If classified according to the objectives that motivated the compiler, Christian florilegia cover the entire field of ecclesiastical disciplines. Thus, one finds florilegia that comment on Sacred Scripture, the valuable "exegetical chains." Still others try to prove or defend a specific point of doctrine-these are the dogmatic or apologetic florilegia. Liturgical florilegia furnish formulas of prayers for those participating in religious ceremonies. Other florilegia provide preachers with citations and examples, and are called homiletic sententiaries. Among these one must distinguish between collections of plans or excerpts of sermons laid out according to the liturgical year and those that are the result of the study of the art of preaching; there are also alphabetical lists of quotations on vices and virtues, on the spiritual life, and on prayer. Canonical florilegia codify the jurisprudence of the Church, and spiritual anthologies gather together traditional teachings on various aspects of the Christian life, such as spiritual combat and the way of perfection. In the field of ethics, P. Delhaye distinguishes between educational anthologies (among which one should set apart Mirrors of Princes) and anthologies aimed at moral edification. M. Richard divides Greek florilegia into three groups: the Damascan, the sacred-profane, and the monastic florilegia.

Value. Florilegia may transmit excerpts of works that no longer exist; in some rare instances, it may even happen that these excerpts are of sufficient quantity and quality to allow a reconstruction of the general physiognomy of the original work. More often, however, the original works from which the compilers borrowed have survived; yet it is useful, even indispensable, to refer to the work as it was transmitted and interpreted through the florilegia when establishing the critical text of the work in question. Florilegia preserve interesting versions of Biblical and patristic texts, valuable either for the textual history of the Scriptures and the Fathers or for the history of their influence. As collections of citations of ancient authors, florilegia give a precise idea of the influence of these authors in the history of thought and literature. Further, by revealing what works have been commonly read in the past, they furnish information on the culture of a given period and on the condition of ancient and medieval libraries. However, it must be noted that the compilers did not always refer directly to the sources that they quoted; often they cited only already existing florilegia. Many anthologies are preceded by letters of advice or by prologues in which the compilers make explicit the reason for their collection. In the absence of such prefaces, however, their intentions can easily be determined by examining the plan and the contents of the collection, lists of capitula being significant in this regard. Knowledge of the compiler's objectives makes it possible to pass judgment on the methods he used to attain his end. By unveiling the didactic and pedagogic processes of reasoning and memorization implicit in the florilegia, one can penetrate the psychology of the compilers, of the scribes who copied and multiplied their work, and of their readers. A world of preoccupations, problems, proposed solutions, and realizations becomes intelligible, thanks to the florilegia, which are witnesses of a past no longer accessible except by the mirror of these writings.

Limitations. Florilegia, like all digests and excerpts, have their limitations. Selection, which is the basis of the work, implies discrimination. The compilers retain only what is considered useful for their ends, thus often ignoring nuances, explanations, and transitions. They preserve only the lapidary phrase, the punch line, the paradoxical sentences easy to memorize. Briefly, florilegia have a tendency to schematize, to devitalize the original idea, sometimes so much so that a sentence, taken out of its original context and used in the florilegia, no longer conveys its original meaning. Compilers were not always able or willing to transcribe faithfully, either because they did not understand certain passages of their model or because the model itself was defective for various reasons. It is quite possible that they copied from texts that had become illegible or that they tried to give passages a meaning alien to that of the author. Precaution is therefore necessary in using these collections. Before basing an argument on any one of the excerpts it is essential to refer first, whenever possible, to the text of the original work.

FLORINUS, ST.

Fl. Rhaetia, Switzerland, seventh century. He was educated by Alexander, a priest of St. Peter's Church, who resigned his office in his favor after the young man's ordination. The early accounts of his life (Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis, 2 v. 3063–3065), written for the edification of the reader, are in large part unreliable. They recount a number of miracles supposed to have been worked by the saint. He was reported to have been buried in his parish church, but his relics were later transferred to the collegiate church of St. Florinus in Koblenz, Germany, and to the Abbey of Schönau in the Archdiocese of Trier. He is venerated as the patron of the Diocese of Chur.

Feast: Nov. 17.

FLOROVSKY, GEORGE

Scholar and prominent Russian Orthodox theologian in the West; b. Odessa (Ukraine), Aug. 28, 1893, of a priest's family; d. 1974. Georges Vasilievich Florovsky (Georgij Vasilievich Florovskij) received a solid philosophical and scientific training at that city's university, under such renowned professors as N. N. Lange, B. Babkin, and I. P. Pavlov. His first published works were on laboratory experiments and classical philology. In 1920, fleeing Bolshevik occupation of his country, he settled in Sofia (Bulgaria), where he was drawn into the "Eurasian" group of Prince N. S. Trubeckoy, opposed to the older Russian currents of the Westernizers and the Slavophiles, through its insistence on the merits of Asian and Tartar values in Russian culture and world mission. Florovsky's personal position, however, evolved towards the acceptance of Byzantine-Orthodox culture as the true vocation of Russia.

Between 1922 and 1926 he resided in Prague as a lecturer in the philosophy of law at the Russian University Center, established by Russian emigrés. When the Russian Theological Institute of St. Sergius opened in Paris, Florovsky was among the first to join the faculty as professor of patristics (1926). In 1932 he was ordained a priest for the Russian Exarchate of Western Europe, under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of Constantinople.

In Paris, Florovsky developed his thesis on the irreplaceable value of the intellectual experience of the Fathers of the Church for Christian dogma and theology. His two books on the Eastern and Byzantine Fathers produced during this period offer a powerful vision of Christian thought, forever grounded in that golden age of theology. The latter's impact-or the lack of it-on Russian theology was the object of his next major work, The Ways of Russian Theology (1937), which stirred a memorable conflict within the Russian emigré intelligenzia. His basic thesis was offered for discussion at the First International Congress of Orthodox Theologians in Athens (1936). At this time he became more and more engaged in the Ecumenical Movement in its different stages, often fighting almost singlehanded in order to keep it open to Orthodox insights. His later contribution to the World Assembly in Evanston, Ill. (1954), eased the way for the Russian Orthodox Church and other Eastern Churches into the World Council of Churches (New Delhi 1961).

In 1948 Florovsky moved to New York City in order to teach at St. Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, where as dean (1951–55) he insisted on high academic standards and was instrumental in starting the prestigious St. Vladimir's Seminary Quarterly (1950). During this same period, he lectured at Columbia University (1950–55), the Holy Cross Greek Orthodox Theological School in Brookline, Mass. (1955), Harvard Divinity School (1956), and Princeton (1961). On the occasion of his 80th birthday, shortly before his death, the Pontifical Institute for Oriental Studies in Rome published a Festschrift (1973) in his honor.

Influence. Florovsky left a mark in several fields of Christian doctrine and life, well beyond the strictly Russian boundaries of his Orthodox allegiance. His impact is particularly felt in his emphasis on the Hellenic quality of Orthodoxy, his anti-Nestorian Orthodox Christology, and his desire for true collegiality.

The age of the Fathers of the Church is for Florovsky, not just a stage in the development of theology, but a real turning point of Christian thought towards Orthodoxy, obtained through the happy marriage of the original Christian message and Greek thought, and duly adapted (baptized) to the needs of the former. To neglect the heritage of the Fathers would mean to go back to a stage of theological uncertainty and a breeding ground of christological heresies.

His view of orthodox Christology is that obtained and fully understood only through the suffered experience of the Eastern Church, as witnessed by the early ecumenical councils, and particularly Chalcedon. In order to safeguard true doctrine against the Nestorian temptation of Western Christianity, Florovsky propounds "asymmetric Christology" as a guarantee of hypostatic union in Christ.

The Russian word SOBORNOST, which translates as collegiality, is key to Florovsky's ecclesiology. Sobornost sets Christ at the core of the church, which is His extension as Christified humanity—the Augustinian Christus totus, caput et membra—made one in Christ, through the action of the Spirit and the ministry of the successors of the Apostles. Intensive catholicity, made present in the local church, would express adequately the fullness of ecclesiality, before recourse to any wider form of the church.

FLORUS OF LYONS

Carolingian author; b. probably Spain, late 8th century; d. Lyons, France, 860. In Lyons c. 800, he was the most important cultural figure in the school founded there by LEIDRADUS. Nearly all the official acts of the See of Lyons under Bishops Leidradus (798-814), AGOBARD (814-840), Amulo (840-852), and REMIGIUS (852-875) were performed under his influence or direction, even though they do not bear his signature. His role in the dispute between AMALARIUS of Metz and GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS was important, but his writings were more often concerned with the liturgy, exegesis, and Canon Law. The Liber de imaginibus of Pseudo-Agobard attributed to him is by CLAUDIUS OF TURIN, also from the school of Lyons. Most of Florus's works are of a collective nature, but their importance lies in what he selected. His works include: a compilation from 12 FATHERS OF THE CHURCH on the Epistles of St. Paul (in MS), an Expositio missae (ed. P. Duc, Belley 1937), an edition of the Martyrology, sentences of St. AUGUSTINE on predestination and grace, works against Amalarius, who had usurped the See of Lyons (Patrologia Latina 119:72-96), a treatise against JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA (Patrologia Latina 119:102-250), three treatises against Gottschalk, and a collection of canons of Troyes (in MS), from which have been published a De electione episcoporum and a De lege et canone.

FLOWER, RICHARD, BL.

Lay martyr; vere Floyd or Lloyd; alias Graye, Fludd; b. c. 1567 in Anglesey (Diocese of Bangor), North Wales; d. Aug. 30, 1588, hanged at Tyburn (London). Flower, the younger brother of Fr. Owen Lloyd, was arrested in London (1588) and condemned for assisting Fr. William Horner, a seminary priest. He suffered with Bl. Fr. Richard LEIGH and the blessed laymen Edward Shelley, Richard Martin, John Roche (all beatified in 1929), and St. Margaret WARD. He is frequently confused with Fr. William WAY, who used the alias Flower. Bl. Richard Flower was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

FLOWERS, SYMBOLISM OF

Flowers have frequently been understood as signs of a larger reality, and individual species have been used metaphorically as symbols. Though the Bible mentions nearly 100 species of flora, few of the flowers can be positively identified. Even the lilies of Christ's logion in Mt 6.28 are not the flower known today. In the Scriptures generally the life and death cycle of plants is primarily a sign of the transitory nature of life; the blossoming and withering of flowers illustrate particularly the swift passage of beauty. "Man, born of woman, is short-lived and full of trouble, like a flower that springs up and fades" (Jb 14.1). "For the sun rises with a burning heat and parches the grass, and its flower falls and the beauty of its appearance perishes. So too will the rich man wither in his ways" (Jas 1.10). Because flowers signal the spring (Sg 2.12), and because of their fragrance and beauty, and yet precisely because they pass so quickly, they acquired a further symbolic meaning. A great and lasting presence of flowers is to be a sign of the Messianic kingdom. "The desert and the parched land will exult; the steppe will rejoice and bloom. They will bloom with abundant flowers . . .'' (Is 35.1).

Symbols played a prominent role in early Christian art; for example, in the catacombs of Domitilla, Praetextatus, and Callistus, and in the mosaics at Ravenna and the vault of the mausoleum of St. Constance in Rome, where garlands of flowers signify the paradisial state of the saints. Various flowers were used to designate persons and virtues. The lily as a sign of virginity is among the most ancient. The full development of this type of symbolism came in the late Middle Ages when flowers became part of an elaborate sign language, which was a major catechetical tool. The Renaissance added some of the flower symbolism of pagan times. The most important flowers were the lily (representing purity, Christ, Mary, and especially the Annunciation) and the rose, which had a wide variety of meanings depending on its color or the presence or absence of thorns, etc. The violet signified humility; the hyacinth, power or peace; the daisy, innocence; the tulip, prayer; the sunflower, soul longing for God; the lotus, eloquence; the marigold, jealousy. The passion flower illustrates the popular propensity to find symbolic representation, each of its many parts having been suggestive of an instrument of Christ's passion. Contemporary Christian symbolism is drawn mainly from the Bible and is less extravagant.

FLOYD, JOHN

Jesuit theologian and controversialist; b. Cambridgeshire, England, 1572; d. Saint-Omer, France, Sept. 15, 1649. Admitted to English College, Reims (1588), he proceeded to Rome, where he entered the English College (1590). He joined the Society of Jesus in 1592. On the mission in England at the time of the Gunpowder Plot (1605) he visited Father Edward Oldcorne in Worcester Gaol and was himself captured and imprisoned. A year later he was exiled but afterward returned to England and underwent several further imprisonments. Floyd spent much of the later part of his life abroad, mostly at the English Jesuit College of Saint-Omer. He enjoyed a great reputation as a theologian and controversialist and wrote many books in defense of the Catholic cause against the English Protestants. He also defended in print, against certain of the English Catholic clergy and against the Sorbonne, the policy of the papacy in temporarily withholding a bishop from the Church in England. He used various pseudonyms: Daniel of Jesus, I. R. Student in Divinity, Fidelis Annosus, and Hermanus Loemelius.

FOCHER, JUAN

Franciscan lawyer and author, date and place of birth unknown; d. Mexico City, 1572. Of French origin, Focher had already received the doctorate in law in Paris before entering the Franciscan Order in the Province of Aquitania. He went to New Spain in 1540 and spent the rest of his life there. In the complex problems of beginning Church organization, his personality and training made him something of an oracle, consulted by episcopal chapters and committees. His treatises cover the main problems of colonization and evangelization of the period, and are of special importance for religious history and for the development of Mexican civil law. They demonstrate a systematic theory of evangelization for the Americas and show its application, thereby constituting the manual for the Franciscan missionaries in New Spain and the source, in great part, of the inspiration of their methods and practices. His Itinerarium catholicum is universally considered as the first attempt at a manual of systematic missiology in which is stated, for the first time, the theory of the royal vicarship in the Indies to explain the relations between Spain and the Native American Church. His numerous works were circulated at the end of the 19th century among bibliophiles, but they are largely unknown and unpublished.

FOCOLARE MOVEMENT

The worldwide Focolare Movement (Work of Mary) embodies a specific form of spirituality best described as the Gospel seen from the perspective of unity; the aim is to strive for the unity Jesus prayed for on the night before he died; "Father, may they all be one" (see Jn 17:21). Focolare had its origin in 1943 in Trent, Italy, when a young schoolteacher, Chiara Lubich, together with a few young women, amid the devastation of World War II, came to see that there is but one ideal that can never fail. This "ideal" is God, who is love. They focused their lives on the gospel and many others followed. Within a few months, over 500 people had joined them in living what was emerging as a new spirituality in the Church: the "spirituality of unity," which is based on the mutual love inherent in Jesus' new commandment. It is a way of going to God together, which brings about a change in individuals, in groups and society, uniting people beyond all their differences.

In 1962 Focolare was initially approved by Pope John XXIII, and received the continued blessing of Pope Manuscript prologue page from "Tractatus de Baptismo et Matrimonie Noviter Conversorum ad Fidem," 16th century, by Juan Focher.

Paul VI, who on Feb. 8, 1978, said to a group of its members: "Be faithful to your inspiration which is so modern and so fruitful." The movement spread to every continent and came into special prominence in 1977 when its foundress, Chiara Lubich, was awarded the Templeton Prize for progress in religion.

The spirituality of the Focolare Movement bears striking kinship with the spirit of the Second Vatican Council. The council frequently recalls the promise of Jesus to be present wherever two or more are united in his name (Mt 18.20). The council's stress on unity is well known. "For the promotion of unity belongs to the innermost nature of the Church" (Gaudium et spes 42). These are only two of the fundamental points of the spirituality of the movement.

The Focolare Movement has many branches, including five that are movements in their own right, though animated by an identical spirituality and represented in the General Coordinating Council of Focolare in Rome and locally. At the core are the focolarini, lay men and women living in separate communities called Focolare houses. Following the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the focolarini work as other lay persons in regular jobs and professions. Their goal is to maintain unity and hence the presence of the risen Lord. Some married persons, while continuing to live in their families, participate fully in the life of the Focolare houses.

Also part of the Focolare Movement are the Volunteers, who emerged in the wake of the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. They are lay people wholly committed to living the spirituality of unity and, through it, to renewing society.

The young generations make up three Movements known as the Gen (New Generation), first formed in 1966. They are divided according to their age into the Gen II for teenagers and young adults; Gen III for children; and the Gen IV for the little ones.

The priests' movement is made up of diocesan priests committed to living the Focolare spirituality. Often the life of unity of these priests brings about a transformation of parish life. Seminarians living this spirit make up the GenS (Gen Seminarians).

There are also bishops who share in the spirituality of the Focolare, as well as men and women religious, who are associated with Focolare while continuing to live in their own communities. Focolare spirituality helps them to see how the specific charism of their founders can be lived in the present time. They also cultivate a rapport of unity with other religious orders and congregations. Young religious living this spirit form the GenR (Gen Religious).

Between 1966 and 1984, a further development saw the emergence of large-scale but less formally organized bodies within the Focolare: New Humanity, New Families, Youth for a United World, Young for Unity, Parish Movement; all of these aim to bring a spirit of unity into their respective environments and fields of endeavor.

At the international headquarters of the Focolare, the president (who according to its statutes will always be a lay woman) is helped by a council in which all branches of the Focolare and all aspects of the life of its members are represented. The Focolare throughout the world is organized in 75 "zones" (i.e., geographical territories), each with its own council acting in unity with the international headquarters.

Wherever the Focolare Movement exists various ecumenical activities take place. Of particular interest is the Ecumenical Center of Ottmaring, Germany, where Lutherans and Catholics work together, though they live in separate communities. Over the years, the Focolare has built relationships with many ecclesial movements and associations within the Catholic Church. The movement is present throughout the Christian world and has also spread, particularly since 1977, among non-Christian religions.

The Focolare carries on social, cultural, and economic activities in many countries. Every year summer meetings called Mariapolis (City of Mary), are held for those who wish to come into contact with Focolare. The goal of the Mariapolis is to generate the presence of Christ in the community through the practice of mutual and constant charity. Permanent Mariapolises exist in Italy, Africa, Argentina, and Brazil. The movement operates "New City" publishing houses in many countries. The Focolare monthly magazine New/Living City, is devoted to the spirituality of the movement, and is published in 24 languages. In the United States the Mariapolis Luminosa, New City Press, and Living City magazine are located in Hyde Park, N.Y. In 1991 the movement launched the "Economy of Sharing," a set of guidelines intended to reconcile the often conflicting worlds of economics and solidarity.

On the vigil of Pentecost 1998, during the meeting of ecclesial movements and new communities with Pope John Paul II, Chiara Lubich described the essence of that something new the Focolare offers. "Holy Father, you identified love as the 'inspiring spark' of all that is done under the name of Focolare, and it is really true. It is the driving force of our movement. Being love and spreading love is our general aim. In fact, the Focolare Movement is called to bring an invasion of love into the world."

FOLCWIN OF LOBBES

Benedictine abbot, chronicler; b. c. 935; d. 990. In 948 he became a monk at SAINT-BERTIN, near Thérouanne, where Saint FOLCWIN, his great uncle, was bishop. In 965, designated abbot of LOBBES by Bp. Everaclus of Liège, he is supposed to have received the abbatial blessing at Cologne on Christmas Day in the presence of Emperor Otto I. Only in 1881 was it rediscovered that Folcwin of Saint-Bertin and Folcwin of Lobbes were the same man. His intelligent use of documentary evidence and his distrust of mere oral tradition give him special importance as a writer. His works include a history of the abbots of Saint-Bertin, written 961-962 (Patrologia Latina 136:1181–1278; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 13:606-634); a life of Saint Folcwin of Thérouanne, written between 970 and 972 (Patrologia Latina 137:535-542; Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15.1:424-430); a history of the abbots of Lobbes, written between 972 and 980 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 4:54-74); and a history of the miracles of Abbots URSMAR and Erminus of Lobbes, written c. 980 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15.2:832-842).

FOLIOT, GILBERT

English abbot and bishop; b. c. 1110 of a wellconnected Anglo-Norman family; d. Feb. 18, 1187. Trained in Roman and Canon Law and theology, he taught in the schools before becoming a monk at Cluny c. 1132 and, subsequently, was prior of Abbeville. Chosen by King Stephen in 1139 to be abbot of Gloucester, he won the friendship of Archbishop Theobald, who in 1148 secured his election to the See of Hereford, where he speedily became the most respected bishop in England. Disappointed in his expectation of succeeding Theobald at Canterbury by the election of Thomas BECK-ET, whom he disliked, and unappeased by his translation to London in 1163, Foliot, after quarrelling with Becket at Clarendon and Northampton, became the leading spirit of the opposition to the exiled Archbishop, though by no means entirely the King's man. In a war of pamphlets his letter Multiplicem stands out as a rhetorical masterpiece and bitter summary of charges against Becket. Twice excommunicated, Foliot was unreconciled when Becket was murdered, but accepted the Archbishop's canonization with good grace. As bishop, Foliot was frequently a papal judge–delegate and helped to establish the personnel of his cathedral. He owes his celebrity to his share in the great controversy between HENRY II and St. Thomas, and while his action is comprehensible, he does not emerge as an attractive or saintly figure. He remains an enigma. Although upright, austere, energetic, and influential, his character contained elements of ambition, rigidity, harshness, and, possibly, even duplicity. His correspondence with many of the leading men of his time is an important source for the political history of England in the mid-12th century.

FOLKSTONE, ABBEY OF

The first nunnery of Anglo-Saxon England, was built by King Eadwald of Kent c. 630 for his daughter Eanswith, its first abbess (c. 614–640). The destruction of the abbey was begun by the incursions of the sea and completed by Danish invaders, perhaps in 867. In 927 King Athelstan granted the land to Christ Church, Canterbury, to be refounded as a priory for monks, dedicated to St. Mary and St. Eanswith. After the Norman Conquest the house became an alien cell of Lonlay, Normandy, but later returned to English allegiance. When the sea again undermined the site, the monks, in 1137, moved for safety to a new church. Here, in what is now the parish church, St. Eanswith's reputed relics are still preserved, although nothing remains of the monastic buildings that were surrendered to King Henry VIII on Nov. 15, 1535.

FOLLOWING OF CHRIST (IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE)

In the earliest Christian writings the concept of identification with Christ was the fundamental and allpervading notion. TERTULLIAN's apothegm Christianus alter Christus found manifold expression throughout patristic literature and was admirably synthesized by ISI-DORE OF SEVILLE (Sententiae 1.30.4): "Christ is one in Himself and in us" (unus in se et in nobis est Christus). CYPRIAN summed up the following of Christ: "We ought to cling to His words, to study His teachings, and to imitate His life" (De unitate ecclesiae 1.2). The perfect realization of this ideal was found in the martyr. IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH pleaded in his letter to the Romans: "Let me imitate the passion of my Lord." In this same spirit the ascetics embraced a life of total dedication. "Let Christ be your life's breath" was the admonition of ANTHONY OF EGYPT.

With the CHRISTOLOGICAL controversies of the 4th century the simple devotion of early Christianity assumed a more theological expression. Although the Doctors of the Church insisted upon the reality of Christ's human nature as the exemplary cause of all holiness, they referred to man's likeness to God as the special end of the Incarnation. In the Greek Fathers this idea was especially emphatic. In the East, however, stress was placed on the redeeming act of Christ, who raised us to a share in His divinity; in the West there was more emphasis on our imitation of Him: "What does it mean to be a disciple of Christ if we do not copy His compassion and imitate His humility?" (Ambrose, Sermo 29). These two aspects of Christological devotion, reverence for the divinity of the Word Incarnate and imitation of the sacred humanity of Jesus, were combined in the teaching of St. Augustine: "In His divinity He dwells within our souls; in His humanity He sets before our eyes the example of His life and thereby draws our hearts to Himself" (Sermo 264). In the 11th century PETER DAMIAN summed up this tradition: "It is truly great to die for Christ, but not less noble to live for Him'' (Sermo 32; PL 144:6803).

With St. BERNARD the Christology of the West turned strongly toward the mysteries of Christ's human life. Bernard's affective trend in spirituality influenced subsequent writers. The Cistercian mystics developed profound love for the Sacred Humanity. Their prayer was a progression from the contemplation of Christ in the Scriptures and liturgy to the experience of union with Him and thence to imitation of His acts. The culmination of this devotion is to be found in the Franciscan tradition of deep emotional response to the mysteries of Jesus' human life and suffering. The stigmata of St. FRANCIS, the poetic tradition of the STABAT MATER, and the Meditationes vitae Christi find theological basis in the writings of St. BONAVENTURE and in the teaching of DUNS SCOTUS that love has precedence over knowledge.

Following more closely in the patristic tradition, the Dominicans developed a theological approach to the love of Christ. For St. THOMAS AQUINAS contemplation is wisdom in the intellect, charity in the will, and peace in the heart. Devotion is the gift of oneself to God, rather than complacency or enjoyment of Him. Thomas treated the mystery of the Incarnation as the principal work of Divine Providence and taught that every action of Christ was meant to lead men toward God. But the primary object of devotion is always the Person of the Word (Summa Theologiae 2a2ae, 82.1, 3).

The greatest mystic of the Dominican Order, CATH-ERINE OF SIENA, remained Thomistic in doctrine, but was more intuitive and practical in her zeal for the Church and her participation in Christ's suffering. Dominican mysticism in Germany under TAULER and HENRY SUSO took an affective turn in attempting to follow Christ to the cross, that is, by the willing acceptance of suffering, and thus win a share in His love.

The epitome of medieval piety is found in the Vita Christi of LUDOLPH OF SAXONY—a work that combines patristic and medieval spirituality with such clarity and unction that it merits to be called the book of the imitation of Jesus Christ. It is not so much a biography as a set of meditations on the life of Christ. The considerations are filled with tender reverence for "the exemplar of all holiness, the Lord Jesus Christ, who came from heaven that He might go before us on the road to eternal life." The prayers that conclude each meditation open the way, through love of Christ's humanity, to that penetration to the depths of His divinity whereby the medieval saints strove to form their souls in the image of Him who is the Image of the invisible God.

FONCK, LEOPOLD

Exegete and founder, under Pius X, of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL INSTITUTE; b. Wissen, near Düsseldorf, Germany, Jan. 14, 1865; d. Vienna, Austria, Oct. 19, 1930. He made his humanistic studies at Kempen, Germany, and his philosophical and theological studies at the Gregorian University, Rome. Ordained in 1889, he entered the Society of Jesus in Germany in 1892. His biblical studies, begun at the Gregorian under R. Cornely, were continued from 1893 to 1899 in England, Egypt, and Palestine and at the Universities of Berlin and Munich. He taught NT exegesis at the University of Innsbruck from 1901 to 1908, when he was invited to the Gregorian. That was the age of the crisis of Modernism. In 1907, PIUS X published the decree LAMENTABILI and the encyclical PASCENDI; in 1909 he founded the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome and made Fonck its first rector. The directives of Pius X determined all of Fonck's work and thought.

For the next 20 years, Fonck devoted himself to this institute. As rector from 1909 to 1919 (though exiled to Switzerland during the war years, 1915–19), he formed its library, museum, publications, courses, and scientific method and prepared the founding of a filial institute in Jerusalem. Thereafter, he served as professor and as editor of Biblica. He was also a consultor of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION. His last years were spent in Prague and Vienna, where he devoted himself to the ministry.

Among the several books by Fonck on biblical topics, the best-known are his Parabeln des Herrn im Evangelium (Innsbruck 1902, 4th ed. 1927) and Wunder des Herren (Innsbruck 1903, 3d ed. 1907); the former appeared in English as The Parables of the Gospels, tr. G. O'Neill (New York 1915, 3d ed. 1918).

FONSECA, PETER DA

Philosopher; b. Proença-a-Nova, Portugal, 1528; d. Lisbon, Nov. 4, 1599. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1548, studied at the University of Evora, and spent a number of years as teacher of philosophy and theology in the University of Coimbra. A man of great tact and finesse, he was appointed to important committees by his religious superiors and was sent on several delicate missions. He was one of six Jesuits appointed to work out the Jesuits code of education, the Ratio Studiorum. From 1567 to 1592 he held such offices in the society as rector, general's assistant, superior of a professed house, and visitor; contrary to what one sometimes reads, he was never provincial. After Portugal was incorporated under the crown of Spain (1582), Philip II used Fonseca's influence and ability to remedy the moral and social evils of Lisbon. Fonseca reminded his contemporaries of St. Ignatius Loyola by reason of his prudence, his choice of apostolic works, and his manner of accomplishing his goals.

Fonseca is best known, however, for his contribution to the renaissance of SCHOLASTICISM in the 16th century. He wrote a popular text in dialectics and an introduction to philosophy; but his most important work was his fourvolume Commentarii in libros Metaphysicorum Aristotelis (Lisbon 1577–89). With a humanist's taste and philological background, Fonseca attended to textual criticism and always tried to get as accurate a Greek reading as possible. The Greek is accompanied by Fonseca's own translation. The commentary tries to interpret Aristotle strictly according to Aristotle himself; but after the commentary Fonseca adds a number of special questions in which he treats, in a personal fashion and sometimes at great length, almost all philosophical questions.

Though Thomistic in a broad sense, Fonseca nevertheless taught that the human intellect has a direct knowledge of singulars; that created existence is only an intrinsic mode of a finite essence; that primary matter is not altogether potency; and that the principle of individuation adds something positive to a thing's essence. Fonseca was one of the first to utilize scientia media (God's knowledge of hypothetical future free actions) as a means of reconciling human freedom with divine foreknowledge, predestination, and efficacious grace. Luis de MOLI-NA probably arrived at the doctrine of scientia media independently of and before Fonseca, but this point is still debated.

FONTBONNE, SAINT JOHN, MOTHER

Mother superior, educator, and second foundress of the Sisters of St. Joseph, b. Bas-en-Basset, France, March 31, 1769; d. Lyon, Nov. 22, 1843. Jeanne Fontbonne was the daughter of Michel Fontbonne and Benoîte Theillière, the second oldest of five surviving children. She was educated by the Sisters of St. Joseph in Bas-en-Basset, where two of her aunts taught in the school. Later she completed her studies at Le Puy-en-Velay. On July 1, 1778, she and her sister Marie accompanied their aunts to a new foundation at Monistrol, where they were to become the first postulants. Bas-en-Basset and Monistrol are located about mid-way between Le Puy and Saint-Etienne, in the department of Haute-Loire.

On Dec. 17, 1778, Marie and Jeanne received the religious habit and the names of Sisters Saint Teresa and Saint John, respectively. Sister Saint John's leadership qualities were already evident, and she was elected superior of Monistrol in 1785. She immediately undertook the establishment of a training school where the poor could learn a trade, and obtained financial help from a wealthy citizen, Madame de Chantemule. Bishop de Galard encouraged her efforts; the hospital and schools progressed.

With the outbreak of the Revolution in 1789, the work of the sisters was in danger. Bishop de Galard, who had refused the constitutional oath, was forced to flee. Father Ollier, the local pastor, took the oath and became hostile toward the sisters, who also refused to swear allegiance to the new government. On Sept. 29, 1792, most of the sisters abandoned their convent and returned to their families. Mother Saint John remained along with her sister and Sister Martha. They continued their charitable work in the hospital in secular dress, but Father Ollier's insistence that they participate in the religious services that he conducted eventually drove them away, and on Oct. 14, 1792, they returned to the Fontbonne family home in Bas, where they observed the rule as much as possible.

Late in 1793, the three sisters were imprisoned at Monfranc (St-Didier-en-Velay), where others, including their aunts, were later condemned. Here they continued their life of prayer. They rejoiced as the day of their execution drew near, only to learn that they had been spared by the fall of Robespierre (July 27, 1794). When liberated, they returned to the Fontbonne home, where they resumed a life of service while in secular dress. Mother Saint John always regretted that she was not worthy to die as a martyr, but other great works awaited her.

In 1807, the need for religious education among the generation raised during the Revolution was imperative. Joseph Cardinal Fesch of Lyon, the uncle of Napoleon, through the intermediary of the Vicar General Father Claude Cholleton, called Mother Saint John to direct a group of women in St-Etienne, called the "Black Daughters," or popularly, "the Sisters of a Happy Death," because they attended the sick and the dying. She left her home on Aug. 14, 1807, to meet this unknown group, in whom she found kindred spirits. She gave them the Rule of the Sisters of St. Joseph that Father Médaille had drawn up and taught them to temper their austerities and combine the interior life with service to others. On July 14, 1808, she received twelve of them into the Congregation at the Maison Pascal. Father Piron addressed them in these words: "You are but few, my daughters, but like a swarm of bees, you shall spread yourselves everywhere But, while increasing, preserve always the humility and simplicity which should characterize the Daughters of St. Joseph."

Shortly afterward, another group at Rue Micarême joined the sisters. This establishment became the first motherhouse. Other foundations appeared; old ones were restored. Soon the necessity of a common novitiate became apparent. Formerly each house prepared its own postulants and novices; however, under the Napoleonic system, centralization was in order. In 1816, Mother Saint John obtained property, formerly a Carthusian Monastery, adjoining buildings, and the Château Yon, all located in the Croix-Rousse section of Lyon. This site, rue des Chartreux, became the motherhouse of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Lyon.

Other motherhouses were formed from Lyon, including Chambéry, Gap, Bourg, Annecy, and Bordeaux. Former foundations, now restored, became independent motherhouses, such as Le Puy, Clermont-Ferrand, and Saint-Vallier. In 1836, Mother Saint John accepted an appeal from Bishop Joseph Rosati of St. Louis, Missouri, in the United States, and sent six sisters, among them her two nieces, followed by two other sisters who were trained as instructors to the deaf. This group became the seed that gave birth to over thirty congregations of Sisters of St. Joseph in the United States and Canada. In 1831, sisters went to Italy where they formed independent foundations. Under Mother Saint John's leadership, the congregation expanded to include over 240 houses with 3,000 sisters.

In 1839, Mother Saint John resigned her office, and Mother Sacred Heart replaced her. She spent her remaining days in prayer and simple tasks, often giving conferences to the sisters, some of which have been preserved. She died on Nov. 22, 1843, at the motherhouse in Lyon. She is revered by the Sisters of St. Joseph as the second foundress, and as an example of the charity and humility encouraged by Father Médaille. Many buildings in American foundations bear her name, and her memory remains alive on both sides of the Atlantic.

FONTE, PEDRO JOSÉ

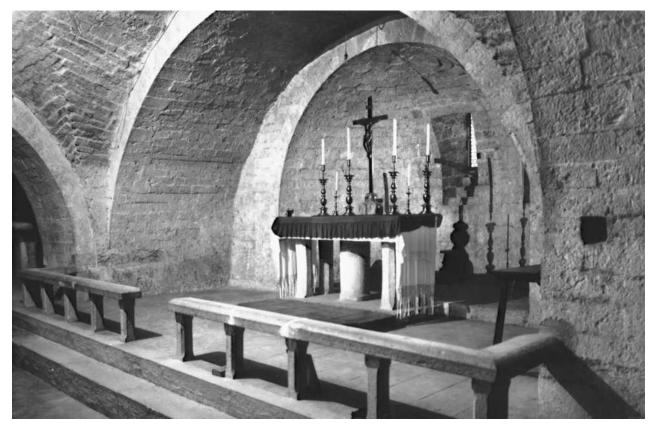

Thirty-first archbishop of Mexico; b. Linares, Aragon, May 13, 1777; d. June 11, 1839. In 1802, the year of his ordination, Pedro José de Fonte y Hernández de Miravete was invited by the archbishop of Mexico, Francisco Javier de Lizana y Beaumont, to become his vicargeneral and provisor.

After Archbishop Lizana died in 1811, the See of Mexico remained vacant until Fonte was consecrated June 29, 1816. When Mexico became independent, Archbishop Fonte returned to Spain. Following the recognition of Mexican independence by Spain in 1837, Pope Gregory XVI ordered him either to return to his see or to resign. Fonte chose resignation.

The first four years of his reign passed uneventfully since the movement for independence had all but collapsed with the execution of Morelos. In April of 1820 news of the Riego revolt in Spain and the readoption of the Constitution of 1812 reached Mexico. Fundamentally, the archbishop espoused political conservatism, but loyalty to the crown overrode his personal convictions. All Church leaders swore allegiance to the constitution, and in July the archbishop defended its freedom of the press, guarantees of political liberty and equality, and suppression of the Inquisition. In spite of the increasing anticlericalism demonstrated by the Spanish Cortes, Fonte remained loyal, even when all his suffragans during 1821 swore allegiance to Agustín de Iturbide, the conservative army commander who declared for independence.

When Iturbide's victory seemed assured, Fonte prepared to leave the country, but Capt.–Gen. Juan O'Donojú persuaded him to delay his departure. The archbishop agreed to remain if the King would accept the Treaty of Córdoba signed by Iturbide and O'Donojú in late August. When Iturbide entered Mexico City in triumph, the archbishop met him at the doors of the cathedral and intoned a solemn Te Deum of thanksgiving. He counseled his clergy to obey the new government, but he himself refused to participate.

His last important act as reigning archbishop was to report to the regency on Oct. 19, 1821, the results of his deliberations with his cathedral chapter and a junta of bishops on the question of filling ecclesiastical vacancies. The consensus was that patronage had ended with independence, and that until Mexico received a new concession from the Holy See, the bishops had the power to appoint. In April of 1822 the Ministry of Justice and Ecclesiastical Affairs rejected this contention, but by this time the Spanish government had repudiated the Treaty of Córdoba and Fonte was ready to depart.

FONTE AVELLANA, MONASTERY OF

Camaldolese monastery in the Apennines, Diocese of Cagli-Pergola (former Diocese of Gubbio), central Italy. Tradition ascribes its founding (c. 1000) to Ludolf (d. 1047), a disciple of St. ROMUALD. It flourished under St. PETER DAMIAN (d. 1072) and became known for writings on asceticism, liturgy, and canon law (AVELLANA COLLECTIO), as well as for its role in the Gregorian reform. Papal protection was granted in 1076. It was head of an eremitical congregation of 18 monasteries, eight hermitages, and 15 priories (which came under papal protection in 1301) until 1325, when it was made an abbey. After being made commendatory in 1392, it fell into decline (see COMMENDATION). In 1569 the congregation was suppressed and attached to that of CAMALDOLI. The monastery was suppressed (1808–14 and 1866–1875) and restored as a hermitage in 1935. The Romanesque chapel and the scriptorium are noteworthy. Many saints lived at Fonte Avellana: DOMINIC LORICATUS, JOHN OF LODI, AL-BERTINUS, and some 50 others.

FONTENELLE (SAINT-WANDRILLE), ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey near Caudebec-en-Caux on the right bank of the Seine River, in the Archdiocese of ROUEN, north France. It was founded in 649 by St. WAN-DRILLE (d. 668) and his nephew in the forest of Jumièges near the Roman road from Harfleur to Paris. Under the protection of Abp. OUEN OF ROUEN and Queen BATHILDIS, it grew to 300 monks in 80 years. Its abbots include Ansebert (678-696); Hugh (723-732), the pluralist nephew of Charles Martel (bishop of Rouen, Paris, and Bayeux, and abbot of Fontenelle and JUMIÈGES); and AN-SEGIS (823-833), the compiler of Carolingian capitularies. St. WULFRAM OF SENS (d. 697) evangelized Frisia from Fontenelle; the shrine of his relics was a pilgrimage center (1008 to the 16th century). Revived by Gerwold (787-811) after a brief decline, Fontenelle became known for its hagiographies and for the Gesta abbatum Fontanellensium (written 834-845, in Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores, 11:270-304). The monks fled the Northmen (852) but returned (960) under Mainardus, a monk of Saint-Bavon in Ghent, to flourish under good abbots; there were 77 monks in 1340. The abbey was placed in COMMENDATION (1546), was pillaged by Huguenots (1562), joined the MAURISTS (1636), and was rebuilt. In 1791 it was suppressed, sold, and partly destroyed, but it was restored in 1894 by the archbishop of Rouen with monks from LIGUGÉ. French law caused the monks to withdraw to Belgium (1901-23) and to Réray (1923-31) before they returned in 1931. Abbot Joseph Pothier (1898–1923) and Lucien David were important revivers of GREGORIAN CHANT (see SOLESMES). Fontenelle founded FÉCAMP (659), MONT-SAINT-MICHEL (965), Préaux (1034), Grestain (1036), Saint-Benoît-du-Lac in Quebec, Canada (1912), and several priories (7th-18th century).

FONTEVRAULT, CONVENT OF

Former French double monastery, about 11 miles southeast of Saumur, Maine-et-Loire, France. It was established, probably in 1101, in what was at the time a remote area, by ROBERT OF ARBRISSEL, a renowned preacher and hermit who had inspired many of both sexes to recognize their vocation to the monastic life. The new house attracted special attention when it revived a type of institution not uncommon in western Europe during the early Middle Ages but now little known; it was one of the famous medieval Double MONASTERIES, having communities of men and women living separate existences within a single precinct, both under the single rule of an abbess. The nuns were always the major element there and lived under the BENEDICTINE RULE with observances that demanded an austere and strictly enclosed life. The male community included both clergy and laity and, for a while at least, lived under the Rule of St. AU-GUSTINE.

From its earliest days Fontevrault won the highest reputation, and the size of its community increased: in 1248 the abbey claimed to have a total population of 700 and in 1297 was said to have 360 nuns. It was greatly venerated by King HENRY II of England, who was a generous benefactor to the house, and by his son, King Richard I, who believed he owed his release from captivity to the prayers of its nuns. Both kings were buried at Fontevrault, where their tombs may still be seen along with those of Henry's wife, Eleanor of Aquitaine, his daughter Joan of Sicily, and his daughter-in-law, Isobel of Angoulême. In 1173 the abbey was exempted from episcopal visitation. Fontevrault gradually developed into a religious order that included houses in France and Spain, as well as five in England. In the mid-13th century, JACQUES DE VITRY warmly praised the life of this order.

The abbesses of Fontevrault were not infrequently of high birth, including in their number various members of the royal houses of France. In the 15th century the 26th abbess, Mary of Brittany, found the order in great decay and put forward vigorous new statutes, which under her immediate successors were widely adopted within the order, whose numbers were now much reduced. Later on the situation improved. When the order was suppressed in 1790, it had 59 monasteries. In 1824 there began an attempt to revive the order, and houses were established at Chemillé, Brioude, and Boulaur, but none of these now remain.

After being used as a prison since 1804, the considerable remains of the Abbey of Fontevrault have recently been taken over as an ancient monument. The imposing, Romanesque conventual church, dedicated in 1119, is largely intact, as are the adjoining cloister, chapter house, and refectory (for the most part of 16th century date). A remarkable feature is the huge, 12th-century octagonal kitchen.

FONTFROIDE, ABBEY OF

Former French abbey, first Benedictine, later Cistercian, in the Diocese of Narbonne, the present-day Diocese of Carcassonne. Fontfroide was founded by BENEDICTINES in 1093, but was acquired by the Abbey of Grandselve in 1142, both houses becoming affiliated with CLAIRVAUX in 1145. From this date the community grew rapidly. In 1149, it founded Poblet in Spain, and in 1242, Valbonne in the French Pyrenees. The CISTER-CIANS of Fontfroide played an important role in the fight against the ALBIGENSES. The martyred PETER OF CASTEL-NAU (d. 1208) was a member of the community. The famous abbot of Fontfroide, Jacques Fournier, became BENEDICT XII (1334-42). After the mid-15th century Fontfroide was under commendatory abbots and subsequently lost much of its wealth and membership. In 1768 it had ten professed monks and an annual revenue of 14,000 livres. In 1783 the abbot's portion of the monastic income was granted to the Diocese of Perpignan. Fontfroide was suppressed during the French Revolution in 1791, but was reoccupied by the Cistercians of Sénanque in 1858. The community was ousted again by the French government in 1901. In 1919 the returning monks were resettled in the former Benedictine abbey of Saint-Michel de Cuxa, Fontfroide having been sold. The surviving church of Fontfroide was constructed in the late 12th century and is a fine example of early Cistercian Gothic.

FOOLHARDINESS

A vice opposed to the virtue of fortitude by way of excess. Fortitude, or courage, moderates the passions or emotions of fear and daring; it is concerned with threatening evils that are difficult either to endure or to overcome. Fortitude has two functions: it strengthens a man to the endurance of an evil or to an attack upon it, depending upon which of the alternatives is judged reasonable. Foolhardiness is opposed to fortitude by facing danger and attacking when true virtue would choose rather to flee or to endure the evil. Not only does foolhardiness attack unnecessarily and unreasonably, but it is also likely to attack with greater violence than is warranted by the circumstances. Foolhardiness may be caused by presumption, as when one overestimates his own powers to repel evil (cf. Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 127.2 ad 1); by anger, which can lead to an attempt to repel an aggressor with unnecessary violence or to punish him; or by vainglory, for an attack against evil may come from an unreasonable desire to assert one's own will and gain esteem. It can arise from a contempt for life or for other goods that are risked, or from other causes.

Foolhardiness—like the other offenses against fortitude—is sinful, but its gravity depends on its causes and its effects. If temerity or foolhardiness leads one to put some great good in serious jeopardy or inflict grave harm unnecessarily, the sin is a grave one.

FORBES, ALEXANDER PENROSE

Episcopalian bishop, leader of the OXFORD MOVE-MENT in Scotland; b. Edinburgh, June 6, 1817; d. Dundee, Oct. 8, 1875. He was educated at Edinburgh and at Haileybury College, England, before going to Madras, India, in the East India Company's service. From 1840 to 1844 he attended Oxford University, where he came under the influence of Edward B. PUSEY and other Tractarians. After a brief ministry, he was consecrated bishop of Brechin in the Episcopal Church (1847). As a result of his primary charge (1857) dealing with the eucharistic presence and sacrifice, he was tried in 1860 by his fellow bishops, censured, and admonished. His main theological work, inspired by Pusey and written with his assistance, was An Explanation of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England (1867-68), an Anglo-Catholic interpretation of the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. Forbes hoped for a better understanding between ANGLICANISM and other churches, especially the Roman Catholic, and in pursuit of this goal corresponded with Father V. de Buck, SJ, the Bollandist, and with DÖLLINGER. He was coeditor with his brother, Rev. George Hay Forbes, of the Arbuthnott Missal, (1864), and he wrote Kalendars of Scottish Saints (1872).

FORBES, JOHN

A notable Capuchin Friar Minor of the Belgian Province; b. Aberdeenshire, c. 1570; d. Termonde, Flanders, Aug. 4, 1606. He was the second son of John, 8th Lord Forbes, by his first wife, Margaret Gordon, daughter of the 4th Earl of Huntly, leader of the Scottish Catholics at the time of the Reformation. His father, resolutely anti-Catholic, divorced his Catholic wife, and reared John as a Protestant. John was converted to Catholicism through the secret care of his mother, elder brother, and uncle, James Gordon, SJ. He evaded a marriage that his father had arranged for him by escaping in disguise to Flanders. There he joined the Capuchins at Tournai (1593), receiving the name Archangel, as had his brother, also a Capuchin, who had died in 1592. Paul V, at the request of prominent Scottish Catholics and of Archangel's father, sanctioned (1596) the friar's return to Scotland for the purpose of settling an age-long family feud and assisting the Catholic cause. Archangel, however, pursued his studies at Lille and was ordained. He held important offices among the Belgian Capuchins and won many converts. He died as a result of ministering to the plague-stricken. He is recognized as the de jure 9th Lord Forbes.

Charles de Forbin-Janson.

FORBIN-JANSON, CHARLES DE

Bishop, founder of the Holy Childhood Association; b. Paris, Nov. 3, 1785; d. Aygalades, his family's castle near Marseilles, July 11, 1844. After being appointed auditor of the Council of State by Napoleon I (1805), he joined the CONGRÉGATION, and perhaps the KNIGHTS OF THE FAITH. He entered the Saint Sulpice seminary (1808), and was ordained (1811). He modified his intention to go to China after consulting Pius VII, who urged him to help re-Christianize France after the FRENCH REVOLUTION. Together with Abbé Jean Bauzan he founded the Missionnaires de France, later known as Fathers of MERCY, and served with them until 1823, except in 1817 when he was sent on a mission to Syria. Consecrated bishop of Nancy (1824), he was zealous in preaching but neglected diocesan administration and alienated his clergy. As an opponent of GALLICANISM he refused to sign the Gallican DECLARATION OF THE FRENCH CLERGY. When the revolution of 1830 unseated King Charles X, Forbin-Janson, an ardent monarchist, fled France, leaving to a coadjutor the administration of his diocese. At the request of bishops Benedict FLAGET and John PURCELL, Gregory XVI encouraged him to undertake a missionary tour in the U.S. Between 1839 and 1841 he preached widely and successfully in many cities, including Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Detroit, St. Louis, and New Orleans. At the invitation of the American bishops he attended the Fourth Provincial Council of BALTIMORE (May 1840). During the next two years he preached very frequently in Canada and the U.S. and evangelized the Native Americans. He helped Pauline JARICOT establish the Society for the PROP-AGATION OF THE FAITH. In 1843 he founded the Pontifical Association of the Holy Childhood.

FORCE AND FEAR (CANON LAW)

Canon law adopted definitions of force and fear from Roman law. Force is pressure from a greater thing that cannot be resisted-Vis autem est maioris rei impetus, qui repelli non potest (Corpus iuris civilis, Digesta 4.2.2). Fear is trepidation of mind, caused by an immediate or future danger-Metus est instantis vel futuri periculi causa mentis trepidatio (Corpus iuris civilis, Digesta 4.2.1). Force results in the mere physical propulsion of the victim, who gives no voluntary response. Such force is called physical, absolute, or passive force. If a force is not overpowering, it may still cause fear in the victim. Fear, as St. Thomas Aquinas observed, may result in a voluntary act that would not have been performed if a harm or evil had not been inflicted or threatened (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 6.6). This is moral, conditioned, conditional, causative, or active force and is more frequently simply called fear.

Types of fear. Fear is slight if it is caused by a harm or evil that is inconsequential. Fear is reverential if it is the trepidation normally found in the child-parent relationship and is, of its nature, slight. Fear is qualifiedreverential if the trepidation inherent in the child-parent relationship is augmented by insistencies, harassments, or similar factors; in that case it becomes grave. Fear is grave in an absolute sense if it is serious enough to sway a resolute person; in a true though relative sense, it is grave if it is sufficient to sway a given person because of this person's age, temperament, or other qualities.

Fear is extrinsic if caused by a free agent distinct from the victim; intrinsic, if it arises from the subject's own being (e.g., conscience) or the force of nature. Fear is induced directly if the agent intends a certain act to be performed by the victim or indirectly if such an act is not intended by the agent. Fear is justly induced if (1) the victim deserves the harm or evil inflicted or threatened; (2) the agent has the right to inflict or threaten the harm or evil; and (3) the threats are made or the harm inflicted in a way provided by law. Fear is unjustly induced if (1) the victim does not deserve the harm or evil inflicted or threatened; (2) the agent does not have the right or authority to inflict or threaten the harm or evil; or (3) legal procedures are violated.

Principles and application. All acts that are the result of physical force are invalid (Codex iuris canonici c. 125 §1; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium c. 932 §1). Acts that are the result of fear, though it be grave and unjust, are not invalid unless this is provided in the law, but such acts are subject to nullification by judicial sentence (Codex iuris canonici c. 125 §2; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium c. 932 §2). The canons on fear are designed to protect human freedom, to curtail injury and injustice, and to preclude the unhappy effects that result from coerced actions.

Renunciation of an Office or Benefice. Resignation from an ecclesiastical office is null and void if it is caused by grave, unjustly inflicted fear (Codex iuris canonici c. 188; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium c. 968). The gravity may be absolute or relative, the injustice substantial or in manner.

Holy Orders. No one ever has the right to force a man to receive orders (Codex iuris canonici c. 1026). Physical violence invalidates the Sacrament of Holy Orders (Codex iuris canonici c.125 §1; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium c. 932 §1).

Religious. Entry into the novitiate is invalidated by physical force or grave fear brought to bear either upon a candidate or a superior receiving a candidate (Codex iuris canonici c. 643 §1, 4°; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium cc. 450, 5° and 517 §1). The same canonical provisions obtain for religious profession as for entry into the novitiate (Codex iuris canonici cc. 656, 4° and 658; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium cc. 464, 3°; 527, 3°; and 532).

Marriage. Marriage is invalid if entered into through force or grave fear from without so that the victim, in order to free himself, is forced to choose marriage (Codex iuris canonici c. 1103; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium c. 825).

Vows and Oaths. The law nullifies any vow made as the result of grave, unjust fear (Codex iuris canonici c. 1191 §3; Codex canonum ecclesiarium orientalium c. 889 §3). In the Latin Church, the law also nullifies an oath extorted by force or grave fear (Codex iuris canonici c. 1200 §2).

Crimes. Under Latin discipline, physical force completely eliminates delictual imputability. In laws of purely ecclesiastical origin, grave fear generally eliminates delictual imputability; however, if an act is intrinsically evil or tends to the harm of souls, grave fear lessens but does not exclude imputability (Codex iuris canonici cc. 1323, 1324).

FORCE AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY

Moral responsibility presupposes that a human act is voluntary. A voluntary act, whether of commission or omission, is one in which the cause or moving principle is within the agent, and one which the agent performs consciously and with awareness of the relevant moral circumstances. A person is therefore morally responsible when he knows what he is doing and is free in the sense that, at least interiorly, he is able to act or not to act.

When something is done through physical force or violence, the source or principle of the act is external to the agent. However, not every action that has its source in an external principle is necessarily to be attributed simply to force. In addition, the will, the intrinsic principle from which human and moral action proceeds, must not concur in what is done. Hence, for an action to be violent or forced, and therefore in no sense morally attributable to an agent, not only must its cause be external, but the agent's will must contribute nothing—indeed, must be opposed to—what is done. A clear instance of such an action would be the case of a man who is pushed and in falling accidentally strikes and injures another. Such an action is not voluntary and involves no moral responsibility.

Force, being physical in nature, cannot directly affect an act of the will itself, which is immaterial in nature. Acts issuing directly from the will itself are interior and are called elicited acts; other acts are under the control of the will, yet are performed by other powers, e.g., the members of the body. These are called commanded acts of the will. Acts elicited by the will are always voluntary. Even God, in moving the will, cannot force its act, for its forced act would be a contradiction, at once voluntary and involuntary.

Acts commanded by the will, however, are subject to physical force. It is with regard to these that the question of responsibility may arise when something is done under force. Clearly, if there is no reasonable way open to resist physical aggression, no responsibility is incurred in passive acquiescence in the action. If the action in question is morally evil, the will in its interior, elicited act should not concur. Whether or not external resistance is to be attempted depends upon particular circumstances and judgment of prudence as to whether resistance would serve any useful purpose.

Actions done because of physical force should be distinguished from actions done out of fear [see FEAR (MORAL ASPECT)] or because of compulsion in the psychological meaning of the term.

FORCELLINI, EGIDIO

Priest and lexicographer; b. Campo sul Piave, Belluno, Italy, Aug. 26, 1688; d. there, April 5, 1768. He was educated at the Padua seminary, which he entered in 1704. He spent seven years (1724–31) as director of the seminary at Ceneda, near Treviso, and the last three years of his life in retirement in his native town. Otherwise, the Padua seminary was his home from boyhood and its library the focus of his work. He first collaborated with Jacopo Facciolati on a number of projects in Greek, Latin, and Italian grammar and lexicography, especially on a new edition (1718) of the then-standard Latin dictionary of Calepinus (first published 1502).

The deficiencies of the "Calepinus" led to the planning of a thoroughly new work, which was to be marked by breadth of coverage, with gleanings from rare authors, coins, and inscriptions, close attention to orthography and arrangement of meanings, and generous provision of illustrative examples. This work, the Totius latinitatis lexicon, Forcellini completed after about 40 years of prodigious toil, but he never saw it in print.

The first edition, dated 1771 (four folio volumes from the Padua seminary press), was followed by five other Italian editions and a number of transalpine and American reprints and adaptations. The best edition is that edited by F. Corradini and G. Perin (Padua 1864–1920; reprinted, with some additional material in the appendixes, Padua 1940). Until the Thesaurus linguae latinae (1900–) was completed, the Forcellini dictionary stood as the fundamental monument of Latin lexicography.

FORD, FRANCIS XAVIER

Bishop, missionary; b. Brooklyn, N.Y., Jan. 11, 1892; d. Canton, China, Feb. 21, 1952. He was the son of Austin B. Ford, publisher of the Irish World, the New York Freeman's Journal, and the Monitor. His mother, Elizabeth (Rellihan) Ford, was a teacher and newspaper woman. Ford attended St. Francis Preparatory School, Brooklyn, and Cathedral College, New York City, where he became interested in the newly founded Catholic Foreign Mission Society. In 1912 he became the first seminarian to enter the society's headquarters at Hawthorne, N.Y. He was ordained in 1917, and was one of the first four Maryknoll Missioners to leave for the Orient the next year. As superior of the Maryknoll mission in Yeoungkong, South China, he opened the first Maryknoll seminary for Chinese students in 1921 and the following year welcomed the first group of Maryknoll Sisters. In 1925 he became prefect apostolic of a new mission among the Hakkas in northern Kwangtung (Meihsien), with Kaying as its center. This prefecture became the vicariate apostolic of the same area in 1935 (a diocese in 1946), and Ford was named titular bishop of Etenne. He was consecrated by Maryknoll's cofounder, Bp. James A. Walsh, on Sept. 21, 1935. Ford remained in South China during World War II, directing limited mission work and caring for refugees from the coastal areas occupied by the Japanese. Five years later, with the arrival of the Communists from the North, he became the object of a systematic campaign of molestation and abuse. Arrested in December 1950 on charges of "anti-Communist, counterrevolutionary, and espionage activities," he was transferred to prison in Canton in April 1951. During the 200mile trip he was subjected to public display and Communist ridicule at every stop. Subsequent interrogations and the rigors of Communist jail ended in his death, which was not revealed until Aug. 16, 1952.

FORD, THOMAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Devonshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), May 28, 1582. After receiving his master's degree from Trinity College, Oxford, Ford was a fellow for about three years. Having entered the English College, Douai in 1570, Ford became one of the first three of its students to be ordained (March 1573 at Brussels). He continued his studies until his return to England, May 2, 1576. There he was chaplain to Edward Yate and his Bridgettine guests at Lyford, Berkshire. Ford was arrested with St. Edmund CAMPION (July 17, 1581) and committed to the Tower (July 22), where he was submitted to torture three times. He and Bl. John SHERT stood trial together on an absurd charge of conspiracy at Rome and Rheims-where he had never been, and on dates when he was in England. Both were condemned November 21 and were executed with Bl. Robert JOHN-SON. All three were beatified by Pope Leo XIII.

FOREIRO, FRANCISCO

Portuguese Dominican theologian and Scripture scholar who played a prominent role in the Council of Trent; b. c. 1510; d. Lisbon, Jan. 10, 1581. His academic achievements in Greek and Hebrew attracted King John III of Portugal, who sent him with Francisco de VITORIA to pursue his studies at Paris. Upon his return, Foreiro won fame as a theologian and preacher. He was eventually the King's personal theologian. King Sebastian retained Foreiro in this post and in 1561 sent him to the Council of Trent. Foreiro's preaching was so acclaimed there that he was appointed to preach every Wednesday of Lent. The first secretary of the INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS, he also served on the commission for the reform of the Breviary and Missal and helped to compose the Roman Catechism. In 1568 he was elected provincial of Portugal and, when freed from this office, devoted his waning years to study. He wrote commentaries on all the Prophets and on Job as well as meditations on the Gospels and a Hebrew lexicon.

FOREST, JOHN, BL.

Franciscan priest, martyr; b. Oxford, England, 1471; d. hanged at Smithfield (London), May 22, 1538. At age 20, Forest was accepted into the Observant Franciscans at Greenwich. He studied theology at Oxford and may have earned a doctorate. He is known as the confessor to Queen Catherine of Aragon, and appears to have been provincial in 1525, when he threatened to excommunicate the brethren who opposed Cardinal Wolsey's legatine powers. The Observants as a whole and Fr. Forest in particular attracted Henry VIII's displeasure by opposing his divorce, although there was an attempted reconciliation in February 1533. Nevertheless, he was imprisoned at Newgate before Fr. William Peyto gave his famous sermon in front of the king at Greenwich (1534). In his confinement Fr. Forest corresponded with the queen and Bl. Thomas ABELL and wrote a book or treatise against King Henry. When Forest refused to make an act of abjuration before Cranmer at Lambeth (April 8, 1538), he was sentenced to death by hanging and his remains burned. The statue of "Darvell Gatheren," which had been brought from the church of Llanderfel in Wales, was thrown on the pile of firewood; thus fulfilling the popularly believed prophecy that this holy image would set a forest on fire. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

FORGIVENESS OF SINS

In Catholic teaching SIN is an offense against God resulting in a state or condition of GUILT, in which the sinner is estranged from God, deprived of His grace and friendship, and under a juridical necessity of paying the debt of punishment incurred by his transgression. By the forgiveness of his sin the sinner is reconciled to God and restored to divine favor, and his liability to punishment is remitted. Since it is God who is offended in sin, the forgiveness of it must always come from Him, at least mediately. That God is willing and ready to exercise His divine prerogative of forgiveness with regard to all sinners who are disposed to pardon is clear in both Old and New Testaments (Is 43.25; 44.22; Ez 18.21–23; Mt 6.14; Lk 6.37; Jas 5.15, etc.). Forgiveness is offered and received in Christ (Jn 1.29; Rom 4.27; 1 Cor 15.3; Gal 1.4; 1 Pt 2.25; 3.18). Christ Himself claimed the authority to forgive sins (Mk 2.1-12; Mt 9.2-8; Lk 5.17-26), and He delegated it to his Apostles to be exercised by themselves and their legitimate successors in the Sacrament of PEN-ANCE [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1667-93]. Forgiveness of sin may be obtained also apart from the Sacrament through perfect CONTRITION, which includes at least an implicit desire to receive the Sacrament. Contrition or sorrow for sin is a universally necessary condition of pardon. The sorrow for sin required for forgiveness must involve an element of divine love, for it is impossible that a soul should be received to grace and put in right relationship to God if it is not prepared to love God. Moreover, this readiness to love God cannot conceivably exist without the repentant sinner being prepared also to love other children of the same heavenly Father (2 Jn 4.20–21). In the Christian way of life, therefore, an individual's willingness to forgive injuries done to himself is a ready test, easy to apply, of the sufficiency of his own dispositions to receive pardon (Mt 6.14-15; 18.21-35; Mk 11.25-26).

FORGIVENESS OF SINS (IN THE BIBLE)

Sin, in the Bible, is a personal offense and a revolt against God. It makes man impure and excludes him from religious worship. By it the personal bond of the covenant is broken, so that man separates himself from God and provokes His wrath. See SIN (IN THE BIBLE). To reestablish this personal relationship and appease God's wrath, man offers God gifts and sacrifices and seeks forgiveness by the intercession of God's favored ones, by true repentance, and by interior submission to God.

In the Old Testament. Many Hebrew words are used to express forgiveness: $s\bar{a}lah$, 'to forgive'' [always with God as subject (1 Kgs 8.30, 39; Is 55.7; Dt 29.19)]; $n\bar{a}s\bar{a}$, 'to take away'' [Ps 31(32).5]; kipper 'to cover, make atonement for'' (if man is subject, Ex 32.30), or, 'to forgive'' [if God is subject, Ps 64(65).4]; various forms of the root ksy, 'to cover'' [Ps 31(32).1; 84(85).3]; and $m\bar{a}h\hat{a}$, 'to wipe out'' [Is 43.25; Ps 50(51).3]. So also, sins are said to be blotted out, purged away, covered, remembered no more, cleansed, and washed. And it is God Himself who cleanses, washes, and, in fact, ''creates'' anew.

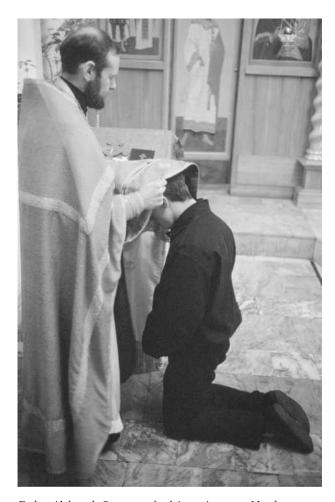

One way to win someone's forgiveness is to present a gift (Gn 32.21). Sacrifices, too, appease Yahweh. After the census that was considered to be a crime, David offered holocausts and PEACE OFFERINGS (2 Sm 24.25). See CENSUS (IN THE BIBLE). The SIN OFFERING, prominent in postexilic times, atoned for a sin committed in ignorance (Lv 4.1–5.13). Yet in an early and primitive conception, no sacrifice could atone for deliberate sins (Nm 15.30–31). To expiate the sin of withholding dues from God or man the guilt offering or sacrifice of reparation was offered (Lv 5.14–26; 7.1–7; Nm 5.5–8). Annually on the Day of ATONEMENT (Yom Kippur) the covenanted people confessed their sins and atoned for them by expiatory sacrifices. The high priest sprinkled the blood of the animals on the covering of the ARK OF THE COVENANT, because for the Israelites the blood was the seat of life, through which one made atonement [Lv 16.14–16; 17.11; see BLOOD, RELIGIOUS SIGNIFICANCE OF (IN THE BIBLE)].

Also through the intercession of His favored ones, e.g., Moses, God forgave His people (Ex 32.32-34). The intercession of the Servant of Yahweh (Is 52.13-53.12) went beyond that of Moses. The Servant's giving up His life as "an offering for sin" (Is 53.10; see SUFFERING SER-VANT, SONGS OF) recalled the ritual of Leviticus ch. 16. Yahweh forgave directly, too. For example, David was absolved of the sentence of death after his humble acknowledgment of guilt (2 Sm 12.13), although he and his family were to be punished severely. The prophetic doctrine (Hos 14.2-7; Is 1.18-20; Jer 3.22-23) called for repentance, conversion, and return to the covenant of God in order to obtain forgiveness. Certain Psalmists extolled contrition as a means to forgiveness: "Should I offer a holocaust, you would not accept it. My sacrifice, O God, is a contrite spirit; a heart contrite and humbled, O God, you will not spurn'' [Ps 50(51).18-19; 24(25).7-11, 18; 31(32).1-6; 37(38.2-9, 18-19; 129(130); 143(144).1-2]. Psalm 102 (103) is a hymn praising God's compassion for contrite sinners.

Just as the Exile was the punishment for rebellion, so the restoration and the new covenant would entail a cleansing from sin, forgiveness, and, positively, a new spirit of fidelity to God [Jer 31.31–34; Ez 36.16–36; Psalm 50(51)]. Pardon for sin was also very much emphasized by the consoling prophet who wrote Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40.1–2; 44.22; 53.4–7, 8d, 10–12).

In the New Testament. With the coming of the Kingdom of God, the messianic redemption, which consisted in pardon for sins through Christ's expiation (Rom 3.21–26), created the new people of God, freed from sin and reconciled with God (Rom 5.1–11).

Forgiveness was proclaimed in the Gospels by Jesus Himself (Mt 9.1–7, 10–13; Lk 7.47–49; 15.1–32; see also Mt 6.12; Lk 11.4). The divine prerogative of pardoning sin was transferred to Jesus in His role as Servant of Yahweh (Mt 8.17; Lk 4.18–21; 18.31–34; Acts 2.23; 3.13, 18, 26; 4.27–38; 8.32–35). Like sin, forgiveness had taken on a personal nuance with Ezekiel (Ez 14.12–23; ch. 18; 33.10–20) and was so represented in the parables of Christ (Mt 13.3–9, 18–23; 25.14–46). In the LORD'S PRAYER, divine forgiveness parallels the forgiveness that a man gives to those offending him (Mt 6.12). The Servant of the Lord gave His life as a ransom for the multitude (Mt 20.28); His blood was poured out for the remission of sins (Mt 26.28). After His Resurrection, Jesus declared: "repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His name to all the nations, beginning from Jerusalem" (Lk 24.47).

St. Paul often personified sin and described the sinner as a slave to this archenemy of God. Consequently he considered the pardon of sin as an emancipation. God not only pardons the sinner but transfers him into the resurrected life of Christ through Christ's death (Rom 6.1–11; Gal 2.19–20). A man redeemed by Christ becomes a new creature (2 Cor 5.17; Gal 6.15), a new man (Eph 4.22–24; Col 3.9–10), in contrast with the old man subject to sin. "He has rescued us from the power of darkness and transferred us into the kingdom of his beloved Son, in whom we have our redemption, the remission of our sins" (Col 1.13–14). The motivation for this transformation is, simply, God's love (Rom 5.8–9).

Johannine theology speaks of sin in the singular as affecting all mankind. John the Baptist pointed out Jesus as "the lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world" (Jn 1.29). Because He was the light of the world and life itself, Christ could rescue man from darkness and death (Jn 8.12; 9.5, 39; 11.25–26; 12.35–36, 46–50). As a result of His glorification He gave the Spirit to His Apostles that they might forgive sins (Jn 20.23). Toward the end of his life, John the Evangelist repeated that Christ appeared in order to "take our sins away" (1 Jn 3.5), that His blood was the source of pardon for sin (1 Jn 1.7), and that He continues to be the advocate and the propitiation for the sins of all men (1 Jn 2.1–2, 12).

So also in the Epistle to the Hebrews Jesus is described as the one who by offering His precious blood purifies Christians from every stain (Heb 9.14), saves man (5.1-10), and creates a way back to God (10.19-20).

FORM

From the Latin forma, a term signifying figure or shape or "that which is seen" (Gr. είδος) and having many derived meanings, such as kind, nature, and species. In early philosophical usage it came to signify the intrinsic determinant of quantity from which figure or shape results, and then to mean the intrinsic determinant of anything that is determinable. Thus the term is employed in such expressions as "form of contract," "form of worship," and "form of a Sacrament." In its stricter philosophical usage, however, it is limited to signifying the intrinsic PRINCIPLE OF EXISTENCE in any determinate essence, a definition that applies to both accidental and substantial form. In a further extended usage, every SPE-CIES or NATURE, whether in itself material or existent as immaterial, is called a form, although it may not be strictly a formal principle. In this manner it is not unusual to speak of the angelic form, or even of the form of God, as signifying the nature or essence of the angel, or of God. Hence, form is sometimes used as a synonym for ESSENCE or nature. Similarly, the formal cause, in Aristotelian and scholastic philosophy, is frequently identified with the essence ($\tau \delta \tau t \ \eta v \epsilon t v \alpha t$), as that in virtue of which the essence, even of material and composite entities, is precisely what it is.

This article is concerned primarily with the philosophical significance of the term form and treats this in two parts: the first presents a history of the development of the concept of form; the second, a systematic analysis of the concept from the viewpoint of scholastic philosophy.

History of the Concept of Form

This survey (taken mainly from F. Aveling's earlier one) first enumerates the kinds of form discussed by philosophers; the development of these kinds is then traced through the Greek, medieval, modern, and contemporary periods.

Kinds of Form. The various kinds of form recognized in philosophy include the following. Substantial form, in material entities, is what determines or actuates primary matter to become a specific substantial nature or essence, as the form of hydrogen, of horse, or of man (see MATTER AND FORM). It is defined by ARISTOTLE as the first ENTELECHY of a physical body, and it may be such that it is merely the determinant of matter, in which case it is called a corporeal substantial form, or it may exceed, as it were, the potentiality of matter, in which case it is called a spiritual or subsistent form. Accidental form is what determines a substance to one or other of the accidental modes, such as quantified, qualified, relationed, etc. (see CATEGORIES OF BEING). As the existence of an ACCIDENT is an inexistence, or one of inherence in an existent subject, it always connotes a subject of inherence. A separated form is one that exists apart from the matter it actuates. No accidental form can thus be separated, nor can corporeal substantial forms. The form of man, the human soul, becomes a separated form at death. An accidental form, because it modifies and determines substance, is sometimes referred to as an inhering form. The term is employed to emphasize the distinction of accidental from substantial forms. These latter do not inhere in matter, but are coprinciples with it in the constitution of material substances.

Forms of knowledge, according to I. KANT, are forms of (1) intuition, viz, space and time, and (2) thought, viz, the 12 categories by which all judgments are conditioned: unity, plurality, totality; reality, negation, limitation; substantiality, causality, relation; possibility, existence, and necessity. All of these are a priori forms and under them, as content, fall all of humanity's intuitions and judgments.

Greek Thought. The doctrine of form in Greek philosophy made its first appearance with PLATO. While not denying that the things of ordinary experience possess something like form, Plato turned his primary attention to the exemplars that corporeal shapes or forms might imitate. This led him to postulate the existence of a world of Forms or Ideas that subsist in themselves and are the immutable objects of man's highest knowledge. (For the historical development of this Platonic conception, see IDEA.) Plato's doctrine was criticized by his student, Aristotle, particularly on the point of the separate existence of Forms. For Aristotle, forms exist, but they exist in matter. The Aristotelian doctrine of forms stems from the notion of substance, and particularly from that of material substance as composed of matter and form. In some texts Aristotle identifies form with essence, and this because substance is what it is essentially by reason of the substantial form; it would be a mistake, nonetheless, to suppose that his doctrine leaves no room for a distinction between the two.

Medieval Thought. The Aristotelian distinction between matter and form, and its more basic formulation in the doctrine of potency and act, is central in the philosophy and theology of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, the principal spokesman for medieval scholasticism. For him, substantial form is an ACT, the principle of activity, and that by which things actually exist (Summa theologiae 1a, 66.1–2). Moreover, it is one. Thus man exists as man, in virtue of his substantial form, otherwise known as the human soul (see SOUL, HUMAN). That the rational soul is the unique form of the body is also of faith [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (Freiburg 1963) 900, 902, 1440, 2828]. Man is learned or healthy in virtue of the accidental forms of learning or health that inhere in him; these may be present or absent without detriment to his humanity. Both kinds of form, it may be noted, are individuated by something extrinsic to themselves: substantial forms by quantified matter, and accidental forms by their subject of inherence (see INDI-VIDUATION). The incorporeal subsistent form of man, though continuing to exist when separated from the body, retains its relationship to the matter by which it was individuated.

This doctrine is common to most scholastics, but it should be noted that DUNS SCOTUS and others taught, in opposition to St. Thomas's doctrine of one substantial form, a plurality of forms in individuals. Thus, while according to Aquinas man is all that he is substantially (corporeal, animal, rational, Socrates) in virtue of his one soul, according to Scotus each determination (generic or specific) adds a new form to man. In this way, man would be corporeal in virtue of a corporeal form, animal in virtue of a superadded animal form, etc., until he becomes Socrates in virtue of his ultimate personal form (Socrateitas). WILLIAM OF OCKHAM also distinguished between a rational and a sensitive soul in man, and taught that the latter is corruptible. (See FORMS, UNICITY AND PLU-RALITY OF.)

Modern Thought. The principal alternative systems in the modern period that profess to give an account of corporeal substances are those of Descartes, Locke, Mill, and the materialists. R. DESCARTES placed the essence of bodies in extension in three dimensions, thus identifying quantified substance with quantity and in no way accounting for substantial differences. Each substance possesses a "preeminent attribute, which constitutes its nature and essence and to which all others relate." To this J. LOCKE added the qualities of substance, making its essence consist of its primary qualities or properties (extension, figure and mobility, divisibility and activity). Locke regarded substantial form as "wholly unintelligible," maintaining that the search for this and like entities is fruitless. J. S. MILL, considering substance from a psychological rather than from an ontological viewpoint, defined it by its relation to sense perception as an external and permanent possibility of human sensations. Akin to this is the doctrine of many materialists and positivists, who attempt to explain the nature of matter or substance as a series of sensations. All of these theories, as well as that of Kant mentioned above and those of the idealists, are strongly influenced by the epistemologies of their proponents (see KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; QUALITY).

Contemporary Thought. In recent philosophy the term form rarely occurs, and the issues concerning the relationships between matter and form are no longer argued, the term matter being generally used without reference to form. Yet the problems that have traditionally been solved in terms of matter and form continue to be discussed. Examples are the problem of the one and the many, that of the universal and the particular, and that of the changeable and the changeless. These are discussed by thinkers such as W. JAMES and H. BERGSON, J. Dewey and G. SANTAYANA, and A. N. WHITEHEAD and B. RUSSELL. An occasional approximation to earlier thought is found in expressions such as the "eternal objects" of Whitehead or the "realm of essence" of Santayana. Although not explicitly stated, therefore, the problem of form and its meaning still lies dormant in contemporary thought.

Systematic Analysis

Form is the term commonly used to designate the determinate aspects humans apprehend in things. This part of the article investigates such a notion of form systematically, treating of quantitative form, qualitative form, and intelligible form, and concluding with an analysis of the concept of formal causality.

Quantitative Form. The shape of a triangular bar and the shape of a square desk top are quantitative forms. They are configurations of actual matter that are definite down to the minutest detail; that is, they are determinate. They must be the shapes of actual things, for otherwise they would not exist independently of thought; yet the kind of stuff of which they are quantitative forms is quite irrelevant to human understanding of them as such forms. Thus triangularity and squareness are abstract, and this in two ways: they leave out of consideration all possible materials that can be formed triangularly or squarely, and they also omit all deviations from actual straightness that occur in attempts to produce perfectly triangular or square surfaces in matter. This twofold abstractness results from the omission of all features that are irrelevant to understanding what it is to be triangular and what it is to be square. Thus does the human understanding apprehend some determinate aspect of the thing understood; this exists in the mind not with the properties of a physical existent but with the abstractness of an act of understanding. By contrast, the things that do exist in a physical way are determinate in every detail. Consequently, they are only approximations to their idealized quantitative aspects.

Some of the quantitative forms humans apprehend in nature can serve as models for forms engendered by him in matter when he produces artifacts. Thus a table top that is approximately square has been formed by man in accordance with a model made on paper or one existing only in his imagination. The model possesses the determinate form called squareness just as truly as does the actual table; however, its manner of existence is different, and so is its degree of approximation to the idealized squareness known through understanding. Thus one and the same formality (form considered abstractly as that by which something is determinate) can exist actually in matter, or representationally in the imagination, or meaningfully in the understanding. Number and Measurement. A similar analysis holds for the quantitative form called number, which is used in a practical way to signify groupings of things; here, however, the imagined groupings and one's understanding of them can be exact replicas of actual physical multiplicities. This is so because numbers are more abstract than abstract shapes. Consequently, for numerical distinction any one means of identifying units suffices; the determinate aspects of their actual configurations can be left out of consideration.

In general the term quantitative form refers to any static or dynamic aspect of EXTENSION that can be considered in itself or as an actual aspect of things found in nature. The determinate aspects of such extension can be known with great precision by measurement.

Form and Matter. The determinate is contrasted with the determinable, that is, with what is capable of being formed in some manner. This latter is called matter or substrate; it designates what is formed and what remains when one form replaces another. The wood of a table about to be built is determinate as wood; nevertheless it is further determinable, since an arrangement of parts can be introduced into a pile of wood to form a table. When the wood has received these determinations, however, it is still receptive to further ones: it can be arranged, for example, as part of a room ensemble, or the table can be disassembled and the wood formed into some entirely different thing. Because the receiver of these new determinations is merely physical, and in no way cognitive, a new determination is acquired in each instance only at the expense of a previously existing one. This is so because a form that is actually present in a substrate forms the substrate determinately and thereby excludes other similar forms. Any one form must cease to be present actually when a contrary form replaces it.

The forms that result from the arrangement of parts presuppose the existence of parts, which are themselves determinate and further determinable. Consequently, the term quantitative form applies universally to the extended aspects of the most basic parts of material being as well as to the largest and most complex system of parts. But it is by the latter type of quantitative form that one customarily distinguishes kinds of living things. The same criterion is commonly used in the sciences of botany and zoology, and even paleontology, which primarily studies traces of the quantitative forms of living things preserved in the earth's crust. (See QUANTITY.)

Qualitative Form. Inseparable from the quantitatively determinate aspects of things are determinate aspects that correspond to a person's various abilities to be directly aware of his or her body and its environment. By sight and taste and touch, for example, one can detect determinate aspects that are called qualitative forms or sen-determinations of things, "qualities" because they are of a particular kind (Lat. quale) for each external sense. Such aspects are directly indicative of differences other than differences of mere extension. They are forms sui generis and provide the initial diversity in one's apprehension of matter. Their number corresponds to the number of ways in which humanity can make direct sensory contact with things. Thus sensible qualitative form is any aspect of anything that can make an initial impression upon any human sense. The quantitative forms resulting from the limits of the extension of material beings, it should be noted, are not apprehended initially but only by means of the sense qualities. The triangular shape of a steel bar, for example, may be apprehended either in the contrast of the color of the steel with the visual appearances of its surroundings or in the contrast of its hardness and coolness with the tactile impressions of its surroundings, but not directly and initially.

Forms Related to Sense. Humanity's view of the material universe is predetermined in that the senses are able to detect some formal aspects but not others. Yet, through technology, people have devised instruments to extend the normal range of the senses and to detect formalities that are otherwise too minute, too gross, or too distant for accurate discrimination. Through such instruments, formal aspects of things not discernible by any sense (e.g., molecular structure) can be represented to the senses. These may be referred to as reductively sensible, even though they are not directly apprehended by the senses.

Mechanical Explanation. The discovery of such formal aspects and the entities corresponding to them-such as atoms and molecules-has led some in the history of thought to attempt to explain all sensory forms mechanically, i.e., as nothing more than subjective impressions produced by the motion of particles of matter. Thus DE-MOCRITUS posited atoms and the void as the only true realities and asserted that sense qualities exist for man but not in things themselves; similarly, contemporary mechanists hold that sense perception is but a biochemical function of brain cells. One difficulty for such mechanical viewpoints is that the basic entities of one age tend to be replaced by new ones in succeeding ages, thus giving rise to repeated revolutions in mechanistic thought. Another is that mechanical phenomena alone are rendered more intelligible by mechanical explanations. For example, a mechanical explanation proposes that puttylike sodium, combining with gaseous chlorine, forms crystalline salt. The crystalline structure of salt can be explained in terms of the quantitative forms of its components, but this explanation sheds no light on the different qualitative properties found in salt and in its components when taken by themselves. Yet another difficulty for MECHANISM is that no direct contact with matter is possible for man except through his senses and through formal aspects that are inseparable from them. To cast doubt upon the senses is thus to characterize all sensory information, and all theory elaborated from it (mechanism included), as nothing more than an illusion.

The alternative to rejecting SENSE KNOWLEDGE or reducing it to some inexplicable, albeit real, element in human experience is to recognize the mechanical viewpoint as but one of many limited viewpoints arising in human understanding, according as a person singles out one or other formal aspect as preeminently intelligible.

Intelligible Form. Since the senses can apprehend only what is actually present to them, they are cognitively formed, or informed, by the determinate aspects of all things that can make an impression upon a sense organ. Through the repetition of sensory impressions, many things that are first discriminated as novelties come to be familiar. For example, bread and butter and coffee are easily recognizable by their visual appearances and their customary aromas and textures. If a mistake in identifying coffee by such sensory signs occurs, the sense of smell or of taste is usually invoked to decide the issue, since for most people to be coffee means to have a certain aroma or taste. But this may not be the decisive CRITERI-ON for all. Some, for example, may want assurance that the ingredients are known to have been obtained from a coffee tree; others may wish a chemical analysis to determine that the beverage has the chemical components found in coffee beans. Each of these methods of identification-the regular recurrence of the same sensory signs in the same combination (with incidental variations), the regular derivation of the thing in question from the same kind of source, and the invariability of the chemical components and quantitative form of the individual molecule of the kind of thing in question-is sufficient for the practical purposes of identification. Moreover, all three viewpoints, when added together, constitute part of the answer to the question as to what coffee really is. Such grouping of characteristics is the work of the human INTELLECT; its result is what is known as intelligible form.

The name ABSTRACTION is commonly used of the process by which the intelligible form is derived from sensory experience. The CONCEPT it attains is abstract; there can be no concrete representation of it in itself, although its intelligible content can often be exemplified. Thus human understanding of animal as a sentient organism can be exemplified by any individual animal. While the concept is immaterial, however, it can be said to be formal, or to be a form, because it informs human intellect, even if in a general and abstract way. Its generality and abstractness do not militate against its being a form, since one formal aspect may encompass another, as the concept of color includes concepts of red, blue, and green. When many limited formal aspects are included within a more general formal aspect, however, this is always done at the expense of the determinateness of the more general. Thus to include green in the category of color and to include color in the category of quality is to proceed from determinate to general notions. It is this way, incidentally, that the notion of form itself is arrived at. The partiality of individual intelligible viewpoints obtained by abstraction from experience need not hinder human attempts at understanding the universe, for in thought itself one can compare them and derive more general but equally informative intelligible forms as a result. (See APPREHENSION, SIMPLE; KNOWLEDGE, PROCESS OF.)

Formal Causality. Although formal aspects that are exclusive of one another considered in themselves may be included in some more general category in thought, the same is not true for forms outside of thought, such as the quantitative forms of bodies. Forms of the same kind exclude one another from the same substrate. But many forms not of the same kind can exist in the same substrate. Thus a body that is living may also be sentient and soft and warm, although it cannot be warm and cold at the same time. Similarly, what are materially the same parts may be informed by different forms at both the substantial and the accidental level. Thus combinations of chemicals may be salt or living flesh, depending upon the form of the whole of which the chemicals are the components. The principle of formation in this case is called substantial form to indicate that it gives to that which it forms its very being in the order of SUBSTANCE. By contrast, accidental forms are aspects that may always be found with the kind of thing in question but are not thought to characterize it fully. Hardness is an essential quality of diamonds, although the substance of diamond is carbon; and humans have many reflex actions similar to those found in unicellular organisms, although they are defined as rational animals because reason is the dominating characteristic in their acting and being.

Form comes into being when the composite of which it is the form comes into being. Thus the properties of salt arise simultaneously with the chemical union of sodium and chlorine by their mutual action upon one another. While the sculptor is the sole efficient cause of the statue he produces in stone, the stone and the figure with which he informs it exert mutual causality upon each other.

Both substantial and accidental forms are said to be educed from the potency of their corresponding matter under the action of the efficient cause. The rational soul of man, however, so transcends matter in its intellectual activities that it cannot originate from matter by a process of eduction (see SOUL, HUMAN, ORIGIN OF).

Form passes out of existence when the whole of which it is the form is destroyed. When salt is broken down to its component chemical parts, the properties of salt cease to exist in them; similarly, the remains of a once living body act entirely according to their chemical natures and not as parts of living matter. Forms are physically inseparable from things; the act of apprehension, however, can separate them from matter and permit judgments about their nature, kinds, and characteristics.

From these considerations it may be seen that the causality of form is that of an intrinsic cause and, as such, one that requires the receptive action of some appropriate matter. Form and matter exercise their special causality by a mutual communication of their own being; their proper effect is the composite that results from their union. Both form and matter obtain their actual existence from the existence of this composite, even though the form may have preexisted potentially in the matter (and previous composite) from which it was educed. And neither form nor matter can exercise its causality unless there is a proper proportion between them, and unless an efficient cause acts to bring about the composite's formation. FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL Term used for the method of interpreting the books of the New Testament, particularly the Gospels, by investigating not only the literary forms employed in their composition, but also the preliterary formation of these writings. This method will be considered here according to its objective, its nature, its classification of various types in the Gospels, and its value for exegesis; a historical, bibliographical synthesis of the studies connected with this method will then be given, followed by a brief account of the literary genres employed in the New Testament apart from the Gospels.

Objective. The theory of the Biblical literary genres and its practical application as a hermeneutical method originated and developed in the field of Old Testament studies. Around 1920 this method was extended to the field of New Testament studies, more particularly to the study of the Gospels. Here, where it received the name of form criticism (Formgeschichte, history of forms), it underwent certain adaptations caused by the difference in subject matter, without however concealing its ancestry. H. GUNKEL, in the Old Testament field, went beyond the theory of the written documents (J, E, D, and P) older than the present Pentateuch and penetrated back to literary units, complete in themselves, classifiable according to types, units that were born and grew in the life of the people and that were ordinarily transmitted by oral tradition. Similarly, in the New Testament field, M. Dibelius and R. Bultmann went beyond the two-source theory (Mark and Q) in the solution of the Synoptic problem and penetrated back to small units, classified according to type, that were born and developed and transmitted orally in the early Christian community before these units were gathered and wrought into the Gospels by the Evangelists.

The objective of the form-criticism school is, in fact, to offer a genetic explanation for the accomplished fact of the Gospels as the outcome of earlier oral traditions. For this purpose literary forms are analyzed as an intermediary step in the process, on the supposition that from the "forms," conclusions can be drawn regarding the "formation." This method purports to go behind the four Gospels back to the original GOSPEL; it seeks to carry the modern Christian back into the life of the early Christian community in order that he may, with it and like it, hear the original preaching of the gospel (M. Dibelius).

Method. In order to attain this objective, the method requires that these three steps must be taken: (1) the literary units must be isolated; (2) they must be classified according to types; (3) their place of origin and transmission must be determined.

Isolation of Units. For the purpose of isolating the literary units, the Gospels offer data sufficiently firm for laying the foundations of a working hypothesis. The Gospels give clear evidence of being collections; they are compositions in the sense of being composite, made up of preexisting parts. This can be seen in the grouping of units around a common theme, in the repetition of certain catchwords, and in certain numerical arrangements (groups of three each, seven each, etc.); the transitions, the literary sutures, the framework around the units, etc., can easily be apprehended. This apprehension, of which one becomes reasonably sure in an attentive reading of any individual Gospel, becomes all the more certain when one Gospel is compared to another; in parallel pericopes there is only a change in the framework, in the introduction or the conclusion, in the position of a unit within the whole narrative, etc. In this way it is possible to arrive at a clear distinction between what is redactional and what is traditional; the redactional part is due to individual Evangelists, while the traditional part is the material derived from an earlier stage of oral transmission. The last step in the method is that of progressive analogy, i.e., from a series of units isolated with certainty, it is legitimate to conclude by analogy to others less certain or even doubtful.

Classification by Types. The units thus isolated are then classified according to types. Strictly speaking, the criteria of classification should be formal, i.e., drawn up on the basis of form; actually, various scholars combine three kinds of criteria: formal, thematic (according to the different themes), and purposive (according to different intentions or tendencies). This is quite legitimate because the theme often determines the selection of the form that is used, and the purpose has a strong effect on the style. Since many of the literary units are very short, formal criteria alone would not be sufficient for a satisfactory classification. Other criteria, such as those of literary or topical motifs or those of "tone," can easily be brought under the criteria mentioned above. Theoretically, according to the leading scholars of the form-criticism school, form is a great superpersonal power; in reality, many doubtful, intermediate, or contaminated forms are encountered. In such cases the investigator can simply set forth the state of the material and not attempt a rigorous classification, or he can work over the material for the purpose of bringing it under exact forms. For the sake of classification, recourse may be had to a comparison with literatures that are historically or culturally close to the New Testament literature, especially to rabbinical or Hellenistic religious literature. The names given to types and subtypes are of but subordinate value; of much more importance is the exact description of the type. This is necessary for the sake of overcoming differences in terminology.

Origin and Transmission of the Units. To each type and to each unit belonging to this type there is assigned a Sitz im Leben, a certain situation in life, in which it receives and transmits its own proper form. One thus passes from the form back to its formation, from the literary fact back to its preliterary history. The Sitz im Leben is a concept, not in the historical, but in the literary sense. It is not a determination established by coordinates of space, time, or person. There is no intention or even possibility of drawing from the form conclusions regarding the date, place, or author of the analyzed form. Rather, it is in the activity of the community that the literary type has its situation in life—the community's worship, catechesis, and apologetics. As the literary type is a genus, so also its situation in life is generic. To find the situation in life of a genus, its form is helpful, since the form has been determined by the necessities and motives of the life of the community. This is the analytical way. Moreover, a unified picture of the life of this community may be obtained by bringing together and reconstructing into a unified whole the scattered, casual data of the other New Testament writings, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles. This is the constructive process. This double process is completed by a comparative view, since the phenomenon of oral transmission is not limited to the early Christian community. The technique of such transmission in Judaism has been recognized and investigated, and the laws governing the oral transmission of popular traditions have been studied [see M. Jousse, Le style oral et mnémotechnique chez les Verbo-moteurs (Paris 1925)]. Moreover the apocrypha and the Synoptic Gospels themselves, when compared one with the other, can reveal certain tendencies that play a part in the transmission of this material. Such comparative material has a purely formal application, i.e., to discover the technique of transmission; it would be hazardous to use it for passing judgment on the contents.

When this third stage of study is finished, the literary method has not the right to advance without further ado to the facts, to pass positive or negative judgments on their historicity. This is the task of historical criticism, which, however, makes use of the literary method both as an instrument and as a preliminary step. Thus the form-criticism method seeks to classify the literary types and to describe the history of their transmission, but nothing else. It has not the right, in its own name, to decide that something is pure invention or actual fact.

Descriptive Classification. A primary, obvious classification divides the isolated pericopes into deeds and sayings, narratives and discourses; in such a division the criterion according to theme coincides with the criterion according to form. However, since narratives usually include dialogues, statements, and maxims and since sayings generally appear in the context of a narrative, one more criterion is needed for making a clearer division; this is the purpose of the passage. A deed may be told for its own sake, for the sake of the person who does it, or for the sake of a saying that serves as its climax. This diversity of purpose usually conditions the form and for this reason leaves certain traces in the style. Thus, for example, neither the purely thematic criterion of miracle nor the purely formal criterion of story would be sufficient, because the whole purpose of a miracle story might be to lead to the statement of some teaching. In the case of sayings, the difficulty in classifying them is much less, because the circumstances in which they are placed are often merely redactional; and they disappear when the pericope or literary unit is isolated in separating the part derived from tradition from the work of the redactor.

For the public life of Jesus, excluding the Passion narrative, the classification according to type that is commonly accepted is that of R. Bultmann—prescinding from his opinions on historicity, which are foreign to the method as such. L. Randellini has summed up the various types and illustrated them by examples. This classification is schematized below.

It is to be noted that, granted the cases that fall between the various types as well as the diversity of opinion among the scholars, no classification can be perfect. Thus for Bultmann disputations and didactic dialogues are reckoned as subtypes of apothegms. On the other hand, Dibelius calls paradigm what Bultmann calls apothegm, and he establishes a major type that he calls Novelle (short story), which frequently coincides with the miracle story. The sayings in the first person often coincide with the legal sayings, and it is not always easy to decide between the sapiential exhortations and the prophetic admonitions, etc.

Deeds. Certain literary units in the Gospels are concerned primarily with recounting the doings or deeds of Jesus. Besides special stories that cannot well be classified under a more general heading, there are miracle stories, cultic and biographical legends, and possibly, if understood in a special sense, myths.

The point of interest in miracle stories lies in the miracle that is recounted. In the most common type of miracle, the cure of a person who is ill, the narrative shows three steps in its development: (1) description of the sick man and his sickness and of others who are present; (2) the performance of the miracle, with certain gestures or words, which in the case of an exorcism may consist in a dialogue with the demon in the possessed man; (3) the effects of the miracle, especially the reaction of those present. The description is usually very sober; naturalness and power stand out. The motif of faith appears frequently. The tripartite scheme, mentioned above, grows quite clearly out of the theme. Miracle stories have their place in the preaching of the Apostles both as testimony to the person of Jesus and as signs of the salvation already at work.

Cultic and biographical legends are pious stories that explain a cultic act or exalt a saint. (According to Bultmann, the concept of legend excludes historicity; according to Dibelius, it prescinds from it.) The Last Supper would be a cultic legend, with ultimate cultic significance. The story of the sinful woman in Lk 7.36–50 would be a biographical legend, with ultimate hagiographical reference. Since Christ is over and above every saint and since the whole interest of the Evangelists is concentrated in Him, legends are less common in the Gospels than in Acts. The story of Zachaeus in Lk 19.1–10 could be a biographical legend. The story of Judas's suicide in Mt 27.3–10 (cf. Acts 1.18–20) could be an etiological legend connected with a certain place. In other cases there remain only some legendary motifs. The purpose of the community in recounting legends is the honor of a saint, edification, or imitation.

The concept of myth must be adapted if examples of it are to be found in the Gospels. Dibelius finds a mythical style throughout St. John's Gospel, without derogating from its historicity. For Bultmann's idea of myth in the Gospels and the need for giving modern significance to their mythical language, see DEMYTHOLOGIZING.

Under the heading of special stories would come the stories of Jesus' baptism, temptations in the desert, transfiguration, triumphal entry into Jerusalem, etc. Neither the theme nor the manner of development is constant. The style shows a certain amplitude and dramatic movement. No useful purpose is served in grouping these stories under a common heading, and exegetes study each one by itself.

Sayings of Jesus. The principal types of Jesus' sayings are: (1) discussions and dialogues; (2) sapiential sayings; (3) prophetic sayings; (4) legal sayings; (5) sayings in the first person; (6) parables. Note that the division into sapiential, prophetic, and legal sayings reechoes the classical division in Jer 18.18: instruction from the priests, counsel from the wise, messages from the prophets.

The occasion of a discussion may be a miracle that has just been recounted, something done by Jesus or His disciples, or a polemical question. Didactic dialogues usually begin with a sincere question. The answer may be another polemical question, a quotation from Scripture, or a maxim. The style strives for brevity, intensity, effectiveness. Bultmann claims that these disputes were born in the apologetic and polemic atmosphere of the community. M. Albertz [Die Synoptischen Streitgespräche (Berlin 1921)], while granting the apologetic and didactic purpose of the community, derives the original form from Jesus Himself.

Sapiential sayings are a clear-cut type, with numerous parallels in the Old Testament. It is sufficient here to cite a few examples: exhortation (Mt 10.16), question (Lk 6.39), maxim (Mt 5.14), macarism (Mt 5.3–12), argument a minore ad maius (Mt 10.29). Bultmann regards metaphors, hyperboles, antitheses, parallelisms, and paradoxes as ornamental motifs. Such sayings have their Sitz im Leben in the teaching of the community, and the principles of thematic grouping by means of key words plays a part in their transmission. Bultmann adds the principle of duplication, amplification, analogous creation, and false attribution.

Prophetic sayings include proclamations of salvation (Mt. 11.5–6), threats of woe (Lk 6.24–26), and warnings (Lk 21.34–36). Apocalyptic prediction is represented, e.g., by the foretelling of the destruction of the Temple (Mk 13.2). Noticeably absent are prophetic visions and the classical formulas of the Old Testament, "The word of the Lord to . . ." and "Thus says the Lord," etc.

Some of the legal sayings have their Sitz im Leben in the laws and customs of the Jews (Mk 7.15; 2.27); others give practical rules for the life of the Christian community (Mt 18.1–20). The Sitz im Leben of the latter is the counseling and instructing of the community.

As for sayings in the first person, Jesus proclaims His mission, His office, and His commission to the Apostles (Mt 15.24; Lk 10.18) in the first person.

In the generic term of parable certain related forms can be included. In the use of imagery the figurative element is combined with the doctrinal one without the use of a particle of comparison (Lk 6.43-45). In the metaphor the doctrinal element is not explicitly stated but is implied in the imagery (Mt 7.13). In the simile or comparison the two elements are joined by an explicit particle of comparison (Lk 7.31-35). Common to all three types is their combining of the two elements, the material one on the mundane level and the transcendent one on the religious level: likewise common to all three is the didactic religious purpose. The formal difference between them is slight. The parable in the strict sense uses a story as the material element. Its construction is usually quite simple: the introduction announcing the comparison, the narration of the story, at times with an emphatically marked climax ("I assure you"), and the conclusion or application joined to the preceding by different formulas. The narrative style follows the laws of the folk epic (A. Olrik), e.g., in brevity, economy of personages, construction of little scenes in which only two persons are involved. unencumbered dialogues, and linear development. The parables originated in a Palestinian environment, and the early Christian community transmitted them with didactic purposes in view, adapting the application to their concrete needs.

Apothegms. These are minute scenes in which an important saying is placed. The statement is the center of interest; it determines the brevity of the scene, and it usually comes at the end. Bultmann, who introduced the Greek term $\dot{\alpha}\pi \dot{\alpha}\phi \theta \epsilon \gamma \mu \alpha$, regards the scene as a pure invention created for the sake of finding a place for the saying. He thus turns most of the disputes and didactic dialogues into subtypes of apothegms. Dibelius employs the neutral term $\pi \alpha \rho \alpha \delta i \gamma \mu \alpha$, and he abstains from passing any judgment on its historicity.

Passion Narratives. The account of Christ's Passion is a unique case, and therefore it cannot be subject to classification. Here the principal task of the form-criticism school has no place; one can merely admit the uniqueness of this kind of narrative. However, the secondary task of form criticism is pertinent—to analyze the history of the tradition (which, showing remarkably fixed form and concord, precedes the redaction of the Gospels) and to discover the religious motives that sustain and impel the transmission of the tradition in the bosom of the early Church.

The Passion, joined to the Resurrection, is, first of all, the central theme of the Apostolic KERYGMA. The Gospels develop in narrative form what many passages elsewhere in the New Testament, both in Acts and in the Epistles, proclaim in brief form. In the narrative development, the kerygma becomes articulate in dogma and theology, especially in its frequent recourse to the Old Testament prophecies. Subordinate to the theological interest, an apologetic and even polemic interest is revealed, which has recourse to the arguments of Christ's own preaching. In the second place, the Passion narrative holds a privileged place in Christian worship. Traces of it are found in the hymns of Phil 2.6-11; 1 Tm 3.16; 1 Pt 1.18–21; 2.21–24; 3.18–22; and in the heavenly liturgy of Rv 5.6-14, while explicit references to the Passion are made in the Eucharist and Baptism rites. Mention should be made here of the radical theory of G. Bertram, a disciple of A. Deissmann, who finds in the Christian cult the origin of the apotheosis or deification of the hero Jesus. In the third place, the Passion narrative shows an exemplaric interest, presenting the self-sacrificing Jesus as a model for Christian living.

Resurrection Narratives. It is difficult to reduce to one common type the various accounts of the apparitions of the risen Christ. Certain common motifs; however, can be seen: the disciples' lack of faith, Christ's sudden appearances, the disciples' fear, their recognition of Him, and their joy. Some of these motifs coincide with apparition motifs in the Old Testament. Actually, however, the variety of motifs is predominant. It is evident that before the tradition was fixed in writing, a consecutive narrative of the apparitions had not been formed, as was the case with the Passion. On the contrary, the Sitz im Leben of these narratives is very clear: they are witnesses of a decisive fact, and they are adduced as such with theological and apologetic value. The Resurrection event is joined to the Passion in the most simple formulas of the Apostolic kerygma. (It is logical that the rationalist critics declare these narratives to be pure inventions of the Christian community.)

Infancy Narratives. Apart from the Davidic descent and the virginal birth of Jesus, an account of His childhood does not form part of the programmatic preaching of the Apostles. It is absent from the samples of the kerygma in Acts, as well as from the Gospels of Mark and John, and the episodes of the INFANCY NARRATIVES in Matthew are quite different from those in Luke. This is the specific problem of the Infancy narratives. It has led some Catholic scholars to compare them with Old Testament and even extra-Biblical narratives. P. Gaechter sees behind Luke's version a tradition originating in Jerusalem, and he makes an analysis of the history of the tradition. R. Laurentin finds in Luke's redaction a collection of imitations of the story of Samuel's childhood or a procedure typical of MIDRASH. For Matthew's Infancy Gospel certain extra-Biblical parallels are adduced from narratives of the life of Moses. These literary findings, which in some way imply judgments on the historicity of the narratives, have provoked a contrary reaction that has completely stopped further study in this field. Prescinding from questions of historicity, it is beyond dispute that Annunciation accounts in Luke repeat a consecrated schema used in such accounts in the Old Testament, and likewise certain are the cases of coincidence of motifs and literary formulas with passages in Samuel and extra-Biblical texts.

Evaluation. Form-criticism, or as it is called in German, die formgeschichtliche Methode (the method of the history of forms), can be considered from the viewpoint of its objective or from that of the method it employs. Its objective is to go back from the written Gospels to the preliterary oral stage in which tradition was in the course of formation; it is a sort of paleontology of the Gospels (Dibelius). This objective is, in itself, quite legitimate, and historically it supplanted a literary criticism that had already exhausted itself. But one must remember that a literary reality cannot be adequately identified with the process of its formation, that is, that the Gospels cannot be adequately explained without the Evangelists. Finally, the canonical and authoritative texts for the Church are the four Gospels, not some hypothetical or probable forms that may have existed before them. Form criticism, therefore, is a licit, interesting, and promising undertaking; but it cannot be called the only task of Gospel exegesis. Viewed as a method, die formgeschichtliche Methode is precisely that-a method of work. As such, it is neutral and disposable, to be evaluated according to its usefulness and its results. But it should not be forgotten that any method, especially one that is concerned with the sciences of the spirit, suffers under the influence of those who use it. For this reason it is very difficult to pass a neutral judgment on a method that, in theory, is neutral. Nevertheless, an evaluation will be attempted here, following the three stages of the method as described.

Value of Isolation of Units. To isolate the literary units of which the Gospels are composed is relatively easy and reliable. Likewise, the isolation of the editorial work that was done on the oral tradition can be achieved with sufficient certitude; the wide agreement of exegetes in this regard confirms the results. (In the Old Testament there is not the same favorable situation of the presence of three or even, at times, four parallel documents.) In otherwise doubtful places, what is lacking in objective evidence is supplied by the picture of the whole that the investigator has seen in formation or that he has brought with him. The method, however, becomes more uncertain or even dangerous when it pursues more and more minute divisions, separating a maxim from its scene, breaking a binary formula into its component parts, or isolating a piece from its natural series. The shortest is not always the oldest. Together with the aggregative force of thematic or formal combination, there are also at work the forces of selection, of partial citation, etc., as shown by the use of the Old Testament in the New Testament. Uncontrolled analysis can lead to an atomism that loses sight of the large or even the small connections. Bultmann is not free from this defect.

Value of Classification by Types. Every classification simplifies the understanding of an object and permits, by comparison, the appreciation of the individual. The convergence of the three criteria—theme, form, and purpose—can guarantee the results. Classification places the literary units in a new context, which means placing them in a new light. But it would be sterile to be content with a pure, quasi-botanical classification. The dangers in such a step are the following.

There is a danger of carelessly confusing the form and the thematic criteria and of drawing inferences as a result of such confusion. The same theme of miracle may appear in the form of miracle story or in the form of apothegm; the same form of miracle story may hold for a tempest theme or a deafmute theme. Therefore, before drawing conclusions it is necessary to determine clearly whether the differences are those of theme or of form.

Another danger is to apply foreign types to the Gospels and to draw unwarranted conclusions from them. Bultmann borrowed the term and type of apothegm from Greek literature. Actually, however, such a type is found in many different literatures, and therefore it could be useful for seeking the differential of the Gospels. The type of legend is taken from medieval Christian literature—written, not oral; but in Bultmann it is surcharged with a negative evaluation that has been imposed on it by the ENLIGHTENMENT. Dibelius's term of Novelle (short story) is not felicitous, and the deficiencies in the term myth are evident. Moreover, in using a type that is common to other literatures, there is the danger of jumping from analogy to dependence, e.g., to explain the stories of Jesus' miracles as imitations of Greek miracle stories created for the purpose of setting up Christian, in opposition to pagan, propaganda.

A third danger is to define a type so as to raise it to an absolute norm for judging all the individual units that may fall under this type. In assuming that the pure form is the original, primary one, a certain pure type is reconstructed that is never met with in any individual case, and then this pure type is applied as the ideal norm on the individual unit until they are equalized. The result is a mechanical stylization of life as if in a laboratory. Bultmann, for instance, finds that precise topographical data do not correspond to the style of the apothegm, and therefore, when they occur in Gospel apothegms, he considers them very suspicious. One runs the risk of going in a vicious circle in thus defining a certain literary genre with absolute rigor, applying this definition to the literary units, and then drawing conclusions. Bultmann is frequently guilty of such faulty methodology, thereby falsifying the formcriticism method in its very birth. It should be noted, however, that the fault lies not in using a well-established form as a criterion but in turning it into an absolute criterion.

A final danger lies in passing, without further ado, from conclusions regarding the form to judgments regarding historicity: e.g., it is cultic, hence not historical. As far as mere terminology regarding the form is concerned, one is justified in saying that it is a legend and that therefore it is not history. What this means is that the matter is narrated in the form of a legend, not in the form of history-nothing more. But it is wrong to draw the conclusion that since the thing is told in the form of a legend the thing itself is legendary, not historical. Such a conclusion is to leap from a judgment regarding the form to a judgment regarding the historicity. Naturally, the question concerning the historicity interests the investigator. Yet it is a question that cannot be answered by merely typological criteria: other "real" criteria (concerning the things themselves) must be added to these. Dibelius, in general, is cautious in his conclusions, modestly skirting this field. On the contrary, according to E. Schick, this is the capital sin of Bultmann: to jump from conclusions regarding the form (which are often merely hypothetical) to judgments of historicity, i.e., nonhistoricity. It is clear that frequently a judgment that something is not historical is simply a prejudgment (prejudice) placed at the end of the study. L. Köhler says of Bultmann's analyses of Jesus' disputes that they seek to find how they could have come into being, on the supposition that they are not historical. And Bultmann himself lays the burden of proof on anyone who wishes to go back from the Gospel text to the life of Jesus.

Part Played by the Community. With the classification according to the various literary forms the work is not yet finished. The next step is to investigate the history of the forms. This is where the Geschichte (history) of the formgeschichtliche Methode fits in: to go back through the "forms" to the "formation," back from the four Gospels to the original one gospel, from the Evangelists to the community. Thus there appears a new view of oral tradition, a new view of the early Church and its life. Before the Scripture there was oral tradition, as a living force united with Jesus, as a force that was, to a large extent, formative, so that Scripture is, to a large extent, a fixing of the oral tradition. The bearer of this traditiontradition in the sense both of the act of transmitting and of the material transmitted-was the early Christian community, the early Church. Scripture was born in the Church and from the Church; the New Testament is the Church's book. This Church displayed a life of many different activities: it proclaimed the good news, it preached, it defended itself, it celebrated its liturgy. This rich and varied life vitalized the transmitted material and its fixed form in writing; it produced a living book-the New Testament.

In a certain sense, therefore, this new method has, no doubt, made an important contribution; and for this reason it has been welcomed, though with various degrees of reserve, by many Catholic scholars. Yet, if the investigator twists these concepts, the method can turn out to be catastrophic. Instead of a faithful transmission by controlled witnesses pledged to preserve, interpret, and actualize the material, we are offered a tradition that preserves but little and invents almost everything, indebted more to Judaism and Hellenism than to Jesus, a tradition that cannot bring us with certainty to the person and life of Jesus. "Of the life and personality of Jesus practically nothing can be known." This tradition can lead us merely to the early Christian community. Yet this community is not the Church as it is shown to be in the other writings of the New Testament and even in certain passages of the Gospels, but a community borrowed from a positivistic and romantic sociology that has already become outdated in the scholarly field of history and literature. It is an anonymous, amorphous community, an undifferentiated mass, without personalities; it is creative in a strict sense, collectively engaged in a work of invention. This community scarcely remembers Jesus, but it compensates for this by having a fantastically prodigious power of creation. It has created something marvelously new without anyone's being able to explain who created the community itself. It is precisely this that has discredited a Formgeschichte directed by certain determined religious conceptions or negations: the Gospels are first cut up into minute literary units, these are then dissolved in an amorphous community, and the result is set forth as a scientific explanation of the Gospels.

Historical and Bibliographical Conspectus. Although the opinions of the leading proponents of this method have already been mentioned, it will be useful to set forth here a brief historical synthesis of many of the scholars connected with this theory, together with the basic bibliographical data.

Early Background. It was from Johann Gottfried von HERDER that the first intuitions arose regarding this theory: the early preaching, oral tradition, the Apostles' preaching and the instruction of the first communities, the Palestinian and Hellenistic color; see his Vom Erlöser der Menschen. Nach unseren drei ersten Evv. (Leipzig 1796); Nach Jo-Ev. (Leipzig 1797). J. K. L. Gieseler developed the theory of the common oral tradition, with its conservative and formative principles, and he compared this with the tradition of the Rabbis; see his Historischkritischer Versuch über die Entstehung und die frühesten Schicksale der schriftlichen Evangelien (1818). This was followed by the period of literary criticism of the New Testament until, at the end of the century, there was a return to the ideas of Herder. C. F. G. Heinrici, in his book Die Entstehung des New Testament (Leipzig 1899) and in several articles, separated the Gospels from other surrounding literary works, in practice distinguished tradition from redaction, pointed to the formation of the traditions in the early preaching and teaching, and found their roots in the life of the community. H. Gunkel's influence was felt after World War I, and in about a year the new school was born. Decisive for the community and cult aspect of the theory was the work of Adolf Deissmann, Licht vom Osten (Tübingen 1908).

Basic Studies. Urged on by Gunkel, or on the strength of their own independent efforts, five men produced the following basic works: (1) M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangelium (Tübingen, January 1919); (2) K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (Berlin, March 1919); (3) R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (Göttingen, March 1921); History of the Synoptic Tradition, tr. J. Marsch (New York 1963); (4) M. Albertz, Die synoptischen Streitgespräche (Berlin, May 1921); (5) G. Bertram, Die Leidengeschichte Jesu und der Christuskult (Göttingen 1922).

These scholars remained active until the beginning of World War II, publishing books and articles and contributing to the second edition of the dictionary Die Reli- gion in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Bertram, "Entstehung des Christentums" 1:1531-35; Bultmann, "Evangelien: Gattungsgeschichtlich" 2:418-422, "Urgemeinde" 5:1408-14; Schmidt, "Formgeschichte" 2:638-640, "Geschichtschreibung im New Testament" 2: 1115-17, "Jesus Christus" 3:110-115; Dibelius, "Bibelkritik des New Testament'' 1:1033-35. The following are other works by these authors that should be cited: Bertram, "Die Bedeutung der Kultgeschichtlichen Methode für die ntl. Forschung'' [Theologische Blätter 2 (1923) 25-36], in which he made his own method somewhat different by a different terminology; Bultmann, Jesus (Berlin 1926) and the first edition of his collected articles, Glauben und Verstehen (Tübingen 1933). Dibelius, ''Zur Formgeschichte der Evangelien" Theologische Rundschau 1 (1929) 185-216 and other articles in which he widened the field of study, such as "Zur Formgeschichte des New Testament ausserhalb der Evangelien'' Theologische Rundschau 3 (1931) 207-242; "Stilkritisches zur Apostelgeschichte" Eucharisteion für H. Gunkel 2 (1923) 27-49; "Rabbinische und evangelische Erzählungen" Theologische Blätter 11 (1932) 1-12. Schmidt, "Die Stellung der Evangelien in der allgemeinen Literaturgeschichte" Eucharisteion für H. Gunkel 2 (1923) 50-134; "Die Persönlichkeitsfrage im Urchristentum'' Theologische Blätter 3 (1925) 153-161.

Reaction. Comments and criticisms on the new school or new method were not slow in making their appearance, and they came from different sides. On the Protestant side the following studies in criticism of this theory may be mentioned. O. Cullmann, "Les recéntes études sur la formation de la tradition evangelique" Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses 5 (1925) 459-477, 564-579. E. Fascher, "Die formgeschichtliche Methode: eine Darstellung und Kritik'' Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft 2 (1924). L. Köhler, "Das formgeschichtliche Problem des New Testament'' in Sammlung gemeinverständlicher Vorträge und Schriften aus dem Gebiet der Theologie und Religionsgeschichte (Tübingen 1925). M. Goguel, "Une nouvelle école de critique évangelique" Revue d'histoire des religions 2 (1926) 114-160.

On the Catholic side the following critical studies, among others, have been published. H. Dieckmann, "Die formgeschichtliche Methode und ihre Anwendung auf die Auferstehungsberichte" Scholastik 1 (1926) 379–399. F. M. Braun, "Une nouvelle école d'éxégèse" La Vie intellectuelle (1931) 180–199; Où en est le problème de Jésus (Brussels 1932); "Formgeschichte" Dictionnaire de la Bible, supplemental ed. L. Pirot, et al. 3 (1938) 312–317. E. Florit, Il metodo della "Storia delle Forme'' e sua applicazione al racconto della passione (Rome 1935).

Although the attitude of Catholic scholars has been rather negative, efforts are being made to distinguish the method used in this theory from the whole theory itself. During World War II, E. Schick brought out his Formgeschichte und Synoptikerexegese: eine kritische Untersuchung über die Möglichkeit und die Grenzen der formgeschichtlichen Methode (New Testament Abhandlungen 18, Münster 1940). This Catholic study, which explains the new method, evaluates it with balanced judgment and endeavors to apply it, is a work of basic importance and is still very useful. (Extensive use of it has been made in preparing this article.) After the war, various Catholic scholars began to accept the method as purged of the errors contained in the rest of the system. Special mention should be made of T. Soiron, who was able, in 1941, to publish (at Freiburg) his work, Die Bergpredigt Jesu: formgeschichtliche, exegetische und theologische Erklärung. However, although K. H. Schelkle defended his thesis, Die Passion Jesu in der Verkündigung des New Testament, in 1941, it was not until 1949 that he was allowed to publish it (at Heidelberg). Other Catholic scholars who have published valuable studies on this matter are L. Cerfaux, L. Léon-Dufour, H. Schürmann, A. Vögtle, J. Dupont, F. Mussner, the commentators in the Regensburg New Testament, etc. Abundant and clear information can be found in L. Randellini, "La tradizione evangelica," Introduzione al New Testament (Brescia 1961) 35-138.

After 1950 there appeared a new method and school that extended and integrated the results of form criticism by paying more attention to the intelligent and important work that the Evangelists did on the material they received from tradition. W. Marxsen gave the name of Redaktionsgeschichte (redaction history) to this new method. Some of the main representatives of this school, with their important studies, are G. Bornkamm, "Matthäus als Interpret der Herrenworte" Theologische Literzturzeitung 79 (1954) 341–346; H. Conzelmann, Die Mitte der Zeit: Studien zur Theologie des Lukas (Tübingen 1954); W. Marxsen, Der Evangelist Markus: Studien zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Evangeliums (Göttingen 1956).

Other New Testament Literary Genres. The formcriticism school has concentrated its efforts on the Synoptic Gospels, with only an occasional excursus (e.g., by Dibelius) on the Acts of the Apostles.

The New Testament Epistles can be all grouped in one common literary genre, though with certain differences among them, from the short personal note to Philemon through the letters occasioned by certain situations, such as Galatians and 2 Corinthians, up to those Epistles, such as Romans and Hebrews, that approach the form of a theological treatise.

The Revelation to St. John belongs to the apocalyptic literary genre that was highly developed in the late extra-Biblical religious literature of the Jews. It evidently gives more space to eschatological visions, which are described in symbolic terms, than to visions concerning actual history related in allegorical style.

Although all these writings are strictly literary works, the incorporate a certain amount of preliterary, traditional material. To some extent, therefore, they too can be analyzed according to the principles of the history of tradition, yet without the advantage of a possible Synoptic comparison, as in the case of the Gospels. According to Bornkamm (Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 1:1002-05) the following types of literary genre may be mentioned as found in these writings: kerygmas, in which the faith is briefly set forth, and creeds, in which it is professed (1 Cor 15.3-5; 8.6); hymns (Phil 2.6-11); sermons made up of a kerygmatic argument from Scripture combined with an exhortation to repentance (Acts 2.22-39); and admonitions, which occur toward the end of many of the Epistles and which contain, among other things, lists of vices and virtues (Rom 1.29-31), comparisons taken from everyday life (1 Cor 9.24), and advice on the various states of life (Eph 5.21-6.9).

FORMOSUS, POPE

Pontificate: Oct. 6, 891 to April 4, 896. Of Roman origin, Formosus played an important role in papal affairs for more than a quarter of a century before becoming pope. He was consecrated bishop of Porto in 864 by Pope NICHOLAS I, who selected him to lead the missionary party that went to Bulgaria in 866 at the request of King Boris. Formosus was so successful in that venture that Boris sought to have him made an archbishop to serve as head of an autonomous Bulgarian church. It was a request that Nicholas denied, perhaps because he suspected that it had more to do with Formosus' ambition than with Boris' wishes. Formosus took an active part in the proceedings of the Roman synod of 869, which denied the right of PHOTIUS to be Patriarch of Constantinople. In 869 and again in 872 he served as papal legate on missions sent to the West Frankish and the East Frankish kingdoms. He played an important role in the complex maneuvering by Pope JOHN VIII that ended in 875 with the selection of Charles the Bald, king of the West Franks, to succeed Louis II as emperor. But Formosus' prominent role in the papal affairs was abruptly interrupted in 876, when he and a circle of prominent clerical and civil officials were forced by John VIII to flee Rome. When the fugitives refused the papal command to return to Rome, John VIII excommunicated them. After several years in exile in the West Frankish kingdom, Formosus was permitted to return to Rome and was restored to his see at Porto by POPE MARINUS I. In 885 he as bishop of Porto was called on to consecrate Pope STEPHEN V, and he himself was elected pope in 891.

As had been the case since the pontificate of Nicholas I (858-867), appeals continued to flow to the Roman curia requiring decisions by the pope. Although Photius had been deposed as patriarch in 886, opposing parties in Constantinople were still seeking to resolve problems associated with his patriarchate, especially the issue of the legality of his ordinations. Asked for a ruling on this matter, Formosus insisted that those ordained by Photius must surrender their positions, a decision that impeded the efforts of those in Constantinople anxious to put an end to the Photian schism and to make peace with Rome. Disputes arising from challenges to the jurisdiction of metropolitans and from contested episcopal elections continued to be appealed to Rome; Formosus made every effort to assure that papal authority in settling such matters was honored. At the urging of Archbishop Fulk of Reims, Formosus lent his support to the cause of Charles the Simple in his struggle against Eudo, count of Paris, for kingship of the West Frankish kingdom.

These activities reminiscent of the pontificates of such great Carolingian popes as ADRIAN I (772–795) and Nicholas I were in fact misleading in terms of the actual situation facing the papacy and the PAPAL STATE as the ninth century neared its end. The problem, long in the making, was fundamental. Since the pontificate of STE-PHEN II (752–757) the survival of the Papal State and the capability of the pope to act independently on behalf of the Christian community had depended on a protector willing and able to guarantee the territorial integrity and the autonomy of the Papal State and allow the pope freedom of action in religious affairs. The Carolingian dynasty had filled that role since the time of King PEPIN III. However, by the end of the ninth century that family was fast approaching its end.

This emerging chaos was particularly evident in Italy, creating a situation which threatened the very existence of the Papal State. When Formosus became pope, Guido (Guy) of Spoleto—long an antagonist of popes John VIII and Marinus I—had emerged as the leading actor on the Italian scene. Guido was able by force of arms to establish himself as king of Italy and then in 891 to compel Pope STEPHEN V to crown him emperor and his son Lambert king of Italy. His past behavior left no doubt that he would have little respect for the ancient privileges of the Papal State. Guido's ascendancy raised the urge in Rome to seek a more benevolent protector for St. Peter. The leading candidate was Arnulf, king of the East Franks, to whom Pope Stephen V had already made overtures about intervention in Italy.

By the time of the election of Formosus, Guido seemed to be consolidating his position as master of Italy. He compelled Formosus to crown his son Lambert as emperor, assuring Spoletan control of that office. Complaints about his aggression against residents of the Papal State mounted. All of which combined to persuade Formosus in the summer of 893 to renew his predecessor's plea to Arnulf to help St. Peter and his people against "the evil Christians" of Spoleto. Arnulf invaded Italy in late 893, drove Guido out of Pavia, but then returned to his own realm without taking decisive action. Guido died soon after, leaving Lambert as emperor and king of Italy. In response to new papal appeals Arnulf led another expedition into Italy in 895 and marched victoriously to Rome, where he overpowered the Spoletan defenders and took over the city in early 896. Formosus immediately crowned him emperor, but what seemed a papal triumph was fleeting. While leading a campaign against Lambert Arnulf suffered an incapacitating stroke that ended any possibility of his utilizing his imperial office on behalf of the pope and the Papal State.

Shortly after Arnulf's coronation, Formosus died, but his presence on the Roman scene was not yet ended. With Arnulf disabled, Lambert of Spoleto quickly recovered control of Rome. He and his mother, Agiltrude forced Pope STEPHEN VI to convene a synod in 897 to consider the fitness of Formosus for the papal office. The dead pope's body, already buried nine months, was exhumed and placed in full regalia on a throne before the synod. With Pope Stephen VI presiding, a series of charges derived from Formosus' activities throughout most of his past career were addressed to the cadaver whose "responses" were relayed to the assemblage by a terrified deacon standing beside the corpse. At the end of what was later dubbed a horrennda synoda, Formosus' pontificate was declared illegal and all of his acts were declared void, including his ordinations. His body was then stripped of its insignia and vestments and consigned to a common grave from whence it was to be thrown into the Tiber, but it was spared that fate by a hermit who recovered and re-interred it.

This "cadaveric synod" divided Rome and the Papal State into pro- and anti-Formosan parties whose bitter animosity became increasingly violent. As reward for his role in the trial, Pope Stephen was deposed and strangled by the pro-Formosans. Although Pope JOHN IX (898-900) sought to clear the name of Formosus, Pope SERGIUS III (904-911) revived the decrees of the cadaverous synod, touching off not only a new round of violence but also the pamphlet writing of Auxilius and Eugenius Vulgarius in defense of Formosus. By the time the vicious rivalry over the Formosan issue ended, irreparable damage had been done to the established order in the Papal State. The constant turmoil caused by the rivalry of these factions created a setting that allowed a powerful Roman family, founded by Theophylactus, an official in the papal administration, to seize control of elections to the papal office, to exploit papal resources, and to dominate the governance of Rome and the Papal State during the first half of the tenth century.

FORMS, UNICITY AND PLURALITY OF

A subject of controversy in the Middle Ages that can be understood only in terms of the Aristotelian doctrines it presupposes. This article therefore treats the presuppositions on which the controversy was based, its origins, its historical development, and a brief evaluation of its importance in the history of thought.

Presuppositions. The thesis of unicity or plurality of forms is philosophical in nature. It is an application to a concrete fact of the Aristotelian metaphysical doctrines of potency and act and of matter and form (see POTENCY AND ACT; MATTER AND FORM). It applies to all substances composed of matter and form. It may be formulated thus: whether in one individual, remaining essentially one, there are many substantial forms or only one. The essence of a natural thing is constituted from two principles: one potential, undetermined in itself yet determinable, namely, matter; the other actual, the determining factor that makes the thing what it is, namely, FORM. Incomplete in themselves, they tend naturally to unite so as to constitute one individual substance, the hoc aliquid, or composite, which, although possessing several perfections and activities, is essentially one. Three factors are essential in becoming: the starting point of the change, PRIVATION; its end, form; and an underlying subject, or substratum, persisting through the process. The substratum, though numerically one before the change, plays a double part: one positive, persisting in every transmutation, matter; the other negative, the absence of the preceding form, privation. Privation, however important in becoming, does not survive as a constituent element (Phys. 190a 14-192a 33; Meta. 1032a 15-1033b 19, 1055b 11, 1069b 32-4). The crux of the problem consists in determining (1) whether primary matter is absolutely passive potency or contains some actuality of its own (potentia activa); (2) whether privation is the disappearance of all previous forms or is an incomplete form (incohatio formae); and (3) whether substantial form, including virtually all preceding forms, confers on primary matter its complete and specific determination, and alone actualizes all its perfections and activities, or imparts one perfection only. In the first alternative, one must posit oneness of form; in the latter, plurality of forms.

Origins of the controversy. In the height of the controversy, JOHN PECKHAM asserted that the unicity thesis originated from the Averroist leaders (Registrum epistolarum, ed. C. T. Martin, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 224 v. [London 1858-96; repr. New York 1964—] 3:842). The theory is Aristotelian in origin, not Averroist; the question was debated years before the Averroist movement arose (see AVERROISM, LATIN). It impinged on the schoolmen with Avicenna's De anima (Venice 1508, v. 7, fol. 26v–27v), and was formulated by DOMINIC GUNDISALVI (GUNDISSALINUS) in his own De anima [ed. J. T. Muckle, Mediaeval Studies 2 (1940) 44-7]. The discussion turned on the oneness of soul, admittedly a different question; but by systematically presenting Avicenna's statement and introducing the catchword "substance," Gundissalinus supplied the main features of the problem and set the basis of the unity thesis: the vegetative, sensitive, and rational, though separately three distinct substances, united in man are one simple substance. Nevertheless, in his De processione mundi (ed. G. Bülow, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 24.3:30) and De unitate (ed. P. Correns, ibid. 1.1:8) he popularized Avicebron's theories on matter and form, on the various degrees of forms, and other tenets, thus providing the pluralists with their fundamental principles.

Historical development. The full implications of the problem dawned on the masters slowly and gradually. In its first phase it was restricted to psychology; later, when its metaphysical issue was grasped, it was extended to all composites.

Prior to Aquinas. In its earliest stage the investigation, after the pattern of Avicenna and Gundissalinus, centered in the plurality or unity of the soul in man. JOHN BLUND (before 1210) and ROLAND OF CREMONA (1229–30) first broached the subject. Both supported the unity theory. Roland's proofs foreshadowed St. Thomas Aquinas's: Since one thing has one being (unicum esse), it can have but one first perfection. And if the first imparts complete perfection, the second or third serves no purpose. The pluralists argued from the embryo-genesis theory, which later, with the support of Aristotle's De generatione animalium (736a 35-736b 5), became their strongest evidence throughout the controversy. With PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR (d. 1236) the inquiry moved from the unity of soul to the unicity of substance: "whether the sensitive and rational are rooted in the same substance." Some held that man possesses one soul comprising three distinct incorporeal substances, each exercising a special vital function. Others maintained that they were not three substances, but powers, or faculties, rooted in one soul, one substance. Philip's presentation of the question set the standard for the first half of the thirteenth century.

St. ALBERT THE GREAT, perceiving its general and wider principles, brought the inquiry one step further. He identified substance and form, distinguished by Philip and others. Albert's considered view appears in De unitate intellectus: "In my writings I repeatedly repudiated the pluralist theory as an absurdity. Its inventors were not Aristotelians, but some Latins who knew not the nature of the soul. It is a fatal error to assert that one subject possesses many [plures with the manuscripts, not possibiles, as in the printed text] substances, for substances cannot be but forms" (Omnia opera, ed. A. Borgnet, 9:455). See S. Vanni-Rovighi, "Alberto Magno e l'Unità della forma sostanziale nell'uomo," Studi in onore di Bruno Nardi (Firenze 1955) 2:753–778.

To sum up, Aristotle was claimed by all litigants, and the supporters of unicity appealed also to Augustine. ADAM OF BUCKFIELD, ROGER BACON, and Geoffrey of Aspall (see A. B. Emden, A Biographical Register of the University of Oxford to A.D. 1500, 3 v. [Oxford 1957-59] 1:60-61) were all pluralists; and so were, according to their own principles, ROBERT GROSSETESTE, THOMAS OF YORK, and St. BONAVENTURE. RICHARD FISHACRE and RICHARD RUFUS OF CORNWALL remained undecided. But Philip the Chancellor, HUGH OF SAINT-CHER, JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE, the Summa Fratris Alexandri, WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE, Pseudo-Grosseteste's De anima, and St. Albert all defended the unity of substance in man, however imperfectly they understood it. Yet by admitting a medium uniting soul and body, or by distinguishing between substance and form, they showed their incomplete grasp of its implications. Even Albert, not being aware of the full implications of potency and act, failed to tackle certain difficulties, such as the elementary forms in inorganic bodies (mixta). By granting exceptions, they weakened its metaphysical and universal value [see D. A. Callus, "The Origins of the Problem of the Unity of Form," The Dignity of Science, ed. J. A. Weisheipl (Washington 1961) 121-149; O. Lottin, Psychologie et Morale aux XIIe et XIIIe siècles (2d ed. Gembloux 1957) 1:463-479].

Thomistic Teaching. St. THOMAS AQUINAS brought the unicity thesis to its full maturity. Recognizing the confusions on the fundamental issue, he restated the problem anew. His innovation consists in linking the traditional thesis with Aristotelian doctrine, regarding it not as psychological but as metaphysical, based on the principle of CONTRADICTION. An exact concept of esse and unity, of primary matter and substantial form, and of the distinction between substantial and accidental form enabled him to demonstrate the intrinsic incompatibility of plurality of forms, whether juxtaposed, or hierarchically coordinated, or however disposed. Nothing is absolutely one except by one form, by which a thing has being, for a thing has both being and unity from the same source. If, therefore, a human being were living by one form, animal by another, and man by a third, it would follow that he is not absolutely one. If the intellectual soul is the form of the body, it is impossible that there be another substantial form besides the intellectual soul, as it is impossible for any accidental disposition or other medium to come between the body and the soul or between any substantial form and its matter. Since the intellectual soul virtually comprises all inferior forms, it does by itself whatever the imperfect forms do in other things (Summa Theologiae, 1a, 76.1, 3–8; De anim. 6, 9–11; De spir. creat. 1–3).

Primarily a philosophical problem, it became theological by implication. But the question itself was not new, and it had been debated peacefully until theological inferences impinged on it. The crisis flared up during Thomas's second regency in Paris (1269-72). His dictum that "all previous forms disappear with the advent of the substantial form" (Quodl. 1.4.1, Easter 1269) aroused fierce opposition from some theologians. The crucial issue concerned Christ's identity living and dead. Was Christ, living and dead, the same man? Was His body numerically the same on the cross and in the grave? Does the soul perfect the body immediately or by means of corporeity? Thomas answered that, soul and body being hypostatically united with the Divine Person in life and death, Christ living and dead was identically, or simpliciter, the same man. But since the soul makes the body human, at their separation, the soul remaining the same, Christ's body was the same in a certain respect, or secundum quid (Quodl. 2.1, Christmas 1269; ibid. 3.2.2, Easter 1270; ibid. 4.5.1, Easter 1271; cf. Summa Theologiae 3a, 50.5, Naples 1273). The form of corporeity, not being distinct from the specific form but one and the same with it, does not remain (Quodl. 12.7.1, Christmas 1270).

The univocity thesis was impugned, but not condemned, in Paris. It was included in neither the 1270 nor the 1277 syllabus. There is no foundation for a story that it was proscribed and that Thomas was excommunicated. This arose from a misinterpretation of ROGER MARSTON [Quaestiones disputatae (Quaracchi 1932) 116–117; see D. A. Callus, "The Problem of the Unity of Form and Richard Knapwell, OP," Mélanges offerts a Étienne Gilson (Toronto-Paris 1959) 151–156].

The Oxford Crisis. Spared in Paris, the thesis was attacked at Oxford. The Dominican archbishop of Canterbury, ROBERT KILWARDBY, on March 18, 1277, forbade the teaching that "the vegetative, sensitive, intellective principles are one simple form [12]. The absolute potentiality of prime matter [3]; the absence of any incomplete form in privation [4]; the immediate union of substantial form with prime matter [7, 16]; and the equivocal predication of a living and dead body [13]" were also not to be taught (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, 4 v. [Paris 1889–97] 1:558–560). Peter of Conflans, archbishop of Corinth, however, remonstrated with Kilwardby for condemning irreproachable theses, especially that of the unity of form, upheld as true doctrine by many masters. Kilwardby riposted that it is unintelligible that the specific form of the composite performs the activities of all imperfect forms, and at its presence they all pass away. This theory, he said, is false and against sense experience, faith, and morals. The true unity of forms consists in the aggregate of all incomplete forms, essentially different but coordinated, each performing its proper action, and thus constituting with the complete form one composite.

Kilwardby's Apologia prompted two vigorous replies-one from GILES OF ROME with the Contra gradus et pluralitates formarum (before April of 1278), the other from GILES OF LESSINES with his De unitate formae (July of 1278), which is a constructive, comprehensive, and dignified treatise, in which all Kilwardby's arguments are objectively confuted. The unity thesis was attacked by WILLIAM DE LA MARE in his Correctorium Fratris Thomae, but it was defended by THOMAS OF SUTTON in the Contra pluralitates formarum and in De productione formae substantialis (see CORRECTORIA). HENRY OF GHENT discussed the question in Paris without taking sides (Ouodl. 1.4, 1276). Later, mainly because of theological prejudices, he stated that there are two forms in man but one in other compounds (Quodl. 2.2, Christmas 1277; ibid. 3.6, Easter 1286; etc.). And so it continued to be freely ventilated in the schools.

The controversy reached its final climax with Kilwardby's successor, John Peckham, who on Oct. 29, 1284, ratified the prohibition, singling out the unity tenet as a source of many absurdities. A long and painful struggle ensued between him and the English Dominicans. The crux of the dispute converged on whether the unicity thesis was compatible with Catholic doctrine. Peckham claimed that it was impossible, without the plurality theory, to safeguard the teaching on the Incarnation, the Eucharist, the resurrection of the body, and other Catholic articles. The Dominicans argued that the problem was not theological, but primarily philosophical, and therefore either answer was consistent with the faith. Since all Catholic doctrines could be explained effectively by either view, it could be discussed freely as an opinion. Moreover, since, on Peckham's own confession, this question was reserved to the Holy See, it was outside the archbishop's competency.

WILLIAM DE HOTHUM, Dominican provincial, pointed out to Peckham that the proper way of determining a philosophical issue, when either solution might be adopted without danger to faith, was not by condemnation but by a solemn disputation. RICHARD KNAPWELL undertook this task in his disputed question "Whether faith about the essence of human nature united to the Word requires us to posit many forms." His purpose was not to attack the pluralist view nor to defend his own, but to show that both opinions could equally safeguard Catholic faith. He expounded them objectively, replied to both objections, and concluded: "All this is said without dogmatizing, or injury to a better opinion." Peckham, however, on April 30, 1286, condemned the unity thesis in itself and in all its implications as heretical and fruitful of heresies, and excommunicated its defenders (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores 3:921-923). Contrary to Peckham's expectation and pressure, Rome did not ratify his censure. The reaction to the condemnation was strongly felt, and it was criticized vigorously in Paris (cf. GODFREY OF FONTAINES, Quodl. 3.5.207-208, 211; Christmas 1286). Knapwell disappeared from Oxford, but ROBERT OF OR-FORD, Thomas of Sutton, WILLIAM OF MACCLESFELD, and others vindicated the Thomist thesis.

The condemnation did not stop the controversy. It continued in scholastic disputations, treatises, and commentaries on the Sentences and on Aristotle. The condemnation had no juridical effect outside Peckham's province; yet it painfully hampered the freedom of discussion, causing perplexities and anguish of minds (cf. Henry of Ghent, Godfrey of Fontaines, loc. cit.). In Oxford the hindrance was more deeply felt. JOHN BACON-THORP, as late as the first half of the fourteenth century, is a striking example. Comparing Oxford with Paris, he deplored that, whereas the Parisians were free to accept whatever opinion they preferred, the Oxford masters were compelled to discuss it in Peckham's terms [Quaest. in 3 sent. 19.1 (Cremona 1618) 119-124; see D. A. Callus, "The Problem . . . and Richard Knapwell," 123-160].

Evaluation. The controversy was not a conflict between Dominicans and Franciscans. They certainly had a prominent share in it; but other religious and secular masters in theology and arts joined issue. Nor was it a hair-splitting question. Indeed it was of the highest metaphysical importance. It is an explanation of the essential unity of man and of any composite. The answer betrays two concepts of unity: composite unity and simple unity. The pluralists, considering the components in the structure of the composite as substantial entities, posited unity of composition, although they varied considerably in their interpretations. Thomas Aquinas, establishing the transcendental relation of matter and form on potentiality and actuality and on the real composition of essence and the act of being, necessarily postulated one simple substance, or form, in all composites. He made it the cornerstone of his metaphysics and a fundamental tenet of his synthesis [cf. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 6 (1914) 385]. The conflict, therefore, was between two opposite tendencies; two different interpretations of potentiality and actuality, of matter and form; two different methods of approaching philosophical problems. For the metaphysicians, the controversy over unicity or plurality of forms is of universal significance and permanent value, and it is as relevant in the twenty-first century as it was in the thirteenth.

FORNARI-STRATA, MARIA VICTORIA, BL.

Widow, foundress and abbess; b. Genoa, Italy, 1562; d. there, Dec. 15, 1617. In 1589 after nine years of marriage to Angelo Strata (Strada), she was widowed; she made a vow of chastity and lived quietly with her six children until they were settled in life. Five of them became religious; the sons, Franciscans; the daughters, Regular Canonesses. She was then free to carry out her desire to found an order of contemplative nuns devoted to the mystery of Mary's Annunciation and hidden life in Nazareth. Through the financial assistance of Vincenza Lomellini, she built a convent, and Bernardino Zannoni, SJ, drew up the constitutions, which were approved by CLEMENT VIII on March 15, 1604. Maria Victoria and ten companions were clothed in the habit; a year later they made solemn vows (Sept. 7, 1605). Each nun added "Maria Annunziata" to her baptismal name, and the order became known as the "Celestial Annunciades" from their sky-blue scapulars and mantles to distinguish them from the order founded by St. JOAN OF FRANCE (VALOIS). The Italians called them "Le Turchine" or "Blue Nuns." The order spread to Pontarlier (1612) and Vezou (1613) in Burgundy and then to Germany. The cloister is unusually rigid; the nuns devote their time to making vestments and altar linens for poor churches. Pope LEO XII beatified Maria Victoria in 1828.

FORNICATION

Sexual intercourse between an unmarried man and an unmarried woman who are not closely related. It is thus distinguished from adultery, in which at least one of the parties is married, and from incest, in which there is a close relationship either of blood or affinity between the parties. Fornication, objectively considered, is always gravely sinful. It is one of the sins that excludes those guilty of it from the kingdom of Christ and of God (Eph 5.5; cf. 1 Cor 7.2; 10.8; Gal 5.19). This doctrine is confirmed by natural reason, which holds that the generative act is legitimate only when performed by a man and woman bound to each other by the tie of marriage. The unwed are not responsibly related to each other so as to provide a stable family situation in which possible issue of their union can be properly cared for and brought to maturity. Sexual relations between persons unmarried to each other are a type of activity that, per se, can result in injury to offspring and to the community, which is likely either to be burdened with their care, or to be deprived of the sort of increment it has the right to expect as the fruit of the union of its male and female members. Moreover, if irresponsible and promiscuous sexual behavior were legitimate, this would cause the institution of marriage, so necessary to the social good, to be less desirable, and it would provide occasion for much disorder and strife.

FORNICATION (IN THE BIBLE)

Israel's legal tradition did not specifically prohibit sexual intercourse between an unmarried man and an unmarried woman. Unmarried women living in the paternal home were expected to be chaste since their chastity was a matter of respecting their fathers' authority and his economic interests. Thus, Deuteronomic legislation stipulates that a man who seduces an unmarried woman is to pay 50 shekels, as a form of bride price, to her father (Dt 22.28-29; see Ex 22.14-16). Subsequently he was not allowed to divorce her. If a man discovers that a woman was not a virgin at the time of their marriage and wished therefore to divorce her, substantiation of the charge meant that she was to be put to death because she had committed a serious sexual offense that affected the entire community (Dt 22.20-21). Legislation in Leviticus stipulated the death penalty for the daughters of priests who served as sacred prostitutes themselves because their sacrilegious behavior dishonored and tainted their fathers (Lv 21.9).

In English translations of the New Testament the Greek word porneia is often translated as "fornication." In fact, porneia is a general term meaning "sexual immorality" or "immoral sexual behavior." Specific connotations of the term can sometimes be construed from the contexts in which the term appears. Thus, Acts 15.20, 29 uses the term porneia as a summary of the kinds of sexual immorality cited in Leviticus 18. Influenced by the biblical image of the marital covenant to describe the covenantal relationship between Yahweh and Israel, the Book of Revelation uses "fornication" as a metaphor for idolatry and idolatrous practices (Rv 2.21; 14.8; 17.2, 4; 18.3; 19.2).

Most of the New Testament texts that employ the term porneia use it in a general sense. Thus, "fornication" is a common item on the lists of vices scattered here and there throughout the New Testament (Mk 7.21, etc.). Paul exhorts the Corinthians and the Thessalonians to "shun fornication" (1 Cor 6.18; 1 Thes 4.3). Like most of the moralists of his day, Paul gives sexual intercourse with a prostitute as an example of porneia, but he says nothing about the marital status of either the man or the woman involved in the activity. No New Testament text specifically mentions sexual intercourse between an unmarried man and an unmarried woman.

The meaning of the "exception clause" (Mt 5.32; 19.19) often translated as "except for the case of fornication (porneia)" in Matthew's version of Jesus' sayings on divorce is widely debated. The most plausible interpretation is that the clause refers to adultery. Roman law in force at the time that Matthew's gospel was written considered a husband's failure to divorce an adulterous wife to be a capital offense. Bibliography: R. F. FORT AUGUSTUS, ABBEY OF Benedictine abbey at the south end of Loch Ness, Diocese of Aberdeen, Scotland; dedicated to St. Benedict. The fort, built by the English (1729) to keep the Highlanders in check after the Jacobite rising (1715) and named after the third son of George II, was abandoned and sold (1867). The new owner, Lord Lovat, offered it to the English Benedictines (1876), who transformed it into the present abbey and school. The foundation was the successor and continuation of the pre-Reformation Scottish abbey at Regensburg, which had become a seminary (1862), and whose last returning monk was a member of the new community, which had ties also with the English abbey at Lamspring, Hanover. The abbey, still part of the English Congregation, has produced several archbishops and bishops. The Priory of St. Andrew (Edinburgh), founded from Fort Augustus in 1930, has since moved to North Berwick. St. Anselm (Washington, D.C.) and St. Gregory (Portsmouth, R.I.) were founded as priories from Fort Augustus, though both are now independent. In 1964 Fort Augustus had 31 priests, three clerics, and 14 brothers; its school, opened in 1878, had 157 boys.

FORTEM VIRILI PECTORE

Five-strophe office hymn that was traditionally prescribed for Vespers and Lauds in the common of feasts of holy women. It was composed by Cardinal Silvio Antoniano (1540–1603), who along with Robert BELLAR-MINE, under the chairmanship of BARONIUS, was a member of the commission that was responsible for the corrections and changes made in the Roman BREVIARY by Pope Clement VIII. The common of holy women was added to the Breviary at this time (1602). The hymn is inspired by Prv 31.10, where the valiant woman is described. The meter is iambic dimeter. Bibliography: J. FORTESCUE, ADRIAN Writer on oriental churches and Roman liturgy; b. Jan. 14, 1864; d. Letchworth, England, Feb. 11, 1923. He was of the family of St. Adrian Fortescue, martyred in 1539 under Henry VIII. His father Edward Bowles Knottesford Fortescue (1816–1877) built the church at Wilmcote in Warwickshire in the most advanced spirit of the Oxford Movement. In 1850 he became Provost of the St. Ninian Scottish Episcopal Cathedral at Perth. Through his first wife, Francis Spooner, he became connected with Cardinal Manning and the Archbishop of Canterbury, Archibald Tait. Among the seven children born from this marriage were George, who became the Keeper of Printed Books in the British Museum, and his heir, Edward Francis, who was an expert on the Armenian church. For fourteen years Edward was the President of the Association for Promoting the Unity of Christendom (A.P.U.C.). After the death of his first wife, he married Gertrude, the daughter of Reverend Sanderson Robins. Together they entered the Roman Catholic Church in 1872.

The second child of this marriage, Adrian Henry Timothy, was baptized in the Sacred Heart Church, Eden Grove, London, on Jan. 24, 1874, and educated at the Jesuit school at Boulogne–sur–Mer in France and at St. Charles, Bayswater, London. In 1891 he entered Scots College, Rome (Ph.D. 1894) and then to the theological college at Innsbruck. He was incardinated a priest in the Archdiocese of Westminster, where he served at St. Boniface (The German Church) in Whitechapel, as well as at Walthamstow, Ongar, Colchester, Enfield, Witham, and Maldon. After earning the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1905, he spent a year traveling and studying in the Near East.

During this period he produced his first major work The Orthodox Eastern Church (Catholic Truth Society, 1908, third edition, 1911). Also at this time he contributed the first of 110 articles (about 250,000 words) to the original Catholic Encyclopedia. On his return to London, he was asked to found a parish in Letchworth in Hertfordshire. He and his cousin Charles Spooner designed the church, which was dedicated to St. Hugh of Lincoln. The opening ceremony was marked by a Mass in the Roman rite as well as by a Byzantine–rite (Melkite) liturgy. The Tablet reported the church as a place ''where the services (always strictly liturgical) are carried out in a manner which might well be imitated." In 1912, at the suggestion of Herbert Thurston, he wrote his second major work, The Mass (Longmans, second edition, 1913). He wrote the preface and edited A Roman Missal (tenth edition, New York 1951). In 1918 The Ceremonies of the Roman Rite Described first appeared. Until the reforms of the 1960s this volume made the name Fortescue almost synonymous with the Roman liturgy, and it was reproduced many times, as recently as 1996 by St. Austin Press. Fortescue lectured frequently on the Oriental liturgies, and in 1919 he was made consultor of the Congregation for the Oriental Church.

FORTESCUE, ADRIAN, BL.

Knight of St. John, Martyr; b. Hertsfordshire c. 1476; d. London, July 8, 1539. The Fortescues were an ancient, noble family dating from the period of the Norman conquest. Adrian's mother was Alice Boleyn, aunt of the future queen. Adrian was the second son. He married Anne Stonor c. 1499 and was knighted in 1503. In 1503 he was named a commissioner of levying "aids" and in 1511 commissioner for the peace-both in Oxfordshire. In 1513 he was at the "battle of the spurs," and in 1520 at the "field of the cloth of gold" in special attendance upon Queen Catherine. In 1530 he stood high in the King's favor, receiving lands from the estates of Wolsey. Perhaps he owed this favor to his close relationship to Anne Boleyn. About this time he married Anne Rede. In 1532 he was admitted as a "knight of devotion" of St. John of Jerusalem and in 1533 he joined the "fraternity" of the Blackfriars. In 1534 he was arrested and placed in the Marshalsea prison for the best part of a year. In 1539 he was again arrested and his name included in the Act of Attainder against Margaret Pole and others. The charges against him are most vague: that he traitorously refused his duty of allegiance and that he "hath commyted diverse and sundrie detestable and abominable treasons." He was executed on July 8 or 9, 1539, and beatified by Leo XIII in 1895.

Feast: July 11 (Knights of Malta; Archdiocese of Birmingham).

FORTITUDE, GIFT OF

The gift of the Holy Spirit that adds to acts of the infused virtues, the heroism that some circumstances of life demand. This gift moves the soul to intense acts in the areas of all the virtues, with no anxiety about results. Since it makes practical decisions, fortitude is directed by the gift of COUNSEL. Together, both gifts move the soul to confident activities that are beyond the reach of the virtues alone. Fortitude achieves the fourth Beatitude, an insatiable desire for works of justice that the soul constantly satisfies with acts of virtue. The fruits of the gift are patience, a quiet self-containment in the presence of vexatious details, and longanimity, the ability to endure with composure even very long periods of suffering.

[P. F. MULHERN]

FORTITUDE, VIRTUE OF

Courage of soul that enables a person to adopt and adhere to a reasonable course of action when faced with the danger of death or other grave peril. In a wide sense fortitude can be understood as a general virtue, i.e., as a characteristic of all virtue, because of its very nature any true virtue must be firm and not readily subject to change. However, it is also considered as a specific virtue with the specific function of giving the soul firmness by controlling impulses, on the one hand of fear and on the other of foolhardiness, that might otherwise cause it to deviate from the path of virtue. Fortitude has as its subject the "irascible" APPETITE. The virtue strengthens this appetite against the passion of fear and curbs it in its immoderate stirrings of daring or audacity. Opposed to it by way of defect is the vice of cowardice; and by excess, the vice of foolhardiness.

Different conceptions of fortitude, or courage, and the virtues associated with it are to be found in the philosophers of classical antiquity, in the Bible, and in the writings of the Fathers. It is not possible to coordinate these different usages with precision (Gauthier, 487–532). However, it is clear that Christianity has assigned greater value to the passive aspect of courage, its willingness to endure suffering—or if need be, death—in the cause of God's justice, than to the active aspect that is manifest in acts of valor in war and in the performance of other great and noble deeds. In Christian theology the supreme act of the Christian virtue of fortitude is martyrdom (see MARTYRDOM, THEOLOGY OF). This, together with the

"Fortitude," marble sculpture by Nicola Pisano, from the pulpit of the Bapistry of Pisa Cathedral, Italy. (©Dennis Marsico/ CORBIS)

Christian insistence upon gentleness, meekness, clemency, the forgiveness of injury, etc., has served as an excuse for some writers, such as Nietzsche, Marx, Renan, to denounce Christianity because it has made men unmanly and too ready to suffer evil rather than to fight against it. Without doubt there are circumstances in which virtue calls for vigorous and aggressive action, but it is a mistake to think that Christian morality does not take this into account. The virtue of fortitude has two acts: to attack (aggredi) is no less characteristic than to endure (sustinere).

Of these two acts, however, endurance is the more difficult and requires greater depth of manly courage, other things being equal. When an evil threatens, its objective existence generally helps moderate an excessive impulse to attack; but fear and the difficulties involved in endurance must be coped with by sheer virtue. In attacking evil, man has at least some hope that he will overcome it, some hope that he will prove stronger than the threat; but in endurance he submits to an evil that seems stronger than himself. Again, attack is made in the face of a danger that is still in some measure a future thing; but endurance already oppresses the victim. Furthermore, attack is usually of relatively brief duration; but endurance is long and continuous. However, endurance in this context is not to be regarded as mere passive submission to danger and suffering; it involves, more importantly, a strong action of the soul holding steadfastly to the good and refusing to yield to fear or pain.

The cardinal virtue of fortitude is conceived as strengthening the soul against the fear of death or comparable affliction. The virtues that are its potential parts— MAGNANIMITY, MAGNIFICENCE, PATIENCE, and PERSE-VERANCE—make the soul steadfast when confronted by lesser evil.

FORTUNATUS, VENANTIUS HONORIUS CLEMENTIANUS

Poet and bishop of Poitiers; b. near Treviso, Venezia, c. 530; d. c. 609. Fortunatus was reared in Aquileia and educated in Ravenna (c. 552), where he studied rhetoric, grammar, and law. Cured of an eye disease through the intercession of St. MARTIN OF TOURS c. 565, he embarked on a pilgrimage of gratitude, the route of which can be traced by poems he composed at Mainz, Cologne, Trier, Metz, Verdun, Rheims, Soissons, Paris, and finally Tours, where he met Bishop Euphronius before he proceeded to Poitiers.

On a visit to Holy Cross convent in Poitiers, Fortunatus met the former Queen RADEGUNDA, who had taken the veil after fleeing from her husband, King Clotaire I of the Franks. He was persuaded to become the director of Radegunda and her spiritual daughter Agnes, abbess of the monastery, where there were about 200 nuns. His devotion to the nuns manifested itself in the constant exchange of gifts, letters, poems, and culinary delicacies. Fortunatus served for a time as steward for the convent and later, after receiving Holy Orders, as chaplain.

In 568 Radegunda received a relic of the true cross from the Byzantine Emperor JUSTIN II, and Fortunatus composed a series of hymns to commemorate the event. His Vexilla Regis Prodeunt and the Pange Lingua Gloriosi Lauream Certaminis were eventually incorporated into the liturgy of Holy Week. After the deaths of Radegunda and Agnes (c. 587), Venantius took up his travels once more and visited the Merovingian King Sigebert, as well as neighboring prelates, St. Felix of Nantes, St. Leontius of Bordeaux, and particularly St. GREGORY OF TOURS, who encouraged him to publish a collection of his poetry. During his lifetime, Fortunatus edited ten books of poetry; one book was published posthumously.

Elected bishop of Poitiers (c. 599), Fortunatus held that office for about ten years, but his fame rests on his literary achievements. A Christian gentleman of refinement, even of fastidiousness, Fortunatus has been accused of indulgence in flattery and a euphemistic characterization of contemporaries. His personal life was devout, and by the close of the 8th century his tomb was venerated as that of a saint. Although his name is not included in the Roman martyrology, several French and Italian dioceses venerate him as a saint.

He composed prose lives of St. HILARY OF POITIERS, St. Germain of Paris (see GERMAIN, ss.), St. Radegunda, and several local patron saints, as well as hagiographical poems, including a Vita S. Martini in 2,243 hexameters. His poetry embraces elegies, panegyrics, and eulogies on grief, death, virginity, patriotism, and womanhood, as well as toasts, inscriptions, epithalamia, and letters in poetical form to friends or hosts.

Fortunatus was a facile poet; but his true merit rests on allusions to contemporary events, persons, and places, depicting the refinement of Christian life and thought during the coarse and harsh Merovingian era. Although he avoided theological allegory, faults in prosody undermine his stature as a poet, and monotony intrudes in his versification. His literary cult declined appreciably after the 16th century.

FORTUNE

A chance event whose per accidents cause is an agent operating by deliberate intention; more commonly referred to as luck. In his Physics (197a 35–197b 1), AR-ISTOTLE treats CHANCE as a genus, with fortune and the special type of chance that is not traceable to deliberate intention as its species. He also uses the notion of fortune, as something more known to man, to manifest the notion of chance. The latter is, like the operation of NATURE itself, difficult for the human intellect to grasp clearly. Yet one can see in human affairs that, at times, something happens to an intended effect that is beyond the intention or expectation of the agent, as when a person digging a grave finds a buried treasure.

Unlike chance, fortune or luck is called good or bad depending on the event that happens to the agent. Good luck is often identified with happiness, especially by those who think that the goods dispensed by fortune play a significant part in determining man's happiness. Misfortune, on the other hand, is usually associated with any unintended harm that comes to the agent.

Various notions of good and evil result in correspondingly different notions of fortune and misfortune. By reason of their identification of the good with the objects of desire, the Roman Stoics associated fortune with moral virtue. Since sorrow comes from a present evil, in their view the wise or virtuous man is careful to forestall any evil or misfortune; failing that, he reconciles his desires to what he cannot prevent. Good fortune is important to the extent that it is helpful in the "art of living." (See STOICISM.)

Niccolò MACHIAVELLI, comparing fortune to a "raging river," advises his prince to yield to its violence when necessary, but to provide for any reoccurrence "when the weather becomes fair," so that the "waters may pass away by canal." In particular undertakings he advises the prince to "direct his actions according to the spirit of the times" in such a way that he may anticipate fortune and be ready to receive it. He concludes that, since fortune changes while men remain the same, men will be successful when they are in agreement with fortune and unsuccessful when they are at odds with it. He further notes that "fortune is a woman" and thus yields more readily to the young and the bold man.

Finally there are those who identify fortune with fate, and the latter, in turn, with the PROVIDENCE OF GOD. Both identifications are associated with one type or other of absolute determinism in the universe.

FORTY HOURS DEVOTION

A continuous period of public prayer "before the face of the Lord" recommended by Pope Clement VII in Graves et diuturnae (1592). "Forty Hours" seems to have originated in Milan (ca. 1527), where the devotion (involving Masses, eucharistic exposition, processions, litanies and special prayers) rotated through the city's numerous churches, creating a year-round cycle of prayer and supplication. In 1731, Clement XII republished, in Italian, the instructions for Forty Hours ceremonies to be followed as issued two decades earlier by Clement XI. While this "Clementine Instruction" was of obligation only in Rome, its use elsewhere was encouraged.

Forty Hours remained popular until the late 20th century. By decree of June 21, 1973 the Congregation for Divine Worship issued a revised ritual, "Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass" (HCWE). HCWE does not specifically mention the Forty Hours Devotion. Instead, it simply recommends with the local Ordinary's consent and when suitable numbers of people will be present, in churches where the Eucharist is regularly reserved solemn exposition of the Blessed Sacrament once a year for an extended, even if not strictly continuous period of time. "This kind of exposition," says HCWE 82, "must clearly express the cult of the blessed sacrament in its relationship to the Mass. The plan of the exposition should carefully avoid anything which might somehow obscure the principal desire of Christ in instituting the eucharist, namely, to be with us as food, medicine, and comfort." When continuous exposition is not possible because of too few worshipers, the Blessed Sacrament may be replaced in the tabernacle during the scheduled periods of adoration, but no more often than twice each day (HCWE 88). The Host should be consecrated in the Mass which immediately precedes the exposition and after Communion placed in the monstrance upon the altar. Mass ends with the prayer after Communion, and the concluding rites are omitted. The priest then may locate the Blessed Sacrament on an elevated, but not too lofty or distant throne, and incense it (HCWE 93-94). Prayers, scriptural readings, religious silence, homilies or exhortations, congregational singing, and part of the Liturgy of the Hours should be employed during the exposition (HCWE 95-96). This extended exposition is interrupted for Masses celebrated through that period.

FORTY MARTYRS, SS.

Soldiers martyred near the end of the DIOCLETIAN PERSECUTION; d. March 323. These 40 martyrs probably belonged to the famous Roman Legion XII stationed in Lesser Armenia at Sebaste, the modern Sivas, Turkey. The Eastern Roman Emperor, Licinius, ordered all soldiers to sacrifice to idols. These 40 soldiers refused. While awaiting trial before Agricola, the governor, they composed "The Testament of the Forty Holy Martyrs of Christ," which H. Delehaye considered to be an authentic and accurate historical account of the faith in the 4th century. The governor ordered them exposed naked on a frozen lake. The slow death provided time to persuade them to apostatize. One did. But another soldier declared his Christian faith and took the apostate's place.

Feast: March 10.

FOSCARINI, PAOLO ANTONIO

Philosopher and theologian; b. Montalto Uffugo (Calabria, Italy), c. 1565; d. there, June 10, 1616. He entered the Carmelite Order and distinguished himself as a preacher, mathematician, and professor in philosophy and theology at Messina and Naples. In 1607 he was nominated vicar-provincial and in 1608 elected provincial of Carmelite Province of Calabria. His writings were: Ordinationes et exercitia quotidiana (Cosenza 1611), Institutionum omnis generis doctrinarum tomis VII comprehensarum syntaxis (Cosenza 1613), which can be considered a course in methodology; and Trattato della divinatione naturale cosmologica (Naples 1615), part of an unpublished Institutiones. Foscarini however became famous by his Lettera sopra l'opinione de' Pittagorici, e del Copernico della mobilitá della terra, e stabilitá del sole, e del nuovo Pittagorico sistema del mondo, al reverendiss. P.M.Sebastiano Fantone, Generale dell'Ordine Carmelitano (Naples 1615). In this letter he follows Copernicus's theory as proposed by Galileo, defending it as true and not in contradiction with Holy Scripture. His letter was put on the Index, March 3, 1616.

FOSSANOVA, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian abbey 60 miles south of Rome, Diocese of Terracina, Italy; now occupied by Conventual Franciscans. Pope Innocent II gave the 11th-century Benedictine monastery of St. Stephen to Cistercians from HAUTECOMBE (1135), and Frederick I Barbarossa and Innocent III favored it to make it one of the most important Cistercian foundations in Italy. It is known for drainage (fossa nuova) of the swamps and colonization of south Italy with seven daughterhouses. Its well-preserved Burgundian Gothic church, the first such structure in the south (1208), influenced later Italian architecture. In 1274 Thomas Aquinas died at Fossanova. The commendatory abbatial title was held by cardinals from the Renaissance to 1795, when Pius VI gave Fossanova to Cistercians of Casamari. It was suppressed during Napoleonic rule (1812) and revived by Carthusians (1826).

FOUCAULD, CHARLES EUGÈNE DE

Hermit; b. Strasbourg, France, Sept. 15, 1858; d. Tamanrasset, Algeria, Dec. 1, 1916. Foucauld, who came from a distinguished and devout family, was left an orphan in 1864 and was entrusted to the care of his maternal grandfather, De Morlet, a retired colonel. While pursuing his secondary studies at Strasbourg and Nancy, he lost his faith. So deeply did he plunge into dissipation that he had difficulty in completing his military education at Saint-Cyr (1876) and at the cavalry school in Saumur (1878). He received a commission as a second lieutenant, but he was discharged for disorderly conduct at the garrison of Pont-à-Mousson (1881). He was soon restored to his rank and regiment during a native revolt in the Sahara. In the ensuing eight-month campaign he turned from his dissolute ways and distinguished himself in the field for bravery and leadership qualities. When he returned to France, he could not adjust to garrison life and resigned his commission. Then he returned to the Sahara to engage in exploration. After a year spent in Algiers studying local language and customs he passed two years in the desert disguised as the Jewish servant of a rabbi (1883–84). His topographical, ethnological, social, and military findings were published as Reconnaissance au Maroc, 1883–1884 (1888), which won for him recognition from the Geographical Society of Paris.

So deeply had the desert solitude and the religiousness of the Muslims impressed Foucauld that he became reconciled to the Church of Abbé Henri Huvelin (October 1886). With characteristic intensity he began to live a life of prayer and asceticism. On a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he joined the TRAPPISTS in the Monastery of Notre Dame des Neiges in Nazareth (1890) but soon transferred to a poorer house at Akbès in Syria (1890–96). In search of greater poverty and self-sacrifice he transferred to the Abbey of Staoüeli in Algeria (1896). The superior there sent him to Rome to study theology, but he left the Trappists before ordination and returned to Nazareth to live as a hermit (1897–1900). In 1901 he was ordained at Viviers.

Thereupon he went back to the Sahara and established a hermitage at Beni-Abbès on the Morocco-Algeria frontier. He sought to bring Christianity to the Muslim desert tribes, not by preaching but by good example. By his life of contemplation and charity he aimed to show himself as a man of God and as "the universal brother," and thereby to prepare the way for later missionaries. In his hermitage, which he called "la Fraternité du Sacré-Coeur de Jésus," he kept the Blessed Sacrament always exposed and spent long hours in adoration. In 1905 he penetrated deeper into the Sahara and set up his hermitage in the Ahaggar Mountains near Tamanrasset. Respected by the Tuareg tribesmen, Foucauld was able to learn a great deal concerning their customs and language. He was murdered by a maurading band belonging to the fanatical Senusi sect. Foucauld had no disciples during life, but the publication of his personal papers inspired the founding of the LITTLE BROTHERS OF JESUS (1933) and the LITTLE SISTERS OF JESUS (1936). The first steps toward Foucauld's beatification were taken by the prefect apostolic of Ghardaia in 1927. In 1947 the relevant documents were forwarded to Rome.

FOUNDATIONAL THEOLOGY

The terms "foundational theology" or "fundamental theology" as commonly understood within Roman Catholic theology refer to the introductory tract that treats the nature, possibility, and existence of revelation. In some versions, it also includes an analysis of the nature of Christian faith and a treatment of the nature, method, and sources of theology. Since the divine revelation in Jesus is the basis of the Church, Roman Catholic theology labels the discipline that deals with the existence and content of that revelation foundational or fundamental theology. The term "fundamental theology" is a very literal translation of the Latin theologia fundamentalis and was for a long time the title given to the discipline. The term "foundational theology," however, has been used by many (especially Bernard LONERGAN) to signify a conception of the discipline that interprets the foundations of theology in a way different from that of traditional neo-scholasticism. Whereas the neo-scholastic treatment emphasized the nontheological and the apologetical task of the discipline, Lonergan develops foundational theology as a specific functional specialty within theology. Many have adopted Lonergan's term "foundational" in order to distance themselves from a view of the discipline that in their opinion is too naturalistic in that it uses philosophical and historical arguments without consideration of any Christian or religious preunderstanding. Nevertheless, the terms "foundational" and "fundamental" theology are often used today indiscriminately and often represent merely the choice of a different English term.

From Apologetics to Foundational Theology. The history of Christian apologetics up to the ENLIGHTEN-MENT is one of individual apologies being argued against specific heresies. The Enlightenment's critique of prophecies, miracles, and supernatural revelation struck at the foundations of Christian belief. Johann Sebastian von DREY, one of the initiators of the German TÜBINGEN SCHOOL, argued that a new type of apologetics was necessary. Such an apologetics should go beyond the medieval preambles of faith, namely, those philosophical truths that could be proven independently and prior to faith. It should provide a foundation for Christian faith and theology through a defense of revelation. Drey explicated the program for this discipline within his writing on the organization of theological disciplines in the modern university, with their increased specialization. Theology came to be divided into exegetical, historical, systematic, and practical studies. Catholic theology identified a division of foundational and systematic theology. The goal of foundational theology was to defend the presuppositions of theology, whereas the goal systematic theology was to give an exposition of Christian doctrine.

Modern Preamble of Faith. Henri Bouillard, one of the initiators of a theological movement known as "la nouvelle théologie" (the new theology), sought to retrieve a more integrated vision of the relation between the natural and the supernatural. The movement in reality recovered elements of patristic and scholastic theology that modern neo-scholasticism had neglected. It criticized the extrinsicism of neo-scholasticism and argued for a more intrinsic relation between human nature and divine grace and between the love of God and the knowledge of God.

Bouillard's conception of foundational theology retrieves Thomas Aquinas's notion of the preambles of faith, but give it a new role under the conditions of modernity. Bouillard notes that modern fundamental theology developed precisely when modernity stood under the impact of the Enlightenment and DEISM. Deism criticized the existence of supernatural divine revelation, but not the existence of God. The Enlightenment criticized concrete historical religions that invoked prophecies and miracles as a justification of their belief in a special supernatural revelation. Therefore, neo-scholastic fundamental theology sought to demonstrate the possibility and existence of supernatural revelation, the truth of Christian revelation, and the truth of the Catholic church.

Bouillard recognized that the modern situation deals only with the denial of revelation or the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but also with the denial of the God of philosophers. Not deism, but atheism is the challenge today. The classical approach to the preambles of faith presupposed the rational and philosophical demonstration of the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the principles of morality. Its successor retrieved and also went beyond these demonstrations, taking up their task in the face of modern atheism and the loss of the divine in modern culture. Influenced by Maurice BLONDEL, this approach sought to integrate the natural and philosophical with the religious by appealing to an experience of transcendence that avoided the sharp separation between the philosophical and the religious. The task of foundational theology is then to explicate the interrelation between the philosophical and the religious experience of transcendence in elaborating an approach to the knowledge of God.

Formal and Existential Phenomenology. Karl RAHNER's Foundations of the Christian Faith transforms fundamental theology in a decisive way in terms of its addressee, method, and content. Rahner sees foundational theology not simply an apologetic. Rather, it should deal with the possibility of the "unbelief of the believer." It should itself explicate the philosophical mediation of faith. It should convincingly illumine the meaning of the Christian faith not just to the non-Christian or non-Catholic, but to the believers themselves.

Rahner's conception is labeled a "formalfundamental" theology. This name calls attention to two aspects of his theology. On the one hand, it highlights the phenomenological and existential analysis of the human person as open for God. It explicates the possibility within human knowing and will for human persons to be hearers of God's word and receivers of God's revelation. On the other hand, it emphasizes that foundational theology is more than a formal analysis of human nature and human subjectivity. It uncovers the fact that human beings are immersed in history in their openness to God and oriented toward history in their search for an answer to their quest for the meaning of the mystery of God. This theology explicates that meaning is found in history in the encounter with a history of salvation that culminates in God's definitive revelation in Jesus Christ.

Rahner's treatment of the traditional demonstration of the existence of God illustrates his understanding of foundational theology. He acknowledges the validity of the proofs, but he maintains that they presuppose a preunderstanding or experiential anticipation of the meaning of what they should demonstrate. Rahner stands within the tradition of the "new theology" but nuances it by maintaining that the desire for God is not a desire based upon an abstract human nature. It is a desire embedded in a historical human nature that has received a historical call from God. His term "SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL" expresses this historical characteristic of human nature. (Rahner appropriates the term "existential" from Martin HEIDEGGER, his teacher, who used it to refer to those categories specific to human nature, such as historicity and self-understanding.) Bernhard Welte has developed an analogous approach. Appropriating Heidegger's phenomenological analysis of the historicity of human nature and of the changing nature of language, thought, and metaphysics, Welte elaborates the pre-understanding of Christian salvation within the finite openness in human nature to the infinite.

Theological Aesthetics. Hans Urs von BALTHASAR has argued for the fundamental theological significance of a theological aesthetics that focuses on a dramatic action of God and Christ and the logic of that action for foundational theology. Balthasar contends that much of modern theology has insufficiently attended to the aesthetic dimension. This neglect had dominated certain strands of modern Protestant theology, but also influenced some modern Roman Catholic theological approaches that unfortunately neglect the classic Catholic emphasis on the aesthetic and sacramental. Against a fundamental theological method that focuses upon the human pre-understanding or the a priori condition of revelation within human rationality, Balthasar emphasizes the aesthetic contemplation of the Christian drama of revelation in his development of the fundamental theological implications of aesthetics. He points to an aesthetic model whereby the encounter with the aesthetic object influences, changes, and challenges the subject. Through contemplating the form of Christ manifest in the dramatic action of His suffering, death, and Resurrection, one opens oneself to this form and becomes conformed with Christ.

In developing theological aesthetics that display a Christian Trinitarian logic and drama, Balthasar cautions against the appeal to an anthropological, existential, or transcendental starting point within foundational theology. The danger is that the starting point does not remain simply a starting point or beginning, but can become a standard or measure that limits what is to be grasped. Just as an aesthetic experience transforms the subject, so too should God's action in Jesus transform our subjectivity. In his critique of an anthropocentric starting point as the foundation of theology, Balthasar has sought to pick up and develop Karl Barth's criticism of liberal Protestant theology, but in a way that remains sensitive to a Catholic sacramental understanding of the analogy of being and analogy of faith.

Practical Political Theology. Johann Baptist Metz, a student of Rahner, has developed a foundational theology that seeks to overcome what he perceives as the limitations of Rahner's approach. Metz argues that Rahner has overemphasized personal subjectivity, has failed to take sufficiently into account social and political praxis, and has not confronted the moral and religious implications of the Holocaust. The horrors of Auschwitz speak against a fundamental theological conception that underscores on human autonomy and human transcendence over nature. Such an ANTHROPOCENTRICISM interprets human history in terms of a continuous evolutionary progress. It views this history as culminating in the modern European West with its established freedoms. Such a view overlooks the suffering victims of this history. It expresses instead the viewpoint of the victors. It is Eurocentric rather than polycentric.

In contrast, Metz proposes a foundational theology that is a political theology or, more precisely, a practical hermeneutic of Christianity. Such a foundational theology is indeed defined by the challenge of modernity and the Enlightenment. Metz, however, does not interpret this challenge as a purely theoretical or as a merely philosophical critique of Christianity. It is also, and primarily, a practical challenge and a political critique. The fundamental theological response to this challenge entails a practical hermeneutic and an emphasis on practice as its central point. Christian theology has a practical logos. The belief in God entails the affirmation of specific practice implied within Christian belief. Such a belief entails a conversion and a discipleship. It requires a discipleship of solidarity of hope in the God of Jesus and in Jesus' practice of solidarity with society's outcasts and victims. The God of Jesus is a God of the living and the dead. This God promises resurrection and thereby affirms all to be subjects by affirming their identities and hopes even in the face of suffering, death, and injustice. The Christian community advocates a discipleship and a "dangerous memory" that is in solidarity with those who have unjustly suffered in the past and it proclaims a hope in resurrection that gives justice and meaning to life. The logos of Christian practice is a logos involving memory, solidarity, and hope. Such a logos differs from a more theoretical logos, for it criticizes the progressive understanding of history through its conviction that Christian apocalypticism entails an "interruption" of a human history of domination.

In Germany, Helmut Peukert, a student of Metz, has sought to develop foundational theology by bringing Metz's emphasis upon memory and a discipleship of solidarity with those who have suffered unjustly in confrontation with 20th-century philosophy, especially epistemology and the philosophy of science. Peukert criticizes the more empirical and positivist conceptions of rationality as insufficient because they are unable to deal adequately with suffering, especially the suffering and death of past victims of injustice. Foundational theology develops an understanding of meaning and rationality based upon a hope in the resurrection and in the ultimate vindications of those who have suffered and died.

Diverse Publics and Criteria. David Tracy has proposed that the various branches of theology should be distinguished with reference to their specific social location, public or reference group, characteristic mode of argumentation, and distinctive religious and ethical stance. Each branch of theology seeks to provide both an interpretation of a religious tradition and an explication of the religious dimension of the contemporary situation. Fundamental theology relates primarily but not exclusively to the public represented by the academy, whereas systematic theology relates primarily, though not exhaustively, to the Church. Fundamental theology consequently employs a mode of argument that suitable to the approach and methods of an established academic discipline in interpreting the truth claims of the religious tradition. Moreover, it offers arguments that all reasonable persons should acknowledge as reasonable even if these persons are neither religious believers nor members of a Christian church. In addition, fundamental theology has a distinctive ethical and religious stance. Though the fundamental theologian might be personally a believer, in arguments his personal faith or beliefs may not serve as warrants or backings of truth. His claims of the truth for the Christian faith must be argued on public grounds.

Such a conception of foundational theology relies on the link established within the sociology of knowledge between social location and types of argumentation and modes of commitment. Some critics question whether the awareness of the social conditioning of knowledge throws the notion of public rationality into question. Tracy's more recent work has taken up the significance of the ambiguity of interpretation, the importance of conversation, and the fragmentary character of knowledge for theology and foundational theology.

Critique of Foundationalism. Classical pragmatic philosophers such as Charles Pierce and Wilfrid Sellars as well as neo-pragmatists such as Richard Rorty, Richard Bernstein, and Robert Brandom have criticized various forms of foundationalism. They criticize a subjective foundationalism. based upon introspection of the human consciousness (e.g., R. DESCARTES's method, starting point, and search for clear and distinct ideas). In addition, they criticize the foundationalism of positivism and empiricism (e.g., John LOCKE's evidentialism, which equates true belief and evidential belief). Alongside this pragmatic critique, recent hermeneutical theory has underscored the role of one's pre-understanding as well as the horizon of one's embeddedness within a cultural historical tradition. Moreover, recent theories of deconstructive as well as postmodern analysis have underscored the ambiguity of meaning. All of these tendencies have influenced contemporary formulations of foundational theology.

For some contemporary Protestant theologians this critique of foundationalism has reinforced the traditional Lutheran critique of metaphysics and of natural theology. Hans Frei and George Lindbeck have strongly argued against an apologetic anthropological approach. Lindbeck appeals to Ludwig WITTGENSTEIN's understanding of language and its interrelation with life praxis to advance a cultural-linguistic understanding of theology that stresses a community's narratives and life practices. If Tracy argued that one can defend the notion of Christian claims via "publicly acceptable criteria," Lindbeck underscores the linguistic and communitarian context of adjudication. Ronald Thiemann and William Placher explicitly take up the critique of foundationalism. Thiemann develops a narrative theology and bases Christian theology on revelation in a way that takes into account the pragmatic critique of foundationalism. Placher advocates an unapologetic theology.

Roman Catholic theologians, on the other hand, have incorporated the critique of foundationalism within foundational theology itself. Fiorenza argues that the critique of foundationalism does not entail the absence of any foundations. Instead, it requires a multiplicity of foundations and the awareness that every foundation is located within a web of interpretation and within a community of discourse. This procedure involves a broad reflective equilibrium (a term widely used within current political and moral philosophy influenced by John Rawls) whereby foundational theology brings together diverse grounds and reasons. Just as diverse cords are interwoven to form a strong rope, so too are diverse sources brought together to form the warrants for Christian belief. Thus foundational theology brings into reflective balance diverse tasks: the hermeneutical task of interpreting what is paradigmatic and normative within the tradition, the critical task of analyzing the warrants stemming from practice, and the philosophical task of explicating the appropriate background theories (philosophical, ethical, and anthropological). All of these tasks are interrelated and dependent on each other. The result shows the importance of diverse foundations, each influencing each other in the interpretation and warrant for Christian faith. Such a method takes up traditional topics within foundational theology, such as the foundation of the Church and the Resurrection of Jesus. These involve not only historical and existential arguments, but also a hermeneutical. interpretation that attends to the Church's reception of Jesus, evident in the diverse literary forms of its interpretation and in the living out of this reception in practice. The testimony and practice of the Christian community should be explicated in a way that acknowledges diverse foundations and varied warrants for the Christian faith.

Diverse Currents and Directions. These diverse currents within foundational theology show the vitality and the richness of the field. Not only are there basic agreements about the nature of fundamental theology, but there are also important disagreements. There is basic agreement on the importance and necessity of foundational theology within Roman Catholic theology, the need to deal with the challenges of the modernity and the Enlightenment, and the integration of foundational theology within theology in general. The disagreements include the degree to which a metaphysical defense and a transcendental philosophical approach is essential to the fundamental theological approach and whether foundational theology should be much more hermeneutical and praxis oriented. Whereas all take seriously the challenge of the modem Enlightenment, not everyone interprets this challenge in the same way and not everyone shares the same assessment of modernity. Some appeal to public reasons or public rationality as the avenue through which an apologetic should approach. Others view such a public rationality as a fiction of the modem Enlightenment. Consequently, the latter argue that foundational theology should take much more seriously the radical pluralism of philosophical worldviews and the increasing reality of religious diversity at a time when even local communities are becoming more multicultural and multireligious.

The emergence of the critique of modernity as Eurocentric and as dominated by a one-dimensional technological rationality has gained force with postmodern and postcolonial philosophical currents. This critique suggests that foundational theology needs to examine the extent to which its own methods and arguments have the limitations and presuppositions of the very positions it is contesting. In addition, the postmodern critique of traditional metaphysics as it emerges in Emmanuel Levinas's emphasis upon our vulnerability before the other highlights an ethic of responsibility for the other that is intrinsically linked with an ethic of belief. Christian foundational theology has always underscored the role of testimony for a knowledge of history and the importance of personal testimony and love for knowledge. The current task of foundational theology is to show further how the Christian community's testimony to Jesus and its solidarity with the other is central to the theoretical tasks of foundational theology.

FOUNDATIONALISM

Foundationalism seeks to discover whether there exist ultimate bases and foundations of human knowledge, and if so, to discover what these are. Though the term is newly minted, it designates an ancient and honorable concern among nearly all of the major philosophers of the Western tradition. The earliest example is Aristotle's compelling logical argument in the Posterior Analytics that, insofar as knowledge is based on evidence, and that evidence in turn is articulated in premises, and those premises rest on still other premises—eventually we will need to reach premises that are not just "prior and better known" than the conclusions drawn from them, but that are themselves not dependent upon any prior knowledge, being instead those that are self-evident or evident simply in terms of themselves alone.

Problematic status. Despite the tradition of persistent and perennial search for foundations that has seemingly characterized all previous philosophy, the inventors of the new term "foundationalism" want the designation to be taken as a form of criticism and even opprobrium. What could be worse, they ask in effect, than that spectacle of futility and irrelevance that has been exhibited by Western philosophers in their obsessive preoccupation with the foundations of human knowledge. Instead, philosophers should open themselves to the dawning of that new day, ushered in by the likes of Richard Rorty and his associates among the so-called Post-Analysts, in which we shall no longer worry over the question of whether our knowledge be with or without adequate foundations.

It must not be thought, however, that this apparent bland dismissal of concern with the foundations of knowledge is philosophically frivolous. Richard Bernstein, for example, has made the very telling point that even on its face any such enterprise as that of trying to discover the absolute foundations of any and all human knowledge is bound to be a futile attempt to find some fancied Archimedean point, from which all knowledge might be levered and suspended. Still more to the point have been the sorts of arguments developed by Alvin Plantinga and Nicholas Wolterstorff. Oversimplifying their arguments somewhat, what they are apparently concerned to point out is that any ultimate or absolute foundational truths upon which all the rest of our human knowledge would need to be based presumably would have to be either of two kinds. Either they would have to be truths of a purely formal kind, such as we are familiar with from logic and mathematics, and which do indeed seem to require no other evidence of their truth than just those very truths themselves. Or, as an alternative, they might be truths of simple observation or perception. For what other evidence can one have of such simple truths as "I am wearing shoes," or "There is a tree outside my window," other than that I just do perceive these things to be the case?

Accordingly, having established this much, Plantinga and Wolterstorff immediately proceed to give the coup de grace to any remaining and still struggling Foundationalists. For so far from the purely formal truths of logic and language being able to provide us with a foundational knowledge upon which we might be able to base our remaining knowledge of the world, it turns out that any and all purely formal truths, being no more than mere logical or linguistic truths, are in principle totally incapable of providing us with the slightest knowledge of the world or the way things are. Hence they are quite irrelevant for purposes of any foundationalism. And no less embarrassing is the case regarding ordinary observational or perceptual truths. Not only are such truths unable to provide us with unshakable foundations for our human knowledge, but it would appear, particularly from recent researches in the logic of science, that any and all perceptions and supposed data of observation are entirely relative to the conceptual schemes or frameworks in terms of which our perceptions and observations take place. Hence we have only to change our operative frameworks, and what we perceive will no longer be the same at all. And with that, the hope that experience and observation might provide us with an ultimate foundation for our knowledge of the world and of reality simply goes out the window.

What, then, is the consequence of such a demise and destruction of any and all forms of foundationalism, so far as human knowledge is concerned? Presumably, the answer that the Post-Analysts would give is that henceforth it shall be pragmatism, and not realism, that must be the order of the day, so far as human knowledge is concerned. Catholic thinkers have surely been on the defensive with regards to this sort of epistemological nihilism. T. Russman's Prospectus for the Triumph of Realism, however, is a skillful rehabilitation of foundationalism along Aristotelian and Thomistic lines.

FOUNTAINS ABBEY

Former Cistercian abbey, near Ripon, Yorkshire, England. Although the south and midland regions of England had been "monasticized" by the BENEDICTINES in the 10th century, the north of England was largely neglected until after the Norman Conquest, the great pioneer abbey in the area being the Cistercian Abbey of RIEVAULX. The most distinguished of the earlier monastic foundations of the area was probably the house of Black Monks at St. Mary's, York. Prior Richard and some of the monks there soon felt the pull of the Cistercian way of life as they saw it exemplified at Rievaulx and began to agitate for reform. Archbishop THURSTAN OF YORK heard of their plans and came to visit St. Mary's, but the abbot refused him admission. A scene of violence followed. Thurstan excommunicated the monks and withdrew, together with Prior Richard and the reform party of 12 monks. They spent Christmas Day with Thurstan, who on Dec. 26, 1132, led them to a site three miles from Ripon where the new community of Fountains Abbey was established. Richard was elected first abbot. The monks decided to follow the rule of the CISTERCIANS, and BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX sent them one of his monks, Geoffrey, to teach them the Cistercian way of life. But after two years of extreme poverty and privation the monks felt they could carry on no longer and petitioned Bernard to receive them into CLAIRVAUX (1134). Bernard reluctantly agreed, but then the dean of York, Hugh, who had been a friend to the new abbey from its foundation, decided to give up his rich benefices and enter Fountains as a simple monk. He gave the abbey his great fortune and his fine library: from this time onward Fountains prospered. A foundation charter was drawn up. The abbey reached its greatest influence under the third abbot, HENRY MURDAC. In 1143 the See of York fell vacant, and King Stephen proposed to fill it with a royal clerk, his nephew WILLIAM FITZHERBERT. Murdac and the monks of Fountains led a successful resistance to this apparently scandalous appointment. Bernard and the Cistercian Pope EUGENE III were solicited, and Stephen had to accept Murdac as archbishop in his nephew's place. Unfortunately Murdac proved to be ineffective as archbishop, and after his death William was restored.

By the time of Bernard's death (1153), Fountains was the mother of seven daughter foundations, but the abbey quickly passed from austerity to laxity by way of the successful pursuit of power. The abbey church was completed in splendid style by 1245. Extravagance and mismanagement reduced the monks to poverty in the next generation. The Scots Wars hindered their recovery; in 1319 Edward II exempted them from royal taxation. Their later history was one of litigation over property. When the abbey was dissolved by Henry VIII in 1539, it was worth about £1,000 per annum and housed an abbot, a prior, and 30 monks.

FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS

D. c. 304, at the beginning of the DIOCLETIAN PERSE-CUTION. Roman tradition lists them as four brothers, Severus, Severian, Carpophorus, and Victorinus, who held offices of trust in Rome; they were sentenced to death by public beating, and were buried as martyrs three miles from Rome on the Lavican Way. But they are confused with the five Pannonian stonemasons, Nicostratus, Claudius, Symphorian, Castorius, and Simplicius, who, having refused to sacrifice to the gods under Diocletian, were enclosed in leaden boxes and drowned. Modern hagiographers have not been able to distinguish the two groups.

By Pope GREGORY I THE GREAT's time the church built over the relics of these martyrs was considered "an old church." Pope LEO IV repaired the church in 847. After a fire destroyed the church, Pope PASCHAL II had the church rebuilt and discovered two urns of relics under the altar.

FOUR MASTERS, ANNALS OF THE

A title (Annales quattuor magistrorum) first used by John COLGAN in the preface to his Acta Sanctorum Hiberniae (Louvain 1645). The Annals are a historical compilation of the Kingdom of Ireland made at the Franciscan friary in Donegal (1632-36) and cover events from "forty days before the Flood" to the year 1616. The Four Masters were headed by Michael O'CLERY (Ó Clérigh), known as Tadhg an tSleibe before he became a friar in Louvain. He was sent by the Franciscans to Ireland to collect materials for their great enterprise of publishing the antiquities and hagiographical texts of early Ireland. His had been a learned family that had compiled the evidence of native Irish learning for more than three centuries. He gathered about him Peregrine O'Duignan (Cúcoigcríche Ó Duibhgennáin) of Leitrim, Farfassa O'Mulconny (Fearfassa Ó Maolconaire) of Roscommon, and a relative, Peregrine O'Clery (Cúcoigcríche Ó Clérigh). These were the principal workers on the project, but P. Walsh has shown that others, Muiris, son of Torna Ó Maolconaire, and Conaire Ó Clérigh, also had worked on the project for a short time.

The importance of the Annals lies in the fact that they present a synthesis of materials still in existence, enabling historians to establish the general reliability of the Four Masters. This allows greater assurance of truth for such periods for which the Annals are the only documents, and for which the originals have long since disappeared. The material was prepared directly for the printer, even to the title, preface, and necessary approbation, but none of the Four Masters ever saw the work in print. Michael O'Clery had planned the project and Fergal Ó Gara was the patron who paid the collaborators, while the community furnished them with food and lodging. Many of the manuscripts were obtained on loan and often a money deposit was required until a book should be returned. It remained for John O'Donovan to edit the Annals with an English translation, copious notes, and indexes.

FOURIER, PETER, ST.

Cofounder of a religious order, pioneer in the establishment of elementary schools; b. Mirecourt, Lorraine, Nov. 30, 1565; d. Gray, Franche-Comté, Dec. 9, 1640.

Peter Fourier was educated at the Jesuit University at Pont-à-Mousson, entered the Order of Canons Regular of St. Augustine in 1585 at the Abbey of Chamounsey, was ordained in 1589, and received his doctorate in patristic theology in 1595, graduating with highest honors. When offered a choice of three parishes, he selected Mattaincourt, a morally lax parish and known as "Little Geneva" because of Calvinistic influences.

By personal mortification, austerity, and a deep prayer life, Fourier restored religious fervor to his parishioners, to many lax clergy, and to many Protestants who were converted to the Catholic faith. As pastor he organized the Guild of St. Sebastian for men, the Rosary Society for women, and the Immaculate Conception Society (now the Sodality of Mary) for young girls. He established a charitable fund to assist destitute parishioners, and inaugurated a court of justice to help unfortunate victims of malice.

Fourier was aware that the success of Calvinism and the lack of religious zeal among the uneducated villagers stemmed from ignorance of the truths of faith. His original intention of establishing a religious community of schoolmasters for the education of village boys met with disapproval from Rome. However, with the cooperation of Alix LE CLERC, a young girl of solid religious principles, he began in 1597 the foundation of a religious community of women who were to devote themselves to the teaching of religious and secular subjects to poor girls in free elementary schools. It was his belief that the uneducated girl was even more dangerous to society than the uneducated boy because of the important role of women in the upbringing of children. The new community received papal approval in 1616 under the title Canonesses Regular of St. Augustine of the Congregation of Our Lady, and enjoyed rapid growth in France.

Many educators have been inspired by Fourier's insight and his understanding of the educational and psychological needs of children. The use of the group method of instruction as opposed to the tutorial system, of visual instruction, and division of students according to abilities in reading rather than in age groups were ideas he utilized far in advance of his time.

In 1621, by order of the bishop of Toul, Fourier undertook the reform of the houses of the Canons Regular in Lorraine. His mission was not enthusiastically received, but by 1629 the original observance was reestablished and the Canons Regular of Lorraine had formed the Congregation of Our Savior. Fourier was elected their superior general in 1632.

Peter Fourier was beatified in 1730 and canonized in 1897 by LEO XIII.

FOURNET, ANDRÉ HUBERT, ST.

Cofounder of the Daughters of the Holy Cross of ST. ANDREW; b. Maillé, near Poitiers, France, Dec. 6, 1752; d. La Puye, near Poitiers, May 13, 1834. Born of well-todo and pious parents, Fournet reacted to the heavy religious atmosphere of his home with a certain irreverence and frivolity. While studying law and philosophy at Poitiers, he enlisted in military service and had to be brought out by his parents' influence. He was sobered by the counsel and example of his uncle, Jean Fournet, a dedicated and holy priest of the poor parish of Hains. He studied for the priesthood and was ordained (1776). After a brief curacy with his uncle he became vicar of the small church of St. Phèle (1779) and parish priest of St. Pierre (1781) in Maillé. Fournet was respected for his conviviality and his generosity to the poor, but his own parish house was run with austerity. He refused to take the oath required by the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY but ceded the church (September 1791). He continued to minister, saying Mass in homes, fields, and barns. His bishop, however, compelled him to flee to Spain in 1792. Fournet returned secretly to Maillé in 1797 and said Mass in a barn. He was continually hunted by the republican police and had some narrow escapes-once even posing as a dead man. After Napoleon became first consul, Fournet began to minister openly, but the unsettled religious conditions led to his assuming a much wider pastoral responsibility than before the French Revolution. Some churches around Maillé were suppressed; some priests apostatized, and others joined the PETITE ÈGLISE. In 1797 Fournet had become acquainted with St. Jeanne Élisabeth BICHIER DES AGES. He suggested that she establish a religious community to provide care for the sick and to educate the poor. He wrote the rule for the Daughters of the Holy Cross of St. Andrew. In 1820 he retired as parish priest of Maillé and moved to La Paye to direct the growth of the community. He was beatified on May 16, 1926, and canonized on June 4, 1933.

FOURNIER, ST. JOHN, MOTHER

Foundress of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Philadelphia; b. Arbois, France, Nov. 13, 1814; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 15, 1875. Her parents, Claude and Jeanne Marie (Ramboz) Fournier, christened her Julie. She entered (1828) the Order of the Immaculate Conception, making her vows in 1832. Attracted by the foreign missions, she transferred to the Sisters of St. Joseph of Lyons, who were planning an American foundation in St. Louis, Mo. She received the habit June 16, 1836, as Sister St. John, and after preparation for teaching the deaf, she went to teach in St. Louis. She remained there until 1847, when Bp. Francis P. Kenrick requested that she and three other sisters be assigned to St. John's Orphanage in Philadelphia. In 1848, Mother St. John opened St. Patrick's parochial school, Pottsville, Pa., and supported it by funds from an adjoining academy. The following year she agreed to Kenrick's request to staff St. Joseph's, Philadelphia's first Catholic hospital, which the sisters were forced to relinquish ten years later for lack of funds. In 1858, under Kenrick's successor, Bp. John Neumann, she established a permanent motherhouse, Mt. St. Joseph, at Chestnut Hill, Pa., later adding a wing (1860), a chapel (1866), and an academy building (1873). During the Civil War she sent 14 sisters to nurse in field and "floating" hospitals. Having established two orphanages and 38 parochial and private schools during her service in Philadelphia, Mother St. John, on the advice of Bp. J. F. Wood, remained independent of the St. Louis generalate set up in 1860. Papal approbation for the rule was obtained by the Philadelphia community in 1896.

FOURSQUARE GOSPEL, INTERNATIONAL CHURCH OF THE

This church, an evangelistic, Pentecostal church, was founded (1921) by Aimee (Kennedy) Semple MC-PHERSON at Los Angeles, Calif. In its essential theological orientation, the Foursquare Gospel Association is a pentecostal church, but it developed as the personal following of a single dynamic revival preacher, rather than growing out of any preexisting pentecostal fellowship. Mrs. McPherson was ordained (1921) as pastor of the First Baptist Church in San Jose, Calif., but her movement was only very loosely associated with the Baptist Church and became an independent denomination soon afterward, although she herself always claimed membership in the Baptist Church. With a natural flair for showmanship and public relations, she soon attracted a large following. In 1921 she formed the Echo Park Evangelistic Association, and two years later she dedicated the Angelus Temple in Los Angeles, the center of her Foursquare Gospel Church. The Lighthouse of International Foursquare Evangelism (L.I.F.E.) Bible School was established in 1923, and evangelists trained there became the missionaries and pastors of Foursquare Gospel churches throughout the U.S.

As an evangelist, Mrs. McPherson preached Protestant fundamentalism and placed particular stress on baptism by the Spirit that cleanses from inner sin and declares itself by the charismatic signs of faith healing and speaking with tongues. In this respect, she belonged to the pentecostal tradition. Faith healing became an important element in her revival services and in the church she organized. She also drew on the premillenarian tradition to emphasize the imminent Second Coming in her sermons. The new denomination survived a series of scandals involving her disappearance (1926) and charges of misappropriated funds and acrimonious quarrels between Mrs. McPherson and her mother over control of the Angelus Temple (1927-31). Aimee McPherson continued to dominate the Foursquare Gospel Church until her death in 1944.

The International Church of the Foursquare Gospel confesses the unity and Trinity of God and the Incarnation and Redemption of Christ. It holds the verbal inspiration and sufficiency of the Scriptures, the ability of all humans to repent and accept Christ as their personal Lord and Savior, and the second blessing of sanctification by the Holy Spirit; and it looks to the Second Coming of Christ. Indeed, the term "foursquare" in its name refers to the four foundational tenets of Pentecostalism: (1) salvation, (2) baptism by the Spirit, (3) divine physical healing, and (4) the Second Coming of Christ. Baptism and the Lord's Supper are accepted as divine ordinances. In its government, a central board oversees the entire denomination, appointing field supervisors to direct local churches, which are, in their turn, governed by a council elected from the congregation. A central ordination and missionary board passes on the qualifications of candidates for the ministry and the foreign missions. Services are primarily evangelistic and make provision for the healing of the sick. A number of foreign missions and various kinds of charitable work are supported.

FOURTEEN HOLY HELPERS

A group of 14 saints traditionally venerated together, especially in Germany (feast, August 8). They are three bishops, DENIS OF PARIS (feast, October 9; invoked against headache and rabies), Erasmus, called ELMO (June 2; invoked against colic and cramp), and BLAISE (February 3; invoked against throat troubles); three virgins, BARBARA (December 4; invoked against lightning, fire, explosion, and sudden and unprepared death), MAR-GARET (July 20; invoked against possession and by pregnant women), and CATHERINE OF ALEXANDRIA (November 25; invoked by philosophers, students, wheelers, etc.); three knightly patrons, GEORGE (April 23; protector of soldiers), Achatius (June 22), and Eustace (September 20; invoked by hunters); the physician Pantaleon (July 27; invoked against tuberculosis); the monk GILES (September 1; invoked against epilepsy, insanity, and sterility); the deacon Cyriac (August 8; invoked against demoniac possession); the martyr Vitus (June 15; invoked against epilepsy and "Vitus dance"); and the giant CHRISTOPHER (July 25; invoked by travelers in difficulties). Latin terms for these helper saints were manifold: auxiliatores, auxiliantes, intercessores, adiutores, coadiutores, adiuvantes or simply quatuordecim sancti. Calling a saint a Nothelfer, a "Helper in Need," was current German usage from the late 12th century. Judging from earlier medieval art it would seem that Leonard of Noblat originally had the place of Cyriac. In fact, in southern Germany, including Nuremberg, it is Leonard, not Cyriac, who appears most often until c. 1520. Down to the 16th century certain localities made special substitutions; thus SS. Nicholas, Sixtus, Wolfgang, Sebastian, or Oswald might be counted a Helper. The Diocese of Augsburg, probably under the influence of the monastery of Sankt MAGNUS OF FÜSSEN, added a 15th name, St. Magnus.

The cult was advanced first by the Dominicans, later by the Cistercians and the Benedictines. The nobility, the urban aristocracy, and the bourgeoisie were equally favorable to the cult, and powerful religious movements and the plague years of the 14th century may have been responsible for its promotion. Its attraction lay in the power of the group as a whole, although individual saints were later assigned a special patronage; churches and altars dedicated to one of the 14 included the remainder of the group as subsidiaries.

The earliest pictorial witness of the cult is a fresco in the Dominican church of St. Blaise in Regensburg (c. 1320). In Nuremberg the cult developed and spread extensively in the 14th and 15th centuries; it was especially fostered there by the Dominican sisters of St. Catherine's. Having been diffused throughout southern Germany and the German-speaking Alps, the cult was carried into central Germany from Bamberg. Elsewhere only sporadic traces of it can be found. Veneration reached its high point in the mid-15th century with the Vierzehnheiligen pilgrimage on the Upper Main River in the Diocese of Bamberg. The feast of the Holy Helpers was given its own Office and Mass, probably the result of the pilgrimage. Soon confraternities began to develop. The origins of Vierzehnheiligen are outlined in a work printed in 1519; it reports that the son of a shepherd of the Cistercian monastery of Langheim, while watching sheep in a district originally called Frankenthal, had a vision c. 1445 of a group of 14 children with the Child Jesus in their midst; the Child told the shepherd that these were the 14 Holy Helpers, who from this spot wished henceforth to dispense their favors. (Thirty-three years prior to this book appearance, a Holy Helper altar in Langenberg, near Gera, Thuringia, had already pictorially portrayed the miracle.) Immediately a chapel was built on the site of the alleged apparition, and its altar was dedicated in 1448. Destroyed in 1525 during the PEASANTS' War, the shrine was rebuilt on a larger scale and dedicated in 1543. The cornerstone of the present basilica was laid in 1743 and the new baroque edifice, one of the most important of 18th-century German churches (by Balthasar Neumann), was dedicated in 1772. Pilgrimage processions, organized by parishes and confraternities, are still frequent and Vierzehnheiligen remains one of the most important pilgrim shrines of the Dioceses of Bamberg and Würzburg.

The earliest iconography of the Fourteen Holy Helpers displays them in a single row, headed by St. Christopher. Often they are grouped around the figures of the Madonna and Child or around the figure of St. Christopher carrying the Holy Child in his arms. Not infrequently they are grouped around the Man of Sorrows. Baroque art preferred to use a Root of Jesse motif, with the saints among the branches. At the Vierzehnheiligen shrine and in numerous wayside shrines that stand along Franconia's pilgrimage routes to Vierzehnheiligen, the Holy Helpers are depicted in a circle surrounding the Child; often it is a circle of 14 children as in the original apparition. Artistic monuments to the Helpers include late Gothic paintings, such as those by Hans Burgkmair, Lucas Cranach, and Matthias GRÜNEWALD.

July 1624; d. London, Jan. 13, 1691. He was one of five or six children brought up in a household of piety. His father, a weaver, and his mother shared deep religious convictions. Fox was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and later was often referred to as a cobbler. In 1643, he began almost four years of restless wandering in search of enlightenment, until he was convinced that immediate revelation of truth comes from God to the individual in an experience of illumination. To Quakers, this is known as the Inner Light, Inward Light, or Light Within. Fox wrote in his Journal, "These things I did not see by the help of man, nor by the letter, though they are written in the letter, but I saw them in the light of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by His immediate Spirit and powers, as did the holy men of God, by whom the Holy Scriptures were written." He started a preaching ministry in 1647, but the beginning of his movement is usually dated 1652, the year of his vision on Pendle Hill. In this year Fox made his home at Swarthmore Hall, near Ulverstone, the house of Judge

Thomas Fell, vice-chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In 1669, he married Margaret Fell, who had been a widow for eight years. Fox's compelling zeal attracted followers among the Friends of the Truth and the Seekers. After 1652, with Swarthmore Hall as the center, the Quaker movement grew in spite of persecution and the frequent imprisonment of Fox and his followers. The "Valiant Sixty" (actually 66), as they were called, traveled widely as missionaries of Quakerism. Fox himself made missionary journeys to Ireland (1669), the West Indies and North America (1671-72), and Holland (1677 and 1684). Among his disciples were James Nayler, Robert BARCLAY, and William PENN. Fox had great organizational ability, which enabled him to devise individualistic outlets in a larger complex for unity: the Particular Meeting, a local group, joins with other Particular Meetings in a Monthly Meeting, which in turn joins other similar Meetings in a Quarterly Meeting; these in turn form the Yearly Meeting. Fox left no theological treatises. His Journal was published posthumously in 1694, and edited by N. Penney in 1911.

FOXE, RICHARD

Bishop of Winchester, England, Lord Privy Seal to Henry VII and Henry VIII, founder of Corpus Christi College, Oxford; b. Ropesley, near Grantham, Lincolnshire, 1447 or 1448; d. probably at the castle of Wolvesey in Winchester, Oct. 5, 1528. Most probably, he studied for a time at Magdalen College, Oxford, but he took the degree Doctor of Canon Law from the University of Paris. There he was ordained and became secretary to Henry, Earl of Richmond later Henry VII. Foxe was present at Bosworth Field in 1485 and soon afterward was appointed principal secretary of state and keeper of the privy seal. For the next 30 years he occupied a high place in the councils of the realm and was constantly employed in diplomatic and other secular business. During this period he went from one bishopric to another, but for the most part, until he withdrew from public affairs, he administered his ecclesiastical responsibilities by deputy. He became bishop of Exeter (1487); of Bath and Wells (1492); of Durham (1494), where he was probably resident for a time; and of Winchester (1501). With the rise of Thomas WOLSEY he withdrew from public life to concentrate on the care of his diocese and the advancement of learning. He resigned the privy seal in 1516. His most lasting work was the foundation of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the first statutes of which are dated 1517. He was blind for some years before his death.

FOXE'S BOOK OF MARTYRS

John Foxe (1516–87) entitled his work Actes and Monuments of these latter and perillous dayes, touching matters of the Church, wherein ar comprehended and described the great persecutions & horrible troubles, that have bene wrought and practised by the Romishe Prelates, speciallye in this Realme of England and Scotlande, from the yeare of our Lorde a thousande, unto the tyme nowe present. Gathered and collected according to the true copies & wrytinges certificatorie as wel of the parties them selves that suffered, as also out of the Bishops Registers, which wer the doers thereof, by John Foxe. The title gives the scope, the viewpoint, and the methodology of the work. The preface of the first English edition (1563) contained among other matters a dedication to Queen Elizabeth I and an address "To the Persecutors of Gods truth, commonly called Papists." Another address contrasts it with the Golden Legend; however, it is broadly within that tradition. It is a martyrology and a church history. The 1570 edition had the title . . . the Ecclesiasticall history contaynyng the Actes and Monumentes of thynges passed in every kynges tyme in this Realme Seven subsequent editions followed, bearing the title Book of Martyrs (1576, 1583, 1596, 1610, 1632, 1641, 1684). In 1837 the modern eight-volume edition was launched by S. R. Cattley and revised in 1870 by Josiah Pratt.

The work was severely attacked by S. R. Maitland as dishonest and inaccurate. Mozley has done much to rehabilitate its reputation. Haller has placed Foxe fully into the context of his time and demonstrated the meaning of the work as a polemic against Roman Catholicism and an apologetic for the Elizabethan church. Foxe was inaccurate at times, but the charge of dishonesty is unjust. He could be negligent of chronology, discursive, and prejudiced. In citing documents he is usually reliable and the large amount of original source material he quoted directly still gives usefulness to his work, although it must be used with care. Abridgments and revisions of his book were made for partisan purposes or for profit.

Foxe was influenced greatly by the CENTURIATORS of Magdeburg. Originally his work was called Rerum in ecclesia gestarum narratio (1559), but he expanded it greatly in the first English edition. The work ranges from the 1st century to the end of Mary I's reign (1558). The materials from the 14th and 16th centuries are particularly voluminous. Foxe supplied the English reading public with an account of the work of Luther, Zwingli, and other Continental figures; most notable, however, is the narrative of the church in England during the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. E. Gordon Rupp said, "Foxe's Book counted in English history as much as Drake's drum." It was accepted as authoritative by most Englishmen of 2½ centuries; therefore its historical importance as a work of ecclesiastical historiography is preeminent.

FOY, ST.

Virgin martyr under Dacian; b. Agen, France, c. 290; d. there, 303. She is known in the various European languages as Faith, Fe, Fede, Fides, and Getreu. The passio of St. Foy is similar to that of St. AGATHA; also, before being beheaded she was roasted on a griddle, as was St. LAWRENCE. She should not be confused with the daughter of St. Sophia who was martyred at Rome with her sisters Hope and Charity. In the ninth century the body of St. Foy was removed from Agen to Conques, where it was venerated by pilgrims, some of whom were on their way to SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA, and by Crusaders. Until approximately 1050 her reliquary was displayed behind a screen of chains left by former prisoners, who attributed their release to her intercession. In art she appears with a griddle, the martyr's palm, the sword of her martyrdom, and sometimes the dove that reputedly brought her the martyr's crown.

The most famous representation of St. Foy is on a reliquary commissioned in 949 by Bp. Étienne of Clermont, abbot of Conques. The saint is shown as somewhat older than she was at the time of her martyrdom. She is seated on a throne in a hieratic pose. Her blue enameled eyes are the first reported in the history of art. Later the figure was decorated with jewels given by pilgrims. The two small tubes she holds have been identified as flower vases or as parts of her griddle. The reliquary was one of the "Majestés d'or" brought to the Synod of Rodez in 1161. She is represented also on the portal of the Last Judgment in the church of St. Foy, Conques, where she kneels before the abbot's chair and is blessed by the hand of God.

FRANCA, LEONEL

Founder and first rector of the Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro, spiritual leader and writer; b. São Gabriel, Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, Jan. 6, 1893; d. Rio de Janeiro, Sept. 3, 1948. After completing his early studies in Bahia, he attended the Jesuit Colégio Ancheita in Novo Friburgo, Rio de Janeiro, until he entered the Society of Jesus on Nov. 12, 1908. Upon completion of his liberal arts studies in São Paulo (1912), he studied philosophy at the Gregorian University, Rome. Returning to Brazil (1915), he taught for five years at the Colégio S. Inácio, Rio de Janeiro. He went back to Rome (1920) for theology at the Gregorian and was ordained on July 26, 1923. After his tertianship at Oya, Spain (1925), he pronounced his solemn vows on Feb. 2, 1926, at the Colégio Anchieta, which had become the scholasticate; there for two years he taught philosophy and was prefect of discipline. In 1928 Franca returned to the Colégio S. Inácio, where he remained until his death.

From his youth Franca was the victim of a heart ailment and received the Anointing of the Sick five times, but his frail health did not prevent him from exercising an extraordinary influence, particularly on the intellectual levels and among the nation's leaders. He was also a dedicated confessor and especially gifted as a spiritual director. He organized and for years was president of the Association of Catholic Professors in Rio de Janeiro and for a long time was ecclesiastical assistant in various centers of Catholic Action. Cardinals Sebastian Leme and Jaime de Barros Cámara held him in high esteem and entrusted him with important religio-political missions. He also enjoyed great prestige in government circles, and his influence as counselor of ministers and of members of Parliament brought about favorable decisions in various questions of national scope, e.g., legislation on divorce, laws in favor of religious instruction in government controlled schools, and the appointment of chaplains to the armed forces. The President of the Republic, Getúlio Vargas, invited him to run for senator.

Franca was a prolific writer and lecturer. At his death more than 200 lectures on apologetics, education, and sociology were found in his files. He published 14 books, the best known being Nocoes da História da Filosofia (currently in its 18th edition), O Divórcio, A Psicologia da Fé, A Crise do Mundo Moderno (translated into Spanish), A Imitação de Cristo, A Igreja, A Reforma, e a Civilização (translated into Dutch), O Livro dos Salmos, and a study of the RATIO STUDIORUM. He contributed to numerous journals until he devoted his time exclusively to the periodical Verbum, which he founded (1944) as the Catholic University magazine. When the foundation of the university was decided upon in the Brazilian Plenary Council of 1939, Cardinal Leme entrusted the work to the Society of Jesus in the person of Franca. He organized first the Catholic Faculties of Rio de Janeiro with chairs in law, philosophy, sciences, and letters. On Dec. 12, 1940, he was named the first rector. In March 1941 he inaugurated courses for both men and women. In 1942 the government officially recognized the Catholic Faculties. Franca founded (1943) the School of Social Service. In 1946 the federal government granted the institution the official title of university, and in the following year the Holy See raised it to the rank of pontifical university. Finally, in 1948, Franca obtained the government's authorization to install the faculty of engineering. This was the last note in his diary.

FRANCA, SS.

Two saints of the Middle Ages.

Franca, virgin; fl. 11th century. She was a recluse in her home of Fermo, Italy, before seeking religious vows from the local bishop and entering a convent, possibly San Angelo in Pontano. In her later years she once again retired to her hermitage. The chief source of information on her is an almost contemporary passio composed by an anonymous monk [Analecta Bollandiana (1957) 75:288, 294–298].

Franca Visalta of Piacenza, abbess; b. Piacenza, Italy, 1173; d. Plectoli (Pittoli), near Piacenza, April 25, 1218. Her parents were the count of Visalta and his noble wife. Franca was accepted at the BENEDICTINE convent of San Siro in Piacenza at the age of seven and received the regular Benedictine habit at the age of 14. She manifested a great love for prayers, fasting, and other austerities. Her care of the sick and love of the poor, with whom she shared her bread, greatly edified her companions. In c. 1198 she was unanimously elected abbess, and she took great interest in religious discipline and strict observance of the rule. After spending 30 years at San Siro, Franca transferred to the CISTERCIAN convent at Plectoli and became superior of the new foundation. She died at the age of 43 and was buried at Plectoli. In 1559 her body was removed to the church of St. Franca in Piacenza. Her cult was confirmed by Pope GREGORY X in 1273.

FRANCE, ANATOLE

French poet, novelist, critic; b. Paris, April 16, 1844; d. Saint-sur-Loire, Oct. 13, 1924. He was the son of a Parisian bookstore owner and bibliophile, and was educated at the Collège Stanislas. He began his literary career (under a pen name for Jacques Anatole François Thibault) rather inauspiciously in 1873 with the publication of Poèmes dorés, tepid imitations of Parnassian verse. Long an admirer of (Joseph) Ernest RENAN, France imitated him in tempering knowledge with skepticism to combat what he considered the prevailing dogmatism. Like VOLTAIRE, he argued for a kind of pragmatic humanism that barred any basic metaphysical and spiritual considerations and considered reason and justice the only redemptive factors in a universe corrupted by materialism.

His Crainquebille (1902; adapted for the theater, 1905) is a cleverly veiled treatment of the Dreyfus case. Crainquebille, like Dreyfus, appears as the innocent victim of shamefully partisan political justice. Les Dieux ont soif (1912) denounces religious and political fanaticism; France's narrow conception of humanism leads him to confuse dogma, law, and established order with constraint and repression of thought. This attitude was probably what led to all his works being put on the Index in 1922. Reacting to the scientific and positivistic currents prevalent in literature, he wrote and edited four volumes of literary criticism, La Vie littéraire (1888-92). This work, however, is more a compendium of France's own literary preferences and aversions than a balanced analysis of the literature of his time. His reputation rests mainly on the wit and wry humor that salts all his writings, however wrongheaded or superficial they may appear to the modern reader. He was elected to the French Academy and received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1921. It is curious that he should be remembered best for some of his least objectionable stories, such as "Le Jongleur de Notre Dame," and "Pierre Nozière."

FRANCE, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Once known as Gaul, the republic of France is located in Western Europe. It is bounded on the north by the English Channel, Belgium, and Luxemborg; on the east by Germany, Switzerland, and Italy; on the south by Spain and the Mediterranean Sea; and on the west by the Bay of Biscay. This entry presents discussion of the Church in France from 500 to the present; for information on the Church in France prior to the year 500, see GAUL, EARLY CHURCH IN.

The Middle Ages: 500 to 1515

The Merovingian Period. While Christianity is known to have been practiced in the city of Lyons by 120, it was not until the year 500 that the barbarian nations known as Gaul underwent a transition after its people united with the Gallo-Romans and brought new values to Christianity. The chief political institution of this new people—kingship—played a vital role in the religious history of France throughout the Middle Ages and beyond. First of all, there was the conversion of CLOVIS, king of the FRANKS, which precipitated the conversion of all his people. The Gallo-Roman bishops, who had distrusted the heretical ARIANISM of the other barbarian kings, gave full support to this new Frankish dynasty. Several years later, the Burgundians finally abjured Arianism under the influence of AVITUS OF VIENNE while CAESARIUS OF ARLES assured the victory of Catholicism in the regions of the lower Rhône. Thus in the early 6th century, unity of faith in Gaul had been achieved.

Meantime, the king became an anointed ruler. A period of "political Augustinianism" manifested itself in the "ministerial concept of kingship." The king lived surrounded by clerics who formed the nucleus of a "Hof-kapelle" from which the bishops were recruited. As the patron of churches the king summoned councils, eventually transforming the canons of these councils into CAPI-TULARIES, e.g., the council of Orléans (511) and the council of Paris (614). Above all, he exercised a sovereign right over church property, which had, in large part, been originally donated by him.

The end of urban life left the Church in Gaul comprised of rural parishes, and so it remained until the end of the ancien régime. From the 5th century, bishops had to send priests outside the mother church to serve the vici, villae, and castra, parishes that were often founded by nobles. Because such parishes were assured an endowment by their founders, they remained proprietary churches of a powerful laity, and intellectual, spiritual, and moral debasement of the clergy resulted for many years. Yet, this same clergy distinguished itself by the services it rendered in care of the poor (matricula) and the ransom of prisoners. In the Merovingian period the character of the clergy changed. A benefice was now linked to the parish, while the councils imposed discipline upon the peasant priest: CELIBACY, the interdict of banquets, etc. Meanwhile, culture reached its lowest ebb. There were no schools, much less universities. The few writers of the day were mediocre, GREGORY OF TOURS being the most characteristic. As a result, the religion of the people was very coarse. Although the councils made obligatory both Sunday Mass attendance and Easter Communion, these were but external practices of a religion entangled with superstition and ORDEALS. However, PILGRIMAGES, often to legendary saints, preserved a certain spirit of Christianity, the most famous pilgrimage of the era being the one to Tours.

As a result of the spiritual mediocrity under the MER-OVINGIANS more perfect souls aspired to the monastic life. Consequently Irish monasticism flowered in France with St. COLUMBAN's Rule enjoying an extraordinary diffusion. For a long time, and in all regions, the influence of the Scotti was felt. In time, however, the Columban monasteries united themselves to the BENEDICTINE RULE, the most famous of the Benedictine monasteries being Fleury (SAINT-BENOÎT-SUR-LOIRE), which prided itself on housing the relics of St. Benedict himself.

The Carolingian Period. The CAROLINGIAN period was essentially one of Church reform pursued by a dynasty which was, admittedly, as Frankish as the Merovingians, but which was inspired by a coherent blending of the Christian spirit, the Bible, and the Fathers, in particular St. Augustine. This Carolingian reform began with the collaboration of three men: CHARLES MARTEL, whose policy it was to support Christianizing missions in Germany; St. BONIFACE, an Anglo-Saxon monk who interpreted the Benedictine Rule in a missionary sense; and Pope GREGORY II, who gave the enterprise the approval of Rome. This alliance of France and the papacy, which was to become one of the main themes of the country's religious history, was confirmed in 751 when PEPIN III was crowned king of the Franks, and again in 754 when Pope STEPHEN II went to Quiercy to request aid from the king against the LOMBARDS in Italy.

This Franco-papal alliance was first put to the service of reform. The councils of Soissons and Les Estinnes (742) interrupted the secularization of Church property, but obliged the churches to lodge royal hunting parties. CHARLEMAGNE followed up this early reform by bringing order to the Church, imposing the Hadriana Collectio and the Gregorian Sacramentary throughout his empire. But he wanted to be the sole master of the Church and even intervened in such dogmatic matters as ICONO-CLASM and ADOPTIONISM, e.g., the LIBRI CAROLINI. The crowning of Charlemagne as Emperor of the West (800) gave him even more prestige: his empire had a certain mystique which contributed further to the myth of the "Carolingian peace." Charles summoned to the Frankish court writers such as PAUL THE DEACON and THEODULF OF ORLÉANS from all over the Christian West to give luster to a Carolingian renaissance. During his own reign, however, this renaissance became primarily a reform of the education of the clergy.

The content and the spirit of Carolingian culture presented itself as a return to tradition. Ancient texts were accepted and became the norm of thought and life, e.g., the old canonical collections, the Grammar of Priscian; those texts that had been lost were forged, e.g., the FALSE DECRETALS, the DONATION OF CONSTANTINE. The Carolingians tried not only to live the vita apostolica, but to reconstitute the society of the Old Testament; no period was more Biblical, more ready to prefer the commandments of the Church over the demands of interior life. A century without philosophers and without mystics, the Carolingian era was one of moralists, especially Christian moralists who never forgot the requirements of salvation. Thus it was a century marked by great revivals, such as that of 829, and by an obsession with penance closely linked to the PENITENTIALS.

The Gregorian and Bernardian Reforms. The 10th and first half of the 11th centuries were the age of FEUDALISM par excellence, the age in which the Church fell under the power of laymen. Within this anarchy a popular religion took shape, a religion expressed in the earliest medieval drama, the Chansons De Geste; pilgrimages to SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA or to Jerusalem; and Roman pilgrimages. It was a religion of HERMITS, especially in western France.

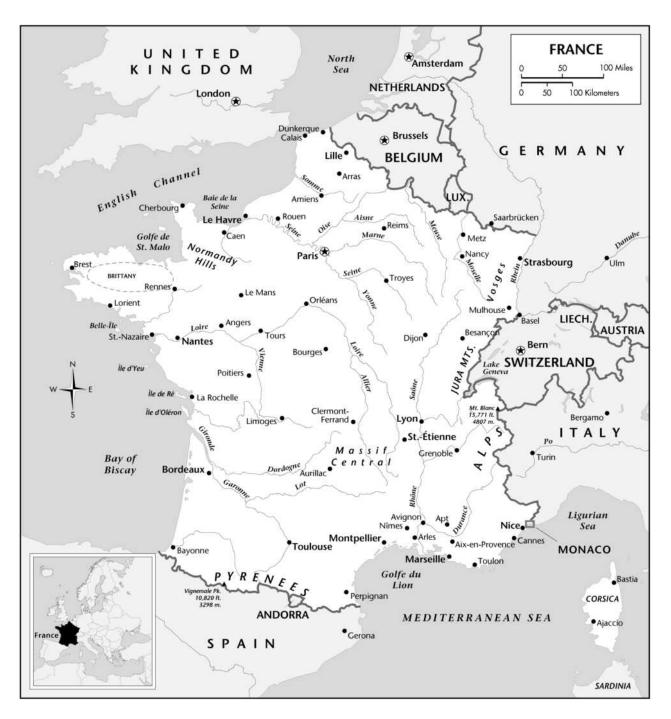

During the second half of the 11th century, reform became the ambition of the Holy See. This GREGORIAN REFORM began in eastern France with Pope LEO IX, originally from Alsace, and with Cardinal HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA, a former monk of MOYENMOUTIER. The reform was extended to all France by special legates, such as HUGH OF DIE. It at first focused on the morals of the clergy, as evidenced by the councils of Vienne and Tours (1059), but it presupposed Rome's initiative, and this entailed a shift in the ecclesiastical structure by which a centralized papacy gained at the expense of the local diocesan. Naturally this did not occur without resistance from the bishops.

During this era, the popes, who were often in serious conflict with the Roman emperor (see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE), found refuge in France. In gratitude they loaded the Capetian Dynasty with privileges such as the title "very Christian king." It was this close relationship with the popes that led to that French devotion to St. Peter which is illustrated on the Miégeville portal at Saint-Sernin of Toulouse. This closeness between the papacy and France led to the election of French popes c. 1100, the first being URBAN II. Then in 1107, at the council of Troyes, Pope PASCHAL II upheld IVO OF CHARTRES's theory of investiture; the French Pope CALLISTUS II extended it to the whole Roman Empire through the Concordat of Worms.

The Gregorian reform was also a spiritual reawakening. Urban II fostered community life under the Rule of St. Augustine for various groups of canons (see CANONS REGULAR) as well as for the cathedral chapters. These canons then played a considerable role in developing hospitals, in parish life in the suburbs of towns, and in the sheltering of pilgrims. In 1095 the same Urban preached and organized the First CRUSADE at the council of Clermont. France responded with two armies, one from the north, one from the Midi. To defend the CRUSADERS' STATES established in the Holy Land, a new congregation, the TEMPLARS, was founded in France and was soon imitated by the KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN. Both orders received numerous donations, making them important economic powers. Reform did not limit itself to the secular Church; the old religious orders also rejuvenated themselves. CLUNY had been restored since the 10th century; in 1098, CÎTEAUX was founded. BERNARD OF CLAIR-VAUX, the most famous Cistercian monk, did not content himself with the life of a contemplative religious, but exercised a prodigious influence on his time: he was the preacher of the Second Crusade, and supervisor of the monarchy's choice of worthy bishops, the champion of the primacy of the pope. Bernard was even able to impose his own candidate, Innocent II, on France during the schism of 1130. While Bernard gave the popular religion of France elements that still predominate today devotion to Mary, to the Passion, etc.—he was also a traditionalist, hostile to all innovation, especially in theology, where he clashed with ABELARD. With Bernard stood the canons of SAINT-VICTOR, who revived theology and mysticism (see VICTORINE SPIRITUALITY).

This same era was characterized further by new institutions: by "communes," that owed much to the ideal of communio from which they drew their name; by the GUILDS that for a long time had remained of pagan inspiration but were gradually becoming confraternities. Rivalry between the nascent towns helped to spur the development of Gothic art and church architecture. The Gallery of Kings was created at Notre-Dame in Paris, and the Virgin became the protectress of the kingdom.

The 13th Century. The second half of the 12th century was an age of decline for the Church. King PHILIP II AUGUSTUS scandalized his contemporaries by his political cynicism. The Gregorian reform slowed down, and henceforth the reformers would be foreigners. In fact, toward 1200, France had become the home of the CATHARI and WALDENSES, the most widespread and virulent heretics of the period. In the face of this danger to the faith, St. DOMINIC devised new forms of the apostolate, such as public debates between heretic and preacher friar. Dominic's society of itinerant and mendicant preachers, organized in Toulouse, was a success, and in 1215 his order was extended to the whole Church. It was in France especially that the Dominicans found their first recruits; the friary of Saint-Jacques in Paris was their most famous house. For a long time proper evangelical action in response to the heretics in Languedoc was impossible, for the cruelties of the northern Crusaders against the ALBI- GENSES (see LOUIS VIII, KING OF FRANCE) had provoked even the hesitant in southern France finally to rally to heresy. The peace treaty of 1229 did found a university in Toulouse to combat heretical error, but at the same time an institution of repression, the INQUISITION, was organized there.

Earlier, the University of Paris had been founded. At the time, there was a veritable popular movement in university circles, which would have been animated by an anticlerical spirit if the MENDICANT ORDERS had not been able to counteract it. Dominicans and Franciscans, in effect, early constituted a university-oriented clergy, their recruits often coming from that school. The University of Paris was the prototype of medieval universities both in its statutes and in its dynamism, for throughout the Middle Ages it had the best teachers and the largest number of students. It also assured the formation of a new type of man, the "intellectual." Likewise, a new culture and a new collective mentality were being formed.

Because the mendicants presented themselves as the militia of the Holy See they clashed with the secular clergy: with the secular teachers of the University of Paris as well as with the secular parish priests to whom the mendicants meant competition because of their preaching.

These conflicts would continue until the end of the Middle Ages, with Rome most often upholding her "militia."

The new institutions in France were fruitful, thanks to LOUIS IX (d. 1270), a king whose religious spirit was exceptional. This remarkably cultivated prince reformed his kingdom and ruled with justice. Reflecting the austerity of his private life, he followed a policy of public economy that favored the little people. He achieved peace with England. His Crusades, which were the first to have a missionary character via contacts with the MONGOLS, earned Louis a reputation that would consolidate his dynasty. At the same time, Gregorian reforms continued; the king appointed excellent bishops; diocesan synods were held regularly and led to the composition of Statuts such as those of Nîmes that were effective throughout the whole area. Books such as the Évangiles des domées (Sunday Gospels) and the Livre des métiers (Guild Book) by Étienne Boileau revealed a vital and socially effective Christianity.

The Close of the Middle Ages. With the death of the son of Louis IX the century of knights ended. A new literature developed for the bourgeoisie: the FABLIAU and the second half of the Roman de la Rose. The king's chancery was no longer the monopoly of the clergy and passed into the hands of the legists. The best representative of the new spirit was Guillaume de Nogaret, for ten years the impetus behind the religious policy of King PHILIP IV and an enthusiastic promoter of reform ideas imbibed from his contemporary spiritual milieu. Nogaret was a master in the art of propaganda and thus able to give the king the support of all three Estates of his kingdom. The struggle he inspired against Pope BONIFACE VIII was as dramatic as it was useless: nothing, in fact, gravely divided the two powers except the theology of "direct power" (see UNAM SANCTAM) and the nationalism of Nogaret. The excommunication of the king forced Nogaret to push the battle as far as the criminal attempt at Anagni. The death of Boniface allowed Philip to influence the entire Church by having his satellite, Bertrand de Got, elected Pope CLEMENT V. Clement saw his office only as a means to exploit the Church. During this pontificate, the Holy See was domesticated by France, which imposed on the pope the suppression of the Templars (see VIENNE, COUNCIL OF), while the Sacred College was weighted with French cardinals.

The transfer of the Holy See from Rome to Avignon was a result of a new policy issued by a college of French cardinals that stated that only French popes could be elected. These popes now established themselves in Provence, and this new papal capital drained the resources of the French Church. Not unnaturally this Avignon papacy favored France. JOHN XXII excommunicated Flanders, while NEPOTISM became commonplace as cardinals pursued personal politics. Prodigiously wealthy due to the accumulation of benefices, cardinals were often protectors of the arts, thus preparing the way for the RENAIS-SANCE. In this manner, there developed an Avignonese civilization closely tied to that of the western basin of the Mediterranean.

What was the responsibility of France for the beginning of the WESTERN SCHISM? Cardinal de la Grange, who represented the French King Charles V in Rome, had followed an equivocal policy during the early months of URBAN VI's troubled reign. The king quickly rallied to antipope CLEMENT VII once he was elected, and exerted pressure on his bishops to do the same. Certain areas of France, however, especially the southwest, which was under English domination, continued to resist Clement (now in Avignon) and to support Urban in Rome. At the same time Charles chased any students and teachers who followed Urban out of Paris and transformed the university into a sort of royal council, making adherence to Clement VII an article of its diplomatic program. Although the alliance between Charles and Clement was very profitable to both parties, it ended at the death of Clement VII. In an attempt to end the schism, Charles VI called a veritable national council which decided to remove France from obedience to the pope at Avignon. An ordinance withdrew this pope's right to name any prelates, substituting the "liberties of the Gallican church" for papal reservations. The French Parlement established doctrine. Thus, the schism favored the development of a national religious conscience, and marked the birth of GALLICANISM. The affirmation of the autonomy of the Gallican Church within the universal Church was contemporary with the Gallicanism of theologians who asserted the superiority of the council over the pope (see CONCILIARISM). This doctrine, which was defended by such sincere theologians as GERSON, became a weapon in the hands of the king, and was given form with the PRAGMATIC SANCTION of Bourges in 1438. Thus the king of France became the absolute master of the Church in France. Henceforth he acted as sole judge of the recruiting of bishops. No council, not even a provincial one, could be held without his sanction. He assured the unity of this Church through the legateship conferred on Cardinal d'Amboise in 1501. About 1500 the king allowed the formation of so-called "mitered" families, administrators, from generation to generation, of the same dioceses, transforming such dioceses into veritable seigneurial estates. The French king eventually determined that his domination would be stronger if it were shared with the pope. Accordingly Francis I signed a new concordat with Pope LEO X in 1516 that remained in effect until 1790 and that later inspired the CONCORDAT OF 1801.

Serious decadence resulted from this royal meddling in ecclesiastical affairs, a decadence stimulated by the multiplied dispensations and privileges that resulted from the Western Schism. By 1500 simony was prevalent in the episcopate, for the bishop was now primarily a lord occupied with the administration of his province, not a resident diocesan. His first concern was with the material wealth of the Church, which, reconstituted in the second half of the 15th century, permitted the full development of flamboyant Gothic art.

Reforms and Pre-Reformation. In 1500 the French king summoned a council at Pisa, thinking to take upon himself the role of champion of Church reform. In reality the Pisa council served only to compromise true reform due to its partisan politics. And what was meant by "reform"? Was it to be reform of the morals of the clergy, of the organization of the Church, or was it to be an awakening of religious sentiment? At the waning of the Middle Ages reform presented itself under each of these diverse facets. Although the secular clergy of the 15th century was generally too dependent on the monarchy to be receptive to reform, nevertheless, several of its number presented coherent programs of reform, notably Gerson, who until the beginning of the 16th century enjoyed an extraordinary audience. Gerson's ideas on education were taken up again at the end of the century by J. Standonck, who represented the Flemish milieu of the DEVOTIO MODERNA in Paris. All the religious orders partially reformed themselves during the 15th century. Each mendicant order gave birth to a reform group of Observants. At

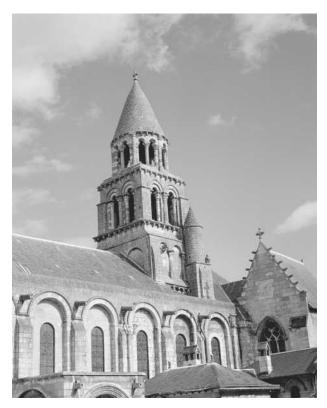

"Tres Riches Heures by Jean," Duke of Berry, Paris, 15th century.

Cluny Jacques d'Amboise attacked COMMENDATION as responsible for much of the moral decadence. An analogous movement took place in convents for women, e.g., at FONTEVRAULT.

Another type of reform occupied certain humanists who, in the light of ancient texts, pursued the discovery of a new art of living, always at the risk of appearing too liberal to the Sorbonne, which remained attached to SCHOLASTICISM and where Noël Béda exerted a veritable despotism. GAGUIN, Fichet, and Budé and especially LE-FÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES and ERASMUS represented the new spirit. Lefévre, molded by the culture of the Florence of Marsilio FICINO and heir to the mystical tradition of the Middle Ages, published and commented on a new edition of St. Paul three years before Luther. Erasmus, who often sojourned in Paris, where he was in touch with the humanistic and reform milieu, published his Nouveau Testament in 1516.

haps by the Black Death. There followed a somber century: the Pietà, the DANCE OF DEATH, Holy Sepulchers, and the ARS MORIENDI all presupposed and supported an acute sense of sin, fear of the Last Judgment, remembrance of the Passion, and trust in Christ the Savior. This same religion excited popular movements such as the flagellants of St. VINCENT FERRER (see FLAGELLA-TION) and the penitents of the Franciscan Brother Richard (c. 1428-31). There was also a whole popular evangelical movement connected with the Bible historiale, the French translation of the "histories" and the "moralities" of the Bible. At the same time, the use of the Books of Hours became widespread, and works of piety such as the golden legends, manuals for confession, and "lucidaires" or laymen's guides, multiplied. Printing increased diffusion. The most important of these works was Internelle Consolacion, a French translation of the IMITA-TION OF CHRIST.

The trials France underwent at the close of the Middle Ages purified and internalized religious sentiment. The Christian of 1500 was characterized first of all by his teatralità: his taste for mystery plays, for dramatized sermons such as those of Olivier Maillard and for exaggeratedly expressionistic iconography. He was characterized by triumphalism, which manifested itself in processions of the Holy Sacrament and coronations of Mary, by his Christian sense of history as seen in the great PASSION PLAYS; he was characterized by his good conscience, his need for reassurance being reflected by his mathematical piety, his interest in indulgences, his passive confidence in the Church and priests and his recourse to the manuals of casuistry. Familiarity with the Bible increased; Christ came to be viewed more and more as the only Savior. Yet, religion remained very external, often limited to the letter of the commandments of the Church and far removed from the idea of salvation through faith. French Lutheranism in one way would benefit from these changes, but in another, would compromise this Catholic reform, which did not have the time to develop fully even its limited promise.

The Rise of the Modern Church: 1515–1789

In 1515 the Church in France was in as disordered a state as it had been a century before at the end of the Western Schism. For guidance in matters of unity and welfare it became accustomed to look for the person of the king, who in turn, through his control of the appointment to benefices, supplied bishops who had slight regard for their religious duties.

The Concordat of Francis I. Francis I (1515–47) agreed to a concordat with the papacy (1516) that, while removing the long-term threat of a French schism, also won him the formal recognition of his right to nominate candidates for the most important benefices. This concordat, which remained in force until the French Revolution, made it unnecessary for French kings to abandon Catholicism in order to gain control of the goods of the Church. This Gallican trend was furthered by the decree of the Council of Sens (1528) that made French bishops responsible for the reform of all religious orders in France, and by the decree of the king (1540) that gave Parlement sole competence in matters of heresy. Sentiment for reform did not come from royal or episcopal circles except in the case of Guillaume BRIÇONNET of Meaux, who gathered around him a circle of Christian humanists. Though this group eventually moved toward Lutheranism, Briçonnet's attempts to have Catholicism preached in his dioceses sets him apart from the other French bishops.

The Huguenots and Civil War. During the reign of Henry II (1547-59) royal action severely limited the inroads of Lutheranism. However, circumstances at the time of Henry's accidental death resulted in an influx of Calvinist ministers into France that reached its peak about 1562. This influx effected political changes and divided the allegiance of the nobility. The signing of the Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559) ended the long series of wars in Italy dating back to 1494 and limited the chance of the lesser nobles to make a career of the army. These men, who had begun to duplicate the extravagant manners of the Italian Renaissance, were finding their fixed income from the rent of peasants insufficient, especially in an era of inflation resulting from the influx of gold from the New World. In 1560 royal pensions were sharply reduced, thereby forcing them to become "clients" of the greater nobility. The seizure of Church lands seemed a way out of a dilemma. The three great noble families-the GUISEs, the Montmorencies, and the Bourbons, all of whom had gained a large number of clientswere involved in a struggle to dominate Henry's young successor, Francis II (1559-60). The Guises supported the royal family and Catholicism in order to further their own interests. The Montmorencies were split on religious issues: the Duke of Montmorency was loyal to the king and to Catholicism though he opposed the Guises, while the Admiral de Coligny, his nephew, supported the HU-GUENOTS.

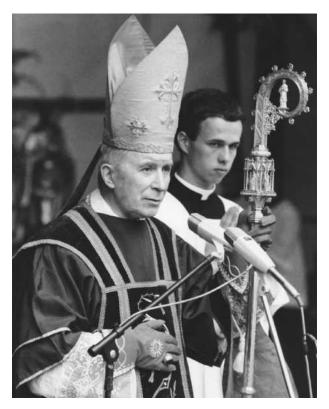

Aristide Briand.

The premature death of Francis II (December 1560) and the accession of his 11-year-old brother Charles IX (1560–74) shifted the balance of power. With the support of the Estates-General of 1560, the king's mother, CATH-ERINE DE MÉDICIS, assumed the position of regent. With the consequent decline of the power of the Guises, the Huguenots, led by the Bourbon Louis de Condé, took the initiative.

Despite attempts at conciliation, by April 11, 1562, France was involved in a religious and political civil war. After the ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY Massacre on Aug. 25, 1572, when many Huguenots were murdered, the conflict became more bitter and culminated in strong anti-royal sentiment among the Huguenots and the formation of the fanatical Catholic League by followers of the king.

Henry IV and Reform. From the time of the murder of Henry III (1574–89) until 1594, France was in a state of anarchy that finally ended with the acceptance by all of France of Henry of Navarre, leader of the Bourbons. As Henry IV (1589–1610), he abjured Calvinism and brought a solution to the religious crisis by means of the Edict of Nantes (1598), which guaranteed the Huguenots the right to retain their religion and gave them 100 fortified towns for their protection until animosity subsided.

As a result of the Wars of Religion the expansion of Calvinism in France was halted, and political stability, based on a growing desire for a strong monarch, was restored. But the religious life of the nation worsened despite the earnest activities of the Jesuits and Capuchins. In the rural areas a forceful Christianity was disappearing because of war and neglect. Among the intellectuals the skepticism of Montaigne and Charron became dominant. Yet during the reign of Henry IV steps toward reform were taken by Cardinal Jacques DUPERRON and Bp. Jean Camus. The assassination of Henry IV brought his wife, MARIE DE MÉDICIS, to power as regent for Louis XIII (1610–43). Though France faced a period of civil unrest that lasted into the 2d decade of the century, this religious reform continued. Despite the refusal (1614) of the Third Estate to accept the enforcement of the decrees of the Council of Trent in France and the continuing hostility of the government to these decrees on the grounds that they threatened the privileges of the Gallican Church, the Assembly of Clergy of 1615 accepted them. Under the inspiration of the Jesuits, the leaders of the First Estate resisted Gallicanism and worked for reform in the episcopacy and the regular clergy. The latter was begun by Cardinal de LA ROCHEFOUCAULD in 1622 and continued by Cardinal RICHELIEU. New congregations were established, and by 1630 there were 15,000 monasteries and convents in France, half of which had been founded since the end of the Wars of Religion.

The religious quickening that occurred during the first half of the 16th century was the work also of outstanding spiritual leaders. St. FRANCIS DE SALES, Bishop of Geneva and founder of the Visitation nuns, emphasized that perfection is a goal attainable by all men. Pierre de BÉRULLE, founder of the French Oratory, concentrated on the grandeur of God and the necessity of mortification. St. VINCENT DE PAUL, founder of the Lazarists and the Sisters of Charity, influenced by both St. Francis de Sales and Cardinal Bérulle, worked for the conversion of rural France and the establishment of charitable institutions. Jean Jacques OLIER founded the Sulpicians (1643) to improve the secular clergy through the foundation of diocesan seminaries. This period witnessed also a great French missionary effort led by the Jesuits, Capuchins, and Récollets.

The Role of Richelieu. The reign of Louis XIII was dominated by Cardinal Richelieu, who served as first minister of France from 1624 until his death in 1642. From the time of his consecration as bishop of Luçon (1607) until his entry into political life after the Estates-General of 1614, Richelieu planned sincerely for Church reform, though his interests were also political. He restrained the independence of the nobles and the Huguenots, accomplishing the latter through the Peace of Alcais of 1629, which ended Huguenot political power and their possession of the 100 fortified towns. Beyond the borders of France, Richelieu renewed the war against the Hapsburgs that had ended in 1559. French aid to the Lutheran states of Denmark and Sweden and to the Protestant princes of northern Germany, and, finally, direct French intervention in 1635 prolonged the Thirty Years' War and wakened the power of the Hapsburg dynasty.

Mazarin and the Fronde. The Italian-born Cardinal MAZARIN succeeded Richelieu in power and was master of France until 1661. He concluded the Thirty Years' War and furthered the great decline of Spanish political influence through the Treaty of the Pyrenees (1659). Within France, however, a growing hostility erupted against Mazarin and the Spanish regent, Anne of Austria. The anti-Italian spirit dated back into the 16th century and was especially strong among the clergy because of resentment that so many Italians held important French benefices. The anti-Spanish feeling gained momentum through the long wars with the Hapsburgs. This animosity resulted in the Fronde (1648–53), a rebellion begun by Parlement but carried on by the nobles, who found their political importance declining.

Louis XIV and Absolutism. During his long reign (1643–1715), Louis XIV achieved the goal of a strong French state planned by Francis I, Henry IV, and Richelieu. He became his own first minister after Mazarin's death (1661), and by checking the threat of the Fronde and adopting a successful fiscal policy, he succeeded in reinforcing the monarchy and reducing the influence of the nobles to the functions of courtiers. His plans for full control of the state included religious affairs as well. He revoked the Edict of Nantes in 1685 since the presence of two religions limited the power of the crown. The Church was brought further under royal authority when the Assembly of Clergy of 1682 was pressured to accept the Four Articles. This formulation of Gallicanism emphasized the separateness of the French Church and the superiority of a general council over the pope. At issue was the régale, the rights of the king regarding appointments to benefices not included in his privileges. The Four Articles were revoked by the king in 1693 after strong opposition from INNOCENT XI, who had annulled them in a rescript on April 11, 1682. Louis gave up his pretensions to the control of some benefices not specified in the Concordat of 1516. Louis' power was felt in the territory of Rome itself over the matter of the droit d'asile (right of asylum), in which matter Innocent struggled to limit the abuses of ambassadorial immunity and to retain sovereignty in his own capital.

The Fate of Jansenism. The theology of Cornelius JANSEN, Bishop of Ypres (1510-76), which emphasized predestination, human unworthiness, and the irresistibility of grace, survived the condemnation of his book, the Augustinus, by the Holy Office on Aug. 1, 1641, and spread through Belgium, Holland, and France. Through the activity of Jean DUVERGIER DE HAURANNE, Abbé of St. Cyran (1581-1643), it spread to the Convent of PORT-ROYAL and was kept in prominence by the efforts of the ARNAULD family, the brilliant Provinciales of Blais PAS-CAL, and the leaders of Parlement who were sympathetic to Gallicanism and Calvinism. After the death of the influential supporter of the Jansenists, the Duchess of Longuevill, Louis XIV moved strongly against them, even when they supported Gallicanism and his own anti-Roman policies. He destroyed Port-Royal (1710) and enforced the papal bull UNIGENTIUS of April 8, 1713, which denounced the Jansenist propositions of Pasquier QUES-NEL (1634-1719). However, Jansenism remained as a sentiment in France in the seminaries and in Parlement. The Jansenists had their revenge on the Jesuits, their determined opponents, when, through the influence of Parlement, the Society of Jesus was ordered expelled from France in 1763.

Madame Guyon and Quietism. The mystical theories of Miguel de Molinos, as adapted by Madame GUYON, attracted a group of followers in France in the 1680s and 1690s. QUIETISM was a reaction against the overly organized spiritual life of the 17th century, and in its French version emphasized resignation and pure love of God. Madame Guyon had some support among the French clergy, especially Archbishop FÉNELON. The strongest opponent of this movement was Jacques BOS-SUET, court bishop and theoretician of divine right absolutism. Through his effort, Madame Guyon was imprisoned in 1695 and Fénelon was silenced four years later. The condemnation of Quietism brought the contemplative life under suspicion. Jansenism had already deemphasized the efficacy of prayer and this reaction against Quietism completed the damage at a time when the Church in France was in need of all of its spiritual force. The government, meanwhile, faced the task of maintaining the absolutist structures of Louis XIV without a Louis XIV. The nobles and Parlement began to regain their lost power and the kings were progressively separated from the people by a growing bureaucracy. This problem was aggravated by the inept and inattentive behavior of Louis

XV (1715–74) and the inability of Louis XVI (1774–91) ever to understand the crises he faced.

The Church and the Enlightenment. The attitude of the Church to the theories of the 17th-century scientists and the philosophies constructed upon them was multifold but disastrous. Some clerics were attracted to the ideas of Pierre GASSENDI and Daniel HUET, which ideas derived from the philosophy of MONTAIGNE and CHAR-RON and opposed that of DESCARTES. This resulted in a fideistic skepticism. The greater number of philosophers and theologians remained conservative, if we except the appearance of an occasional philosopher such as Leonart LESSIUS, and either ignored or condemned new trends of thought. As a consequence, men such as Descartes found themselves cut off from the established tradition and forced to forge their own answers to the pertinent question raised by investigations of the new science: if man had been so long mistaken about the organization of the universe, could he know anything with certitude? By the end of the 17th century Newton and Leibniz had restored humanity's confidence in itself. However, this new creature placed his assurance not in faith and reason, but in reason alone. The thinkers of the 18th century were weary with the endless quarrels among Jesuits, Jansenists, Quietist, and scholastics. Aware that the world was not the world of Aristotle and Ptolemy, and searching for a means of making human beings happy, they accepted the new faith in reason. Voltaire, Diderot, and the other philosophes, inspired by Newton's laws, Leibniz's optimism, and the destructive criticism of the old order by Bayle and Montesquieu, worked to build a utopia in this world. Their religion was a DEISM that professed belief in creation by a Supreme Being and the progress of creation wholly by means of natural laws. For the middle class and for many clerics, already repelled by the growing worldliness of French churchmen, the ideas of the philosophes were irresistible. Their religion, however, did not become Deism, but simple indifference. (See EN-LIGHTENMENT.)

The leaders of the Church in France did not protest the government's suppression of the Jesuits (1763), thus allowing the destruction of the one group that had entered into fruitful controversy with the philosophes. In 1766 Louis XV established a Commission of Regulars composed of five laymen and five archbishops. By 1781 these enemies of exempt religious had caused the disappearance of nine religious orders and the rapid decline of most others. Though the commission had been instituted to reform the orders, which was needed, they worked without papal approval either to destroy or to bring under episcopal and royal control the religious life of France. Rather than prescribing a gradual reform of such abuses as abbeys held in commendam, the commission demanded immediate acceptance of arbitrary legislation.

The Eve of Revolt. Because the bishops of France in the 1780s were all nobles, the Church was now identified with the aristocracy and the monarchy. The rural clergy, who received little support or attention from the episcopacy, formed a clerical proletariat. In the meantime the financial crisis of the government, growing since the wars of Louis XIV, reached its climax with the calling of an Assembly of Notables (1787) to remedy the failures in the system of taxation. The Notables, hoping to gain further power in their 70-year struggle against the crown, refused to assent to the taxation of the notables and clergy and called for an Estates-General. In this fateful meeting of 1789, approved by Parlement and dominated by the aristocracy, the middle class (given its first chance to speak in 175 years and united by its desire to gain a place in society) seized power for itself. In the following years the Church, because of its association with the aristocracy, suffered from the havoc and destruction brought by the revolution.

Revolution, Restoration, and Reform: 1789–1965

The history of the Church of France after 1789 is dominated by three problems: the conflict with the more liberal society issuing from the French Revolution; the development of an industrial working class opposed to the aristocracy and all its manifestations; and the confrontation with contemporary civilization.

1789 to 1814. Under the ancien régime, the state was Catholic, and the king was considered a religious personage, a "bishop of the exterior." At the start of the French Revolution, the Constituent Assembly of 1789 could not imagine a Church separated from the state. It legislated on religious matters as the king had done. Under the diverse influence of Gallicanism, Jansenism, Protestantism, and the Enlightenment, the Assembly enacted the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY. This legislation created a schismatical Constitutional Church, and split the country religiously into two opposing groups. The revolution became increasingly hostile to the Church and by 1792 sought to destroy it, along with the monarchy with which it had been intimately allied. Later the Constitutional Church suffered persecution also. An attempt was made to dechristianize the country, and to replace Christianity with the cult of the goddess of Reason (1793), the cult of the Supreme Being (1794), THEOPHILANTHROPY (1797), and the DECADI cult (1798). In this condition of semi-anarchy, leftist, republican, and irreligious France triumphed over rightist, monarchist, and Catholic France.

The decade of revolution revealed the dechristianization already extant in some regions of the country and promoted the phenomenon; but by 1799 the majority of the people desired the restoration of the Catholic religion. In Vendée the greater part of the populace had taken up arms to defend their altars. With order restored under the Consulate, Bonaparte (see NAPOLEON I) sought to unify two mutually hostile segments of France arrayed against each other in civil war. He negotiated with PIUS VII the CONCORDAT OF 1801. A few bishops among those who had refused to resign their sees, as the pope demanded, joined the schismatic PETITE ÉGLISE. The new concordat governed church-state relations until 1905. It did not recognize Catholicism as the state religion but as the religion of the majority of the French people. It permitted the government to name the bishops, who were then canonically instituted by the pope. Bishops in turn were given the right to select pastors and curates. The regular clergy, scorned by the public, was not mentioned in the pact. This concordat was a compromise in which the Church agreed to liberty of conscience and to a legal parity with the Protestants and Jews. Confiscated ecclesiastical goods were not restored, but the state obligated itself to a reimbursement of the clergy. However, Bonaparte, on his own authority, immediately appended to the concordat the Organic Articles, which withdrew the state's concessions. One result of this procedure was that the Church lost confidence in this French government, which was no longer Catholic and which was to manifest hostility to this faith. Gradually the Church became accustomed to turn for help to the Holy See and Gallicanism gave way to ULTRAMONTANISM.

Highlighting the period of the First Empire (1804–14) was the conflict between Napoleon I and Pius VII (who came to Paris in 1894 to consecrate the emperor). The Continental Blockade provided the occasion for this great church-state dispute, but the underlying cause was imperial despotism. From 1809 to 1814 the pope was Napoleon's prisoner, during which time he agreed to the so-called CONCORDAT OF FONTAINEBLEU (1813), which he soon disavowed. This dramatic conflict was terminated by the collapse of the empire. Its sole lasting effect was to increase the authority and prestige of the papacy. The empire had succeeded in its aim of restoring religious peace but it had failed to enslave the Church to the state.

1814 to 1830. The religious history of the Restoration period (1813–30) was that of the failure of an attempt at a partial return to the ancien régime. During the reigns of Louis XVIII and Charles X, counterrevolution, the dominant ideology, found its outstanding proponents in the theocratic Joseph de MAISTRE and the traditionalist Louis de BONALD. The reactionary political outlook, to which the newly appointed bishops such as Hyacinthe de QUELEN subscribed, was tinged with a Gallicanism that defeated the project of a new concordat in 1817. Administrative pressure, the laws in the press (1822) and on sacrilege (1825), and other legislative measures all favored the religious reconquest of society. Indicative of the means utilized to effect this reconquest was the activity of the KNIGHTS OF THE FAITH, a secret society that worked in the shadow of a pious society called the CON-GREGATION, and that encountered violent opposition from a Voltairean bourgeoisie. The outcome was the expulsion of the Jesuits from teaching (1828) and the explosion of anticlericalism in the Revolution of 1830, which overthrew Charles X. The religious policy of the Restoration was mostly a failure; it had one good feature in that it permitted priests, sorely tried for a quarter of a century, to replenish their ranks and to build up a new vitality.

1830 to 1848. The July Monarchy was coterminous with the reign of Louis Philippe (1830-48), head of the cadet branch of the Bourbons. It began in an antireligious atmosphere. It was at this time that the first attempt was made at conciliation between the Church and society issuing from the revolution. The leaders in this movement of Catholic liberalism were Hugues Félicité de LAMEN-NAIS, LACORDAIRE, and MONTALEMBERT, whose organ was the short-lived newspaper L'Avenir. They championed liberty under every form. Above all, they upheld liberty of religion to be obtained by the complete separation of church and state. This program horrified the ecclesiastical authorities. Unfortunately, Lamennais was not a sound theologian, and L'Avenir was condemned by GREG-ORY XVI in the encyclical Mirari vos (1832). The principal Catholic demand under the July Monarchy was for liberty of education. During the Restoration the Church had tried, under the lead of Denis FRAYSSINOUS, to Catholicize the university, but after 1830 the university freed itself of this control. Under the July Monarchy the Church endeavored to obtain freedom for Catholic secondary education but the Chamber refused to grant it. As a result of the Catholic assaults on the university, the Jesuits were obliged to close their homes. On the other hand, the bourgeoisie were responsible for the passage of the Guizot Law (1833), which left to the Church supervision of primary education; they were motivated by fear lest popular unbelief menace the social structure. As a result of the influence of Lamennais and the anticlericalism of the government, ultramontanism made great progress. One effect was the gradual supplanting of the Gallican by the Roman liturgy. Another was the remarkable revival of the regular clergy, a phenomenon that was evident to a slight degree between 1830 and 1848 and that attained its full development later during the Second Empire.

1848 to 1852. Its liberal position in dealing with the anticlerical July Monarchy won for the Church wide-spread popular approval during the Revolution of 1848 and at the beginning of the Second Republic (1848–52). For the second time hope rose for a conciliation with the society issuing from the revolution. But the economic and social crisis that resulted from the revolutionary days of July 1848, in the course of which Archbishop AFFRE of Paris was slain, revived the division of the country into two blocs, with the Church taking its stand solidly on the right. Moreover, the hostility of the republicans was unleashed by the French military expedition to Rome, which overthrew the Roman Republic and restored Pius IX to control of the STATES OF THE CHURCH.

The Revolution of 1848 had brutally posed the social problem that arose from the destruction of the corporations by the French Revolution and from the birth of modern industry. Only a few Catholics grasped the situation as early as the time of the July Monarchy; these men formulated solutions, which later were given the name of social Catholicism. These forerunners manifested two diverse tendencies. Armand de MELUN was a pioneer leader in the conservative trend. The democratic direction was represented by Ere nouvelle (1848), whose political ideals were the liberal ones formerly proposed by L'Avenir. In the reaction to the stormy days of June 1848, social Catholicism suffered a blow from which it did not recover until the Third Republic.

Fear of socialism brought the middle class close to the Church on the political level. This was evident in the Falloux Law (1850), which granted the Church freedom for secondary education and representation in the council of the university. This law has been of capital importance in the religious history of contemporary France, because it assured the partial re-Christianization of the middle class, which had become completely imbued with the rationalist philosophy of the 18th-century Enlightenment. At the same time, the Falloux Law accentuated the rivalry, born during the July Monarchy, between intransigent or authoritarian Catholics, who found the law insufficient, and liberal Catholics, who were pleased with it. These two groups conflicted also over another great problem. The intransigents, led by Louis VEUILLOT and Bp. Louis PIE, condemned the type of society issuing from the revolution and sought to destroy it, whereas the liberal group, led by Montalembert, Albert de Broglie, and Bp. Félix DUPANLOUP, aimed rather to improve it. Thus the dispute between the Church and society was further complicated by a quarrel among Catholics themselves.

1852 to 1879. The Church, dominated as it was by intransigent Catholics, supported for the most part the dictatorship inaugurated by Louis Napoleon in the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851, followed by the establishment of the Second Empire (1852-70). Motivating in part this outlook was the Church's eagerness for the reestablishment of order and appreciation for the official homages that the new regime lavished on the Church. The only hostile Catholic groups were the legitimists, who were partisans of the elder branch of the Bourbons, and the liberals. The situation of the latter became still more painful in 1864 with the publication of the encyclical QUANTA CURA and the SYLLABUS OF ERRORS, despite the famous distinction made by Bishop Dupanloup between the thesis and the hypothesis. When VATICAN COUNCIL I solemnly defined the doctrines of papal primacy and infallibility in 1870, it dealt a death blow to Gallicanism.

The drive to unify Italy led in 1859 to a war that revealed disquieting perspectives in regard to the papal temporal power. Since NAPOLEON III and the Church viewed this problem differently, the alliance between them loosened until 1869 when republican opposition caused it to be tightened once more.

1870 to 1918. After the fall of the Second Empire, there followed a brief period introduced by the insurrection of the Paris commune. During this uprising, violently hostile to the Church, Abp. Georges DARBOY of Paris was shot to death. In the National Assembly, which governed the country until 1876, monarchists and Catholics comprised the majority. Great pilgrimages at this time to PARAY-LE-MONIAL revealed the persistence of vain hopes for a return to the Christian state. The Church did gain one advantage by obtaining (1875) freedom of higher education, which permitted it to found several Catholic faculties.

The republicans, positivist in spirit, came into power between 1876 and 1879. They disdained Catholicism as an obscurantist force destined soon to disappear. To precipitate this event they launched a threefold offensive that aimed to destroy religious congregations, Catholic education, and the Concordat of 1801. The onslaught was conducted in two stages. During the first one (1879–89) most congregations were dissolved (1880) and primary education was made compulsory, with public schools gratuitous and nonsectarian.

During the ensuing period of appeasement (1889-98), LEO XIII launched the third attempt at conciliation between the Church and the modern world. In pursuance of his policy of RALLIEMENT he issued Au milieu des sollicitudes (1892). This encyclical sought to deter French Catholics from jeopardizing their religion any longer by combating republican institutions; instead it advised Catholics to accept them. Most Catholics, however, refused either to abandon their monarchical ideal or to distinguish between the struggle against hostile legislation and the struggle against the Third Republic. The Ralliement had already collapsed when the Dreyfus Affair revived the battle between the right and the left and gave the signal for a second wave of anticlericalism and LA-ICISM (1898–1906), more violent than the first. It was started by Pierre Waldeck-Rousseau and resulted in further expulsions of religious congregations (1901). Justin Émile Combes was mainly responsible for the prohibition of congregations to teach (1904), the rupture of diplomatic relations with the Holy See (1904), and the abrogation of the concordat by the law separating Church and State (1905). Aristide Briand supervised as rapporteur the passage of this last law, which caused the Church to lose an annual budget of 35 million francs and the bulk of its possessions, because it conformed to Pius X's decision and refused to accept the juridical status bestowed on it.

At the beginning of the Third Republic, the conservative tradition of the social Catholicism was maintained in the workers' circles (Oeuvre des cercles ouvriers), in which the leading figures were Charles LA TOUR DU PIN and Albert de Mun. These circles enjoyed a measure of success for a while and then declined because of their undemocratic character. The encyclicals RERUM NOVARUM (1891) and Au milieu des sollicitudes (1892) gave rise to the movement of democratic priests, overly concerned with politics and journalism. Later came Sillon, led by Marc SANGNIER and the popular education movement, which had very brilliant moments c. 1900 before being dissolved by Pius X (1910), chiefly because it seemed to claim that Christianity implied democracy. Beginning in 1904 the Semaines sociales elaborated a doctrine for social Catholicism, but these ideas won support from no more than a minority of French Catholics.

The intellectual activity of the Church in France remained deficient after the Revolution because the clergy focused on the struggle against the adversaries of Catholicism, their activities absorbed by the work of ecclesiastical reconstruction. APOLOGETICS was continually behind the times. Young intellectuals who came under the influence of POSITIVISM, theological Liberalism, and Freemasonry (which in France had become irreligious) fell away from the faith. With the foundations of the Catholic faculties, the Church took note of this deficiency and underwent a veritable intellectual renaissance. This in turn gave rise to the crisis of MODERNISM, which occurred at the point where rationalist criticism encountered the rebirth of clerical studies. There was a question, for a time at least, of bringing the Catholic religion into harmony with the intellectual and moral needs of the time. French Modernism was above all Biblical (with LOISY as chief representative) and philosophical (with BLONDEL, LE ROY, and LABERTHONNIÈRE as leading exponents). Its errors drew a papal condemnation that affected the Church outside as well as within France. INTEGRALISM, which arose as part of the anti-Modernist reaction following the condemnation, retarded the intellectual activity of French Catholicism until after World War I.

1919 to 1945. After World War I international and financial problems relegated to the background of French politics the religious question, which was henceforth looked upon with greater serenity under the influence of the "ex-service men" spirit. The law regarding religious congregations was not put into effect. The Concordat of 1801 remained in force in Alsace-Lorraine even after the region's return to France. Relations with the Holy See were reestablished and permitted the negotiation of an accord that won for the Church the legal status that it had lacked since the separation. A last outbreak of militant anticlericalism appeared after the 1924 elections and attempted to question most of these changes. Its failure was due to the quick, resolute action of the Féderation nationale catholique and, above all, to its lack of popular support.

Taking advantage of the changed climate, Benedict XV and Pius XI overcame the opposition of the French hierarchy and resumed the Ralliement policy of Leo XIII, which Pius X had renounced. Catholics, who had been almost unanimously hostile to the separation of church and state, had since come to realize that although it had reduced the Church to poverty, it had also won for it liberty, independence, and an inestimable increase in dignity. They became accustomed to accepting separation as a permanent condition. On the other hand, Pius XI in 1926 condemned the ACTION FRANÇAISE of Charles MAURRAS who compromised the Church by assembling against the government a clientele of Catholic conservatives, integralists, nationalists, and monarchists. Action Française did not submit until 13 years later, but meanwhile its influence over youth had gradually declined. This second Ralliement, which constituted the fourth attempt to reconcile the Church, did not, to be sure, resolve all the problems that had plagued the Church for 135 years, but it did blunt their sharpness and relegated them permanently to the background. Henceforth both state and church tended to respect the nation's diverse spiritual families. If the traditional struggle between the two powers did not cease, it was carried on with much less intensity, except in regard to the school question.

After the great turning point of the French Revolution, the next great turning point in the history of the Church in France occurred between 1919 and 1926. The political problem had by 1919 ceased to be as important as the social problem. Gradually it became clear that the social problem was merely one aspect of a third problem, which was posed by contemporary civilization itself.

In the years following 1926 the changed political climate became stabilized. The state maintained correct or good relations with the clergy. Collusion between Catholics and monarchists ceased. No longer was the royalist party represented in the Chamber. Catholics no longer formed a single bloc; they divided in their positions and became pluralists. Some of them formed a republican party whose inspiration was Christian, the Parti démocrate populaire; its importance was quite modest, but it enjoyed a certain role in the Assembly between the two world wars.

During World War II the French regime (1940–44) under Marshal Pétain was conservative and favorable to the Church. It abolished the legislation affecting religious congregations and granted financial assistance to private schools. The hierarchy supported this government at first and then, like the rest of the country, detached itself from it and opposed the creation of a state youth movement and measures of racial discrimination.

The liberation government was dominated by the left-wing parties, but it was not anticlerical because Catholic participation in the resistance movement was widespread and because many militant Catholics were part of this government and of succeeding governments, although Catholic membership in government ministries had been a rarity before World War II. Only the office of Minister of National Education remained inaccessible to Catholics. The governments of both the Fourth and Fifth Republics granted financial aid to Catholic schools. The Mouvement républicaine populaire (MRP), successor to the Parti démocrate populaire and, like it, Christian in inspiration without being sectarian, won the largest number of votes after the liberation, because of a temporary weakness of the right-wing parties. On the political, social, and intellectual levels, the left wing of the MRP was composed of small groups of Catholics with very advanced, even progressivist ideas, bordering on those of the Communists.

A symmetrical development assured to social Catholicism a larger following within and without the Catholic fold. Social Catholicism saw its program put into effect by legislation, notably in regard to family allowances and social insurance. Christian syndicalism, whose modest beginnings dated back to 1887, was organized in 1919 with the creation of the Conféderation française de Travailleurs chrétiens. As a result of its earlier efforts this confederation grew rapidly after World War II.

Although the Church was for the most part freed from the political problem, it became aware that in place of the seemingly static world of the 19th century, a new world was evolving, whose future was as uncertain as the situation of Catholicism in the French sector of this world. The Church accepted also a newly developed type of spirituality.

Spiritual Renaissance. By the mid-20th century, France could no longer be regarded as almost entirely Catholic, as dechristianization had made deep inroads. The two anticlerical outbreaks during the Third Republic accentuated the trend toward dechristianization, especially in some regions. Another factor in the spread of dechristianization was industrial growth, one effect of which was the creation of proletarian areas that had little or no contact with traditional Christianity. Le Christ dans le banlieu (1943) by Y. Daniel and H. Goding (Eng. tr. France Pagan, 1949; by M. Ward) revealed the existence of this little-known dechristianized society existing alongside Christian society. A school of religious sociology founded by G. Le Bras was formed to study this phenomenon.

In the 19th century Catholics regarded their religion mostly in its moral aspects: they admired its organization, respected its prescriptions, which supplied them with a way of life, honored the virtues exemplified by the saints, and practiced sentimental devotion to the rosary, the month of Mary, the souls in Purgatory, etc. Beginning at the end of the 19th century a theological renaissance, a return to the faith of numerous intellectuals, the progress of Biblical studies, and the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT oriented fervor more directly toward God. Missals were substituted for prayerbooks to be read during Mass. The mystical life became more frequently looked upon as a prolongation of the life of grace. The Catholicism of conformism and individualism, of law and obligation, pious practices, and sentiment gave way to a Catholicism at once personal and more social, inspired by the theological virtues and growing stronger by practice, a Catholicism that aimed at making the life of a Christian a life of permanent prayer, a thoroughly human activity directed not only toward the salvation of the individual but also toward that of the world. To win victories the orientation of this Catholicism was no longer political but apostolic. While this new orientation banished egoism, it also impelled some zealous young Catholics into rash activism in critical situations.

During the 20th century LOURDES became a worldrenowned center for pilgrimages. Other shrines in France, such as LA SALETTE, were also very popular. A large percentage of modern canonized or beatified martyrs and confessors were French, and many who had been put to death during the French Revolution were beatified in this period.

Another characteristic of the Church that became increasingly entrenched during the 20th century was the increasing number of religious congregations devoted mainly to the active apostolate. Many of these, while established in France, later spread throughout the world.

Intellectual Activities. On the intellectual plane, the modern renaissance had a character of objectivity as the human respect characteristic of the bourgeois Catholicism of the 19th century disappeared. Catholic literature enjoyed a brilliant revival, the first signs of which appeared before 1914. Georges BERNANOS, Paul CLAUDEL, and François Mauriac became among the best-known Catholic literary lights. The high level of this literary revival was sustained by the creation of the Semaine des Ecrivains catholiques, replaced after World War II by the much more substantial Semaine des Intellectuels catholiques. Catholic publishers produced great collections pertaining to all realms of religious thought and activity. From the Catholic press came numerous periodicals and newspapers.

Domestic Missionary Movements. To make the world Christian, the focus of missionary groups turned to natural social communities. Before World War II this apostolate was conducted through the specialized agencies of CATHOLIC ACTION. After the war, the job was spread among various missionary movements, certain geographical areas and certain classes in society treated much like mission territories. Following the example of the Belgian Young Christian Worker movement, in 1926 Catholic France organized Jeunesse ouvrière chrétienne française (JOC), the aim of which was to have catholic laymen of a certain group exercise an apostolate among other laymen of the same group and in the same milieu. The Catholic Association of French Youth, established in 1886, developed in this same spirit of social Catholicism. Between 1927 and 1931 the group was transformed into a federation of specialized movements, each focused around young persons of a different social milieu. Among the other specialized movements that arose after 1926 were the Agricultural Christian Youth (JEC), Young Christian Student (JEC), and the Independent (i.e., middle-class) Christian Youth (JIC). Corresponding movements for young women and for adults came into being later. In addition Catholic Action groups of a more general type also appeared.

Another notable feature of the Catholic revival was the birth of a domestic missionary movement among the clergy. In 1941 the Mission de France was created to remedy the inconveniences involved in the partitioning of the country into dioceses that left the most dechristianized regions deprived of priests. This apostolate was conducted among the workers and also in parishes, and involved a specialized group of priests who sought to reestablish the presence of the Church in a dechristianized class. These WORKER PRIESTS began their labors in 1941 and shared the same life of labor as other workers. Unfortunately some priests lacked sufficient preparation and engaged in temporal activities that sometimes compromised the integrity of the priesthood. Pius XII put an end to the experiment on 1954, but Paul VI permitted its revival in 1965 with certain modifications.

The missionary spirit was also applied to parish life, and it was here that it found the widest field of action, thanks to the revival of preaching and especially of the liturgy carried out in a community spirit centered on the celebration of Mass and the distribution of the Sacraments. In rural districts priests organized themselves into communities so that they could serve dechristianized nearby parishes.

To restore the stability of the Church after the French Revolution and its aftermath, the Church in France needed changes in its organization. The Concordat of 1801 prevented such reorganization as long as it remained in effect, and following the separation of church and state, Pius X did not sanction meetings of the hierarchy due to the fear they would further expand the law of separation. However, by the late 1800s new problems made clear the need for a new type of organization, and in 1919 a commission of French cardinals and archbishops was created. In 1951 the entire episcopate held its first plenary meeting; four others would meet by 1965. Several permanent episcopal commissions formed, as well as an episcopal secretariat, laying the groundwork for the French Church's transformation into an episcopate receptive and responsive to contemporary problems.

Vocations. Once the law of separation went into effect the social and financial considerations that once induced many peasant families to direct one of their sons toward the priesthood ceased to exist. This resulted in the gradual disappearance of a rather ineffectual type of priest. It also cut recruitments quickly to less than half of what they had been. Then, too, the regular clergy were affected by the law concerning religious congregations, as well as by the wretched material situation of most priests since 1905. This drop in recruitment was especially noticeable in rural areas, while among urban workingclass areas vocations remained characteristically few. World War I heightened the crisis: by 1929 the number of secular priests dropped to 46,500, and by 1965 to 40,000. On the other hand, the regular clergy considerably increased its membership during the same period: among the 20,000 religious men there were 7,000 priests within France (apart from those living abroad in mission areas) by 1965. Teaching brothers totaled 5,000 in France, plus 1,500 more in the missions. There were about 117,000 religious women in France and several thousand other French nuns working in the missions.

French Foreign Missionary Activity. Despite the difficulties of French Catholicism, its missionary role in the first half of the 20th century was a leading one. This labor had begun with the increase in vocations in 1830 and developed very rapidly after 1860 because of French colonial expansion. Missionaries frequently arrived before the soldiers. The privileges France possessed in the Near East resulting from the "capitulations", and in China because of the Treaty of Tien Tsin (1858) facilitated the work of various French religious institutes, many of which were founded during this period. The HOLY GHOST FATHERS, the White Fathers, and the Society of the AFRICAN MISSIONS made great gains in evangelizing Africa. The Fathers of the Sacred Hearts, the MARIST FA-THERS, and the SACRED HEART MISSIONARIES dedicated themselves to work in Oceania.

The Mid-20th Century and Beyond

With the establishment of the Third Republic in 1870, and only interrupted by German occupation during World War II, France was able to maintain a republican form of government. For the French Church, Vatican II (1962–65) represented the realization of a great hope and the vindication of a distinctive national experience. It also marked the beginning of a period of self-doubt and internal tension that brought it to a very different situation by the close of the 20th century.

The French at Vatican II. The chief contribution to Vatican II by the French was made by theologians who in the decades preceding the council had been involved in a concerted effort to make the expression of Catholic teaching more informed by tradition and more relevant to modern times. This New Theology, which stressed the pastoral aspects of dogmas, had encountered many difficulties in the past and its exponents were suspected and put aside. The writings of Henri de LUBAC, Yves CON-GAR, Jean DANIÉLOU, and their colleagues and disciples inspired influential bishops not only from their own country but also from many others. These theologians, held suspect in some quarters, were vindicated by the fact that they were among the experts chosen for the drafting and revision of the conciliar documents. Their mark appears distinctly on the texts on liturgy, revelation, ecclesiology, ecumenism, and missions. Gaudium et spes reflected an optimism typical of the influence of TEILHARD DE CHAR-DIN.

About 20 percent of the French bishops were also active participants at the council; their 210 interventions related mostly to the two constitutions on the Church, Lumen gentium and Gaudium et spes. They also addressed issues concerning the Christian apostolate, especially of the laity. On that last topic, despite the interventions of Cardinal LIÉNART and Bishop Ménager, the conciliar documents did not take into account the experience of French Catholic Action. On the documents on Ecumenism, Religious Liberty, and Non-Christian religions, French Archbishop Marcel LEFEBVRE, superior of the Holy Ghost Fathers, placed himself directly in opposition to the majority of his colleagues; he also took the lead in the resistance to the doctrine of episcopal collegiality.

The French Episcopal Conference. An immediate result of the Vatican II was the establishment of the French Episcopal Conference in 1964. The French hierarchy had a relative experience of episcopal collegiality since 1919 when an Assembly of Cardinals and Archbishops (ACA) began to meet occasionally. Between 1951 and 1960, the French episcopate held four plenary assemblies. In 1945 a general secretariat of the ACA was created in charge of preparing and coordinating the decisions of that body. In 1961 the position of adjunct secretary for pastoral matters was created, with the purpose of coordinating the initiatives and actions of many dioceses (pastorale d'ensemble). It was also in 1961 that a new regional structure was added that supplanted the traditional provincial division. The new structure established nine Apostolic Regions, reflecting cultural and even linguistic identities: Ile-de-France, North, West, Center, East, South-East, Midi, Provence-Mediterranée, and Center-East. The statutes of the French Episcopal Conference, first confirmed by the Holy See in 1966, were revised in 1975 in favor of a more democratic participation with all members of the episcopate electing the officers. The higher instance is the Permanent Council-president, vice president, nine elected members (one by apostolic region), the archbishop of Paris (and eventually a cardinal, if none is already present)-that meets monthly. An important secretariat was also instituted, with a general secretary and four adjunct secretaries: Informationcommunication (also the spokesman of the Conference); pastoral service; apostolate of the laity; and administrative, financial, and juridical matters. Fifteen episcopal commissions (Family, Rural World, Independent Milieus, Youth, Migrants, Clergy, Religious, Liturgy, Public Opinion, Social, Religious Education, Exterior Missions, Christian Unity) and six episcopal committees (Finance, Mission de France, Maritime, Relations with Judaism, France-Latin America, and Canon Law) were established. In addition a bureau doctrinal of six members was placed in charge of theological matters. Finally, three episcopal groups (groupes épiscopaux) assured a direct link between the bishops and Christian communities, charismatic renewal, and the Réalités of tourism and leisure, to which was added a National Council for Solidarity.

The Conference of Bishops also sponsored several national services. The Centre national de l'enseignement religieux was in charge of pastoral catechetics in the country. The Centre national de pastorale liturgique (1965) continued the works of the Centre de pastorale liturgique, founded in 1943. The Service national du cat-échuménat coordinated the baptismal preparation of adult converts, and the Service biblique, évangile et vie organized and supported the many groups and associations interested in Biblical popularization. These groups published documents and magazines dealing with their objects of specialization.

In conformity with the reforms of Vatican II, each diocese established a council of priests (conseil presbytéral) and a pastoral council, in which the laity could participate. Religious men and women were organized in two Conferences of Major Superiors of France, with subdivisions at the regional level. The dearth of ordained ministries forced the ordinaries to commit many responsibilities to équipes animatrices of lay and religious men and women. They assumed charge of small parishes, often organizing Assemblées dominicales en l'absence de prêtres (ADAP) and serving as chaplains to schools, jails, and hospitals.

Liturgical Reform. Of the changes wrought by conciliar decisions, the most pervasive was in the area of liturgical reform. Many experts who contributed to the renewal of the liturgy were French or had been trained in France, among them A.-G. Martimort, L. Bouyer, J. Daniélou, and P. Jounel. These reformers based their recommendations on the many attempts at renewal and experimentation that had been tried during the 1940s and 1950s, both on the theoretical level (under the influence of the journal La Maison-Dieu) and the practical one (pilot communities, such as the one at Saint-Séverin, Paris). It later became plain that the reforms implemented were often poorly prepared and imprudently pushed through. Presenting, on occasion, the image of an iconoclastic and disorderly church, these reforms baffled many conventional faithful and scandalized the rest. Traditional devotions were disparaged, cherished customs such as communion solennelle were abandoned, and new rituals were invented that had little to do with the conciliar norms. In particular, the complete elimination of Latin exacerbated and brought into the public arena a rift that had long existed between conservative and progressive Christians within France.

A Time of Crisis. The crisis soon became apparent via the conflicts of the Action catholique. This form of apostolate of the laity had evolved along the lines of social or class distinctions, under the control of the hierarchy that commissioned the baptized Christians to represent the Church in their milieu. As their activity became more directed to social and political changes than to mission, this notion of mandatum was challenged and eventually abolished (1975). The successive tensions between the leaders of the different movements and the hierarchy (especially the crisis of the Jeunesse Etudiante Chrétienne [JEC] in 1965) brought a dilution of what had been for decades the store of Catholic elites and of religious and priestly vocations. At the same time, an identity crisis seriously affected the French clergy, as significant numbers abandoned the priesthood or religious life, and seminary recruitment reached its lowest point since the French Revolution. The turmoil of May 1968, a period of political unrest and systematic questioning of traditional values that started in the university community, revealed the uncertainty of a society in transition. It also demonstrated the weakness of the Catholic community in addressing these challenges and, above all, its divisions. At the dogmatic level, the tension was compounded by the reactions to the encyclical Humanae vitae (1968), of which the French bishops had given a pastorally sensitive interpretation.

By the late 1960s the divisions of the French Church were clear. Opposition, which had serious political connotations, existed between a left wing, often under Marxist influence, that advocated deep changes and wanted Christians to be fully involved in the transformation of society, and a right wing that promoted a return to order and tradition based on their interpretation of the Christian message. The leaders of the French episcopate who had been associated with Vatican II had either died (cardinals Roques, Richaud, Veuillot), resigned (Cardinal Liénart, Archbishop Lefebvre), or received Roman appointments (cardinals Garonne, Villot). They left to their successors the difficult task of controlling growing tensions and preserving some kind of order and homogeneity. Either individually or through documents issued by the Episcopal Conference, the majority of bishops endorsed a moderately progressive course that also reflected this rift.

Religion and Politics. Since the time of the French Revolution, the attitude of the Church vis-à-vis political issues had been consistent: a desire to influence society through political choices balanced by the need to maintain the independence of the Church. A situation now existed wherein a significant number of committed Catholics desired to improve and even change French society in the name of Christianity. One area of influence was social justice and the treatment of the poor both in internal and external policies (especially the matter of decolonization, which was very important at the time). Questions related to military disarmament were also raised. On these matters the Politique, Église et Foi, issued by the Conference of Bishops in 1972, represented a milestone in its acknowledgment of a diversity of political choices compatible with the Christian message and its delineation of "normative evangelical and moral criteria" for making decisions on social and political issues. The position of French Catholics was shown to be conservative in the election of May 10, 1981, when only 20 percent of practicing Catholics gave their vote to socialist President François Mitterand.

The Church and Social Issues. Once in power, Mitterand attempted to expand the reaches of the Loi Debré which, since its inception in 1959 under the leadership of President Charles de Gaulle, regulated the recognition of Catholic schools by the state and offered limited government support to students in exchange for moderate regulatory control. The final version of the proposed law appeared to many defenders of Catholic education a complete takeover by the state. In response a massive demonstration was organized in Paris that drew over 1,400,000 participants and successfully stopped the law's passage in the National Assembly.

Further attempts to reform education were resisted by the laity, as many bishops were reluctant to endorse a position they feared might be exploited at the political level. The same episcopal reluctance to intervene in matters involving politics was also evident in the moderate official positions expressed during Parliamentary discussion on the issue of contraception (Loi Newirth, 1967) and of the legalization of abortion (Loi Weil, 1974).

A Church Divided. The growing division within French Catholicism was publicly revealed in 1976 as the result of a rebellion led by Archbishop Lefebvre. The former archbishop of Dakar rejected several of Vatican II's decisions, especially as they were implemented in France. Desiring to preserve the traditional liturgical rites established after Trent, Lefebvre maintained a classical conception of the priesthood. In July 1976, he ordained the first priests trained according to these principles at the Fraternity St. Pius X at Écone, Switzerland. The Lefebvre affair had a deep political component, revealed the frustration of many Catholics with the changes they had been forced to accept, and indicated their desire for a clearer identity. While Lefebvre was excommunicated in 1988, after consecrating four bishops, negotiations conducted in Rome resulted in the reintegration of many of his followers in the Catholic communion.

Another disagreement among French Catholics was the question of catechetics. In the early 1960s most of the country's 220,000 catechists were lay women (84 percent). In response to the need for a better pedagogy of the faith, the classical presentation by questions and answers—in use in all dioceses since 1937—was replaced by a progressive method focusing more on the experience of children than on the content of the Christian message. A Directory of Pastoral Catechetics (Directoire de Pastorale catéchétique), issued in 1964 by the Conference of Bishops, was followed by a profusion of manuals adapted to all possible situations. The results of the new methodology were disappointing and in 1976 the bishops resolved to recenter the courses on prayer and faith. A comprehensive series of programs, or parcours, was established, with a reference book collecting fundamental documents titled Pierres vivantes (1981) that presented the salvation history beginning with the Exodus in the Old Testament and Pentecost in the New. In 1985, after many complaints and the intervention of the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith, a second edition beginning the history with the creation story in Genesis and the infancy narratives in the New Testament was published. A similar desire to improve the content of the resources available to educators resulted in a comprehensive catechism for adults (1991). By 1998, only 55,000 catechists were teaching the tenets of Catholicism in France, a reflection more of declining numbers of practicing Catholics than of the Church's commitment to catechetics.

Religious leaders long recognized the need to expose a faith many nominal Catholics seemed to know imperfectly. The success of the 1992 publication CATECHISM OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH illustrated a need for this education. In response, Catholic universities and institutes expanded their continuing education offerings to include courses for the laity on par with the level of academic scholarship in existence in the period preceding Vatican II. Contributors to the journal Communio (founded 1975) represented an influential group of young philosophers and theologians who successfully worked to restore religious understanding to a high level.

Reform and Renewal. The desire for reforms within the Church reflected a widely held desire for a "return of the sacred," a renewed interest in the transcendental elements of faith, particularly individual prayer. This tendency was encouraged by Rome through several key ecclesiastical appointments. The choice of a successor of the archbishop of Paris, Cardinal Marty, in 1981, was perceived by many as an important test. The selection of J. M. Lustiger (b. 1926), a former curé of Paris and successor at Orléans of the controversial Bishop G. Riobé, was indicative enough of a new type of leadership. Lustiger, a convert from the Jewish faith, had remained aloof from general ecclesiastical stances while serving as chaplain of the Sorbonne and a pastor. He soon put his mark on the diocese, stressing the need for a stronger presence, based on a renewed and deeply spiritual sense of Catholic identity. His attention to the problem of priestly recruitment and education of the laity was soon noted and imitated by his peers.

About the same time, a new archbishop was chosen at Lyon, A. Decourtray (1923–94), formerly of Dijon, was soon perceived as an open and traditional pastor. Both cardinals exhibited a willingness to address contemporary issues with rigor and clarity, displaying a rare ability to intervene in public debates and to use the media. Their influence was notable in the appointments of comparable bishops, distinguished by their intellectual and spiritual capacities and in the support given to fresh forms of Catholic ventures.

Another indication of a renewal in the French Catholic church was the growth of charismatic fraternities (le Renouveau), which echoed a movement begun in the Anglo-Saxon world that was based on a strong sense of community and association in prayer and action in society. Examples include Lion de Juda (1973), Chemin-neuf (1973), and Emmanuel (1976), to which can be added the older l'Arche (founded by Jean Vanier in 1964 and present in more than 17 countries) and the Foyers de charité, which started at Chateauneuf-de-Galaure in 1936 around the mystic Marthe Robin (1902-81). After their official recognition by the French bishops in 1982, these groups developed in many dioceses, often receiving a particular mission, such as the responsibility for a parish or a shrine. The international intellectual movement known as OPUS DEI took root in France in 1956, another example of a new association constituting a new source of influential lay and clerical elites.

A Secular Society. As the French Church entered the third millennium, its members continued to weather the unstable philosophical heritage of the French Revolution. In the postmodern world, many in the Church sought to transcend the combativeness characteristic of French Catholicism, most apparent between liberal and conservative interpretations of the Christian message. Such attempts at unification-which some have viewed as a reflection of changing attitudes within Western culture overall in the wake of the two World Wars-were encouraged by the papacy, particularly Pope John Paul II. The appointment of bishops who viewed the Church as an active moral presence in the world was supported by a new, younger elite who considered surrendering to worldly values a mistake made by their predecessors. Instead, this elite prefered an aggressive presentation and defense of Christian values.

In this era of multicultural awareness, many in the French Church supported the desire by other religious denominations—Orthodox and Protestant, but also Jewish and Muslim—to replace the traditional laïcité of the state with a more emphatic expression of religious freedom that would allow diverse faiths to be acknowledged within French society and valued in the name of culture and the defense of human values. The influence of Pope John Paul II marked the first evidence of a shift in this matter: It is quite significant that the reception the pope received during his second pastoral visit to Lyon (1986) was exceedingly warmer than was his 1981 reception in Paris.

The Catholic Presence. Reflecting a trend within Christian religions as a whole, surveys of Sunday mass attendance and reception of the sacraments taken between 1960 and the early 1990s revealed a slow but persistent decline in quantitative participation in religious life. In 1966 the proportion of regular participants at the Sunday mass or messalisants was calculated to be about 23 percent, but it had dropped to 12 percent by 1990. The number of occasional Catholics seemed most in decline, according to drops in the frequency of baptisms (421,295 in 1998), weddings, and funerals. While many of these Catholiques festifs were thought to have been dismayed by the changes associated with Vatican II, it might well have been that their attitude more reflected the influence of secularization and the retreat from Christian values common throughout the Western world. Many French citizens declaring themselves to be Catholic did not adhere to the major points of the Creed, such as the belief in the Trinity or the resurrection of Christ.

The importance, for the French Church, of public communication was reflected by the number and diversity of its publications. Two major publishers existed: the Centre National de Presse Catholique, which printed 26 titles, including the daily La Croix; and the Association Nationale de la Presse Catholique de Province, which produced 29 titles. The Chrétiens-Mídias was created in 1988, in direct association with the Episcopal Commission for Public Opinion, to coordinate diocesan activities with the goal of asserting a Catholic presence and fostering a dialogue in the fields of art and culture. The Church was also present over the airwaves, with such local radio stations as Radio-Notre-Dame in Paris (1981) and Radio-Fourvières in Lyon (1982). On national television, the Sunday program Le jour du Seigneur regularly included live broadcast of the Mass.

By 1998 there were 30,709 parishes in France. Private elementary and secondary schools (écoles privées) had about 20 percent of the total student population, and 90 percent of these private schools were Catholic. There were also five Catholic institutes of higher education, at Angers, Lille, Lyon, Paris, and Toulouse. In 1998 the Catholic clergy in France included five cardinals, 28 archbishops, 180 bishops, 27,781 priests, 3,858 brothers, and 55,087 sisters divided between 40,000 cathedrals, churches, and smaller chapels.

Accepting Religious Diversity. By 2000 13 percent of the population of France was immigrant. Due to an increased influx of Muslims during the late 20th century, Islam grew to become the second largest religion in France, with historian Alain Besançoin going so far as to posit that the nation now housed more Muslims than practicing Catholics. The assimilation of this growing Muslim population into French society was a major challenge to both the state and the Church. In fact, French Catholics remained somewhat adverse to social accommodation of other religions, although at the official level cooperation was successfully attempted. For example, the 1994 funeral of Cardinal Decourtray concluded with an interreligious celebration in front of the Lyon cathedral, and involved representatives of France's significant Jewish community.

Despite the majority position still held by Catholics in France, in an age of increasing toleration of differences dialogues following the lines of Catholic ecumenism first presented by Y. Congar in 1937 were strengthened with other Christian communities. In addition to the exchanges existing around the community of Taizé or the informal Groupe des Dombes, official dialogues between Protestant and Catholics continued to produce declarations touching on such practical issues as the celebration of baptism and marriages.

Given the French Church's long and complex history, the growing tolerance of religious differences that developed in the closing years of the 20th century did not satisfy all the nation's Catholics. Some openly dissented from a vision that, in their eyes, succumbed to an illusive spirit of "restoration," inconsistent with decades of French Catholic experience. Such tolerance was in some circles decried as utterly impossible in the postmodern age. Another concern of this faction involved fragmentation of the Church into rival "chapels" that would leave the institution more divided than ever. Held up as proof of the viability of this concern was the removal of Bishop Jacques Gaillot of Evreux in February of 1995. The bishop's removal was not justified by any dogmatic deviation, but by his lack of "communion" with the other bishops. The passionate reactions by the right wing to Gaillot's dismissal, as well as the organized left-wing protest encountered by Pope John Paul II on his 1996 visit to France, both illustrated that ideological polarization remained a serious problem in the country. However, the difficulties experienced by the Church in France, while a consequence of its long and unique history, may have also resulted from the stresses facing Catholicism, and indeed organized religion as a whole throughout an increasingly secularized Western world.

FRANCES D'AMBOISE, BL.

Carmelite prioress; b. Thouars, France, May 9, 1427; d. Couëts, near Nantes, France, Nov. 4, 1485. A daughter of Louis d'Amboise, viscount of Thouars, she became the wife of Peter II, duke of Brittany (d. 1457). Noted for her charity to the poor and sick, the childless widow resisted even the request of King Louis XI that she marry again. In 1463 she founded at Vannes the first cloister of Carmelite nuns in France, and in 1467, entered this convent and received the habit from the prior general, John SO-RETH. She died as prioress of Our Lady of Couüts and was buried there. In the convent as at court she combined a practical sense of affairs with a life of prayer and love of neighbor and followed with interest the fortunes of her country. Some of her conferences to the nuns survive in manuscript. Her cult was approved in 1863 by Pope Pius IX.

FRANCES OF ROME, ST.

Foundress of the Oblates of St. Frances; b. Rome, Italy, 1384; d. there, March 9, 1440. She was born into a noble Roman family of Busso and was married very young, in obedience to the wishes of her parents, to Lorenzo dei Ponziani, a wealthy landowner in the Trastevere district. Her saintly activity brought some ray of hope to the troubled years between 1400 and 1440, when furious internal struggles and natural calamities devastated the city of Rome. She aided the poor with great generosity and provided for the care of the sick in the city hospitals, especially Santa Maria in Cappella, which the Ponziani family was administering with papal consent. Here Frances was an example of modesty in dress and in her way of life for the 35 years in which she devoted herself to spiritual and temporal works of mercy. Her fame spread to Viterbo, Siena, Arezzo, Florence, Bologna, and the Marches, and naturally in Rome. On Aug. 15, 1425, she founded a group of Oblates of Olivetan Benedictines attached to the church of Santa Maria Nuova. Although at first not living in community, the group was later reorganized, adopting the common life to facilitate their dedication to works of mercy. Its constitution was approved by Pope EUGENE IV in 1433, and they were housed in a convent in the Tower of the Specchi, in the neighborhood of Campidoglio, where on March 21, 1436, the widowed Frances herself retired. Immediately after her death the process of canonization was begun, and after repeated attempts she was canonized by PAUL V on May 29, 1608. Her tomb is in Santa Maria Nuova.

FRANCESCHI, GUSTAVO JUAN

Philosopher and sociologist; b. Corsica, 1871; d. Montevideo, June 11, 1957. He was an outstanding figure in the Argentine clergy during the first half of the 20th century because of his abilities and the excellent use he made of them. Before becoming a priest he had a reputation as an oceanographer and an author with a beautiful style. After his ordination in 1902, he became an outstanding preacher, stressing particularly the social doctrines of the Church and frequently speaking in the public squares and streets of Buenos Aires. He was chaplain of the chapel of El Carmen for 30 years, and during that time he served as secretary for the Argentine Social League and promoted social study clubs. He frequently served as chaplain for the national prison, and he was clerical adviser for the Catholic Students' Center and the Catholic Teachers' Union. He directed the review Justicia Social and contributed frequently to El Trabajo, the organ of the Catholic Workers' Groups. In 1916 he began teaching philosophy at the Catholic University of Buenos Aires, and from 1917 to 1941 he was professor of sociology and Catholic social thought in the major seminary of Buenos Aires. From 1933 until his death he directed the review Criterio (founded March 1928 by Atilio Del'Oro Maini) and wrote a weekly article for it. These articles, written in a clear logical style on a variety of important topics, were read by both intellectuals and nonintellectuals. Some of them, as well as articles published in other periodicals, were collected and published in book form: La democracia y la iglesia (1918); Los cículos de estudios sociales (1822); Tres estudios sobre la familia (1823); La angustia contemporánea (1929); Keyserling (1929); Fundación social de la propiedad privada en la República Argentina; Las circunstancias sociales de Pío XI (1933); La Iglesia (1935); En el humo del incendio (1938); Visión espiritual de la guerra (1940); El deber actual de los Católicos (1940); Manantiales de nuestra fe (1941); and El pontificiado romano (2 v. 1945). In this last work, as in all his writings, Franceschi showed himself to be a theologian, a moralist, a philosopher, and a well-balanced historian, always well informed on his subjects. He was much influenced by French thought and was very skillful in adapting it to Argentine circumstances. He was a canon of the cathedral and in 1933 was named a domestic prelate. He did outstanding work through his writings in spreading Catholic doctrine and defending the interests of the Church.

FRANCESCO MARIA OF CAMPOROSSO, ST.

Italian Capuchin lay brother; b. Camporosso (Imperia), Italy, Dec. 27, 1804; d. Genoa, Sept. 17, 1866. After joining the Capuchins (1821), he exchanged his baptismal name, Giovanni, for Francesco Maria and pronounced his solemn vows in 1825. For the next 40 years he served in the friary in Genoa as almsgatherer (questor). During his daily begging rounds of the city his deportment, spiritual advice, and catechetical instruction deeply impressed the different classes of people whom he met. During the cholera epidemic (1866) he nursed the plague-stricken in their homes. He contracted the disease and died a martyr of charity. His remains are enshrined in the Capuchin church of the Most Holy Conception in Genoa. He was beatified June 30, 1929, and canonized Dec. 8, 1962.

Feast: Sept. 17.

FRANCHI DE' CAVALIERI, PIO

Italian scholar and hagiographer; b. Veroli, Aug. 31, 1869; d. Rome, Aug. 6, 1960. After studies in classical philology, he was given the post of a scriptor or researcher in the Vatican Library (1896) under Cardinal Franz Ehrle; he served as honorary conservator of the Sacred Museum of the library from 1921 to 1948. He worked on catalogues of manuscripts with Vatasso, editing the list of Latin manuscripts (1902), and with A. Mercati, the Greek manuscripts (1923). He also brought out editions of the Rotulo di Giosuè (1905) and the Menologion of Basil (1907), and with H. Lietzmann he published Specimina Codd. graec. Vaticani (Bonn 1910 and 1929). His principal concern, however, was hagiography, and he published nine volumes of Note agiografiche in the Studi e Testi series and wrote articles for the Römische Quartalschrift, Rivista di archeologia cristiana, Nuovo bollettino di archeologia cristiana, and Studi romani. In 1956 he presented the library with a precious collection of ancient coins; he was looked upon as the dean of Roman hagiographers.

FRANCIA, ANNIBALE MARIA DI, BL.

Founder of the Rogationist Fathers of the Heart of Jesus and the Daughters of Divine Zeal, known as "the father of orphans and the poor"; b. July 5, 1851, Messina, Sicily, Italy; d. there, June 1, 1927.

Annibale was the son of a noble family headed by Francis di Francia, Marquis of Santa Catarina, and his wife Anna Toscano. When Annibale was two, his father, who was papal vice-counsel to Pius IX, died. Stories about Annibale's days in a Cistercian boarding school (1858–66) describe acts of the heroic compassion which characterized his entire life. When the school was closed during the Revolution of 1866, the Sicilian poet Felice Bisazza tutored him. Annibale used his writing skills to compose articles for his uncle's periodical, La Parola Catolica, poetry (The Hymns of July First), prayers, and pamphlets.

At 18 Annibale recognized his call to the priesthood. A month before his ordination (March 16, 1878), he encountered a blind youth, Francis Zancone, who introduced him to the need for charity. Thereafter he joyfully dedicated himself to the spiritual and temporal relief of the most neglected, beginning in the neighborhood of Avignone in Messina. He established evening and boarding schools for boys, a kindergarten for girls, and orphanages dedicated to Saint Anthony of Padua (to whom Annibale later built a shrine in Messina). Like others who heroically give of themselves he encountered opposition, but received the support of his archbishop, Giacomo Cusmano, and John Bosco. For the physically poor, especially children in the Anthonian orphanages, he begged from door to door. For the spiritually poor he prayed "to the harvest master to send workers to the field" (Mt. 9:38).

For the purpose of praying for vocations to the priesthood and religious life and for caring for needy children and the poor, Francia formed the Rogationists Fathers and Daughters of Divine Zeal. Melanie Calvat, one of the visionaries of La Salette, spent a year at the female institute (1897–98) helping Francia firmly establish it following some setbacks. Orphanages run by the sisters multiplied quickly after 1902 to meet each new crisis in Italy (e.g., earthquake, cholera, war). The Rogationists have expanded beyond the borders of Italy to other countries in Europe, Argentina, Brazil, India, the Philippines, Rwanda, and the United States. Additionally, to invite others to unite spiritually to pray for vocations, he established a Holy Alliance for bishops, prelates, and priests, as well as the Pious Union of Evangelical Prayer for laity.

For many years Annibale was the spiritual director for the writings of the Luisa Piccarreta (1865–1947; cause opened February 1994), who recorded private revelations on the Divine Will. Among the 19 volumes to which he gave the nihil obstat were The Virgin Mary in the Kingdom of the Divine Will and The Hours of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ.

Throughout his life Blessed Annibale conscientiously fulfilled his priestly obligations, showed Christ–like love to the most vulnerable, and trusted completely in Divine Providence. In beatifying Annibale di Francia on Oct. 7, 1990, Pope John Paul II held him up to the Church as the "authentic precursor and zealous teacher of the modern pastoral ministry of vocations."

Feast: May 31 (Rogationists).

FRANCIS DE SALES, ST.

Bishop of Geneva, founder of the Order of the Visitation, and Doctor of the Church; b. Thorens, Savoy, Aug. 21, 1567; d. Lyons, Dec. 28, 1622.

Francis lived in what was the independent Catholic Duchy of Savoy, which, with its capital in Turin, straddled the Alps. His birthplace was on the French side of the Alps, some 30 miles south of Geneva. This city, once part of Savoy, had been controlled by John Calvin's followers since 1536, and its bishop had taken refuge in Annecy. By Francis's time the ''wars of religion'' had given way to a tentative truce but no true tolerance.

His parents, Francis de Boisy and Frances de Sionnaz, were staunch Catholics and loyal members of Savoyard nobility. His father destined his first-born Francis for a career in public life. After two years of primary school in LaRoche, and three years at the College Chappuisien in Annecy, Francis attended the Jesuit College de Clermont in the University of Paris from 1578 to 1588. He studied humanities then philosophy, adding courses on theology by his own choice and without his father's knowledge.

After a brief stay in Savoy Francis went to the University of Padua to study law. There he continued his theological studies and his spiritual formation, assisted in both by his spiritual director, Antonio Possevino, SJ (1534–161) a noted theologian and church diplomat. Together they worked out a set of "spiritual exercises" to help him cultivate devotion in a typical student milieu. His law studies, far from being neglected, led to a doctorate in both canon and civil law and high praise from his professor, Guido Pancirolo.

In Paris Francis experienced a crisis that arose in part from his reading of theology and confronting the controversial topic of predestination. As a young man of 19, he became convinced that he was predestined to hell. Much as he prayed, he still felt that, because of his sins, he would be among the damned; for him the worst part was the prospect of being unable to love God for eternity. Deliverance from the temptation came when he could pray: "Whatever may happen, O Lord . . . I will love you always . . . at least in this life will I love you if it is not given me to love you in eternal life." Kneeling before a statue of Our Lady of "Good Deliverance," he prayed the Memorare and then, standing, found himself "perfectly and entirely healed."

As he pursued his studies of law and theology at Padua, the question of predestination arose again as he questioned whether he could accept the position of Augustine and Aquinas as it was being taught, or if he had to reach an understanding more attuned to the scriptural truth of God's will to save all, and to the reality of human free will. The resolution of this crisis again found expression in prayer. Mindful of the fallibility of his own thinking, Francis cautiously yet confidently opted for the more positive view, convinced that God's name is not "the one who condemns," but "the one who saves [Jesus]." His experience of this crisis, in its moral and intellectual phases, was formative of his spirituality with its emphasis on human capacity to love in the present moment, and on the prior unconditional goodness and love of God.

Ever since his early years he felt called to priesthood, but Francis's father knew nothing of this and had other plans for his eldest son-admission to the bar at Chambery, a proposed marriage and appointment to the Senate of Savoy. Francis agreed to the first of these plans, was coolly polite about the second, but refused the third. Meanwhile without his knowledge efforts were made in Rome to obtain for Francis the recently vacated position of provost, a post second to the bishop. The nominating letters arrived on May 7, 1593, and the next day, Francis asked his father's permission to take holy orders. The nomination as provost served as an enticement, and finally, M. de Boisy gave Francis his blessing. By the end of that year Francis had received all the minor and major orders, being ordained to the priesthood on December 18. He was installed as provost by Claude de Granier, bishop of Geneva in exile in Annecy.

In September 1594 Francis volunteered to undertake a mission to the Chablais, a part of the diocese where the Catholic faith had been banned by Calvinists for more than 50 years. The duke of Savoy had regained tentative control over the region, and wanted his Catholic religion to be restored in it. Bishop de Granier agreed to send two priests into the area. At first Francis and his cousin, Louis, had to stay at an armed castle some ten miles from Thonon, the regional capital, venturing forth to contact local officials and to preach wherever a few people would dare listen to them.

After a year and a half of seemingly futile efforts, multiple trials and frustrations, Francis's perseverance began to bear fruit: conversions, of civic leaders and of increasing numbers of citizens, tardy but necessary backing from the duke, four more priests to help, and the 1598 Treaty of Vervins, which promised a more stable and peaceful Savoy. By September the new situation of Catholics in the Chablais could be celebrated in Thonon. The duke arrived and proceeded to give the remaining Calvinists the choice of embracing the Catholic faith or of leaving his territory. As a trained jurist Francis saw a multiplicity of religions as a threat to the state's unity, and did not openly opposed the duke's measures. But as a priest and missionary, he much preferred persuasion, and never lost hope for a rapprochment among divided Christians, even though his three clandestine meetings with Theodore de Beze, Calvin's successor, showed how unlikely this was.

In 1597 Francis acceded to the request of Bishop de Granier to be named his coadjutor. The following year he took the ailing bishop's place in an ad limina visit to Rome, during which Pope Clement VII invited Francis to appear before a distinguished "jury" of cardinals and theologians, so that they might be as impressed as he was with the learning and piety of the bishop-elect.

In January 1602 Francis left for Paris. His official mission had to do with establishing the faith in a part of the diocese which the duke had given over to France. In that regard results were disappointing, but Francis's presence in Paris was a remarkable success. He interacted with a circle of spiritual leaders at the home of Barbe Acarie, where all the recent currents of spirituality were represented. Francis learned from all these trends, but he identified most with Teresa of Avila's approach, "in which the solid, evangelical virtues were much preferable to visions, revelations, and ecstasies" (A. Ravier). During these months Francis served as Madame Acarie's confessor; he influenced the circle to endorse her inspiration to bring the reformed Carmelites to France, and he encouraged Bérulle to do the same for Philip Neri's Oratory-in which Bérulle eventually found his own vocation.

Francis also made a grand impression on the court and on Henry IV himself, who was struck by the priest's evangelical preaching and positive accessible piety and tried to entice de Sales to remain in France. Francis declined the offer made, as well others made in 1608 and 1619.

On his way back to Annecy, Francis received word of the death of Msgr. de Granier, and prepared for his episcopal ordination, which took place in the church of his baptism in Thorens. He later wrote that on that day "God took me from myself to take me to himself and give me to his people." He gave himself to a full range of pastoral activities: he preached, taught catechism, worked for the reform of his clergy and of local monasteries, visited every parish, including those in remote Alpine villages, and more and more took on a ministry of spiritual direction both in person and by letter.

In 1604 he was invited to give the Lenten sermons in Dijon, the capital of Burgundy. There Francis met Baroness Jane Frances Fremyot de CHANTAL (1572-1641), a young widow with four small children. The spiritual rapport between Francis and Jane was immediate and mutual, and four months later Francis agreed to be her spiritual director. Thus began a relationship which would grow into one of the most celebrated spiritual friendships in the history of the church. For six years the friendship deepened through multiple letters they exchanged and through the visits Jane made to Savoy. The widow de Chantal had a desire to give herself totally to God but did not know what that might mean, especially in view of her children. Francis affirmed her in her existing responsibilities, but also encouraged her to nurture her inner desire until God's further inspiration would show the way. An idea they first discussed in 1607 bore fruit in 1610 in the creation of a new religious congregation, the Visitation of Holy Mary, a community of prayer open to women whose health or age prevented them from joining an existing order. To the end that the community could spread beyond Savoy into France, Francis and Jane saw this modest beginning evolve into a religious order with vows and enclosure (1618). In retrospect Francis saw this foundation as "the fruit of the trip to Dijon," i.e., as flowing from his providential encounter with Jane de Chantal and marked by their respective contributions and by their common spirit.

In 1618 Francis was a member of a Savoyard delegation to the French court; they were to negotiate a marriage between Christine of France, sister of King Louis XIII, and Victor Amedee, crown prince of Savoy. In Paris Francis was much in demand as a preacher and spiritual director; he was again in contact with spiritual leaders such as Berulle and Vincent de Paul; with Mother de Chantal he established a Visitation community in Paris (with Vincent as its chaplain); he met several times with Angelique Arnauld, at that time an experienced convent reformer, who felt drawn to the Visitation; finally he again overcame the efforts of the cardinal of Paris to make him his coadjutor.

Francis returned to his dear Annecy after a year's absence, but his health was failing, and he dreamed of retirement. His brother was named coadjutor but there were two trips Francis had to make: one by order of the pope to oversee a monastic election in Piedmont, the other by order of the duke to be part of a Savoyard delegation to greet King Louis XIII at Avignon. On the return trip, at Lyons, he suffered a cerebral hemorrhage and died in the gardener's cottage of the Visitation monastery on Dec. 28, 1622. After some delays his will was found and his body duly returned to Annecy, arriving there on January 24.

Writings. Francis's life and ministry provided the matrix and motivation for all his writings—26 volumes in the Oeuvres completes. During the time in the Chablais when few would come to hear him, Francis explained Catholic doctrine in a series of short tracts which were copied (possibly printed) and clandestinely circulated. Francis hoped one day to rework and expand these "meditations," to produce a book to help preachers win over Calvinists "by a style that is not only instructive but affective." He never realized this larger project, but affective." He never realized this larger project, but affer his death a partial manuscript was found and published in 1672 under the title of Controversies. From the same period and ministry came the first book Francis himself published, The Defense of the Standard of the Cross (1600), a thorough explanation (in response to Protestant objections) of Catholic theology and practice in regard to venerating the cross or crucifix.

The ministry of spiritual direction led Francis to publish a very different kind of book in 1608. One of his directées, Madame de Charmoisy, had moved from Annecy for a time, and so he put in writing some of his advice on prayer and Christian living. These she shared with Fr. Fourier, a Jesuit, who strongly urged Francis to prepare them for publication. The resulting Introduction to a Devout Life was an immediate success, and Francis began to gather other memos he had written to directées, and worked them into an expanded second edition by September, 1609. Finally in 1619 he published the definitive edition, which continues to be recognized as a classic of Christian spirituality.

Prior to writing the Introduction, Francis had begun to write a "booklet" about the love of God and a sequel about love of neighbor. He eventually produced a substantial volume, divided into 12 "Books"-all on love for God. While his subject was the practice of love for God, the first four Books contain theological and philosophical underpinnings for the rest. Books five through nine are the core of the Treatise on the Love of God, while the last three show how love of God reigns over all other loves, subsumes all the virtues and gifts and is exercised in everyday life. Though less accessible and less popular than the Introduction, the Treatise, which appeared in 1616, is seen as Francis's major work, comprehensive without being academic. Its teaching on the various forms and states of prayer owes much-as he says in the preface-to the experience of the early Visitation sisters and that of other directées.

Francis delivered many sermons, only one of which was published in his lifetime. Many others have come down to us: some in his own writing—either fully written out or, more frequently, as sketchy notes for his own use in preaching; others transcribed as he spoke and/or immediately afterward, by "secretaries" skilled in the art of memory (ars memorativa) and in reconstituting oral presentations. Recent studies have affirmed the basic reliability of these transcriptions and the advantage they have of giving an accurate idea of what and how Francis preached.

The Spiritual Conferences fall into this last category; in fact until very recently three transcribed sermons were included in collections of conferences. Most of the latter were informal, sometimes out-of-door discussions with the first Visitation community, and all were in implicit dialogue with it. A first unauthorized publication prompted Jane de Chantal to prepare the ''true spiritual conferences'' in 1629. Subsequent editions and translations have varied in their accuracy, contents, and order of presentation. The text published in the 1969 Pléiade edition of his Oeuvres surpasses them all, and is utilized in a recent English translation.

At Clermont College Francis had learned the art of letter writing and he practiced it both in formal correspondence with popes and princes and in personal letters of spiritual direction and friendship. His complete works contain over 2,000 letters, estimated to be one tenth of what he actually wrote. Many of these are letters of a gifted spiritual director. Though written to specific directées in unique circumstances, they have been published in a variety of collections beginning in 1626, and continue to speak to Christians in very different circumstances.

Other short writings, opuscula, which for the most part Francis wrote but did not see published, comprise the last five volumes of the Oeuvres. Included are a early work on the Song of Songs, the spiritual exercises he wrote in Padua, advice to confessors, and many texts related to the Visitation community.

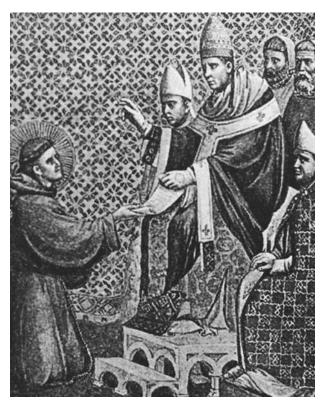

This corpus of published and unpublished works contains a widely recognized spirituality, a "devout" or simply Christian humanism, possible in any calling or circumstance, a "spirituality for all." Some parts of it were written for specific audiences, but according to Francis contemplative religious can benefit from reading the Introduction, and lay people do benefit from the Spiritual Conferences. Underlying all his life and writings can be seen an adaptable spirituality which (1) is rooted in the human heart-center and extends to all facets of life, (2) finds peace in the midst of busyness and in a dynamic conception of prayer and discernment, and (3) sees God acting in ordinary human relationships-in community, family and especially in friends. His experience convinced him that spiritual friendship is necessary for those living "in the world," himself included. The relationship with St. Jane de Chantal so shaped both of them that it can be said that theirs is a common spirituality expressed in different voices.

These writings also contain a less-well-recognized theology. On some topics Francis can be called Scotist or Molinist, but what he developed over the years, while not a systematic or "school" theology, was a pastoral synthesis of those theological points "which concern for the service of souls and 24 years spent in sacred preaching lead me to think are most conducive to the glory of the Gospel and of the Church." Some of the theological topics he dealt with are the primacy of love, the question of grace and free will, a theology of praise, an analysis of "God's will," the nature of the Church, the sufficiency of scripture, and the role of Mary and the saints. Francis's theology, then, like his writing, was intimately linked to his ministry. It served as a solid foundation for his spiritual teaching and for his psychologically astute spiritual direction.

Francis was beatified in 1661, canonized in 1665, and declared a doctor of the Church in 1877. In 1854 he was named patron of the deaf and in 1923 that of writers and journalists. Shortly after the Second Vatican Council Pope Paul VI wrote: "None of the recent doctors of the Church knew better than St. Francis de Sales how to anticipate, with the profound intuition of his wisdom, the deliberations of the Council" [Acta apostolicae sedis LIX (1967), 115]. That wisdom is becoming better known through the attraction of his writings, through scholarly studies and through religious organizations claiming the saint as founder or patron, as they renew themselves in his spirit, notably Visitation Sisters, Missionaries of St. Francis de Sales, Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, Salesians of Don Bosco, and the St. Francis de Sales Association.

"Saint Francis of Assisi Presenting His Rule to Pope Innocent III," part of 14th-century fresco cycle by Giotto, Assisi, Italy.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI, ST.

Founder of the Order of Friars Minor, the Order of Saint Clare, and the Order of Brothers and Sisters of Penance. b. Assisi, c. 1182; d. there, Oct. 3, 1226.

His father, Pietro di Bernardone, was a textile merchant; his mother was named Pica. He was baptized John, but was called Francesco, that is, Francis. Having received the usual liberal arts education of the period, he knew Latin and possessed some knowledge of French. His wealth and love of life made him a flamboyant leader of Assisi's youth. In the feuding between Assisi and Perugia he was imprisoned (1202-03). Afterwards, a debilitating illness brought him to a realistic awareness of his strengths and weaknesses. In 1205 he dreamt about joining a campaign against Apulia, but after a dream promising him glory, he changed his plans and at Spoleto returned to Assisi. Soon after, he met a leper and began a life of continuous conversion. A short while later, he entered the abandoned church of San Damiano on the outskirts of Assisi where he heard a voice from the cross calling him to rebuild the house of God. Taking his inheritance he used the money to fulfill the mandate, severed relations with his father, and dramatically and publicly renounced dependence on his father, Pietro. After hearing the missionary discourse in the Gospel of Matthew 10: 5–14 on Feb. 24, 1209, he embraced poverty and gave his life to preaching penance and peace.

Early Days of the Order. He began attracting followers and when there were a dozen, Francis drew up a form of life consisting of Gospel passages and some practical norms of living. Francis and his brothers presented the document to Pope Innocent III who approved it orally in 1209 or 1210. They then returned to the chapel of Our Lady of the Portiuncula (Santa Maria degli Angeli) in the valley below Assisi. Clare was invested there March 18–19, 1212 into a new way of life and thus the Second Order was founded. The preaching of Francis and his brothers initiated in Italy a strong penitential movement, which spread elsewhere among the laity, and later developed into the Third Order.

To reactivate the Church's mission to spread the Gospel Francis attempted a journey to Syria in 1212, but was shipwrecked in Dalmatia. A second journey to Morocco was thwarted by his illness in Spain (1213–14). Meanwhile, the order had expanded considerably. In 1217 the order was organized into provinces. In 1219 during the Fifth Crusade Francis traveled to the Middle East where he tried in vain, at Damietta, to convert the Sultan of Egypt, Malik al-Kamil. Meanwhile during Francis's absence from Italy there arose internal difficulties among the brothers that clearly showed how much the legally unstable order depended upon the personality of its founder.

After his return to Italy in 1220, Francis requested the pope to name as cardinal-protector Cardinal Hugolino, a man who later, as Pope Gregory IX, played an important role in the formation of the order. In the same year Francis, who remained minister general until his death, accepted Peter Cathanii as his vicar. The rule, which had developed until that time without much direction, was revised and promulgated in 1221 at the Chapter of the Mats in Assisi, with 3,000 friars in attendance. Caesar of Speyer incorporated the related Scripture passages into this, the earliest extant rule (regula non bullata). After the death of Peter Cathanii in 1221, Francis independently appointed Brother Elias of Cortona as vicar-general. The demand for a stronger juridical structure in the order resulted in a definitive rule (regula bulata), approved by Honorius III, Nov. 29, 1223.

Death and Afterlife. Francis devoted himself to the spiritual growth of his brothers by means of circular letters and admonitions. He traveled and preached throughout the countryside, but he repeatedly interrupted his activity to retreat to a solitary hermitage. On Dec. 25, 1223, at Greccio he organized the now famous crib ceremony in the description of which it becomes evident that he was a deacon. The date of his ordination to the diaconate is unknown. On the mountain of Alvernia (La Verna) he received the stigmata on Sept. 14, 1224 (the first documented stigmatization). Plagued during the last years of his life with blindness and serious illness, he died at S. Maria degii Angeli (Portiuncula), Assisi during the evening of Oct. 3, 1226. The next day he was buried in Assisi at the church of Saint George. Two years later on July 16, 1228 in Assisi, Gregory IX enrolled Francis in the catalogue of the saints. A day later on the 17th, Gregory laid the cornerstone of a new church (built later by Brother Elias of Cortona) that was destined to shelter Francis' remains. At this same time, Gregory IX charged Thomas of Celano to write the saint's biography; he completed it by early January 1229 at the latest. In 1230 the lower church of S. Francesco was near enough to completion that Francis' remains were solemnly interred there on May 25. For fear that relics might be stolen, the location of the grave was kept secret. After many attempts in 1570, 1607, and 1806, the grave was located in 1818, and its surroundings were expanded into a crypt-church. The Church commemorates Francis' death on October 4 and the feast of the Stigmata on September 17. The order, moreover, celebrates the first approval of the rule (renewal of vows) on April 16, the translatio on May 25, the canonization on July 15, and the discovery of the grave on December 12. Franciscans further celebrate his death with a special transitus ceremony on the evening of October 4.

Francis is venerated as spiritual father by the three branches of the First Order (Franciscans, Franciscan Conventuals, and Capuchins), the branches of the Second Order of Poor Clares (Urbanists, Colettines, Capuchinesses, etc.), the Franciscan Third Order Regular, approximately 30 male congregations, more than 400 communities of Franciscan Sisters, and numerous lay communities of the Third Order Secular.

The miracles Francis performed during his lifetime and after his death have not followed a single pattern, but have answered all kinds of human requests. He is venerated not only by Catholics but, especially since the 19th century, by Protestants as well; there is also a Protestant Third Order of St. Francis. His apostolate of peace and his example of fraternal charity have captured today's imagination. His profoundly Christian love of creation (Canticle of the Brother Sun) exemplifies his appreciation of God's generous gifts of creation. All that is speaks and proclaims the glory of God. Francis' vision of creation in its profound origins as a generous outpouring of God's love has not always been properly understood. In recent times romantic enthusiasts have often encouraged a superficial praise for creation in and of itself rather in the wondrous beauty of its origin and destiny. However, the publication of a critical edition of Francis' writings by Cajetan Esser in 1974 have gone a long way to remedy that situation. In 1979 John Paul II proclaimed Francis to be the patron saint of ecology.

FRANCIS OF GERONIMO, ST.

Jesuit preacher and social worker; b. Grottaglie, near Taranto (Apulia), Italy, Dec. 17, 1642; d. Naples, May 11, 1716. He was the eldest of 11 children, and spent his boyhood in a residence of secular priests who lived in a community. In 1658 he entered the Jesuit college at Taranto and later attended the Gesù Vecchio, Naples, where he was ordained March 18, 1666. After a year as prefect at the Collegio dei Nobili, he entered the society in July 1670. Following his novitiate, he spent a year with an experienced missionary preaching in the Province of Otranto. He then returned to Naples, completed his studies at the Gesù Nuovo in 1675, and was solemnly professed.

After his profession he asked to be assigned to the mission in Japan, but was told that his mission was to be Naples. He was appointed regular preacher at the church of the Gesù Nuovo and began a lifetime of preaching to the Neapolitans and the people of the surrounding countryside. Three great interests consumed his life: his Oratorio delle Missioni; the organization of a citywide "family Communion" on the third Sunday of each month; and his numerous sermons, often preached outdoors and to those unaccustomed to frequenting churches.

To further his preaching work, he organized an auxiliary whose primary purpose was to support the missionaries. The organization, which he called Oratorio delle Missioni, was made up of ordinary workmen whom he himself enlisted. At first they aimed only at material aid for the missions; they raised money, prepared altars, vestments, etc., and arranged for the sermons. But before long the members entered into the spirit of the apostolate and rivaled one another in enrolling an audience for the sermons. Francesco formed the auxiliary into a sort of cooperative that gave financial assistance to its sick members and also provided funeral expenses.

The absorbing interest of his life was his preaching. His sermons were always well planned, short, and energetic. He scorned no means that would help his hearers; for example, he might hold a skull aloft for them to look at, or he might bare his shoulders and apply the discipline. Every Sunday he preached in the city several times. On Tuesdays, unfailingly he preached on Our Lady in the church of S. Maria. Other days he preached generally in towns outside the city, and some days it is recorded that he preached as many as 40 times. This seems less an exaggeration when it is realized that it was his custom to preach wherever he could find listeners. He went where he would find sinners to convert. If a section of the city developed a bad reputation, he went there and preached. He preached on street corners, in dark alleys, in the public squares, on the city docks, on the decks of prison ships in the harbor. The Jesuit archives contain the voluminous outlines of his sermons, each minutely developed, and in view of his tireless zeal their estimated number of 10,000 does not seem too large.

Francesco became interested in social agencies to aid in the permanent reclamation of his many converts. Two refuges for reformed women are credited to him in Naples, as well as an asylum for deserted children. Nothing was beyond his interest, and he formed charitable groups to prepare for his own work among the convicts and even among the slaves on the Turkish ships that put into the Bay of Naples.

Francesco published nothing, apart from a record of outstanding events in his preaching career, which he wrote at the behest of his superiors (cf. Boero, 67–181).

His obsequies were said to surpass the homage that Naples gave its kings, but the Neapolitan rulers never had the hold over the hearts of their subjects this apostle still has. He was canonized in 1839. His body lies in his native Taranto, but he is one of the patron saints of the city of Naples.

FRANCIS OF OSUNA

Franciscan priest whose writings greatly influenced St. Teresa; b. Osuna, Sevilla province, Spain, c. 1497; d. 1542 (place unknown). Although he was born of parents attached to a noble household, little is known of Osuna's early life. As a young friar he was sent to the University of Salamanca where, without neglecting his studies, he devoted considerable time to prayer and contemplation. He spent the years 1527 to 1531 mostly in Seville. Later he was chosen to represent his Order at chapters in Toulouse (1532) and Paris (1533). Afterwards he spent some time in Flanders, but the cold, damp climate affected his always delicate health. At some time between 1530 and 1535, his Order elected him Franciscan commissary general to the Indies, an office he never exercised, either because of ill health or because he felt his vocation lay in writing. From Flanders he returned to Spain. The circumstances of his death are unknown.

Osuna is known chiefly for his Abecedario Espiritual (Spiritual Alphabet), 1527, which so greatly influenced St. Teresa. The work is in six parts, treating respectively of the Passion, asceticism, prayer and the contemplative life, love, poverty and riches, and of Christ's wounds.

FRANCIS OF PAOLA, ST.

Founder of the MINIMS; b. Paola, province of Cosenza, Calabria, Italy, March 27, 1416; d. Tours, France, April 2, 1507. He was the second son of Giacomo d'Alessio and his wife, Vienna da Fuscaldo. When 12 he spent a year at the Franciscan friary of San Marco and then accompanied his parents on a pilgrimage to Rome and Assisi. With their permission, he then sought a secluded region at Paola to live as a hermit. He later moved to a remote cave by the sea but was discovered by some hunters who spread the fame of his virtues. Although he would frequently return to his grotto, he believed that God now wished him to dedicate himself to an apostolic life. At 19 he received his first followers, thus laying the foundations of his order. Francis became the defender of the poor and oppressed and did not fear to plead their cause before Ferrante I of Aragon and Louis XI of France. His last 25 years were spent in France, where he was called by Louis XI, then near death. Though unwilling at first to leave Italy, at the insistence of SIXTUS IV he left for Paris and prepared the king for a happy death. At the court of the Valois he was instrumental in restoring peace between France and Brittany by advising the marriage of the Dauphin, Charles, to Anne of Brittany, and between France and Spain by counseling Louis XI to return the counties of Rousillon and Cerdagne to Spain. While at court he became the tutor of the future Charles VIII. His miracles were numerous, and because many were connected with the sea, he was declared patron of seafarers by PIUS XII on March 27, 1943. He was canonized on 1 May 1519, by LEO X, and has enjoyed particular veneration in Latin countries, where he is honored by the devotion of the "Thirteen Fridays." His iconography is rich with illustrious names as Bartolomé Murillo, Diego Velázguez, Francisco Goya, Giovanni B. Tiepolo, Giovanni B. Piazzetta, Giulio Romano, and others. He appears in the Torquemada of Victor Hugo, and is the subject of a sonata by Franz Liszt, St. Francis of Paola Walking on the Waters. Francis' letters are preserved in a collection edited by F. Preste, Centuria di lettere di S. Francesco di Paola (Rome 1665).

FRANCISCAN FRIARS OF THE ATONEMENT

(SA, Official Catholic Directory #0530); officially known as the Society of the Atonement (Societas Adunationis, TOR), and popularly known as Graymoor or Atonement friars; a branch of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Assisi, founded in 1898 by Lewis Thomas WATTSON (Father Paul, SA). The Atonement friars are comprised of priests and brothers who are engaged in social, ecumenical, and pastoral ministries in the United States, Canada, England, Italy, and Japan.

Foundation. Wattson, who, as an Episcopalian clergyman, held pastorates in Kingston, New York, and Omaha, Nebraska, wished to begin "a preaching order like the Paulists," based on the ideas of St. Francis, especially in the observance of religious poverty. On July 9, 1893, while reading from St. Paul, he found the word "atonement" and chose it as the name for his proposed community. Several years later he met Lurana Mary White (1870–1935), who, as Mother Lurana, SA, subsequently founded the FRANCISCAN SISTERS of the Atonement. On Oct. 7, 1898, they pledged themselves to God to establish the Society of the Atonement. The foundation was made that December when Mother Lurana went to Graymoor. Father Paul arrived the following October and spent the first winter in an abandoned paint shack. In 1900 the first small building was erected on the friars' property, the Mount of the Atonement. For the next several years the two communities struggled to survive against the threats posed by paucity of numbers, poverty, and the ostracism by their fellow Anglicans.

On Oct. 30, 1909, in the sisters' chapel at Graymoor, Father Paul, Mother Lurana, and 15 followers were received into the Catholic Church. Permission for this singular event was granted by Pius X through the apostolic delegate to the United States, Diomede Falconi, OFM. Shortly after, the group was received into the Franciscan order. Father Paul was ordained on July 16, 1910, at St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, New York, by Abp. John Farley of New York. During the next 30 years, Father Paul's efforts were expended for the Church, for Graymoor, and for Christian unity.

In 1951 the friars received their decretum laudis from the Holy See; the decree of final approbation was granted in 1960. The constitutions agree substantially with those of the Friars Minor, with whom the Graymoor friars have a decree of aggregation (1932). The priests and clerics recite the Divine Office in choir each day. All members wear the grayish-brown habit fastened at the waist by a cord to which is attached the Franciscan rosary of the Joys of Our Lady; and a crucifix is worn about the neck. The motto of the community is "All for Christ and the Salvation of Men."

Chair of Unity Octave. In 1908 Father Paul instituted the Chair of Unity Octave, a prayer crusade for religious unity from January 18 to 25. Pius X approved the practice in 1909; in 1916 Benedict XV extended it to the universal Church. Pius XII, in a letter (Nov. 1, 1957) urged the octave's observance to be spread as widely as possible. In 1959 John XXIII recommended it to all the faithful. The U.S. hierarchy in 1921 agreed to observe the octave in each diocese; this resolution was renewed in 1957 at the annual bishops' meeting in Washington, D.C.

Other Activities. Graymoor friars direct St. Christopher's Inn at Graymoor (opened in 1909), a hospice for homeless and jobless men. They are engaged in domestic and overseas missionary work, parish administration, chaplaincies, pastoral outreach, campus ministries, retreats, and spiritual direction. Many friars work with the homeless, HIV/AIDS patients, people seeking recovery from alcoholism and substance abuse. From 1903 to 1973, the society published the Lamp, a monthly periodical devoted to Christian unity and the missions. Between the years 1935 and 1969, the Atonement friars produced the Ave Maria Hour, a transcribed radio program on the lives of saints.

In 1949 the Atonement friars established their first overseas mission in the diocese of Yokohoma, Japan. This was followed by the establishment of a community in Rome and England. At the start of the 21st century, the friars operate parishes in the United States, Canada, and England; they have communities in the United States, Canada, England, Japan, and Italy. The motherhouse is in Graymoor, Garrison, New York.

FRANCISCAN MARTYRS OF GEORGIA

The title refers to five Friars Minor—Pedro de Corpa, Blas Rodríguez, Miguel de Añon, Antonio de Badajóz, and Francisco de Veráscola—who were slain in 1597 in the territory of the present-day Diocese of Savannah. Though the territory was then called La Florida, to distinguish these missionaries from others martyred in territory that is now part of the state of Florida, the term "of Georgia" is used to identify them.

These five Spanish missionaries-four priests and one lay brother-were laboring in the region then known as Guale. The event that occasioned their slaving was the polygamous infidelity of Juanillo, the son of a Guale cacique. A baptized Christian sacramentally married, Juanillo had openly taken a second wife. Called to task by the missionary in Tolomato, the headstrong young man took offense at the correction. Fearing that he would be impeded in succeeding to the position of cacique of the tribe, he organized a revolt against the authority of the missionaries. He rounded up a group of nonbaptized natives, who, under cover of night, came to Tolomato. On the morning of Sept. 14, 1597, Juanillo and his followers invaded the house where Fray Pedro was preparing for the celebration of Sunday mass for his flock. Without further ado, he slew the priest with blows of a stone-hatchet.

The following day the rampant natives moved on to the nearby settlement of Tupiquí, where they found Fray Blas preparing to offer mass with his people. The invaders allowed him to celebrate mass, after which he spoke words of farewell and exhortation to the faithful who had gathered. Though the friar sought to persuade the rebels to desist from their bloody intention, they refused to abandon their plan, beyond postponing action for two days. They then bashed his head with clubs and threw his body to the vultures. Crossing the channel, the rebels came to St. Catherines Island (then called Guale). They had previously sent word to the cacique of the island to slay Fray Miguel and the lay brother Fray Antonio, the two friars missioned there. Hoping to save them, however, the cacique planned to send them to another island, where he knew that the faithful natives would give them safe haven. The warning did not arrive in time to save them from the rebels. The priest offered a last mass and gave viaticum to his assistant. The rebels slew both Fray Miguel and Fray Antonio with blows from a tomahawk.

The slaying of the fifth victim, Fray Francisco, took place on a date not explicitly indicated in the sources. For some days he had been absent from his mission on Asao (now St. Simons Island) when the revolt broke out and his brethren had been slain. Pressured by the rebels, the natives on the island, who had not embraced the Gospel in any great number, were persuaded to join the revolt. When within a few days the friar arrived back at his post, a group of young braves who had formerly been his friends overpowered him as he pulled into the land. On the shore of the island they clubbed him to death. Thus within the period of one week all five missionary friars working in Guale were put to death.

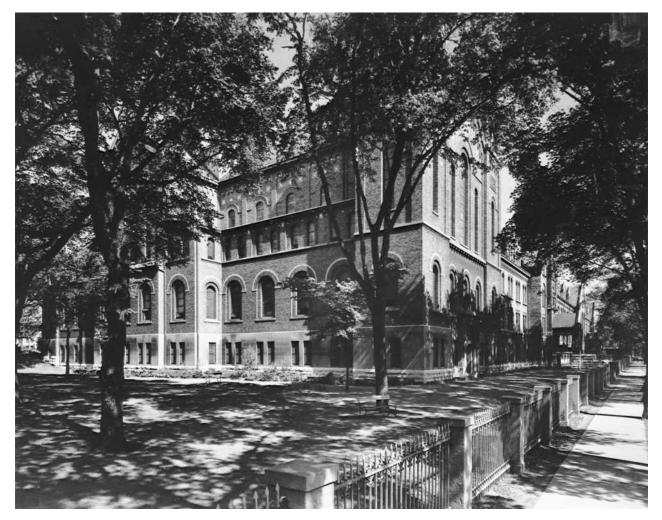

From the time of their martyrdom there was a constant recognition that their death was a witness to Gospel values. Their cause for canonization was formally opened in the Diocese of Savannah in 1983, and ten years later forwarded to the Congregation for the Causes of Saints in Rome for consideration.

FRANCISCAN SISTERS

This entry reports on the congregations of religious women that look to St. Francis of Assisi for inspiration. Most follow the Third Order Regular Rule of St. Francis. For the historical development of the rule, see FRANCIS-CANS, THIRD ORDER REGULAR. Some have papal approbation; others are established with episcopal approval in a particular diocese. The members of these communities profess simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Each congregation is governed by constitutions designed according to its own specialized mission and particular ministries. In most cases the inventory that follows gives the official title of the congregation, the acronym each uses, and a number in brackets that refers to its listing in the Official Catholic Directory, where the location of its headquarters, and current statistics can be found.

St. Joseph's Convent, motherhouse of the Franciscan School Sisters of Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Many of these congregations are members of the Franciscan Federation Third Order Regular of the Sisters and Brothers of the United States, an organization comprised of male and female religious in the United States, Canada, and the Caribbean who follow the Third Order Regular Rule of St. Francis. The mission of the Federation is to promote exploration and study of Franciscan evangelical life and its implications for contemporary society. The Federation provides national and regional opportunities to collaborate, gather, and celebrate so that the brothers and sisters can better live the Third Order Regular call to conversion, contemplation, poverty and humility.

In 1991 the members restructured the Federation into six geographic regions. The goal of regionalization and regional steering committee is to provide service to the members of the Federation and to increase grassroots participation and networking among the members.

Bernardine Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis (OSF) [1810]. A congregation founded in Cracow, Poland, in 1457, when St. JOHN CAPISTRAN established the reformed branch of the Friars Minor in that city. A group of tertiaries, ladies of the Cracovian nobility, desiring to lead a life in common like that of the daughters of Bl. ANGELINA OF MARSCIANO in Italy, formed an active community of the Third Order of St. Francis. Because these Franciscan sisters attended liturgy in a church dedicated to the then recently canonized St. Bernardine of Siena, they became known as the Bernardines. St. Agnes, the first convent of the Bernardine Sisters, was erected in Cracow in 1457; from it a new foundation, that of St. Joseph, was established in the same city in 1646; St. Joseph Convent gave rise to the Sacred Heart Convent, which was founded at Zakliczyn-onthe-Danube in 1883. From there, the Bernardine sisters came to the United States in 1894.

During the first decades of its existence, the community was engaged in caring for the aged, nursing the sick, and instructing the poor. In time, however, the Bernardines became strictly contemplative; although they remain such in Poland, they engage in active work in the United States. The first American house of the congregation was opened at Mt. Carmel, Pennsylvania, in 1894. Thaddeus Jachimowicz, pastor of St. Joseph's parish, petitioned the Zakliczyn convent for sisters to educate the children of the parish. Mother Jadwiga Jurkiewicz obtained a dispensation from the cloister for the sisters who were appointed to this apostolate and sent three sisters, under the direction of Mother Veronica Grzedowska, to Mt. Carmel. In the course of a year circumstances forced the sisters to move to Reading, Pennsylvania, where they received a gift of ten acres of land from Msgr. George Bornemann that became the site for their permanent home. In 1901 the novitiate was established; in 1912 the first general chapter was held in which Mother Hedwig Leszczynska was elected the first general superior. Until 1918 the community remained under the jurisdiction of the Reformed Friars Minor in Poland. Because of disrupted communications with Europe caused by World War I, the congregation became diocesan in 1918. That year it received provisional approbation of its constitutions, and on May 6, 1941, the Holy See gave final approval to the constitutions, and the community returned to its former status of a pontifical congregation.

Originally engaged in elementary grade teaching and care of orphans, the community gradually extended its activities. Teaching, the major interest of the sisters, was expanded to include kindergarten through college, and to this was added social work, hospital care, nursery care, and retreats for women. The sisters progressively spread their apostolate to foreign lands. In 1937 Mother Angela Wojtkowiak established a convent at Dom Feliciano, Brazil, by amalgamating into the American community a group of ten European Bernardines who had migrated from Cracow to Brazil in 1926, but found conditions for expansion and growth too difficult without outside help. In 1957 the community extended its apostolate to Africa, when the superior general, Mother Mary Chrysostom Yadusky, opened a house in Cape Palmas, Liberia. Geographically the community is divided into four provinces: Sacred Heart, Reading, Pa.; Holy Name of Mary, Stamford, Conn.; Holy Rosary, Farmington, Mich.; and Immaculate Conception, Porto Alegre, Brazil. The general motherhouse and central novitiate are located at Villanova, Pa.

[R. JAMESON]

Congregation of the Servants of the Holy Child Jesus of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis (OSF) [1980]. An international Franciscan community founded in 1855 by Antonie Werr to minister to the needs of women who were neglected by society; in particular, prisoners, prostitutes and the destitute poor. The sisters first came to the United States in 1929 and established their first foundation at Staten Island, New York. Their principal ministries are in social work, health care and teaching.

[A. COOPER]

Congregation of the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis of Perpetual Adoration (FSPA) [1780]. This congregation, also known as the Franciscan Sisters of Perpetual Adoration, is a papally approved apostolic congregation founded in 1849. A group of six women and men, their pastor, Father Anton Keppeler, and his assistant, Father Mathias Steiger, all members of the Third Order of St. Francis, emigrated from their parish in Ettenbeuren, Bavaria, to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, to be of service to the Church among German immigrants. The women, Ottilie Dirr, Anna Ritter, Maria Saumweber, Theresia Moser, Maria Eisenschmid, and Creszentia Eberle, formed a religious community under the direction of Anton Keppeler, with Ottilie, (Mother Aemiliana), as Superior. Keppeler and Steiger died of cholera in 1851.

In 1860 the founders, overwhelmed with the domestic duties they had assumed at St. Francis Seminary (1856) adjacent to their property, left the small community. With the election of Sister Antonia Herb as superior and the support of Reverend Michael Heiss, rector of the seminary, the sisters again focused their efforts on the original purposes of the founders. They transferred the motherhouse to Jefferson, Wisconsin, (1864); then to La Crosse (1871), where Heiss had become bishop. At St. Rose Convent, the motherhouse, the sisters intensified their preparation to teach children in elementary and secondary parish schools. Their work at the seminary terminated when some 30 sisters stationed at or near the seminary severed connections with the La Crosse motherhouse and established an independent congregation.

The early ministries in educating immigrant children, caring for orphans, ministering to the sick, and spreading the Gospel among the Native Americans were later extended to African Americans in the South, the poor in Appalachia, and to the people of China, El Salvador, Guam, Zimbabwe, and Cameroon. The sisters today are focusing energy on the ever-evolving ministry of accompanying people on their spiritual journeys. They also sponsor a healthcare system, Viterbo University, four spirituality centers and a center for holistic living.

Through their social justice ministries, the Sisters try to serve as agents of change both in individual lives and in society. They also provide diverse educational programs, resources and direct ministry to the disadvantaged around the globe. The mission of the congregation is also expressed in partnerships with others seeking Franciscan values and goals without formal membership.

[R. HOPHAN/M. LANG/G. MCDONALD]

Congregation of the Third Order of St. Francis of Mary Immaculate (OSF) [1710]. Mother Alfred Moes and Father Pamfilo da Magliano established this first Franciscan Sisterhood in Illinois on Aug. 2, 1865. Papal Approbation was first received in 1909, with the most recent renewal in 1985. The strong Franciscan tradition imparted by Father Pamfilo and the charism experienced by Mother Alfred remain vital in the Joliet Sisters and their Associates. With a heritage of simplicity, versatility, and ingenuity in responding to the needs of God's people, the Congregation has ministered in most of the United States of America, with extensions in Central Brazil since 1963. Sisters have been engaged in a variety of ministries, including education (early childhood, special, primary, secondary, higher, and religious), pastoral ministry, administration, social work, child care, care of the sick and elderly, and ministry to the incarcerated.

[M. VOELKER]

Franciscan Handmaids of the Most Pure Heart of Mary (FHM) [1260]. A diocesan congregation originally called Franciscan Handmaids of Mary and founded in Savannah, Ga., in 1916, by Mother Theodore and Rev. Ignatius Lissner of the Society of the African Missions. Their purpose was to meet the challenge of proposed state legislation requiring that African-American children be educated only by members of their own race. The new community began its work in St. Anthony's school, Savannah. Scarcity of vocations and the timely invitation of Cardinal Patrick Hayes to staff a nursery prompted a small band of sisters to move to New York City in 1924 and establish their provincial house. The sisters minister in education, pastoral care, and social work.

[M. C. ALEXANDER]

Franciscan Hospitaller Sisters of the Immaculate Conception (FHIC) [1270]. A congregation of papal approbation founded in Lisbon in 1871 by Mother Maria Clara of the Child Jesus and Rev. Raimundo dos Anjos Beirao. The congregation sought to address the needs of the poor and abandoned. The sisters established foundation in Angola, Brazil, Spain, South Africa, the Philippines, Mexico and the United States (1960). The sisters minister in schools and hospitals, as well as other ministries devoted to meeting the needs of the poor and disenfranchised.

[R. RODDY]

Franciscan Missionaries of Mary (FMM) [1370]. A congregation with papal approbation (1896, 1984), founded in 1877 in Ootacamund, Madras, India, by Hélène de CHAPPOTIN DE NEUVILLE (Mother Mary of the Passion). The generalate of this congregation, established specifically for work in the foreign missions, has been in Rome since 1882, when the community was joined to the Franciscan Order. The sisters minister in 77 countries and 70 nationalities divided into 55 provinces. In the United States, where the sisters established themselves in 1903, the provincial house is in the Bronx, New York.

The sisters combine contemplative and active life and follow the rule of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis. Mother Marie Hermine de Jésus (Irma Grivot) and six companions were martyred during the Boxer Rebellion in China in 1900. They were beatified in 1946 and canonized on Oct. 1, 2000. Another China missionary, 26-year-old Maria Assunta PALLOTTA, was beatified in 1954. The foundress, Mother Marie of the Passion, was declared Venerable in June, 1999. The sisters serve in education, social service, medicine, nursing, and catechetics. In the United States they sponsor Franciscan Children's Hospital and Rehabilitation Center, Brighton, Massachusetts, and St. Francis Hospital, noted for openheart surgery, in Roslyn, New York.

[M. MOTTE]

Franciscan Missionaries of Our Lady (OSF) [1380]. A community that originated in 1854 in Calais, France, through the amalgamation of seven autonomous congregations. In November of 1866 the constitutions were submitted to the Holy See. In the spirit of the Franciscan rule, the sisters devote themselves to teaching and to the care of the sick and aged. After the union of 1854 the congregation spread rapidly throughout Europe and elsewhere. By 1964 there were houses in Europe, England, Ireland, Scotland, North and South America, and in the mission fields of Ethiopia, Madagascar, and Mozambique. There were six novitiates, located in France, Portugal, Scotland, Argentina, the United States, and Ethiopia. The sisters arrived in the United States in 1911 and ministered in health care. The first foundation in the United States was established in Monroe, Louisiana. In 1966 the provincial house of the North American Province was established in Baton Rouge, Louisiana.

[R. BOYLE]

Franciscan Missionaries of St. Joseph (SMSJ) [1410]. A congregation with papal approbation (1939), founded by Cardinal Herbert VAUGHAN and Alice (Mother Mary Francis) Inghan, (d. 1890) at St. Joseph's College, Mill Hill, London, England, on Sept. 8, 1883. The sisters, popularly known as Mill Hill Sisters, have as their special purposes the domestic management of ecclesiastical colleges, teaching and medical work in the missions, and various branches of child care.

[M. T. SHARRATT]

Franciscan Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Sorrows (OSF) [1390]. A congregation founded in China in 1939 by Bishop Raphael Angelo Palazzi, OFM. The congregation adopted its current name in 1948. In 1959, due to the threat of suppression by the Communists, Bishop Palazzi moved the sisters to Hong Kong. In 1952, under the leadership of Mother Mary Leola, the congregation moved from Hong Kong (Macao) to the United States, where it eventually established a provincial house in Beaverton, Oregon. In the United States the sisters ministered in education, retreats, and social work. In 1969 the sisters opened a mission in Taiwan. The sisters minister in retreat houses, pastoral ministry, and the missions, in Oregon, California, British Columbia, Taipei (Taiwan) and Shatin (Hong Kong).

[A. WARREN]

Franciscan Missionary Sisters of the Divine Child (FMDS) [1340]. A diocesan congregation founded on August 15, 1927, by William Turner, Bishop of Buffalo, N.Y. (1919–36). The chief purpose of the congregation is to proclaim the Gospel message through education, pastoral ministry, and spiritual guidance. The motherhouse is located in Williamsville, New York. On Dec. 4, 1957, Robert E. Lucey, archbishop of San Antonio, granted permission to organize a group of lay assistants known as the Daughters of St. Francis. Franciscan Missionary Sisters of the Immaculate Conception (OSF) [1350]. A pontifical congregation, founded in Mexico City in 1874 by Father Refugio Morales, OFM, and Dolores Vásquez (Sister Maria de la Cruz de Cristo Crucificado). Because of the religious persecution in Mexico, houses were set up in the United States in 1926 and in Central America in 1928. Worldwide the congregation is known as Hermanas Franciscanas de la Inmaculada Concepcion.

The Congregation is organized into five provinces: two in Mexico, two in Central America, and one in the United States. In 1980 the sisters opened two mission houses in Peru, South America, and in the following years it extended itself into Spain, Portugal, Rome, and Africa. In the United States province, the sisters serve in schools, hospitals, parish pastoral ministry, two homes for the aged, and a retreat house.

Franciscan Missionary Sisters of the Infant Jesus (FMIJ) [1360]. A congregation of pontifical right founded by Barbara (Sister Mary Joseph of the Infant Jesus) Micarelli on Dec. 25, 1879 in Aquila, Italy. The sisters ministered to the poor, the orphaned, and abandoned. After a wide expansion in Italy the sisters came to Latin America (Boliva and Peru) in the early part of the 20th century. They were established in the United States in 1961 at the invitation of Bishop Celestine Damiano, of Camden, New Jersey. Their ministry is primarily in pastoral care, evangelization, education, and health care. In the United States they serve in the dioceses of Camden and Trenton in New Jersey and Arlington in Virginia. The congregation also has foundations in the Philippines, Belgium, Germany, Albania, and Cameroon.

[R. RODDY]

Franciscan Sisters, Daughters of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary (OSF) [1240]. A congregation with papal approbation, founded in 1860 by Mother Maria Clara Pfaender in Salzkotten, Germany. The sisters are engaged in educational, nursing, pastoral and social services, and spiritual renewal in Germany, France, Holland, Indonesia, Brazil, Nigeria, Malawi, Rumania, and the United States. The ministry of the sisters has varied according to the needs of time and place. In Europe through the years they have undertaken nursing in hospitals, in homes, and even on the battlefields. They have also served in various phases of teaching and the sheltering of the aged and orphans.

The U.S. province—with headquarters in Wheaton, Illinois, since 1947—dates from 1872, when Rev. E. A. Schindel of St. Louis, Missouri, sought to establish a hospital in St. Louis. His request came when the stringent laws of the Kulturkampf made a U.S. foundation desirable for the welfare of the larger congregation. In 1875 five more sisters bound for the United States mission drowned when the German steamer Deutschland ran aground in a storm off the coast of England. The faith and heroism of these sisters during the crisis are immortalized in the poem "The Wreck of the Deutschland," by Gerard Manley HOPKINS.

The work of the community in the United States extended to the states of Missouri, Iowa, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Colorado. The generalate of the congregation is located in Rome.

Franciscan Sisters of Allegany (OSF) [1180]. At the request of John Timon, CM, first bishop of the Diocese of Buffalo, N.Y., four friars were commissioned to serve in the diocese by the Minister General of the Order of Friars Minor. In 1855 the four friars arrived in Ellicott-ville, N.Y., accompanied by Nicholas Devereaux, their benefactor.

The friars' missionary duties expanded to many towns and villages, prompting Bishop Timon to invite Father Pamfilo da Magliano, OSF, superior of the little band of missionaries, to seek the aid of the Sisters of the Third Order.

On April 25, 1859, Father Pamfilo founded the Franciscan Sisters of Allegany. On that date he received Mary Jane Todd, a Franciscan Tertiary, as the first novice and gave her the religious name Sister Mary Joseph. The ceremony took place in the Chapel of St. Bonaventure College and Seminary, Allegany, N.Y.

Mary Anne O'Neil (Sister Mary Theresa), the third novice received by Father Pamfilo, was elected the first general superior. She served in this capacity for 52 years though not consecutively. Mother Teresa established some 38 foundations in education and health care ministries. She is considered the co-foundress of the congregation. With the assistance of Diomede Cardinal Falconio, OFM, Mother Teresa received final approbation of the congregation by Pope St. Pius X in 1913.

The Allegany Sisters are the first congregation of women religious founded in the United States to go to the foreign missions. In 1879 two sisters went to the British West Indies (Jamaica); in 1946 and 1965 the sisters went to Brazil and Bolivia respectively. By the late 1990s, the sisters were co-foundresses of native Franciscan congregations in Brazil and Bolivia.

Franciscan Sisters of Baltimore (OSF) [1200]. The Franciscan Sisters of Baltimore (also known as the Franciscan Sisters of Mill Hill), had their origin in 1868 when five sisters of the Church of England, under the leadership of Mary Basil, were received into the Catholic Church by Reverend (later Cardinal) Herbert Vaughan of Westminster. As members of the Society of St. Margaret, they had been working for the poor in the slums of East London, England. In the year of their reception as Franciscans in 1870, they resumed this same activity. Three years later they established a motherhouse at Mill Hill, London, with Mary Basil (Mother Mary Francis) as superior. Obtaining papal approval in 1880, they were known as the Franciscan Sisters of St. Mary, Mill Hill.

At the request of Vaughan and Archbishop James Gibbons (later James Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore), four sisters arrived in the city in 1881. In 1882 they took charge of St. Elizabeth Home and St. Francis Xavier School for African-American children. In 1885, with the help of additional sisters, their educational work was extended to Richmond, Virginia, and in 1889 to Norfolk, Virginia. Until the end of segregation in 1954, the sisters were engaged solely in the African-American apostolate. From the beginning of their apostolate in the United States, the congregation was incorporated under the title of Franciscan Sisters of Baltimore. In 1902 Vaughan again requested the help of sisters to assist the Mill Hill Missionaries in the Vicariate of the Upper Nile in Africa. Leading this venture was Mother Mary Paul Murphy of New York. In 1952 this mission group became a separate community known as the Franciscan Missionary Sisters for Africa.

In 1954 the original congregation transferred the general motherhouse from Mill Hill to Baltimore, and in 1982 the Franciscan Sisters of Baltimore became an independent papal congregation. The sisters are presently engaged in a variety of ministries: education, social service, catechesis, pastoral ministry, and retreat work.

[S. J. KENNET-DAWSON]

Franciscan Sisters of Chicago (OSF) [1210]. A congregation with papal approbation (1939) founded Dec. 8, 1894, in Chicago, Illinois. The foundress, Josephine Dudzik (Mother Mary Theresa, 1860-1918) was a Franciscan tertiary and a prefect of the 3,000-member St. Stanislaus Kostka Rosary Sodality Society in Chicago. She dedicated herself to alleviating the misery of the poor and the aged whom she observed through the windows of her workshop while engaged in professional tailoring. Her plan to organize her tertiary companions who were willing to join her in a common life of prayer and work was confided to her friend, the superior of the parish tertiaries, Rose Wisinska (1850-1917), who later became co-foundress as Mother Mary Anna. At a meeting of the Third Order members on Oct. 1, 1893, the plan was presented and the group of women gathered in November of 1894. Guided by her pastor and spiritual director, Father Vincent Barzynski, CR (1838–99), Josephine promised never to abandon this congregation. Despite many hardships, she persevered in organizing the new religious family and was successful in inspiring her followers with her ideals of charity and self-sacrifice. Mother Mary Theresa Dudzik was named Venerable in 1994.

The Sisters continue to minister in education, healthcare, pastoral and social service and sponsor eldercare facilities and services in the Archdiocese of Chicago, Ill.; Cleveland, Ohio; Joliet, Ill.; Lafayette, Ind., and Louisville, Ky.

Franciscan Sisters of Christian Charity (OSF) [1230]. A Congregation founded in 1869 by Theresa Gramlich, Rosa Wahl, and three companions in Manitowoc, Wisconsin, under the guidance of Rev. Joseph Fessler, to meet the catechetical and educational needs of the area. Within a few years the ministry of the sisters included health care. Primary concerns for the religious and professional formation of its members led the Congregation to establish Holy Family Academy and Normal School at the Motherhouse, Holy Family Convent. Manitowoc, in 1885. This school was the forerunner of Holy Family College, now Silver Lake College, a four-year, co-educational, liberal arts and professional college, founded in 1935, and sponsored by the congregation.

In the mid-1930s the Sisters began missionary work in the southwestern part of the United States, where they accepted eight schools on Native American reservations in Arizona. In 1964 they accepted a foreign mission in Lima, Peru. Since the 1960s, the Congregation, in addition to its educational and health care ministries, has responded to the growing needs of the Church by extending its services to include hospital pastoral ministry, various forms of parish ministry, service to African Americans, Latinos, immigrant peoples, and to the poor and needy. Members serve in numerous dioceses and archdioceses throughout the United States and in Lima, Peru.

Franciscan Sisters of Mary (FSM) [1415]. The Franciscan Sisters of Mary came into being in 1987 with the reuniting of the Sisters of St. Mary (SSM), St. Louis, Mo., and the Sisters of St. Francis (OSF), Maryville, Mo. Both congregations had a common founding in 1872 by Mary Odilia Berger. This first congregation was known as the Sisters of St. Mary. In 1894, seven SSM, guided by Mary Augustine Giesen, formed a new religious congregation known as the Sisters of St. Francis of Maryville, Missouri. In 1987, after many years of prayerful study, the two congregations reunited. The ministry of the congregation embraces varied expressions of compassion and healing, including health care, pastoral services, homeless teens with children, birth center and hospitality to women. From the foundation center in St. Louis, Missouri, the sisters serve in the United States and Brazil.

[J. MOTZEL]

Franciscan Sisters of Mary Immaculate (FMI) [1500]. A congregation with papal approbation (1933). Although the sisters established their motherhouse in Colombia in 1893, the community had begun in Ecuador in 1888, when seven sisters from Switzerland, led by Mother Caritas Brader (1860-1943), went there to engage in teaching. Unfavorable political conditions forced them to move to Colombia. The congregation subsequently established schools and missions in Panama, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Peru, Mexico, Guatamala, El Salvador, Honduras, Cuba, Africa, Romania, and the United States. The sisters are engaged in teaching, nursing, catechetics, domestic work, and the staffing of charitable institutions. In 1932 they were invited to Amarillo, Texas, by Bishop Rudolph A. Gerken (1927–1943). The United States headquarters and novitiate are located in Amarillo, Texas. The sisters are represented in the Dioceses of Amarillo, Tex., and in the archdioceses of Santa Fe and Los Angeles. Mother Caritas Brader was declared venerable in 1999.

[M. N. ROONEY]

Franciscan Sisters of Oldenburg (OSF) [1720]. On Jan. 6, 1851, a Franciscan religious from Vienna, Austria, Sister Theresa Hackelmeier, joined Father Joseph Rudolph, pastor at Oldenburg, Ind., to help him begin a school for the children of his German immigrant parishioners. Three postulants awaited her arrival. A log cabin convent, a school for girls, and a home for orphans were built.

Despite a devastating fire in 1857, the congregation grew and staffed numerous elementary schools in southern Indiana. The first school outside Indiana opened in St. Louis, Mo., in 1859. Expansion followed in Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, and Kansas. In 1892 the sisters took up the education of African-American children, first in Indianapolis, Ind., and later, in 1911, in Kansas City, Mo. The sisters began work with the Spanish-speaking people of New Mexico in 1918. In answer to an appeal from the Jesuits in Montana, the Congregation accepted two missions on the Crow Indian Reservation in 1934. Five years later, six sisters began a mission in Wuchang, China. In 1960 the sisters accepted missions in Papua New Guinea.

Currently, the sisters are engaged in a variety of ministries, mainly in education and catechesis, as well as pastoral ministry to the poor and marginalized.

[F. KENNEDY]

Franciscan Sisters of Our Lady of Lourdes (OSF) [1710]. A congregation with papal approbation, founded in 1877 by Maria Catherine (Mother Alfred) Moes (1828–1899) and her sister, Catherine (Sister Barbara) Moes. They came to the United States from Remich, Luxembourg, intending to teach and first resided with the School Sisters of Notre Dame in Milwaukee, Wis. In 1856 they entered the Marianite Sisters of the Holy Cross at Notre Dame, Indiana.

When differences arose between the European and American branches of that community, Mother Alfred and three other sisters petitioned Father Pamfilo da Magliano, OFM, of Allegany, N.Y., to receive them as Franciscans. They adopted the Franciscan habit June 1, 1863, and became known as the Franciscan Sisters of Joliet, Illinois. Two years later they established a Congregation with Mother Alfred as general superior. Shortly after Mother Alfred left office, she responded to an invitation to establish an academy in Minnesota. She succeeded in opening two academies in 1877 in the towns of Owatonna and Rochester, Minn. Bishop Thomas Foley of Chicago (1870–79) expressed concern over the transfer of sisters to Minnesota in a letter to the superior at Joliet on Dec. 23, 1877. He wrote that Mother Alfred could not return to Joliet, and declared that the other sisters would have to choose between Joliet and Rochester. By the end of the month, 24 sisters had decided to join Mother Alfred.

With the approval of Bishop Thomas Grace of St. Paul, Minn., the Franciscan Sisters of the Congregation of Our Lady of Lourdes became a separate foundation in Rochester. The sisters continued classroom and music instruction in the academies and accepted invitations to work in parish schools. In 1894 they opened the Winona Seminary for Young Ladies, an academy for the elementary and secondary education of girls. In 1907, college courses were offered at the seminary; five years later it was chartered as the College of Saint Teresa, which remained in operation until 1989.

Although originally teachers, the sisters also began nursing after a tornado struck Rochester in 1883. In 1889 Saint Mary's Hospital, built by the sisters and staffed by Dr. W. Mayo and his sons, opened. Later additions made it one of the largest privately owned hospitals in the United States. In 1986 Saint Mary's, under the continued sponsorship of the sisters, became part of the Mayo Medical Center.

For many years the sisters also conducted hospitals in Ohio and Colorado and homes for the aged in Minnesota. Responding to the call of Pope John XXIII, in 1962 they began to minister in Latin America, including the founding of a colegio in Bogota, Colombia, where they continue to minister today. Since 1955 the Congregational Center has been at Assisi Heights in Rochester. The sisters serve throughout the United States and in Columbia, South America.

[M. L. REILLY]

Franciscan Sisters of Our Lady of Perpetual Help (OSF) [1430]. A congregation with papal approbation (1939) founded in St. Louis, Mo., on May 29, 1901. The cofounders, Mother M. Solana Leczna (1867–1919), Mother M. Ernestine Matz (1873–1957), and Mother M. Hilaria Matz (1881–1948), were members of the Franciscan Sisters of Joliet, Illinois. At the beginning of the 20th century, the purpose of the new congregation was to meet the needs of immigrants, particularly of Polish descent, settling in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys. The sisters serve in about seventeen states in pastoral care, teaching, health care, youth ministry, and social services.

[M. I. JANOTA/A. P. WILKEN]

Franciscan Sisters of Peace (FSP) [1425]. A diocesan institute (Archdiocese of New York) established in 1986. The founding 112 sisters of this institute had been members of the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart of St. Francis (Peekskill, N.Y.). The sisters trace the roots of their charism to that of their European founders: Gertrude Paul, Constanza Huber and Pellegrina Santelamezza, who founded the Tertiary Franciscans for Apostolic Mission in Gemona, Italy, on Dec. 5, 1865. (The congregation later became known as the Franciscan Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart.) The sisters minister in education, health care, and pastoral ministry in the eastern United States. Their congregational center is located in Haverstraw, N.Y.

[R. RODDY]

Franciscan Sisters of Penance and Charity of Tiffin, Ohio (OSF) [1760]. This congregation was founded as a diocesan community in 1869 by Joseph Bihn, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Tiffin, and by Elizabeth Schaefer, a widow from the same parish. The original purpose of the community was to provide a home for orphans and the elderly following the U.S. Civil War. As the number of sisters gradually increased, the scope of their ministry extended to include teaching, hospital work, care of pilgrims and retreatants, pastoral ministry, and missionary work in the United States and Mexico. The orphanage was phased out in the 1930s but St. Francis Home for the elderly remains a vibrant institution, providing acute care, assisted living, and independent living for the elderly. Papal approbation was requested in 1955 and initial approval was granted by the Holy See in 1962. In their general assembly of 1994 the sisters agreed to focus their concerted efforts on living out the goals of contemplation/action, care of creation, peacemaking, and concern for the poor.

[H. LINDER]

Franciscan Sisters of St. Joseph of Hamburg, New York (FSSJ) [1470]. A congregation with papal approbation founded in 1897 by Mother M. Colette Hilbert (1865–1938) in Trenton, N.J. In 1898 Mother M. Colette established the community's motherhouse and a school near Corpus Christi Church, Buffalo, N.Y. In 1928 the motherhouse was transferred to its present site in Hamburg, N.Y. The congregation engages in education, health care, and social service ministries in several dioceses throughout the United States. The congregation sponsors Immaculata Academy, a high school for young women in Hamburg and Marycrest Manor, a skilled nursing facility in Livonia, Mich., and Hubert College, a four-year college in Hamburg.

[P. TIRONE]

Franciscan Sisters of the Atonement (SA) [1190]. A congregation with papal approbation, commonly known as the Graymoor or Atonement Sisters. The Society of the Atonement, composed of the Friars and Sisters of the Atonement, was founded at Graymoor, Garrison, N.Y., in 1898 by Rev. Paul James WATTSON and Mother Lurana Mary White, both of whom were then members of the Episcopal Church. In 1908, Father Paul inaugurated the Chair of Unity Octave, now called the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity. In October of 1909, the Friars and Sisters were corporately received into the Roman Catholic Church with the permission of Pope Pius X. The Society honors Mary under the title of Our Lady of the Atonement.

The word ATONEMENT indicates the twofold vocation of the Society: through a life of prayer, work, and sacrifice, they seek to atone for sin and to draw all persons to union, "atonement" with God, in the spirit of Christ's prayer, "That all may be one" (Jn 17:21). The congregation is involved in a variety of ministries: ecumenism; religious education and catechetical ministries; social welfare and community development; health care; hospital chaplaincies; pastoral ministry; home visitation; adult social day care; child day care and kindergartens; youth ministry; justice and peace work; and guest and retreat houses. The sisters minister in the United States, Canada, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Brazil, and South Africa.

[M. F. FLANIGAN/A. GRIFFITTS]

Franciscan Sisters of the Poor (SFP) [1440]. A papal congregation begun in Aachen, Germany, on Oct. 3, 1845, by Frances Schervier (1819-1876) for service to the sick and the poor. By 1851 Mother Frances Schervier and 23 companions professed a rule of life based on the Rule of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis. Mother Frances and her companions were noted for their compassionate response to the needs of the time. In 1858 six sisters arrived in Cincinnati, Ohio, at the invitation of Mrs. Sarah Peter, a wealthy widow, to begin the congregation's ministry in health care in the United States. Those pioneer sisters were responsible for building many hospitals, nursing during the U.S. Civil War, and maintaining an orphanage after the war. As time passed, numerous hospitals were established in the Midwest and Eastern parts of the United States. In April 1959, by decree of the Sacred Congregation for Religious, the Congregation of the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis was officially divided into two autonomous religious congregations, each of Pontifical Right. The sisters in the United States and Italy became known as the Franciscan Sisters of the Poor. In 1960 and later in 1978 the Franciscan Sisters of the Poor established ministries in Brazil and Senegal. The sisters' vision of healing and hope continues today through their healing ministry to the sick and the poor.

International leadership is located in Brooklyn, N.Y., with regional leadership based in Cincinnati, Ohio, Rome, Italy, and Goiania, Go, Brazil. Frances Schervier was beatified on April 28, 1974 by Pope Paul VI.

[M. L. SAHM]

Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Heart (OSF) [1450]. A congregation with papal approbation (1898) whose motherhouse is in Frankfort, Ill. This community stems from a congregation founded in Baden, Germany, by Rev. Wilhelm Berger in 1866. Berger, pastor of the village church of Seelbach, began the congregation to serve the poor and the sick in their homes. The first motherhouse, known as Maria Hilf, was established in 1867. Despite the services rendered by the sisters in 18 military hospitals during the Franco-Prussian War, the hostile measures of Bismarck's Kulturkampf forced the community to seek missions outside of Germany. The need for sisters in the United States was brought to the attention of Mother M. Anastasia Bischler, the first superior general (1874–1908), by Rev. Dominic Duehmig, pastor of St. Mary's Church, Avilla, Ind., who at that time was visiting his native Germany.

On May 17, 1876, Mother Anastasia and three companions sailed for the United States and were welcomed to the Diocese of Fort Wayne, Ind., by Bishop Joseph Dwenger (1872-93). Later that year 23 more sisters came to the United States where they eventually formed an independent congregation: the Franciscan Sisters of the Sacred Heart. Their first headquarters was established on a run-down farm in Duehmig's parish in Avilla. The farmhouse was remodeled to accommodate the sisters and to serve elderly persons who were given shelter in what came to be known as the Sacred Heart Home for the Aged. In 1883 the motherhouse and novitiate were transferred to Joliet, Ill.; the novitiate (1953); and the motherhouse (1964) were moved to St. Francis Woods in Frankfort, Ill. The sisters' first educational institution, a public elementary school, was opened in Avilla in 1877. Two more schools followed at Hessen Cassel, Ind. (1878), and Dyer, Ind. (1879). Further foundations, both schools and hospitals, were made in Indiana and Illinois before the end of the 19th century. By 1963 the community had extended its work into California.

[M. A. BRITTON]

Franciscan Sisters of the Sorrowful Mother (SSM) [4100]. A congregation with papal approbation that was founded in Rome, Italy, by Mother Frances of the Cross (Amalia Streitel, 1844-1911), a native of Mellrichstadt, Germany. Having been educated by the Franciscan Sisters of Maria Stern in Augsburg and having experienced religious life in both Franciscan and Carmelite convents, she went to Rome in 1883 at the request of Father Franziskus Maria Jordan to organize a new community of sisters. Both soon discovered that their views concerning the foundation were divergent. The conflict was resolved in 1885 when the cardinal vicar of Rome, Lucido Maria Parocchi (1883–1903), appointed as spiritual director of the small community Rev. Dr. George Jacquemin (d. 1920) and named the new congregation Sisters of the Sorrowful Mother. A rented dwelling close to St. Peter's Basilica became the first motherhouse in Rome. In accord with the instruction and example of their foundress, the sisters practice special devotion to Our Lady under the title of Sorrowful Mother.

From Italy the community spread to Germany, Austria, the West Indies, and the United States, where the first foundation (St. Francis Hospital) was made in 1889 in Wichita, Kansas. The sisters also have missions in Wisconsin, Minnesota, New Jersey, and Oklahoma. The Sisters of the Sorrowful Mother sponsor the Marian Health System and minister as educators, chaplains, social workers, counselors, pastoral associates, and retreat directors. The congregation is divided into two provinces, a European province and a United States-Caribbean province, with its generalate in Rome, Italy. The foundress's cause for beatification is in process.

[D. DIRKX]

Hospital Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis (OSF) [1820]. A congregation with papal approbation, founded in Münster, Germany, in 1844 by Father Christopher Behrensmeyer. The founder had belonged to the Order of Friars Minor until 1811, when his order was dispersed during the Napoleonic conquest. The congregation was founded on July 2, 1844, at the Shrine of Our Lady of Telgte, near Münster. The sisters began their work in the homes of the sick and in hospitals that they established for the physically and mentally ill. At the time of Father Christopher's death on June 2, 1858, there were ten hospitals in Germany and Silesia. Later the sisters extended their apostolate to Poland, Holland, Czechoslovakia, the United States, China, and Japan.

Twenty sisters arrived in New York in 1875. Under the direction of the Bishop of Alton, Ill., they proceeded into various parts of Illinois to carry on their nursing activities. St. John's Hospital, in Springfield, Ill., became the center for the religious and professional training of the sisters. In 1930 the sisters transferred their provincial motherhouse to a site about six miles northeast of Springfield, Ill. Msgr. Joseph Straub, as director of the community, supervised the construction of the new headquarters, which includes St. Francis of Assisi Church and St. Clare of Assisi Adoration Chapel.

At the present time the American province sponsors thirteen hospitals that comprise Hospital Sisters Health System. The sisters of the American province are also represented in Germany, Poland, the Czech Republic, Japan, Korea, and India.

Missionary Franciscan Sisters of the Immaculate Conception (MFIC) [1360]. An apostolic Institute of pontifical right founded in 1873 by Elizabeth (Mother Mary Ignatius) Hayes (1821–94), a convert from Anglicanism. She founded the first mission of the congregation in Belle Prairie, Minn., in 1873 and the second mission five years later in Augusta, Ga. The sisters serve among the poor and marginalized in some eleven countries in social services, education, and catechetical instruction. Provincial houses are located in Newton, Mass.; Montreal, Canada; Brisbane, Australia; and Aitape, Papua New Guinea. Missions currently are in Ireland, England, Egypt, Bolivia, Peru, and Chad.

[G. FOYSTER]

Missionary Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God (SMIC) [2760]. The Missionary Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God were founded in 1910 in Santaém, Párá, Brazil, by Bishop Amando Bablmann, OFM, and Mother Immaculata of Jesus (Elizabeth Tombrock) together with four Brazilian Conceptionist nuns of the Ajuda Monastery in Rio de Janeiro. The new foundation, designated a branch of the Conceptionist Order, was named the Missionary Poor Clares of the Immaculate Conception. The Conceptionist Rule was followed until 1922 when a decree of reorganization was issued by the Holy See. The Rule of the Third Order of St. Francis was adopted in 1925, and in 1929 the order was granted the status of an apostolic congregation of pontifical right and given the name Missionary Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of the Mother of God. The generalate was transferred from Brazil to the United States in 1924.

Initially, the congregation served the people of the Amazon Region of Northern Brazil, mainly through the education of youth. The congregation spread to other areas of Brazil; to Germany (1915); the United States (1922); China (1931); and later to Taiwan (1949); Namibia (1962); and the Philippines (1996). As an international community with a missionary charism, the congregation encourages and promotes collaboration and exchange among the provinces, but mission experiences are sought primarily in the country of origin. The focus of ministry includes rural and urban health care, education at various levels, pastoral care, and social work.

[R. C. GONZALEZ]

Missionary Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis (FMSC) [1400]. A congregation with papal approbation, this community, whose motherhouse is located in Rome and whose work is in education and the missions, was founded in 1860 at Gemona, Italy. Under the guidance of Father Gregorio Fiorvante dalle Grotte di Castro, OFM, the new community was endowed for a time by a French duchess, Laura Leroux, who wished to place her patrimony in the service of some good work.

On Dec. 9, 1865, the sisters began their work in the United States at the request of the Franciscan Friars in New York City. In 1869 they purchased the site of their provincial house and novitiate at Mt. St. Francis in Peekskill, N.Y. There they began an academy for girls, which was transferred in 1900 to Highland Falls, N.Y., and called Ladycliff Academy. Growth of the academy and of Ladycliff College (chartered in 1933) necessitated the erection of a new Ladycliff Academy at Mohegan, N.Y., in 1961.

The sisters spread their teaching apostolate into New Jersey (1871) and Pennsylvania (1874), as well as in New York State. An important phase of their work began in 1879 with the care of neglected children at St. Joseph's Home in Peekskill. In 1949 Cardinal Francis Spellman requested the sisters to assume the care and supervision of the children at Lt. Joseph P. Kennedy, Jr., Home in the Bronx, N.Y. Four sisters from the U.S. province were sent to do mission work among the native Americans of Bolivia in 1960.

The sisters are engaged in ministry in Chile, Peru, Italy, India, Cyprus, Turkey, Congo, Bolivia, France, Lebanon, Bulgaria, the Philippines, the United States, Switzerland, Lithuania, the Czech Republic, Luxembourg, Ecuador, Albania, and the Republic of Central Africa. In 1986, 115 sisters in the American province opted to start a new diocesan community. The remaining sisters carry on works in education, health care, administration, and pastoral ministry.

School Sisters of St. Francis (OSF) [1680]. The School Sisters of St. Francis Congregation was founded April 28, 1874, in New Cassel, Wis., by Mother Alexia Hoell, Mother Alfons Schmid, and Sister Clara Seiter. These sisters left their community in Schwarzach, Germany, to minister to the German immigrants in America. Within the next decade, School Sisters staffed schools across the United States. By 1887 a new motherhouse was built and dedicated in Milwaukee.

The congregation is an international community working in eleven countries worldwide, mainly in the United States. Provinces are also located in Europe, India, and Central America. Sisters are involved in education, pastoral ministry, social services, health care, and the fine arts. In addition to vowed members, the community has an associates program, comprised of men and women who share in the congregation's mission.

[I. DEGER]

School Sisters of St. Francis of Christ the King (OSF) [1520]. An international congregation with papal approbation that traces its roots to the School Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi founded in Graz, Austria, in 1843. After being sent to run an academy for girls in Maribor, Austria, (now Slovenia), circumstances dictated that they form a new congregation, which became independent on Sept. 13, 1869. This congregation later came to be known as the School Sisters of St. Francis of Christ the King. In October of 1909, four sisters arrived in the United States to work among the Slavic immigrants of the Kansas City area. The sisters expanded their ministries to serve as educators, housemothers of an orphanage, housekeepers, musicians, sacristans, cooks, and mentors. These ministries took them to the Chicago archdiocese and the Joliet diocese. In 1926 an 88-acre tract of land was purchased in Lemont, Ill. Mt. Assisi Convent, the provincial center and novitiate, Mt. Assisi Academy, Alvernia Manor, and Our Lady of the Angels House of Prayer are located on this site. Through these and a number of parishes within the archdiocese of Chicago and the Joliet diocese the sisters engage in their principal ministry, education, particularly religious education.

[T. A. QUINCY]

School Sisters of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis (OSF) [1690 Pittsburgh and 1700 Bethlehem]. The School Sisters of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis trace their roots to the community of Mother Frances (Antonia) Lampel in Graz, Austria, in 1843 and continued by Mother Hyacinth (Magdalene) Zahalka in a new foundation in Bohemia in 1888. Originally founded for the education and Christian formation of young women in Austria and Bohemia the sisters soon embraced other ministries as the needs of the Church grew. On Oct. 30, 1911, Mother Hyacinth, accompanied by Sister Georgia Cerney, sailed for America but died in Pittsburgh on March 10, 1912. The new general superior, Mother Xavier Furgott, came to Pittsburgh in May of 1913 to initiate plans for a future foundation. On Aug. 15, 1913, six sisters arrived in America and began staffing schools in parishes of the diocese of Pittsburgh. In 1946 the community in Pittsburgh received the status of a province.

In 1957, because of increased membership and numerous vocations from the eastern part of Pennsylvania, the province was divided into two provinces: the Pittsburgh Province, serving western Pennsylvania, and the Bethlehem Province, serving eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Massachusetts. Presently, the Pittsburgh Province ministers in western Pennsylvania, Texas, and Arizona. The Bethlehem province serves the eastern United States. Changes and adaptations following Vatican II resulted in the broadening of areas of ministry. The sisters respond to the needs of today's Church through ministries in education, parish social ministry, pastoral ministry, retreat work and spiritual direction, and pastoral care. Today the congregation has provinces in Rome, Czech Republic, Slovak Republic, and the United States (Pittsburgh and Bethlehem, Pennsylvania). Sisters also minister in Chile, South Africa, Aima-Ata, Kazakstan, and Warsaw, Poland. They have a Formation House in Kerala, India.

[F. PARANA]

Sisters of St. Felix of Cantalice. See separate entry under that heading.

Sisters of St. Francis, Clinton, Iowa (OSF) [1540]. Near the end of the Civil War, a young widow named Caroline Cambron Warren visited the Trappist Abbey in Gethsemani, Ky. While there, she was asked by the abbot to conduct a school for poor girls. She agreed and was employed immediately. By the time the school session began in May of 1863, Mrs. Warren had been joined by her niece, Sally Walker. In 1864, Lizzie Lillis joined the other two. The three began to live a communal life of work and prayer. Shortly thereafter, Mrs. Warren was received as a Franciscan tertiary, and on Jan. 21, 1866, all three women became Franciscan tertiaries. After the ceremony, Bishop Lavialle of Louisville, Ky., declared that the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis was established with his approbation. Abbot Benedict Berger was appointed their spiritual director.

Abbot Benedict's first endeavor was to see that the sisters were trained properly. He persuaded Mother Antonia of the Oldenburg Franciscans to set up a separate novitiate for these women, and nine women entered the separate novitiate in Oldenburg, Ind. After completing their studies, the sisters made vows for a year and returned to Gethsemani in 1868. The abbot had built a new motherhouse and school named Mount Olivet, not far from Gethsemani Abbey, but Bishop McCloskey prevailed upon the sisters to move to Shelbyville, Ky. Our Lady of Angels Academy opened there in 1874. The school in Shelbyville was recognized as a superior institution, but there were many academies in the area and the school was located in an area that was very anti-Catholic. The sisters' welfare did not improve, and many times they had to resort to begging just to provide a little food.

In spite of the hardships, women continued to ask admittance, and schools were opened in Fancy Farm, Hardinsburg, Knottsville, Lebanon, Louisville, St. Mary's, and Whitesville, Ky. In 1888 two Jesuit priests gave a mission at Shelbyville and, seeing the destitute situation of the sisters, urged them to apply for acceptance into the diocese of Dubuque, Iowa. On Sept. 21, 1890, the first twelve sisters left for Iowa.

Upon reaching Iowa, some of the sisters went directly to the schools where they were to teach. Those sisters not yet employed were graciously given food and lodging by the Dubuque Franciscan Sisters. On Jan. 6, 1891, the last of the sisters left Dubuque for Anamosa, where the motherhouse was to be established. In 1891, Rev. James Murray, pastor of St. Patrick Parish in Clinton, asked for teachers. In 1893, Father Murray was instrumental in helping the sisters obtain the Chase property in Clinton. The large building on the property became the motherhouse. It was named Mount St. Clare, and Mount St. Clare Academy was opened on the premises. New property was purchased, and a seven-storey building was built in 1910. In 1918, the school was extended to include a junior college, Mount St. Clare College. Hospitals were opened in Grinnell and Burlington, Iowa, and in Macomb, Ill. Schools of nursing were opened in Macomb and Burlington. In 1914 a health-care facility for the elderly was opened in Clinton in the first Mount St. Clare building, then called Mount Alverno Home for the Aged. The sisters staffed parish schools in many Iowa towns as well as in Illinois, Nebraska, Minnesota, Ohio, Missouri, and California. In 1960, the congregation staffed a school and clinic in Freeport, Bahamas. In 1964, four sisters went to staff a school in Chulucanas, Peru. Following the Second Vatican Council, many sisters who had been involved in education and health care turned their attention to social services, peace and justice works, pastoral ministry, campus ministry, early childhood education, AIDS ministry, legal aid to the poor, hospital chaplaincy, prison ministry, and home care for the elderly. In 1988, an associate program was inaugurated, and in 2000 a temporary commitment program was authorized.

[S. MCCARTHY]

Sisters of St. Francis Congregation of Our Lady of Lourdes (OSF) [1530]. Mother Adelaide Sandusky of the Rochester, Minnesota Franciscan Sisters, responded to the invitation of Bishop Joseph Schrembs of Toledo, Ohio, and came with 23 Sisters to minister to the educational needs of immigrants in the parishes in 1916. By 1930 the growth and development of the Ohio community brought about its separation and establishment as an autonomous diocesan congregation with Mother M. Adelaide as the first elected general superior. The generalate and corporate headquarters of the sisters is situated on an 89-acre campus in Sylvania, Ohio. Sisters' residences, Rosarv Care Center, Lourdes College, St. Francis Education Center, Sophia Counseling Center, the Franciscan Center, Franciscan Services Corporation, which administers health and human services in Ohio and Texas, and Convent Park Apartments for independent senior living are located on or adjacent to the Sylvania campus. The sisters' mission extends to 15 other states.

[M. B. MROZ/K. ZIELINSKI]

Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi (OSF) [1705]. In 1849, a small band of lay Franciscans left Ettenbeuren, Bavaria, and came to America to become missionaries to the German immigrants in Wisconsin. Amidst hardship and struggles, these women organized the Sisters of St. Francis of Assisi. In their personal and corporate lives the sisters are dedicated to the Franciscan values of living simply and serving the poor, seeking personal transformation, working toward right relationships with all people through justice, respect, hospitality and peace making, and reverencing God within themselves and others and in all creation. Ministries are as diverse as the women who serve them: administrators; teachers; healthcare providers; social workers and counselors; campus, prison and parish ministers; childcare workers; artists and musicians. Community members are located across the United States and in Taiwan.

The congregation sponsors Canticle Court Inc. and Juniper Court, Inc., St Francis, Wis., corporations offering affordable housing and independent living for the older adult in a community environment. Cardinal Stritch University, located in Milwaukee, Wis., is the largest Franciscan institution in the United States. Marian Center for Nonprofits leases space to nonprofit agencies that respond to human needs through education, the arts, and social justice. St. Ann Center for Inter-generational Care, also in St. Francis, Wis., is a nationally recognized noninstitutional daycare alternative for persons of all ages. Shepherd Hall meets the special daycare needs of persons with dementia. St. Coletta's of Illinois, located in Palos Park, provides group home living for profoundly disabled persons, a day school, and a workshop where those with developmental challenges can learn skills needed to earn a living. St. Coletta and Cardinal Cushing Schools of Massachusetts, located in Braintree and Hanover, provide residential and educational services to school-age youngsters with developmental challenges, adult living units with vocational training, and a day school for those with severe, multiple disabilities. Cushing Residence, a funded housing complex for senior citizens located on the Hanover campus, engages services provided by students in vocational training. St. Coletta of Wisconsin, Jefferson, serves the needs of adults with disabilities. In addition, the congregation maintains Liteh Kindergarten in Taipei, Taiwan.

[M. LUNZ]

Sisters of St. Francis of Penance and Christian Charity (OSF) [1630]. A congregation with papal approbation (1869) founded in 1835 by Marie Catharina Daemen (1787–1858) in Heijthuijsen, province of Limburg, Holland. Daemen was a Franciscan tertiary engaged in works of charity at Maaseik, Belgium. In 1827 she went to Heijthuijsen, where she formed a group of tertiaries devoted to similar works. Under the direction of the local pastor, Petrus van der Zandt, and with the approval of Bp. Cornelius van Bommel of Liège, the tertiaries assumed the Franciscan habit and formed a religious community in 1835. Daemen, now known as Mother Magdalen, became the first superior. Expansion outside Holland began in 1854 when a house was established in Germany. Subsequent foundations were made in Poland (1867), Indonesia (1870), Brazil (1872), the United States, and Tanganyika (now Tanzania; 1959). In 1874 the sisters began their work in the United States at Stella Niagara (Holy Name Province) in the diocese of Buffalo, N.Y. Two other provinces are located in Denver, Colo., (Sacred Heart Province; 1939) and Redwood City, Calif. (St. Francis Province; 1939). In 1991, the sisters of the Sacred Heart Province established a mission in Chiapas, Mexico.

[M. G. MILLER]

Sisters of St. Francis of Perpetual Adoration (OSF) [1640]. A congregation with papal approbation (formerly known as the Poor Sisters of St. Francis Seraph of Perpetual Adoration) founded in 1863 by Aline (Mother Maria Theresia) Bonzel in Olpe, Westphalia, Germany, for the purpose of serving the sick, the aged, and orphans and of educating youth. The sisters maintain perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament in the congregation. By the time of Mother Maria Theresia's death in 1905, the congregation had spread to several parts of Germany and to the United States. In 1930 her remains were transferred to a special crypt at the general motherhouse in Olpe, and her cause for beatification has since been introduced in Rome. The sisters came to the United States because of the oppressive laws of the Kulturkampf. On Dec. 14, 1875, six sisters arrived in Lafayette, Ind., at the invitation of Joseph Dwenger, Bishop of Fort Wayne. In 1886 the foundations made in Indiana, Nebraska, and Ohio were constituted as an American province. In 1932 the whole congregation was divided into four provinces: two in Germany and two in the United States. Since 1993 there are four provinces: St. Elizabeth Province, Cologne, Germany, the Immaculate Heart of Mary Province, for the area east of the Mississippi River, with its headquarters in Mishawaka, Ind., the St. Joseph province, for the western states, with its headquarters in Colorado Springs, Colo., and the Immaculate Conception province, Baybay, Levte, Philippines.

[M. F. PETERS/C. GENTRUP]

Sisters of St. Francis of Philadelphia (OSF) [1650]. The Sisters of St. Francis of Philadelphia, formerly known as the Glen Riddle Franciscans, were founded in 1855 by Mother Mary Francis (Anna Maria) Bach-mann, Sister Margaret (Barbara) Boll and Sister Bernardine (Anna) Dorn with the support of St. John Neumann, Bishop of Philadelphia, Pa. They became the first American community of Franciscan women following the Third Order Regular Rule of St. Francis. Throughout their history, they have been dedicated to serve the poor, the marginalized, and oppressed, directly and indirectly, by ministering in the United States, the Carribean, Central America, Europe, and Africa. Ministries include education, spiritual direction and pastoral care, health care, and counseling. Five other congregations: the Sisters of the Third Franciscan Order (Syracuse, N.Y.; 1860); Sisters of St. Francis of the Third Order Regular (Williamsville, N.Y.; 1863); the Sisters of St. Francis of the Immaculate Virgin Mary Mother of God (Millvale, Pa.; 1871); the Sisters of St. Francis of the Immaculate Virgin (Hastingson-Hudson, N.Y.; 1893); and the Sisters of St. Francis of the Providence of God (Pittsburgh, Pa.; 1922), trace their roots to the Sisters of St. Francis of Philadelphia.

[E. KULAEZ]

Sisters of St. Francis of Savannah, Missouri (OSF) [1670]. The origin of this congregation of sisters began in Vöcklabruck, Austria, where the sisters provided day nurseries for children whose parents worked in factories. In 1850 Fr. Sebastian Schwarz organized a group of women who formed a community of sisters under the leadership of Mother Franziska Wimmer. As the community grew it branched out to other charitable services. In August of 1922, upon invitation from the Benedictines in Conception, Mo., twelve of these sisters came to Conception. The first superior and foundress was Mother Pia Feitenschlager. In 1935 the community moved to Chillicothe, Mo., and remained there until the purchase of the Dr. Nichols' Sanatorium in Savannah, Mo., in 1957. With the move to Savannah they established La Verna Heights Retirement Center, a nursing home for women. Besides the care of the elderly and infirm, the sisters established Subasio Center in the Provincial House for the care of persons with HIV/AIDS. The sisters remain involved in the education of adults and children and in various other social works.

[K. REICHART]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Holy Cross (OSF) [1550]. A diocesan congregation founded in 1874 by Edward Francis Daems, OSC, a missionary who worked in northeastern Wisconsin from 1851 to 1879. Fr. Daems established a religious society of women to assist in ministering to the Catholics who were immigrating from Canada and Europe. The community had its beginning in the work of Christine Rousseau, Pauline LaPlant, and Mary Pius Doyle, who in 1868 staffed a new parish school at Bay Settlement, Wis. They and a fourth woman were received into the Third Order of St. Francis in 1874 and were granted episcopal approbation by Bishop Francis Xavier Krautbauer of Green Bay in 1881. The sisters continue their work with new immigrants while continuing their ministries in education, health care, and pastoral work in Wisconsin and Nicaragua.

[D. SHALLOW/U. SCHUMACHER]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Holy Eucharist of Independence, Missouri (OSF) [1560]. A diocesan congregation established in 1893 in the diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph and dedicated to the works of the active apostolate. The sisters trace their origin from the Franciscan convent of Grimmenstein, Switzerland, begun in 1378. In the latter part of the 19th century, five sisters, led by Mother M. John Hau, came to the United States to settle in Nevada, Mo. In 1900 they became an independent community with their own motherhouse and novitiate. In 1977 a mission was opened in Rodrigues Alves, Acre, Brazil, and in 1982 the motherhouse was moved to Independence, Missouri.

[M. J. PETERS]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Holy Family (OSF) [1570]. A congregation with papal approbation whose motherhouse is located at Mount St. Francis, Dubuque, Iowa (established in 1878). The community was founded in Herford, Germany, by Mother Xavier (Josephine Termehr, d. 1892) and approved by Bp. Konrad Martin of Paderborn in 1864. During the 11 years that the congregation existed in Germany the sister cared for children at Haus Bethlehem, a Herford orphanage, and nursed wounded soldiers during the Austro-Prussian and Franco-Prussian Wars. In recognition of their services, the King of Prussia, William I, awarded the sisters the Iron Cross in 1872, but only three years later Bismarck's Kulturkampf forced them to leave Germany and go to the United States. The exiled community sailed from Rotterdam on the Caland and landed in New York on Sept. 5, 1875. The little band, comprised of Mother Xavier, 17 sisters, seven novices, and four postulants, went directly to Iowa City, Iowa, where they staffed the German department of St. Joseph's Institute in 1875 and opened Mount St. Mary's Orphanage in 1876. Their stay in Iowa City terminated in 1878, when the community transferred to Dubuque to open the diocesan orphanage. In 1880 they built their first motherhouse; in 1925 a new and larger motherhouse was erected on the present site. The sisters serve numerous dioceses throughout the United States, as well as Africa and Central America.

[M. R. ROSEMEYER/D. HEIDERSCHEIT]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Immaculate Conception (OSF) [1580]. A diocesan congregation established in 1890 when Mother Mary Pacifica Forrestal (1859–1948) and four companions assumed directorship of the diocesan orphanage in Metamora, Ill., at the request of John Lancaster Spalding, Bishop of Peoria. As the community grew the sisters' ministry extended to elementary education and care of the aging. The congregation is involved in teaching, parish work, care of the elderly, religious education, social work, hospital chaplaincy, retreats, spiritual direction, adult literacy, and prison ministry. These ministries are based in the dioceses of Peoria, Springfield, and Joliet, Ill., with a mission on Standing Rock Indian Reservation in the diocese of Rapid City, South Dakota.

[V. BUTKOVICH]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (OSF) [1590]. A congregation with papal approbation (1943) whose generalate is in Dillingen an der Donau, Bavaria, Germany. In the United States, the provincialate is located in Hankinson, N. Dak. The community traces its origin to a group of women (perhaps originally BEGUINES) whom Count Hartmann of Dillingen endowed with a convent in 1241. These religious adopted the rule of the Franciscan Third Order and led a strictly cloistered life for the greater part of their early history. Then, in 1774, the community changed to a semicloistered form of life and began educating girls. In 1913 the community sent sisters to the United States, where they opened a convent at Collegeville, Minn., in 1913. The provincial motherhouse in the United States was established in Hankinson, N. Dak., in 1928. After 1936 the congregation expanded from Dillingen to Brazil, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, India, and Albania. The sisters of the Hankinson province are largely engaged in healthcare, care for the elderly, and childcare, as well as education and catechesis.

[M. P. FORREST]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Immaculate Virgin Mary Mother of God (OSF) [1620]. A congregation with papal approbation whose motherhouse is located in Millvale (Pittsburgh), Pa. The congregation is also known as the Millvale Franciscans. The congregation takes its heritage from the Franciscan Sisters of Philadelphia (formerly the Glen Riddle Franciscans) founded in 1855. In 1864 sisters went to Pittsburgh to solicit financial aid for their proposed hospital in Buffalo. While in Pittsburgh, a prominent Catholic physician, Dr. Philip Weisenberger, urged them to begin a hospital to serve the German immigrants. These sisters opened a 30-bed hospital. Soon afterwards the sisters began to teach in the elementary and high schools in the diocese. Today the work of the congregation focuses on education, health care, social services, and pastoral care. The sisters own and sponsor Mt. Alvernia, an all-female high school, as well as Mt. Alvernia Day Care and Learning Center located on their motherhouse campus. The congregation was the first in Pittsburgh to establish a volunteer program open to single men and women who commit themselves for a year of service with the poor while living a simple Franciscan lifestyle. The congregation largely serves in the Pittsburgh area; however, sisters minister throughout the United States, as well as Africa, Canada, and Puerto Rico.

[L. WESOLOWSKI]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Martyr St. George (OSF) [1600]. A congregation with papal approbation founded in Thuine, Germany, in 1869 by Pauline (Mother Anselma) Bopp (1835–87) under the direction of Rev. Gerhard Bernhard Dall (d. 1874) for the purpose of nursing the sick in their homes and caring for orphans. Community members are engaged in teaching, nursing, and social work in Brazil, Germany, Holland, the United States, Japan, Sumatra, and Africa. The sisters came to the United States in 1923, where they established their motherhouse and novitiate in Alton, Ill.

[M. I. ROHNER]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin (OSF) [1510]. A community that traces its origin to the congregation founded in 1855 by John Nepomucene NEUMANN, Bishop of Philadelphia, and later known as the Glen Riddle Franciscans (now known as the Sisters of St. Francis of Philadelphia). On July 2, 1882, the Franciscan Sisters of Buffalo, N.Y., a community that in 1861 became independent of Bishop Neumann's original foundation in Philadelphia, went to New York City at the request of Father John C. DRUMGOOLE to assist him in the care of orphaned and destitute children at the Mission of the Immaculate Virgin. As the work at the mission expanded, it was deemed advisable to form another independent community, the Sisters of St. Francis, Conventuals of the Third Order. The separation took place in July of 1893, and Mother Mary Catherine was elected the first superior general of the new congregation. The original motherhouse at Mount Loretto, the extensive new site of the children's home on Staten Island, N.Y., was later transferred to Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y. While continuing the child care at Mt. Loretto, the sisters expanded their apostolate to include health care in hospitals, day clinics, and nursing homes, as well as in education. They also serve as pastoral associates.

[J. A. RANIERI/R. S. SMITH]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Providence of God (OSF) [1660]. The congregation was founded in 1922 to preserve the faith of Lithuanian immigrants and their children and eventually extended its ministry to the broader Church. Based in Pittsburgh, Pa., the congregation is the fifth foundation of the Sisters of St. Francis of Philadelphia (formerly the Glen Riddle Franciscans) established by St. John Neumann of Philadelphia in 1855. Over the years the congregation staffed hospitals, elementary and secondary schools, and provided catechesis for public school children. Since Vatican II its ministries aim to meet contemporary needs with the new immigrants, the homeless, the poor, the disadvantaged, and the imprisoned. Sisters also provide spiritual direction, retreats, and the use of hermitages on their grounds. Since 1938 they have been meeting the educational, spiritual, and social needs of the people in various parts of Brazil, where they are based in São Paulo. They maintain schools and a social center, engage in parish ministry in areas where priests are few, work with base communities, provide health care, and assist the poor in literacy and housing programs, as well as food and clothing distribution.

[M. JASKEL]

Sisters of St. Francis of the Third Order Regular Williamsville, New York (OSF) [1800]. This community of the Sisters of St. Francis of the Third Order Regular stems from the Sisters of St. Francis of Philadelphia (formerly the Glen Riddle Franciscans), who were founded in 1855 in Philadelphia by Mother Mary Francis Bachmann with the help of St. John Neumann, bishop of Philadelphia. In 1861, responding to the needs in Buffalo, N.Y., a new foundation was established by Sister Mary Margaret Boll. As women at the service of life, the sisters are involved in education at various levels, health care, care of the elderly, pastoral work, counseling and spiritual direction, mission work, communications, social services, and prayer ministry. The sisters minister primarily in western New York, but also serve in four other states, as well as in Kenya, East Africa.

[B. LEISING]

Sisters of St. Joseph of the Third Order of St. Francis (SSJ-TOSF) [3930]. A congregation with papal approbation (1917) founded on July 1, 1901, by Mothers Mary Clara Bialkowski and Mary Felicia Jaskulski.

Guided by Rev. Luke Pescinski, pastor of St. Peter's Church in Stevens Point, a group of Polish sisters separated from the School Sisters of St. Francis, Milwaukee, to respond to the dire religious and social need for teachers of immigrant children in the growing Polish parishes of the Midwest and across the country. The sisters first responded to health-care needs in 1939, procuring the tuberculosis sanatarium just outside Stevens Point. Shortly afterwards they responded to calls for service in small hospitals in several states, including an integrated hospital in Mississippi. In 1949, the Congregation built Marymount Hospital on convent grounds in Garfield Heights, Ohio, the only hospital it currently sponsors. Inspired by the Second Vatican Council, with laity serving in Catholic schools and hospitals, some sisters responded to unmet needs such as ministry to the mentally and physically handicapped and their care-givers; organizational work in poor areas; pastoral roles in parishes, dioceses, hospitals, nursing homes, and senior apartments; sponsorship of ecumenical spirituality centers; and missionary work in Puerto Rico, Peru, Brazil, and South Africa. In 1943, St. Joseph Motherhouse and Novitiate were transferred to South Bend, Ind., centrally located to the three provinces in Stevens Point, Garfield Heights, and Bartlett (Ill.). In 1990, the congregation centralized offices in Stevens Point.

[J. M. PEPLINSKI]

Sisters of the Sorrowful Mother of the Third Order of St. Francis (SSM) [4100]. A congregation with papal approbation, dedicated to works of Christian charity, and following the rule of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis. It was founded in Rome, Italy, by Mother Frances of the Cross (Amalia Streitel, 1844-1911), a native of Mellrichstadt, Germany. Having been educated by the Franciscan Sisters of Maria Stern in Augsburg and having experienced religious life in both Franciscan and Carmelite convents, she went to Rome in 1883 at the request of Father Franziskus Maria Jordan to organize a new community of sisters. Both soon discovered that their views concerning the foundation were divergent. The conflict was resolved in 1885 when the cardinal vicar of Rome, Lucido Maria Parocchi (1883-1903), appointed as spiritual director of the small community Rev. Dr. George Jacquemin (d. 1920) and named the new congregation Sisters of the Sorrowful Mother. A rented dwelling close to St. Peter's Basilica became the first motherhouse in Rome. In accord with the instruction and example of their foundress, the sisters practice special devotion to Our Lady under the title of Sorrowful Mother. From Italy the community spread to Germany, Austria, the West Indies, and the United States, where the first foundation (St. Francis Hospital) was made in 1889 in Wichita, Kansas. The sisters established themselves in Wisconsin. Minnesota, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Iowa. Mother Frances' cause for beatification was introduced at Rome in 1947.

[M. C. KOLLER]

Sisters of the Third Franciscan Order (OSF) [1490]. The Sisters of the Third Franciscan Order, Syracuse, N.Y., were founded in 1860 by Mother Mary Bernadine Dorn, one of the original group of the first native community of Sisters of St. Francis established in the United States (known as the Glen Riddle Franciscans). When the Conventual Franciscans accepted parishes in Syracuse and Utica, N.Y., they invited the Glen Riddle Sisters to join them and to staff the schools. The sisters accepted in March of 1860. The following November, with the approbation of Bp. John McCloskey of Albany, N.Y., the foundation in Syracuse was established. Four years later, the Sisters' first motherhouse and chapel in Syracuse were dedicated. In 1883 Mother Marianne Cope led a group of sisters to Hawaii to care for individuals with leprosy. She relinquished her position as superior general to become superior of the missions in Hawaii, where she remained for 35 years. In 1932 the order received the decree of papal approbation.

Dedicated primarily to education, the community developed a program of teacher training, including maintenance of Duns Scotus House of Studies at Catholic University of America, for the sisters in graduate work. St. Francis Normal School opened at the motherhouse in 1934 and later became Maria Regina College. The community's hospital medical centers include the only Catholic hospitals in Hawaii. The community has around 300 professed sisters who minister in education, healthcare, social services, and retreats throughout the United States and Peru.

Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis (OSF) [1770]. A congregation with papal approbation (1899) established in 1877. (The Franciscan Sisters of Rock Island, Ill., merged with the East Peoria sisters in 1989.) The East Peoria sisters stem from the Franciscan Sisters of the Holy Family of Dubuque, Iowa, who were canonically established in Herford, Germany, in 1864, and who came to the United States in 1875 during the Kultur-kampf. The German community of 29 members settled first in Iowa City, Iowa, in 1875 and in 1878 established a motherhouse in Dubuque. Later, a few of the sisters went to Peoria to found a hospital. Bp. John Lancaster Spalding, first bishop of the Diocese of Peoria (1877–1908), seeing that the sisters were struggling in poverty and were without proper hospital facilities, offered to help, provided that the sisters would agree to establish their own independent community in his diocese. After consulting with their superior in Dubuque, the sisters consented to his request in 1877. Bp. Spalding then set about choosing the site for the future St. Francis Hospital and Motherhouse and helped the sisters draw up the constitutions of the community. Sister Mary Frances Krasse was elected the first superior of the new congregation, called the Sisters of the Third Order of St. Francis. The apostolate of the sisters consists in caring for the sick, poor, injured, aged, and dying. The congregation conducts hospitals in Illinois and Michigan, and nursing homes in Iowa and Illinois. The community maintains a formal in-service program for the education of the junior sisters.

St. Francis Mission Community (OSF) [1505]. Established in 1981 as an autonomous province of the Franciscan Sisters of Mary Immaculate [1500]. The 20 professed sisters minister in education, parish ministry, and pastoral care in the dioceses of Amarillo and Lubbock, Tex., as well as the archdiocese of Los Angeles.

FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALITY

Franciscan spirituality motivates a way of following Christ that is based on the gospels. It embraces a diversity of vocations: lay and clerical, contemplative and active, academic and pastoral, married and celibate. Emerging out of the high middles ages, it emphasizes the humanity of Jesus Christ as the mystery of God's presence in human flesh. After the Second Vatican Council critical editions and new translations of primary sources inaugurated new approaches to study of texts that are foundational for Franciscan spirituality. First among these are the writings of Francis of Assisi, which, although not exclusively, are important for the Franciscans of the First Order. The writings of Clare have also developed in importance for the Second Order of Poor Clares. In regard to the lay movement of the Third Order, which today comprises both the Secular Franciscan Order and many canonically established religious communities, there are a number of important texts. The experience of these early lay Franciscans, who embraced a life of conversion, served the poor and experienced mystical contemplation, have become more important for understanding the foundational Franciscan experience. Angela of Foligno and Jacopone da Todi are here selected as examples of the lay Franciscan penitental movement. The first part of this article will examine the writings of these four figures as examples of the foundational inspiration for the ongoing development of Franciscan spirituality.

The second part of the article will treat initial theological insights and developments offered by three early Franciscan theologians: ANTHONY OF PADUA, BONAVEN-TURE, and JOHN DUNS SCOTUS. The development of the full 800-year tradition of Franciscan spirituality is beyond the scope of this article, but it will conclude by identifying several common characteristics that continue to identify the Franciscan spiritual tradition.

Foundations. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) acknowledges that his conversion began when the Lord led him to live among the lepers. It was among lepers that the Spirit transformed for him what "seemed bitter . . . into sweetness of body and soul" (I 124) [cf. Francis of Assisi: Early Documents listed below]. Francis's loving acceptance of those who had been hatefully rejected was his way of "leaving the world" of power, conceit, and its death-dealing divisions. From this point forward, Francis considered himself a "lesser brother," and accepted every human being he encountered as a generous gift of God and, therefore, his brother or sister.

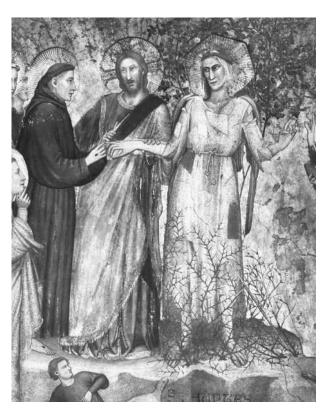

Having found a new home among the lepers and the beggars, Francis found a new home in the Church and a new understanding of Church. He came upon the three abandoned churches in Assisi of St. Mary of the Portiuncula, San Damiano, and St. Peter that were falling into ruin. By rebuilding these churches, he began to care for the wounds of the Church. He was equally at home in the Church and in the houses of lepers. Both places opened his heart to hear the Word of God and to embrace those different from himself. Just as he experienced the cross of Christ in the poverty of lepers, so in the human vulnerability and weaknesses of the larger community- that is Church—he entered into the same mystery of the cross. The first prayer he taught his brothers was an ecclesial prayer: "We adore You, Lord Jesus Christ, in all your churches throughout the whole world and we bless you because by your holy cross you have redeemed the world'' (I 124-25). This is an older liturgical formula that Francis adapted by adding to it his own words: "Lord Jesus, . . . in all your churches throughout the world," and "holy." For Francis every church and every house of lepers was a place of sacred encounter with the cross of the Lord Jesus.

The church of St. Mary of the Portiuncula was especially important to him because there Francis honored Mary, who first conceived the Word of God by the same Spirit that penetrated his own heart. It was there, in obedience to the command of Christ, he received the Body of Christ she first brought into the world. Only in the Church, where Francis could find the Body of Christ, could he find the source, the beginning, and the power for his gospel life of peace and reconciliation: "I implore all of you brothers to show all possible reverence and honor to the most holy Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ in Whom that which is in heaven and on earth has been brought to peace and reconciled to almighty God" (I 117).

From the houses of lepers and the churches Francis moved into the world with new ears for the Gospel. The more he embraced the Gospel, the more the "poverty and humility of Our Lord Jesus Christ'' (I 70) became the concrete and practical plan for his own life. Courageously he announced peace: "Let us pay attention to what the Lord says: 'Love your enemies and do good to those who hate you, for Our Lord Jesus Christ, Whose footprints we must follow, called His betrayer a friend and willingly offered Himself to His executioners. Our friends therefore, are all those who unjustly inflict upon us distress and anguish, shame, injury, sorrow and punishment, martyrdom and death" (I 79). Francis's acceptance of distress and anguish, martyrdom and death were at the heart of his mission to serve the Lord as a "pilgrim and stranger" on the highways and byways of the world. In his Testament Francis acknowledged that he and his brothers in their gospel life and preaching had one greeting for all: "The Lord revealed a greeting to me that we should say: 'May the Lord give you peace" (I 125-26).

In his mystical experience of the stigmata on Mount La Verna two years before he died, Francis embraced Christ, his Brother, on the cross. It was an embrace so intimate it marked his flesh. The stigmatized Francis received Christ's wounded flesh in his own flesh. This has often been interpreted as affirmation of his unconditional embrace of what the Spirit revealed to him: "a form of life according to the Gospel." Francis embraced Christ in lepers, in the Church and, ultimately through the stigmata, in himself. On Mt. La Verna he received the gift of ecstatic peace.

After that mystical experience he composed his famous work The Canticle of Brother Sun. In this Canticle, Francis makes it clear that only when brothers and sisters humble themselves with their Brother, who humbled himself on the cross, can they make God's name known. To give praise to God, they must be humble not only before the lepers of the world, the non-Christians across the sea, and before the needs of each other, but they must also be humble before the very earth under their feet and even the sun above their heads. All elements of the created universe are brothers and sisters and share with Francis a common origin from the same God. All creation is called to share in the communion of praise offered by the whole church together with the Virgin Mary and all the angels and saints. The legacy he left for his brothers was that they were to promote throughout the world The Canticle of Brother Sun as a song of communion and praise. He requested that it be sung before they preach. The Canticle was his message of peace.

Clare of Assisi (d. 1253) was the first woman to follow Francis, and in her own right she became a foundress of the Second Order, a new way of contemplative life for women. She was the first woman to write a rule of life for women. Living with her sisters in the monastery of San Damiano, she emphasized the necessity of peace in their relationships with each other in order that their spirits might soar toward contemplation of the mystery of the Incarnate Word. This is captured in Clare's Fourth Letter to Agnes: "Gaze upon that mirror each day, O Queen and Spouse of Jesus Christ, and continually study your face within it. . . . Indeed blessed poverty, holy humility and inexpressible charity are reflected in that mirror, as with the grace of God you can contemplate them throughout the entire mirror . . . that is, the poverty of Him who was placed in a manger . . . the holy humility, the blessed poverty, the untold labors and burdens that He endured . . . the ineffable charity that led Him to suffer on the wood of the Cross and to die there the most shameful death'' (Cf. Clare of Assisi: Early Documents, 48).

Poverty, humility, and charity are conditions and rewards of a life focused on penetrating the great mystery of how God creates and loves in God's own free and eternal choice for the incarnation of the Son. Contemplation is the shared journey of the sisters into direct experience of the heart of the great Christian mystery of God's love, the Word made flesh. In the "mirror" of that mystery, the sisters see the intimate reality of themselves. Christ, the fullest expression of God's life and love, is the mirror of all that God creates and loves. Contemplation is to ponder, experience, and embrace all that is found in the heart of Christ, who is the perfect example of self-giving love.

Clare's single-minded focus on the great mystery of God's love empowered her and her sisters to "be a mirror and an example for those living in the world" (CA:ED, 55). Their life of contemplation in a bond of peace and free from accumulation of possessions was not only a life for themselves-it was also a life to serve as example for others, calling others into the heart of the mystery of God's greatest revelation of love. In the bull of canonization issued by Alexander IV, he recognized this aspect of Clare's vocation: "Her life is an instruction and a lesson to others who learned the rule of living in this book of life" (CA:ED, 180). Moved by the example of Francis and inspired by the Spirit, Clare and her sisters focused all their energies toward a life of fullest freedom from what is not necessary in order to gaze in the mirror, that is, to know a peace that sees clearly and experiences profoundly God's love revealed in the "ineffable charity" of Christ on the cross.

Angela of Foligno (d. 1309) exemplifies the development of ecstatic experience among Franciscan lay penitent women. After the death of her husband and reception into the Third Order, she directed her attention to the service of lepers, the poor, and the sick. In this she began to perceive and experience how Christ had died for her. Overwhelmed at the gift of God's generous love, she was moved one day to strip herself of all her clothing before the cross: "I was inspired with the thought that if I wanted to go to the cross, I would need to strip myself in order to be lighter and go naked to it." (LaChance, 126). Stripped of her sins and possessions, her spiritual experience becomes intense, affective, and imaginative. Description of these experiences is preserved in her Memorial, the text written by her confessor Brother Arnaldo. To him she poured out her soul between 1290 and 1296, and step by step she describes her sharing in the self-emptying of Christ crucified that lead her through suffering, pain, joy, and darkness to "a state of joy so great that it is unspeakable. In it I knew everything I wanted to know, possessed all I wanted to possess. I saw the All Good. In this state the soul delights in the All Good'' (LaChance, 203).

The cross was the inspiration of her prayer and visions, and through these she received the grace to return the love to Christ crucified which he had given to her. In this manner, she experienced the cross deep within herself and she entered intensely into the experience of Christ, who made himself "poor of goods, . . . poor of friends, . . . poor of himself to the point of helplessness" (LaChance, 288). Through this self-emptying focus on the cross she entered into a radical new experience of God. She writes: "The more perfectly and purely we see, the more perfectly and purely we love. As we see, so we love. Therefore, the more we see of Jesus Christ, God and man, the more we are transformed into him by love" (La-Chance, 242).

Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306) lived as a lay Franciscan penitent for 10 years after the death of his wife. Although he eventually joined the First Order, his vernacular writing, The Lauds, a poetic diary of his own experience, was shaped by his lay penitential life. Jacapone emphasized that poverty and obedience of the cross are key insights for following Christ: "poverty is having nothing, wanting nothing, and possessing all things in freedom" (Huges, 186). On the cross Christ obediently embraces all that is mortally human and therein the obedience of the cross is recapitulation of all of creation into the peace and harmony of God's eternal plan. So Jacopone exults: "Since I gave my will to God, all things are mine and I am one with them in love, in ardent charity." Jacopone was amazed at the wonder of all the gifts of creation. The more he let them go, the more beautiful they became, and the more he connected to them. His poverty became his peace.

Initial Theological Developments. Anthony of Padua (d. 1231) was among the first of the trained theologians to join the First Order. Francis acknowledged and approved his theological vocation: "I am pleased that you teach sacred theology to the brothers providing that, as contained in the Rule, you 'do not extinguish the spirit of prayer and devotion' during study of this kind'' (I 107). Anthony captured Francis's vocation of preaching and composed two sermon collections: the Sunday Sermons (1223-30) and the Festal Sermons (1230-31). He gave much of his energy to teaching theology in order to support the mission of gospel preaching. He was a master of the spiritual interpretation of scripture, and he crafted his gospel message to be practical encouragement for people of all vocations. Like Francis, Anthony of Padua taught that the humility, poverty, and suffering of Jesus is at the heart of the Gospel and is the only way to understand and effect among peoples the gospel message of peace. Anthony writes: 'only the poor, that is the humble, have the gospel preached to them, because their emptiness makes them receptive, while the proud are unwilling to receive anything'' (Lynch, 28–29).

Bonaventure (d. 1274), especially after his election as minister general of the order, devotes his theological and literary skills to deepen the spiritual insights that flowed from Francis. He applied his interpretations and synthesis of Augustinian theories of exemplarism and illumination to the Franciscan mystical journey. This earned him the title Seraphic Doctor. His spiritual masterpiece, The Journey of the Soul into God, models the pilgrim's contemplative assent after the pattern of Francis's seraphic embrace of the poor crucified Christ. Bonaventure identifies the spiritual journey in a very succinct way: "There is no other path but through the burning love of the crucified" (Cousins, 54).

From the outset of the spiritual journey, Bonaventure insists that the true goal of contemplation is the ecstatic peace of union with God. Since the soul's desire for peace can only be fulfilled through and in a humble desire for God, the text outlines a path to peace through "six levels of illumination by which, as if by steps or stages, the soul can pass over to peace through ecstatic elevations of Christian wisdom'' (Cousins, 54). Bonaventure understands peace (pax) to mean "right order," specifically, the order of divine love as shared within the Trinity and as poured out into creation. Receptivity is the root of the "right order" of peace. Such a vision understands that everything is a pure gift from God and everything is invitation to an intimate sharing of God's love generously poured out upon all creatures. True order is not a static "thing" imposed, but a dynamic relationship of love that is freely shared.

Bonaventure's insistence on the necessity of receptivity for acquiring peace can be seen in how he opens the first chapter: "Here begins the speculation of the poor person in the desert'' (Cousins, 59). Like Francis, Bonaventure's journey to God begins in poverty. The inherent poverty of the human person is embedded in the very fact that, as a creature, one is in no way equal to God; rather, the creature, essentially and totally, depends upon God the Creator. This is a poverty of absolute and radical dependency on God, which in turn opens the creature to God, the overflowing giver and source of every good gift. Poverty is fundamentally openness and receptivity. Everything exists not only in relationship to God's loving presence, but since only God can truly fulfill the inherent poverty and need of the created human person, the poverty of created existence reveals also the richness of the divine presence. Ultimately, poverty indicates that all of creation and every creature is a gift freely and generously given.

The journey of the soul ends with the poverty of the cross. The disorder of sin must be reordered by the love of the cross whereby the highest becomes the lowest and the richest becomes the poorest. On the cross God becomes poor. Cruciform love leads the wayfarer into the very core of the mystery of God's self-giving love. Here, the root of the soul's union with God is the poverty of the reciprocal self-emptying of the divine into the human and the human into the divine. The fruit of this union is the soul's transitus into the ecstatic peace of God's love. The two meet and become one through and in the seraphic love of Christ crucified. In the gift of Christ's cross, like Francis, one receives peace.

John Duns Scotus (d. 1308), in his unique approach to the absolute predestination of Christ, offers an important theological cornerstone for the development of Franciscan spirituality. He taught that the mystery of the incarnation resides first and foremost deep in the mystery of the free gift of God's goodness and love. Jesus is the "first born of every creature" (Col 1, 15), and the incarnation of the Word is therefore conditioned neither to creation nor to human sin. Rather, creation itself is ordered within God's eternal design that the Word become flesh. All creation therefore exists because of and for the sake of the gift of the incarnate Christ, who is the full manifestation of God's love. All creation mirrors the gift of God's Word because all exist in view of the incarnate Word, and no human sin can destroy the eternal design that manifests God's goodness. Creation, that is, each and every creature, even in the singular uniqueness or "thisness" (haecceitas) of each individual reality, is a gift and is infinitely loved by God. Considering, however, the historical reality of sin, this divine love does in fact become redemptive but in the great eternal scheme of God's plan for creation this redemptive aspect is an accidental rather than an essential aspect of God's love for creation. For example, in the third Ordinatio John Scotus writes: "I say that the incarnation of Christ was not foreseen as occasioned by sin, but as immediately foreseen from all eternity by God as a good more proximate to the end. Thus Christ in his human nature is seen as closer to the end [God had in mind in creating]" (McElrath, 153). Scotus' teaching on the Immaculate Conception is to be understood in this context. In the primary mystery and eternal plan that the Word of God is to take flesh, Mary is and remains a model of God's divine original intention.

Characteristics. Poverty. The fundamental disposition of Franciscan spirituality is openness to God, the giver of every gift. It refers everything back to God. Francis of Assisi saw poverty exemplified in Christ and it becomes the gospel value he embraced as he followed the "poverty and humility of Our Lord Jesus Christ." Clare embraced radical poverty to foster a life of contemplation of the poor Christ. Bonaventure taught poverty is the first step of the spiritual journey toward God. Jacopone da Todi believed that poverty was having nothing in order to possess all things in freedom. Subsequently, Spiritual Franciscans John Peter Olivi (d. 1298) and Ubertino da Casale (d. 1341) insisted that strict poverty was key to authentic living of the Rule. With Angelo of Clareno (d. 1337), poverty took on an eschatological significance necessary for the renewal of the whole Church. Later in the 15th century, the First Order Observant movement attempted to recapture and promote a simpler life of strict poverty as it was found in the tradition of the rural or more eremitical friaries. John Capistran (d. 1456) and James of the Marshes (d. 1476) were strong promoters for this renewal of poverty in the life of the First Order.

Humility. Francis identified humility as a sister to poverty. Humility is grateful acceptance of God's gifts, especially the gift of God's Son in Word and Eucharist. Both of these aspects of the mystery of the incarnation are sacraments of the humility of God. In the conclusion of his Later Rule Francis writes that the brothers are "to observe the poverty, humility and Holy Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (I 106). Poverty and humility not only have gospel implications but also ecclesial ones. The brothers are to live the gospel "submissive and subject" to Holy Church. This humble submission to the Church is consistent with his vision of the gospel life that the brothers no matter where they find themselves are "not to engage in arguments or disputes but [are] to be subject to every human creature for God's sake'' (I 89). According to Thomas of Celano (d.1260) the "humility of the Incarnation" describes the process of Francis's conversion and is the identifying characteristic of the spiritual disposition of all the brothers.

Compassion. Clare is the first to mention explicitly two basic characteristics of Franciscan compassion. In her contemplation Clare gazes in the mirror and sees Him "who was placed in a manger" and Him who suffered "on the wood of the cross" (CA:ED, 48). Crib and cross characterize the compassion of Christ who fully embraced the human condition in the helplessness of an infant and in the suffering of a shameful death. This is the compassion of God. In The Major Life of Francis, Bonaventure explains that it is "through compassion [God] transformed him [Francis] into Christ" (II 586). Compassion is the basis for service to the poor. This characteristic was pronounced among Third-Order lay Franciscans. In addition to Angela of Foligno and Jacapone da Todi, St. Elisabeth of Hungary (d. 1231), St. Rose of Viterbo (d. 1252), St. Margaret of Cortona (d. 1297) and even St. Louis IX (d. 1270) were notable examples of an active compassion that embraced others in their helplessness and suffering.

Jesus Christ-The Incarnate Word. The characteristics of poverty, humility and compassion flow from the vision and the experience of Christ as he is found in the texts of the gospel. The incarnate Christ in the crib and on the cross is the central spiritual focus that captures the dynamic of Franciscan spirituality. This fosters the affections and, in some cases, encourages ecstatic mystical experiences. As already indicated above, Clare saw Christ as the "mirror" into which one must gaze. Angela threw herself naked on the cross to embrace her Divine Lover. Bernadine of Siena (d. 1444), following the Christcentered spirit of Scotus, preached the holy name of Jesus. In his sermon The Glorious Name of Our Lord Jesus Christ he taught that everything that pertains to salvation and to the glory of the final age is revealed in the name of Jesus: "O glorious name, O gracious name, O lovely and worthy name." St. Leonard of Port Maurice promoted the devotion of the Stations of the Cross as a way to foster affective prayer based on the human suffering of Christ. Francesco de Osuna (d. 1540) developed a method of recollection that placed emphasis on alertness of heart and intensity of desire. Human affections, desire and imagination are all aspects of Franciscan prayer that center on the mystery of the incarnation.

Within this central characteristic of emphasis on the humanity of Christ, the role of Mary is always prominent. The incarnation of the Word of God can never be honored apart from her who conceived the Word and gave the Word human flesh. Francis often praised the "Mother of our most holy Lord Jesus Christ, Spouse of the Holy Spirit" (I 141), and he even held that to follow Christ in poverty is to follow Mary: "He [Christ] wished, together with the most Blessed Virgin, His mother to choose poverty in the world beyond all else" (I 46). Bonaventure continues the Marian tradition by identifying Mary as the Advocate of the Franciscan Order. Lawrence of Brindisi (d. 1619) in his famous Mariale demonstrates that Marian spirituality flows out of the devotion to the universal primacy of Christ and is directed toward her consent to and participation in the mystery of the Word made flesh. In modern times, Maximilian Kolbe (d. 1941) renewed and further developed this same Marian aspect of Franciscan devotion to the mystery of the Incarnation.

Finally, all these characteristics can be brought together under the umbrella of piety (pietas). In the modern use of English the word is weak; but in Bonaventure's use of the term, it is a rich use of the ancient Roman word that characterizes familial relationships. In Franciscan spirituality, the virtue of piety reconciles the family of creation. It flows from participation in the mystery of the incarnation: "Truly this is the virtue that binds all creatures together, and gives power to all things having the promise of the life, that now is and is yet to come" (II 595).

FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS

Strict observers of the rule and testament of St. FRAN-CIS OF ASSISI. Their centers were hermitages in central Italy, where LEO OF ASSISI and many of the first companions of Francis survived, and in Provence. They accepted the doctrines of JOACHIM OF FIORE on the approaching "age of the Holy Spirit," which was to be preceded by the coming of ANTICHRIST, and inaugurated by a barefooted order of contemplatives, which they identified with themselves. The breach between them and the Franciscan Conventuals was widened by the condemnation of Gerard of Borgo San Donnino's Introduction to the Eternal Gospel (1254), an edition of Joachim's works, which Gerard regarded as the Bible of the new age, and by the resignation of the Joachimite minister general, (Bl.) John of Parma (1257). It was completed by relaxations of the rule of poverty after St. BONAVENTURE's death (1274).

The views on poverty and some of the theological and philosophical theories of the Provençal Spiritual PETER JOHN OLIVI were condemned in 1283, but his subsequent appointments as lector at Florence and Montpellier were vindications of his orthodoxy. Although a Joachimite, Olivi was a moderate, condemning the excesses of the Spirituals and accepting the legitimacy of the resignation of CELESTINE V, whom many Spirituals identified with the "angel pope" of pseudo-Joachimite prophecy. The ardent Spiritual JACOPONE DA TODI witnessed the COLONNA manifesto against BONIFACE VIII. Olivi's disciples were persecuted before and after his death (1298). He was venerated as a saint, and his lay followers, the Provençal BEGUINES, gave considerable trouble to the INQUISITION.

In the March of Ancona a number of Spirituals, among them ANGELUS CLARENUS, author of the Historia septem tribulationum, an account of the Spirituals from the end of the life of St. Francis, were imprisoned in 1275 for 15 years. After a stay in Armenia, they returned to Italy and were formed by Celestine V into a hermit order called the CELESTINES. They retired to Greece at the election of Boniface VIII but returned because of the persecutions of the Conventuals. During the pontificate of CLEMENT V, Angelus, now their general, was at the Curia seeking papal recognition for his order.

From 1309 to 1312 there was a papal inquiry into the state of the order and the doctrines of Olivi, representatives of both parties being summoned to the Curia. The case of the Spirituals and the defense of Olivi were undertaken by Olivi's disciple, UBERTINO OF CASALE. Four of Olivi's doctrines were condemned, and Ubertino's plea for the separation of the Spirituals was rejected. After Clement's death the Tuscan Spirituals seized three hermitages; those of Provence took the convents of Narbonne and Beziers, electing their own superiors and adopting a special short and skimpy habit. Upon the election of JOHN XXII (1316), a delegation sent by them to Avignon was refused a hearing and its members imprisoned. Three bulls were issued against the Tuscan Spirituals, who had taken refuge in Sicily, and against those of Provence, four of whom were burned at Marseilles (1318) for refusing to abandon their peculiar habits. Olivi's Lectura super Apocalipsim was condemned in 1320.

The ideals of the Spirituals were revived by the Observants, whose founder, John de Valle, was almost certainly a disciple of Angelus Clarenus. Their aspirations are reflected in such works as the Speculum perfectionis and the FIORETTI (see FRATICELLI).

FRANCISCAN THEOLOGICAL TRADITION

Contemporary study of the Franciscan theological tradition breaks with the custom, established by earlier generations of scholars, of speaking of a uniform Franciscan school, with a perennial core of fixed and unalterable positions. The comparison of vernacular and academic theologians, some of them previously ignored, prompts an appreciation of the diversity among Franciscan theologians throughout the medieval period. Nevertheless, men and women, drawn to the Franciscan worldview from varying social and political strata, often appear to have shared a common sensibility vis-à-vis the theological concerns that marked their experience of the evangelical life. Questions regarding the possibility of knowing and loving God, the relationship between the current society and the world to come, respect for creation as expression of the goodness of God, free will and revelation, the uniqueness of Christ in personal and cosmic history, together with other concerns, often elicited creative, if not always harmonic responses from those who identified with the gospel proposal of FRANCIS OF ASSISI.

Sometime after Nov. 29, 1223, Francis of Assisi sent a brief letter to his confrere, Anthony of Padua, approving his intention to teach theology to the brothers near Bologna as long as study, like any other work, did not extinguish prayer and devotion. Bologna is the same city where Franciscan hagiographical sources note the Poverello earlier demanded the abandonment of the first friary linked to academics. Site of the earliest European university, Bologna is emblematic of the controversy that surrounded theological studies in the Minorite community from the beginning. Unlike their fellow mendicants, the Dominicans, the early Franciscans did not always recognize an intrinsic link between their evangelical vocation and academic theology.

Francis of Assisi, though not trained in the academic discipline of theology, is considered a vernacular theologian who displayed a profound knowledge of Scriptural and Patristic sources cultivated in liturgical prayer, preaching, and reflective literary composition. He reminds the brothers in the Testament (1224) that respect is due to theologians because they minister God's word of spirit and life to the world. Although he described himself as a simple, uneducated man, his writings reveal an educated layman, transformed by God's word and committed to spreading his interpretation of the Christian calling through various venues, including the medium of the written text. The themes he developed in native Umbrian and acquired Latin, such as the goodness of the Triune God, following the poor Christ, the symbolic nature of the world, the dynamics of Gospel fraternity, virtues and vices, and the importance of the Eucharist and the Mother of God, are among the salient insights later Franciscan theologians explored in the cloister, the pulpit, and the classroom.

The cloister of San Damiano was the locus of Clare of Assisi's theological reflection. As a companion of Francis from the earliest days, she focused on the community of sisters, poverty, and Christ. Clare, like Francis, received no formal theological education but was likewise convinced of her experience of the divine and the corresponding responsibility of conveying her faith in word and example. Her Form of Life (1253), the first religious rule written by a woman, and the Testament (1247–1253) evoke a vision of community as the matrix of evangelical ministry and contemplation of Christ. Her Letters to Agnes of Prague (1234–1253) written perhaps with the assistance of another early companion of Francis, Brother Leo, demonstrate Clare's ability to synthesize sources from monastic theology within a Franciscan framework of radical poverty and ecstatic prayer. Others after Clare, like Angela of Foligno, who in the Memorial (1296-1297) describes her spiritual itinerary, would continue to find poverty, inside and outside the cloister, conducive to contemplation of the crucified Christ.

Paris School. Many of Francis's other companions came from the educated ranks of society, as his biographer, Thomas of Celano, relates in The Life of Saint Francis (1228–1229). Their previous intellectual formation favored the academic theological reflection apparent in their formal preaching and teaching. The missionary thrust beyond the borders of Europe and expansion into areas within Europe where literate and educated, yet unorthodox formulations of the faith flourished, necessitated preaching different from the popular approach the Poverello had employed so successfully. The concomitant entrance into urban areas, where academic faculties were located, facilitated the friars' growing interest in the cultivation of theological study. Beginning with Bologna as early as 1220, houses dedicated to study or studia, and other friaries with lectors for the instruction of the brothers, appeared throughout Europe. The English Minorite Roger Bacon boasted that already by the 1230s the brothers had brought learning into every city; however, two cities, Paris and Oxford, became the intellectual centers identified, in particular, with the nascent Franciscan theology.

The Franciscans arrived in Paris as early 1217 and established a house of studies in 1224 with the assistance of a confrere theologian, Haymo of Faversham. The decision in 1236 of the secular regent master, ALEXANDER OF HALES, to enter the fraternity and transfer his chair of theology to the Franciscan studium provided the friars with the opportunity to receive a university degree at their own school. Alexander, together with JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE, guided the Minorite school until their deaths in 1245 when they were replaced by ODO RIGALDUS and WILLIAM OF MELITONA. Each master made a substantial contribution, much of which is remains unedited, to the formation of the friars; however, Alexander of Hales remains the dominant figure of the early Parisian studium. He introduced the Sentences of Peter Lombard into the curriculum and, without neglecting biblical sources, utilized Aristotelian philosophy. Alexander's emphasis on theology as a science included the notion of theological knowledge as sapientia or wisdom, which became a hallmark of the Franciscan approach to education. The Summa (1245-1256) of Alexander, edited by John of La Rochelle and completed by William of Melitona, together with the Disputed Questions and the Gloss on the Sentences (1223-1227), treated themes such as the contingency of the world, divine knowledge, the person as the imago Dei, the Incarnation of Christ, and the vision of God as Good.

Alexander's student BONAVENTURE received the habit of the friars in 1243 and became the most influential of the regent masters at the Parisian studium. Although Bonaventure's course of study concluded in 1254, he was not recognized as a master of theology until 1257 due to the conflict between the mendicant and secular masters at the university. Elected general minister of the Franciscan order in the same year, he served in this capacity until his death in 1274 at the Second Council of Lyon. The academic works of the Seraphic Doctor included disputed questions, sermons, biblical commentaries and the Commentary on the Sentences (1250–1252). Bonaventure's university writings present a cosmic vision of emanation, creation, incarnation, redemption, and return. The trinity of persons, not the unity of God, is the starting point of theology. Pastoral and administrative responsibilities as minister general promoted an integration of previously held Augustinian and Neoplatonic positions into a synthesis dominated by the Gospel paradigm of Francis of Assisi and his eschatological role in salvation history. The Journey of the Mind into God (1259), the Major Life of Saint Francis (1260–1262) and the Collations on the Six Days (1273) illustrate Bonaventure's appropriation of the Poverello as source and stimulus for theology. Later confreres, including Gilbert of Tournai, Walter of Bruges, John Pecham, Matthew of Aquasparta, and Richard of Middleton, would frequently follow the trajectory of his teaching.

Introduced to Bonaventure's apocalyptic views as a student in Paris, PETER JOHN OLIVI also pondered the heritage of the Poverello, the institution and purpose of the Minorite order, and the ages of history marking the approaching eschaton. Upon leaving Paris, Olivi was appointed lector in southern France, then Florence, and again in Provence, where he died in 1298. His utilization of the Joachimite tradition in the Lecture on the Apocalypse (1296-1297), his stance on poverty in the Questions on Evangelical Perfection (1274-1279), and his teachings concerning the Virgin Mary and marriage provoked censure and condemnation from some, and admiration and imitation from others. Olivi's biblical and sentence commentaries, selected questions, and sermons illustrate a broad range of interests from the proper study of Scripture and the person of Jesus Christ to the economic aspects of religious poverty and the nature of free will.

Oxford School. Like Paris, Oxford was an influential center of medieval Franciscan theology. Thomas of Eccleston's chronicle, On the Coming of the Friars Minor to England (1258-1259), claims that the friars arrived in the university town in 1224. ROBERT GROSSE-TESTE served as the first prominent, secular lector for the newly arrived Minorite community until 1235. After being named bishop of Lincoln, Grosseteste provided other secular masters for the Oxford studium, who also received episcopal appointments throughout the British Isles. Adam Marsh, friar and student of Grosseteste, took a chair of theology in 1247, becoming the first of many Franciscan regents at Oxford. The combination of theology and science cultivated by Grosseteste and Marsh found a proponent in Roger Bacon, who, critical of the theological methodology of the Parisian friars, insisted on the epistemological priority of experience and a requisite, reciprocal relationship between science and wisdom. Bacon entered the Franciscan order in 1257, already having taught in the faculty of arts in Paris and Oxford. His Opus Maius, Opus Minus, Opus Tertium, Letter to Clem*ent IV* (1266–1268), and compendiums to the study of philosophy and theology explored the correlation between Church and culture and the possibility, albeit unrealized, of interdisciplinary unity among the scientific, philosophical, and theological branches of knowledge.

John DUNS SCOTUS, most probably a native of the small Scottish town of Dun near the English border, studied and taught in Oxford and Paris until his death in 1308 at the Minorite studium in Cologne. The "Subtle Doctor" produced a wealth of theological and philosophical works delineating the direction of academic Franciscan theological reflection for centuries. Among his edited works are On the First Principle, Quodlibetal Questions, and sections of the Ordinatio. Scotus directed his acute ability for philosophical analysis toward the integration of Aristotle into theological method, thereby providing a systematic, metaphysical foundation for positions on Christ, the Immaculate Conception, the sacraments, morality, the univocity of infinite and finite being, the contingency of creation, and individuation. His teaching on the principle of individuation, haecceitas, allowed for the appreciation of every contingent being and the freedom of God's revelatory actions in salvation history. Consequently, he held that the incarnation of Christ was not dictated by sin, but, rather, the desire that humanity, together with all of creation, be united to God in the most intimate bond. Throughout his theological texts, Scotus defended reason yet underlined the primacy of love over knowledge, concluding that the essence of beatitude is the love of God.

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, another prolific friar educated at Oxford, was the last major figure representing the Franciscan theological tradition before the Reformation. Controversial and innovative in both theology and politics until his death in 1347, Ockham elaborated reasoned, nuanced positions on Christology, Mariology, the sacraments, divine freedom, and creation and divine power in his commentaries on the Sentences (1317-1321). Drawn into the events surrounding the turbulent papacy of John XXII, he defended the received Franciscan interpretation of evangelical poverty in the Opus nonaginta dierum (1332). Other texts, like the Quodlibetal Questions (1323–1327) and the Treatise on Imperial and Pontifical Power (1347), indicate, respectively, Ockham's willingness to revise previous theological views on the absolute power of God and consider contested political and ecclesial issues.

With few exceptions, the reception and interpretation of Duns Scotus's opus dominated the Franciscan theological tradition after the Reformation to the end of the 19th century. Certainly the writing of Bonaventure, whose synthesis of the spiritual life was widely diffused through vernacular translations, and the writings of others like Peter John Olivi, whose views on evangelical life found favor among the reform minded, were not forgotten. The Franciscan studia, both among the Conventual and Observants after the division of the Minorite Order in 1517, continued to introduce students to a wide diversity of theological texts, often abbreviated, from the Franciscan tradition. Friars on university faculties and elsewhere, however, preferred to comment upon and develop selected Scotist themes in textbook form throughout the Counter-Reformation and Enlightenment. The turn toward historical-critical studies in the 19th century, especially in Germany, resulted in renewed academic interest in diverse representatives of Franciscan theology. Romano Guardini, Wolfhart Pannenberg, Paul Tillich, Hans Urs von Balthasar, Karl Rahner, and Joseph Raztinger are among the theologians of the 20th century who looked to the broad Franciscan tradition in the formulation of their theological worldviews.

The last decades of the 20th century proffered historical studies in Europe and the Americas on myriad aspects of the Franciscan theological tradition, including new perspectives on previously marginalized or forgotten male and female figures. A critical appreciation of the past with an openness to the present possibilities of dialogue may offer the best prospective for the reception of the Franciscan theological tradition in the future. The contemporary quest for truth and the experience of the divine, concern for the environment and social justice, the desire to unite authentic spirituality and science, and respect for a pluralism of belief and culture in the midst of globalization, are but few of the areas where the resources of the Franciscan tradition continue to provide potential inspiration and insight.

FRANCISCANS, FIRST ORDER

The popular name for the Order of Friars Minor (O.F.M.), founded by St. Francis of Assisi in 1209. The formal English term, "Friars Minor," is a literal translation of the Latin fratres minores ("Lesser Brothers"). Over the centuries the Order of Friars Minor has split into several independent congregations. Their common history is treated in this article.

The Lesser Brothers emerged from the "form of Gospel life" chosen by Francis (1181/82-1226) and his first companions in Assisi. Research into their origins over the past quarter of a century has emphasized the essentially lay origins of the movement. Their call "to follow in the footsteps of Jesus Christ'' led Francis and his brothers "to leave the world" by rejecting the structures of Assisi's communal life to live at the margins of society among the poor and the outcasts. Although the life of these early "Lesser Brothers" had a strong eremetical element, they also were convinced they had an evangelical mission to their society. Supporting themselves by whatever trade they knew or by begging, they engaged in informal street preaching to call their hearers to a committed Christian life. The little band received initial papal approval in 1209. What quickly set the Lesser Brothers apart from many other lay penitential groups was their phenomenal expansion, both numerical and geographical. By 1217, they had decided to spread north of the Alps and to the Crusader States, even to Muslim "unbelievers." By 1221, there were between three and five thousand brothers.

Both the Lesser Brothers' rapid growth and their desire to gain official canonical recognition of their novel way of life led them to develop greater internal organization. They soon began conforming to many of the patterns of traditional religious life. A formal version of Francis's Rule of Life was definitively approved in 1223. At the same time, the complexion of the community was quickly changing, as more and more clerics were drawn to the apostolic ideals of the brotherhood. The popes, especially Gregory IX, who canonized Francis in 1228, recognized in the Franciscan movement a potent instrument to implement the pastoral reform vision of the Fourth Lateran Council and increasingly intervened to oversee and channel its growth to this end.

Early Developments. The attitude of Francis himself toward these developments continues to be debated by historians. In any event, whether viewed as a betrayal or a providential evolution, by mid-century the life of the Lesser Brothers was largely focused on the official pastoral ministry of the Church, especially doctrinal and moral preaching and the hearing of confessions. A predominantly lay brotherhood had become an order of educated clerics; the friars largely abandoned their rural hermitages, settling down in urban residences similar to those of canons regular, following a traditional conventual routine with churches to accommodate their growing clientele. To support these apostolic tasks, the earlier strict poverty was relaxed by several Papal interventions. The study houses of the Order in such academic centers as Paris and Oxford produced some of the greatest masters of Scholastic theology, such as Bonaventure (+1274),

John Duns Scotus (+1308), and William of Ockham (+1347).

This rapid transformation provoked serious external and internal crises. Many clergy resented what they viewed as the intrusion of the new mendicant ordersarmed with papal privileges-into the pastoral ministry entrusted to them. Largely exempt from the local hierarchy, the friars' churches were drawing away their audience and their incomes. Their complaints found a voice in a strong theological attack on both the life and ministry of the mendicant orders mounted by several prominent theologians of the University of Paris between 1254 and 1271. The brothers, led by Bonaventure (General Minister from 1257 to 1274), responded by constructed an ideology justifying their pastoral ministry in the Church. They saw their mission as grounded in their perfect observance of the life of Christ and his apostles, particularly evident in their distinctive renunciation of the ownership of property and the use of money. Supported by the papacy, the Franciscans beat back the attempt of some bishops to suppress or restrict them at the Second Council of Lyons in 1274. In 1279 Nicholas III issued an apostolic constitution, Exiit Qui Seminat, which upheld the Franciscan ideology on poverty as official church teaching and also ruled on disputed points of religious observance among the friars. The latter points to the severe crisis of identity that was tearing apart the Order from within.

Poverty Controversy. A vocal minority had resisted the new orientations from the outset; by the end of the century, reacting against what they saw as increasing laxism among the main body of brothers, a protest movement, known as the Spirituals, formed. Influenced by the apocalyptic views of JOACHIM OF FIORE, the Spirituals considered Francis as a prophetic sign of a coming age of renewal in the Church. Any betrayal of his practice of poverty "to the letter' could therefore only be viewed as surrender to the forces of the carnal institutional Church of a passing age. The increasingly acrimonious debate within the Order eventually led to outright schism on the part of the Spirituals and their eventual suppression in a series of decisions by John XXII between 1317 and 1329. However, in the process John also re-interpreted Exiit, condemning the characteristic Franciscan doctrine of the absolute poverty of Christ. The elected leadership of the Order, aided by the writings of William of Ockham, refused to submit to these decisions; they rejected John as a false Pope, seeking refuge in Bavaria with the Emperor Louis IV. The vast majority of the Order remained faithful to John, but with the theoretical underpinnings of their distinctive observance now undercut, the Lesser Brothers soon conformed to the pattern of common ownership of property customary among other religious.

During the latter part of the 14th century, however, a certain reaction to this accommodation set in, with small groups of friars seeking permission to retire to remote houses to live a more primitive form of Franciscan life. Besides attempting to conform to the earlier practice of poverty, this movement, known as the Observant reform, also stressed the eremetical dimension of Franciscan life and the fundamental equality of all friars. These aims originally limited the reformers' engagement in organized pastoral ministries. As the movement gained momentum in the 15th century, tensions within the Order increased between these "Observant" friars and those who wished to maintain the now-traditional practices, known as "Conventuals." This was partially due to the fact that more and more Observants, such as Bernardino of Siena (+1444), were increasingly engaged in the ministry of itinerant popular preaching, thus bringing them into pastoral competition with their Conventual brethren. Wishing to preserve and promote their vision of Franciscan life, the Observants sought protection from superiors they viewed as lax. The papacy acquiesced, granting them virtual autonomy within the structures of the Order in 1446. However, the acrimony between the two parties only continued to increase, finally forcing an ultimate solution: in 1517, Pope Leo X divided the Order into two independent congregations, the Friars Minor of the Regular Observance and the Friars Minor Conventual.

More Divisions. The Regular Observance thus created in 1517 had merged together various local reforms with differing standards. Very quickly, friars dissatisfied with the settlement initiated movements of "stricter observance," leading to the further splintering of the Franciscan Order. The largest of these, originally known as the Friars Minor of the Eremetical Life, but popularly called Capuchin Friars ("the brothers with little hoods") because of their distinctive habit, quickly achieved autonomy in 1528. Characterized by their zeal for the ideals of the primitive Franciscan fraternity and for an intense blending of its contemplative and missionary energies, the Capuchins grew rapidly, playing a prominent role as popular preachers during the Counter-Reformation. They gained total independence as a third congregation of Friars Minor, under their own general minister, in 1619.

Other groups seeking a more austere life also appeared, although they remained under the jurisdiction of the Observant General: the Discalced, led by Peter of Alcantara (+1562), in Spain and Portugal; the Reformed, concentrated in Italy and Eastern Europe; and the Recollects, in France, Germany, the Low Countries, and the British Isles. These three families of "stricter observance" gained considerable autonomy within the Observant branch, organized into their own provinces with their own distinctive statutes. Despite-or because ofthis process of continual fragmentation, the Franciscans flourished during the Counter-Reformation and Baroque periods. They were notably active as missionaries: the Observants and Capuchins within the Spanish, Portuguese, and French colonial dominions, the Conventuals in Eastern Europe. By 1760, the Order reached its peak membership, totaling 130,000 friars in the three congregations.

The next century brought a series of wrenching crises for the Franciscans. First, the Enlightenment reform policies of Spain, Portugal, France, and the Austrian Empire drastically limited recruitment to the Order. Then, in the wake of the French Revolution, governments inspired by liberal anti-clerical ideologies suppressed religious houses in a number of European countries. Finally, Bismarck's Kulturkampf banished the friars from much of Germany in 1875. The breakdown of communal life and the challenge of modern values caused a lack of identity for many Franciscans. By 1880, the three branches of Friars Minor had been reduced to a total of only 25,000 friars. However, new ground for expansion providentially appeared at this point in the rapidly growing church in the United States.

Move to the Americas. Franciscans had been in the Americas from the very beginnings of European exploration. Between 1493 and 1820 almost 8,500 Spanish Franciscans—most members of the Regular Observance—set out for the New World. In what is now the United States, the first permanent Franciscan missions among Native Americans date to the late 16th century. Friars arrived in Florida in 1573, gradually establishing a chain of 36 missions, but the native population was soon depleted due to disease, desertion, and incursions by English raiders. By the early 18th century, only a few Christian Indians remained in the vicinity of St. Augustine. Franciscans also accompanied the Spanish colonizing expedition to New Mexico in 1598, quickly establishing missions among the Pueblo nation. Later efforts extended the evangelizing efforts of Spanish friars to Texas in 1716, Arizona in 1767, and California in 1769. The Franciscan presence in the Southwest began to unravel in the late 18th century, as Spanish and then Mexican policies of secularization gradually forced the withdrawal of the friars from these areas. Franciscans were also active in the French colonies. Recollect friars labored along the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes beginning in 1615; the Capuchins in Acadia from 1632, and in Louisiana from 1722. This presence was dramatically curtailed when New France was ceded to England in 1763.

Although a few missionaries and refugee friars continued to minister in the United States in the early 19th century, Franciscans were able to establish a stable and enduring presence only with the great waves of European immigrants that arrived between 1840 and 1920. The oldest Franciscan jurisdictions presently in the United States trace their origins to friars who came to labor among German-speaking immigrants. Observant friars arrived in Cincinnati in 1844, Conventuals in Texas in 1852, and Capuchins in Wisconsin in 1857. As Italian and Eastern European immigrants began arriving later in the century, friars from those nations arrived to serve them, forming new jurisdictions. The needs of this immigrant population greatly shaped Franciscan life and ministry in the United States, establishing it in patterns quite different from the experience of most friars in Europe. In America, the predominant ministries were parishes and schools; the demands of these institutions forced the modification of the more monastic style of Franciscan life characteristic in Europe, especially in the many smaller houses. But America proved to be fertile soil for Franciscans; by 1960, the Observant friars, generally called simply Franciscans in the United States, were organized into six provinces and several smaller units, with 3,600 friars; the Capuchins into five jurisdictions with 1,100 friars, and the Conventuals into four provinces with 1,000 friars.

New Developments. Meanwhile, in the late 19th century the Order in Europe began experiencing both a numerical and a spiritual rebirth. All three branches of the Order attempted to reestablish Franciscan life by fostering a return to traditional observances and the Order's intellectual tradition. In terms of Franciscan institutional history, the great event of this period was the Leonine Union of 1897, whereby the Recollect, Discalced, and Reformed families were merged back into the Regular Observance to create one Order of Friars Minor (O.F.M.). Participating in the neo-Scholastic revival of the period, the three Franciscan congregations established general study houses in Rome and attempted to recover the distinctive insights of Bonaventure and John Duns Scotus. The period of historical retrieval culminated in the late 1960s with new critical attention on the writings of Francis himself.

This coincided with the massive efforts to renew the Order's life and mission in the wake of the Second Vatican Council. The consequent attempts over the next 30 years to redefine the Franciscan charism and refound the Order on that basis resulted in both liberating and creative ventures and wrenching internal dislocations. Franciscans of all three of the major branches have been part of the general phenomenon of the decline of vocations to religious life, especially in the industrialized nations where the Order had been most strongly established in recent centuries. At the dawn of third Christian millennium, the Friars Minor (O.F.M.) worldwide numbered 17,000, with 1,800 in the United States; the Capuchins numbered 11,300, with 730 in the U.S.; and the Conventuals numbered 4,500, with 620 in the U.S. At the same time, the perennial tendency of Franciscans to form new splinter movements again emerged. Two of these have experienced rapid growth: the Franciscan Friars of the Immaculate, which was recognized as an institute of papal right in 1998, and the Franciscan Friars of the Renewal, an American congregation established in New York in 1987.

FRANCISCANS, SECOND ORDER

The Order of St. Clare, better known as the Poor Clares, dates back to Palm Sunday, 1212, when St. Clare received the habit from St. Francis of Assisi, opening the way for women to join the Franciscan movement. After a very brief stay with the Benedictines of San Paulo and a few months at Sant Angelo with a group now believed to be Beguines, Clare and her first followers, including her blood sister, Agnes, were taken by Francis to San Damiano, the small chapel where he had first heard a voice from the crucifix calling him to "Rebuild my church." Within the enclosure of that monastery the sisters would live the same gospel life as the friars, a life centered around poverty, minority, and community. Francis gave these first Poor Ladies, as he liked to call them, a very brief "form of life" which committed them to "having nothing" either as individuals or as community. Church authorities regarded this non-ownership as being too risky for enclosed women who, unlike the friars, were not free to go out and to work or beg.

In 1215, the Fourth Lateran Council, concerned about the religious groups springing up all over Europe, decreed that new religious communities had to accept one of four existing rules. Francis had already received verbal approval of his rule, but Clare and her sisters had not. The Benedictine rule was closest to the way the sisters were living, but it did not include the Franciscan charism of absolute poverty. Therefore, in 1215-16 Clare applied for and received an indult from Innocent III giving her and her new community the Privilege of Poverty by which "no one can compel you to accept possessions." As part of this same effort to place the new San Damiano community on more solid canonical footing, Francis "almost forced" Clare to assume the role of abbess, a service she would give to her sisters the remaining 40-some years of her life.

Appointed by Honorius III as papal legate, Cardinal Hugolino of Ostia in 1219 gave the Poor Sisters a new constitution, the Rule of Hugolino. Benedictine in character, it lacked the communal poverty so important to Clare's understanding of her form of life. When Hugolino was elected to the papacy in 1227 Clare asked for a renewal of the Privilege of Poverty that had been given her some ten years earlier and this was granted in 1228. Foundations made by the community at San Damiano accepted this Privilege of Poverty but other monasteries continued to follow Hugolino's Form of Life, retaining communal ownership. All were Benedictine by rule rather than being officially incorporated into the Franciscan family.

During the next decades the rapid multiplication of monasteries claiming the same basic inspiration as the Damianites, as the sisters were sometimes called, prompted Innocent IV in 1247 to write still another Form of Life, which, although incorporating Clare and her followers into the Franciscan Order, still permitted communal ownership of property. This rule was never widely accepted by the sisters.

Around this time Clare began work on her own Form of Life which took its inspiration from Francis, including his emphasis on absolute poverty, but also incorporated elements from the legislation of Hugolino and Innocent IV. However, all of these diverse sources were modified by the lived experience of the sisters at San Damiano, making this the first rule written by a woman for women. When Innocent IV came to visit Clare on her deathbed, she requested papal approval of her Form of Life. This she received on Aug. 9, 1253, two days before she died.

Known today as the Primitive Rule, Clare's Form of Life was accepted by the community of San Damiano and by a few other monasteries; others, however, continued to observe either the Rule of Hugolino or that of Innocent IV. In 1263 St. Bonaventure, as minister general of the Franciscan Order, petitioned Pope Urban IV to bring some unity into the observance of Clare's followers. The pope responded by issuing still another rule, which came to be know as the Urbanist Rule; once again communal ownership of property was permitted. This document was the first to use the title "Order of St. Clare."

By 1316, a hundred years after the order's inception, there were 372 Poor Clare monasteries located in places as diverse as Syria, France, Belgium, Spain, Germany, Bohemia, Sweden, Denmark, Cyprus, Greece, and England. New foundations were made in mission lands as the sisters followed and sometimes preceded the evangelizing efforts of the friars. In the early 1400s a return to the original inspiration of Clare, especially in regard to poverty, was initiated by Colette of Corbie; her reform movement came to be known as the Colettine observance. The Order also suffered from the persecutions of this period. In 1539, when all monasteries were suppressed in England, women who wished to become Clares had to go to the Continent to do so. It would be two and half centuries before the order would be reintroduced. In France the Poor Clares of Lyon were condemned to death but were saved from execution by the prior death of Robespierre. But Josephine Leroux, a Poor Clare from Valenciennes, was martyred along with five Ursuline Sisters. Similar hardship, persecution, imprisonment threatened communities in Germany, Spain, Portugal and other countries, yet the order continued to grow and spread.

For more than 700 years the Poor Clares have kept the same form of life: living a purely contemplative religious life in an enclosed community, relating to each other as sister to sister, practicing the total poverty of "possessing nothing" either individually or communally, and offering a life of personal and liturgical prayer as intercession for all God's people. They form a worldwide order of about a thousand monasteries.

The Poor Clares came to the United States in 1875 in the persons of Mother Maddalena Bentivoglio and her sister, Constance, who were commissioned by Pius IX to start a monastery of the Primitive observance in what was then mission country. They opened the first permanent monastery in Cleveland in August 1877, but when other Clares from Germany, led by Mother Veronica von Elmendorff, arrived later that year, Mother Maddalena moved on, first to New Orleans and finally to Omaha, Nebraska where she succeeded in establishing the protomonastery of all those using the initials OSC. The Cleveland monastery became the first U.S. foundation of Colettines, i.e., those using the initials PCC.

All Poor Clare monasteries are autonomous, each with its own abbess, council, chapter, and novitiate and its own nuancing of Clare's original charism. In 1950 the Holy See urged all contemplative monasteries to federate for the purpose of sisterly support and communication. At present there are five such federations in the United States: the Bentivoglio Federation and the Holy Name Federation, which include all the houses that trace their beginning to Mother Maddelena; the Federation of Mary Immaculate which unites the Colettine Poor Clares; the-Federation of the Capuchin Poor Clares who came to the U.S. from Mexico in 1981; and the Poor Clares of Perpetual Adoration who began in the U.S. in 1921 and who have their own PCPA association with their own Constitution based on the Rule of St. Clare. The first Canadian foundation of Colettine Poor Clares was made in Valleyfield, Quebec in 1902. In the western part of Canada several monasteries owe their origin to and are members of the Bentivoglio federation in the United States.

FRANCISCANS, THIRD ORDER REGULAR

The Third Order Regular of Saint Francis traces its historical and spiritual origins to the ancient Order of Penance, the medieval penitential movements, and to Saint Francis of Assisi. Men and women anxious to live a deeper spiritual life looked to Francis of Assisi to give them a "form of life." The Letter to the Faithful, in both the earlier and later editions, embodies this elemental rule of life for lay people living in the world. In time, many of these brothers and sisters of penance left their homes to live either in hermitages or in common life bound by the religious vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience and engaging in the works of mercy. The first official approbation of this movement in Italy was given by Nicholas V, July 20, 1447, in the apostolic letter Pastoralis officii, in which he recommended that these tertiaries constitute themselves as a true mendicant order by holding a general chapter for the election of a visitator or general superior, compiling their own statutes, and selecting their own proper religious habit.

History. From the beginning the rule of life of the Third Order Regular was substantially that of the secular third order, which had been approved by Nicholas IV in the bull Supra montem, Aug. 18, 1289. As the order developed revisions were made, particularly at the chapter of Florence in 1472. Further revisions in the rule and constitutions, done in the 16th century by Bonaventura da Vicenza, were approved in 1549. During the course of the centuries other congregations of the Third Order had arisen in Dalmatia, Germany, France, Holland, Spain, Belgium, and Portugal. With the intention of unifying the internal life of all tertiary Franciscans, Leo X promulgated by means of the bull Inter cetera, Jan. 20, 1521 another rule composed of 10 chapters. This rule, which remained in effect until 1927, did not, however, bind the tertiaries of Italy, Spain, Belgium, and Dalmatia. Sixtus IV granted in 1473 the privilege of exemption and, in 1479, the special privileges enjoyed by all Franciscans.

In the 16th century the Italian congregation, also called the congregation of Lombardy-of which the present male branch of the Third Order Regular of Saint Francis is the continuation-united within itself tertiary groups in Italy, Sicily, and Dalmatia. The congregation of Belgium joined in 1650, and some congregations of southern Germany as well. The rule and constitutions of that period, revised in 1639, 1734, and 1888 were replaced by new legislation in the 20th century. The rule given by Pius XI, Oct. 4, 1927 was extended to all the modern congregations of regular tertiaries of both sexes. New constitutions for the male branch, approved by the same pope on March 7, 1929, were amended and revised in 1940, 1953, 1959, 1969, 1973, and 1992. The Third Order Regular is a member and active participant, along with the Friars Minor, the Conventuals, and the Capuchins, in the conference of Franciscan Ministers General.

Growth in the 20th Century. Events that took place in Italy from 1860 to 1873 brought about in great part the suppression of the order by the civil government. The number of provinces in Italy was reduced to two, namely, the province of Sicily and that of Umbro-Picena (today, Assisi). The dawn of the 20th century saw the order almost extinct, but it found new life as a result of the union of the Spanish congregation, May 13, 1906 and the establishment in the United States, at Loretto, Pa., of the Province of the Sacred Heart. The Spanish congregation had originated in the 13th or 14th century and was approved as a regular order in 1442 by Eugene IV. Suffering many suppressions in the early 19th century, it was revived through the leadership of Fray Antonio Ripoll. The province of the Sacred Heart was made up from two communities of Franciscan Tertiary brothers, one at Spalding, Nebraska and the other at Loretto, Pa., which sought and obtained permission to join the Third Order Regular. Two Italian friars, Jerome Zazzara and Anthony Balestieri, were sent to assist the process of union. The province was established in 1910.

On Oct. 11, 1912, Pius Dujmovic of the Dalmatian province was elected minister general and remained in office for nearly eight years. He promoted the work of restoration by personally visiting the provinces in Italy and the U.S. He began publication of the Analecta T.O.R., the official publication of the Order. His efforts were seriously handicapped during World War I when again the order suffered heavily in Italy and Dalmatia. On Aug.12, 1920, Arnaldo Rigo of the Spanish province was elected minister general and guided the order for 12 years. In that same year a group of friars from Sacred Heart Province formed the Commissariate of the Immaculate Conception to care for Italian immigrants in the diocese of Altoona, Pa. In 1925 this commissariate was established as a province. In 1924 the Spanish province established a commissariate in North America with houses in New York, New Jersey, Texas and Mexico. Later, friars living and working in Texas and Mexico were gathered into the Vice Province of Santa Maria de Guadalupe. The following year, 1925, the Dalmatian province established a commissariate in Pittsburgh, Pa., to care for Croatian immigrants. In 2001, few friars continued to minister in the United States but many served Croatian immigrants in Germany.

The pattern of growth continued through the general administrations of six successive minister generals. Giovanni Parisi, nominated May 26, 1936, expressed a desire that the order extend itself to the foreign missions. In 1938, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith assigned a territory in the diocese of Patna, India. Under the leadership of Father Eugene George, then minister provincial, friars from the Province of the Sacred Heart began this work. In 1971, this mission was established as the province of Saint Thomas the Apostle. In 1996, two commissariates were additionally formed: that of Saint Francis in Ranchi and the other of Saint Louis in Bangalore. Most recently, in 1999, the commissariate in Ranchi was raised to the status of a vice province.

During the generalate of John Bocella, (1947–1965), mission territory in Paraguay was entrusted to the care of friars from the Assisi Province in 1951 and additional territory in the same country entrusted to friars from the Immaculate Conception province in the U.S. in 1960. Both of these groups of friars with indigenous vocations were formed into the Vice Province of Saint Anthony in 1992. In 1955, the Tertiaries of Albi, France, along with their missions in Brazil, were united to the Third Order Regular. This group of friars was founded in 1866 by Francis M. Causade and approved in 1873. They may be considered to be a revival of the ancient French Franciscan congregation known as the "Picpus" founded in 1287 by Barthélemy Béchin. In 1962, the U.S. Province of the Sacred Heart accepted another Brazilian mission in the diocese of Borba. All of the friars working in Brazil along with native vocations now form the Vice Province of Nossa Senhora de Aparecida established in 1992.

The generalate of Louis Secondo (1964–1977) was marked by an extraordinary general chapter given over to the mandate of the Second Vatican Council to return to the spirit of the founder and to adapt to the signs of the times. Consultation among the members of the provinces resulted in experimental constitutions (1969) that, after the period of experimentation, were later examined and codified. During his term the collaborative work on a new Rule was begun with the Madrid Conference of 1974. It would be completed by his successor.

In 1982, the minister general, Roland Faley (1977–1983), formally united two additional diocesan congregations with the Third Order Regular. The Franciscan Familiars of Saint Joseph, a community organized by the vicar apostolic of Marianhill (Republic of South Africa) in 1923 to live and work among the Zulu people was established as the Vice Province of Saint Joseph. And in the same year, the Congregation of Native Brothers of Saint Vincent de Paul organized in 1877 by Fr. Luigi Piccinelli in Ceylon (Sri Lanka) to care for orphans and to teach was established as the Vice Province of Our Lady of Sri Lanka.

In 1991, a small group of friars in Gothenburg, Sweden, was united to the TOR under the leadership of general minister, José Angulo Quilis (1983–1995). This group, originally Lutheran, shared an attraction to St. Francis and welcomed men and women in need of personal care or spiritual guidance. Today they comprise the Delegation of Saint John the Baptist. In 1999, under the guidance of minister general Bonaventure Midili (1995–), the Delegation of Saint Bonaventure was established in Bangladesh. Notable Figures. Several members of the order have made notable contributions to studies. John P.M. Doyle (1874–1952) of the Sacred Heart Province (U.S.) taught philosophy and theology at St. Francis College and Seminary and edited four books on these sciences. Raniero Luconi (1878–1951) was a historian and for many years editor of the Analecta, T.O.R.. Bartolomé Salvá (1867–1956) was a student and editor of the works of Bl. Raymond Lull. Historians Raffaele Pazzelli, Lino Temperini and Gabriele Andreozzi have written extensively about the penitential charism and history of the Third Order of Penance.

Inclusive Third Order Regular. Beginning in the late 1950s there had been some attempt to dialogue with male tertiary congregations who followed the common rule of the TOR (1927). This dialogue was expanded in the 1970s to include the many women's congregations who also followed that rule. Encouraged by the mandate of Vatican II to return to the historical and spiritual sources, this expanded and inclusive dialogue moved slowly toward the creation of a new rule. With approximately 200 superiors general, representing 35 countries and almost 200,000 Third Order Regular religious, and after much study and deliberation, the text for the new rule was approved in March 1982. It received papal approbation on Dec. 8, 1982. These varied male and female congregations known collectively as the Brothers and Sisters of the Third Order of Saint Francis are represented internationally by the International Franciscan Conference (CFI) with executive offices in Rome, Italy. The president of the CFI joins with the general minister of the Secular Franciscan Order (SFO) and the four ministers general (OFM, OFM Conv, OFM Cap, and TOR) to form the Conference of the Franciscan Family through which they have a common voice. In the United States, the Franciscan Federation with executive offices in Washington, D.C., serves as the umbrella organization and voice for the 12,000 plus male and female members of the TOR in the U.S.

FRANCISCANS, THIRD ORDER SECULAR

An autonomous lay order, properly called the Secular Franciscan Order (formerly "Third Order of St. Francis"). It is open to men and women, married and single, as well as to diocesan bishops, priests, and deacons who are not members of religious orders. It is the only lay Franciscan order. Its members are bound by a life commitment to live the gospel according to their state of life. They are organized into local self-governing "fraternities" assisted by regional, national, and international fraternities. A minister general, elected by the S.F.O. general chapters, leads the S.F.O. with a general council at the international level. Each level of fraternity also has a spiritual assistant from one of the religious orders of Franciscan men and women.

Origins. When Francis of Assisi decided to enter into conversion (penance), in his own words, he "left the world," that is, he began reducing his personal material needs in order to be free to love and serve the Lord. St. Francis was the first of a long line of "Penitents from Assisi"—all within a larger penitential movement which dates from the beginning of the Church. Some Franciscan Penitents became celibate brothers (friars) in a religious order of men (the "First Order"), and women like St. Clare became cloistered sisters (the "Second Order"). Most Franciscan Penitents were not called by God to leave their marriages and children, nor their ordinary lives. Francis's Letter to All the Faithful, describing what it means to be part of the penitential (conversion) process, is used to introduce the new S.F.O. Rule.

Various editions of a Rule and other instructions for lay Franciscans were approved by the Holy See to help them in their conversion process. In 1893 Pope Leo XIII issued a new Rule for the "Third Order Secular of St. Francis." This new Rule changed the direction of growth in the Order from an autonomous lay order to a quasi religious order subject to the authority of Friars of the three branches of the First Order and the Third Order Regular. This artificially divided the one S.F.O. into four orders. "Third Order Secular" Franciscans took up many customs of religious orders, none of which were appropriate for a lay order.

The New Rule. In 1976 Pope Paul VI approved a new Rule of the S.F.O. that reasserts the basic autonomy and unity of the order and its interdependence with other Franciscan men and women in the world. At the same time it affirms the independence of the S.F.O. from the Friars' Orders. The Holy See approved the General Constitutions of the S.F.O. in 1995. These were revised by the S.F.O. General Chapter of 1999, and the revisions were approved in 2000.

Franciscan brothers and sisters of the various Franciscan religious orders now help S.F.O. Fraternities as "spiritual assistants." A tangible sign of their decision to convert their hearts, usually a Tau cross, is worn by the Seculars to show who they are. However, the testimony of their love for one another, their dedication to living the gospel of Jesus within the Catholic Church, and their care for the poor are the clearest signs of conversion.

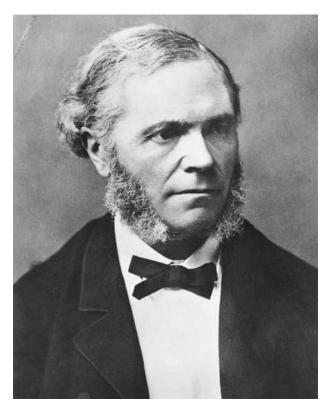

Model for Lay Spirituality. The Second Vatican Council called all the orders in the Church, religious and lay, to study their roots in order to renew their life within the Church. The new Rule of Paul VI for the S.F.O. enables lay Franciscans to return to their original calling within the Church. The focus of the new Rule is on conversion, on opening hearts to the work of the Holy Spirit, to enable Franciscan laity to live their baptismal vocation. The new S.F.O. Rule sets the gospel of Jesus as the anchor of spiritual life. Secular Franciscans are to read and live the gospel, "going from Gospel to life and life to Gospel." In the Rule there are five specific areas of ministry for Secular Franciscans: (1) formation of each other in gospel living, (2) promotion of family life, (3) working for peace and justice for all peoples, (4) protection of all of Creation, (5) reverence for work as a gift from God. Secular Franciscans are to be active members of their parish churches and dioceses, leading by their good example. Eucharist and the Liturgy of the Hours, active care for the poor, and a desire to be leaven in society are marks of Secular Franciscan life.

FRANCK, CÉSAR AUGUSTE

Important composer of the romanticist period; b. St. Croix (Liège), Belgium, Dec. 22, 1822; d. Paris, Nov. 8, 1890. Although by birth a Walloon, he became absorbed into French culture, was naturalized in 1873, and is regarded as a French composer. He studied at the Liège and Paris conservatories, becoming organ professor at the latter in 1872. He had aspired to a career as virtuoso pianist, and concentrated practice gave him an abnormal hand-stretch that influenced his creative pianism. Although three early piano trios (1841) suggested what was to follow, it was only between 1860 and 1862 that his first really important music appeared, Six Pièces for organ—a direct consequence of his appointment in 1858 as organist at Sainte-Clothilde, where he could give full vent in his extemporizations to his simple and ardent faith. His religiosity has been distorted; the picture painted by his adoring pupil Vincent d' INDY is one of a bigoted and consummate prig. This he was not; he was simply a good man and a staunch believer, who spoke to God through his music. The gallery of Sainte-Clothilde, his house in Boul' Mich, and later the organ room at the conservatory thronged with young musicians (not all his pupils) who were introduced there to the beauties of Bach and Beethoven and his own improvisations. His "liturgical" compositions are undistinguished; his concert works, however, reflect his spiritual preoccupation as well as his improvisatory technique. There are few composers whose sincerity is so overt as was his in everything he wrote.

César Auguste Franck. (Corbis/Bettman)

Musically he may be regarded as the father of modern harmony. He formulated a distinctive school of composers whose style was basically contrapuntal in structure yet lyrical in intent; and he moved French music from operatic domination to an "absolute" and symphonic position. His own output was not large, but it includes several masterpieces among the genres he essayed. Such are his monumental oratorio, Les Béatitudes; his violin sonata, string quartet, and piano quintet; and his extended orchestral works, notably the Symphonic Variations and D-Minor Symphony, both popular perennials of the concert repertory. His organ works and the two great solos for piano are acknowledged classics of their instruments.

FRANCKE, AUGUST HERMANN

German Pietist, Protestant educational theorist, sense realist, and practical reformer; b. Lübeck, March 22, 1663; d. Halle, June 8, 1727. After studying for the Lutheran ministry at the Universities of Erfurt and Kiel, he received his degree from Leipzig in 1685. Francke founded a Bible study club, the Collegium Philobiblicum, that attracted Philipp Jakob SPENER, the court preacher at Dresden who converted Francke to PIETISM. In 1689 Francke won the post of lecturer on the Bible at the University of Leipzig, but his Pietist views angered the Lutheran clergy who forced his resignation. The newly founded University of Halle then offered him a professorate in Greek and Oriental languages and later in theology and a pastorate in the adjoining town of Glaucha. For the remaining 36 years of his life Francke taught at the university and preached to his parishioners at Glaucha.

Francke's work in education exerted great influence throughout the Protestant sections of the Germanies. In 1692 at Glaucha he opened an elementary school supported by alms to educate the poor. As an innovation he used needy university students as tutors, who in return received guidance and free attendance at the university lectures in Halle. Soon after the rich demanded and received a Latin school for their sons. In 1695 Francke started an orphans' school that ran a printing press, paper mill, book store, and dispensary. Within three years this practical school, taught by university students, numbered 100 resident pupils and 500 day scholars.

Student teachers trained in Francke's teacher's seminaries carried throughout Europe and incorporated into elementary and secondary schools his main educational ideas: special care and training for orphans; training of teachers; emphasis on practical subjects-vernacular, arithmetic, geography, useful arts, foreign languageand practical piety in everyday life. As a professor, Francke, together with his collaborators, succeeded in making Halle the first modern university by substituting German for Latin as the lecture language; placing scientific studies alongside law, medicine, and theology; and introducing the principle of ACADEMIC FREEDOM made operative through research. Other European universities followed the example of Halle, and in the United States, the Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, Md., in 1867 took it as its model and became the first graduate school in the Americas.

FRANCO LIPPI, BL.

Carmelite lay brother; b. Grotti, near Siena, Italy, Dec. 3, 1211; d. Siena, Dec. 11, 1291. After a scandalous life as a condottiere, he was blinded in battle at the age of 50 and vowed to change his life and go on at pilgrimage to SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA if cured. St. James answered his prayers, and his sight was restored. After visiting Rome, he returned to Siena to take up the penitential life of a hermit, which he continued when he later became a CARMELITE lay brother. Living in a little cell close to the chapel of Our Lady, he overcame various temptations of the devil and was comforted by appearances of Our Lord and Our Lady. He was said to have enjoyed also the gift of prophecy. His body was exhumed 50 years after death, and part of his relics were taken to Cremona, while the remainder are still venerated in the Carmelite church in Siena. His cult was approved by Pope CLEMENT V in 1308, and he has been in Carmelite liturgy since 1672. Many 17th-century confraternities, especially in Spain, were dedicated in his honor. He should not be confused with another Sienese Francis, the Blessed Servite Francesco of Siena (d. 1328), as is done in G. Lombardelli's La Vita del b. Franco Sensese da Grotti (Siena 1590).

Feast: Dec. 11.

FRANCO OF COLOGNE

Medieval music theorist; fl. 1250-80. Nothing is known of his life except that he was a papal chamberlain and preceptor of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem at Cologne. The only reference to his compositions is a statement by Jacob of Liège about a three-part motet heard in Paris. The same writer describes Franco as Teutonicus (German), perhaps to distinguish him from an earlier Franco of French birth. His reputation rests on one genuine treatise, Ars cantus mensurabilis (c. 1260), which presents a system of setting down music whereby rhythmical and metrical matters are dealt with clearly, logically, and scientifically. Previous methods had tended to be ambiguous and vague, hindering the development of polyphony. Franco's system found many imitators in Italy, France, and England, and some aspects remained in force until the 16th century. His definitions of discant, hocket, copula, and organum are classics of their kind, combining brevity, accuracy, and pertinent musical illustration.

[D. STEVENS]

FRANGIPANI

A noble Roman family influential in affairs of the papacy and the Empire from the early 11th to the end of the 13th century. The name first appears in 1014, when a Leo de Imperio or de Imperatore qui vocatur Frangapane signed a placitum relative to the abbey of Farfa. De imperatore shows adherence to the imperial cause, and it has been suggested that the qui vocatur indicates the then recent origin of the family name. Another witness to the 1014 agreement was a Petrus de Imperato, head of the city militia; the name appears in Roman records from 960 on. De imperatore without "Frangipane" is found frequently until 1042, then disappears. The family name has various forms: Fragapane and Frajapane (1014), Fricapanem (1094), Fraiapanem (1116); and in the 12th century Friapane and Fraiapanis vary with Fragenspanem or Frangenspanem.

The legend connecting the origin of the family with the old Roman Anicii and the name with an 8th-century member, Flavius, who provided bread (frangebat panem) for the people during a famine, is without foundation.

In Rome the Frangipani possessed the large holdings extending along the Palatine, the Forum, Via sacra, Coliseum, and the Circus Maximus, and centered in the fortified tower near the Arch of Titus. This tower, the Turris cartularia temporarily housed a portion of the papal archives. In the beginning of the 12th century the family was divided into three branches: de Cartularia, de Septizonio, and de Gradellis, and acquired many lands in Campagna, Marittima, and Terracina. They held Ninfa in fief from the pope until 1213, and dominated Marino, Torri, Astura, and Cisterna until these yielded to GAETANI influence in the 13th century; Nemi was acquired by the Frangipani in the 16th century.

Increasingly prominent during the GREGORIAN RE-FORM, the Frangipani vacillated as circumstances demanded between supporting the papacy and the Empire, always opposing the other baronial families, first the PIERLEONI, then the Annibaldi and the Gaetani. In 1061 Cencio Frangipani supported Hildebrand in obtaining the election of ALEXANDER II, and in 1084 he aided Robert Guiscard's entry into Rome to liberate GREGORY VII. Under Cencio's son Giovanni, URBAN II received hospitality and refuge in 1093 at the Turris cartularia, and in 1108 PASCHAL II entrusted the government of Benevento to Leone Frangipani.

When Emperor HENRY V went into Italy, the Frangipani shifted to the imperial side. Cencio II, a follower of Henry V, took GELASIUS II prisoner in 1118. This opposition to the papacy continued under CALLISTUS II, who destroyed the Frangipani towers to obtain their submission. The Frangipani reached the height of their power when their candidate, HONORIUS II, was elected in 1124. They continued more or less loyal to the papacy during the 12th century, but in the following century they took part in the uprisings against the papacy and aided FREDERICK II against GREGORY IX and INNOCENT IV. They sold their strongholds in Rome to the Emperor and received them back from him in fief; with his help they rebuilt the destroyed Turris cartularia. Toward the end of Frederick II's reign the Frangipani shifted again to the papal side, and because of this defection Frederick took back their fiefs to Taranto and Otranto.

into the 17th century. Families elsewhere claimed descent from the Frangipani of Rome and assumed the name. The Frangipani of Croatia, who held Modrus, Tersato, and the island of Veglia, claimed descent from the Roman house, but on the basis of false documents. The Frangipani of Friuli, who also claimed a Roman origin, held Tarcento and Castel Porpeto; this family is still extant. It is uncertain whether ANTIPOPE Innocent III (Lando of Sezze) 1179, and Leo de Monumento, supporter of Henry VI, belonged to the Frangipani family.

The following are prominent members of the Roman branch of the Frangipani family: Aldruda, Countess of Bertinoro, who in 1174, with Guglielmo Marchesella of Ferrara, led the troops who freed Ancona from the siege of the Germans. Jacoba, wife of Graziano Frangipani of Settisoli, friend and follower of St. Francis of Assisi (buried near his tomb in the Assisi basilica). Guglielmo, d. 1337, archbishop of Patras (1317), who excommunicated the Catalonian Company in 1331. Muzio, husband of Julia Strozzi and leader of the papal auxiliaries to France in 1569. Silvester (Ignatius Ciantes), Dominican; b. 1594; d. 1667; provincial of the order in Sicily, then in Apulia, Calabria, and later England; author of several ecclesiastical works. Pietro Francesco Orsini (BENEDICT XIII), Dominican; b. 1649; d. 1730; son of Giovanna Frangipani of Tolpha.

A number of the members of the Neapolitan branch are noteworthy: Giovanni, Count of Astura, famous for the capture of Conradin of Swabia in 1268. Fabio Mirto, d. March 17, 1587; governor of the Marches and of Perugia, 1559; bishop of Cajazzo, 1537, of Barletta-Nazareth, 1572; participant in the Council of Trent, 1562 to 1572, 1577 to 1587; nuncio to Paris, 1568 to 1572. Ottavio Mirto, nephew of Fabio, son of Sylvio Frangipani Mirto; b. 1542 or 1543; d. 1612; bishop of Cajazzo, 1572; governor of Bologna under Gregory XIII; bishop of Tricario, 1592; nuncio to Cologne and the Low Countries, 1587 to 1596, to Brussels, 1596 to 1606; archbishop of Taranto, 1605. Ottavio Fraja, Benedictine; b. 1783; d. 1843; librarian at Monte Cassino, collaborator of Cardinal Angelo MAI, noted paleographer.

FRANK, JACOB

Jewish pseudo-Messiah; b. Korolowska (Podolia), Poland, c. 1726; d. Offenbach (Hesse), Germany, 1791. Frank flourished in a time of economic and political insecurity for the Jewish community and of spiritual confusion resulting from the exposure of the messianic pretensions of Shabbetai Zevi (see SHABBATIISM), which, while disillusioning many of the latter's followers, persuaded many others that his conversion to Islam was a necessary condition to the fulfillment of his messianic claims.

Having grown up in an atmosphere filled with mystical aberration and superstition, and having received a poor Jewish education, Frank was attracted early to the teachings of the Shabbatians whom he met in Turkey, where he had settled as a merchant. Adapting the beliefs and practices of this semi-Islamic cult to his purposes, he returned to Podolia in 1755, where, through clandestine meetings characterized by mystical formulas and erotic behavior, he assumed leadership as the reincarnation of Shabbetai Zevi, the second person of a trinitarian doctrine.

The Jewish community, scandalized by the activities of the Frankists, reported them, to the authorities in 1756, resulting in Frank's expulsion from Poland as a Turk and his followers' excommunication by the rabbis for gross violations of Jewish observance and morality. As anti-Talmudists and Trinitarians, the sectarians sought relief from the archbishop of Podolia, who granted them his protection and convened a public disputation between them and the rabbis. This concluded with the Jewish community being compelled to pay their opponents a heavy indemnity and publicly burning copies of the Talmud. Reappearing in Podolia, Frank convinced his adherents to adopt Christianity as a cover for their messianic expectations, and in 1759 the Frankists negotiated with the Catholic Church for their conversion, requesting another public disputation, wherein they attempted unsuccessfully to demonstrate a Talmudical basis for the blood accusation.

After a pomp-filled conversion ceremony, which included the participation of the royal house, reports of non-Christian preachings and practices by the converts confirmed the Church authorities' growing suspicion of Frank's hypocrisy. After a trial for heresy in 1760, he was imprisoned for 13 years, during which time he vigorously propagandized his cause. He was released by the Russians in 1772 at the first partition of Poland.

Leaving Poland, Frank had some success in Moravia, and finally established himself in a palace in Offenbach, giving himself the title of baron. Supported by the gifts of his devotees, he and his daughter, Eve, "the Holy Lady," lived a life of luxury. After Frank's death, Eve assumed the leadership of the sect, but her father's supporters did not transfer their loyalty to her, either in spirit or in coin, and at her death in 1816 she was destitute. As for the Frankists, they merged into their surroundings, eventually disappearing as a sect.

FRANKENBERG, JOHANN HEINRICH

Archbishop of Malines and primate of Belgium (1759–1801); b. Grosglogau, Silesia, Sept. 18, 1726; d. Breda, Holland, June 11, 1804. As the scion of an old Silesian noble family, he studied philosophy in Breslau and theology at the Collegium Germanicum in Rome, where, when still a young student, he drew the attention of Pope Benedict XIV. In 1750, he was ordained and made assistant to the apostolic vicar and later archbishop of Gorizia, Karl Michael Count Attems. He was dean of the Chapterhouse in Prague (1754) and dean of Bunzlau, Bohemia (1755). On Jan. 20, 1778, Frankenberg was appointed archbishop of Malines by MARIA THERESA, and he was created a cardinal by Pope Pius VI.

JOSEPHINISM, the system that Maria Theresa had introduced into her patrimonial dominions, was felt only mildly in the Belgian Church, so that Cardinal Frankenberg could discharge his office of metropolitan without great difficulty. As early as 1782, however, Emperor Joseph, disregarding the totally different Belgian conditions, thwarted the attempt of the Belgian episcopate to proceed collectively in the problem of mixed marriages, which had become acute because of the Emperor's proclamation of his Tolerance Decree on Dec. 13, 1781. In 1786, in the matter of the erection of a general seminary at Louvain, the ruler provoked the public opposition of Cardinal Frankenberg, who refused to send his pupils to the seminary founded and conducted by the government. Frankenberg was called to Vienna, where the Emperor tried in vain to win the archbishop over to his views. Back in Malines, supported by the other Belgian bishops, he continued his opposition until in August 1789, a popular uprising forced the Emperor formally to decree the reestablishment of the episcopal seminaries. But when open civil war broke out in October, the cardinal fled in order to escape imprisonment. When Austrian rule and, in its wake, religious peace, were reestablished, Frankenberg returned to his diocese. A few years later, he opposed French measures hostile to the Church, and was forced to leave the country (1797). The cardinal went first to Borken, in Münsterland, and, when the Prussians expelled him, to Breda.

FRANKFURT SCHOOL

The Frankfurt School, most famous for its Critical Theory, was conceived in 1922 by Felix Weil. His family fortune provided for both the inauguration of the Frankfurt Institute of Social Research in Frankfurt, Germany and the financial independence necessary for its members to perform the envisaged social research and theoretical speculation both there and elsewhere, especially in the United States, during the period of exile caused by Nazism. Officially erected in 1923, the Institute only began to develop the approach which later characterized it in 1930 under the leadership of Max Horkheimer (1895–1973). He remained director of the Institute until his retirement. He and Theodor Adorno (1903-1969) are most closely identified with both the Institute and the development of its Critical Theory. Among others associated with the institute, the more well known are W. Benjamin, F. Pollock, and especially in the United States, P. Tillich, E. Fromm, H. Marcuse, and J. Habermas.

General Theory. In order to produce a new critical theory, the Frankfurt School attempted a fusion of Marx's socio-economic with Freud's psychoanalytic critique. Originally directed precisely against the capitalist economic system and its concomitant implicit ontology, the new Critical Theory soon widened its scope to include the "whole (of reality)," which it deemed to be a "totally administered world," and, hence, destructive of individual human persons, their freedom, their pleasure, their being. Thus, "the (empirical) whole is the untrue." Consequently, Critical Theory rejected both the more recent positivism, empiricism, and scientism as well as the older classical metaphysical systems, because both inherently tend to accept and equate any given particular state of reality with reality pure and simple. According to Critical Theory, the malaise of modern man is rooted specifically in the Enlightenment, but can be traced all the way back to the dawn of human consciousness and reflective thinking. The exploitation of nature and the alienation of humanity involved in this beginning have intensified steadfastly and culminated in the capitalist economic system, whose own proper fruit has been the mass culture and consumer civilization, so typical of the West, but inexorably infecting all mankind. The result is the total and seemingly incurable alienation of man—not only economic, social, cultural, but also ontological.

A Theological Dimension. Although some thinkers associated with the Frankfurt School have remained steadfastly atheistic, there is discernible in the writings of especially Benjamin and the later Horkheimer and Adorno what has been termed a theological dimension. Thus Adorno and Horkheimer have been led to the conclusion that, since "the whole is the untrue," the appeal to or "longing for the entirely other" is not absolutely reprobate, although it "is, to be sure, a nonscientific wish." However, on the basis of their fear of and opposition to the cheap reconciliation advocated in customary metaphysical systems (German Idealism) and the reduction of everything to the status of means in contemporary empiricist scientism, they remain decidedly dedicated to their Negative Dialectic. By it alone can the temptation to absolutize the present moment be overcome. Thus their admittedly impressive achievement remains but a negative critique. Hence their noble aim of overcoming the split in human consciousness, of reconciling subject and object, person and nature, of restoring paradise (the influence, however implicit and unreflective, of the Jewish background of many members of the Frankfurt School ought never be overlooked) was essentially beyond attainment. The thin line between Judeo-Christian negative theology and rationalist agnosticism is strikingly manifest in their thought.

Writings. Horkheimer and Adorno not only thought together, they also wrote together Dialectic of Enlightenment (New York 1944, 1972). The foundation of Critical Theory, as well as of all their later writings, was provided by that book along with Horkheimer's Eclipse of Reason (New York 1947, 1974) and Adorno's Minima Moralia (Frankfurt, 1951, 1976). Their entire work can be viewed, as they themselves viewed it, as ''a critique of philosophy, and therefore (it) refuses to abandon philosophy.'' Their journey, starting in the culture of assimilated German Jewry, took them through classical Greek and modern European philosophy as well as the Marxist and Freudian critiques to a head-on confrontation with contemporary mass-consumer culture, created by technological rationalism. They were philosophers characterized by a refusal to accept human suffering, by a demand for justice in a world where injustice at least seems to triumph. Hence they were led to define the human being as the "Longing for the Entirely Other," the title of what may be termed Horkheimer's last will and testament (Die Sehnsucht nach dem ganz Anderen, Hamburg 1970). For theistic thinkers their writings are clearly an inspiration and a challenge, for the philosophy of religion an especially fertile source of new insights about the transcendent, both human and divine.

FRANKS

A people of Germanic origin who played a decisive role in shaping western European history during four centuries extending from the late 5th to the late 10th century. During that period the term "Frank" assumed different meanings depending on the historical situation.

The Franks were mentioned for the first time in Roman written texts in the 3rd century in connection with Germanic raids across the Rhine frontier. The term, meaning "hardy" or "brave", referred not to a unified political and ethnic entity, that is, not to a gens or nation, but to loose, constantly shifting confederations involving various related tribes, each with its own name, living east of the lower Rhine. From time to time these tribes joined hands temporarily to raid Roman territory, to defend against other Germanic groups, or to fight other confederations. From the late 3rd century onward the Roman imperial government began to utilize members of what one modern authority called "this swarm of tribes" for a variety of purposes: settlement as war prisoners on abandoned farm land west of the Rhine; recruitment as auxiliaries in army units assigned throughout the Roman empire; acceptance as imperial allies (foederati) granted lands in return for military service. Some tribes continued to raid Roman territory in search of booty to take back to their original lands east of the Rhine. This ambiguous relationship, continuing throughout the 4th and 5th centuries, resulted in the settlement of many Franks on Roman soil, especially along the northeast frontier. Archaeological evidence, chiefly from grave sites, demonstrates that these newcomers adapted many aspects of Gallo-Roman life without entirely abandoning their Germanic culture or their connections with the Germanic world east of the Rhine. Some individual Franks even rose to high status in the Roman world as generals and even consuls. But in the larger picture marking the decline and dissolution of the Roman Empire, the Franks remained an obscure, relatively insignificant force.

Tribal Migrations. As the 5th century progressed that picture began to change. On the larger scene entire Germanic "nations" led by well-established kings migrated en masse into the western part of the Roman Empire and eventually established independent kingdoms: VISIGOTHS, VANDALS, Burgundians, Ostrogoths, ANGLO-SAXONS. So complete was the dismemberment of the Empire that after 476 there ceased to be an emperor in the West. Roman Gaul was decisively affected by this process. The Burgundians occupied the Rhône valley, and the Visigoths took control of the lands south of the Loire River. The territory between the Loire and the Rhine, increasingly under control of military figures who claimed to represent the Roman government, provided the setting in which the Franks began to make their mark on history. Unlike the Germanic nations noted above, the Franks did not take possession of this area as a politically unified people. Rather, different groups from the "swarm of tribes" that together comprised the Franks slowly penetrated south and west from their original homeland on the right bank of the lower Rhine, a process that was often facilitated by the Roman imperial government. As the infiltration continued and the newcomers took up permanent residence, the tribal groups became more effectively organized under chiefs whose role was fundamentally military. Two such groupings became especially important. One involved Franks who moved south on both sides of the Rhine to establish an area of dominance centered around Cologne; this group would later be known as the Ripuarian Franks. The second group, called the Salian Franks, originally settled just south of the mouth of the Rhine in Batavia. From there the Salians expanded southward, eventually establishing control over old Roman cities such as Cambrai, Tournai, and Arras, and over the Gallo-Roman population that had long occupied that area. During that expansion the Salian Franks usually supported the authorities claiming to represent the Roman imperial government, especially in military operations such as those mounted to halt the intrusion of the Hunnic ruler Attila into Gaul or to block the Visigoth kingdom from expansion north of the Loire. For that effort the Salian leaders were well rewarded, as is illustrated by the rich contents of tomb of King Childeric (reigned 458–481) found at Cambrai in 1653. Childeric's career also made it clear that the newcomers were slowly replacing the Romans as the effective rulers of northern Gaul.

The Merovingians. It was a Salian king, CLOVIS (reigned 481 or 482–511) and the dynasty he founded, the MEROVINGIANS, who elevated the Franks to a central position in western part of the Roman Empire. One of Clovis' chief accomplishments was his unification of the "swarm of tribes" into a single political entity, an end Clovis achieved by the brutal murder of the leaders of rival tribes of Franks. He and his sons mounted a series of military campaigns that established Frankish rule over all of Gaul except small territories occupied by the Gascons, the Bretons, and the Visigoths in Septimania. While conquering Gaul the Merovingians also asserted their authority in varying degrees over Germanic peoples living east of the Rhine, including the Thuringians, the Alemanni, the Bavarians, and the Saxons. The might of the Franks was felt even in northern Italy as a result of their involvement in the sequence of events that witnessed the end of the Ostrogothic kingdom and the establishment of the Lombard kingdom. By the end of the Merovingian dynasty in 751 a succession of kings of Frankish descent had created Francia, a term used to describe a unified political entity that represented the most powerful and the most enduring of all the Germanic kingdoms established in the western part of the Roman Empire.

But the Frankish leaders of the Merovingian dynasty had achieved more. Despite the violence and brutality that characterized their rule, the Merovingian kings played a key role in creating a milieu in which the Frankish newcomers and the established Gallo-Roman elite gradually intermixed to create an aristocracy whose members considered themselves Franks, increasingly defined as freemen of any ethnic origin who accepted the overlordship of a Frankish king. The melding of Germans and Gallo-Romans was encouraged by the Merovingian system of government, which vested authority in a king as a war leader and his personal followers who were rewarded for serving the king loyally. By dispersing their wealth gained from seizure of the Roman public lands, from booty acquired through military victories, and from property confiscated from their political enemies, the kings were able to draw to their court both Frankish and Gallo-Roman aristocrats eager for wealth and status. Through family ties and friendship bonds those who had the king's trust drew an ever widening circle toward identification with the cause of the king. Religion provided another matrix linking the two populations. One of the highlights of Clovis' reign was his conversion to orthodox Christianity; in contrast with other Germanic kings who were Arians, Clovis thereby became the champion of the religion accepted by the bulk of the population in the West. Clovis' Frankish companions soon followed the example of their leader, thereby becoming Christians who shared a common ground with the Gallo-Roman aristocrats. The Frankish warriors who often received grants of land in return for their loyalty to their king found it sensible to adopt the prevailing agricultural system based on large estates tilled by a dependent population; this accommodation provided another common ground to share with their Gallo-Roman counterparts. All of these factors combined to erode slowly the distinctions between Franks and Gallo-Romans, forming in the process a homogeneous elite, which increasingly conceived themselves as Franks, that is, free men living under the overlordship of a Frankish ruler. The end product was the formation of the last of the Germanic gentes who shared in the dismemberment of the Roman Empire, the "Frankish nation", a nation formed after the great migrations through a process of assimilation and accommodation that provided elements of strength which permitted the Franks to play a decisive role in the development of the post-Roman western Europe world.

The Carolingian Dynasty. During the course of the 7th and early 8th centuries the Merovingian kings were increasingly stripped of their power and wealth by the very same aristocratic families that had long supported them in their rise to power. Finally, in 751 one of those factions brought the Merovingian dynasty's rule over the kingdom of the Franks to an end. That faction was led by a member of a powerful aristocratic family of Frankish origins, later known as the CAROLINGIANS. In many ways the new rulers sought to continue the Frankish ways of their Merovingian predecessors. They titled themselves "kings of the Franks". They continued to be successful warrior kings, greatly expanding their political sway by subduing the Frisians, the Saxons, the LOMBARDS in Italy, the Avars in the Danube valley, Muslims in northeastern Spain, and the Aquitainians. These conquests allowed the kings to continue rewarding their followers, thus sustaining the aristocracy whose members counted themselves Franks. The Carolingian rulers retained the basic structures of government that had emerged under Merovingian rule in a fashion that prolonged the Frankish flavor of their rule; one of their chief concerns as rulers was to make more effective the political mechanisms which allowed the central government to restrain the ambitions of aristocratic families. They lent their efforts to strengthening the Christian establishment by putting the weight of royal authority behind a religious reform movement and a vigorous missionary undertaking. The kings played a key role in nurturing a cultural renaissance which gave new vigor to a concern that had long been significant in Gallo-Roman society, that is, the preservation of the Roman cultural heritage and the religious tradition of the patristic age. To the extent that Carolingian rule could be equated with the Franks, it could fairly be said that during the first half of the 9th century the Franks had achieved a position that allowed them to share center stage among the major powers in the Mediterranean world. Their political sway over the western European portion of the old Roman empire was unchallenged. They stood as equals to Roman emperors in Constantinople and the Muslim caliphs in Baghdad and Cordoba. They were widely recognized as the guardians of the Christian establishment in the West, a role symbolized by their protectorate over the papacy and the Papal States. Intellectual leaders from all over the West—Italy, Spain, Ireland, Anglo-Saxon England—were drawn to the Frankish court and to

Frankish monasteries to share in shaping the CAROLIN-

GIAN RENAISSANCE.

However, the Carolingian regime fostered developments that began to efface its Frankish characteristics. From the moment that he took power, PEPIN III, the first Carolingian king, modified the role of blood ties rooted in a Germanic past as the basis of royal authority in favor of religious sanction bestowed by the ecclesiastical establishment, including the Roman Pope. The concept of king as ruling by the grace of God, nourished by the revival of learning and given shape by the experience gained from governing an increasingly diverse population and from royal leadership in reforming religious life, eventually convinced Charlemagne, his religious and intellectual counselors, and the Pope that the title "emperor of the Romans" better suited reality than did "king of the Franks". The priestly function implied in the Carolingian concept of the imperial office radically redefined the responsibilities of the ruler and of his subjects in ways that effaced the old Frankish idea of the warrior king and his warrior followers to the point where that ethos survived only in a mythology that provided the substance of great epic poems compiled later in the Middle Ages. The bonds that linked the warrior king to his followers for the purpose of gathering the fruits of war were slowly transformed during the Carolingian period into bonds involving a lord-vassal relationship based on personal allegiance of a vassal to a lord in return for a benefice, usually a grant of land, made by a lord to his vassal in order to permit the vassal to perform specified personal services. This transformation laid the basis for the feudal order in which the royal office, civic responsibility, and the public welfare had an entirely different meaning than did the original Frankish monarchy. The Carolingian reform created a religious establishment carrying a Roman stamp that set it a considerable distance apart from that which had taken shape under the rule of the Merovingian Franks. And the Carolingian cultural renaissance produced an intellectual, literary, and artistic milieu that had little association with anything Frankish. In short, although the Carolingian regime did not consciously disassociate itself from its Frankish roots, it blurred to some degree the Germanic elements that had played an important role in giving original shape to post-Roman world in western Europe.

That the age of the Franks had passed was made especially clear by political developments of the last half of the 9th century. What had once represented a united Francia, the realm of the Franks, now became a collection of independent kingdoms whose Frankish rulers of the Carolingian dynasty were eventually replaced by other ruling families with little or no connection to the Franks. For a brief span two of these kingdoms were known as the kingdom of the East Franks and the kingdom of the West Franks. However, in time each of these kingdoms fragmented into local lordships whose populations were linked by ties that had little to do with ethnic origins. Occasionally a late Carolingian king called attention to his Frankish heritage or was criticized for forgetting it. Eventually, the term "Franks" virtually disappeared from the vocabulary of the West, except for a territory known as Franconia. The Muslims often referred to the crusaders as Franks, and of course one of the major national states that emerged from the Middle Ages was called France. But these names had little to do with the remarkable people who from an obscure existence along the lower Rhine frontier came to dominate the history of western Europe for four centuries and to create the foundations upon which western Europe's remarkable history eventually was built.

FRANSEN, PIETER FRANS

Theologian, author; b. Doornik (Tournai), Belgium, Dec. 10, 1913; d. Heverlee (Louvain) Belgium, Dec. 2, 1983. Fransen entered the Society of Jesus in 1930 and completed his philosophy and theology studies at the theological faculty of the Society in Louvain. Ordained to the priesthood in 1943, he earned a doctorate in theology at the Gregorian University in Rome in 1947. From 1947 to 1967, he taught dogmatic theology at the Jesuit Theological Faculty at Louvain and then Heverlee. He also taught alternate semesters at the University of Innsbruck. In 1966, Fransen was named Dean of the theology faculty at Heverlee. He was instrumental in the formation of the Center for Ecclesiastical Studies, a consortium of several religious orders and congregations which collaborated in the educational formation of their candidates for priesthood.

When the bilingual division of the Catholic University of Louvain became inevitable in 1968, the Faculty of Theology, which already included Irish Franciscans and students of the American College, instituted an English-speaking section of the Faculty in 1969. Fransen was named chairman of the newly created English program and ordinary professor at the University, responsible for the areas of sacramentology, ecclesiology, grace, mystical theology and the hermeneutics of conciliar texts. Fransen continued at the University until his death in 1983 but also lectured and taught courses on every continent. He served on the editorial boards of Louvain Studies, Bijdragen, Collationes, Tijdschrift voor Theologie and contributed about 200 articles to various periodicals. The major themes of his writings are found in Divine Grace and Man (Desclee 1962); Intelligent Theology, 3 v. (1969); New Life of Grace (1971). He edited and contributed to Authority in the Church (Louvain 1983).

Theology. Although Fransen wrote in the areas of ecclesiology, sacramentology, mystical theology and ecumenism, his best known works were studies of the Council of Trent and the renewal of the concept of grace. His doctoral work on The Indissolubility of Christian Marriage in the Case of Adultery: Canon Seven of the Twenty-Fourth Session of the Council of Trent (1947) was the beginning of his life-long interest in the critical exegesis of conciliar texts. His general principles of interpretation asserted that in matters of faith, not even the pope or bishops possess the truth. All human thoughts and formulae always fall short of God's fullness. The truth is entrusted to the whole Church and the sum total of the Church's teaching will never exhaust the mystery that is God. God is the only source of authority and thus, all reflection on faith is a ministry, a service of the Word. A council is the Church in action at a given time and a given place in history. A dogma is not an endpoint as much as a new beginning and must be reinterpreted in dialogue with the sensus fidei.

In contrast to the handbooks of theology, Fransen formulated three hermeneutical principles: in dogmatic texts, only the central assertion in a decree or canon is defined, any subsequent interpretations do not have the same authority; with regard to pontifical documents, there is a need to distinguish carefully between declarations of faith addressed to the universal Church and replies given to one bishop or conference of bishops; and, finally, every text should be read in the spirit in which it was written. This attention to the linguistic and historical contexts of a given historical period can free the Church from a fundamentalism which presumes that dogmas are free from historical evolution. Conciliar texts must be subject to the same kind of literary criticism given to Biblical texts.

Koinonia. Fransen's familiarity with the mystical theology of Jan van Ruysbroeck enabled him to develop a positive theology of grace, emphasizing neither redemption from sin nor intermittent actual auxilliary proddings to good and from evil, but communion with the triune God. In this communion, God and man are in an interpersonal encounter and dialogue, through which God divinizes man and man is divinized by God. The leit motif of Fransen's theology of grace is best expressed thus: the more grace divinizes us humans, the more it humanizes us. God and man are not hostile rivals, but friendly partners. It is for this purpose and within this horizon that God created the world in the first place. Salvation by grace is not primarily of the fallen world, from sin, but primarily of the created world, its consummation into celestial communion and glory.

This emphasis on divine-human communion also pervades his understanding of the Church, the Sacraments, and all salvation history. Against a sort of "metaphysical clericalism," whose inherent thrust divides the Church into "above" and "below," Fransen emphasized the Church as koinonia or communion. To understand the Sacraments properly, one must begin with and concentrate on their content, namely, grace. And grace is the communion of the divine with the human. In history, this communion is humanly actualized in what has come to be termed Faith and Sacrament. Hence, one properly always speaks of Faith and the Sacraments of the Faith. Faith and Sacrament are equally incarnations or embodiments of God's saving will/grace in human nature and history. Sacraments are the symbolic, ritual celebrations of this saving grace by the faith-full. These faith-full are to be thought of primarily as the whole communion of the Church, consequently as the individual members of this communion.

Christ is the perfect communion of the human and divine. As this perfect communion was not centripetal, selfish, and for itself, but centrifugal, sharing and for others, so must all Christian, ecclesial, and sacramental reality and realities also be. Fransen's theology is intent upon showing that insistence upon the specialness of Christ and the Church is not inconsistent with insistence on the universality of salvation for all men and women, for "God wills that all should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim 2:4–6). Clearly, then, one of his favorite theological texts was from Augustine:

I referred only to the true religion that now is called Christian. . . . For the reality itself, which we now call the Christian religion, was present among the early people, and, . . . was never absent from the beginning of the human race: so the true religion which already existed, now began to be called Christian . . . not that in former time it was not present, but because it received this name at a later date'' (Retract. 1.12.3; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. 34, 128).

One best understands both the life and theology of Piet Fransen if one understands them as the illustration and illumination of another beloved statement of Augustine: Quia amasti me, fecisti me amabilem.

FRANZELIN, JOHANNES BAPTIST

Cardinal, theologian; b. Aldein, Tyrol, April 15, 1816; d. Rome, Dec. 11, 1886. After completing his preliminary training at the Franciscan college in Bolzano, he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Graz in 1834. He later spent six years teaching in Austrian Poland. In 1845, he was sent to Rome to pursue a course in theology, but in 1848, he was driven from the Eternal City by the anti-Jesuit sentiment of the Italian revolution. His theological studies were completed at the University of Louvain. After his ordination in 1849, Franzelin was assigned to teach Scripture at the Jesuit scholasticate at Vals near Le Puy. In 1850, he was recalled to Rome to teach Oriental languages and lecture on dogmatic theology at the Gregorian University. He was named prefect of studies and confessor at the German College in Rome in 1853. Four years later he was called to occupy the chair of dogmatic theology at the Gregorian University. As professor he published an almost complete theology course that was widely used.

Chief among his works (all issued in Rome) are the De Sacramentis in genere (1868), De Eucharistiae sacramento et sacrificio (1868), De Deo Uno (1870), De Deo Trino (1869), De Verbo Incarnato (1870), and De divina Traditione et Scriptura (1870). In addition to teaching, Franzelin acted as consultor to various Congregations of the Roman Curia, including the Holy Office. In his theological lectures at the university he tried to open new vistas. He left no branch of learning untouched in his attempts to draw up a synthesis. By applying this knowledge he tried to give theology a more positive orientation. In this attempt he parted company with many of his predecessors and contemporaries who regarded theology as an abstract and speculative discipline, far removed from the empirical sciences.

During Vatican Council I, Franzelin acted as papal theologian. In this capacity he was asked to prepare a draft of the constitution Dei Filius on the nature of the Church. Franzelin's draft was rejected by the Council fathers in the form in which it was submitted. It was drastically revised, and eventually accepted and promulgated. In the consistory of April 3, 1876, Franzelin was named a cardinal by Pius IX. He was appointed to membership on several Congregations and made prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Rites. Honors did little to change the man; he remained an exemplar of the rule of his religious order.

FRASSATI, PIER GIORGIO, BL.

Lay youth, member of the Dominican Laity, patron of youth. b. April 6, 1901, Turin, Italy; d. there, July 4, 1925. Pier Giorgio Frassati, marked by youthful vitality, optimism, and charity, combined a love of politics, sports, outdoor life, study, and piety. His agnostic father, Alfredo Frassati, founder and owner of the liberal Turin daily La Stampa, was appointed senator of the Kingdom (1913). His mother, Adelaide Amelia, saw that her children received religious training. Pier Giorgio began his studies (1910) in the state school in Turin with his younger sister Luciana, but was later sent to the Jesuit school (1913). The following year, he enrolled in the Apostleship of Prayer and the Company of the Most Blessed Sacrament. After graduating from high school (1918), he studied mineralogy in the Faculty of Industrial Mechanical Engineering at the Royal Polytechnic of Turin in order to "serve Christ among the miners." At the university, he became active in many Christian groups. He joined the Italian Catholic Students Federation (1919), the St. Vincent de Paul Society (1919), the university Nocturnal Adoration Group (1920), the newly founded Popular Party (1921) that promoted Catholic teaching based on Rerum Novarum, and the Milites Mariae of the Young Catholic Workers (1922). He became a member of the Dominican Laity (1922), taking the name Girolama in honor of the Dominican Savanarola to the surprise of many who thought of him as a sportsman or political activist. During his father's tenure as Italian ambassador to Berlin (1920), Pier Giorgio worked with Father Karl Sonnenschein to seek out and assist the poor, just as he did in Turin. There he also became friendly with Karl Rahner and his family.

At the age of 24, Frassati was stricken with acute poliomyelitis of which he died after five days of terrible suffering. On his deathbed he gave money and instructions to his sister to continue to see to the needs of the families dependent upon his charity. Thousands of the poor he had helped without public knowledge attended his funeral. He was buried in Pollone, where on July 16, 1989, Pope John Paul II prayed at his tomb. His body has since been transferred to Turin's cathedral.

Frassati's cause for beatification was opened in 1932 but suffered delays. Pope John Paul II beatified "the man of the eight beatitudes" (May 20, 1990) saying: "The secret of his apostolic zeal and holiness is . . . in prayer, in persevering adoration, even at night, of the Blessed Sacrament, in his thirst for the Word of God, which he sought in Biblical texts; in the peaceful acceptance of life's difficulties, in family life as well; in chastity lived as a cheerful, uncompromising discipline; in his daily love of silence and life's 'ordinariness."" Feast: July 4 (Turin).

FRASSINELLO, BENEDETTA CAMBIAGIO, BL.

Married woman, founder of the Benedictine Sisters of Providence (Benedettine della Provvidenza); b. Oct. 2, 1791, Langasco (near Genoa), Italy; d. March 21, 1858, Ronco Scrivia, Italy. She was the daughter of Giuseppe and Francesca Cambiagio, who moved to Pavia while Benedetta was still young. Following a mystical experience in 1811, Benedetta wanted to devote herself to prayer in a convent, but instead she complied with her family's wishes and married Giovanni Battista Frassinello (Feb. 7, 1816). In 1818, the couple agreed to live together in perpetual continence while caring for Benedetta's younger sister Maria, who suffered from intestinal cancer. Following her death (1825), they both chose to enter religious life: Giovanni joined the Somachi, while Benedetta took the habit of the Ursulines. Illness forced Benedetta to leave the convent and return to Pavia, where she decided to help abandoned girls. Giovanni left his monastery also to assist her in this task. Although Benedetta was appointed "Promoter of Public Instruction" and they publicly vowed perfect chastity, the couple suffered criticism for their unusual relationship. That impelled them to turn over their work to the bishop (1838) and retire to the village of Ronco Scrivia. In 1833, with her husband and five companions, Benedetta founded the educational Institute of Benedictine Sisters of Providence, which continues its work in Italy and Peru. Benedetta was beatified at Rome by Pope John Paul II, May 10, 1987.

FRASSINETTI, GIUSEPPE

Pastor, writer, and founder of the Sons of Mary Immaculate (FSMI); b. Genoa, 1804; d. there, Jan. 2, 1868. The brother of Bl. Paola Frassinetti, he was ordained in 1827. After laboring in the ministry at S. Pietro di Quinto al Mare, he became pastor of S. Sabina in Genoa in 1839, where he remained thereafter. His intensely active pastoral apostolate won for him the reputation of being "the Italian curé d'Ars." Besides busying himself with many other works, Frassinetti was a voluminous writer whose works went through many editions. These include: Compendio della teologia dogmatica (Genoa 1839; 26th ed. Turin 1903); Gesù Cristo regola del sacerdote (Florence 1852; 11th ed. Genoa 1899); Il conforto dell'anima divota (Naples 1852; 14th ed. Rome 1906); Manuale pratico del parocho novello (Novara 1863; 10th ed. Turin 1902); Compendio della teologia morale di S. Alfonso (2 v. Genoa 1865–66; 11th ed. Turin 1948); and many others. Frassinetti's cause for beatification was introduced at Rome in 1939.

FRASSINETTI, PAOLA ANGELA MARIA, ST.

Also Paula; founder of the Congregation of Sisters of St. Dorotea (Dorotheans); b. March 3, 1809, Genoa, Italy; d. June 11, 1882, Rome. The only daughter of the five children of John and Angela Frassinetti, Paola's four brothers became priests. When her mother died in 1818, her aunt took charge of the family until her own death in 1821. After that, Paola cared for the household. She was educated at home by her father and brothers. Bronchial problems caused her to go to Quinto al Mare (Genoa) in 1830, where she lived with her brother (Ven.) Giuseppe FRASSINETTI, a priest. She served as the parish housekeeper and taught the local girls. When Paola's ill health frustrated her attempts to join a religious congregation, she founded her own institute, the Dorotheans, at St. Clara's (Aug. 12, 1834), which was dedicated to the education of girls from all walks of life. After difficult early years, the institute received papal approval in 1863. Paola remained superior general until her death; after 1841 she resided in Rome. She saw the Dorotheans spread through Italy and abroad to Portugal and Brazil. In 1876, Frassinetti suffered the first of several paralyzing strokes. She died peacefully of pneumonia at the mother house, St. Onofrio in Rome, where she is buried. Frassinetti, patron of the sick, was beatified in 1930, and canonized March 11, 1984 by Pope John Paul II.

FRATICELLI

Term of contempt for heretical Franciscans; these can be divided into two branches.

Fraticelli de Paupere Vita. These were the successors of the Franciscan SPIRITUALS and were directed by ANGELUS CLARENUS, who returned to Italy in 1318 and died in 1337. The CLARENI had hermitages in Rome, in central Italy, and in Naples, where Angelus's friend Philip of Majorca, brother of Queen Sancia of Naples, arrived in 1329, and was joined by the surviving Spirituals from Provence and Sicily. Philip preached against Pope JOHN XXII, and a bull of 1340 describes him as "the promotor and ruler of a heretical sect." In 1362 a process was directed against Louis of Durazzo, the cousin of Joanna I, because he had protected the Fraticelli. On that occasion they were said to be divided into three groups, one of which was called the "followers of brother Philip of Majorca." The courts of Aragon and Sicily also protected them. Writing in Latin and Italian, the pamphleteers, defending the Fraticelli's separation from the Franciscan Order, show considerable familiarity with the works of the Fathers, with the early Franciscan writings, including those of the Spirituals, and with the manifestos against John XXII, whom, with his successors and adherents, they regarded as heretical because of John's condemnation of the Franciscan doctrine of the poverty of Christ (see POVERTY CONTROVERSY). Their Joachimism (see JO-ACHIM OF FIORE) makes it likely that some of the later Joachimite treatises emanated from their circle, and there may be some connection between them and the hermits with whom COLA DI RIENZO lived after his first exile from Rome. Part of the sect subsequently became orthodox. In 1473 various groups of Clareni hermits, distinguished by their short, skimpy habits, were united to the Franciscan Observants but enjoyed considerable autonomy until 1563, when the two bodies were finally amalgamated. At that time the Clareni had 21 hermitages.

The Fraticelli de Opinione. The followers of MI-CHAEL OF CESENA were given this designation. Their resistance to John XXII received considerable support among the Franciscans and, outside the order, even as far away as Persia. In 1331 the two Franciscan chaplains of Sancia of Naples were accused of corresponding with the former minister general and of maintaining that John XXII was no longer pope. One of them, Andrea de Gagliano, was later tried by the Inquisition but was absolved. In the late 14th and 15th centuries the sect was confined mainly to Italy and gained adherents during the WESTERN SCHISM. Their propaganda provoked answers from orthodox circles; from the Tuscan hermit John de Cellis, a correspondent of St. CATHERINE OF SIENA; and from St. JAMES OF THE MARCHES, the companion of St. BERNARD- INE OF SIENA, who with St. JOHN CAPISTRAN acted as an inquisitor against them. The Fraticelli were organized as a church with their own minister general, bishops, priests, and women preachers. Many members of the sect became victims of the INQUISITION; a certain Fra Michael da Calci was burned at Florence (1389), and others at Rome (1467). Certain groups escaped to Greece in the mid-15th century, but little trace of the sect has been found elsewhere; nor has it been possible to establish connections between them and the HUSSITES and other heretics.

FRAVASHI

In Zoroastrianism, the name of the protective spirits, one of which is assigned to each man or woman belonging to the camp of Ahura Mazda and fighting for him against the forces of evil. Originally they seem to have been rather like the Marutah in India or the Teutonic Walküren. In the Yasht (see AVESTA) dedicated to them, they are invoked not only for victory in battle but more often for fecundity. They survive man's earthly existence, but they are believed to have existed even before he was born. As surviving spirits of the dead they, like the Roman manes, are supposed to come back to earth at a given time of the year, when festivals are held to welcome them.

FRAYSSINOUS, DENIS

French bishop, apologist; b. Curières (Aveyron), May 9, 1765; d. St. Géniez (Aveyron), Dec. 12, 1841. He was a Sulpician (1788–1806) and was ordained in 1789. After engaging in pastoral work secretly during the French Revolution, he taught dogmatic theology at the seminary of St. Sulpice in Paris (1800–06). In 1801, he began to attract wide attention for his outstanding sermons and conferences, which were suspended from 1809 to 1814 by order of Napoleon I. Louis XVIII named him court preacher and royal almoner. In 1819, he became vicar-general of the Archdiocese of Paris, and in 1822 titular bishop, grand master of the university (minister of public instruction), member of the French Academy, and of the Chamber of Peers, with the title of count. From 1824 to 1828 he acted as minister of ecclesiastical affairs. During the July Revolution (1830) he retired from public affairs and lived in Rome for two years. From 1833 to 1838, Frayssinous, a royalist in politics, dwelt in Prague and Görz as tutor for Count Henri de Chambord, who was later a claimant to the French throne, supported by the Legitimists. From 1838 to 1841 he resided at St. Géniez.

In 1818, Frayssinous published Les Vrais principes de l'Église gallicane, reflecting his moderate GALLICAN-ISM similar to that of BOSSUET. His conferences, published as Defense du christianisme (3 v. 1825), went through many editions and were translated into English, Italian, Spanish, and German. Frayssinous was the outstanding Catholic apologist during the early Restoration period.

FREDEGARIUS

The 16th-century name for the author of a universal chronicle, whose final part, a continuation of the Historia Francorum of GREGORY OF TOURS from 585 to 642, is almost the unique source of Frankish history for the period it covers. The chronicle contains many curiosities, such as the earliest legend of the Trojan origin of the Franks, the sole report of the first Slavic kingdom (ruled by the Frank Samo), and glimpses of what Gaul knew of the Byzantine world. For all the barbarism of its language, it is a major witness to the culture of its time.

The work grew out of an existing compilation of world chronology and history, which Fredegarius interpolated and augmented with an epitome of Gregory of Tours's Histories, bks. 1–4. He then added an original chronicle, which ends in 642 but alludes to events as late as 658. Why Fredegarius stopped is unknown; he meant to continue to his own time. Though the chronicle has been attributed to as many as three authors, writing at different times, recent opinion favors a single author, probably a Burgundian, writing c. 658 to 660, whose testimony is rarely that of an eyewitness.

Equally important, interesting, and barbaric in language are the eighth-century continuations of Fredegarius, which were commissioned by Childebrand, a brother of CHARLES MARTEL, and his son Nibelung. They constitute a Carolingian family chronicle between 642 and 737 to the death of King Pepin I (768).

FREDERICK II (THE GREAT), KING OF PRUSSIA

Reigned 1740 to 1786; b. Berlin, Jan. 24, 1712; d. Potsdam, Aug. 17, 1786.

Early Life. He was the oldest of four surviving sons born to King Frederick William I of Prussia and Princess Sophia Dorothea of Hanover. His tutor, Duhan de Jandun, instilled in him a deep love of French culture. The curriculum set up for the crown prince by his father, the "Soldier King," strongly emphasized military training. Frederick rebelled against the Spartan drill and the king's stern Calvinism. After the failure of an attempt to flee to England (Aug. 4, 1730), he was arrested and imprisioned in the fortress of Kuestrin. Completely submitting to his father's will, he was freed after a year. Still under restrictions, he was gradually reinstated. In 1733 he married Elizabeth Christine of Brunswick-Bevern. The marriage was not harmonious and remained childless. In Rheinsberg, an estate he had received from his father, the crown prince spent the happiest years of his life. Here he found time to study and to write. Enjoying the company of the congenial intelligentsia, he corresponded with many prominent men of letters, such as Voltaire. The best-known of his early writings is Antimachiavel (1740), a lofty refutation of immorality in politics.

Kingship. He succeeded to his father's throne May 31, 1740. At the beginning of his 46-year reign Frederick II abolished the use of torture for criminals and lifted press censorship. The death of the Hapsburg Emperor Charles VI and the accession of Maria Theresa provided Frederick with the opportunity of renewing ancient but questionable claims to some Silesian territories. He invaded Silesia (December 1740) and initiated the War of the Austrian Succession, which involved the electors of Bavaria and Saxony as well as the kings of England and France. By the Treaty of Dresden (1745) Frederick remained in possession of Silesia but acknowledged Maria Theresa's husband (Francis of Lorraine) as Holy Roman emperor. The acquisition of Silesia made Prussia a European power. During the next 11 years Frederick made remarkable efforts to improve agriculture and manufacturing. He balanced the budget, produced a substantial surplus, and, in an age of intense dynastic conflict and shifting alliances, increased his army and concluded the convention of Westminster with England. In the meantime, France, Russia, and some smaller states became Austria's allies. Frederick's sudden invasion of Saxony precipitated the Seven Years' War (1756-63). Strategy and courage enabled him to oppose a powerful coalition and the death of Tsarina Elizabeth removed Russia from the war and saved Frederick. The Peace of Hubertusburg restored the status quo. Peace, save for the brief war over the Bavarian Succession (1778-79) and the first partition of Poland (1772), by which he gained Western Prussia (without Danzig and Thorn), characterized his remaining years. Dismissing the divine theory of kingship, Frederick II considered himself the "first servant of the State." He worked incessantly for the welfare of his subjects. Many of his reforms were directed to the administration of justice. The independence of law courts was established as a principle. But Frederick was an avowed cynic who believed in power and in power alone. He was an autocrat whose tight personal rule was sustained by the strict, though grudging, obedience of the noble bureaucrats. Contemptuous of all beliefs, he practiced religious toleration, but there was no freedom of thought in Prussia. For the achievements of German culture Frederick had nothing but scorn—a feeling that was reciprocated by the leading German intellectuals. The myth of Frederick's "German mission" has long been shattered.

Religious Policy. His relations with the Catholic Church remained strained despite some friendly gestures. When he annexed Silesia, he solemnly promised to respect the Catholic religion, to which about half of his new subjects adhered. But soon discriminatory laws and fiscal policies caused deep concern. The introduction of Prussia's anticlerical marriage practice was bitterly resented. Conforming to the pattern of absolutism, he used (and misused) his prerogatives to interfere in the internal affairs of the Diocese of Breslau, and to establish a tight control over the hierarchy and benefices. He disregarded the fact that such prerogatives were derived from privileges granted only to Catholic sovereigns on the basis of a treaty with the Holy See. Toward the Jesuits he assumed a benevolent attitude after the suppression of their order. The members of the extinct society were encouraged to carry on their work as educators.

FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reign: March 4, 1152, to June 10, 1190; b.1122 or 1123, the son of Frederick II, Duke of Swabia, and Judith, the daughter of Henry the Black. His reddish-blond hair earned him the sobriquet "Barbarossa," which means "Red Beard" in Italian. In 1147 he became Duke of Swabia upon the death of his father and accompanied his uncle, Conrad III, on the unsuccessful Second Crusade. Frederick was elected king of Germany on March 4, 1152 after Conrad's death. His lineage made him an ideal choice to bring reconciliation to Germany, since his Hohenstaufen father was a brother of the preceding king, and his mother was sister to Henry the Proud, who had been leader of the Guelphs, Conrad's main opposition.

Frederick hoped to reestablish the power of empire, which had been weakened during the struggle between popes and emperors during the eleventh and early twelfth centuries. After his coronation he predicted the restoration of the greatness of imperial Rome. He considered himself the heir of the caesars and had no difficulty including his own legislation with that of Justinian and the emperors of antiquity. He saw Roman law as a vehicle for extending his power, especially in regard to the papacy. Frederick called his state the sacrum imperium, or "Holy Empire," and he believed himself to have been chosen by God to foster an institution that was the cornerstone of world order, the source of peace and justice. Although his vision had something in common with that of post-Constantinian emperors, his was an empire governed by medieval mechanisms, especially customary law, and its medieval roots were fundamental to it. The veneration of CHARLEMAGNE as a saint during the Christmas season of 1165 was meant to enhance Frederick's own imperial prestige as the ostensible heir of the FRANKS and the Saxons as well the ancients.

In Germany Frederick tried to fulfill the hope of reconciliation that his election portended. He offered important offices and dignities to his Guelph uncle Welf VI, and he was eventually able to satisfy the demand of Henry the Proud's son and heir, Henry the Lion, to return the Duchy of Bavaria, which had been given by Conrad to the Babenburg family. The Babenburg Henry Jasomirgott was compensated with the newly created Duchy of Austria, which was granted on generous terms. But years later, when Henry the Lion refused to support him during a crucial Italian campaign, Frederick blamed his defeat in Italy on him and was eventually able drive him from power.

As the perfidy of Henry the Lion demonstrated, a German policy based solely upon the accommodation of German princes could only have modest success. It was necessary for Frederick to build power that was independent of the high aristocracy, and he had certain advantages, since he could use his legal position as sovereign against the nobility. He also increased the size of royal estates and attempted to give them a geographic cohesion that would make them governable. Within these lands he built towns and castles and placed ecclesiastical institutions under his protection. He employed to a greater extent than his predecessors ministrales, a servile class of men who were hardly serfs, to govern those lands directly under royal control. There were no exact equivalents to ministrales, who were often quite talented soldiers, and who occasionally became quite wealthy in other countries

In spite of the Frederick's energy and intelligence, his success in Germany was limited and led to no unified kingdom. The princes may have been too firmly entrenched because of the weakness of the monarchy during the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY, and monarchy itself too archaic in its structure. There was no fixed capital and no class of administrators. Income was always uncertain. German nationalist historians have looked wistfully at his reign, but he had no nationalist aspirations, not as later centuries would understand them.

Certainly Frederick's long involvement in Italy was detrimental to his success in Germany. Frederick made six expeditions to Italy, where he spent 16 of his 38 years in power. Numerous and complex were his reasons for devoting so much of his time there. He was enamored with the classical tradition, and Italy was the home of the Roman Empire, but there were factors more compelling than historical romanticism. It has been conjectured that he hoped to create a basis for a territorial state from a central grouping of lands that included northern Italy as well as Burgundy and Switzerland. Clearly the cities of northern Italy had been the beneficiaries of the increase in trade and population that had taken place over the previous several hundred years, and they could provide Frederick with a revenue that was greater than that of either the French or English king. In addition Italy was the seat of the papacy, and in an age when society was perceived as the "Church," it was in Frederick's interest to remain on good terms with the popes or to dominate them. A strong Norman state in southern Italy, which could threaten his influence in Rome, further complicated the situation.

Nevertheless, the future of his rule in Italy looked bright at the beginning of his reign. In 1153 at Constance his delegation reached an accommodation with the papacy that promised to benefit both pope and emperor. In addition there were a group of Italian cities that were uncomfortable with the dominance of Milan, the most powerful city in northern Italy, and they looked to the emperor for support. Although Pope HADRIAN IV crowned Frederick emperor in 1155, and although he was able to dominate Lombardy after he destroyed Milan in 1162, Italian politics became bramble from which he could never completely extricate himself. All Italian cities shared a sense of independence and a reluctance to support Frederick financially. They chafed under imperial administrators and their demands for regalia, certain political and economic prerogatives that Frederick claimed as his own. Milan was rebuilt with the help of its neighbors. In regard to the papacy, Frederick's understanding of imperial authority made him sensitive to papal aspirations, both real and imagined, and his inability to intervene effectively in the southern Italy for a sustained period of time made him a poor ally to the popes. In 1160 he sided with Antipope VICTOR IV in the disputed election of Alexander III and began an 18-year schism that had disastrous consequences for his Italian policy. The cities of Lombardy supported Alexander, who worked closely with them. In a moment of imperial weakness, they formed an alliance known as the LOM-BARD LEAGUE and built a strategically placed fortress named after the pope, Alessandria, as an act of defiance. Abandoned by his cousin, Henry the Lion, before whom he may have knelt to beg for help, he was decisively defeated by the League at Legnano in 1176. He was able to salvage a respectable peace, but he could not dictate terms.

Yet Frederick was far from broken. In 1180 he was able not only to drive Henry the Lion into exile but also to fragment the base of power that Henry had created by subdividing his estates. In spite of his defeat at Legnano he was able to collect a healthy subsidy from Lombardy and to establish his own power base in Tuscany. He arranged a marriage between his son Henry and Constance, the woman who would become the heiress to the Norman kingdom of the mezzogiorno, which might have given his son mastery in Italy and hegemony in Europe if Henry VI had not died prematurely.

Therefore Frederick still had great power and position when news reached Europe in 1187 that Jerusalem had fallen to Muslim forces. He, along with the kings of England and France, vowed to free the Holy City. The emperor, who led the largest contingent, took an overland route to Palestine, and in 1190, in what is now Turkey, he fell from his horse in a rapidly moving stream and drowned. In latter times a legend, which had originally grown up around his grandson, Frederick II, was transferred to him. Frederick, it claimed, did not die on a crusade, but rather he sleeps in a cave, to be awakened when Germany will again need him.

FREDERICK II, ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned Nov. 22, 1220 to Dec. 13, 1250. Frederick was born in Jesi, a small city on the eastern side of the Italian peninsula on Dec. 26, 1194. His father was the Emperor Henry VI of the Hohenstaufen family (d. 1197) and his mother was Constance, daughter of Norman King Roger II of Sicily. Frederick inherited the crown of the Kingdom of Sicily through his mother. He was crowned Roman emperor in St. Peter's on Nov. 22, 1220 and ruled until he died on Dec. 13, 1250. His reign was marked by a long and difficult conflict with the papacy. In its aftermath, the empire was permanently weakened. Although the papacy emerged victorious, it did not enhance papal authority and prestige.

Since Frederick was only four years old when Henry VI died, and since the imperial title was not hereditary, he was not immediately elected emperor. Frederick was crowned king of Sicily in 1198, but turbulence and civil war marked his minority there. An old supporter of his father, Markward of Anweiler, claimed the throne for himself. Since the papacy had long claimed the overlordship over the Kingdom of Sicily, Pope Innocent III intervened to support the rights of young Frederick. With the pope's support, Markward and his allies were defeated. Innocent did not want Frederick to reassert Hohenstaufen claims in Germany or in central Italy, but after an electoral dispute and a civil war in which Otto of Brunswick emerged victorious, Innocent had no choice but to support young Frederick as the king of Germany. The German princes opposed to Otto elected Frederick king of Germany and emperor-elect in 1211. Frederick spent the next eight years in his German lands reasserting Hohenstaufen rule.

Innocent was not only concerned about the political implications of Frederick's new position. The pope had worked vigorously to reestablish papal secular authority over the Papal States in Central Italy and to eliminate the practice that was common in many parts of Christendom by which kings and princes participated in the election of bishops. The issue had already arisen in Sicily over the election of the archbishop of Palermo in 1209. Frederick's relationship with the Church was further complicated by the large number of fiefs that Innocent had given to the bishops of the realm. The conflict between papal authority and rights in the Kingdom of Sicily and Frederick's royal power would complicate relations with the papacy during his entire reign.

In November 1220 Innocent III's successor, Pope Honorius III, placed the crown of Roman emperor on Frederick in St. Peter's. During the coronation Frederick took the cross again and vowed to lead a crusade to the Holy Land. At Honorius's request he promulgated a series of constitutions that protected the rights of the Church and the clergy in imperial and royal lands. After his coronation Frederick returned to Sicily and began to regain control of the kingdom.

The pope wanted Frederick to lead an army to the Holy Land immediately but Frederick delayed. He spent three years organizing his government and reclaiming royal rights in Sicily. He founded the University of Naples in 1224. It was the first university established by a secular ruler in Europe. There are many stories about Frederick's love of learning. If we can believe all of them he was interested in mathematics, poetry, science, philosophy, and languages. He did write a book on the art of falconry that remained a standard work for centuries.

Pope Honorius became increasingly unhappy with Frederick. The pope died in 1227, and Pope Gregory IX, the new pope, excommunicated the emperor after Frederick's first expedition to the Holy Land was aborted by illness. In spite of his excommunication, Frederick returned to the Holy Land, concluded a peace treaty with the Moslem ruler, Sultan al-Kamil of Egypt. Its terms granted Frederick control of Jerusalem for ten years.

Pope Gregory was not placated by Frederick's success. Instead of lifting the ban of excommunication, the pope called for an invasion of Kingdom of Sicily. Frederick's father-in-law, John of Brienne, led the papal army. Frederick sailed back to Italy and quickly restored order to his kingdom. After extensive negotiations, he concluded a peace treaty with the papacy in 1230. Gregory lifted Frederick's excommunication, and the emperor reaffirmed the Church's rights in the Kingdom of Sicily.

In 1231 Frederick promulgated the Constitutions of Melfi, the first legal codification issued by a European secular ruler. These laws replaced all earlier legislation in the Kingdom of Sicily. As soon as the papacy learned of the plan for a new codification, Gregory warned Frederick not to issue any laws that would infringe upon ecclesiastical rights. As in 1220, the papacy wanted to influence the content of Frederick's legislation. The Constitutions of Melfi, which became the law of the land in the Kingdom of Sicily, were augmented with new legislation for centuries afterwards. They were commented upon by the most important Southern Italian jurists, and remained in force until 1809 in Southern Italy and until 1819 in Sicily.

The relationship between Frederick and Gregory deteriorated from 1231 to 1239. Frederick claimed authority over parts of Central Italy that infringed on papal lands, and Gregory accused the emperor of ignoring or destroying ecclesiastical liberties. Frederick also tried to reestablish imperial control over the Italian city-states in Northern Italy. In 1239, after Frederick had suffered defeats in Northern Italy, Gregory excommunicated him again. The pope accused Frederick of heresy, of injuring the rights of the church in Sicily, and of hindering the recovery of the Holy Land. Gregory died a short time later. When Innocent IV became pope in 1243 after a long interregnum, he pursued a vigorous campaign against Frederick. In 1245 he convened a council in Lyon and summoned the emperor to answer for his crimes. Frederick moved slowly toward Lyon, but Innocent condemned him before his arrival. The pope deposed him from his imperial and royal offices and called for a crusade against him. It was the first time that a pope had used the crusade against a Christian ruler.

Although Frederick continued his war with the papacy after Lyon, he had little success. The Lombard citystates were too rich and powerful to be subdued with the limited resources Frederick had. On Dec. 13, 1250 Frederick died in Castel Fiorentino near Foggia. After his death, the German empire and the Kingdom of Sicily were separated forever. The Hohenstaufen vision of an empire stretching from the North Sea to Sicily ended with a long imperial interregnum that lasted until 1270 and with the pope's appointment of a French monarch to rule the Kingdom of Sicily.

FRÉDOL, BÉRENGER (BERENGARIUS FREDOLI)

Cardinal and canonist; b. Lavérune (southern France), c. 1250; d. 1323. At first a professor of Canon Law at Bologna, he became bishop of Béziers in 1294, a cardinal in 1305, cardinal bishop of Tusculum (after June 10, 1309), and major penitentiary (before Sept. 2, 1311). In the pontificate of Boniface VIII, Bérenger's flair for diplomacy made him an important figure in relations between the Holy See and the Kings of France and Aragon; in that of Clement V (1305–14) he was at times the Pope's sole confidant and counselor. And if he adroitly terminated the posthumous trial of Boniface VIII, he played a more questionable role in the suppression of the TEMPLARS, particularly in the famous case of the confession of the Grand Master, Jacques de Molay. As a canonist he was one of those commissioned in 1296 by Boniface VIII to compile the LIBER SEXTUS; in addition, he wrote a fine treatise on excommunication and interdict [ed. E. Vernay, Le "Liber de excommunicatione" du Cardinal Bérenger Frédol (Paris 1921)] and has been credited with a manual on confessional practice. His inclination for cataloguing, attested by inventories of the Corpus Iuris from Gratian to the Sext, of the Summa of HOSTIENSIS ("Oculus copiosae"), and of the Speculum of DURANTI THE ELDER (1306), is a sign of a clear and orderly, if somewhat systematic, turn of mind.

FREE CHURCHES

The title given in England and Wales to religious bodies, previously known as Dissenters or NONCONFORM-ISTS, that are not in communion with the Church of England or the Catholic Church. The term came into common use late in the 19th century and generally refers to the Methodists, English Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Quakers, Unitarians, Churches of Christ, Plymouth Brethren, various Pentecostal sects, and, recently, Mormons. During the 19th century, Nonconformists agitated for disestablishment and promoted the principle of voluntaryism which held that the church ought to be spiritually independent of the state, that establishment of any one denomination was unjust to all others, and that state endowment of any religion must be rejected as a corrupting influence. In 1892, under the leadership of the Methodist Hugh Price Hughes and the Baptist John Clifford, a National Free Church Council was established in Manchester. It was intended to be a loose association of local councils and at its annual meeting a wide range of theological and religious questions were to be discussed. The efforts of J. H. Shakespeare of the Baptist Union led to the founding of the Federal Council of Evangelical Free Churches (1919), which excluded Unitarians and allotted representation on the basis of each denomination's membership. These two bodies united as the Free Church Federal Council (1940). Most Free Church bodies also joined with the established Churches of England and Scotland in the British Council of Churches (1942). The influence of the Free Churches in public and religious affairs of England has tended to decline with their numbers.

FREE WILL

Sometimes called free choice or free decision (Latin liberum arbitrium), free will is an ability characterizing man in the voluntary activity of choosing or not choosing a limited good when this is presented to him. It is the basis for asserting man's unique dignity among creatures, as well as for maintaining that he is a person. On it is founded much of the tradition of Western law and morality. Again, it has important consequences in the social order; a person's outlook on man as a strictly determined being or as an autonomous moral person is bound to condition, to some extent, his attitude toward the rehabilitation of criminals and of the mentally ill.

In view of the long history of the concept of free will, and the divergence of views regarding it, this article first sketches the evolution of the concept and its status in modern thought, and then gives a detailed analysis based on the teaching of scholastic philosophers. Arguments against free will are mentioned here only in passing, since these are given fuller treatment elsewhere.

History of the Concept of Free Will

The main stages in the development of the notion of free will may be characterized as follows: the philosophical bases were first proposed by Greek thinkers; these were then developed systematically by patristic and medieval writers, under the influence of the Christian religion; then controversies arose in later scholasticism, traceable largely to the Protestant Reformation and its underlying causes; and these were followed, finally, by the diversity of views that typifies modern thought on the subject.

Greek Origins. The early Greeks generally believed that inanimate things, as well as human beings and the gods themselves, were subject to the fates. Consequently these thinkers did not attempt to change the order of things, but sought to be in harmony with the rest of the universe. Again, in the ancient world freedom was viewed more in a political than in a metaphysical setting. The free man was the one who could participate in the political order, who, unlike the slave, was not ruled by someone above him. Nevertheless, even then certain philosophies contained implicit suggestions of human free choice.

Pre-Socratics. The followers of Pythagoras seem to have simultaneously advocated both freedom and determinism. In their theory of METEMPSYCHOSIS, they argued that the state of a man in his new life depended on actions he performed in his previous life. At the same time they held that all things in the universe were interconnected with an unknown, but probably discoverable, series of number relationships, and that whoever found the key to these would be able to control human affairs. The SOPH-ISTS taught that man, by clever argument, could change the course of human events; they also argued over whether or not a man deliberated about acts he performed. From this it may be inferred that they acknowledged some degree of free choice in man, even if the outcome was subject to the will of the fates. The Eleatics necessarily denied human freedom, in consequence of their pantheistic monism. Similarly DEMOCRITUS, and the Greek atomists generally, adhering as they did to a strict mechanism, denied contingency of any kind in the universe.

Classical Thinkers. It was with SOCRATES that the Greek notion of human freedom shifted emphatically from a political concept to the psychological notion of individual subjective freedom. Socrates was one of the first Greek philosophers to stress the need for internal selfcontrol. External authority had broken down under the attacks of the Sophists. Consequently the new law Socrates taught was based not so much on external authority as on the mastery (Gr. $\dot{e}\gamma\kappa\rho\dot{\alpha}\tau\epsilon\iota\alpha$) each man has of himself. Since, for Socrates, no man does evil knowingly, and since his future depends upon what he knows, man must possess some degree of freedom.

Plato's myth of reincarnation implied moral responsibility. In fact, the whole of the Republic may be described as an extension of Socrates's notion of έγκράτεια. Aristotle himself did not explicitly discuss either liberty or free will, although both concepts can be found in his works. He disagreed with the teaching of PLATO and Socrates that a wicked man is necessarily ignorant of what is good. Experience, he said, shows otherwise; a man who is truly good can still choose what is evil.

Later Evolution. Like the Eleatics, the Stoics denied freedom of choice as a result of their materialistic pantheism, holding, as they did, that all changes in the universe were due to inexorable laws. For them, a man could be called free only if he willingly accepted these laws. PHILO JUDAEUS held that man's freedom is rooted in his intelligence. PLOTINUS taught that the human soul is free so long as it does not become involved in the world of matter. Moses MAIMONIDES, on the other hand, maintained the freedom of the will in an unqualified way.

Patristic and Medieval Development. With the introduction of Christianity into the mainstream of Western thought, free will came to be studied in more detail. Two teachings of the Christian religion influenced this development. One was that man was created by God and commanded to obey a divine moral law; at the same time, he was promised an eternal reward or punishment. But reward or punishment imply that a man has free choice, for otherwise such sanctions are meaningless. The second was that the first man had incurred original sin and that man, as a result, needed redemption by grace.

Patristic and medieval writers were not so much concerned to prove the existence of free will as they were to establish the roots of freedom, its relation to reason, and its theological implications. St. EPHREM THE SYRIAN, for example, taught that man has freedom; that this freedom is rooted in his intellect and will; and, because of this, that man is the image of God. Other patristic writers defended free will against the pagan teaching that fate ruled the universe.

Augustine and Anselm. In the early Church St. AU-GUSTINE was beyond question the greatest exponent of the Christian teaching on human freedom. His major concern was to reconcile man's freedom in relation to contingent acts with the foreknowledge God necessarily possesses. Augustine insisted on the freedom of the human will; yet he insisted on the necessity of grace as a basis of merit. He also asserted that an omnipotent and omniscient God would necessarily know, from all eternity, the infinite number of motives to which the will of each man might consent.

By the time Augustine composed his treatises, the Latin term libertas had several meanings in the Christian world. It could mean freedom of the will, or freedom as opposed to slavery—whether this is slavery to sin or slavery to death. Consequently when St. ANSELM OF CANTER-BURY took up a discussion of liberty he distinguished between the power to choose what is good or evil (arbitrium) and the power to choose what is actually good for one's nature (libertas). For St. Anselm, free choice is not so much an ability to choose between good and evil as it is an ability to maintain rectitude of the will.

Thomistic Doctrine. St. THOMAS AQUINAS argued that man is free with respect to finite goods but that he is determined to the infinite good. That is to say, the human person, encountering a finite object, can accept or refuse it; he can do so because the object can appear either as good, since it has actuality, or as lacking in good, since it lacks the actuality possessed by a different object. Aquinas held that a human person would not be free if he directly encountered an infinite good his intellect clearly recognized as such. But since man, in this life, is not confronted directly with an infinite good, he is not necessitated by the objects of this world. To reconcile the contingency of human choice with God's foreknowledge, Aquinas emphasized that man is in time whereas God is outside time, and that past, present, and future are simultaneously present to the Divine Mind. Thus foreknowledge, while meaningful to man, has no counterpart in God.

Yet God is not only omniscient, He is omnipotent; and in His omnipotent providence He brings into actuality all events that have happened, that are happening, and that will happen in the universe. This raises a problem: If an omniscient and all-provident God also effects whatever happens in the universe, how can God's activity be reconciled with man's freedom?

Later Scholasticism and Protestantism. Among Catholic philosophers and theologians two main positions have been formulated to solve this problem. Both positions claim their origin as further refinements of the teaching of St. Thomas, and both were developed in answer to the positions of Luther and Calvin. Dominican and Molinist Theories. Dominican theologians for the most part teach that God premoves each man toward his freely chosen goal, because every act of a creature requires that God first move the creature. This premotion is in conformity with the nature of the creature premoved. Thus an infinitely powerful God infallibly premoves man, a free agent, to choose a particular goal freely, while premoving other creatures toward their goals with necessity. God's premotion is inevitable in view of his omniscience. Since it is inevitable, it may be called a decree, and in this sense is logically prior to divine knowledge of creatural activity. (See PREMOTION, PHYSICAL.)

The Molinist position differs from the Dominican chiefly in two respects: instead of referring to a divine premotion, Molinists think it more precise to speak of a divine concurrence with man's will; and, secondly, they hold that God's knowledge of what a free being would choose, if the necessary conditions were supplied, is logically prior to His decree of concurrence or premotion. (See CONCURRENCE, DIVINE.)

St. Thomas himself notes that part of the difficulty in resolving the question of God's premotion and of man's free choice lies in the need to use a more apt terminology when speaking about God, since terms can be predicated of God only analogically. In the problem at hand terms such as premotion or foreknowledge are applied to God as if He existed in time, whereas He is an infinite being existing outside of time.

Protestant Reformers. Among the controversies of the Reformation, the doctrine of free will was a crucial point of difference between Protestant and Catholic theologians. Martin LUTHER and John CALVIN strongly denied freedom of the will, basing their arguments on scriptural texts, especially those of St. Paul. Luther concluded that man is predestined to such an extent that he can never truly be said to have power over his own fate. Luther did not deny all human freedom; but he believed that the freedom man possessed after original sin was not enough freedom to allow him to work out his redemption.

Calvin's denial of free will went further than Luther's. He asserted that man cannot perform a good act unless necessitated to it by God's grace, and that man can in no way resist such grace. It is absurd, said Calvin, to speak of man cooperating with grace, because this implies the possibility of rejection on man's part. See PREDES-TINATION (IN NON-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY).

Modern Thought. Consequent on the 16th-century discovery of large numbers of regular movements in the universe, some philosophers attempted to extend physical determinism to the sphere of human action. This inclination still persists, although it is counterbalanced by other tendencies in modern thought that defend the reality of freedom.

Determinists. Thomas HOBBES held that the notion of free subject was as self-contradictory as that of round quadrangle. Deliberation, for Hobbes, was nothing more than a succession of desires and aversions, each counterbalancing the other, until a final state was reached. This final state Hobbes called "the will act." Since each desire and aversion had been caused, Hobbes concluded that the will act itself was caused; hence the will act is not free. Yet he maintained that man does have freedom to act, since he can act once he has willed it.

B. SPINOZA concluded that only God is a free cause and that all human actions are subject to strict determinism. J. O. de La Mettrie, on the basis of his materialism, also denied freedom of the will. Arthur SCHOPENHAUER taught that a man knows the successive acts of his will after they have occurred, but that he does not foresee his future acts. Man only thinks he is free; if he were actually so, he would be able to foresee his future acts. J. F. Herbart's denial of free will resulted from his initial assumption that the methods and presuppositions of psychology are identical with those of physics.

Descartes, Hume, and Schelling. The writers mentioned above may safely be characterized as determinists; others cannot be located in a neat category, because their works contain elements of both determinism and freedom. René DESCARTES, for example, wavered between Jansenism and Molinism. David HUME held that from one standpoint man's acts are free, whereas from another standpoint they are not. He asserted that man's choice is necessitated as much as that of any material agent. Acts of choice are strictly determined by preceding feelings or motives, as well as by character. Nevertheless, since man himself makes the choice, in this respect he may be called free. Friedrich SCHELLING held that man's actions are simultaneously predictable and free. Man himself makes a choice, but his choices are determined by his character, which, in turn, is the result of previous choices. Freedom, for Schelling, is fundamentally the power of choosing between good and evil.

Proponents of Free Will. A variety of positions may be found also among advocates of free will. Some preserve deterministic elements in their teachings. N. MALE-BRANCHE, for example, saw that if his position on causality were carried far enough, it would deny human responsibility for any acts. Not wishing to go to this extreme, he asserted that religion and morality would be meaningless unless man is free. G. W. LEIBNIZ held for freedom of choice, although his theory should likewise have ended in a mitigated form of determinism. He held that, while free acts must be motivated by reason, reason must judge to be best what seems to be best.

Some writers accept freedom of the will as a given fact but deny any attempts at a strict demonstration. Blaise PASCAL, for example, said that freedom could be known only by means of a religious experience. Immanuel Kant held that it could not be demonstrated scientifically, but that it is implicit in the CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE. Similarly, contemporary existentialists are prone to accept free choice as a foundation for their philosophical positions. Karl JASPERS, for example, maintains that each man is a unique being who goes beyond what he already is, and locates his new state of being in the process of exercising his freedom. Martin HEIDEGGER states that, within certain limits, man can be responsible for his destiny by freely choosing his possibilities, especially his destiny to death. Jean Paul SARTRE affirms that freedom is a distinctive characteristic of man. Gabriel Marcel and Emmanuel Mounier teach that man realizes himself as a person only in his acts of commitment. (See EXISTENTIAL-ISM; PERSONALISM.)

Philosophical Analysis of Free Will

The foregoing history of the concept of free will shows not only the diversity of thought on this subject, but also the necessity of distinction and definition when attempting to analyze man's free activity. Scholastic philosophers, pursuing such a program, have arrived at refined notions of free will, its distinction from voluntarity and related concepts, and various influences to which it is subjected. The following is a survey of common scholastic teaching in this area.

Preliminary Distinctions. The term free will is customarily regarded as an accurate translation of the Latin expression liberum arbitrium; yet the more exact translation is free choice or free decision. One reason for objecting to "free will" is that this expression is interpreted too often to mean that every voluntary act is by definition a free act preceded immediately by an act of deliberation. Such is not the case.

Voluntarity. The designation "voluntary" means that an act was, at one time or another, willed freely; but it does not always mean that an act here and now being performed is a free act. Acts that have become ingrained as habits were perhaps at one time willed; and insofar as they were once willed and arose from the will principle, they may be called voluntary; but once established as habits, they should no longer be called free. Other acts resulting from a previous act of choice may also be called voluntary, but not, strictly speaking, free. These are virtually voluntary acts, that is to say, acts that, once chosen, are executed without requiring a new act of choice. A man who has chosen to go for a walk does not have to continue making a choice for each step he takes while walking. Insofar as he chose to be doing what he is doing, his act is virtually voluntary, although not completely free. (See VOLUNTARITY.)

Deliberation. Again, not every act a man performs is voluntary. The actions a man performs are commonly divided into human acts (actus humanus) and acts of man (actus hominis); a HUMAN ACT is one following some kind of deliberation, whereas an act of man is not preceded by deliberation. A reflex movement of the body, for example, would be an act of man and not a human act.

Definition of Free Will. To avoid confusing freedom with voluntarity and nondeliberate acts, free will is usually defined as the freedom possessed by a human being who, encountering an object he evaluates as finite, may choose whether or not to yield to the attraction of that object.

Such a definition obviously requires further exposition and clarification. Any object, insofar as it is actual and attractive, may be called a GOOD. Yet the WILL can be attracted to such an object only so far as it recognizes this as some kind of good. A good that can satisfy only to a limited extent is called a particular or finite good, whereas one that can satisfy in every conceivable respect is called the universal or supreme good (see GOOD, THE SUPREME).

According to St. Thomas Aquinas, the human will is strictly determined in its nature toward an object recognized intellectually as the universal good. (According to DUNS SCOTUS, the human will, absolutely speaking, would not be necessitated even in this case.) For St. Thomas, then, freedom of choice is exercised only with regard to objects recognized as particular goods. A man is not determined to these because particular goods may be viewed in two opposing ways: (1) they may be seen as good, i.e., according to the proportionate good they possess when compared to the universal good; or (2) they may be seen as lacking in good, i.e., to the extent that they lack goodness when measured against the universal good. Thus, any finite good can be considered under an aspect of desirability or undesirability when compared to the universal good. As desirable, it can attract the will; as undesirable, it cannot.

Further Distinctions. Assuming that the object in question is a particular good, further notions are helpful for clarifying what is meant by freedom of the will. These include the concepts of freedom of exercise, freedom of specification, elicited and commanded acts of the will, license, indifference, and spontaneity.

Exercise and Specification. Freedom of exercise is freedom to adopt or reject a particular good. This is the basic freedom of the will. Freedom of specification, on the other hand, is freedom to choose between one particular good and another, when several such goods are available. This is not found in every case involving freedom of the will. A person who elects to achieve a goal may find that only one particular good is available to achieve it. In such an eventuality he has no freedom of specification.

Commanded and Elicited Acts. Freedom of exercise and freedom of specification both apply to elicited acts of the will, as distinguished from commanded acts. Elicited acts are those taking place within the will itself; e.g., acts of desire or of choice. Commanded acts are those desired or chosen by the will, yet executed by another power. Suppose, for example, that an athlete desires to run faster than any man has ever run before. His desire is an elicited act; but his act of desire alone will not accomplish the result he seeks. He can accomplish this only by his ability to run. In such a case he is free to seek the goal; whereas he is not necessarily free to attain it.

License. Freedom of the will should not be confused with license. License is the ability to choose an object that, although satisfying, does not perfect the nature of the chooser. The ability to consume poisoned food or to read a salacious book is license, not freedom, because poisoned food or such reading do not make a person more human—they work against his humanity. Freedom, as opposed to license, is the capacity of a person to pursue, without extrinsic or intrinsic necessity, goods that can fulfill his nature.

Indifference. Freedom of will may be defined also as a condition of indifference with regard to finite goods. Such indifference can be understood either as indifference within the will itself or as indifference within the object. Indifference within the will is further subdivided into active and subjective. Active indifference is the neutrality of the will to act or not to act for a finite object. Subjective indifference (sometimes called formal indifference) is the neutrality of the will precisely as the subject in which active indifference is rooted. Indifference within the object (sometimes called objective indifference) is the dual aspect presented by a finite object whereby it can be considered from one standpoint as possessing desirable attributes, and from another standpoint as lacking the attributes possessed by another desirable object.

With these distinctions understood, freedom of the will may be more accurately described as the active indifference in virtue of which the will has dominion over its own act, through its power over the last practical judgment of the intellect, which presents the finite object to the will as a good to be adopted.

Spontaneity. Such freedom is not to be confused with spontaneity. Spontaneity signifies something arising within a thing from its internal principles and independently of external agents. The life activities of a plant are spontaneous; yet they are not free, since they arise from internal necessity.

Faculties Acting on the Will. The most important of the powers of the soul that influence choices of will is obviously the INTELLECT (see FACULTIES OF THE SOUL). The will is necessitated toward anything that is understood to be in some way satisfying; such understanding is a function of the intellect. Therefore a person's choice of an object is partly guided by his intellect. On the other hand, since even understanding of an object is a finite good for the person considering it, he may refuse to acquire a complete understanding, and his truncated intellectual act may thus result in a distorted concept of the object. Because of this, he may be attracted toward an object that here and now he considers good, whereas a more complete understanding of the same object would have presented it as undesirable.

The will can also be affected indirectly by objects of the sense powers, insofar as such objects are presented with a vividness rarely found in intellectual activity. Sense impressions and physical states, as a consequence, can influence a person's intellectual deliberation and choice. Examples of physical states are: (1) an inherited physical makeup whereby one person tends to react more readily and with greater emotion than another; (2) organic dispositions at certain ages of life-e.g., the youth, with his whole future open to him, is more optimistic, less cautious, and more subject to physical drives than the middle-aged man; and (3) organic modifications acquired by an individual himself. Some of the latter may be purely transitory, such as the effect of stimulants or depressing agents. Others may be more or less fixed, such as the pathological condition set up in the nervous system as the result of an addiction to dope.

Free Will and Unconscious Influences. The powers and contents of mind referred to above are considered as existing in the field of CONSCIOUSNESS at the time they exert their influence. Other contents of mind, outside the field of consciousness, can be shown also to influence a person's act of choice. Because of such unconscious influences, some writers have argued that a man cannot be called free in his choice, because he is not aware of everything affecting him at the time. This objection, however, does not hold, because the act of free choice is itself made on the basis of conscious judgments. Free will should be considered more as an ability to select between influences, than as an absence of influences. One's own awareness is witness to the fact that he chooses consciously. If his belief is illusory in this case, then no datum of consciousness would seem to have any truth value.

Free Will and Mental Illness. It has also been objected that freedom of the will has been outmoded by what is called "the irresistible impulse." The term is defined in various ways, but the common note is that of a deprivation (sometimes called a destruction) of the free agency of the individual so that he has an uncontrollable impulse to act. Yet it is inaccurate to speak of an irresistible impulse; it would be more correct to say that the impulse was unresisted. It is generally held by psychiatrists that even in severe cases of an obsessive-compulsive reaction a patient could continue resisting the "compulsive" urge, even though this would require an enormous expenditure of anxiety. Uncommon effort may be required for a neurotic to reject the object of a compulsive urge; but this is far different from saying that his will has been destroyed. Again, weakened resistance to an unresisted impulse may be more or less severe at different times for the same neurotic; these are mitigating circumstances in determining the morality of his actions, but it is] incorrect to say, on this account, that his will has been destroyed. If his will were destroyed, it would be impossible both practically and theoretically for a physician to cure him. After the unconscious content influencing a patient has been uncovered, the major effect of therapy is to have the patient choose a more constructive mode of action.

Freedom of will has also been denied in the case of psychotic patients. Psychosis may be generally described as a condition where the sufferer is markedly out of contact with some area of reality and is not aware that he is out of contact. (The psychotic who is hallucinating, for example, sincerely believes that the voice commanding him to kill his children is real.) Therefore, the objector argues, since the psychotic does not possess the true knowledge required for making a free choice, he is not free. To answer this objection, the notion of responsibility must be clarified and a distinction made between subjective responsibility and objective responsibility. By responsibility is meant the capacity to determine one's own acts, or the capacity to be deterred by sanctions or consequences. A person has subjective responsibility if he has freedom to act or not in accordance with his evaluation of the object and, while acting, is aware that he might have done otherwise. A person has objective responsibility if his choice is made on the basis of a true understanding of the situation in which he makes his decision. In the case of the man hallucinating, he would be subjectively responsible if he were free to act or refuse to act on the commands he heard from the voice; but he would not be objectively responsible if he were not in possession of objectively true knowledge, and thus was not free to make an objectively true choice. He would not be guilty of his act, even though subjectively responsible. It must be kept in mind, of course, that here it is a question of a psychotic's action as directly rooted in his psychosis. It is not necessarily true that every action this same individual would perform is totally lacking in responsibility, because he may have some degree of mental clarity in other areas of his life.

FREE WILL AND GRACE

The way in which the fact of man's free choice is reconciled with the fundamental Christian truth of his total dependence on the grace of God is, ultimately, a mystery. The Catholic Church has always believed and taught both truths while allowing its theologians full liberty to attempt to explain their compatibility. This article concentrates on the history of the problem.

Sovereignty of Grace. Catholic belief in the sovereignty of grace holds that no free act leading to salvation can be performed unless it is initiated, sustained, and brought to completion by the merciful gift or grace of God. To deny this is to destroy the whole meaning of the gospel of Jesus Christ (see, e.g., Jn 6.44; 15.5; Phil 2.13; 2 Cor 3.5; Rom 11.6), as the Church affirmed in its vigorous reaction to Pelagianism (H. Denzinger Enchiridion symbolorum, 222–230, 371–397; see PELAGIUS AND PE-LAGIANISM). It even accepted with approval the judgment of the author of the Indiculus that the Pelagians are "very impious defenders of free will" (Enchiridion symbolorum 238). With the rise of NOMINALISM in philosophical and theological teaching, a latent Pelagianism came to infect many facets of popular piety and preaching. Against this tendency the voice of the Reformation thundered the absolute sovereignty of grace. Yet, as Augustine had observed, the question of the interrelation of grace and man's free act is so difficult that "there are some persons who so defend God's grace as to deny man's free will" (Grat. et lib. arb. 1.1; Patrologia Latina 44:881). The Reformation theologians were heirs of nominalism's EX-TRINSICISM as well as foes of its naturalism, and they could only conceive of FREE WILL and grace as standing in opposition to one another, not as set in a relationship of harmony and subordination.

Affirmation of Free Will. In the context of the strong statements of the Reformers [which at least some contemporary Protestant theology interprets in a way entirely acceptable to Catholics-see J. Dillenberger and C. Welch, Protestant Christianity (New York 1958) 33] the Church defined as a dogma that even sinful man has a truly free will (Enchiridion symbolorum 1555). This conviction it has from the revelation that the process of salvation is man's dialogue of love with Him who first loved man (1 Jn 4.10-11; Mt 22.37-40). This same fidelity to the Gospel would constrain it to reject the pseudo-Augustinianism of Baius (Enchiridion symbolorum 1939, 1966; see BAIUS AND BAIANISM) and C. JANSEN (Jansenius) (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2003), which would consider the gift of grace as an irresistible attraction that necessitates man's action, destroying freedom.

Catholic Theology. Every Catholic theology maintains that man's supernatural act is produced both by his free will and by God's grace, but the relationship between them is not that of two independent causes mutually cooperating. On the contrary, the free consent is itself a gift of grace. While one legitimately speaks of "cooperating with grace" (Enchiridion symbolorum 379, 397, 1525), this cooperation is given to men by the gracious God. He so gives it to men that it is truly theirs, but it is theirs without ceasing to depend on the saving good pleasure of God. God and man act on totally different planes. Only the divine freedom is absolutely independent. Man's freedom is a creaturely freedom, and even in its free activity it is dependent on Subsistent Freedom. Yet this dependence does not do away with human freedom, for God's causality transcends every category of cause man can imagine. It gives lesser causes their own action in a way that is totally in harmony with their natures. Beings that are not free He moves to an activity that is determined; beings that are free He moves to an activity that is free and responsible while not ceasing to be the product of grace. Herein there is mystery, but not absurdity.

Theological Controversy. The years that followed Trent's solemn definition of the dogma of human liberty in the presence of efficacious GRACE found theologians trying to explain in rational terms how the sovereign efficacy of God's grace is compatible with the psychological dominion of man's own act that is essential to his liberty. Luis de MOLINA, SJ, wrote his famous Concordia liberi arbitrii cum gratiae donis . . . (Lisbon 1588), in which he postulated a SCIENTIA MEDIA as the special way God foresees the future free act of man prior to determining to give him the efficacious grace that will unfailingly bring about the free action. At the same time Domingo Báñez, OP, was expounding an approach to the problem in terms, he believed, of the principles of St. Thomas Aquinas (e.g., Summa theologiae 1a, 19.8; 105.5; 1a2ae, 10.4 ad 3; 112.3). He totally rejected the scientia media as an unnecessary innovation and as implying that God is somehow dependent on His creature (see BÁÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM). Thence developed the debate between Bañezianism and Molinism, which the Church has refused to decide (Enchiridion symbolorum 2564). The unresolved debate remains as an occasion of suspicion to orthodox Protestant theology; e.g., Karl Barth distrusts any Catholic affirmation of the sovereignty of divine grace that leaves room for a scientia media (Kirchliche Dogmatik 2.1:640-657).

The theologies of the Jesuit and the Dominican schools remain irreconcilably opposed in their manner of explaining how grace is efficacious to move the human will to its free act of encounter with God, but both affirm the fact that it is. Since faith is more concerned with revealed realities than theological explanations, the Church can tolerate the conflict.

The issue is not dead. It is a legitimate task of theology to seek a formula by which to express the complex data of the problem. In recent years there have been new efforts to express this reality within the general terms of the opposing camps (Bañezian: H. Guillermin, Marín-Sola, R. Garrigou-Lagrange, J. Maritain; Molinist: M. de la Taille, A. Michel, B. Lonergan, A. d'Alés, C. Boyer). Others (A. Sertillanges, C. Baumgartner), shunning both the scientia media and the physical premotion, are content to appeal to the transcendent character of the mysterious divine action.

FREE WILL AND PROVIDENCE

That God has a providence implies that He has omniscience and OMNIPOTENCE and that His providence extends to all things. A question concerning man's FREE WILL arises. How can this exist if his every action is eternally foreseen and determined?

Pre-Christian Thought. Among the Greeks the denial of freedom was common. In the universe there is an inescapable law, devoid of intelligence and love, determining every event, binding men and gods. This is destiny, necessity, or inflexible fate. Even those who admitted a supreme being's existence, providence, and man's freedom did not always clearly perceive these realities. Thus Plato held to a hierarchy of gods; Aristotle was a monotheist. Both discussed human liberty not as a special power of the will but more in a political or social context.

Jewish thought asserted the existence of divine providence and human freedom. Deuteronomy clearly stated the ability to choose between good and evil. If Josephus' statement (Antiquities 18.1.3–5) is accepted, at the time of the second Temple the Sadducees, to safeguard man's liberty, denied God's influence in his actions. The Essenes are pictured as having been absolute determinists. The Pharisees seemed to have held a middle position, admitting the creature's liberty in certain matters.

Christian Thought. With a deeper notion of man's supernatural DESTINY, the question of human liberty under the mysterious influence of predestination to grace and final glory became more complex in the Christian Era. Gnosticism, which in some cases rejected responsibility, and Manichaeism, with its denial of freedom, gave no answer. Augustine set forth the difficulty when he wrote that some so defend the grace of God that they deny man's free will; and others so defend man's free will that they deny the grace of God (Grat. et lib. arb. 1.1; Patrologia Latina 44:881). He himself maintained that the divine precepts of the Old and New Testaments would be worthless without freedom (ibid. 2.2, Patrologia Latina 44:882; 2.4, Patrologia Latina 44:883).

St. Thomas Aquinas affirmed both divine providence and man's freedom. God's knowledge and existence are not the same as those of His creatures. He does not know things successively but with one eternal act; otherwise He would be subject to change and imperfection (Summa theologiae 1a, 14.4; 14.7). Nor does He exist in time (Summa theologiae 1a, 14.13 ad 3). Thus the manner and limitations of created intelligence and power must not be ascribed to Him. On the other hand man is free. If he were not, counsels, exhortations, precepts, prohibitions, rewards, and punishments would be purposeless (Summa theologiae 1a, 83.1). To harmonize these two truths Thomas distinguished between primary and secondary causality. To be free the creature need not be the first but only the secondary cause of his actions. An analogy is proposed. When man makes something, he works on an already existing thing, yet he is the real cause of what is produced. God is the first cause of all things; man, acting under His influence, is the true secondary cause of his own actions (Summa theologiae 1a, 83.1 ad 3).

This reasoning applies both to natural and supernatural providence, but with a difference. Strictly speaking the former is not beyond human understanding; yet such understanding is incomplete. Man's knowledge of the divine essence is not proper but analogical; this is imperfect because it is only proportional. The teaching of faith, while only morally necessary here, increases certitude. In the supernatural order, however, man's liberty under grace and predestination to eternal life is a mystery; the created intelligence alone cannot prove it; an appeal to faith is, therefore, absolutely necessary.

The core of the argument on faith is had in the Church's response to various errors. Martin Luther maintained that divine providence and omnipotence were incompatible with human freedom. Original sin also left permanent damage. Free will exists only in God. If applied to man, it should be restricted to things below him, such as the right to use or not use his goods or possessions. In matters of salvation or damnation he is a captive either to the divine will or to that of Satan. M. Baius taught that without grace man is not free; he can only sin.

The Council of Trent affirmed that in Adam's sin man lost his original innocence; his will, though weakened, remains free; under the influence of actual grace it can consent or dissent (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963)1521, 1554). St. Pius V asserted that even without grace man naturally has the choice between good and evil (Enchiridion symbolorum 1927). Vatican Council I mentioned both divine providence and man's freedom:

> All things which He founded God by His providence protects and governs, "reaching from end to end mightily and governing all things well" (cf. Wis 8.1). "For all things are naked and open to

His eyes'' (Heb 4.13), even those things which are future by the free actions of creatures.'' [H. DENZ-INGER, Enchiridion symbolorum 3003.]

In the post-Tridentine period a controversy arose among Catholic theologians concerning the divine influence and human freedom. Luis de MOLINA, SJ, proposed his system of SCIENTIA MEDIA. From all eternity God knows what use each individual will make of his free will. With His aid the creature makes its own selfdetermination; His decree, either absolute or permissive, follows such choice (see MOLINISM). Domingo Báñez, OP, maintained an eternal but free PREDETERMINATION of man's actions (see BÁÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM).

Depending on its concept of God and human freedom, modern philosophy often gives a different picture. When it denies the supernatural order, as does Deism, it rules out consideration of the mystery of grace and free will. When it is materialistic it denies true liberty. Many psychologists hold that man's conviction of freedom as the result of personal experience is an illusion.

FREEDOM

The various meanings of the term "freedom" center around three main themes. The first is the possibility of the subject to act as he will to satisfy his tendencies, aspirations, and the like (freedom of action as opposed to constraint, servitude, etc.; civil and political liberties, etc.). The second is the power of self-determination without any necessitation in willing, if only from pressures of a nature slightly distinct from the ego (freedom of willing, free will, as opposed to NECESSITY). The third is the fulfillment of the reasoning subject by the internal domination of reason, of superior motivations over feelings and over inferior motivations (rational freedom). This article sketches the historical development of the various notions of freedom and then presents a systematic analysis of topics relating to freedom that are of particular interest to Catholics.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

The history of the concept of freedom may be conveniently divided into periods corresponding to those of ancient, patristic, medieval, modern, and contemporary thought.

Ancient period. Man's first awareness of things outside himself naturally led him to an early appreciation of the first type of freedom mentioned above. SOCRATES and PLATO, impressed with the idea of servitude, presented its correlative as a liberation internal to man. The evildoer who thinks he is free because he can satisfy his desires is himself a slave. Only the wise and virtuous man in whom reason rules is truly free. Can man freely choose between true and false freedom? The Socratic theory, which identifies virtue and wisdom, is interwoven in the answer. Sin comes only from ignorance of the true GOOD. This logically seems to exclude freedom of choice properly speaking. In any event, Plato conceived of freedom in the third sense already mentioned.

ARISTOTLE rejected the Socratic principle; for him, evil can knowingly be willed, although not as evil. However, there is no agreement among scholars as to whether or not Aristotle affirmed the existence of free will. He admits of choice (Gr. $\pi \rho \circ \alpha (\rho \in \sigma \circ \varsigma)$) preceded by deliberation. Both concern means alone. Deliberation ends upon a person's accepting one means as the most appropriate. There is neither deliberation nor choice about the end. Again, Aristotle gives the practical syllogism as the application of a general rule to a particular case. Passion can impede the correct use of the principles of reason and substitute for them another rule (e.g., pleasure to be sought). Aristotle's notion of freedom is thus not clearly defined and is difficult to distinguish from spontaneity, just as the will is poorly distinguished from desire. Similarly, the idea of free will is not made precise; the word itself (avτεξούσιον) appears only later in Greek philosophy with the problem of morality, and thenceforth occupies a prominent place in philosophical thought.

Paradoxically, the Stoics, holding for a strict causal determinism (a revival of the old notion of FATE), assert most strongly that man has the power to be master of himself and to arrive at virtue; and they maintain an opposition between what depends on man and what does not. The wise man who has himself conquered virtue is superior to the gods. They strive to reconcile the two seemingly contradictory positions by showing that human acts, although conditioned by their antecedents, are man's very own and truly proceed from him, much like a cylinder that, once thrown on a plane, rolls by itself. In fact, the Stoics consider true freedom as an acceptance of necessity. It has its perfection in the wise man who is free from passions and emotions and is master of himself through submission to universal reason. No less paradoxically, EPICURUS and his followers, although materialists, admit of freedom of choice, freeing themselves from the fear of destiny. To ensure such freedom they posit an indeterminism in the physical world by acknowledging, in atoms undergoing falling motion, the power to deviate from the vertical.

In the Hellenistic period many treatises on destiny appeared, and the first meaning of freedom found energetic defenders (e.g., Alexander of Aphrodisias, second and third centuries A.D.). The problem of reconciling freedom with divine foreknowledge and providence had already arisen by this time.

Patristic era. Christianity, or more precisely Judeo-Christianity, emphasized the idea of freedom: freedom of God in creation, in calling men to salvation, and so on; freedom of man, without which precepts and sanctions would have no meaning. The fact that a free act involves an eternal destiny gave to the problem of freedom a tragic aspect completely overlooked by the Greeks, Aristotle in particular. The specifically Christian problem of the harmony between freedom and grace further complicated the problem of the harmony between divine knowledge and freedom. Moreover the Christian message, with St. Paul in particular, was presented as a liberation: the Christian is torn from servitude to sin, to the flesh, and to the letter of the law in order to enjoy freedom of spirit.

The Fathers of the Church, in fact, at first appeared concerned with defending free will against the fatalism of the Gnostics and the Manichaeans (St. IRENAEUS, ORI-GEN, METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS, GREGORY OF NYSSA, etc.). Knowledge does not change the nature of its object; what is foreseen as free is free (St. AUGUSTINE). BOETHI-US was more precise. He clarified the idea of ETERNITY, that in God there is not foreknowledge but knowledge, so that what is future for man is present for God. The problem of freedom and grace came to the fore with the Pelagian controversy (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM). In what sense and to what point is man, a fallen creature and enslaved to sin, free? How can God move man toward good without infringing upon his freedom, and so on? The Latin Middle Ages would remain under the influence of the Augustinian problematics.

Middle ages. In the early scholastic period, Saints ANSELM OF CANTERBURY and BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX are the two outstanding figures. Anselm considered freedom essentially as the power to retain rectitude of the will for love of this very rectitude. It is inseparable from the will and perdures even in the sinner who cannot recover his lost rectitude. St. Bernard distinguished three freedoms: a natural freedom that is contrary to necessity; another, the effect of grace, that frees from sin; and a third, an effect of glory, that frees from suffering. The will is essentially free, and in man this freedom effects a special resemblance to God.

The thinkers of the high scholastic period dealt more rigidly with the nature of the will's freedom, some relating it to reason, others to the will, still others to both. St. THOMAS AQUINAS saw it as an attribute of the will insofar as the latter is rational. He based his theory of the free act on the distinction between the order of specification, in which intelligence is primary, and that of exercise, in which the will has primacy. Only the good in general, the Absolute Good, can necessarily determine the will in the order of specification. But in the latter case, although this necessity does away with freedom of choice, it does permit a freedom of spontaneity. Man participates in such freedom here on earth to the degree that he is led by the Holy Spirit. It must be noted that, since divine motion respects natures, God can move the will with no detriment to its freedom. (See FREE WILL; CAUSALITY, DIVINE.)

John Duns Scotus gives freedom a particular emphasis as that which characterizes the will and differentiates it from "natural" powers. The will is the sole cause of its decision, the role of the intellect being merely that of proposing its object. Even when faced with the Absolute Good, the will strictly retains the possibility of refusing its assent. The theology of Scotus tries to avoid anything that would place in God a dependence of will on intellect.

The nominalist school further accented the voluntarist and indeterminist tendency. Physical and moral laws are completely subject to the divine mind, and a type of theological determinism begins to appear. This does not always deny free will but views it as necessarily determined by God and in reality as nonexistent. THOMAS BRADWARDINE and John WYCLIF are representative of this tendency.

Modern period. Such theories found an echo among the reformers. For M. LUTHER and J. CALVIN, among others, free will no longer exists in man, who is fallen and totally enslaved to his desires. It is basically incompatible with the foreknowledge and sovereign dominion of God.

The controversy raised by such opinions afforded Catholic theologians the opportunity to study the nature of freedom and of its compatibility with divine knowledge, providence, and action. As regards the first topic, Thomists maintained the nondetermining character of motives, whereas F. SUÁREZ and the Molinists held for the possibility of acting or not acting, all conditions required for action being present, and "all" being understood to include divine motion. On the other hand, Thomists and St. Robert BELLARMINE held that the will always follows the last practical judgment, a point on which Suárez disagreed. The second topic gave rise to the systems of D. Báñez and L. de MOLINA and their variations. Báñez emphasized the primacy of divine action, which infallibly predetermines the will to determine itself freely. Suárez, on the other hand, was careful to safeguard the psychological reality of free will, but he faced serious problems also, particularly in his theory of the SCIENTIA MEDIA. These two systems have confronted each other throughout the history of Catholic theology (see CON-CURRENCE, DIVINE; PREDETERMINATION; PREMOTION, PHYSICAL).

The problems of philosophers during this period differed from those of the theologians. While T. HOBBES professed determinism, R. DESCARTES vigorously affirmed freedom in God and in man. In God freedom is absolute and operates with essences and truths as well as with existences. This indifference is one aspect of God's infinite perfection, of His supreme independence. Freedom is in some way infinite in man too; in this way it is in him the mark of the Creator. Man can oppose the clearly known good simply to assert his freedom. However, this indifference is not purely and simply a perfection in man, who does not create the true and the good. On the contrary, the infinity of freedom in man, insofar as it goes beyond the extent of understanding, is the cause of error and sin, for man can affirm and will something whose truth and worth he does not perceive clearly. Perfect freedom, for him, would be an irresistible and fully spontaneous adherence to the clearly perceived good. Descartes cites an example of this in consenting to the evidence of the Cogito. The Cartesian notion of freedom oscillates between the second and the third meanings cited at the beginning of this article.

For B. SPINOZA, something is free if it exists because of the sole necessity of its nature and if it alone determines itself to act. Only one being fits this definition, God or SUBSTANCE, whose freedom and necessity are identical. There is no freedom of choice in God, for this would place contingency in Him; things derive from Him as conclusions from a principle. Again, there is no freedom of choice in man, whose activity is determined not only by his own essence but by the action of other beings (modes). Human freedom in the third meaning, however, does exist; it consists in freedom from passions or affections and in determination by reason, and comes about because of "knowledge of the third kind," which grasps things through their highest reason, sub specie aeternitatis.

G. W. LEIBNIZ rejected this necessitarianism and attempted to restore the freedom of choice. In his view, the free act is characterized by (1) spontaneity, a characteristic common to every activity since the substance, or MONAD, is alone the cause of all its determinations; (2) intellectuality; and (3) contingency, in the sense that the opposite act does not imply any logical or metaphysical contradiction. Decision is always the result of judgments, affections, tendencies, "little perceptions," and the like, which converge in the soul at a moment coinciding with the autonomous development (with no external command) of the monad. A "freedom of indifference" would violate the principle of SUFFICIENT REASON, whose discovery Leibniz attributed to himself. Thus he never went beyond psychological determinism and considered the free subject an immaterial automaton. In his opinion, God Himself is determined by His perfection to the choice of the better.

Eighteenth-century EMPIRICISM and MATERIALISM completely rejected free will. Freedom is an attribute of man, not of the will, and it consists in the power man has to determine his actions (including his internal acts) by his will when faced with possible alternatives. But the will is necessarily moved by the attraction of pleasure and especially, according to J. LOCKE, by the desire to escape "uneasiness," although Locke acknowledged in man the power to suspend his decision to make the choice clearer. According to D. HUME, internal facts appear to be as completely dependent upon their antecedents as are external facts. Yet these writers were deeply interested in freedom in the first meaning. In this period, the development of liberal ideas in politics and economics put an end to the old regime and created a new type of society.

I. KANT stated the problem of freedom in original fashion. The pure reason, requiring that phenomena be linked among themselves according to causal determinism, excludes the freedom of the phenomenal world but allows the possibility of freedom in the noumenal world, of which it knows nothing (see PHENOMENA; NOUMENA). But the practical reason sees in the fact of obligation a determination by pure reason that implies freedom. In reality Kant has two ideas of freedom: one negative, the power to begin a series of phenomena, and the other positive, the autodetermination of practical reason (or will) in positing moral law. How is negative freedom reconciled with the determinism in this view? In his Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft (Königsberg 1793), Kant acknowledges a timeless choice that determines the intelligible character governing the complete unfolding of empirical existence for every man. This idea was to appear many times in the future, for example, with F. W. J. SCHELLING and A. SCHOPENHAUER.

Contemporary period. The notion of freedom is much used in contemporary philosophy but with very different meanings, a diversity already seen in post-Kantian IDEALISM. J. G. FICHTE exalted the creative freedom by which the ego set up for itself a world where morality was to be practiced (The Vocation of Man), while G. W. F. HEGEL located true freedom in man's having within himself the reason for his own activity. Such a notion of freedom excludes contingency; it is an inclusive and internalized necessity. Concretely it is realized within a well-organized state. This notion of freedom as the perfect penetration of man by reason, as the realization of the true ego (i.e., the rational ego), is common to the rationalist-idealist tradition of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, as exemplified by F. H. BRADLEY and B. Bosanquet.

Whereas the positivistic empiricism of J. S. MILL recognized only freedom in the first meaning-and scientific determinism spread this conception-Marxism adopted and transposed certain Hegelian ideas into materialism. True freedom is what all of humanity will possess when men control the physical and social mechanisms that dominate them at present. Freedom is necessity that is understood and utilized. There is no free will. Because they make no distinction between theory and practice, the Marxists speak of liberation (i.e., from the mastery of a determinism imposed by science and technology) rather than of freedom. Man learns what freedom is by liberating himself. They insist on the dialectical connection between determinism and freedom; without determinism freedom is impossible, because man cannot act upon nature.

Among the defenders of free will, apart from traditional SPIRITUALISM, may be cited C. Renouvier. In the last quarter of the nineteenth century, an antirationalist and antideterminist reaction appeared in the form of pragmatism, the philosophy of contingency developed by W. JAMES. Unfortunately, the assertion of freedom has often been separated from a finalist metaphysics that alone renders it intelligible.

H. BERGSON stressed the freedom of spirit as opposed to the determinism of matter. The free act is the continuous expression of the underlying ego, which continually reconstitutes itself so that one state can never be reduced to a previous state. Determinism proceeds from an illusion that expresses pure spiritual duration in terms of space.

More recently some claim to have found a defense for freedom in the indeterminism of quantum mechanics.

Existential or existentialist thinkers since S. A. KIER-KEGAARD insist on the irrational side of freedom as the generator of ANXIETY. Choice plays an important role in the ontology of J. P. Sartre, for whom freedom is conscious awareness and existence. It precedes the entire order of reason and in this sense, but in this sense alone, it is "absurd." The radical choice is that by which beingfor-itself puts itself, in an absolutely contingent fashion, into being-in-itself as its negation. Such a freedom has no limit but the impossibility of self-renunciation. No nature or order of values is before or above it; it itself creates values.

For N. HARTMANN and others, freedom encounters a world of values to be realized, but it can move toward realization only by choosing among them. This necessity is the radical evil. On the other hand, human freedom is interpreted by the theory of "levels of being," each of which is free with respect to the inferior levels.

Among contemporary Thomists, Jacques Maritain has studied the problem of freedom more profoundly than any other (see THOMISM). Freedom of choice presupposes freedom of spontaneity, common to everything that lives and acts, but it must lead to the freedom of "autonomy and exultation." This is the opening out of a personality whose aspirations nothing harms or contradicts, either as a human personality or as a personality in general. Moreover, Maritain draws attention to the ontological basis of freedom by relating it to the Thomistic doctrine of EXIS-TENCE.

SYSTEMATIC ANALYSIS

Among the topics associated with freedom that merit more detailed consideration are its ontological basis, its relationships to God, and its particular relation to the person.

Ontological basis. In its metaphysical essence, freedom implies autodetermination of the subject more than it does nonnecessity. Its various types stem from the various ways of considering the subject, which can be (1) man as determined from without; (2) more particularly, man as determining his internal or external acts by his will; (3) deeper still, in the willing subject, the ego as not completely determined by nature, circumstances, motives, and the like; or (4) the superego, as opposed to the ego and to the id. To understand the bond between freedom broadly associated with BEING in this way, one must consider being not only as an ESSENCE, as a determination to be this or that, but also as an existent actuality.

A purely essentialist notion of being tends to conceive the bond between various beings after the fashion of a logical connection; in its extreme form, this is found in the rationalist determinism of Spinoza and somewhat less in that of Leibniz. In reality, the ACT by which the subject exists and subsists in his incommunicable individuality, and this in accordance with the demands of his essence, is the root of his activity and spontaneity. His activity is his own inasmuch as it is the expression and realization of this radical actuality.

Spontaneity increases with the ontological level of being. Being is more unified and more itself, its activity more its own and more autonomous, the more it is being and the more it approaches the sufficiency and independence of Subsistent Being. But below the level of SPIRIT, this spontaneity remains entirely determined by the nature of the agent and the concrete conditions of its exercise. With spirit there appears a new kind of spontaneity. Spirit, of course, acts according to its nature, or essence, but its nature is not to be simply a nature, not to be simply what it is, but to be somehow everything. Its essence is "open" and its aspirations can be satisfied by the Absolute alone. In this way it escapes from determinism. Other existents, being only what they are, can act only according to what they are at a given moment. But spirit is not imprisoned by any particular determination, by any end or value; it can transcend them all. This condition of the spirit can be referred to as ontological freedom. In spirit, in fact, there "freely" appears the positive indetermination of being as such, its eminence over its various determinations. Freedom of action is rooted in this ontological freedom.

Obviously, for a spirit incarnate in matter, the exercise of this power of surpassing is conditioned by what it has of the nonspiritual within itself. Human freedom is essentially impure and its field of immediate action is quite diminished.

Freedom in no way constitutes an irrational exception in being, as was believed under the influence of determinist thought. On the contrary, it is nonfreedom that marks a decadence in being. For St. Thomas, free action as action "by itself" has primacy over any action that is determined by a given nature, which is action "by another" (De pot. 3.15). The mystery of freedom is basically the mystery of being itself, of the existent. This is why, if every act clearly makes existence manifest, the free act does so to an eminent degree. The essence of the will does not explain such behavior in these circumstances; only the existent can remove such indetermination. Insofar as freedom implies the contingency of the act in the choice of a finite good, the mystery that it envelops is also that of FINITE BEING, of NONBEING in being itself. Finally, insofar as created freedom expresses the (at least radical) possibility of failure, it implies nonbeing not only on the part of the object but also on the part of the subject.

Freedom and God. Two points here merit consideration: freedom in God and man's freedom before God.

God's freedom. As PURE ACT of being, dependent on nothing, not even on a nature that might differ so little as to be His act and for Him a given, God is freedom. Some thinkers, such as C. Secrétan (1815–95), even consider this freedom as the principle of divine being ("I am what I will''). This implies two impossibilities: selfcausation, in the strict sense, and the contingency of the Absolute Being. Divine existence can be called a free act only if one understands by this the independence and unconditional character of Absolute Being. Such a freedom is also a necessity because Absolute Being cannot not exist (contingency is a defect of being). Only He exists by Himself alone; His existence is neither a pure fact nor the effect of necessity that is a priori with respect to Him. God simply is.

Neither is there freedom of choice in the love that God has for Himself, which is the internal aspect of His necessity, although He does have freedom of choice with regard to other beings. God is determined neither to create, nor to create a particular type of world, nor to impress a determined course on its history. To think otherwise would be to include this world among the conditions without which God would not be God. The Divine Being is sufficient unto Himself; His worth does not depend upon the beings He establishes, nor is He better for having created (better for man, indeed, but this is true only insofar as man exists). This poses a difficulty, which was accentuated by Spinoza, for indetermination and contingency seem thus to be attributed to God. Had God created another world, His act would have been different; and since His act and His being are inseparable, His being would have been other than it is. Here it is pointless to make, as some do, a distinction between God and His choice, to presume that such a distinction can be reconciled with the SIMPLICITY OF GOD and that it does not introduce nonbeing or POTENCY in Him. Even though it is claimed that the determination God gives Himself proceeds from His plenitude and presupposes no lack within Him, there is still the presence of this determination itself that must be explained, and this can proceed ad infinitum. In reality, here one encounters the mystery of free causality. It is proper to the THING that it cannot produce a different effect unless it is modified in its being. It is proper to spirit to be able to give rise to different effects without so changing. For the finite spirit, acts are specified by their objects, and the contingency of objects reflects back on the acts. On the other hand, God is not involved in a network of relationships, for He gives and receives nothing. Contingency, multiplicity, and the diversity of beings that He establishes cannot affect His unique, identical, and necessary act. Man's reason cannot very well grasp the "how" of this. The affirmation of divine freedom guarantees the contingency of the universe but transfigures it at the same time; such contingency is no longer absurd and distressing, as the existentialists hold, but rather it becomes the expression of a loving freedom. The world's entire value stems from its appearing to be the result of a free gift.

Man's freedom before God. There is no need to examine here the particular problems encountered in reconciling human freedom of choice with divine knowledge and providence (see PREDESTINATION; PROVIDENCE OF GOD). The more general difficulty is the following. If man can begin a chain of events, he seems to be a creator and to possess within himself something that does not depend upon God. Human freedom thus seems to limit the universality of divine action. In fact, some thinkers, for example, H. Höffding (1843-1931), have asserted that to admit free will is to admit a kind of polytheism. Without entering into an examination of theories that have tried to clarify the problem of divine CONCURRENCE, one may note that a correct understanding of the relation between freedom and being can shed much light on the problem. The relation of created freedom to God is then seen as an aspect of the relation of participated being to Absolute Being (see PARTICIPATION). God is this very relationship at its maximum intensity. Human freedom participates in divine freedom, but it no more limits divine freedom than finite being limits Infinite Being. On the contrary, divine freedom and OMNIPOTENCE are manifested by the ability of beings to determine themselves, to be in some way "causes of themselves"-a capacity that itself comes from their "openness" to the Absolute. The free act reveals the infinite depth of the Spirit who makes its originator be an "image of God." Thus in every way human freedom bespeaks dependence upon God; it does not limit God. The participated character of human freedom is here the fundamental truth. To specify the "how" of this must be left to various systems of explanation, though none offers complete satisfaction.

The real problem lies in the matter of choosing EVIL, for one would not wish to place responsibility for this on God. But the possibility of sinning, far from perfecting freedom, limits it. Man sins to the extent that he participates only imperfectly in divine freedom. Sin is the expression of the nothingness in the creature. It is the negation or "rupture" of the divine movement toward good; and as such, it is the work exclusively of the creature. Although contrary to the divine will, sin is permitted by this will, which wishes beings to be what they are and to act according to their nature. Divine action (grace) and human freedom must not be considered as contradictories, as though man is freer when less "moved" by God; it is the opposite, rather, that is true.

Human freedom, participating in God's freedom, perfects itself as freedom only to the extent that it allows itself to be completely enveloped by God.

Freedom and person. Freedom appears as the act proper to the PERSON. Metaphysically speaking, the person is radically composed of two elements: (1) SUBSIS-TENCE, that is, individual existence proper to a unit that is relatively autonomous and incommunicable, fully "in itself"; (2) spirituality or an intellectual nature, together with all this implies for openness to being, values, and so on, and for the ability to enter into communication with other persons. This latter aspect is particularly stressed in contemporary thought. But freedom exhibits the person in this twofold characterization: (1) Not only does the free act show the existent as existent, but eminently as this existent. My free act is mine; I alone am responsible (whereas a truth is true for all). Moreover, freedom completes individuality, adding to natural differences or those owed to circumstances that stem from various choices. (2) The free act is expressive of a spiritual nature insofar as this act involves going beyond particular values. The awareness of freedom is nothing more than the awareness of this power of surpassing and of the opening out toward the Absolute. In this way the person is rendered present to himself, in possession of himself, as opposed to the dispersion and the alienation of the thing. This enables the person truly to give himself in a selfless LOVE.

Authentic or spiritual love and freedom are thus closely related; both express the superabundance of the spiritual existent. True love implies freedom, and it is itself a liberator. It is obvious from this that freedom is a condition for the establishment of a true SOCIETY of persons. PERSONALITY and freedom progress on an equal footing. This implies that the person must be placed in conditions conducive to the full operation of his power of self-determination, and this normally implies a certain amount of freedom in the first meaning mentioned at the beginning of this article. Only a really strong personality can find in servitude the opportunity to affirm his proper freedom. The education of the person will thus leave some play for freedom, even though this involves some risk; one need not attempt to prevent every deviation by external restraints. The virtuous act must proceed from within, and this presumes the subject's recognition and acceptance of moral values as his own. When the Good, with whom the subject identifies himself through love, completely determines him and conditions and envelops the very good of his subjectivity and freedom, it is then that he is fully self-determined, fully free, and fully a person.

FREEDOM, INTELLECTUAL

Human freedom is the possibility of selfdetermination as opposed to dependence on the power and compulsion of others: negatively, "being free from" (a certain unfetteredness in relation to other things and to oneself: detachment, separation); positively, "being free to" (ability to dispose of other things and of oneself: power, dominion). Being human, FREEDOM is never absolute and unlimited but relative and in many respects limited; but it is precisely thus that it displays its various levels and forms. Intellectual freedom (in contrast to more practical specifications of it, such as freedom of will, choice, decision, action) means in general terms freedom of the INTELLECT, of thought, of the mind in general, and thus insofar as every man is a spiritual being, it is a capability and a right of every man; it has further the special meaning of the freedom of intellectuals, those whose work is principally of the mind, and is thus, insofar as such men are in the special service of truth and beauty, a capability and right precisely of scholars (working in the natural sciences and other intellectual fields), artists, and writers. Insofar as intellectual freedom is especially called for within a university, in teachers and students, in research, teaching, and study, it is called ACADEMIC FREEDOM (from Plato's school of philosophy in the grove of the hero Academus).

History. The whole history of the human mind is a history of the freedom of the mind, constantly realized anew in new historical situations and forms. But when freedom of the mind, intellectual freedom, appears as a program, a social and indeed political demand, a right of the individual person over against State, Church, and society, its history has to be seen against the background of something with a wider content, human rights, those inalienable rights, because inseparably bound up with the dignity of the human person, to recognition and respect for the essential conditions of its existence. The prehistory of these rights reaches back not only to the secularized ideas of the English and French ENLIGHTENMENT about natural rights, the right to freedom of conscience, of Calvinist inspiration, and scholastic natural law (Thomas Aquinas, Francisco de Vitoria), but right back to Greek antiquity (Stoa) and to the preaching of the New Testament (man as the IMAGE OF GOD and as set free into the freedom of the children of God). Constitutional demands in this field, which had to some extent been asserted in England from the 17th century and largely implemented, were consolidated and given an explicit basis in natural law in the Bill of Rights of Virginia in 1776, the first specialized catalogue of universal human and civil rights (note especially article 1 on personal freedom and equality, article 12 on freedom of the press, and article 16 on freedom of conscience and FREEDOM OF RELIGION). While the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America, 1776, contains a sentence in general terms on the rights of man, the Déclaration des droits de l'homme of the French National Assembly, 1789, treats the matter at length; article 11 is of great importance in relation to this particular subject: "La libre communication des pensées et des opinions est un des droits les plus précieux de l'homme; tout citoyen peut donc parler, écrire, imprimer librement, sauf à répondre de l'abus de cette liberté dans les cas déterminés par la loi." Thence derive similar statements in all modern constitutions, including finally the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights: article 18-"Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance"; article 19-"Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers." Finally, there is the requirement laid down by Pope John XXIII in his encyclical PACEM IN TERRIS: "By the natural law, every human being has the right to freedom in searching for truth and in expressing and communicating his opinions, and in pursuit of art, within the limits laid down by the moral order and the common good. And he has the right to be informed truthfully about public events."

Theological Basis. The Church, aiming to orientate itself by the gospel, has not less but more reason than the thinkers proceeding from the idea of natural law not only to set a theoretically high value on human freedom in every context but also to realize it in practice to the greatest possible extent. The gospel of Jesus Christ is meant, indeed, to bring man true freedom. But man cannot achieve it himself. Man in the concrete just does not live as the Stoics' sovereign being of pure reason, capable of following the law of reason, but finds himself constantly in bondage and fettered to the things and powers of this world and, above all, to himself: "For I do not do the good that I wish, but the evil that I do not wish, that I perform Unhappy man that I am! Who will deliver me from the body of this death?'' (Rom 7.19, 24). God through Jesus Christ (Rom 7.25) helps man, the unfree, to cancel out his own slavish, sinful self and win a new, free self: "For freedom Christ has made us free" (Gal 4.31; cf. Jn 8.36).

Thus the basis and origin of man's freedom does not lie in man himself, he being by nature the slave of sin, but in the freedom of God, the freedom of His grace setting man free in Christ. This freedom is made present by the Spirit: "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom'' (2 Cor 3.17). Freedom from what and for what? Freedom from the slavery of sin for God's saving grace; from the oppressive compulsion of the Law for the gospel, the liberating message of God's reign and the salvation of man in faith and service of his neighbor; from the annihilating power of death for eternal life in God's glory, in the "glorious freedom of the children of God" (Rom 8.21). For the Christian who desires to be given this freedom, everything depends on his not wanting to dispose, by his own power, of himself but letting God, the liberator, dispose of him: in trusting faith and self-giving love for God and his fellow men.

The Church, as the community of these who are truly free in Christ, is by no means a colony on earth of citizens of heaven without interest in conditions in this world. Rather, it takes part, though with prudent detachment, in the trade and traffic of the world (1 Cor 7.29-31), rejoices with those who rejoice and weeps with those who weep (Rom 12.15). It is required to practice OBEDIENCE toward secular authority (Rom 13.1-7) and be socially constructive itself by settling the various conflicts within it (1 Cor ch. 5-7) and building everything up in a love that is not limited to its own community, but is, in principle, without limits (1 Cor ch. 8-14). In this active love of neighbor in the world and for the world, which comes from the love of God, there is revealed the real and not merely notional freedom of Christians and of their Church (cf. Rom 8.31-39). How far it goes is shown by Augustine's ama, et fac quod vis (love, and do what you will).

Precisely as being a gift from God, ever newly given, freedom is at the same time a task for man, to be ever newly conquered—not only in the world but also in the Church. It was necessary even in Paul's time for him to intervene energetically in the Church on behalf of freedom as lived by the individual person and individual group: against, for instance, the traditionalist legalism of the Jewish Christians, who wished to impose the prescriptions of their Law on the Gentile Christians (Gal), and against the arrogance of those who passed judgment on others' personal decisions of faith and conscience (Romans ch. 14; 1 Cor ch. 8 and 10). In all this, Paul never means unbridled willfulness, in which the individual, in simulated freedom, proposes himself as his own god, but true freedom, which is freedom in order (1 Cor 14.33, 40; cf. Rom 8.2). True freedom, coming from love, does not destroy but constructs, in the service of one's neighbor and of the community.

Historical Realization. The freedom of Christians and of the Church in the New Testament cannot simply be copied. Rather, it must be realized anew, historically, in new forms within each historical situation. Over and over again this will assuredly call for a struggle against lovelessness, servility, cowardice, power politics, force, hypocrisy, and, above all, against fear, and a struggle for a loving readiness for self-sacrifice, candor, courage, magnanimity, and tolerance. But this struggle takes different forms in the age of the Roman persecutions and in that of the Christian Byzantine Empire, in the theocratic High Middle Ages and in the time of the absolutist princes of the Enlightenment. In the present age, which is one not only of DEMOCRACY but also of overt or covert totalitarianism in East and West, the manifold realization of freedom, and of intellectual freedom in particular, in the Church (and especially in THEOLOGY) is of special importance. What is involved in intellectual freedom in the Church of today?

(1) Freedom of thought and research: the right to dedicate oneself without hindrance to the discovery of TRUTH and to form a personal opinion or conviction in accordance with the results of research (freedom of opinion, freedom of conscience). (2) FREEDOM OF SPEECH and teaching: the right, without hindrance, to put forward one's own scholarly opinions and convictions, in private and public (and especially in academic form). (3) Freedom to write and to publish: the right, without hindrance, to disseminate one's own scholarly convictions and opinions in written form (freedom of the press).

Practical norms: (1) The only norm in any intellectual activity must be, not an externally imposed law, but solely the truth; fear of the truth is unworthy of a Christian. (2) Every intellectual, in self-critical service of the truth, will be on his guard against premature conclusions and intellectual pride. (3) All fields of learning, and equally the authority of the State and the teaching authority of the Church, have to refrain strictly from overstepping their own frontiers. (4) For the good of one's neighbor and for the sake of the community (whether of State or Church) limitations of freedom are possible, but never according to the principle of totalitarianism: freedom as far as necessary, restraint as far as possible; but always according to the principle of SUBSIDIARITY, which applies in the Catholic Church: freedom as far as possible, restraint as far as necessary.

FREEDOM, SPIRITUAL

The freedom of the children of God under grace. This is infinitely more than the independence and the power of the will to do as it pleases. It includes the real capacity of the will to do good and avoid evil, but in the higher perspective of the freedom wherewith Christ has made us free (Gal 4.31). Sin, on the other hand, by which a human being created to the image and likeness of God refuses to share in God's freedom, must be seen as the loss of that freedom for which God has created man and Christ has redeemed him.

Freedom and Law. The Epistle to the Romans ch. 7 deplores the miserable situation of the man whose concept of freedom is self-centered and who is externally submitted to the written law. Such a man cannot understand that God's law is a law of freedom: "The Law indeed is holy and the commandment holy and just and good" (v. 12). With this unspiritual attitude a man is a slave of sin and as such cannot really be subject to God's law. True subjection to God's law, the gift of God's loving will, can be understood and embraced only when a man opens his heart, humbly and gratefully, to God's love and the needs of his neighbor. Man, who by his selfcenteredness is a prisoner under the law (v. 23), still remains to some extent the image of God and therefore feels that the law is something good. He gives a limited approval to it. But he does not really and sincerely identify himself with God's law, or see that it is written in his inmost being, or find in it a call to his deepest and best possibilities. But he still desires full freedom and cries out: "Unhappy man that I am! Who will deliver me from the body of this death?" (v. 24). The response is St. Paul's hymn on the spiritual freedom conferred by the law of the Spirit: "For the law of the Spirit of the life in Christ Jesus has delivered me from the law of sin and of death'' (Rom 8.2).

The external law alone could not generate true freedom. It found man a slave, selfish and closed in his attitude toward God, toward his neighbor, and therefore also toward the law. This attitude robbed the law of its strength (Rom 8.3). True freedom—a sharing in God's own blessed freedom—for which God had created man, was lost on earth through Adam's sin. It was lost through the attitude that sees freedom not as coming from God and returning to God, but as man's independence of God.

Through Christ and in Christ full freedom, a total sharing in God's love and liberty, returned again to earth. Christ in His human nature was anointed by the fullness of the Holy Spirit, who is the "gift of Himself." Before Christ could baptize the believers in the Holy Spirit, thus giving them a spiritual understanding of His own law that is "spirit and life" (Jn 6.3), the Spirit had to descend visibly upon Him and rest upon Him. In the life-giving power of the Holy Spirit Christ fulfilled the loving will of the Father and made Himself a sacrifice for man's redemption. The power of the same Spirit raised Him again to life. Thus the glorified Lord "is the spirit" (2 Cor 3.17)-He who gave Himself in holocaust and was visibly accepted. It is He who through his Spirit writes the new law in man's heart (Heb 8.10)-He who fulfilled it in the Easter mystery. Through a living faith He gives man a spiritual understanding of the law. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom'' (2 Cor 3.17).

Freedom in Grace. The freedom of the children of God presupposes, therefore, a living faith in the paschal mystery (cf. Jn 7.39). It presupposes Baptism in the fire of the Holy Spirit, trust in Him, the state of grace, and the supernatural virtue of charity. The loss of the life of grace means also the loss of spiritual freedom; and growth in grace, faith, hope, and charity brings growth in spiritual freedom.

Negatively, the liberty of the children of God presupposes a liberating death: death to the deadly "freedom" of selfishness, to the glorification of self and of one's own will. Consequently, there is no possibility of spiritual freedom without a constant struggle against the works of the flesh listed in some detail by St. Paul: "immorality, uncleanliness, licentiousness, idolatry, etc." (Gal 5.19–20).

This must be kept in mind when it is said that spiritual freedom means being "not under the law but under grace" (Rom 6.14). Renewed in mind by the gift of the Holy Spirit, the free Christian not only does not slavishly submit himself to those laws that impose a minimum of external duty; he accepts wholeheartedly and gratefully the law of faith. He tries constantly to live ever more in accordance with the liberating truth of the gospel. He follows the law of grace. He is really free because he allows himself "to be led by the Spirit of God" (Rom 8.14). Positively, spiritual freedom coincides with this total and grateful dependence on the grace of God. "If you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law If we live by the Spirit let us also walk" (Gal 5.18, 25).

Spiritual freedom is a life in accordance with the "talents," the gifts of God. Those who are led by the Spirit follow in all things the supreme rule: "How shall I make a return to the Lord for all the good he has done for me?" [Ps 115 (116B).12(3)]. Through the grace of the Holy Spirit and in perfect obedience to this grace, the Christian accepts everything as a gift of God and glorifies God by making everything a means of unselfish love for God and for neighbor.

Spiritual freedom, then, has as its condition and result the crucifixion of one's lower nature with its passions and desires (Gal 5.24). But in uniting the Christian with the paschal mystery it means essentially joy and peace (Gal 5.22). This joy and the other fruits of the Spirit give one the strength to be victorious in the struggle against the behavior natural to his lower selfishness, in order to fulfill the law of Christ. Spiritual freedom manifests itself in a thinking and a behavior that correspond to the evangelical law expressed in the Sermon on the Mount and the Farewell Discourse. Only those who let themselves be led by the Spirit of Christ can love one another as Christ has loved them. The demands of fraternal love do not diminish one's spiritual freedom; rather, they fulfill it. It is precisely this spiritual freedom that makes the disciple of Christ renounce some actions not forbidden by a general law, when such self-denial strengthens the bonds of unity and contributes to the salvation of one's neighbor. "For none of us lives to himself, and none dies to himself" (Rom 14.7). This constant openness to others and care for them purifies man, making him more spiritual, more like Christ, and hence more free.

Both a useless multiplication of external precepts and a slavish and mechanical obedience are opposed to spiritual freedom, since both suffocate spiritual energy and hinder constant watchfulness for the real needs of one's neighbor and the community. But spiritual freedom by no means involves lawlessness. It unites one with Christ and so causes one to bear the burdens of another in the spirit of Christ. It helps one to submit himself in the right way to the laws of Church and society, integrating everything in the spirit of solidarity.

FREEDOM OF RELIGION

The most authoritative statement of Catholic teaching on religious freedom is the Declaratio de Libertate Religiosa of VATICAN COUNCIL II. It solemnly proclaims that all men, and all religious communities, have a strict right to religious freedom: a right that is based on the dignity of the human person. It praises contemporary legal systems that recognize and uphold this right, and deplores the fact that in many countries it is infringed. The present article is concerned with the main arguments and considerations that have formed Catholic thinking about religious freedom, and the main positions represented at the Council. For the broader historical background of the Council's Declaration, see CHURCH AND STATE.

Religious Freedom at the Time of Vatican Council II. A glance at the state of religious freedom in the world during the 1960s may help to explain why the question received conciliar treatment. No previous ecumenical council had dealt with the topic. Two considerations in particular seem to have urged attention to it.

Violations under Communist Regimes. First, consideration was prompted by the persecution of religion under Communist regimes, which, as Pope Pius XII said, "in the end reject and deny the rights, the dignity, and the freedom of the human person." Forty years after the Russian revolution of 1917, at least 186 bishops of the Roman Catholic Church alone had been executed or imprisoned, and at least 67 million Catholics were undergoing religious persecution to a greater or less degree. In terms of the number of souls affected, this was estimated to be the greatest religious persecution in history. Temporary alleviations of it were dictated by political considerations rather than by recognition of the right to religious freedom, and overtures for the easing of pressures were hindered by the danger that religious leaders would appear to condone antireligious regimes and thus confuse or demoralize the faithful.

A Soviet directive of 1934 made explicit the permanent object of the campaign:

Instruction in any type of religious ceremony as well as the performance of any type of religious ceremony or rite and any other type of religious influencing of the younger generation is forbidden and is punishable by law.

Elementary and secondary schools are to insure the antireligious indoctrination of the pupils. Education and training are to be evaluated as foundations for the active battle against religion and its influence on students and adults. [RSFSR Statute on Secondary Schools (1934) text 263.]

Modern educational techniques enable practical hostility to religion to be exercised most effectively by antireligious education, systematically conducted. The primary criterion for testing the sincerity of alleged concessions to, and in general the real acknowledgment of, the right to religious freedom is not to be sought in the release or nonimprisonment of bishops and priests, or in the diplomatic honors or other privileges accorded to them, but in the freedom of religious education—real, sustained, and peaceful freedom, without penalties of any kind, for parents to provide their children with formation in their own religious traditions.

A general account of Communist policies can be summarized under three headings. (1) In the Soviet Union the main target of attack was the Orthodox Church. At first persecution was direct; then, after a generation of antireligious education, every effort was made to convert the reduced Orthodox Church into an instrument of the state. It was in the Ukraine and in Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia that the Catholic Church suffered direct and violent persecution-in 1946 more than 500 priests of the Diocese of Lvov alone were in prison-and pressure was applied to absorb Eastern Rite Catholics into the Orthodox Church. (2) In China, Christianity was attacked chiefly on the pretext that it was an instrument of European and Catholic imperialism; Taoism was attacked as "counter-revolutionary." Within the first decade after 1949, all but five of 2,500 Chinese Catholic priests had been executed or imprisoned, and systematic antireligious education had attained a perfection and effectiveness not previously known. (3) In Eastern Europe the position remained more complex. Christianity is part of several national traditions; and the forces of antireligion were connected with the Soviet Union. Indirect persecution, e.g., by the imposition of crippling taxes on churches and religious schools, had therefore become more common. In 1965, East German customs officials seized copies of the New Testament as imperialist propaganda. Parish meetings, religious processions, children's recitals at the Christmas crib, the traditional blessings of the fields-these and many other activities often were stopped. Frequently, antireligious measures were even more direct. Catholic bishops such as Cardinals MINDS-ZENTY, STEPINAC, Beran, and SLIPYJ, and Protestant leaders such as Bishops Dibelius, Ordass, and Radvansky underwent "trials" and suffered maltreatment, imprisonment, deportation, or isolation from clergy and people; they must rank with the heroes of any period of Christianity. Many Catholic bishops of Communist-dominated countries were prevented from attending Vatican Council II, and Pope Paul VI, in opening the second session, pointed to their vacant benches as a symbol of "a wound inflicted upon the Council itself." Religious freedom, he said, is a fundamental human right violated in many modern countries by principles and methods of intolerance.

Modern Recognition of the Right. A second consideration that urged the topic upon the Council was the demand for religious freedom that had been mounting in modern times. John MILTON and John LOCKE pleaded for it (except for Catholics and atheists) in the 17th century, VOLTAIRE and Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU in the 18th. The right to religious freedom for all was recognized by the two great 18th-century revolutions, by the French in theory, and by the American in theory and practice. It has been acknowledged by an increasing number of states through the 19th and 20th centuries and is recognized in various forms in the constitutions of many modern states. This recognition expresses one of the deepest convictions of what may loosely be called "the modern mind." Since many Council fathers believed that the Church's most urgent task was to begin "a dialogue with the modern world," it was natural that they should be anxious for a statement of the Catholic attitude toward religious freedom.

Such a statement could not be formulated by simply observing existing situations. No single description could cover the position in traditionally Catholic countries. In Spain a section of the Fueros de los Espagnoles, requiring that the spiritual unity of the nation be maintained, forbade "ceremonies and external manifestations other than those of the Catholic religion." Spain's 30,000 Protestants felt that this rendered ineffective another section of the fueros that recognized the right of non-Catholics to "nonmolestation in their religious beliefs," and in the early 1960s the Spanish foreign minister (Señor F. M. Castiella) was working for the more practical acknowledgment of this right by the recognition of religious minorities in Spain. In Italy the Catholic faith is the official state religion and, although the right to religious freedom is constitutionally recognized, it was sometimes claimed that, in the first decade or so of the Republic, non-Catholics suffered certain disabilities. In Ireland there is no established church; the constitution (art. 44.2) guarantees freedom of conscience and the free profession and practice of religion to every citizen, and state aid is given to schools without discrimination among the churches that manage the schools.

In the newly independent countries of Asia and Africa the situation confronting the Council fathers was more varied, more complex, and more unpredictable. Freedom in these countries was often conceived as simply freedom from the former colonial powers. Frequently there was no long tradition of pluralism, political or religious, and the existence of any organized "opposition" was often seen as inimical to the state. In some countries no clear distinction was made between state and society; in others the basis of social organization is the tribe. For these and other reasons some of the usual preconditions of religious freedom were lacking, and there were in some places suggestions that an unpleasant modern version of the principle cuius regio, eius religio was in the making; e.g., in (Buddhist) Sri Lanka measures were taken against Catholic schools, and in the (Muslim) Sudan Christian missionaries suffered persecution on the score of their being agents of the former colonial powers. But in many countries religion was free, and Christians were prominent in works of primary, secondary, and technological education and in social and political leadership. The Catholic Church worked rapidly to develop local (i.e., native) hierarchies and bodies of clergy and religious, which seem to be a necessary, though obviously not a sufficient, condition of its freedom.

The Doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas. Turning to Catholic theology on religious freedom, perhaps the most influential, as well as the most representative account of one strong element in the theology is in the treatise De fide in the Summa Theologiae of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, specifically in the treatment of unbelief (Summa tehologiae 2a2ae, 10–12). It is important to remember that by infideles (unbelievers) St. Thomas meant non-Catholics of every kind, Christian or otherwise. His views may be summarized in his answers to three questions.

Should Unbelievers Be Forced to Accept the Faith? St. Thomas distinguished between those who had never been Catholics and those who once were Catholics but had lapsed into unbelief. According to his teaching, unbelievers who have never been Catholics must not be forced to embrace the faith. The act of faith is by its nature a free act; without an interior free choice of the will there is no valid act of faith at all. It is therefore wrong in any way to force Jews or pagans to become Christians (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 10.8); it is an offense against natural justice (3a, 68.10).

In the case of Catholics who have lapsed into unbelief by joining another denomination (haeretici vel schismatici) or by abandoning Christianity altogether (apostatae), the teaching of St. Thomas is quite different: they should be compelled, even by physical force, to resume membership in the Church and practice of the faith. The basis for this position is that it is proper that a person be compelled, if necessary by physical force, to honor a promise (here, presumably, the baptismal promises). The Church should seek the return of one who lapses, and always welcome him back to spiritual communion. But if he is obstinate, and there seems to be no hope of his return, she must set the eternal salvation of the many above the mortal life of one man, banish him from the Church by excommunication, and see that the secular power banishes him from the world by death. Only prudential considerations would urge a different policy: if the unbeliever had support of such strength as to threaten schism, he might be left alone; but otherwise there must be no leniency in his punishment (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 10.8, 11.3–4).

Should the Children of Jews and Other Unbelievers Be Baptized against Their Parents' Wishes? St. Thomas held without qualification that it is never permissible to baptize a child against the wishes of the parents. For the natural order of things demands that, before a child comes to the age of discretion, he should be cared for by his parents, in matters both of body and soul. It would therefore be a violation of natural justice if he were taken away from his parents or baptized against their wishes (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 10.12; 3a, 68.10).

Should the Religious Rites of Unbelievers Be Tolerated? Given that unbelievers must not be forced to accept the Catholic religion, may they be permitted to practice their own? St. Thomas answered that tolerance is permissible if it leads to some great good or prevents some great evil. Jews may therefore be permitted to practice their rites, since these prefigured the Christian faith and in a way bear witness to it. The rites of other unbelievers, however, having neither truth nor utility to commend them, should not be tolerated except to prevent some greater evil, e.g., civil unrest, scandal, or the placing of obstacles to the salvation of those who, if left in peace, might gradually be converted to the faith. For these reasons, St. Thomas concluded, the Church has sometimes extended toleration to pagan and heretical worship when unbelievers were in large numbers (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 10.11).

Modern Developments in Thomism. St. Thomas clearly did not credit the unbeliever with a right to practice and profess his religion. In this and several other points many modern Catholics have followed St. Thomas, though with important modifications and developments. Their main positions may be summarized under two headings.

Opposition to the Use of Force. It has been held consistently, and without St. Thomas' restriction to those who were never Catholics, that no one must ever be forced to accept the Catholic faith. Modern writers have never condoned the use of secular power to enforce an initial acceptance of, or a return to, the Church. Pius XII's statement in MYSTICI CORPORIS is unconditional: "If it were ever to happen that, contrary to the unvarying doctrine of this Apostolic See, a person was compelled against his will to embrace the Catholic Faith, we could not, for the sake of our office and our conscience, withhold our censure" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 35 (1943) 243]. This has been accepted unreservedly by Catholic writers.

The "Thesis-Hypothesis" Theory. The question remained, should (or may) an unbeliever be permitted to adhere to his own religion, or even to none? The answer was most often given in terms of the curiously titled "thesis-hypothesis" theory. The thesis asserted that the state has the obligation to acknowledge the Catholic Church as the only religious society with a God-given right to public existence and action, and to recognize this by law. In principle, other religions should have no legal right to public existence and action, and ought to be repressed by the state, for error and evil run counter to the rational and moral nature of man, to the common good of society, and to the right of people to be protected from occasions of defecting from the truth. On the hypothesis, however, that such a constitutional arrangement is unfeasible, the Church may forego her right to establishment as the one true religion of the state, and not oppose the legal tolerance of other religions.

When is the thesis applicable, and when the hypothesis? A common interpretation was that in nations where the majority of the citizens were Catholic, the thesis applied; in others, it was permissible to accept the hypothesis. This naturally led to the charge that the attitude of Catholics in regard to religious freedom was highly ambiguous—where they were in a minority, they demanded it; where in a majority, they refused it. The charge was echoed by some Catholic writers. But many others had the courage of their logic and avowed it quite frankly, as did the authors of a widely used American Catholic textbook who wrote: "The fact that the individual may in good faith think that his false religion is true gives no more right to propagate it than the sincerity of the alien anarchist entitles him to advocate his abominable theories in the United States, or than the perverted ethical notions of the dealer in obscene literature confer upon him a right to corrupt the morals of the community" [J. A. Ryan and F. J. Boland Catholic Principles of Politics]. Nor did these writers fear that such an attitude could be turned against Catholics in countries in which they were in a minority. First, they insisted, Catholic worship and preaching, being true, do not harm the community; second, no non-Catholic state can logically take this attitude, since no non-Catholic sect claims to be infallible. Hence the famous remark of Louis VEUILLOT to non-Catholic liberals, "I demand from you, in the name of your principles, that freedom which I refuse you in the name of my own." Such remarks were widely quoted as a warning to enlightened people against Catholic obscurantism. Ryan and Boland sought to reassure their non-Catholic fellow Americans on the score that a Catholic state in America was too remote in time and probability to disturb a practical man. But clearly the fact remained that such considerations did not demand, or even allow for, universal religious freedom as a matter of principle.

Another group of writers sought to show that interpretations of the thesis-hypothesis theory that failed to demand religious freedom for all were self-defeating. Four levels in the argument can be distinguished. First, at the merely prudential level, there is the danger that if Protestants or Muslims are denied religious freedom in Catholic states, Catholic minorities may (in retaliation) be denied it in Protestant or Muslim states. Second, at a higher level, the Church as a whole forfeits respect, for if she claims for herself a freedom that she denies others, she will be thought insincere and unjust; indeed, some Catholic theologians believed that she would be opportunist and Machiavellian. Third, at a quite different level, a social order that discriminates against groups within it on account of the beliefs that they hold, or which stifles open and rational discussion of important questions, is inimical to the growth of truth in men's hearts. Fourth, at perhaps the highest level, since the act of faith is by its nature a free act, the Church should favor the policy of religious freedom for all as most conducive to a climate in which men can make the act of faith in the most salutary manner that is possible.

The Demand for Religious Freedom in Principle. Policy is not principle. Even the foregoing arguments in favor of freedom would not establish universal religious freedom as required in principle. The positive arguments in favor of religious freedom as a matter of principle have been developed along other lines.

First, it is necessary to recall Catholic principles about the duty to follow conscience. The history of the medieval debates on the issue has been traced by Dom Odon Lottin. Most writers before St. Thomas held that conscience could be binding only insofar as it was in conformity with the law of God. But St. Thomas, from his earliest treatment of the subject, insisted that conscience, whether correct or mistaken, is always binding, in the sense that to act against conscience is always wrong. To evaluate a person's moral performance is to evaluate the performance of his will; the "proper object" of the will is the good, not as it is in itself, but as it is presented by the reason, which is just what is meant by the judgment of conscience. The conclusion is clear: it is always wrong to act against conscience, provided that it has been formed in good faith. So confident was St. Thomas of his conclusion that he applied it absolutely: if a man's conscience judges faith in Christ or abstinence from fornication to be sinful, then such faith or such abstinence would be sinful (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 19.5, cf. In 2 sent. 39.3.3; De ver. 17.3-4; De malo 2.2).

St. Thomas did not draw the further conclusion that the act that follows conscience is good. But in the 18th century St. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI (Theologia Moralis 1.6) saw that this was entailed by St. Thomas's principles, and practically every Catholic moralist has followed him since then. Three quotations show the position of Catholic thought on the question:

> Whether in theory conscience be correct or mistaken, an action will have in fact whatever evil or goodness conscience attributes to it. [A. Vermeersch, Theologiae Moralis Principia (Rome 1923) 1:293.]

> Provided it be certain, an erroneous conscience shows a man what is God's will for him, in exactly the same way as does a correct one. [E. Genicot, Institutiones Theologiae Moralis, ed. A. Gortebecke (Brussels 1951) 1:42.]

> If our conscience tells us that we ought to perform a particular act, it is our moral duty to perform it. [F. C. Copleston, Aquinas (London 1955) 220.]

These conclusions are in the minds of the writers who argue for religious freedom as a matter of principle. Their main lines of argument can be sketched under three headings.

The Individual's Right to Follow Conscience. The first argument claims to establish the individual's strict right to follow his conscience in matters of religious choice, profession, and worship. Versions have been proposed by Bernard Olivier, OP, and E. D'Arcy. The form of the argument is: "X has a strict duty to follow his conscience" entails "X has a strict right to follow his conscience." For the more intimately a given "object" is connected with the integrity of the human person, the more stringently is it protected for him by natural justice. When the "object" is life itself, St. Thomas argued-and all Catholics agree-not even the jeopardy of many innocent people can so abrogate the right to life of an innocent man as to sanction the directly intentional killing of him as a means to their safety. The conclusion holds a fortiori if the "object" is a person's moral integrity, for human rights are derived from human ends. The more closely an "object" is tied to the sovereign end of the sovereign person's existence, the more sacrosanct is his right to it; and substantial fidelity to moral duty is a necessary (this is not to say a sufficient) condition of attaining that end. Therefore, given the premise that it is always one's duty to follow conscience once it is formed in good faith, one has the right to freedom to follow it; and this must hold most especially in the area in which moral duty bears most intimately upon the attainment of one's end, namely with regard to one's relationship with God-religious choice, profession, and worship.

Who is the other party affected by this right? Every ascription of a right to a given person contains an implicit reference to some other identifiable person or persons against whom he can validly claim the right. In the debate concerning religious freedom the other party is the state. The argument concludes that the state, whether on its own behalf or at the behest of the Church, may not use its powers to force or induce a person to adopt a particular religion or to prevent or dissuade him from following that religious belief which his conscience requires him to follow. Two lines of argument lead to this conclusion. The first reasons that to answer otherwise is to imply that the state is empowered to prevent or hinder a person from achieving his sovereign end and require him to breach his personal moral obligations, and to credit it with the right to violate natural justice. The second leads to the next argument advanced by modern writers who hold that religious freedom is required in principle.

Limits of the Competence of the State. The previous argument began with the individual person and ended with the state; the second begins with the state and ends with the person. Two points are basic to it.

The first is a principle that was given its most authoritative statement by Pius XII: "In the pre-Christian era the public authority, the state, was as competent in the religious domain as in profane matters. The Catholic Church was aware that her divine Founder had transmitted to her the sphere of religion, the religious and moral direction of men, to the fullest extent, and independent of the power of the state" [Vous avez voulu, ActApS 47 (1955) 677]. This suggests that the state is not empowered to enjoin or forbid attitudes and conduct in religious matters as it is competent to do in other fields; and this immediately prepares one for the conclusion that the state has no warrant for applying pressure for or against a given religious faith.

The other basic point is made by drawing a clear distinction between SOCIETY and the STATE, a distinction implicit, it is claimed, in many earlier Catholic documents. In terms of this distinction it is argued that the state is simply one of the means—admittedly a very important means—used by society to attain its purposes. Since substantial fidelity to conscience in religious matters is a necessary condition for attaining the supreme purpose of the human person, it cannot be within the state's power to interfere with the citizen's freedom to be faithful to his conscience in religious matters.

It would be simplistic to conclude baldly that "the state therefore has no competence in the field of religion." A satisfactory theory of the human person, the state, the Church, and their mutual relationships cannot be fashioned by seeing the strict implications of these two principles alone. Many other factors are relevant—a people's history and experience; its stage of cultural, economic, technical, and political development; its shared moral code; its tribal or national temperament; its characteristic Weltanschauung; and its religious beliefs. All these and many other factors determine the kind of state it fashions. The state is not a sort of Platonic form that all actual states must identically instantiate; different societies may demand different functions of the states they create to serve their purposes. The Swedish and American peoples, for example, expect very different social services from their respective states, and neither can claim to have the correct program. In this and other fields there is a whole range of possibilities that, provided the demands of justice owed to individuals and groups are respected, may all satisfy the strict requirements of Christian social and political principles. With regard to religion, at least one thing is necessary: that the state recognize and protect religious freedom. It is perfectly proper for a people, if it chooses, to have the state do more, as in the Federal Republic of Germany, where the state contributes a proportion of public revenue to the various churches. But it may not do less.

The most complete statement in English of this second line of argument is that of John Courtney Murray, SJ. He has proposed reasons for preferring this approach to the first sketched above, suggesting that it does greater justice to the multiplicity of elements in the problem, beginning as it does, not with a "single insight—the exigence of the free human person for religious freedom," but with "a complex insight—the free human person under a government of limited powers" [Theological Studies].

Faith a Free Act. French writers were prominent in the development of a third line of argument. The argument is based on the nature of the act of faith, two aspects of which lead toward the same conclusion.

First, faith is the gift of God alone. There are, in turn, two aspects to this. (1) Although natural truths about God are, at least in principle, discoverable by natural reason, supernatural truths, the proper object of faith, can be known only because God chose to reveal them—through revelation in the strict sense. (2) Nor is this enough. Faith requires the work of God within a person; God's immediate action upon the soul is absolutely necessary if one is to be able to embrace divine revelation sicut oportet. This was true even of those who saw Jesus and his works with eyes of the flesh: "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draw him" (Jn 6.44). Hence faith is the gift of God alone; the conclusion is that religious faith not only may not, but quite literally cannot, be given or imposed or required by the state.

Second, faith involves, of its very nature, the completely free assent of the soul to the divine revelation and action. In Mystici Corporis Pius XII, citing a constitution of Vatican Council I, declared, "That faith without which it is 'impossible to please God' must be the completely free 'homage of intellect and will'" (loc. cit. 243). Freedom is absolutely necessary for a valid act of faith; the state therefore acts unjustly if it requires such faith of any person, or even if it destroys or lessens that condition of freedom in which such an act can validly be made.

Answers to Objections. An important part of the case of those who argued for religious freedom as a demand of principle was their handling of objections. They were often accused of being at odds with "traditional Catholic doctrine," and in large measure they met this general charge by answering specific objections. It is sufficient to cite the four most important objections with an indication of the typical lines of reply.

First, it was objected that the claim of a universal right to religious freedom involves assumptions of religious indifferentism or doctrinal relativism. A statement of Ryan and Boland is typical of many: "The men who defend the principle of toleration for all varieties of religious opinion assume either that all religions are equally true or that the true cannot be distinguished from the false" (op. cit.). The Catholic writers whose arguments have just been sketched draw on no such assumptions; indeed, they completely reject them. They all believe in the Catholic Church as the one true Church founded by Christ. They draw, as has been seen, on three groups of data that have nothing to do with the indifferentist or relativist premises imputed in the objection. It is true that the premises lead to the claim for universal religious freedom; but the converse is not true (p implies q does not entail q implies p).

Second, it was objected that "error has no rights." This maxim was taken to be axiomatic, and the full consequences were put forward, not simply as the theory of one school, but as Catholic teaching. For instance, Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange, OP, wrote, "The Church claims that the truth alone has the right to be protected. Since therefore it is certain that she alone possesses the whole truth, she alone has the right to protection. . . . In a Catholic state, she will often tolerate non-Catholics in order to avoid greater evils" [De Revelatione (Rome 1929-31) 2:453]. The maxim embodies a confusion of categories, viz, the logical fallacy committed by allocating concepts to logical types to which they do not belong, in this case, by assigning a predicate that falls under one category to a subject that falls under another. For a given predicate, there is a finite range of subjects of which it may be meaningfully affirmed or denied; if it is ascribed to a subject lying outside that range, the result is not false, but meaningless. For instance, the predicate "having wheels" may be affirmed or denied of motor-cars, armchairs, or clocks, but not —that is, not meaningfully—of jokes, sonnets, or sonatas. So with the predicate "having rights"; it can be meaningfully ascribed only to persons, either individual persons, or groups of them. Rights can be meaningfully claimed or disclaimed for a person, a family, a voluntary association, a state; but not for a proposition, a theory, an argument, or a doctrine. In its literal acceptance then, the maxim "Error has no rights" is meaningless; it is in the same logical case as the sentence "Error has no wheels."

Third, another objection began with the principle that one is obliged to prevent evil when it lies in one's power to do so. If another person is bent on doing wrong, but cannot do so without one's assistance or acquiescence or at least noninterference, then one is bound to prevent him; to allow him to act is to share his guilt. But-the objection proceeds-pagan and heretical religions are wrong. If, therefore, a person or group is bent on practicing or preaching them, a Catholic government that could prevent it is obliged to do so. But, in the first place, it is never permissible to use unjust means, even in order to secure a good end or to prevent a great evil. Since the right to religious freedom is a right in strict justice, no purpose, however exalted, can justify its violation. Second, Pius XII, dealing with the objection without reference to the question of the strict right to religious freedom, rejected in very explicit terms the major premise of the objection, viz, the claim that one is always obliged to prevent evil when it lies in one's power to do so. In an address to Italian Catholic jurists, he observed, "God has not given to human authority any such absolute and universal mandate in the field of either faith or morals. Such a mandate is unknown to the common convictions of mankind, to the Christian conscience, to the sources of revelation, and to the practice of the Church" ["Ci riesce," Acta Apostolicae Sedis].

Fourth, it was charged that the claim that religious freedom is a universal human right runs counter to traditional Catholic doctrine, in particular, that it was condemned by 19th-century popes. For example, GREGORY XVI wrote in Mirari vos, Aug. 15, 1832: "Indifferentism is the fetid source that gives rise to the mistaken view, or rather madness, that everyone is entitled to freedom of conscience" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2730). PIUS IX explicitly repeated the condemnation, and in his SYLLABUS OF ERRORS condemned the proposition "Every man is free to embrace and to profess the religion which, by the light of reason, he believes to be true" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2915). It must be noted, however, that the Church's teaching authority is not exercised in vacuo, but according to the demands created by the needs of man and society, and by the spread of false teachings. Furthermore, it is necessary to distinguish between an ideology and the institutions to which it gives rise; the latter may be sound, although the former is false.(see JOHN XXIII) ["Pacem in terris," Acta Apostolicae Sedis]. The popes condemned the ideology that based freedom of conscience on three false doctrines, viz, that the human conscience is exlex, subject to no law, not even God's; that all religions are equally true or valuable, or that religious truth cannot be known with certainty; and that the state is omnicompetent, so that the Church herself is to be incorporated in and subordinate to the state. These are false doctrines, and were condemned as such by the popes, but the condemnation does not extend to the institution of religious freedom that did in fact, in some places, come from them, but can be based on other, true, doctrinal and rational foundations. This statement may be compared with one from an Anglican source noting that toleration "is generally held to merit commendation when it issues from respect for the natural rights of the human person to freedom of belief, but condemnation when it is due to mere indifference'' [Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church].

Vatican Council II. Between the end of the first session of Vatican Council II and the opening of the debate on religious freedom in the second session, two important papal statements on the question were made. One occurred in the encyclical letter PACEM IN TERRIS. In setting out the rights that arise from the dignity of the human person, John XXIII wrote: "Every human being has the right to honor God according to the dictates of an upright conscience, and therefore the right to profess his religion in private and in public'' (loc. cit. 260). The other statement was made by Paul VI in his address at the opening of the second session, in the course of which he protested against the persecution that kept some bishops from attending the Council, and said: "It grieves and distresses us to see that in many countries religious freedom, together with the other principal human rights, are violated by the doctrines and practices of men who will not tolerate opinions different from their own: opinions about politics, about racial questions, about religion of every kind. We deplore the fact that such injustice is done anywhere to people who sincerely and openly profess their religion" (loc. cit.). Three points in these statements need to be emphasized. First, religious freedom is not presented simply as the lesser of two evils, to be tolerated for the sake of avoiding a greater evil. The popes speak of it as a strict right, whose violation is an injustice. Second, the right is not claimed simply for Catholics, nor based upon the objective truth of a person's belief; it is seen as a human right, tied to conscience and the (subjective) sincerity of faith. Third, the individual's religious freedom is not restricted to interior belief; it extends to public profession.

Drafts of the Declaration on Religious Freedom. These two papal statements were greatly encouraging to those fathers of the Council who hoped for a declaration of the right to religious freedom. A draft for such a declaration was prepared by the Secretariate for Promoting Christian Unity. It was introduced in a relatio presented by Bp. Emile De Smedt of Bruges, Belgium. The claim for the right was based on the principle that a man can attain his ultimate end only by faithfully following the dictates of conscience: "The man who obeys his conscience obeys God himself." The draft was debated in the second session of the Council, but no vote was taken; in the months that followed a great number of animadversiones were received from the fathers and incorporated into a second draft. It was found that the majority of the fathers agreed with the substance of its principal thesis; but there were many amendments sought in expression, argument, and structure.

The minority opposed to the central thesis, which in the event turned out to be small numerically, argued along four main lines: (1) The draft seemed to favor religious and doctrinal indifferentism. (2) It ran counter to traditional Catholic doctrine, especially as taught by the 19th-century popes. (3) It ignored the axiom that error has no rights; only cynicism could extend the same rights indifferently to truth and error. (4) The proposed argument made a logically illegitimate move from the subjective order of conscience to the objective order of right. The Secretariate proposed answers to the first three questions along the lines already indicated. The fourth objection it answered by showing that, in the draft, the starting point was the human person in the objective factual state of contemporary society.

The amended draft was debated at the third session, rewritten once more, and finally adopted by the fourth. It was solemnly proclaimed at the close of the Council under the title Declaratio de Libertate Religiosa. The subtitle is noteworthy: On the right of the person and of communities to social and civil freedom in religious matters. The central thesis is stated as follows: "It is an injustice done to the human person, and to the order laid down for men by God, if a man is denied the free exercise of religion in society: saving a just public order."

After an introduction, which summarizes the reasons for interest in the problem and its principal elements, the Declaration falls into two parts.

A General Account of Religious Freedom. Three levels are distinguished: the human person, religious communities, and the family.

The human person, in matters concerning religion, has a strict right to freedom, i.e., to immunity from force, be it from individuals, from social groups, or from any human power. The right should be recognized in the legal structure of society, and established as a strict right at law.

Two sorts of reason are given. First, every man, being endowed with reason, free-will, and social responsibility, has an obligation to seek the truth, and embrace it when found: especially in religious matters. But he must do this in ways that fit his rational and social nature: by free inquiry, by learning from and engaging in discussions in which one man helps another find the truth that he believes himself to have found. God's commands are mediated to man by conscience; if he is to make his way to God, he must faithfully follow conscience in all his activity. The right to religious freedom is therefore based, not in a person's subjective attitudes, but in human nature itself.

This right demands that a person be not forced to act against his conscience, nor prevented from following it. For the exercise of religion consists above all in free interior acts, which no human power can command or prevent. But further, the social nature of man requires that these interior acts be given external and corporate expression. To deny a person the freedom of such expression would therefore be an injustice.

Second, religious acts transcend the earthly and temporal order. Since, therefore, the civil authority is charged with serving the common temporal good, it would be exceeding its competence if it presumed to direct or restrain such acts.

Religious communities, the Declaration continues, must be credited with the same right to immunity from force as is the person, for such communities are required both by the social nature of man and the nature of religion itself.

The freedom to which they are entitled, given that they respect the just demands of public order, involves a number of constitutive rights: the right to perform public worship, and to prepare their members for religious life and belief by suitable instruction and encouragement; the right to freedom from interference by the civil body in choosing, educating, appointing, and transferring their ministers, in communicating with their authorities and other religious communities in other parts of the world, and in erecting buildings and administering their affairs; the right to bear public witness to their beliefs by the spoken and written word, given respect for the rights of others; the right to show the special contribution their doctrines can make to social order and the enrichment of human life; and the right to hold assemblies and form associations of an educational, cultural, and charitable nature.

The family has the right to order its own religious life, under the direction of the parents; and parents have the right to decide the way that their children are to be educated in their own religious tradition. The civil authorities must therefore recognize the right of parents to decide what sort of schools their children shall attend, without any penalties being imposed, whether directly or indirectly. The rights of parents are violated if their children are forced to attend schools that are not in harmony with their own beliefs, or where the only education given excludes any religious formation.

The Declaration then specifically considers the implications of these rights for civil law. Since it is the special business of the law to preserve and foster human rights and duties, it must ensure the religious freedom of all citizens, and thus the conditions that foster religious life. In some circumstances, the state may give special recognition to a particular religious community; but in such cases, it must recognize and protect the religious freedom of all other citizens and communities. In all circumstances, the civil authorities must make sure that the equality of all citizens before the laws is never, whether overtly or covertly, violated for religious reasons. It is very wrong, then, if the civil authorities, through force or fear, ever impose or prevent the free profession or change of religion; and this is worst of all when force is used to eradicate or stifle religion altogether.

Finally, the Declaration insists on one's duty to exercise religious freedom with personal and social moral responsibility. One must consider the rights of other people, and treat them with justice and humanity. It is for the civil authorities to protect its citizens from abuses of religious freedom, though invoking restrictions, of course, only when necessary.

Religious Freedom in the Light of Revelation. It is possible only to summarize the heads of doctrine in this very rich statement.

Since the act of faith is by its nature a free act, it is only voluntarily that a man can accept God's revelation. A condition of religious freedom, therefore, conduces to a situation in which one can best accept God's invitation to the Christian faith.

Although possessed of all the power of the Godhead, Our Lord forced no one to believe; gentle and humble of heart, He worked miracles to win men to belief, but rebuked the Apostles for suggesting prodigies that smacked of violence, and said that punishment for unbelief should be left to the Day of Judgment; it was not by force but by being lifted up on the cross that He drew men most powerfully to Himself. After Pentecost, the Apostles followed Our Lord's example. In proclaiming the right of the human person to religious freedom, the Church has therefore followed the spirit and mind of the gospel; and though there have been actions in the history of the people of God that lapsed from the spirit, the Church has always taught that no man may be forced to embrace the faith.

The Catholic Church claims freedom for herself under two descriptions: as a spiritual authority founded by Christ and charged to preach the gospel to every creature; and as a society of human beings entitled to live in civil society according to the commandments of the Christian faith.

The faithful are reminded that an element in the formation of their consciences must always be the teaching of the Church. They are urged to pray constantly for all men and to do everything they can to bring them to the truth of Christ by word, witness, and example, but always in the spirit of Christ's gentleness and love, full of respect for the dignity of the free human person.

Finally, the Council welcomes the religious freedom upheld in many contemporary legal systems, but deplores its infringement in many other countries. It is God's will that the human family should respect the right to religious freedom in human society and so, through the grace of Christ and the power of His Spirit, enter into the far more exalted freedom "wherewith Christ has made us free."

FREEDOM OF RELIGION (IN U.S. CONSTITUTION)

The meaning of the religious clauses of the First Amendment to the Federal Constitution has been one of the most challenging aspects of constitutional law, and has significant social implications. These clauses read, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

1. GENESIS OF THE RELIGION CLAUSES

The principles contained in this declaration of religious liberty had a long and tortuous path to follow before they finally became a part of the U.S. Constitution. At the time of the Revolutionary War the majority of the colonies had established churches, but when the framers of the Constitution convened in Philadelphia, the religious status of the several states varied from full and perfect freedom to absolute establishment of Protestantism [See CHURCH AND STATE IN THE U.S. (LEGAL HISTORY)]

The diversity of religious systems was matched by the diversity of religious backgrounds of the delegates to the Constitutional Convention. Almost all religious denominations were represented, including several Baptists and Catholics. The Catholic representatives were Daniel Carroll and Thomas Fitzsimmons.

Agitation for Religious Guarantees. When the delegates to the Constitutional Convention met in 1787 to draft a federal constitution there was already a strong sentiment in favor of religious liberty. No attempt was made in the convention fully to codify this attitude. The principal preoccupation with religious liberty in the convention dealt with test oaths. Charles Pinckney of South Carolina submitted the following provision, "But no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." After brief opposition the proposal was adopted. With slight modifications it was finally approved in the form as it now appears in Article 6 of the Constitution.

In the state conventions called to ratify the proposed Constitution of the United States, opposition to this limited guarantee of religious liberty was expressed. The majority of the delegates approved of the action but expressed the opinion that further guarantees were necessary. Several states recommended specific amendments. New Hampshire proposed the following amendment:

Congress shall make no laws touching religion, or to infringe the rights of conscience.

Virginia requested an amendment providing:

That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence, and therefore all men have an equal natural and unalienable right to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of their conscience, and that no particular sect or society ought to be favored or established, by law, in preference to others.

The states of North Carolina, New York, and Rhode Island, while not proposing a specific amendment, issued declarations of principles in conjunction with ratification. The principles of religious liberty, expressed in these declarations, followed the language of the Virginia proposal. Strong statements of the need for an amendment prohibiting religious liberty were expressed in other states, notably Pennsylvania and Maryland, but they were not adopted as formal recommendations.

In some of the states it was not deemed necessary to request an amendment, for it was asserted that the federal government was not given any power over religion. Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut, writing under the name of "Landholder," expressed this idea in the Dec. 10, 1787 issue of the Connecticut Courant in answer to a charge that the Constitution did not contain a bill of rights. He said, "Nor is liberty of conscience, or of matrimony or burial of the dead [referred to]; it is enough that Congress have no power to prohibit either, and can have no temptation."

Others felt that a bill of rights was absolutely necessary; the leading exponent of this position was Thomas Jefferson. In a letter to James Madison on Dec. 20, 1787, he indicated that he was quite concerned because the Constitution did not carry a bill of rights.

> I will now tell you what I do not like. First, the omission of a bill of rights, providing clearly, and without the aid of sophism, for freedom of religion, freedom of the press, protection against standing armies, restriction of monopolies, the eternal and unremitting force of the habeas corpus laws, and trials by jury in all matters of fact triable by the laws of the land, and not by the laws of nations.

But Madison did not feel quite as strongly as Jefferson. He was well aware of a rising demand for another convention to revise the Constitution, but preferred to have amendments adopted by the Congress.

The debate in the state conventions called to ratify the Constitution clearly indicated that the primary concern was to eliminate legal preference for one or more religions. Many letters, written frequently by men who were outstanding in their communities, demonstrated a fear that possibly the federal government might establish a national religion. They evidenced no attitude of hostility toward religion but rather the desire to prevent by law the extension of legal preference for one sect over another.

Joseph Story, one of the leading contemporary authorities on the Constitution and later associate justice of the Supreme Court, made the following observation:

> Probably at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and of the amendment to it now under consideration, the general, if not the universal sentiment in America was, that Christianity ought to receive encouragement from the State so far as it was not incompatible with the private rights of conscience and the freedom of religious worship. An attempt to level all religions, and to make it a matter of State policy to hold all in utter indifference, would have created universal disapprobation if not universal indignation The real object of the amendment was . . . to exclude all rivalry among Christian sects, and to prevent any national ecclesiastical establishment which should give to a hierarchy the exclusive patronage of the national government.

The following article appeared in the Federal Gazette, titled, "Remarks on the First Part of Amendments to the Federal Constitution Moved on the Eighth Instant in the House of Representatives"

The next article [First Amendment] established religious liberty, and all of those political rights, which by various tricks of state have been wounded through its means, on the firmest ground. The tender, the almost sacred rights of conscience, says this inestimable article, shall by no means, on no account be abridged or interfered with. No self righteous or powerful church shall set up its impious domination over all of the rest. Every pious man may pay the Divine Author of his existence the tribute of thanksgiving and, adoration in the manner of his forefathers.

This article was extraordinarily significant. It was reprinted in the Massachusetts Centinal on July 4, 1789, and appeared in many other leading newspapers throughout the states. It is frequently credited with being instrumental in helping to create a public understanding of the issues involved in the move for an amendment on religious liberty.

Debate on the Proposed Amendment. While these official and unofficial utterances are significant, the important statements were those made at the time that the amendment was under active consideration. This phase of the legislative process commenced on June 8, 1789, when James Madison rose in the House and said:

The amendments which have occurred to me, proper to be recommended by Congress to the State Legislatures, are these: . . . Fourthly, That in Article 1st, Section 9, between clauses 3 and 4 to be inserted these clauses, "The civil rights of none shall be abridged on account of religious belief or worship, nor shall any national religion be established, nor shall the full equal right of conscience in any manner or on any pretext be infringed."

This was an amendment to a section of the original Constitution that was a limitation upon Congress alone. It set forth that portion of the Bill of Rights which Madison deemed to be proper to restrict the power of the Federal government in matters of religion. On June 8, 1789, this draft was referred to the committee of the whole.

On July 21 the committee of the whole was discharged and a select committee was appointed to receive and consider Madison's propositions. This committee was composed of the following state representatives: John Vining, of Delaware; James Madison, of Virginia; Abraham Baldwin, of Georgia; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut; Aedamus Burke, of South Carolina; Nicholas Gilman, of New Hampshire; George Clymer, of Pennsylvania; Egbert Benson, of New York; Benjamin Goodhue, of Massachusetts; Elias Boudinot, of New Jersey; and George Gale, of Maryland. Vining was named chairman of the Committee.

In the House. On July 28 the select committee reported out the fourth proposal of Madison in the following manner:

Article I, Section 9 between paragraphs 2 and 3 insert: "no religion shall be established by law, nor shall the equal rights of conscience be infringed."

It is to be observed that the term "national" was dropped after having been incorporated specifically in Madison's initial recommendation. The report of the committee was tabled.

On August 7 the Congress reenacted the Northwest Ordinance, which in part provided, "Religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged."

On August 13 the House of Representatives resolved itself into a committee of the whole to consider the report of the select committee. Again, on August 15, the House resolved itself into a committee of the whole with Representative Boudinot of New Jersey in the chair. Fortunately, the Annals of Congress are unusually complete in the significant debate that ensued. The Annals preserve the comments of the more influential members of the House. So important is the legislative history of the amendment that it is necessary to set forth in detail the entire debate:

Mr. Sylvester (New York) had some doubts of the propriety of the mode of expression used in this paragraph. He apprehended that it was liable to a construction different from what had been made by the committee. He feared it might be thought to have a tendency to abolish religion altogether.

Mr. Vining (Delaware) suggested the propriety of transposing the two members of the sentence.

Mr. Gerry (Massachusetts) said it would read better if it was, that no religious doctrine shall be established by law.

Mr. Sherman (Connecticut) thought the amendment altogether unnecessary, inasmuch as Congress had no authority whatever delegated to them by the Constitution to make religious establishments; he would, therefore, move to have it struck out.

Mr. Carroll (Maryland)—As the rights of conscience are, in their nature, of peculiar delicacy, and will little bear the gentlest touch of governmental hand; and as many sects have concurred in opinion that they are not well secured under the present Constitution, he said he was much in favor of adopting the words. He thought it would tend more towards conciliating the minds of the people to the Government than almost any other amendment he had heard proposed. He would not contend with gentlemen about the phraseology, his object was to secure the substance in such a manner as to satisfy the wishes of the honest part of the community.

Mr. Madison (Virginia) said, he apprehended the meaning of the words to be, that Congress should not establish a religion, and enforce the legal observation of it by law, nor compel men to worship God in any manner contrary to their conscience. Whether the words are necessary or not, he did not mean to say, but they had been required by some of the State Conventions, who seemed to entertain an opinion that under the clause of the Constitution, which gave power to Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the Constitution and the laws made under it, enabled them to make laws of such a nature as might infringe the rights of conscience, and establish a national religion; to prevent these effects he presumed the amendment was intended, and he thought it as well expressed as the nature of the language would admit.

Mr. Huntington (Connecticut) said that he feared, with the gentleman first up on this subject; that the words might be taken in such latitude as to be extremely hurtful to the cause of religion. He understood the amendment to mean what had been expressed by the gentleman from Virginia; but others might find it convenient to put another construction upon it. The ministers of their congregations to the Eastward were maintained by the contributions of those who belonged to their society; the expense of building meeting-houses was contributed in the same manner. These things were regulated by by-laws. If an action was brought before a Federal Court on any of these cases, the person who had neglected to perform his engagements could not be compelled to do it; for a support of ministers of building of places of worship might be construed into a religious establishment.

By charter of Rhode Island, no religion could be established by law; he could give a history of the effects of such a regulation; indeed the people were now enjoying the blessed fruits of it. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would be made in such a way to secure the rights of conscience, and a free exercise of the rights of religion, but not to patronize those who professed no religion at all.

Mr. Madison thought, if the word, "National," was inserted before religion, it would satisfy the minds of honorable gentlemen. He believed that the people feared one sect might obtain a preeminence, or two combine together, and establish a religion to which they would compel others to conform. He thought if the word "national" was introduced, it would point the amendment directly to the object it was intended to prevent.

Mr. Livermore (New Hampshire) was not satisfied with that amendment; but he did not wish them to dwell long on the subject. He thought it would be better if it were altered, and made to read in this manner, that "Congress shall make no laws touching religion, or infringing the rights of conscience."

Mr. Gerry did not like the term "national," proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, and he hoped it would not be adopted by the House. It brought to his mind some observations that had taken place in the conventions at the time they were considering the present Constitution. It had been insisted upon by those who were called antifederalists, that this form of Government consolidated the Union; the honorable gentleman's motion shows that he considers it in the same light. Those who were called anti-federalists at that time, complained that they had injustice done them by the title, because they were in favor of a Federal Government, and the others were in favor of a national one; the federalists were for ratifying the Constitution as it stood, and the others not until amendments were made. Their names then ought not to have been distinguished by federalists and anti-federalists, but rats and anti-rats.

Mr. Madison withdrew his motion, but observed that the words "no national religion shall be established by law," did not imply that the Government was a national one; the question was then taken on Mr. Livermore's motion, and passed in the affirmative, thirty-one for, and twenty against it.

The House began consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on Aug. 19, 1789. The next day, Fisher Ames moved that the proposed religious amendment be altered so as to read: "Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or to prevent the free exercise thereof, or to infringe the rights of conscience." This motion was accepted by the House.

It is reported in the Journal of the House for Friday, August 21 that the third article was again debated and finally agreed to in this slightly different form: "Third. Congress shall make no law establishing religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed." This action of August 21 is not noted in the Annals of Congress. The next day congressmen Benson, Sherman, and Sedgwick were appointed to arrange the articles for delivery to the Senate, and on the 24th, the clerk of the House was ordered to present the Senate with a "fair engrossed copy of the said proposed articles of amendment with a request for concurrence."

In the Senate. On Tuesday, Aug. 25, 1789, there was read in the Senate the House draft of the articles on religion. >From one of the senators present that day, we learn that the Senate discussed the amendments to the Constitution sent from the House of Representatives. They were not well received by Ralph Izard (South Carolina), John Langdon (New Hampshire) and Robert Morris (Pennsylvania). Izard moved that they should be postponed until the next session. Langdon seconded, and Morris got up and spoke against the amendment. The motion was defeated and Monday was assigned for consideration of the amendments.

It was moved in the Senate on September 3 to amend the House draft of article three by striking out the words "Religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," and inserting "One Religious Sect or Society in preference to others." This motion was defeated. A motion for reconsideration was then passed, and a motion to strike the House-proposed third article was defeated. In lieu of the suggested third article, it was moved to adopt the following: "Congress shall not make any law, infringing the rights of conscience, or establishing any Religious Sect or Society." This too failed. The debate continued. Another motion was defeated that would have amended the House's third article to read: "Congress shall make no law establishing any particular denomination of religion in preference to another, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed." Oddly, the Senate then moved to accept the third article just as it had been received from the House, namely, "Congress shall make no law establishing religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed." But this also failed to pass. Finally, it was passed in the affirmative that they adopt the wording of the House, but with the deletion of the words "nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed."

On Sept. 9, 1789, the necessary two-thirds of the Senate concurred in adopting a draft proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, Oliver Ellsworth. It reads as follows:

To erase from the third article the word "Religion" and insert "articles of faith or a mode of worship"—And to erase from the same article the words "Thereof, nor shall the rights of conscience be infringed," and insert—"of Religion; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press."

The proposed amendment that would have prohibited the states from infringing the rights of conscience was also erased in the Ellsworth draft.

On September 10 the House received word of the Senate action and on the 19th the House reconsidered their proposed amendments, as these had been changed by the Senate.

On Sept. 21, 1789, the House informed the Senate it could not agree to the wording approved by the Senate and that it desired a conference. Accordingly, a committee of conference was named, composed of Senators Oliver Ellsworth, of Connecticut; Charles Carroll, of Maryland; and William Paterson, of New Jersey; together with Representatives James Madison, of Virginia; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut; and John Vining, of Delaware. By the 24th of the month the House had agreed to the committee's present wording of the First Amendment:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

In the process of arriving at this agreement the conferees deleted the proposal that would have applied directly to state action. There is no satisfactory evidence as to who is the author of this wording. The following day, September 25, the Senate concurred in the resolution of the House requesting the President to submit the amendments to states.

Ratification. A determination of the meaning of the First Amendment must of necessity consider the attitude of the conventions called for the purpose of the ratification of the new amendments to the Constitution, and also the expressed attitude of the people during the time that ratification was being debated. The three most important steps in ascertaining the meaning of the amendments are:

(1) the recommendations made by the states; (2) the proposals in the first Congress and the debate thereon; (3) the developments in the process of ratification. Unfortunately, historical records are incomplete with respect to the attitude of the ratifying conventions. It is known that some conventions did not give any specific attention to the amendment on religion but adopted the Bill of Rights as submitted by Congress.

The one ray of light that we have from historical records shone from the Virginia Assembly. On Sept. 28, 1789, three days after the concurrence by the Senate and the House on the 12 amendments, Senators R. H. Lee and William Grayson, of Virginia, wrote to the governor of the state submitting the amendments and saying:

> It is with grief that we now send forward proposals inadequate to the purpose of real substantial amendments, and so far short of the wishes of our country [state].

On Dec. 12, 1789, the majority of the Virginia Senate postponed ratification of the amendments until the next session. Among the amendments that did not meet with their approval was the First Amendment. The Journal of the Virginia Senate for Dec. 12, 1789, reads as follows:

> The third [first] amendment recommended by Congress does not prohibit the rights of conscience from being violated or infringed; and although it goes to restrain Congress from passing laws establishing any national religion, they might, notwithstanding, levy taxes to any amount for the support of religion or its preachers; and any particular denomination of Christians might be so favored and supported by the general government, as to give it a decided advantage over the others, and in the process of time render it powerful and dangerous as if it was established as the national religion of the country.

> This amendment then, when considered as it relates to any of the rights it is pretended to secure, will be found totally inadequate, and betrays an unreasonable, unjustifiable, but a studied departure from the amendment proposed by Virginia, and other states for the protection of these rights. We conceive that this amendment is dangerous and fallacious, as it tends to lull the apprehensions of the people on these important points; without affording them security, and mischievous because by setting bounds to Congress it will be considered as the only restriction on their power over these rights, and thus certain powers in the Government which it has been denied to possess, will be recognized without being properly guarded against abuse.

> This document is particularly significant because it demonstrates that the Virginians who were probably the leaders in the whole movement for disestablishment felt that the proposed amendment did not live up to th spirit or the letter of the recommendation made by the state of Virginia when ratifying the Constitution. This is additionally significant when consideration is given to the fact that other states had adhered to the recommendation of Virginia, i.e., North Carolina, Rhode Island, and New York.

Several of the senators who filed this report had a continuous relationship with the development of religious liberty in Virginia. For example, Anderson and Pride were on the committee which originally reported the Virginia bill for establishing religious freedom. Though Virginia finally ratified the First Amendment, the document in 1789 containing the Virginia Senate's interpretation of the First Amendment was circulated widely throughout the colonies. For example, it appeared in the Daily Advertiser, New York, N.Y., for Jan. 26, 1790. It also was reprinted in the Virginia Independent Chronicle, Richmond, for Dec. 12, 1789. We can only speculate as to whether the other states when ratifying the amendment placed the same interpretation upon it as the Virginia Senate. However, it is a matter of historical record that several of the states were affected by the attitude of Virginia with respect to religious freedom. Presumably, they gave mature consideration to the interpretation placed upon the religious amendment by the Senate of the State of Virginia.

With respect to the other states the record is meager. The records of the debate in the Delaware General Assembly do not divulge what was discussed on the floor of either the House of Delegates or the Council. Final ratification occurred on Jan. 27, 1790.

The state of Pennsylvania formally ratified the present ten amendments on March 10, 1790. Again there is no historical record of the debate on the amendments. Of more than a little interest are the conclusions reached in the state constitutional convention, which was held in 1790, during the same time that the Pennsylvania Assembly was debating the proposed amendments. The Pennsylvania constitution of 1776 stated that:

> All men have an unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

The new Constitution repeated this declaration but significantly added the following:

That no preference shall ever be given by law, to any religious establishment or mode of worship.

Undoubtedly, there is a relationship between the religious amendment recommended by Congress and the language adopted by the delegates to the state constitutional convention. This is particularly true when one considers the emphasis on the term "preference" by the First Congress during the formulation of the religious amendment.

In the state of New York the Senate ratified the amendments on Feb. 24, 1790, without significant debate.

New Hampshire ratified the Federal Bill of Rights on Jan. 25, 1790. The absence of debate or newspaper comment indicates that the New Hampshire legislators did not think that there was any substantial conflict between the proposed amendments on religion and the recommendation that the state had made when it ratified the Constitution.

Similarly, the records fail to disclose any debate preceding ratification by Maryland.

The state of Connecticut did not ratify the Federal Bill of Rights but extensively considered the proposed amendments. The convention was still debating over the form of the amendments when Virginia ratified the Bill of Rights on Dec. 17, 1791, and since three-fourths of the states had already ratified the Bill of Rights, it automatically became law. Similarly, Massachusetts failed to ratify the Bill of Rights. It does not appear from historical records that there was any discussion of religion in the legislative tribunal called for the purpose of ratifying the recommended amendment nor is there any significant discussion in the newspapers of the time.

Georgia also failed to ratify the amendments. No evidence is available concerning the reasons for the failure of Georgia to ratify, and there is no historical documentation of the attitude of Georgia with respect to the religious amendment. However, it is known that in the constitution of 1789 Georgia had declared that all persons should have "free exercise" of their religion.

The amendments were submitted to the South Carolina convention on Jan. 4, 1790, and approved on Jan. 19, 1790. It will be recalled that South Carolina was one of the states that had specifically recommended an amendment with respect to religion. The lack of debate indicated that it felt that the essence of its proposal was incorporated in the religious amendment proposed by the Federal government.

Rhode Island ratified the Bill of Rights of the Constitution at the same time. There is some evidence in the official journal of Rhode Island indicating that there was a debate on the religious issue. The record, however, is so sketchy and contains so many deletions and interruptions that it is difficult to determine the attitude of the Rhode Island convention.

Public Opinion. An examination of the newspapers published during the ratification period discloses few comments on the First Amendment. Undoubtedly, this is due to several factors. In the first place, the amendment did not arouse extended debate in the conventions called to ratify the amendments to the Constitution. Secondly, there had been rather extensive comment on the amendment during the time that it was being debated in the First Congress. Consequently, there was a fairly good understanding of the religious amendment and a conviction that it was substantially in harmony with the attitude of the majority of the states with respect to the relationship between Church and State. It reflected the mainstream of thinking respecting religious liberty. Though there was no significant newspaper comment, the Founding Fathers, who as legislators formulated the First Amendment, expressed their views of the proper relationship between Church and State on frequent occasions. Their statements give us an invaluable insight into the thinking of the men who were primarily responsible for framing the First Amendment.

The Carrolls. It is interesting to examine the opinions of the Carrolls. This outstanding Catholic family was in close contact with the constitutional development of religious liberty in the U.S. Charles Carroll, of Carrolltown, was a senator from Maryland in the First Congress. More important, he was chairman of the Senate Conferees in the committee of conference that was responsible for the final structure of the First Amendment. Fortunately, his views on the Church-State relationship have been preserved in several documents. He frequently expressed his opinion that any preference and discrimination because of religion was constitutionally objectionable. He had approved the ban upon religious tests in Article 6 of the U.S. Constitution, and he led the forces in Maryland in favor of ratifying this amendment. He felt that the use of government funds to aid religion so long as there was no preference given to one sect was constitutional. In the Maryland State Legislature he sponsored various laws which favored impartial state support of religion. None of his writings contain evidence that he believed that the Federal government should have been denied the opportunity to engage in similar expenditures.

Daniel Carroll, cousin of Charles Carroll, also served in the First Congress of the United States and took an active part in the debate on the religious amendments. At various times as a state legislator he had demonstrated his willingness to use governmental funds to aid religion. He had been a staunch advocate of the passage of an action to provide relief for widows and children of Protestant clergy. Moreover, as president of the Maryland Senate he introduced a bill "to incorporate certain persons in every Christian church or congregation throughout this state."

Though not a legislator, a third member of the Carroll family, namely, Bp. John Carroll, was particularly active in the field of religious liberty. Historical records contain many letters and debates of Bishop Carroll in which he consistently expressed the broad principle of religious liberty embraced in the First Amendment as it was originally understood. On Jan. 30, 1789, Bishop Carroll answered a series of letters appearing in the Columbia Magazine that attacked Catholic citizens. He said:

After having contributed in proportion to their numbers, equally at least with every other denomination to the establishment of independence, and run every risk in common with them, it is not only contradictory to the avowed principles of equality in religious rights but a flagrant act of injustice to deprive them of those advantages to the acquirement of which they so much contributed.

Edward Humphrey, in Nationalism and Religion in America (Boston 1924), said that the Carrolls were largely instrumental in reading into the Federal Constitution a principle of religious freedom drawn from the framers of the Declaration of Independence that all men are created equal and are endowed by the Creator with certain unalienable rights.

This equality of religion was a dominant note in the thinking of the Carrolls and certainly it was constantly expressed by them, together with others in the First Congress and in the ratifying conventions. It is the key to an understanding of the meaning of the First Amendment, as it was understood by the Founding Fathers and prominent men of that day.

[G. E. REED]

IMPACT ON THE NEW NATION.

Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter, speaking of the religion clauses of the First Amendment when giving his concurring opinion in McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948), said, "The mere formulation of a relevant constitutional principle is the beginning of the solution of a problem, not its answer" (333 U.S. at 212). This observation aptly summarizes developments between the date of the congressional adoption of the First Amendment (1789) and 1840. It was a period of erratic but steady growth of the principle of religious liberty.

Federal Action. An important factor in assessing the impact of the religion clauses of the First Amendment is the limitation of the amendment to action of the Federal government. The House and Senate conferees stressed this limitation in 1789 when they refused to adopt the proposal of the House that would have made it unconstitutional for a state to violate the equal rights of conscience. The limitation of the Bill of Rights to Federal action was confirmed by the Supreme Court of the U.S. in the case of Barron v. Baltimore, 7 Peters 243, decided in 1833.

Treaties. Despite this limitation the federal government was able to promote religious liberty through treaties and various types of federal legislation. Article V of the treaty with Spain (1819) ceding Florida to the U.S. provided:

The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secure in the free exercise of their religion without restriction. [8 U.S. Stat. at Large 252.] The growth of this principle is reflected in the legislation providing for a territorial government of Florida, 1822. Section 5 of the enabling congressional legislation provided that:

No law shall be valid which . . . shall lay any person under restraint, burthen, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions or worship; in all of which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not burdened with those of another [3 U.S. Stat. at Large 654.] This attitude had been anticipated in the treaty ceding Louisiana to the U.S. (1803). Article II of this treaty had stated that:

> The inhabitants shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, prosperity and the religion which they profess. [8 U.S. Stat. at Large 200.]

The next year Congress had passed a law erecting Louisiana into territories. This act had spelled out the precepts of religious liberty in detail, stating in summary that no law would be valid that imposed a disability on account of religious opinions or worship. In 1805 Congress had passed an act for the government of Louisiana, section 30 of which said:

> That the Constitution shall contain the fundamental principles of religious liberty. [2 U.S. Stat. at Large 331.]

These treaty and enabling law provisions are particularly significant since a large number of the people in these areas were of Catholic persuasion. Moreover, the constitutions of the several states carved out of the Louisiana Territory exemplified this mandate of religious liberty.

The same Congress that adopted the First Amendment enacted the Northwest Ordinance of 1787, Article I of which provided that:

> No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship, or religious sentiments, in the North West Territory. [1 U.S. Stat. at Large 50.]

This principle of freedom of religion radiated to a large section of the country through organic laws that left no doubt about the commitment of the federal government to the basic principles of religious liberty. Other legislation was later to delineate the principles enunciated, but it is clear that these treaties and early enabling laws were the primary contributions to the development of the concept of religious liberty in the area between the Atlantic coast and the Mississippi River. They emphasized the concept of individual religious freedom and the "free exercise" concept of the First Amendment. They were silent on the principle of "no establishment." In this respect they were similar to the House provision rejected by the conferees considering the Bill of Rights.

Thanksgiving and Chaplains. The concept of religious freedom did not, during this period, preclude the official recognition of God. Thus, on the day that the report of the conference committee was accepted (Sept. 24, 1789), the House adopted a resolution:

> That a joint committee of both Houses be directed to wait upon the President of the United States, to request that he would recommend to the people of the United States a day of public thanksgiving and prayer, to be observed by acknowledging with grateful hearts, the many signal favors of the Almighty God. [I Annals of Congress 913.] During the rest of this period all of the presidents, with the exception of Jefferson, proclaimed national days of prayer and religious observance.

In 1790 the House adopted a resolution, "that chaplains of different denominations be appointed to the Congress" (Annals, I, p. 932). The next year congressional legislation provided for chaplains in the Military Establishment Law (1 US Stat. at Large 223). This legislation was extended in 1792. Chaplains were provided for the Navy in 1794 (1 U.S. Stat. at Large 350). In 1800 the Congress directed that:

> The Commanders of all ships and vessels in the Navy having chaplains on board, shall take care that divine services be performed in a solemn orderly and reverent manner twice a day, and a sermon preached on Sunday, unless bad weather or some extraordinary accident prevent it; and that they cause all, or as many of the ship's company as can be spared from duty, to attend every performance of the worship of Almighty God. [2 U.S. Stat. at Large 45.] At the turn of the century the pattern of legislation, both federal and state, continued to disclose a willingness and desire to recognize officially God and the beneficial effect of religion. There was no significant protest outside of Jefferson's refusal to proclaim days of prayer.

Incorporation of Churches. Madison did not object to the appointment of chaplains in 1789 though later, after he had retired from active political life, he wrote a treatise arguing that the practice was not consistent with religious freedom—a thesis that has not been accepted. Madison took a strict view also on the incorporation of religious bodies. In 1811 he vetoed a bill to incorporate the Protestant Episcopal Church of Alexandria,

> Because the bill exceeds the rightful authority to which governments are limited by the essential distinction between civil and religious functions and violates in particular the Article of the Constitution of the United States which declares that, "Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment."

The Annals of Congress do not record the debate on the veto message, but the issue of the National Intelligencer for Feb. 23, 1811, records a portion of the debate; Mr. Timothy Pitkin from Connecticut stated that

> He had no idea that the Constitution precluded Congress from passing laws to incorporate religious bodies for the purpose of enabling them to hold property. He had always held the Constitu tion to intend to prevent the establishment of a National Church, such as the Church of England, a refusal to subscribe to the tenents of which was to exclude a citizen from office. The veto was sustained by a vote of 90 to 27, but this vote should be interpreted in the light of the fact that Mr. Benjamin Pickman, Jr., of Massachusetts, said:

It appeared to him that the bill was not an important one, a refusal to pass which would be productive of any serious injury; and yet that a full discussion of the principles that it involved would occupy the whole of the remainder of the session.

In line with Rep. Pitkin's views was an editorial entitled "Democratic Qualms," appearing in the Baltimore Federal Republican and Commercial Gazette for Feb. 26, 1811. The editorial stated:

> What was the meaning of the Constitution in providing against a religious establishment? Does any man but Mr. Madison imagine it was to prevent the District of Columbia from engaging legal church regulations, and from exercising corporate rights in their congregations? Does The Legislature of Maryland believe it is creating a religious establishment when it is occupied in granting charters to the churches of the different sects of Christians as often as they apply? Where all are equally protected and accommodated, where each sect and congregation has its own establishment, modified according to its wishes and sanctioned in that modification by law, the best security exists against "a religious establishment," that is to say, one pre-eminent establishment which is preferred and set up over the rest against which alone the constitutional safeguard was created.

This was the first legislation to fall as a result of the application of the First Amendment. The fact is that it reflected a very special condition that existed in Virginia, namely, the associating of establishment with incorporation.

Madison also vetoed a bill that provided for a grant of land to a Baptist church in Salem, Miss. This position did not display the general attitude of the Congress or that of the executive office during this period.

In 1803 Jefferson as President concluded a treaty with the Kaskaskia people providing for the payment of $100 annually to a Catholic priest to perform religious ceremonies for the Native Amricans and to educate them (7 U.S. Stat. at Large 74). Starting in 1819 Congress commenced annual appropriations of money for mission boards to Christianize and educate native peoples. This became a standard and well-accepted policy during this period.

Many church-related schools also received congressional grants of land and money. In 1833, for example, Congress granted land to Georgetown College (6 U.S. Stat. at Large 538). These facts are recited not in an endeavor to interpret the First Amendment but rather to indicate the nature and direction of its development.

Scant Judicial Review. There is no body of judicial precedent interpreting the amendment during this period. The only case reaching the Supreme Court of the U.S. was Terret v. Taylor, 9 Cranch 43 (1815), which involved the validity of laws turning over confiscated glebe land in Virginia to public officials. In declaring the law unconstitutional, Justice Joseph Story, speaking for the Supreme Court, said:

Consistent with the constitution of Virginia, the legislature could not create or continue a religious establishment which would have exclusive rights and prerogatives, or compel the citizens to worship under a stipulated form or discipline, or to pay taxes to those whose creed they could not conscientiously believe. But the free exercise of religion cannot be justly deemed to be restrained, by aiding with equal attention the votaries of every sect to perform their own religious duties, or by establishing funds for the support of ministers, for public charities, for the endowment of churches, or for the sepulture of the dead. [9 Cranch at 49.]

This language came close to representing the contemporary attitude with respect to Church and State.

State Constitutions. It is important to examine the constitutional reaction of the states during this period to determine whether their organic law reflected the impact of the First Amendment. This would only demonstrate the indirect action of the amendment for, as heretofore observed, it was a limitation on the federal government and not the states. Yet the amendment was, to a certain extent, a codification of the religious sentiments of the day, and as such, it could be expected to have significant influence.

Uniform Enactments. Twenty-one states adopted constitutions during this time. Seven contained the following provision:

That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; that no man can of right be compelled to attend, erect or support any place of worship or maintain any ministry, against his consent; that no human authority can, in any case whatever, control or interfere with the rights of conscience, and no preference shall ever be given by law, to any religious establishments or modes of worship. This language was first incorporated in the Pennsylvania Constitution of 1790, which was adopted in convention at Philadelphia at the same time and place where delegates from Pennsylvania ratified the First Amendment. The relationship or impact of the First Amendment on the formulation of this language is still open to speculation, but it will be observed that it contains the guarantee of free exercise and a bar against legal preference for a religious establishment. Certainly, the proximity of time, place, and common interest gave the respective delegates an opportunity for an exchange of opinion. States adopting this same language during the period under consideration were Kentucky, 1792; Tennessee, 1796; Ohio, 1802; Indiana, 1816; Illinois, 1818; and Arkansas, 1836. Language substantially similar may be found in the constitutions of Vermont, 1791; Delaware, 1792; New Hampshire, 1792; Georgia, 1798; Missouri, 1820; Michigan, 1835; and Florida 1838.

Private Schools. No state constitution adopted during this period provided that money could not be used in aid of a sectarian school. The constitution of Michigan, however, provided that:

> No money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies, or theological or religious seminaries.

No other state constitutional provisions reveal this concept. On the other hand, the Ohio constitution of 1802 provided:

The laws shall be passed by the legislature which shall secure to each and every denomination of religious society in each surveyed township, which now is or which may hereafter be formed in the State, an equal participation according to their number of adherents, of the profits arising from the land granted by Congress for the support of religion, agreeable to the ordinance or act of Congress making the appropriation.

The Missouri Enabling Act of 1812 had similar language. Despite this diversity, the constitutions were remarkably similar. All contained a free exercise provision spelled out in detail, and most of them had a "no establishment" clause detailed in terms of no preference. This obviously was the accepted concept of religious liberty during this period. Modified establishments did persist as late as 1833 in Massachusetts and several of the other New England states, but by 1840 very little remained except vestigial aspects of establishment that were retained more by tradition than by usage. Several states retained test oaths, notably, Maryland, North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Pennsylvania.

Of course, this does not mean that all the constitutional aspects of religious liberty had been translated into action. It was during the latter part of this period that Nativism took root. In 1834 the Ursuline Convent in Charlestown, Mass., was burned to the ground. More trouble was to come and more open flouting of the constitutional guarantees of religious liberty. The gap between the law and actual practice was a wide one, but this was due to a variety of factors, none of which specifically involved the First Amendment.

Many social and philosophical factors such as the growth of the public schools, the influx of immigrants, the anticlerical philosophy of the French Revolution, and the fear of Rome would eventually result in movements that would reshape state constitutions and place a new and different gloss of interpretation on the First Amendment. However, the basic concept of religious liberty is most accurately shown in the treaties, congressional enactments, and state constitutions that were adopted before 1840. This was the period when the momentum, developed during the constitutional period, generated laws accurately reflecting the fundamental meaning and purpose of the First Amendment.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH (IN CHURCH TEACHING)

The right of the individual to express or communicate in a more or less public way his views without interference from other individuals or groups or from social authority. It is distinguished from freedom of the press insofar as it is the freedom to disseminate one's views by word of mouth (including right of access to radio and television) rather than by the printed word. Insofar as speech implies an overt external activity, the freedom here considered is one over and above intellectual FREE-DOM, which strictly taken is a freedom within the unindictable confines of the person himself. Because the communication of views, ideas, and theories may have and generally does have social repercussions, this right and its limitations present problems that perennially vex the minds of philosophers, theologians, and political scientists.

Men differ in assigning limits or denying limits to this freedom accordingly as they differ on the nature of the society or community within which the right is claimed; on the effectiveness or power of words to influence or determine action; on the likelihood of truth triumphing over error by its own sheer weight; on the existence and importance of basic principles for wellordered community life and the right and duty of protecting such principles from irresponsible and inflammatory attack; and on the practical possibility of limiting or containing something as volatile as expression of opinion. Thus, one who questions whether men have as yet acquired any clear and unchanging truths, whether there are truths whose denial would jeopardize social life, and whether verbal attacks can do any real or demonstrable harm will naturally be at odds with one who is convinced that there are at least some basic truths permanently valid, that among these are some whose denial will undermine the structure of social life, that normal people can reach the reasonable judgment that certain forms of attack upon these principles will ordinarily corrode or destroy them in the minds of the immature and the unbalanced, that while truth will eventually prevail it may do so too late to avert serious and irreparable harm.

General Catholic Attitude. In the past the Church in her general teaching and Catholic theologians in their writings, while acknowledging a right (and even an inalienable one) of the individual to express his mind, have tended to emphasize strongly the limits of this right. The Church's attitude would appear to flow from its conviction that both reason and revelation do declare at least some immutable principles, that among these principles are those on which peace and public order hinge, that society is vested with power to oppose and restrain attacks upon public order, even though the attack at a given moment be mounted only by words and speech.

More recently this attitude, or this emphasis, has been questioned by some Catholic theologians, who share a regard for the individual person and his rightful autonomy, an understandable fear based on experience of excesses perpetrated in the name of public order by entrenched groups in control of public power, and a belief that in modern life—given the proliferation of means of communication that level all barriers to movement of thought and exchange of views—it is impractical and unrealistic to attempt to dam the flow of opinion. These thinkers would prefer to discard the negative and repressive forms of reaction; to accentuate the positive by confronting the false, the unwholesome, and the dangerous with an ever more effective presentation and defense of truth and objective values; and trust to the maturity and responsibility of intelligent and educated public opinion to select and hold fast that which is good.

Specific Areas of Freedom and Limitations. It is inevitable that the Catholic Church, which considers itself divinely founded and preserved, which claims to be entrusted with a doctrine divinely revealed and to be equipped with effective divine assistance in maintaining this revealed message, will admit freedom in more restricted areas than societies that make no such claim. To the extent, however, that the divine message is coupled with human modes of presentation or with arrangements, directions, and discipline consistent with but not in all ages or in all situations demanded by the revealed message, the Church appears ready to recognize more explicitly and sympathetically freedom of speech within the household.

The areas in which freedom may be claimed may be divided into four, the first of which is that of doctrine definitively fixed by the supreme doctrinal authority of the Church. The second is likewise one of doctrine and teaching, but in which the teaching has never been clearly fixed. The third is one in which the divine message is not immediately involved, where consequently the role of the Church has been rather the pastoral one of practical guidance (setting up norms for worship; approving forms of monastic and religious life; conceding indulgences; establishing rules for fast, abstinence, etc.). The fourth is the area of current administrative decisions, contemporary planning, and policy either by the supreme authority or by lower authority, e.g., by local bishops or by the heads of religious orders and congregations (especially in the administration of schools, hospitals, and social institutions directed by religious congregations).

In regard to the first area, if the Church takes seriously its claim to be able to define the sense of divine revelation it cannot tolerate within the Church a freedom that would in effect contain a denial of its infallible teaching authority.

In the second area, one in which there is still room for modification of the Church's position, voiced dissent would not involve a denial of the Church's right; nevertheless, the one invoking freedom should realize that the Church will generally regard the traditional viewpoint as enjoying a strong presumption of truth, and that a pastoral concern for the faithful will urge the Church to exact from the one claiming freedom patience, sobriety in expression of a newer viewpoint, and circumspection in propounding his views. Certainly in more recent times (e.g., Pius XII's encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU and the "Instruction on the Historical Truth of the Gospels" emanating from the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION (April 1964) ecclesiastical authorities have tried to safeguard a legitimate freedom for scholars, even when they voice views at variance with positions long held within the Church, and at the same time to protect the children of the Church from hasty acceptance of theories that may ultimately prove unsatisfactory or of theories that when not fully understood may lead the uninformed or the poorly informed to question related truths that belong to the unchangeable doctrine of the Church. Pastors in the Church may, then, at times act to restrain public expression or discussion, while allowing private discussion in circles competent to understand and sift the issues involved.

The same restrictions of freedom will prevail in the area of long-standing discipline and Catholic life. One who invokes freedom to challenge and adversely criticize arrangements incorporated in the constitutions and rules of religious congregations, centuries-old practices of Catholic life, and historic usages in public worship may be expected to present his views in a manner that displays the courtesy of charity toward Catholics and the Catholicism of the past and avoids so far as possible disruption of Catholic life and unlovely factions within the people of God. Those in authority, out of concern for the continuity of Christian life and worship, may be expected to manifest reserve at times in dealing with those who advocate sudden and violent changes, or to modulate the stridency that at times marks and mars free speech.

In the fourth area, freedom of speech presents the special difficulty that it usually involves an attack upon (or at least a pointed criticism of) living men and women here and now vested with authority ultimately derived from Christ. Within the Church some account must be taken of this circumstance, and the one choosing to exercise freedom may be held to manifest his acknowledgment of the authority, even as he decries its unfortunate exercise. It does not seem that freedom here will be unduly hampered if it be exercised by respectful and private remonstrance to the ones whose official action is considered imprudent or unfair or pointlessly rigorous and then (if no redress is secured) by quiet recourse to higher authority before the aggrieved parties carry their case to the public.

The tensions generated by the exercise of free speech in this sector may be substantially reduced if the directive of Vatican Council II is wholeheartedly accepted and the grounds for later criticism removed or diminished by affording those who are subject to authority a chance to be heard before decisions are made or actions taken. Toward the end of the chapter on the laity (37) in the Constitution on the Church, the council states that > they [the laity] should openly reveal to them [their pastors] their needs and desires with that freedom and confidence that is fitting in children of God and brothers in Christ. By reason of their knowledge, competence, achievements, they may express and sometimes have even the duty of expressing their opinions in regard to things that concern the good of the Church. Let this be done, when the occasion arises, through channels established for this purpose by the Church. Let it always be done in truth, with courage and prudence, with reverence and love for those who by reason of their sacred office represent the person of Christ. . . . Let them [pastors] willingly avail themselves of the prudent counsel of the laity. . . . Let them thoughtfully in Christ weigh with paternal love the projects, suggestions and desires of the laity.

Although freedom of speech within the Church and the limits of that freedom will never be established to the satisfaction of all, the problems it raises will be notably reduced if those who must "guard the deposit" concede freedom to those who labor to relate that deposit to the needs of the time and to contemporary development, and if these in turn honestly and sympathetically assess the responsibility that weighs upon those in authority in the Church to turn over to future generations whole and unimpaired the message and patrimony received from Christ and his Apostles.

FREEMAN, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Mason; b. Menthorpe or Manthorp (?), East Riding, Yorkshire, England, c. 1558; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Warwick, Aug. 13, 1595. Freeman was born into a recusant Catholic family, but he outwardly conformed to the Anglican Church. After receiving his baccalaureate degree from Magdalen College, Oxford (1581), he lived in London, where he witnessed the martyrdom of Bl. Edward STRANSHAM (1586). Freeman was so impressed by Stansham's example that he converted, studied at Rheims, and was himself ordained priest in 1587. For six years following his return to England, Freeman ministered in Warwickshire, where his life was interconnected with that of William Shakespeare. He was arrested in January 1595 in the home of Mrs. Heaths, whose son Freeman was tutoring, and executed as a traitor seven months later despite his protest of loyalty. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

FREETHINKERS

Those who contend that reason can attain to a truth that has been contradicted, obscured, or distorted by the official doctrines of a religious body which lays claim to divine revelation and the consequent right to compel assent to its teachings. In a more restricted sense, freethinkers are those 17th-, 18th- and 19th- century philosophers and scientists, e.g., Anthony Collins, (1676-1729), Lord Shaftesbury (1671–1713), Denis Diderot, Thomas PAINE, Charles DARWIN, and Herbert SPENCER, who maintained that the teachings of Christianity-as contained in Scripture, in the writings of approved theologians, and in the pronouncements of the various churches-were an impediment to the progress of science and enlightened morality. To achieve desired scientific progress and ameliorate various social evils, they insisted it was necessary for the scientist and the philosopher to be free in their thinking and liberated from the limitations imposed by religious authorities. In France, those who assumed this attitude were called libres penseurs, libertins, esprits forts, or franc-pensants; in Germany, the term was Freigeister or Freidenker.

The term "freethinker" was first used by William Molyneux in a letter to John LOCKE (1697), in which the former called John Toland (1670–1722) "a candid free-thinker." Fifteen years later, the term appeared in print again, in Jonathan Swift's Sentiments of a Church of En- gland Man. Swift referred to "the atheists, libertines, despisers of religion, that is to say, all those who usually pass under the name of Free-thinkers." After the publication of Anthony Collins's Discourse of Free-Thinking, Occasion'd by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Free-Thinkers (1713), the term was in common use. However, a certain ambiguity still attached to it, so that when Ambrose Philips began publishing his weekly journal, The Freethinker, in 1718, he was able to use the term freethinker to denote simply one who is "free from prejudice."

John M. Robertson, in his A Short History of Freethought (London 1899, 3d ed. 1915), defines freethinking as "a conscious reaction against some phase or phases of conventional or traditional doctrine in religion—on the one hand, a claim to think freely, in the sense not of disregard for logic but of special loyalty to it, on problems to which the past course of things has given a great intellectual and practical importance; on the other hand, the actual practise of such thinking."

Early History. Throughout the history of Western thought, the problem that gave rise to the modern free-thinkers occurred repeatedly within the context of various religious traditions. Each time it fostered a conflict between religious authorities and intellectuals whose scientific and philosophical inquiries led them to question the validity of the doctrines and sacred writings of the religion generally accepted in their society.

Greeks. The first Greek philosophers, Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes (sixth century B.C.), when pursuing their scientific inquiries into the nature, genesis, and function of the physical universe, found it necessary to reject the Homeric and Hesiodic accounts of how the gods had produced and continued to govern the world. Xenophanes (c. 500 B.C.) openly scoffed at the common anthropomorphic conception of the Greek gods. HERA-CLITUS, living in the same era, wrote, "Hesiod is the teacher of most men; they suppose that his knowledge was very extensive, when in fact he did not know night and day, for they are one." Heraclitus is reported as having said also that Homer deserved to be cast out of the lists and flogged. The fifth-century atomists denied the possibility that the gods could affect the earth in any fashion; rather, they said, all occurrences in the universe were the result of the chance movements of indivisible bits of matter. They also denied the immortality of the soul. SOC-RATES was condemned to death (399 B.C.) on the charge that he did not believe in the gods of the Athenian state. PLATO, in his Republic and various other dialogues, argued that the accounts of the Greek gods given by Homer and Hesiod could not be accepted in any literal sense, and that children ought not be exposed to the immorality contained in such tales. (See GREEK PHILOSOPHY.)

Romans. In the first century B.C., Lucretius carried on, among the Romans, the same sort of freethinking that had been championed by the Greek atomists. Lucretius's explicitly stated aims in composing his lengthy philosophical poem, De rerum natura, have been the aims of most freethinkers since that time: to give a natural, materialistic explanation of all physical and social phenomena, and thereby eliminate from the minds and hearts of men the paralyzing fears that stem from believing that the gods have brought this world and man into being, that the gods intervene in the affairs of men, that the gods can be moved by sacrifices, and that there is an afterlife in which men will be judged and punished by the gods. (See MATERI-ALISM.)

Muslims. The Muslim world, with its official religious teaching based on the Qur'an, has had its own freethinkers, who found their reason in conflict with orthodox religious doctrine. Ibn-Ishāq al-KINDI (9th century), a devotee of Greek learning at Baghdad, gave considerable impetus to the development of a new school of Islamic theology, a kind of modernism that aimed at a reinterpretation of the Qur'an along lines that would permit a reconciliation of Greek learning and Islamic doctrine. The resulting Mu'tazilite school, however, was soon challenged by a resurgence of fundamentalism. Then, in the 11th century, Omar Khayyām, the mathematician, astronomer, and poet whom J. M. Robertson calls "the most famous of all Eastern Freethinkers," openly rejected the limitations of Islamic orthodoxy. In the same century, AVICENNA made a new attempt to provide a philosophical interpretation of the Qur'an and thus to reconcile orthodoxy and science; but his efforts served to provoke Algazel's fundamentalist Destruction of the Philosophers. Finally, AVERROËS, a 12th-century Arab living in Spain, reasserted the claims of reason over religious faith in his Destruction of the Destruction, aimed at ALGAZEL, and in his three sets of commentaries on the works of Aristotle. (See ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY.)

Christians. In the early Christian period the Manichaeans, who claimed that they were Christians, propounded a fanciful, but would-be scientific account of the genesis of the universe and its functioning, along with an interpretation of Scripture in accordance with the demands of their "science." However, orthodox Christianity asserted itself so powerfully that in the nineth century the Greek scholar and patriarch PHOTIUS was considered by many to be a dangerous freethinker because he had maintained in a sermon that earthquakes were the result not of divine anger, but of natural causes. In the same centur JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA gave a metaphysical explanation of reality in his Neoplatonic De divisione naturae that incurred severe ecclesiastical censures for its supposed heterodoxy.

In the 13th century, the influence of Averroës provided the occasion for the rise of a group of freethinking Christians, the Latin Averroists, who discounted the value of revelation and theology and accorded first place to reason and Aristotelian philosophy, which they regarded as the greatest accomplishment of human thought. (See AVERROISM, LATIN.)

Modern Development. With the rise of modern science the tension between orthodoxy and reason became acute for many. The celebrated affair of Galileo GALILEI is a case in point. In addition, the Renaissance humanists provided the beginnings of a "higher criticism" of Scripture that questioned the generally accepted notions concerning the dates, authorship, and historical backgrounds of the various books of the Bible. With respect to the difficulties of both scientists and Scripture critics, the conflicts were exacerbated by a failure on the part of orthodox theologians to distinguish clearly between the message of revelation and its cultural matrix, a failure that was repeated at other times of intellectual crisis, e.g., on the occasion of Darwin's publication of his Origin of Species (1859). In the 17th-century B. SPINOZA had incurred the wrath of the orthodox, both Christian and Jew, with the publication of his Tractatus theologico-politicus, in which he anticipated much of the German 19th-century higher criticism of Scripture and presented a plea for freedom of thought and speech in religious matters. At approximately the same period, the British Deists were beginning to publish their objections to revealed religion (see DEISM). Shortly thereafter, the French ENCY-CLOPEDISTS made their contribution to freethought on the Continent. The 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man showed the influence of freethinking in its statement that "no one is to be interfered with on account of his opinions, even on the subject of religion, so long as their manifestation does not disturb public order as established by law."

Early in the 19th century, Robert Owen (1771-1858), English social reformer, gave evidence of the continuing conflict between science and revealed religion. On a visit to the U.S. in 1830, he challenged the American clergy in general to debate with him a set of freethinking propositions: that all religions are founded in ignorance; that all religions are opposed to the laws of nature; that religion is the principal cause of strife among men; that religion is the principal cause of human vice and misery; and that all religions are maintained only through the ignorance of the many and the tyranny of the few. For Americans, however, freethinking came to be typified by Robert Ingersoll (1833-99), lawyer, politician, author, and lecturer. As a result of his popular lectures on such subjects as "Some Mistakes of Moses" (1879) and "Why I Am an Agnostic" (1896), Ingersoll earned for himself the sobriquet of "The Great Agnostic."

Numerous organizations of freethinkers were established in Europe and America in the 18th and 19th centuries. Freemasonry's Grand Lodge, founded in London in 1717, was originally an association of freethinkers. Other organizations of freethinkers were the Theophilanthropists of France, the Abrahamites in Bohemia, Ernst Haeckel's Monistic Society in Rome, the National Secular Society in England, the International Freethinkers' League in Brussels, the American Rationalist Association, the American Secular Union, and the Freethinkers of America. Numerous freethinking publications sprang up. Robertson, in his A History of Freethought in the Nineteenth Century (2 v. London 1929), lists, for example, 13 such periodicals that began publication in England between 1819 and 1850.

Influence on Catholics. Within the Catholic Church, the pressures exerted by those who desired an adjustment in traditional teaching to bring Catholicism in line with advances in the sciences and in higher criticism were met by Pope Pius IX's encyclical QUANTA CURA (1864) and its list of 80 propositions that came to be known as the Syllabus of Errors. The last of these anathematized propositions summarized the position Pius IX wished to condemn: "The Roman pontiff can and should reconcile and align himself with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization." Pius X continued Pius IX's policy in his encyclical PASCENDI (1907), which condemned the Modernist tendencies that manifested themselves at the turn of the century.

The term freethinker has become somewhat archaic in the second half of the 20th century, largely because the kinds of pressures formerly exerted by church and state to exact intellectual conformity in religious matters have generally given way to a respect for religious freedom and for freedom of thought in general. Within the Catholic Church, moreover, a conciliating factor has been the approval of new directions in scriptural interpretation, particularly in Pope Pius XII's DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1943), and the consequent removal of much of the troublesome tensions that formerly existed. Finally, the deliberations of Vatican Council II have resulted in an aggiornamento that encourages a fuller rapprochement between the Church and contemporary intellectual movements.

FRELICHOWSKI, STEFAN WINCENTY, BL.

Diocesan priest, martyr; b. Jan. 22, 1913, Chelmza, Poland; d. Feb. 23, 1945 in the concentration camp at Dachau (near Munich), Germany. As a Polish Scout prior to his entry into the seminary, Stefan "acquired a particular sensitivity to the needs of others" (John Paul II, beatification homily). He was ordained a priest in 1937. He was working at his first assignment as a parish priest at Torun when he was arrested with several other priests by the Gestapo and released after a few days. On Oct. 18, 1939, he was again stopped and sent to Oranienburg-Sachsenhausen. Over the course of the next 14 months, he was transferred successively to "Fort Seven." Stutthof, Grenzdorf, Oranienburg-Sachsenhausen, and finally Dachau (Dec. 13, 1940). At each stop along the way, Frelichowski witnessed to the love of Christ through his humble service to others. During the typhus epidemics at Dachau (1944–45), he risked his life to bring forbidden material and spiritual comfort to the afflicted and dying until he himself contracted the disease, then developed pneumonia. He died in the camp hospital at age 32-just two months before the end of the war. The decree of Frelichowski's martyrdom was signed on March 26, 1999. Pope John Paul II beatified Frelichowski on June 7, 1999 at Torun, Poland, the city where two peace treaties were signed and a colloquium was held between Catholics and Calvinists, because he was a peacemaker.

FRELINGHUYSEN, THEODORE JACOBUS

Dutch Reformed pastor, influential in the growth of PIETISM and the development of the GREAT AWAKENING in America; b. Hagen, Westphalia, Germany, Nov. 6, 1692; d. after May 1747. He was the son of a Reformed pastor, and he studied for the ministry in Germany and Holland. In 1717 he was ordained by the Coetus of Embden, Holland, and given a pastoral charge in East Friesland. In 1719 he accepted a call to the Dutch congregations in the Raritan Valley of New Jersey.

From his arrival in 1720, Frelinghuysen sought to combat the formalism of worship and the laxity of his congregations. His sermons stressed personal conviction of sin, true repentance, faith, and the work of the Holy Spirit in regeneration. He encouraged private prayer meetings and lay preaching. His new approach and free use of excommunication led some parishioners to appeal to Henricus Boel, a conservative New York pastor, and involved Frelinghuysen in controversy from 1723 to 1732. He was active in the movement for greater autonomy for the Dutch Reformed churches in America beginning in 1737 and favored the wider use of English in services (see REFORMED CHURCHES, II: NORTH AMERICA). He cooperated closely with the Presbyterians, particularly Gilbert Tennent, and in 1739-40, George WHITEFIELD. His sermons were published in English translation by William Demarest (New York 1856).

FRENCH REVOLUTION

The French Revolution (1789–99), whose religious history alone is here recounted, was not merely a violent and decisive overthrow of the political and social structures of the French kingdom; it was also a spiritual and religious drama. After demolishing the traditional ecclesiastical structure of one of the oldest Catholic countries of Europe, the revolutionaries aimed to formulate valid principles of organization for all modern societies, while prescinding from the Church's traditional doctrines or opposing them.

This aspect of the crisis in France during the last decade of the 18th century greatly impressed contemporary observers and later historians. Joseph de Maistre, in his Considérations sur la France (1796), described the Revolution as a death struggle between Christianity and a diabolical philosophy and as a trial permitted by Providence to revivify Catholicism. Abbé Augustin de Barruel's Mémoires pour l'histoire du Jacobinisme (1797) saw in it the fruit of a plot hatched by philosophers, freemasons, and fanatics to destroy the Church. Edgar Quinet in La Révolution (1865) interpreted it as an essentially religious conflict whose goal was the triumph of the spirit of enquiry and of liberty over the "ancient belief" that formed the basis of political despotism. Still later, "scientific" historians rejected these earlier interpretations as too systematic and too philosophical. François Alphonse Aulard (1849-1928) and Albert Mathiez (1874-1932) studied the religious aspects of the disturbance, but denied that the Revolution was a premeditated war against the Church. They brought out the role of circumstances and of necessity (financial, national security) in the decisions taken against the Church. According to them, national renovation could not be effected unless the revolutionary leaders could attract powerful religious support. Lacking the support of the old Church, which had become hostile, they turned to the new "revolutionary religions." Finally, contemporary historiographers invite us to place the revolutionary phenomenon as it appeared in France behind every ideological and reform movement that disturbed Europe and even the entire Western world about the beginning of the 19th century. Although it was in France that the conflict between traditional religion and the new spirit erupted and proceeded to extreme lengths, one cannot separate the history of the vicissitudes of French Catholicism from that of the upheavals that have affected the Catholic Church and other denominations elsewhere and that have changed among peoples everywhere traditional concepts of relations between the state and religion.

Religious Situation in France in 1789. From the beginning of the 18th century throughout all Christian Europe "enlightened" minds and innovators, such as writers, political figures, administrators, and economists, examined "God's case," as Paul Hazard termed it, on a metaphysical plane, and also the Roman Catholic Church's case, on a political and social plane. The "philosophers" rejected divine revelation and the authority of the ecclesiastical magisterium and replaced them, in the name of reason, with "natural religion" or more rarely with outright atheism. They complained that the clergy, especially the papacy, was domineering, intolerant, and scandalously wealthy; and they condemned Catholicism for its social shortcomings, its complete disregard for civic-mindedness, and its alliance with despotism. Incre-dulity was restricted mostly to the aristocracy and intelligentsia. The middle classes were often hostile to the clergy, especially to the regular clergy, and disliked the Holy See and its ultramontane defenders. Among the masses religious practice remained regular, but it was mixed with much ignorance and was based more on conformity than on solid devotion (see ENLIGHTENMENT).

In France the Cahiers de doléances, drawn up in 1789 with a view to a meeting of the Estates-General, manifested a widespread attachment to the national religion, but they contained numerous criticisms of the ecclesiastical institution and revealed an eagerness to see the Church reform and bring the fullness of its influence to bear on the reform of the state. The Cahiers demanded that the clerical class surrender its privileges, especially its exemption from direct taxation, and a part of its immense real estate holdings, which occupied about onetenth of the country. They showed great hostility toward religious congregations, especially of men, which were considered too numerous, useless, and contrary to human nature because of their vows of chastity and obedience. Convinced supporters of GALLICANISM wished to limit papal authority over the national clergy. In this respect they were in accord with the disciples of JANSENISM, who were very hostile to the Roman Curia and to PIUS VI (1775–99), who pursued them with his condemnations in France, in Italy, and in German-speaking countries. Supported by philosophers who advocated tolerance, Protestants demanded complete liberty of conscience and of worship.

On the whole there was no evidence in any part of France at the beginning of the Revolution of an intention to destroy Catholicism. Patriots no more intended to knock down the altar than to overthrow the throne. They had not even a common program for Church-State relations. No one imagined the possibility of establishing a regime of separation similar to that recently set up in the U.S. Furthermore, all differences were hidden by the unanimity of hopes. Everyone believed that the eliminating of abuses, the revivifying of institutions, and the establishment of a new constitution "on the sacred foundation of religion" would require the cooperation of bishops and priests; all expected such cooperation. The Catholic Church seemed to be held in much higher respect in France than in Austria or in the Rhineland. It seemed that in case of difficulty the Church could rely for defense on the devout King Louis XVI and on the deep attachment of a population that had never envisioned throwing aside its Catholic tradition.

Attempt to reorganize the National Church (May 1789 to April 1792). During its first year, the Constituent Assembly made decisions whose direct or indirect effects were to upset the Church's status and to alarm Catholics.

On the night of Aug. 4, 1789, the deputies abolished all privileges of individuals and of social groups. Thenceforth the clergy could no longer exist in the state as a distinct order or class, enjoying precedence, the right to levy certain taxes (tithes), and the power to administer its own holdings and to consent to imposts sought by the king. In the future ecclesiastics were to be citizens on the same level as others and, like them, subject to the law.

Nationalization of ecclesiastical property followed in November of 1789. To circumvent the danger of public insolvency, the Assembly heeded the suggestion of TAL-LEYRAND-PÉRIGORD, Bishop of Autun, and legislated the seizure of the extensive properties belonging to the Church and the sale of it to benefit the state treasury. The Assembly promised that in exchange the state would guarantee an appropriate salary to ecclesiastical functionaries and would assume responsibility for maintaining hospitals, schools, and foundations that had been up to then the Church's care. This confiscation raised some protests, including the indignation of the Holy See; but it was carried out without great difficulty. Purchasers of "national property" continued to fear a return to the past and became determined adversaries of the Church, which persisted in condemning the operation.

At this time the Constituent Assembly, by way of prologue to the political constitution, proclaimed the Declaration of the Rights of Man, inspired by the American Declaration of Independence but more general and universal in character. It declared all men free and equal in rights, with freedom to think and write as they wish; it promised further that no one should be harassed for his opinions, even on religion. The ecclesiastical delegates accepted this moderate formula of tolerance, as well as the complete civil equality of Protestants. Pius VI, however, severely censured the principles contained in the declaration as contrary to revelation and impregnated with an indifferentism capable of leading to the ruin of the true religion (March 10, 1791).

Dissolution of religious congregations was the next step. In the spring of 1790 the Assembly decided to reform religious congregations as a measure indispensable to the public welfare; and it did so without consulting Rome. Religious vows were forbidden in the name of the inalienable liberty of the individual. Congregations not devoted to nursing or teaching were suppressed. Religious houses with few members were united. Religious men and women were authorized to leave their convents. These measures resulted very soon in the desertion of the houses of male religious, which were thereupon confiscated. The congregations of women resisted the pressure of local authorities much longer. Their convents, havens of retreat for priests and laymen who were dissatisfied with the religious reforms, were treated with increasing severity by the government until all were closed and the nuns dispersed (August 1792).

Although it had stripped the clergy of its privileges, the Assembly denied any hostile intentions against the Church. Indeed the majority of the clerical deputies still believed in 1790 that the Gallican Church, once purified, would find a worthy place in the "regenerated" state. Relations between the Revolution and the Church were changed decisively by the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY (July 12, 1790). Without consulting the Holy See, the Constituent Assembly enacted on its own authority a new statute concerning the Catholic clergy as part of its program of administrative and social reforms. It then demanded that priests, as salaried civil servants, take a civil oath to uphold the Civil Constitution. This threatened the enfeoffment of the clergy to the civil power and a break between the Gallican Church and Rome. Another effect of the law was to divide clergy and laity into two hostile groups. The constitutionals, or jurors, supported the Civil Constitution; the nonjurors, or refractory element, opposed it. Pius VI's solemn condemnation of the Civil Constitution (March-April 1791) caused the majority of the faithful to lean toward the refractory. As a result many Catholics detached themselves from the patriots and sided with the ''aristocrats,'' who were resolved to restore the ancien régime with the help of foreign arms if necessary.

The dream of harmonious collaboration between the Revolution and the Church disappeared. Toward the end of 1790 violent anticlerical manifestations broke out in Paris and throughout France. Most of the bishops feared for their lives and fled the country. They joined the royalists, who in Germany and Italy were trying to organize a league of Christian princes that would save the Church and King Louis XVI, by now a prisoner of the Revolution. European rulers hesitated to engage in a very hazardous ideological war, which Pius VI regarded as inevitable. In May of 1791 the French government severed diplomatic relations with the Holy See; and in September it seized AVIGNON, a part of the States of the Church. The pope was convinced that the Jacobins in Paris were spreading their propaganda in order to rouse peoples everywhere to insurrections against the throne and the altar. Within France and throughout all western Europe the revolutionary ideal and Roman Catholicism seemed to be in tragic opposition. Cardinal Zelada, the papal secretary of state, affirmed: "A most cruel and uncompromising war against religion has been openly declared by the dominant party."

The Legislative Assembly declared war on Emperor Leopold II of Austria (April 20, 1792). Soon afterward it decreed the deportation beyond French borders of all nonjuring priests suspected of conspiring against the state. Louis XVI, who had endeavored to prevent the enforcement of this last measure and who was suspected of connivance with foreign powers, was dethroned in a violent Parisian insurrection (Aug. 10, 1792). The collapse of the throne led to a ferocious attack against Catholicism.

Dechristianization (May 1792 to October 1794). Historians have coined the term "dechristianization" to describe the assault by the Legislative Assembly and its successor, the National Convention, against Roman Catholicism and then against all forms of Christianity. This persecution involved the deportation of ecclesiastics and the condemnation of some of them to death; the closing of churches, the wholesale destruction of religious monuments and symbols; the prohibition of worship, religious teaching, and propaganda; the secularization of the state and its institutions; and the condemnation of all ancient religious traditions. Attempts were made to replace "superstition" with revolutionary and civic religions. Dechristianization coincided almost exactly with the Reign of Terror, i.e., with the establishment of a centralized, dictatorial, and bloody regime that arose because of the Revolution's implacable war on a Europe allied against it. Dechristianization was also the consequence of a growing aversion, even hatred toward the Church and the religious ideal, and of a determination to "extirpate fanaticism," a resolve that characterized some political leaders and the populace under their influence.

Stages of Dechristianization. There were two outbreaks of dechristianization corresponding to what is called the "little terror," during the summer and autumn of 1792, and the "great terror," from September 1793 to August 1794.

Since the Legislative Assembly had to wage war against Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, and the French émigrés, it feared the internal disorders caused by the rivalry between juring and nonjuring priests and by the collusion of the latter, who maintained a strong ascendancy over the populace, with the enemies of the Revolution. The government therefore decreed the arrest and exile of nonjuring priests, who were regarded as models of disobedience to the laws. While the Austrians and Prussians were invading France from the northeast, local authorities imprisoned suspects somewhat at random. In Paris a mob became panic-stricken at the news of the approaching enemy, invaded the prisons, and indiscriminately massacred the prisoners as "accomplices of foreign powers" (Sept. 2-4, 1792). Many of the victims have been beatified (see PARIS, MARTYRS OF).

The confusion that followed the collapse of the throne permitted the installation at Paris of an insurrectionary city council, the Commune, which exercised discretionary authority, apart from that of the Assembly. It forbade public manifestations of worship, such as processions, midnight Mass at Christmas, and the wearing of clerical garb. It likewise despoiled churches to amass silver and bronze for national defense. These measures affected the clergy and worship of the Constitutional Church as well as the nonjurors. Actions of this kind were applauded by Cordelier and Jacobin clubs, by popular societies, and by the majority of the Legislative Assembly, whose Girondist deputies were very antireligious. The Assembly even decided to remove the clergy from its function as keepers of the census (the last social function they still performed) and to confine this work to lay officials.

However, these oversystematic procedures ran the risk of deeply wounding popular sentiment, especially in the provinces, and prudent political figures sought to slow down the application of them and to avoid their spread.

Under the National Convention the dechristianizing movement began anew in the summer of 1793, spread across France, and lasted until at least the autumn of 1794 and the Thermidorean reaction. The external and internal situation had become very grave. With England and Spain allied with the enemies of the Revolution, France was besieged by land and sea on all its frontiers by the First European Coalition. At the same time it was torn asunder domestically by terrible civil revolts, notably by the uprising in the Vendée, where the Catholics, who were also royalists, fought with extraordinary intensity to retain the nonjuring "good priests." A federalist insurrection set the large cities of the provinces against Paris and went so far as to make a compact with foreign countries. The Convention, dominated by the Mountain faction, sought by every means to reduce the French to submission. Thus it sent throughout the country commissioners armed with discretionary powers to crush the enemies of the Republic. Some of these envoys, with the complicity of local clubs, stirred up popular wrath against "fanaticism and its henchmen." They forbade all public and private worship. After tracking down priests, the revolutionists compelled them to marry and to abjure the priesthood (deprêtriser). Priests who resisted, along with their religious or lay accomplices, were arraigned before revolutionary tribunals. A law of Oct. 21, 1793, made all suspected priests and all persons who harbored nonjurors liable to death on sight. Condemnations multiplied. Sometimes they were carried out in batches. Thus 135 priests were shot to death at Lyons in the mitraillades (November of 1793). In Compiègne 16 Carmelites were executed; in Orange, 32 Ursulines. The Church has honored a number of these victims as martyrs (see COMPIÈGNE, MARTYRS OF; ORANGE, MARTYRS OF; ARRAS, MARTYRS OF; LAVAL, MARTYRS OF; VALENCIENNES, MARTYRS OF).

Once the "conspirators" were crushed, the attempt was made to replace "superstitious and hypocritical cults' by the cult of the Republic and of natural morality. Civic celebrations were organized in honor of Liberty and of the "Goddess Reason," whose feast was commemorated in Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris (November of 1793) and later in several provincial cathedrals. If these celebrations were not the Saturnalia depicted by the enemies of the Revolution, they inevitably repelled believers as sacrilegious parodies. Henceforth churches were devoted to popular meetings or transformed into shops. It was forbidden to attempt to reopen them for religious services. Protestants also had their churches closed and their services stopped. Some zealots of the Mountain went so far as to close Masonic lodges. All propaganda, all teachings other than those imparting Republican doctrines, were forbidden in popular societies.

To erase the memory of ancient traditions, it was considered insufficient to "demolish the temples that proclaimed the imbecility of our fathers" and to demolish belfries and crosses. Localities bearing names of saints were renamed, and children were given civic first names. Finally, in October of 1793, the Convention abolished the Gregorian calendar, in use among Christian peoples, and replaced it with a revolutionary calendar without Sundays or saints' feast days; the foundation of the Republic was taken as the year I. This was supposed to signify humanity's entrance upon a new era.

Scope and Limits of the Dechristianization Movement. This desperate effort to "uproot fanaticism" from the earth and from souls was the act of a small minority to whom circumstances had momentarily permitted the exercise of almost unlimited authority: Girondists during the Legislative Assembly, the Mountain during the National Convention, members of the Paris Commune and of the Jacobin clubs. Among them were jurists; intellectuals; lawyers, such as Pierre Chaumette; journalists, such as Jacques Hébert or Jean Marat; former religious, such as Joseph Fouché; members of the middle class who led the sans-culottes of the towns: and artisans and workmen. but not the lowest classes. This attests to the existence of a strong current of resentment against the Church, mixed with a rationalist ideology that was in good measure a tributary of the philosophical ideas of the preceding period, although not entirely so. This current continued for a long time after the Revolution.

It would be inaccurate to attribute the entire responsibility for the dechristianizing movement to the Jacobins or to regard all of them indiscriminately as atheists who denied all transcendent morality. The political leader who enjoyed the largest audience in the club of the Jacobins and who dominated the government committees and the Convention during the Reign of Terror was Maximilien ROBESPIERRE. He professed a form of DEISM inspired by Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU. Once in power, he sought to impose by law on all citizens belief in a Supreme Being and in the immortality of the soul (see SUPREME BEING, CULT OF THE). He did not favor the Church, nor did he advocate clemency toward it, but he disapproved the excesses of dechristianization as a discredit to the Revolution. His opposition to some members of the National Convention was not without bearing on his fall (July 28, 1794).

These distinctions were scarcely understood outside France. Most Christian peoples, Catholics and Protestants alike, viewed the religious persecution as the crowning point of the collective fury called the Reign of Terror, which could be explained only as a satanic blow against all that was most respectable in civilization. Beginning with the summer of 1794, the French Republic went from victory to victory and occupied Belgium, the Rhineland, and Savoy. In these Catholic countries it put into effect some of the Revolution's ecclesiastical legislation and measures. All western Europe was seized with dread lest the spread of the antireligious movement prove irresistible. Aversion to the Revolution increased still more because of the sympathy some of its victims inspired. The thousands of refugee or banished priests, religious, and bishops who had settled in Rome, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, Germany, England, and the U.S. (where a handful of Sulpicians founded in Baltimore the first Catholic seminary) demonstrated, on the whole, a dignity under trial and piety amid their hardships that won them great respect, even in the opinion of the antipapist British. The émigrés contributed not a little to confirming abroad the conclusion that France was the scene of an explosion of antireligious hate that was truly satanic.

Although the tempest that had been sweeping over France left ruins in its wake, it did not destroy all religious life, even momentarily. The Catholic masses opposed dechristianization with heroic resistance. Not all the Catholic clergy who were attached to Roman orthodoxy left France. Out of 135 bishops 25 refused to emigrate, and some spent the entire period of the Reign of Terror hidden in the vicinity of Paris. Other bishops sought to maintain the direction of their dioceses through authorized representatives. In Paris the Sulpician Jacques ÉMERY prudently directed the archiepiscopal council; in Lyons the Vicar-General Linsolas courageously organized itinerant missions. Priests and also many religious women who transformed themselves into unassuming schoolmistresses lived and worked clandestinely with the cooperation of the local inhabitants, especially in mountain and forest regions far from administrative centers, such as Jura, Haute Loire, and Lot. Nonjuring priests in western France found shelter among the insurgents of the Vendée.

In the Constitutional Church there was a relatively large number of priests and even of bishops who abdicated their faith, but there were also men of character, such as Henri GRÉGOIRE, Bishop of Loir-et-Cher, who was a deputy in the National Convention and always defended courageously the rights of religious conscience.

The prohibition of worship could be enforced in very unequal measure in different regions and in different periods. Even in Paris, where the promoters of dechristianization were most determined, religious services in secret could not be completely prevented. In the various departments of France the situation varied according to the zeal of local authorities and, above all, according to the resistance of the populace. There were whole regions, as in Brittany, where the prerevolutionary situation hardly changed. Areas with strong religious tradition succeeded in inaugurating missions entrusted to itinerant priests endowed with regular faculties, who were assisted by catechists and utilized the interval between visits from one parish to another to strengthen their spiritual lives. Even in more tepid regions the populace indicated by its attitude that, at the least sign of change in the political scene, it would demand the reopening of churches and schools where children could receive education based on traditional religion and morals.

It was this passive resistance, this evident determination of the people that brought about the progressive abandonment of dechristianization measures, beginning with the day when the Thermidorean Convention let the revolutionary government fall into disgrace, after the elimination of Robespierre.

Separation of Church and State (September 1794 to November 1799). During the year III the Thermidorean Convention turned gradually toward a regime of separation of Church and State. Force of circumstances rather than doctrinal convictions guided it. To lighten the public financial burden, the government decided first to cease paying salaries to the clergy. Implied in this was the abandonment of the Constitutional Church. To free itself from inextricable difficulties, the Convention next promised the free exercise of all religions, subject to precautions necessary to keep public order. This principle was even inserted in the new political constitution of the year III (promulgated in October of 1795), which initiated the Directory regime. This meant that the state would consider itself alien to religious questions and would guarantee to all citizens freedom of conscience and of religious practice.

Unlimited government tolerance was, however, impossible in a nation that was prey to the most profound political and moral divisions and that contained partisans of diverse cults engaged in continual rivalry and bickering. For five years the Directory shifted from complete abstention in regard to religion to half-hearted attempts at accommodation with the Catholic Church, to enforcement, and even to renewal of measures of surveillance and repression of Catholicism. This inconsistent attitude offered no security to any creed and succeeded in discrediting a regime that was very unpopular anyway because of the prolongation of the war, financial bankruptcy, and increasing anarchy.

Attempt at Tolerance and the Revival of Catholicism. From October of 1795 to September of 1797 the government sought to be tolerant. Catholic priests reappeared, and public worship resumed. The rival Constitutional and Roman Churches tried to reorganize. They disputed bitterly with one another over the faithful as clientele. But the Constitutional clergy were weakened by defections and by the low esteem in which the laity held them. On the other hand, the orthodox clergy suffered from divisions in their own ranks. Some priests preached prudence and submission to the authorities, but the majority, especially those who had returned from exile, refused reconciliation with the Republic and censured its laws and its representatives. The Directory thought it prudent to impose on ministers of religion a promise to obey the Republic's laws. In the summer of 1796 it made a somewhat ambiguous attempt to negotiate with the pope to get him to impose submission of the refractory clergy. When this failed and when resistance continued, the Directory stiffened its policy and accused Catholics of seeking to be "aloof, dominant, and persecuting." Furthermore, anti-Catholic prejudice remained very strong in government circles. The Directory imposed the revolutionary calendar and the decadi feasts on which the magistrates had to preach a civic religion (see DECADI, CULT OF). One of the directors, Louis Larevellière-Lépeaux, even pretended to be the prophet of a new religion of his own invention, called THEOPHILANTHROPY. The minister Joseph Lakanal was active in organizing a secular type of education that removed pupils from any semblance of religious cult.

The elections in the year V (March–April of 1797) manifested a strong popular movement against those in power and in favor of complete religious liberty and the recall of deported priests. In the elections Catholics, hoping to restore the Church to its old position, allied with the royalists, who were enemies of a republican form of government. The Directory used this as a pretext to disregard the elections by the coup d'état of 18th Fructidor (September 4) and to call in question the whole policy of religious appeasement.

New Anti-Catholic Offensive. As a result severe persecution started again and lasted two years (September of 1797 through November of 1799). Under the pretext of seeking guarantees of loyalty, the Directory imposed on priests an oath of "hate for the royalty" to which they could not subscribe. Against nonjuring priests the Directory revived the deportation legislation of the previous period and caused 2,000 priests to be arrested (of whom 500 belonged to departments in annexed Belgium). While waiting to transport them to Guiana, officials herded them into prisons and onto convict ships at Rochefort and neighboring ports under conditions so inhuman that many died. Although executions were relatively rare, annoyances were incessant. Catholic worship was no longer tolerated even for the Constitutional Church. The Directory hoped that it would wear down its opponents and put an end to the Church and its priests; it expected that eventually the populace would forget about them.

The victories won outside France by the armies of the Republic seemed to foretell the ruin of Catholicism in every country under French rule. As early as 1796 some directors wished to take advantage of the brilliant success of Gen. Napoleon Bonaparte in Italy by having him advance to Rome and attack the Holy See. Bonaparte refused, unwilling to jeopardize his conquests by stirring up the wrath of the Italian masses, whom he knew to be attached firmly to their religious traditions. He was satisfied to conclude with Pius VI the Treaty of Tolentino (February of 1797), which imposed on the pope rigorous neutrality but left him independent and in possession of Rome. This act permitted Napoleon to pose as the savior of the Holy See in the eyes of Italian and French Catholics (see NAPOLEON I).

Bonaparte's departure for Egypt and numerous incidents between French occupation troops and Italian princes in central and southern Italy allowed the Directory finally to dispatch to Rome Gen. Louis Berthier's army, which dispersed the papal court and proclaimed the Roman Republic (February of 1798). Pius VI, although 81 years old and ill, was seized and taken as a prisoner to France, where he died (Aug. 29, 1799). On this day the total destruction of the Holy See seemed to many to be accomplished. It might have appeared practically impossible to proceed to the election of a new pope in Europe, where the Second Coalition had stirred up war everywhere or to restore Catholicism in France after seven years of merciless persecution.

Religious Pacification (November of 1799 to July of 1802). Actually, the Jacobin government, as it was called in Catholic circles, was condemned by its inconsistency and injustices and by the intense desire of all Frenchmen for peace. When Gen. Bonaparte returned from Egypt, he took advantage of his popularity and of the discredit of the Directory to effect his coup d'état of 18-19 Brumaire (Nov. 9-10, 1799) and to seize power amid general approval. Within two years Napoleon as First Consul restored religious peace in France and in Europe. Once he became First Consul, he declared the Revolution ended but promised to guarantee its "conquests," such as liberty of opinion and of belief, equality among religions, and the sale of religious property. Napoleon used exhortation and force to unite the French. He permitted the return of the refugee priests, from whom he demanded only a simple promise of fidelity to the constitution. Public worship resumed. Churches that had not been confiscated were allowed to reopen, but control over them was disputed between the Constitutional and the orthodox clergy. Each group claimed full authority to the exclusion of the other. The First Consul was surrounded by counselors who had been members of the Jacobin assemblies and who were very hostile to the restoration of Gallican and monarchist bishops to their former sees. Napoleon did not, however, lean toward the Constitutional Church or seriously consider making Protestantism the official religion of the new state, because he had already decided in favor of the Roman Church.

Experience had taught Napoleon to rule men according to the wish of the majority. In France and also in Belgium, the Rhineland, Italy, and in other territories annexed to France, the majority of the population was Catholic and much attached to the Holy See. These Catholics would not overlook the violence of the religious quarrels or submit to the laws of the established government except on the advice of their "good priests" or on the pope's orders. It was, therefore, necessary to negotiate with Rome, but at the same time to advance so cautiously that there would be neither victor nor vanquished among the partisans of the different religions, and to act so firmly that the papacy would be unable to take revenge for the Revolution and oblige Napoleon to compromise his principles and his conquests. It was with these considerations in mind that the government of the Consulate entered into negotiations (November of 1800) with PIUS VII, who had recently arrived in Rome to reestablish the papal government. The new pope was more inclined than his predecessor to enter into an accord with the French government, since he judged this indispensable to save religion in Europe.

The accord was incorporated in the CONCORDAT OF 1801, which was signed July 15, 1801, and promulgated April 18, 1802. It guaranteed full liberty of worship to the Roman Catholic apostolic religion (implicitly rejecting the Civil Constitution of the Clergy), the reestablishment of the hierarchy in communion with the Holy See, and the payment of an adequate salary to the clergy in compensation for the loss of their landed property confiscated and sold during the Revolution. But it did not make Catholicism the national or dominant religion, because Napoleon wanted to safeguard the freedom of dissident religions and the equality of religions recognized by the Republic. The silence of the concordat concerning religious congregations resulted in the disappearance of one group among the clergy and the transfer to others of the social services that they performed. The Concordat was, therefore, a promise of restoration of Catholicism in France and in the countries belonging to it; but this restoration did not involve any compensation for past losses, nor did it bestow any future concessions or special privileges.

Emperor Napoleon I was responsible for the observation of tolerance and for what must be called the laicizing of the state. He gave legal recognition to Protestant and Jewish worship and obliged all creeds to live on good terms under the watchful eye of the government. This situation was so novel in comparison with the ancien régime that Catholics found difficulty in accepting it. Its emancipation of religious dissidents, however, was in conformity with the Revolution's decrees. So well was the formula of the Concordat adapted to existing conditions and to the mentality of the time in France and throughout most of western Europe that many neighboring states tried to obtain from the Holy See a similar accord during the following quarter-century. In France the Concordat survived its author. The Restoration period did not succeed in replacing it, even though it regarded a return to the prerevolutionary regime as essential. Despite numerous changes of government, France retained the concordat for 104 years, until the Third Republic legislated the separation of Church and State (December of 1905).

Prolongation of the Conflict. The mass of French Catholics interpreted the Concordat of 1801 as proof of the Revolution's failure in its attempt at dechristianization. But some conservative philosophers and, still more, some ultramontane theologians continued to deplore the Church's impaired status in comparison with the ancien régime; even more did they bewail the partial victory of Revolutionary principles over Catholic doctrine. The Church could indeed forgive and forget the plundering, the bloody persecution, even the sacrilegious overthrow of the Holy See during the Revolution. It could also consent to deal with the new, secularized states to obtain the blessings of peace and to safeguard religious liberty. It could not and would not, however, tolerate the propagation of those doctrines championed by the Revolution that were injurious to God and to society. Among them was the substitution of popular sovereignty for authority emanating from God. Unacceptable to the Church also was the concession of equal rights to religious truth and error implied in the phrases "liberty of opinion" and "liberty of conscience." The proclaimed equality among individuals seemed contrary to traditional teachings about the providential inequality of conditions.

This explains the effort by the Church, particularly by the papacy, for more than a century to condemn and refute the "principles of 89" and to repel the Revolution, which was conceived thenceforth less as an historic event than as a doctrine of revolt and of negation that had taken hold of the human mind as a result of a false philosophy and had caused the diabolic insurrection of man against God. If several popes, notably Gregory XVI, Pius IX, and Pius X, waged a relentless struggle against the Revolution, it was because they attributed to it the essential responsibility for the spread of such modern errors as doctrinal indifferentism, rationalism, naturalism, and liberalism and because they saw in it a series of innovations dangerous to the individual, the family, and society, including civil marriage, secularized education, and separation of Church and State.

Liberal Catholics proposed, at times with tenuous arguments, that the Church reexamine the message and significance of the Revolution and the conditions of its promulgation; but for a long time this proposal went unheeded. The Church considered war on Catholicism as the basic aim of the Revolution, against which it must take an irreversible counterrevolutionary stand. The appeasement of this antagonism between Church and Revolution demanded, especially in the 20th century, new and terrible trials by mankind. It required also a pacifying of the antireligious fury that characterized the spiritual heirs of the Revolution, a more serene and detailed examination of the philosophical contents of the Declaration of the Rights of Man, a more minute and exact knowledge of the origin of some decisions and of the historic chain of events between 1789 and 1799. In fine, it necessitated a long labor of reconciliation between the Catholic Church and the modern world.

FREPPEL, CHARLES ÉMILE

French theologian, apologist, writer; b. Obernai (Bas-Rhin), France, June 1, 1827; d. Angers, Dec. 22, 1891. After studying at the seminary in Strasbourg, he was ordained (1849) and then became director of St. Arbogaste College in Strasbourg (1851), professor of homiletics, and later of patristics, at the Sorbonne (1855), consultor in the preparations for Vatican Council I (1869), and bishop of Angers (1869). During Vatican Council I he was an energetic supporter of papal infallibility. In 1880 he was elected deputy to the French Chamber, where he was a stalwart upholder of the Church and the monarchy. As a teacher and writer he was noted more for brilliance than for profundity. His voluminous writings included more than 40 titles in 80 volumes. Apart from his numerous pastoral letters and speeches as bishop, his best-known works are Études sur les Pères des trois premiers siècles (11 v. 1859-93), a history of the sacred eloquence of the Fathers of the Church full of allusions to contemporary history; Bossuet et l'éloquence sacrée au 17e siècle (2 v. 1893); his study on the life of Christ written by RENAN, Examen critique de la Vie de Jésus par E. Renan (1863, 15th ed. 1866), which was widely read; and, still more popular, La Révolution fran*caise* (1889), which went through many editions. Freppel was a brilliant orator and very combative. He was one of the most-discussed figures in the French hierarchy, especially because of his sharp, but not always objective, opposition to growing laicism. The impulse that Freppel gave to the social movement in French Catholicism did not advance much beyond the moralizing stage because of his opposition to state action in social problems. At the first Catholic congress on the social question, held at Angers, Freppel presided and claimed that moral renovation and private initiative sufficed to provide the essential remedies for social wrongs. Freppel's hostility to the Third Republic was shortsighted, and it reduced his political influence. His most lasting service was the foundation of the University of Angers (1875).

FRESCOBALDI, GIROLAMO

Distinguished baroque composer and Vatican organist; b. Ferrara, c. August 1583; d. Rome, March 1, 1643. As a youth he had a voice of great beauty, and studied organ with Francesco Milleville, a Ferrarese who became organist of Voltera. In 1694 he became organist and cantor of the Congregation of St. Cecilia. He was appointed organist of Santa Maria, Trastevere, Rome, in January 1607, but left in June for a year in the Netherlands.

At Antwerp Frescobaldi published his first volume of five-part madrigals (Phalese 1608) and returned to Italy, where he published his second book of four-voice fantasies in Milan (1608). In November 1608 he was appointed organist at St. Peter's, Rome, where, according to G. Baini, 30,000 persons came to hear his first performance. Dissatisfied with the pay, he took a leave of absence in 1628, to be organist to Ferdinando II de' Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany, in Florence. Because of political upheaval, he left Florence in April 1634 and was directly reinstated at St. Peter's, where he played until his death. Some records mention him as organist of S. Lorenzo in Montibus during his last year. J. J. FROBERGER was his pupil from September 1637 to April 1641 and handed down his method, spreading it to Germany. His music is remarkable for its high intelligence and artistic taste. All his extraordinary talents are combined in one work, the Ricercare con obligo di cantare la quinta parte senza toccarla, from the Messa della Madonna, of the Fiori Musicali. Here it is provided that a fifth part, a theme of six notes, may be superimposed over the four manual parts, presumably to be sung by the player. The realization by Guilmant has been reprinted by Bonnet and others. Although best known for his organ works, he composed a comparable number of choral and instrumental pieces. Transcriptions of his better-known instrumental works have been made by B. Bartók, O. RESPIGHI, and several other composers.
