Both elicited and imperated actions imply moral responsibility in their agent. When reasonable and good, these acts have MERIT, and this entitles their agent to reward; when unreasonable and evil, such acts have demerit, and this calls for punishment. So, all such acts are imputable to their agent; he is responsible for their consequences to himself and to other persons. Natural Moral Law. Ethical reasoning terminates in judgments that follow the pattern: This kind of action is morally good and should be done; or, this other kind of action is evil and should be omitted. A typical ethical judgment ("Immoderation in eating is to be avoided," or "It is good to help other persons but evil to harm them") is always somewhat general or universal in form. That is to say, ethical judgments may be regarded as rules for the guidance of any moral agent faced by a problem of a certain type. Such rules are regarded also, in Thomistic ethics, as moral laws. In this sense, LAW means: "a rational order made by a person who has charge of a community, for the sake of the common good, and promulgated." (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 90.4.) "Promulgated" here means made available to those subject to such an order.

Right Reason. The primary source of moral laws is God; as First Cause He has fashioned man and his environment so that some kinds of actions are appropriate and others are not. In a secondary sense, since man's intellect enables him to discover reasonable rules of conduct, the human understanding is a proximate source of moral law. The intelligent use of human understanding to work out moral laws is called right reasoning. Since right reason is founded on man's nature and the natures of other things in his environment, and since rational appraisal of the suitability or unsuitability of a given action occurs in the natural course of human life, judgments of right reason also are called natural laws.

Viewed as coming from God, a natural moral law is a participation by the human intellect in God's knowledge of what is right, that is, in eternal law. Seen in terms of human experience, a natural law of morality is simply man's best reasoned judgment of what is generally right or wrong in a given state of affairs. The rules of natural law are, then, "naturally" knowable in a double sense: (1) from the point of view of promulgation, they are implanted in the nature of man as a reasoning being; (2) from the point of view of the "order" that each moral law embodies, they are expressions of a naturally fitting interrelationship of a given kind of action (or omission) with the nature of man, placed in the real context of his action.

Obligation. Some authors also stress obligation as central to the character of moral law. The emphasis on the will of the lawgiver, in later scholasticism, tended to stress the binding character of law on its subjects. Other Thomistic ethicists think that obligation is not as central as what one might call the reasonable appropriateness of a given type of action. In other words, the ethicist is concerned not merely with what man "must" do (the performance of a minimal set of duties) but also with the discovery of what he should do in addition, in order fully to develop his distinctive capacities. Thus considered, the morally good thing transcends a lowest common denominator of what is ethically demanded, and embraces certain types of goodness that are not absolutely required but are nevertheless possible and good for a human agent. Where duty-ethics never requires a man to be a hero or to rise above the ordinary, Thomistic ethics looks to a maximal, or very best, effort on the part of each man as the ideal. Thus, some presentations (Oesterle, Bourke) stress the life of VIRTUE-e.g., perfected habits of intellect, will, and concupiscible and irascible appetitesmore than mere conformity to laws. In any case, the judgments of ethics (and of moral theology) must be applied by each person (through moral CONSCIENCE and PRU-DENCE) to his own moral problems: this the ethicist cannot do for another person.

Kinds of Ethics. There are various divisions of ethics depending upon the scope of the good that is envisioned. Individual ethics deals with the private good; domestic ethics with the good of a FAMILY; political ethics with the COMMON GOOD of a SOCIETY, state, or nation; and international ethics with the broadest natural common good, that of mankind. A common good embraces not only the sum of private goods of the members of a community, but also the higher goods that can be attained by group activity.

Other Schools. While Thomism is central, various other schools of ethical thinking have enriched Catholic tradition. PLATONISM and STOICISM influenced the early Fathers (e.g., St. Augustine) to subordinate sensory goods to intellectual ones. Peter ABELARD, in the 12th century, stressed internal consent (intentio) as most important to the moral act. When Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics became known in the 13th century, Catholic scholars such as St. Albert the Great and Aquinas adopted and modified some of the Aristotelian terminology and analyses of moral action. Franciscan moralists retained much of AUGUSTINIANISM, through the influence of St. BONAVEN-TURE and JOHN OF LA ROCHELLE. DUNS SCOTUS and WIL-LIAM OF OCKHAM, in the 14th century, utilized the theme of "right reason," but stressed the Will of God as the source of moral legislation. Francisco SUÁREZ, in the 17th century, emphasized "human nature adequately considered," as the norm of moral judgment. Modern and contemporary ethics has become very diversified.

See Also: ETHICS, HISTORY OF; EXISTENTIAL ETHICS.

Bibliography: J. A. OESTERLE, Ethics (Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1957). A. FAGOTHEY, Right and Reason: Ethics in Theory and Practice (2d ed. St. Louis 1959). V. J. BOURKE, Ethics (New York 1953). THOMAS AQUINAS, The Pocket Aquinas, ed. V. J. BOURKE (New York 1960). A. G. SERTILLANGES, La Philosophie morale de saint Thomas d'Aquin (rev. ed. Paris 1946). M. WITTMAN, Die Ethik des hl. Thomas von Aquin (Munich 1933). J. MARITAIN, Neuf leçons sur les premières de la philosophie morale (Paris 1951); La Philosophie morale (Paris 1960). J. DE FINANCE, Ethica generalis (Rome 1959). J. MESSNER, Social Ethics: Natural Law in the Modern World, tr. J. J. DOHERTY (St. Louis 1949). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, "Ethics and Theology," The Modern Schoolman, 27 (St. Louis 1949–50) 29–39; "The Empiricism of Thomistic Ethics," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 31 (Baltimore 1957) 1–24. I. T. ESCHMANN, "St. Thomas's Approach to Moral Philosophy," ibid. 25–36. J. LECLERQ, Les Grandes Lignes de la philosophie morale (new ed. Paris 1954). T. E. HILL, Contemporary Ethical Theories (New York 1950). C. C. BRINTON, A History of Western Morals (New York 1959).

[V. J. BOURKE]

ETHICS, HISTORY OF

The science of ETHICS, like other branches of PHI-LOSOPHY, did not come into being suddenly; rather it has a long and involved history that parallels the development of philosophy itself (see PHILOSOPHY, HISTORY OF). This article traces the story of that development through two broad stages: the first deals with ancient and medieval ethical teaching, surveying the origins of ethics among the Greeks and its growth through the patristic and medieval periods; the second is concerned with the evolution of ethical doctrine in modern thought, beginning with the Renaissance and continuing through Kant to the 19th and 20th centuries.

Ancient and Medieval Ethical Teaching

In the 6th century B.C. the Greeks were highly civilized, but had only traditional codes of morality and ideals of behavior which the rising spirit of philosophical criticism did not initially question. This situation changed, however, when growing knowledge of other peoples made known the great differences of custom among them. The resulting contrast helped to initiate ethical inquiry.

Sophists and Socratic Schools. By underlining the relativity of mores, the SOPHISTS generally tended to discredit accepted standards. Yet Sophists like Protagoras wished the contrary, arguing that this very relativity justified each one in following the laws of his own state. They also seem to have implicitly held to a natural law. Other Sophists like Thrasymachus, however, carried their RELATIVISM to radical lengths, even to maintaining that might is right.

SOCRATES (470?–399) rejected such extremes and showed how one could arrive at objective universal knowledge by inductive study. With his ironic dialectic he helped to clarify such basic notions as those of justice and the state. He also held that all men seek happiness and that knowledge is virtue, by which he meant that one who knows what is right will not be voluntarily bad.

Among the lesser disciples of Socrates were the CYNICS and CYRENAICS, each overemphasizing certain aspects of his teaching. Antisthenes (c. 445–c. 365) held the good life to be one of self-sufficiency and freedom from desires, wants, and conventions—a theme later taken up by the Stoics. Aristippus of Cyrene said pleasure was man's end, a view to be developed by the Epicureans.

Plato and Aristotle. PLATO (428?–347) amplified Socrates's EUDAEMONISM. Man's end is to develop and live in a full and harmonious manner under the guidance of reason. To show how this is done he forged theories of a rational asceticism and of the cardinal virtues. Again, because man is by nature social and capable of achieving perfection and happiness only in society, he discussed in detail the functions of the state, which are to make possible and to promote the good life for the citizens.

ARISTOTLE (384-322) wrote the first systematic treatise of ethics, in which he further developed and modified the Socratic tradition. His method was to compare and contrast the pertinent facts, theories, and opinions, and thereby to sift out the truth. He began by pointing out that the notions of good and end are central in ethics. Accepting the common view that man's end is happiness, he showed that this is to be found only in the activity that is peculiar to man, viz, activity of reason or in accord with reason. He also discussed the conditions of responsibility: knowledge, choice, and lack of compulsion. The theory of the cardinal virtues he replaced with a lengthy consideration of various modes of excellence associated with the operation of the intellect and will: the intellectual and moral virtues. The latter are a mean between excess and defect. Thus, courage is the mean between rashness and cowardice. Justice and friendship he studied in special detail. Disallowing the views that pleasure is the good and that all pleasures are bad, he held that as the natural completion of activities, pleasures will be good or bad depending upon the action whence they result. Since the intellect is man's highest faculty, his greatest happiness will be found in a contemplative life provided with a modicum of external goods, health, friends, and pleasure.

Epicureanism and Stoicism. The Platonic and Aristotelian schools were soon eclipsed in popularity by the Epicurean and the Stoic. EPICURUS (342?–270) denied an afterlife and any divine influence on the course of events, and maintained that pleasure is the alpha and omega of blessedness. By pleasure he meant the absence of pain in the body and of trouble in the soul. Debauchery is to be avoided, and blessedness or serenity of soul is to be found especially in sober intellectual pursuits. Of physical goods man should desire only the minimum, and the exercise of virtue is inseparable from a pleasant life. Of the greatest importance, moreover, is true friendship. EPICU-REANISM in its original form thus insisted on a high degree of self-discipline, even though this was for egoistic reasons. It flourished for seven centuries and had among its adherents the poets LUCRETIUS and HORACE.

STOICISM was founded by Zeno of Citium (336?-264?) and was systematized by Chrysippus (c. 280-206). Man's end is to live virtuously, which is synonymous with living according to nature. Nature is here taken in two senses: rational human nature and the divine law establishing the universal order. Thus man has various duties, such as perfecting himself and propagating the species. Happiness is achieved by practicing the cardinal virtues; which involve each other reciprocally, and consists of apathy, a calm indifference to all emotion and to the vicissitudes of life. This results from understanding and accepting one's role in the cosmic plan. An important aspect of the latter is the universal brotherhood of men. Later Stoics were EPICTETUS and MARCUS AURELIUS. As a school Stoicism died out in the 3d century A.D., but it continued to exert influence throughout the Middle Ages and later, by such doctrines as those of the natural law and the division of virtue.

The Roman moralists CICERO and SENECA had little originality and are of importance mainly as transmitters to the Middle Ages of Greek theories.

Patristic Ethics. In the patristic and medieval periods ethical problems were studied mostly from within the framework of the moral theology that was then developing. Of the purely ethical works the majority are commentaries on Aristotle. Yet Christian moral literature presents decidedly new emphases: on man's relations with God, the dignity and intrinsic worth of individuals, the primacy of love, inner righteousness as contrasted with merely legalistic performance of duty, and the virtues of humility, poverty of spirit, mercy, obedience, and chastity.

More interested in exhortation, the early Christians did not make extensive theoretical studies of morality. St. AMBROSE (340?–397) was their first moralist of note. In his De officiis ministrorum he presents a Christianized version of Cicero's De officiis. In it the pastoral concern is much more obvious than the scientific. His reduction of all duties to the exercise of the four cardinal virtues became an accepted medieval theme.

Of the Fathers, St. AUGUSTINE (354–430) was the greatest philosopher and moralist. In regard to man's end he accepts the eudaemonism of the Greeks, but insists that happiness can be found only in God. Man attains God not merely through knowledge but especially in a union of love. There is then but one principal virtue, charity, which manifests itself in four ways as the cardinal virtues: as temperance, which is love keeping one's self whole and incorrupt for God; as justice, which is love rightly using all things in the service of God; as fortitude, which is love easily bearing anything for God; as prudence, which is love correctly distinguishing those things that help man reach God from those that would impede him. There is in God the eternal law, which is the divine reason and will requiring man to preserve the natural order of things and forbidding its disturbance. This law, insofar as it is impressed by God in one's heart to illuminate him, is the natural law of which conscience makes him aware. Man, though free, should submit to it. Sin is any transgression of it in deed, word, or desire. Because of the Fall, however, man can achieve moral righteousness only with the help of grace. Freedom of choice is thus different from liberty, which consists in being able to use one's freedom rightly.

Medieval Period. The first major theorist of ethics to appear after Europe recovered from the Dark Ages was Peter ABELARD (1079–1142). In his Scito Teipsum (Know Thyself) he discusses the nature of morality. He distinguishes sin from the mere inclination to evil, from the pleasure that accompanies acts, from the act itself, from any of its results, and from temptation. To sin is simply to consent to evil. It is intentionally to despise God and His laws. Conversely, a good act is one done with the intention of respecting God's law. Good and evil then depend completely on one's intention. All acts are in themselves morally indifferent. But to avoid the SUBJEC-TIVISM this might entail, he also holds that an intention is not good if the intended act merely seems good; it must be actually good, that is, in accord with God's law.

Thomism. The century that followed Abelard's death was one of intense research into moral and related psychological questions, culminating with the work of St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1225-74) in the full elaboration of a scientific MORAL THEOLOGY. A major factor in this development was the availability of new translations of Aristotle, especially his works on psychology and ethics. This made necessary the study and evaluation of a number of new concepts and theories concerning the nature of freedom; the psychology of the human act; the relation of the soul to its faculties; the nature and interrelations of synderesis, prudence, and conscience; the nature and properties of the natural law; the intrinsic morality of actions; the indifferences of acts; ignorance as a moral factor; the definition and the classification of the virtues; their interdependence; the nature and types of justice; and the role of reason and of intention in morality. Although the discussion of these problems took place within a theological context, they were primarily philosophical, as were the proposed solutions. Especially important was the work at this time of PHILIP THE CHANCELLOR, the Franciscans, and St. ALBERT THE GREAT.

The greatness of St. Thomas as a moralist lay in his ability to integrate the insights of previous thinkers into a comprehensive, well-articulated, and consistent synthesis. Thus, Thomistic moral theory is fundamentally Aristotelian, but incorporates numerous Stoic and Augustinian elements, the whole of which is unified by Thomas's own manner of conceiving them. Also characteristic are his intellectualist conception of beatitude; his analysis of the voluntary act; his separation of the problems of morality, sin, and merit; his detailed study of the nature and role of the passions; his notion of the moral sense (synderesis) as a habitus of the intellect, rather than a faculty; his theory of virtue; his classic conception of laws, eternal, natural and positive, as ordinances of reason; and his reorganization of the whole of moral theology into two parts, one general and the other special, the latter broken down in function of the theological and cardinal virtues.

Scotism and Ockhamism. The end of the Middle Ages was a time of growing SKEPTICISM with regard to the value of philosophy and the capabilities of the intellect. In moral theory this manifested itself in an ever greater emphasis on the divine will in resolving the problem of moral obligation. Thus, John DUNS SCOTUS (1265?–1308), while admitting certain acts to be intrinsically good or evil, held that the obligation itself to do or avoid these acts exists because of the free choice of God's will to impose it. WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (1290?–1349?), on the other hand, denied any ontological connection between the nature of an act and its morality. God in His absolute power and freedom can decree any act to be good or bad, so that the moral law is due to His arbitrary fiat.

Evolution of Ethics in Modern Thought

With the Renaissance, the humanists, in their enthusiasm for the classics, rejected SCHOLASTICISM and revived several of the philosophies of antiquity. Thus, Lorenzo VALLA (c. 1407–57) went back to Epicureanism, Justus LIPSIUS (1547–1606) to Stoicism, and Michel de MONTAIGNE (1533–92) to skepticism. The growing dissolution and secularization of standards is, however, best seen in the work of Niccoló MACHIAVELLI (1469–1527), who dissociated public morality from private, and justified, for the prince, policies based on sheer expediency.

Second Scholasticism. But the end of the Renaissance also saw a revival of scholastic philosophy, the moral theories of which were highly original and influential. Bartolomé de MEDINA gave classic formulation to the theory of PROBABILISM. Francisco de VITORIA condemned the slave trade that was again starting to flourish, and developed a doctrine of international law. St. Robert BELLARMINE worked out a theory of Church-State relations. For him, although all authority comes ultimately from God, the popes get theirs directly from Him, whereas civil rulers receive theirs through the mediation of the community. The popes have no direct power over princes, but do have an indirect dominion when spiritual interests clash with temporal. Thus he rejected the theory of the divine right of kings. The most notable of the later scholastics, however, is Francisco SUÁREZ, who worked out a complete and detailed philosophy of law. This period also saw the establishment of special chairs of ethics in the universities, and the development of purely philosophical, logically elaborated, treatises of ethics-the practice up to then having been to treat of moral theory in theology or in the form of commentaries.

Rise of Rationalism. In the 1600s rationalistic views became common on the Continent. Hugo GROTIUS (1583–1645) held that the natural law could be deduced from man's social nature. This theory of a geometrically stable and inferred natural law was widely accepted for over a century. René DESCARTES (1596-1650), "the father of modern philosophy," held that man's goal is rational contentment. To achieve this, one should understand his nature and capabilities, and train his passions so that they are always under the control of the will. Nicolas MALEBRANCHE (1638–1715), a disciple of Descartes and a member of the Oratory, took life to be a constant attempt to avoid the lure of false goods presented to man by the world and the senses; one can succeed only by abandoning the desires of the body, in order to devote one's self to the knowledge and loving fulfillment of the divine order. Baruch SPINOZA (1632-77), attempting to avoid the difficulties of Cartesian dualism, was led to PANTHEISM. For him, beatitude consists in the realization that one is part of the infinite. Man achieves happiness by transcending the opinions that fill most minds to arrive at a true knowledge of the order and unity of the universe. This entails a calm, impersonal acceptance of all that occurs because one understands why it had to. Among the most pernicious of the false opinions men have is acceptance of the authority of institutional religions and monarchs. Gottfried Wilhelm LEIBNIZ (1646-1716) held to psychological DETERMINISM. Man is free from outer determination, but necessarily chooses what seems best. Sin results from a mistaken judgment. Moral perfection, therefore, consists of real understanding of the nature of the universe, and man's main duty is to achieve it.

English and French Theories. The English, meanwhile, were developing their own distinctive approaches to moral problems. Thomas HOBBES (1588-1679) is frankly materialistic and deterministic. Good is whatever a man desires; evil, whatever he hates. In the state of nature before the formation of states, men were more or less equally powerful and, therefore, had equal rights; being fundamentally egoistic, they were in a continual state of war, and this made their lives "nasty, brutish and short." To remedy this situation men agreed to give up their rights to a sovereign who should maintain peace and order. States are thus conventional, not natural, institutions-the source of all law and right. Because it is the most efficient, an absolute monarchy is the best. Bernard Mandeville (1670?-1733) carried on the Hobbesian tradition in maintaining that men were naturally egoistic. He went further, however, to claim that society prospers by pandering to private vices.

After Hobbes most of English ethics consists of refutations of him and the elaboration of alternative solutions to the problems he raised. Among his earlier opponents were the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS, Ralph Cudworth and Henry More, who rejected atheistic and mechanistic views in favor of a spiritualist and religious philosophy based on eternal, innate, immutable truths, the contemplation of which unites one with God. Richard Cumberland (1631-1718) denied that the laws of nature were innate, but agreed that they were knowable and unchangeable. Against Hobbes he pointed out that man is by nature social, having benevolent as well as egoistic inclinations. Since individual good is tied in with the common good, man is rationally bound to seek both. John LOCKE (1632-1704) presented moderate views that became widely accepted. On the basis of empirically established notions, he held it possible to deduce ethics and the natural law, which is the ultimate source of obligation. The state of nature was not one of war and license but one of reasonable peace and liberty. In it, all goods at first were for common use, but limited property rights over any portion of it were gained by anyone who would improve it with his labor. States are established by the consent of the people for the protection of their rights; hence the power of rulers should be limited. In the 1700s the English moralists are notable as precursors of altruism and utilitarianism, and for their moral sense theories, their continued opposition to egoistic and voluntaristic conceptions of morality, and their progressive separation of ethics from theology. (See BRITISH MORALISTS.)

In France most of the ENCYCLOPEDISTS used Locke's ideas as a foundation for materialistic EGOISM. Yet Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU (1712–78) used a different approach. Man is naturally good but is ineluctably corrupted by society. Despite this, he can feel and maintain his inner integrity by vigorously cleaving to the demands of conscience, the divine instinct that guides even the ignorant.

Kantian Ethics. Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) wanted to show how reason could arrive at necessary and certain truths when it based itself on empirical data. He did this by maintaining that knowledge of this type is gotten through the mind's imposition of its innate forms on such data. This solution, however, made scientific knowledge of nonsensible reality impossible. How then can one have an ethics? Accepting moral obligation as a fact universally admitted, one has only to uncover the principles making it possible. Influenced by Rousseau, Kant held that only a good will is unqualifiedly good. A good will is one that acts solely out of duty, out of respect for the moral law (ETHICAL FORMALISM). Kant distinguishes between hypothetical imperatives, which say what to do if one wishes to attain a given end, and categorical imperatives, which state an unconditional necessity of performing an action. The principle of all morality is the CATEGORICAL IMPERATIVE, which may receive different formulations: "So act that the maxim of your will can always at the same time be valid as a principle making universal law," or "Act so that you treat humanity, whether in your own person or in that of another, always as an end and never as a means only." Moral laws, then, simply state what is rationally necessary. If all men would obey them, one would have a society organized for rational purposes, a kingdom of ends. Acting like members of such a society, men both make and are subject to the laws. Their wills are thus autonomous. This is what gives individual value and dignity. For the moral life to make sense, however, one must postulate that he is free and immortal, and that there is a God. Thus a rational, moral faith can provide man with certitudes that go beyond the limits of science. Kant also reduces all true religion to the community of upright wills.

Idealistic Theories. In the 19th century many of the most influential thinkers developed idealistic and pantheistic systems from a Kantian basis. Ordinarily they rejected Kant's notion of a thing-in-itself behind phenomenon or appearance, and maintained that phenomena have their source in the knowing subject himself, which they then identified in one way or another with the absolute ground of all reality. Their ethics reflect their metaphysics. Johann G. FICHTE (1762-1814) recognized the primacy of the will and of moral action, as did Kant, because through them only does man attain deep insights and perfection. The will freely affirming itself is the primal reality. Since the will is rational and autonomous, morality is its free self-determination to do whatever it sees in any particular situation to be its duty. Georg W. F. HEGEL (1770-1831) held thought to be primal, instead of will. Thus the universe is the dialectical development of the Absolute Idea into self-consciousness, into "spirit." The moral life then is the objectification of the rational exigencies of spirit and, therefore, the gradual self-realization and perfection of individuals and societies. A good man is one who understands that the public good is his own and willingly subordinates himself to it. This does not mean total subjection to the arbitrary demands of a state, but rather that the latter exists to establish and maintain the greatest reasonable, personal freedom of activity. However, the fullest expression of the spirit is achieved, not in the state, but in art, religion, and philosophy. Arthur SCHOPENHAU-ER (1788–1860), like Fichte, considered the primal reality to be will, but one that is irrational. Its ceaseless craving is the source of unhappiness and makes the majority of men either selfish or malicious. Salvation consists in the denial of will by living a life of compassion, of altruism.

The second half of the century saw the universal dissemination of the Kantian-idealistic tradition (see KANT-IANISM; NEO-KANTIANISM). It was maintained in Germany by H. Cohen and P. Natorp of the "Marburg School," R. Eucken, and Eduard von HARTMANN; in England, by T. H. Green, F. H. BRADLEY, and B. Bosanquet; in France, by C. B. Renouvier and J. LACHELIER; and in the U.S., by J. ROYCE, G. H. Howison and B. P. Bowne. Its main characteristics are its emphasis on the autonomy and dignity of the person, on social process, and on teleology. It also strongly influenced the development of liberal Protestantism, in which its corrosive effect on dogmas is obvious. This brought leading liberals like F. D. E. SCHLEIERMACHER and A. RITSCHL to emphasize the moral life, which they thought of as the establishment on earth of the Kingdom of God, of a Kingdom of Ends achieved through reason and love. In America these views became widespread under the name of the "social gospel."

Naturalist Philosophies. The 19th century also saw the proliferation of naturalistic philosophies of life. The most influential of these was the POSITIVISM of Auguste COMTE (1798–1857), the founder of altruism and of sociology. Some of his more eminent followers, such as J. M. Guyau, Alfred Fouillee, and Émile DURKHEIM, rejected his cult of humanity but continued to develop a sociological approach to ethics. For Durkheim, ethics is a purely inductive study of the rules that society sets up and enforces to maintain itself. In England UTILITARIANISM attracted considerable attention. First developed along the lines of an egoistic HEDONISM by Jeremy BENTHAM (1748–1832) and James MILL (1773–1836), it was transformed by John Stuart MILL (1806–73) into an altruistic hedonism. It received a further critical development in the hands of Henry Sidgwick (1838–1900), who combined it with intuitionism.

The theory of evolution was also made the basis of an ethics. Even before Darwin had put the theory on a solid scientific footing, Herbert SPENCER (1820-1903), the century's most popular English thinker, had made it the central idea of his philosophy. The development of life entails a progressive physical and mental adaptation that will result in the eventual disappearance of evil. Human society is evolving in the direction of complete concord and cooperation, in which egoism and altruism will fuse and mutually support each other. But other evolutionists like T. H. Huxley held such optimism to be unwarranted, because civilization is not the product of evolution but of counterevolution, because ethical progress depends on combating the cosmic process. Friedrich NIETZSCHE (1844–1900) critically overhauled the ideas of Darwin and Schopenhauer: evolution advances by organisms struggling against the environment, not by adapting to it; the primal will is not the root of unhappiness and to be negated, but the source of all good. By combining these views he gave EVOLUTION and egoism a radically new interpretation. In evolving, the weaker wills, which are the masses of men, developed the Jewish-Christian ethic, a "slave-morality," because they could not take life as it is. But evolution is producing the "superman," who in his magnanimous strength faces up to the struggles of life, and thereby goes beyond conventional good and evil, transmuting old values into new ones of his own.

Another major naturalistic philosophy of life was socialism. Its earlier utopian forms were due to Claude Henri de SAINT-SIMON, Charles Fourier, and Pierre Proudhon. Rejecting Christianity as one of the main causes of man's debasement, they proclaimed secular schemes for the reorganization of society on the basis of unselfish cooperation and brotherly love, which would do away with all poverty and injustice. Their theories were later overshadowed by the "scientific" socialism of Karl MARX (1818–83), the founder of dialectical materialism. Better known as communism, it makes morality completely relative: whatever advances Communist power is good (see MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL).

Neoscholasticism. The latter half of the 19th century also witnessed the rise of neoscholasticism. Its main moralists were L. TAPARELLI D'AZEGLIO and V. CATHREIN. Against the relativism of the idealists and positivists, it maintained the view of a theocentric and immutable natural law. In social ethics it attacked the opposite errors of secularistic socialism and rugged individualism. It was the inspiration of the revolutionary social encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII (see SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL).

20th-Century Currents. In the 20th century the main points of view of the 19th found continued support. IDEALISM is represented by B. CROCE, G. GENTILE, H. J. Paton, and E. S. BRIGHTMAN; utilitarianism and intuitionism, by G. E. Moore; evolutionism, by J. Huxley; socialism, by the Communists, Nazis, and Fascists, since the more moderate socialists usually limit themselves to political and economic programs; sociological ethics, by E. Westermarck and A. Kinsey; neoscholasticism, by J. Maritain and J. Leclercq. Besides these, however, there has arisen a multitude of new schools. The more prominent include pragmatism, emotivism, analysis, evolutionism, philosophies of value and spirit, existentialism, and existential ethics.

Pragmatism. At the turn of the century PRAGMATISM was developed and popularized by William JAMES. It was only later, however, due to the efforts of John Dewey, who preferred to call it INSTRUMENTALISM, that it was worked out in detail and gained a widespread following. Dewey rejects any absolute ends, and finds in every concrete situation an end properly to be chosen within it. A good action is one that enables a person to achieve the end he has chosen. But a valid VALUE JUDGMENT is not ordered to the satisfaction of one's immediate or selfish desires. The standard is rather the well-being of both ourselves and the other members of our society.

Emotivism. The 1930s were the heyday of LOGICAL POSITIVISM, as propounded by Moritz Schlick, Rudolf Carnap, Bertrand RUSSELL, and A. J. Ayer. These men are known for their moral theory as emotivists. They maintain that propositions can make sense and be true or false only if they are analytically self-evident, like mathematical statements, or if they are empirically verifiable, like scientific truths. Ethical propositions are neither, and so they are meaningless or "non-sense." They are then only expressions of the emotions of the speaker. The statement "killing is evil" merely expresses the speaker's dislike of killing, and his wish that it be avoided. Such assertions, they hold, are basically subjective and cannot be used as universal and objective norms of conduct. Later positivists like C. L. Stevenson have insisted on the emotive character of moral predicates, but have tried to avoid the skepticism entailed in emotivism by emphasizing the importance in life of such noncognitive terms. Since these reflect attitudes that can be discussed and changed, there is a possibility for a valid ethics.

Analysis. In England since World War II the most prominent moral philosophers are of the school loosely referred to as analytical philosophy. They continue the empiricist and positivist tradition, but avoid the crudities of emotivism. They characteristically conceive ethics not as the study of how man should act, but as the study of the language used when talking about how men should act (see LINGUISTIC ANALYSIS). Their main representatives are Stephen Toulmin, R. M. Hare and P. H. Nowell-Smith.

Evolutionism. Henri BERGSON was France's most influential philosopher in the 20th century. For him evolution is the result of a living force (élan vital) manifesting itself in innumerable forms. In man it has developed two types of morality, the closed and the open. The closed is a common, compulsive morality required by society for its protection and maintained by the habits society inculcates. Open morality results from the visions of prophets and mystics, who see for man a wider ideal than that provided by society, and who would extend his limited social solidarity into a fraternity of all men by transmuting his restricted affections into a universal charity.

Value and Spirit. The philosophy of value is a movement that has attracted a large and variegated following. Taking the notion of value as a central point of reference, it tries to interrelate all things in terms of different kinds and levels of value. It had its inception in the second half of the 19th century with F. BRENTANO and A. Meinong. More recently it was given an idealistic cast by W. Windelband and H. Rickert. It received a highly influential, realistic, and almost Platonic formulation in the hands of Max SCHELER and Nicolai HARTMANN. It was developed spiritualistically by R. LE SENNE and L. LAVELLE, and from a psychologistic and relativistic point of view by C. von EHRENFELS. (See VALUE, PHILOSOPHY OF; SPIRIT, MOD-ERN PHILOSOPHIES OF.)

Existentialism. EXISTENTIALISM is likewise a name that covers several different and quite influential views. Although existentialists are much concerned with the individual and his problems, they have produced little in the way of systematic ethics because of their aversion to abstract generalization. This is especially true of M. Heidegger, K. Jaspers, and G. Marcel. On the other hand, however, J. P. Sartre and S. de Beauvoir have outlined their basic positions, which have become known as SITUA-TIONAL ETHICS. This amounts to a sort of heroic formalism. In general, existentialists insist on the necessity for each man freely to involve himself in his own concrete, uncertain situation, and to make his own decisions.

See Also: MORAL THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF; ILLUMINISM.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, MD 1946–), see index in each volume. R. A. TSANOFF, The Moral Ideals of Our Civilization (New York 1942). O. DITTRICH, Geschichte der Ethik, 4 v. (Leipzig 1926–32). F. WAGNER, Geschichte des Sittlichkeitbegriffes, 3 v. (Münster in Westfalia 1928–36). J. LECLERCQ, Les Grandes lignes de la philosophie morale (rev. ed. Paris 1954). O. LOTTIN, Psychologie et morale aux XII^e et XIII^e siè- cles, 4 v. in 6 (Louvain 1942–54). A. FOREST, et al., Le Mouvement doctrinal du XI^e au XIV^e siècle (Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 13; Paris 1951). T. E. HILL, Contemporary Ethical Theories (New York 1950). J. MACQUARRIE, Twentieth Century Religious Thought (New York 1963). A. DIHLE, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER [Stuttgart 1941 (1950–)] 6:646–796.

[G. J. DALCOURT]

ETHIOPIA

Located in northeast Africa, Ethiopia is notable as the only African nation to successfully repel the efforts of European colonialists. It is bordered on the north by Eritrea, on the northeast by Djibouti, on the east by Somalia, on the south by Kenya and on the west by Sudan. Lowlands along Ethiopia's eastern border rise to mountains in the central and southern regions, while the northeast is desert. Natural resources include reserves of gold, platinum and copper, as well as potash and natural gas. Agricultural production, which has been threatened by desertification as well as by overgrazing, deforestation and the diversion of large amounts of money to fund an ongoing border war with Eritrea, accounts for half of Ethiopia's gross domestic product and includes cereals, coffee, oilseed, sugar cane, potatoes and livestock.

Traditionally under the sway of Ethiopian emperors, the region was invaded by Italian forces under Mussolini in 1936. Former Emperor Haile Selassie returned to power in 1941, and the political realm stabilized until an economic downturn in the early 1970s prompted a military junta, the Dergue, to depose Selassie. In 1977 the authoritarian regime of Colonel Mengitsu instituted a centralized Marxist government, which did little to stabilize the economy. Enforcement of the peace was carried out through the Dergue, which caused the murder of numerous political dissidents, including the patriarch of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, in the late 1970s. Prolonged famine and the outbreak of a guerilla war in the northern province of Eritrea remained unabated, and Mengitsu was forced to resign in 1991. A new government led by the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front was successful in restoring order, until Eritrea voted to secede two years later. The country held its first multiparty elections in 1995 and began a border war with Eritrea three years later that finally showed signs of resolution in the 21st century.

Ecclesiastically, the Ethiopian Catholic Church has an archdiocese in Addis Ababa, with suffragans at Adigrat and at the Eritrean cities of Asmara (1961), Barentu (1995) and Keren (1995). The Latin-rite Church maintains apostolic prefectures at Jimma-Bonga and Gambella, and apostolic vicariates at Asawa, Harar, Meki, Nekemte and Soddo-Hosanna.

Early History. Christianity was first brought to Ethiopia by Greco-Roman traders from Egypt and Arabia, but large-scale conversion of the inhabitants was the work of St. FRUMENTIUS, consecrated metropolitan of Ethiopia by Athanasius of Alexandria in the early 4th century. Thus from the start Christianity in Ethiopia was connected with the Egyptian Church. Frumentius is credited with converting King 'Ezānā, to whom the Emperor CONSTANTI-US directed a letter, and whose religious progression is recorded on two inscriptions, the one calling him "Son of the [pagan] God Mahrem," and the other styling him a child of the Christian "Lord of the Heavens." The end of the 5th century under King Ella 'Amidā witnessed a revival of the evangelical spirit, but in the 6th century nine missionary "saints"-Za-Mikâ'êl Aragâwi, Pantalêwon, Isaac Garimâ, Afsê, Gubâ, Alêf, Yem'atâ (or Matâ), Liqânos and Sehmâ—implanted MONOPHYSITISM, which still survives, and established monastic communities.

John of Ephesus records that in the 6th century, King Andog was baptized and asked Justin I or Justinian to send priests and a bishop to Ethiopia. Simultaneously, Cosmas Indicopleustes, visiting the cities of Adulis and Aksum, found a great number of Christians. In 523 King Kalēb (canonized as St. Elesbaan) led an expedition across the Red Sea into Yemen to avenge the massacre of the Christian martyrs of NAJRAN. At this time Ethiopia controlled territory extending over Tigré, Shoa and Amhara. Thereafter, because of a series of revolutions in which records of previous dynasties were destroyed, little else is known until the 13th century.

Church in Axum, Ethiopia. (©Cory Langley)

The Ethiopian Church maintained ties with the Mediterranean world through its hierarchical dependence on the Coptic patriarchate of Alexandria and through frequent pilgrimages to the Holy Land, possibly initiated as a counterpart of the journey to Mecca of Ethiopia's Muslim enemies. Ethiopians in Jerusalem and the Ethiopian monks in Egypt offering hospitality to pilgrims were thus in contact with Christians from other parts of the world. In Ethiopia itself the native clergy was denied independent authority by the Alexandrian patriarchate, which based its claim to supreme jurisdiction on the consecration of St. Frumentius and also on a pseudocanon of the Council of Nicaea that denied autonomy to Ethiopia. Hence the prelates and clerics attached to the royal court used their influence with the king to direct internal politics and were in competition with the regular clergy in the well-landed monasteries, whose authority was concentrated in the provinces.

Church Doctrine Forms. In the 14th century prelates, clerics and regular clergy clashed openly, masking their true interests with theological disputes over such questions as the observance of Christmas and other feasts, fast days and the inheritance by the king of his father's wives. In the second half of the 15th century a settlement was finally reached. The Coptic patriarchate of Egypt was given authority over the whole Ethiopian Church, but the monastic clergy remained under the Ethiopian abbot of the monastery of Dabra Libānos, who was given the title "ečagē."

In the 14th and 15th centuries the Ethiopian Church had to contend with two heresies. The Mikaelites taught a doctrine of Gnostic origin, influenced by dualism, citing 1 Tm 6.16 and Jn 1.18, and maintaining that God is not cognizable and that man can approach supreme knowledge only by degrees and under the guidance of selected masters. They elaborated this doctrine with a theogony of successive emanations and the secret interpretation of Holy Scripture. The second group of heretics, the Stephanites, did not venerate the cross or the Blessed Virgin. Although repressed by Ethiopian kings, especially Zare'a Yā'qob (1436–68), these heresies continued in isolated monasteries into the second half of the 16th century.

Western Influence. Early in the 16th century Portugal sent an army to help Ethiopia defeat the Emir of Harar, Ahmed ibn Ibrāhīm, one of many Muslim aggressors over the years. Jesuit missions, sent by St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA, soon followed, beginning a new period of cultural and religious history. After years of labor by Patriarch Andrea Oviedo, Pero Páez persuaded King Susneos to conclude a union with the Catholic Church in 1614. After Páez's death, however, the local church, especially the monasteries, raised objections, mainly in regard to the replacing of the ancient ETHIOPIAN (GE'EZ) LITURGY by the Latin liturgy; and King Fasiladas, who succeeded Susneos in 1632, renewed ties with the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria. The Jesuit mission did bear two important results: first, an increase in Western knowledge of the history, ethnology and religion of Ethiopia, contained in the collection, Rerum Aethiopicarum Scriptores Occidentales; and second, the adoption of the modern Amharic language in religious writings to replace the ancient Ge'ez.

Christology. From the 17th to the 19th century the Ethiopian Church was divided by a dispute over "the Unction and the Union," which involved the interpretation of Acts 10.38: "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Spirit and with power." This passage referred to the union of the two natures in Christ and the unction of the Holy Spirit in that union. In 1879 King John IV ended the dispute by making the entire Ethiopian Church accept the Monophysite doctrine of the northern monasteries, which was that of the patriarch of Alexandria. Like the Egyptians, the Ethiopians consider EUTY-CHES a heretic, yet remain Monophysite and reject the Catholic doctrine of two natures in Christ. Two schools of thought explain their teaching: the Walda-geb (Sons of Unction) hold that the two natures are radically unified: the divine nature absorbs the human to such an extent that the manhood is merely a phantasm; the Sons of Grace teach that the unification takes place in such a way that the nature of Christ becomes a special nature, and this work is attributed to the Father. The latter school also holds that the unification is completed not through the unction itself but through what is called the adoptive birth of Christ. It recognizes in the Incarnation three kinds of birth: the Word begotten by the Father; Christ begotten of Mary; and finally, the Son of Mary, begotten Son of God, the Father, through adoption, or by His elevation to divinity, and this is accomplished by the Father anointing the Son with the Holy Spirit. Both schools hold that the unification takes place with no blending, no change and no confusion. The contradictions inherent in this dogma are treated as mysteries by Ethiopian theologians.

Except for the problem of the progression of the Holy Ghost (in regard to which the Ethiopians follow the Byzantine teaching) and the humanity of Christ, the Ethiopian Church holds all other articles of faith professed by the Catholic Church.

The Modern Church. In the late 19th century the Ethiopian Church followed the development of the state under the reign of Menelik and renewed contacts with the Western world. In 1878 King John IV had a metropolitan and three bishops—all Egyptians—consecrated for Ethiopia by the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria. In December 1926, on the death of the metropolitan Matthew, the younger clergy demanded an Ethiopian. In June 1929 a compromise was arranged to have an Egyptian, the Abuna Cyril, consecrated as metropolitan, but four Ethiopians consecrated as bishops.

In 1936, while both Ethiopia and Eritrea were under Italian occupation, the Ethiopian clergy ousted Cyril and elected one of its own bishops, the Abuna Abraham, as metropolitan. On Abraham's death in 1939 he was succeeded by the Abuna John. After the British occupied the region in 1941, Cyril returned, and in 1949 an agreement was reached whereby the patriarch of Alexandria would appoint an Ethiopian as metropolitan.

Catholic Missions. After the Jesuit penetration in the 17th century, two Ethiopian Capuchin missionaries were assassinated (1638). The enterprise was abandoned until 1838, when the Vincentian G. Sapeto established a house at Aduwa, and in 1852, 15 native priests were ordained from a seminary established by Giustino de JACO-BIS, who had converted more than 5,000 Coptic schismatics at Adawa and Tigré. A persecution under the Negus Theodore resulted in the martyrdom of native priest Abba Ghebré Michael, in 1855.

In 1846 the Capuchins started a mission in the apostolic vicariate of Galla, and the future Cardinal Guglielmo Massaia became the great apostle and opened a seminary at Kaffa. In 1881 Father Taurin Chagne opened a foundation at Harar, and in 1915 Father Marie-Bernard founded an indigenous congregation of sisters.

In 1937 an apostolic delegation was erected at Addis Ababa with nine missions, three vicariates (Addis Ababa,

Bronze bishop's crown, 18th century, Azum, Ethiopia. (©Dave Bartruff/CORBIS)

Gimma and Harar) and four prefectures (Dessie, Gondar, Neghelli and Tigré), to which Endeber and Hosanna were added in 1940. The territory north of Addis Ababa was subject to the Congregation for the Oriental Churches, and the rest, to the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith. On Feb. 12, 1930, Pope Pius XI erected the Ethiopian College, founded in the Vatican in 1919 by Benedict XV, into a Pontifical College confided to the care of the Capuchins under the vicar-general for the Vatican. Addis Ababa was raised to an apostolic internunciature in 1957 and was established as a metropolitan see in 1961. On May 25, 1985 the country gained its first cardinal, Archbishop Paulos Tzadua (b. 1921), who had served as archbishop of Addis Ababa since 1977.

By the late 20th century, with Ethiopia enmeshed in a bloody border war with Eritrea, other problems faced the nation, the result of both wide-scale drought, refugees and the inevitable modernization of its economy. By 2000 a movement was underway by Ethiopian women's groups to legalize abortion, the illegal practice of which was touted as a leading cause of death for pregnant women under age 20. Members of both Orthodox and Catholic churches responded that enforcement and counseling should be employed instead. In an effort to counter the effects of an extended famine in the region, in 2001, Pope John Paul II gave $100,000 to Ethiopia through his private charity, Cor Unum.

Church of Saint Maryam, 12th–13th Century, Lalibal, Ethiopia. (©Roger Wood/CORBIS)

In 2000 Ethiopia had 192 active parishes, with 142 diocesan and 271 religious priests active among the faithful. In addition, 68 brothers and 719 sisters worked to ensure the health, welfare and spiritual and moral education of all Ethiopians through their humanitarian efforts and the operation of Church schools. Going into the 21st century the Church attempted to foster good relations with Ethiopia's other minority Christian faiths, as well as with the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, as the nation faced the moral and spiritual complexities involved with modernization. By 2001, as efforts between Eritrea and Ethiopia resulted in peace negotiations and the withdrawal of troops, there was hope that both the Church and the government could once again devote full attention to strengthening Ethiopian society and addressing the problems of refugees and of the poor.

Bibliography: Rerum Aethiopicarum Scriptores Occidentales, ed. C. BECCARI, 15 v. (Rome 1903–17). E. CERULLI, Scritti teologici etiopici dei secoli XVI e XVII, 2 v. (Studi e Testi 198, 204; Vatican City 1958–60); "Il Mistero della Trinità: Manuale di teologia della Chiesa Etiopica," Orientalia Christiana periodica, 12 (1946) 47–129.

[F. X. MURPHY/EDS.]

ETHIOPIAN (GE'EZ) CATHOLIC CHURCH

Beginnings. According to Rufinius, a fourth-century Byzantine theologian, Ethiopia's conversion to Christianity began with two Syrian boys, Frumentius and Aedisius, who were aboard a ship in the Red Sea when it was seized off the Ethiopian coast. The boys were taken to Axum where the king, Ella Amida, appointed Aedisius his cupbearer and FRUMENTIUS his secretary. Before his death, Ella Amida gave the two Syrians their freedom. Eventually, Aedisius returned to Tyre, while Frumentius traveled to Alexandria. The young man begged Patriarch ATHANASIUS to send a bishop to provide pastoral care for the growing number of Christians in and around Axum, the capital of Ethiopia. Frumentius was chosen to be that bishop and was duly consecrated bishop of Axum by Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria. Before returning to Axum at some time around 340, Frumentius had spent approximately five years in Egypt studying liturgy, theology, and the customary practices of the Alexandrian church.

As the first bishop, and recognized as the apostle of Ethiopia, Frumentius, ("Abba Salama Kasasate Berhan," "Peaceable Father, who made Manifest the Light," as he is called in Ethiopia) brought with him the celebration of the liturgy that he had been using in Alexandria. The question might be asked: What anaphora did he use? A satisfactory answer to that question may remain unresolved. But working backward from today's liturgy, both Ethiopian Orthodox and Catholic, pride of place is to be given to the very first anaphora of the Ethiopian missal, "The Anaphora of the Apostles." In its present form, that anaphora can be identified as an expanded text of the ancient anaphora in the Apostolic Tradition, commonly attributed to Hippolytus. Of all the churches, only the Ethiopian Church has preserved and used continuously throughout the centuries this ancient anaphora. In the Ethiopian missal the second anaphora is that of "Our Lord." This text is based on a fourth century Syrian document and represents an embellishment of "The Anaphora of the Apostles." With only one exception, today's Ethiopian missal as used by the Ethiopian Orthodox and Catholics is the same. That exception is an inclusion in the Catholic missal of "The Anaphora of St. Mark," but it is not from Alexandria.

Initially, Greek would have been the liturgical language for the simple reason that the liturgy originated in Alexandria, where Greek continued to be the liturgical language until after the Council of Chalcedon. But as Frumentius's apostolic endeavors radiated beyond urban to rural areas, Greek was eventually superceded by Ge'ez, the local language. Toward the end of the fifth century, the Ethiopian liturgy underwent Syrian and Armenian influences with the arrival of the "Nine Saints" from "Rum," the Byzantine Empire. In all probability the "Nine Saints" were the leaders of a large band of immigrants fleeing persecution in the Byzantine Empire after the Council of CHALCE-DON. Whether or not they were anti-Chalcedonian or pro-Chalcedonian is a matter of some conjecture, but in this context their religious affiliation is irrelevant as Eucharistic matters had not been a significant issue at the Council of Chalcedon. These "Saints" are credited with having translated the Gospels and other sacred books into Ge'ez. Confirmation of this Syrian influence lies in the fact that the text of the Gospels translated into Ge'ez was not that used in Alexandria but in Syria.

Centuries of isolation. On 2 Sept. 1441, at the Council of FLORENCE, the head of the Ethiopian delegation from their monastery in Jerusalem told Pope Eugene IV:

The separation of other Churches was the effect of voluntary rebellion, while the separation of our Church cannot be explained due to rebellion or inconstancy, but due to distance and difficulty of travel in order to reach you. . . . For 800 years, until today, no one before you has addressed a word of greetings to us.

There is not a single document or a single date that indicates Ethiopia's severance from the Apostolic See of Rome and an adoption of, or formal declaration of assent to MONOPHYSITISM. Even today, the Orthodox Church of Ethiopia condemns both Eutyches and Nestorius as heretics. It is, therefore, theologically inaccurate to label the Ethiopian Orthodox Church as being Monophysite. Rather the Church would claim that its christology is based on that of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, whose writings predated the Council of Chalcedon.

During those eight hundred years of silence Ethiopia had been isolated from the world outside. Throughout those and subsequent centuries the celebration of the Eucharist in Ethiopia continued, however, in its traditional form. But outside of the country developments had taken place in the celebration of the Eucharist, more so in the Latin Church than in the Oriental Churches. As one of the Oriental Churches, the Church of Ethiopia only gradually became aware of differences in the celebration of the Eucharist as contact was resumed with missionaries from the Latin Church. In the wake of Ahmad ibn Ibrahim's ("Gragn," the left-handed) onslaught into the highlands of Ethiopia that began in 1529 those contacts increased with the arrival of Portuguese military assistance. Within five years of Gragn's final defeat in 1543, the Catholic Church had accepted the celebration of Eucharist according to the Ethiopian liturgical rite. In 1548 Pope Pius III had approved the printing of an Ethiopian missal containing a selection of anaphoras complied by Abba Petros Tesfatsion.

Encounter breeds confrontation. In 1557 Bishop Andre de Oviedo accompanied by five Jesuits and a small party of servants landed at Arkiko. Shortly after arriving at Gondar Bishop Oviedo antagonised the imperial court and was banished to a site between Axum and Adwa, which they called Fremona. They had been forbidden to proselytize among Ethiopians but were permitted to minister to other Portuguese and their offsprings. In that capacity, undoubtedly, they would have used the Latin rite. The last of the Jesuits who had accompanied Bishop Oviedo died at Fremona, aged, 80, in 1597. Only six years later, in 1603, did the next Jesuit, Fr. Pedro Paez, arrive. The following year, on 20th June, and only in response to repeated requests from Emperor Za-Dengel, Fr. Paez celebrated Eucharist in the presence of the emperor according to the Latin rite, read the Gospel in Ge'ez and preached in Amharic.

During his nineteen years in Ethiopia Fr. Paez repeatedly tried to reconcile the different theological terms used by both sides to express their Christology. Perhaps his efforts in this regard bore fruit later as Emperor Fasilidas wrote to the then expelled Patriarch Mendes.

> But this matter (of Christology) is not so important as it is not the reason why the people have withdrawn from us. . . The cause of dissent is to be found in being deprived of Christ's Blood at Communion. Neither is it for that reason alone that we displeased the people, but also because the Wednesday fast is violated and all the feasts of the year are changed from their established days to other dates. . . .

Fr. Paez does seem, however, to have achieved a degree of mutual understanding during his lifetime with regard to the celebration of Eucharist. In areas that were traditionally Christian, Ethiopian Catholic priests used an Ethiopian Ge'ez missal for the celebration of Eucharist. But only two anaphoras were retained and they had been purified of any anti-Chalcedonian insinuations. The name of Pope Leo, for example, had replaced that of DIOS-CORUS. When the Jesuits, however, undertook missionary work beyond the traditional Christian territory, as they did among the Agaw, beginning in 1618, they used the Latin rite, language and vestments.

Three years after the death of Fr. Paez, Patriarch Alfonso Mendes reached Fremona in 1625. From the moment of his arrival Patriarch Mendes vigorously pursued the total Latinization of the Ethiopian Church. To provide pastoral care for the 160,000 Ethiopian Catholics scattered over a vast area, Mendes ordained 20 Ethiopian priests in December 1625. But in the following year, on Feb. 12, he proclaimed that all Ethiopian priests were suspended until such time as he had individually approved each one. He even imposed the use of the Latin rite in monasteries that were traditionally of the Ethiopian liturgical rite. To mollify the mounting hostility to Latinization, Emperor Susenyos, who had become a Catholic in 1622, asked Mendes in 1627 that Ethiopian Catholic priests might be allowed to retain the use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite. His request was refused. Again, in June 1629 and in December of that year, the request was repeated, but on each occasion Mendes refused.

With greater perspicacity than the Patriarch, Emperor Susenyos issued a proclamation in 1631 to the effect that Ethiopians "might follow their ancient customs provided they were not repugnant to the faith." Mendes insisted that the proclamation be rescinded. A ferocious religious battle ensued with the loss of 8000 lives. Even though Susenyos had won the battle he was so depressed that he granted his subjects freedom of religion. Subsequently, Patriarch Mendes and the Jesuits were expelled from Ethiopia.

After his expulsion from Ethiopia, Mendes may have regretted his intransigence, but it was too late. The damage had been done. The deep-seated antagonism between the Ethiopian and the Latin celebration of the Eucharist had taken root; one was indigenous, the other was a foreign imposition. This tragic, sad, historical episode illustrates, however, that, at least in part, there had been at that time a Catholic celebration of the Eucharist according to the Ethiopian liturgical rite.

Renewed initiatives. Over the following 150 years of the approximately twenty papal initiatives to reactivate the mission to Ethiopia, only two are significant to the use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite by the Catholic Church. On May 3, 1640, Fr. James Wemmers, a Flemish Carmelite, was given a papal brief to make the overland journey to Ethiopia. The words of the brief allow for the use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite.

Wemmers knows well the Ethiopian language and by orders of His Holiness the missionaries have been given instructions not to change the Ethiopian rite, but only to recommend union with the Holy See . . . and (so) with the hope that the priests will be able to appease both the archbishop and the monks as it was they who chased away the Jesuit priests for having changed the rite. . . .''

Wemmers was consecrated Vicar Apostolic of Ethiopia in late 1644 but, unfortunately, died at Naples when about to embark for Egypt.

The second initiative involved an Ethiopian priest, Abba Tobia Ghiorghis Gebreziabhier, who was studying in Rome between 1782 and 1788. On April 21, 1788, the Holy See issued a decree nominating Abba Tobia as the Titular Bishop of Adulis. As a condition to being consecrated bishop the decree specified that the nominee should take an oath to retain the use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite. As if to underline the significance of that oath Abba Tobia was consecrated bishop on June 24, 1788 using the Byzantine liturgical rite. Towards the end of 1789 the bishop arrived in the north of Ethiopia. For the next eight years the bishop led a furtive apostolic life as the Coptic Patriarch of Egypt had sentenced him to death. As he feared dying alone and without the sacraments, Bishop Tobia eventually left Ethiopia in early 1797. In Egypt, on May 7, 1801 he died of the plague. Apart from the robes and episcopal vestments of Bishop Tobia, which are still preserved in the monastery of Debre Damo, there is no trace left in Ethiopia of his years of furtive apostolate.

Abiding initiative. Pope Gregory XVI appointed Justin de Jacobis, C.M., as Prefect Apostolic of Abyssinia on March 10, 1839. Msgr. J. de Jacobis, eventually, arrived at his original residence in Adwa, Tigray, on Oct. 29, 1839. Some seven years later, on May 4, 1846, the original Prefecture was divided by the establishment of the Apostolic Vicariate of the Sudan to the west and the Apostolic Vicariate of the Galla to the south. In the following year, June 19, 1847, the Prefecture of Abyssinia was made the Apostolic Vicariate of Abyssinia, which included Tigray (also Eritrea prior to the colonial occupation), Amhara, Shewa, Wello, Gondar and Gojjam.

While making his journey southwards to his Apostolic Vicariate of the Galla, Msgr. G. Massaia passed through Gual'a, the residence of Msgr. de Jacobis, in late December 1846. Msgr. Massaia, since he had already been consecrated a bishop, performed the ordination of several Ethiopian Catholic priests. Although Msgr. Massaia had been authorized to ordain the priests according to the Latin rite it was understood that they belonged to and would exercise their ministry according to the Ethiopian liturgical rite. For the following Easter Msgr. de Jacobis, together with four of the newly ordained priests, went to Alitiena where they solemnly celebrated Easter according to the Ethiopian liturgical rite. A Papal Bull of July 6, 1847 granted Msgr. De Jacobis permission to carry out "all the sacred functions according to the Abyssinian rite." Pope Pius IX renewed and extended the earlier permission for the use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite in a decree dated April 21, 1850. This decree also stated that: (1) both Msgr. de Jacobis and his missionaries who are of the Latin rite "may carry out the sacred functions in the Abssinian rite," and (2) when they were "celebrating in the Abyssinian rite . . . those who normally use unleavened bread may use leavened bread."

Confirmation of the Vicariate's personnel's use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite and its practices has been provided by Fr. Poussou, C.M., who carried out an official visitation in December 1851. He reported that, in accordance with the practice of the Ethiopian liturgical rite, individual priests did not celebrate a private daily Mass. There was only one Eucharist daily at which the community attended. On Sundays, or major feast days, the bishop usually sang the Eucharist. There was no frequent Communion as members of the community only received on Fridays and Sundays.

Attitude of subsequent vicars apostolic. Monsignor M. Touvier was consecrated in Rome as the fourth Vicar Apostolic of the Vicariate of Abyssinia on April 30, 1870. During an audience with Pope Pius IX on May 4, 1870, the faculties permitting the use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite, as granted to Msgr. Touvier's predecessors, were renewed. In addition, the authorization to celebrate Low Mass, as originally requested by a previous Vicar Apostolic, Msgr. Bel, but never granted, was now conceded.

At that time other Latin practices were introduced such as the use of unleavened bread for the Eucharist and the distribution of Holy Communion under only one species, i.e., bread. This practice, however, was not immediately put into effect. It is on record that for the feast of the Holy Cross on Sept. 27, 1877, Fr. Coulbeaux together with six Ethiopian priests celebrated Eucharist in the Ethiopian liturgical rite at Maibrazio. All the members of the congregation received Holy Communion under both species.

In 1882 Msgr. Massaia wrote a scathing repudiation of the validity of the Ethiopian liturgical rite. Perhaps he had overlooked the repeated renewal by the Holy See of its authorization to use the Ethiopian liturgical rite. Moreover, between 1866 and 1882 there had been at least five authoritative replies addressed to various vicars apostolic clarifying in detail the use and practice of the Ethiopian liturgical rite. Msgr. Touvier was obliged to answer the repudiation of the rite that had been made. He admitted that the thirteen anaphoras of the Eucharist that had been revised and so considered to be "catholic" needed further study.

After Msgr. Touvier's death in August 1888, Msgr. J. Crouzet was consecrated Vicar Apostolic on Oct. 28, 1888. The Holy See asked him to carry out an in-depth review of the Ethiopian liturgical rite. A commission began the work in July 1889. With undue precipitation the Holy See issued a decree on July 10, 1890 that the Latin rite translated into Ge'ez was to replace the Ethiopian liturgical rite. But that did not impede the work of the established commission. Finally, on Nov. 8, 1891 Msgr. Crouzet informed the Holy See that fourteen anaphoras, dated 1890, had been revised, printed and circulated. The Vicar Apostolic explained that he had not given his "imprimatur" to the revised anaphoras, as they could not be considered as definitive. Nevertheless, the priests had been authorized to use the Missal, ad interim, for the celebration of Eucharist. With regard to the administration of the sacraments it is worth noting that only during the time of Msgr. Crouzet was the custom abolished of administering Holy Communion and Confirmation at the rite of Baptism.

The Holy See had not renounced its intention to impose the Latin Mass translated into Ge'ez, as was made clear when Fr. M. da Carbonara, O.F.M. Cap., the new Prefect Apostolic of the Italian colony, was entrusted with that responsibility in February 1895. By as late as 1907, however, when nothing concrete had been forthcoming, the exasperation of the Holy See was expressed in a letter dispatched to the Prefect Apostolic. He replied by stating that for a variety of reasons he was now opposed to the adoption of the Latin liturgy translated into Ge'ez. But perhaps the deathblow to the Holy See's initiative was dealt by Fr. E. Gruson, C.M. who wrote from Alitiena:

> The Latin Mass translated into Ge'ez is not unknown. In the XVIIth century the Jesuits did try to introuce it. And we all know the fate that the Abyssinians's attachment to their traditional rite reserved for it.

When Msgr. C. Carrara succeeded Fr. Da Carbonara in 1912 he wanted to reprint the original missal of 1890. Twenty-two years had passed and eighteen years since the original decision to translate the Latin Mass into Ge'ez, but nothing had come of it. Now for the first time, in a dispatch dated Feb. 25, 1913, the Holy See gave its official approval for the reprinting of the original Mass. Henceforth, the Catholic use of the Ethiopian liturgical rite could no longer be questioned. And in the intervening years it has simply been a matter of editing and reprinting the Catholic Ethiopian missal.

Bibliography: A. ALBERTO, The Apostolic Vicariate of the Gallas (1846–1938): Three of Its Vicars: Massaja, Cahange, Jarosseau (Rome 1993). J. BANDRES, "The Ethiopian Anaphora of the Apostles: Historical Considerations," Proche-Orient Chretien 36 (1986): 6–13. T. BEINE, La Politica Cattolica di Seltan Sagad I (1607–1632) e la Missione della Compagnia di Gesu in Etiopia (Rome 1983). P. CARAMAN, The Lost Empire: The Story of the Jesuits in Ethiopia, 1555–1634 (Notre Dame 1985). D. CRUMMEY, Priests and Politicians: Protestant and Catholic Missions in Orthodox Ethiopia, 1830–1868 (Oxford 1971). K. O'MAHONEY, The Ebullient Phoenix: A History of the Vicariate of Abyssinia, 3 v. (Asmara, Addis Ababa 1982–1992); "Abune Tobia and His Apostolic Predecessors," Quaderni di Studi Etiopici 8–9 (1987–1988): 102–171; The Spirit and the Bride: A Manual of Church History (Addis Ababa 1994). A. PAULOS The Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahido

Interior of Ethiopian Church, Jerusalem. (©Shai Ginott/CORBIS)

Church: Faith, Order of Worship and Ecumenical Relations (Addis Ababa 1995). A. TAKLA-HAYMANOT, The Ethiopian Church and Its Christological Doctrine (Addis Ababa 1982).

[K. O'MAHONEY]

ETHIOPIAN (GE'EZ) LITURGY

The Ethiopic Liturgy is broadly similar to the COPTIC LITURGY, but translated into Ge'ez, ancient Ethiopian. The Ethiopian Divine Liturgy can be divided into two parts: (1) the Pre-anaphora including entrance, incensing and preparation of the altar, blessing and offering of the bread and wine, prayers of thanksgiving and petition, trisagion, Epistle, Gospel, dismissal of catechumens, and Creed; and (2) the Anaphora including prayer for peace, the Gloria and the Kiss of Peace, the Preface, Sanctus, Consecration, Anamnesis, Epiclesis, fraction, Lord's Prayer, elevation, consignation (a moistening of the Host with the Precious Blood), commingling of the Sacred Species, Communion, prayer of thanksgiving, and the final blessing of the faithful.

Traditionally, there are as many as 17 Anaphoras (Eucharistic Prayers) in the Ethiopian Liturgical Books, although that "Of the Apostles" is most commonly used. Church buildings, often with open sides and thatched roof, are generally circular or octagonal in design, although some are rectangular. Church interiors are usually divided into three concentric circles, marked off by high partitions: for the altar, the singers, and the assembly. For liturgical services other than the Divine Liturgy, drumbeating, hand-clapping, and the jangling of sistra set the rhythm of the singing. Fasting is frequent and rigorous. Worthy of note, too, are remnants of an early Jewish influence, e.g., ritual purification for mothers, and distinction between clean and unclean meats.

Bibliography: D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East (rev. ed. Milwaukee 1961) 1:138–146; 2:193–203. S. MERCER, The Ethiopic Liturgy (Milwaukee 1915). A. HÄNGGI & I. PAHL, Prex Eucharistica (Freiburg 1968).

[E. E. FINN/EDS.]

ETHIOPIANS (CUSHITES)

Inhabitants of ancient Cush (Chus, Heb. kûš), the region between the first and the sixth cataract of the Nile, roughly equivalent to Nubia, i.e., the southern part of modern Egypt and the northern part of modern Sudan. The Septuagint called the Cushites Ai θ io π ϵ c, which was the Greek term for all swarthy-skinned people south of Egypt; hence the terms Æthiopes in the Latin Vulgate and "Ethiopians" in the Douay Version of the Bible. But modern ETHIOPIA, which is another name for Abyssinia, is far to the south of ancient Cush.

In several periods during the 3d and 2d millennia B.C., especially when the Egyptians had powerful Pharaohs, as in the 12th and again in the 18th and 19th Dynasties, Cush was made subject to Egypt, so that Egyptian culture exercised considerable influence on Cush. However, from about the 11th century onward Cush was an independent kingdom, with its capital at Meroë on the east bank of the Nile between the 5th and the 6th cataracts. In 716 B.C. its King Pi'ankhi (751-710) invaded Egypt and established there the 25th or Ethiopian Dynasty. His successors, who ruled both at Meroë and at THEBES, Shabako (710-696), Shebteko (696-685), and Taharqo (685-663), called themselves" Kings of Cush and Egypt." Although the conquest of Thebes in 671 B.C. put an end to Cushite rule in Egypt, Meroë remained the capital of an independent but ever-weakening kingdom until the 4th century of the Christian Era.

While the kindred terms Cush/Cushites and Ethiopia/Ethiopians occur at least 30 times in the OT, a single reference occurs in the NT (Acts 8.26-40). The terms have a geographic and ethnographic reference. According to the Table of the Nations, Cush was a descendant of Ham (Gn 10.8) and the ancestor of several peoples in southern Arabia (Gn 10.9). According to Gn 2.13, "all the land of Cush" was encircled by the Gihon, one of the four legendary rivers of PARADISE. Because of the union of Cush and Egypt in the 8th and 7th centuries B.C., the Prophets often mention Cush in connection with Egypt (Is 20.3–5; 43.3; 45.14; Ez 30.4, 9) or with Phut and Libya (Jer 46.9; Ez 30.5; Na 3.9).

The literary characterization of Ethiopians/Ethiopia in the Bible is variegated. Amos 9:7–8 portrays Ethiopians as a people living at a distance from Israel. While some commentators have assumed that this passage disparages the Ethiopians as an uncivilized nation of slaves, in fact, at the time of Amos' ministry (c. 750 B.C.), an Ethiopian dynasty ruled autonomously, and prosperously, in the Upper Nile Valley. Jer 13.23 makes a reference to the swarthy complexion of the Cushites: "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard its spots?" perhaps a well-known proverb, framed as a rhetorical question. The prophet highlights the immutability of skin color as a hyperbole, to underscore the magnitude of Judah's intransigence.

Ethiopia is renowned in the OT as a land of valiant warriors and military strength (2 Chr 12.2–12; 14.8–13; 16.7–8; Is 20.1–6; Jer 46.2, 8–9; Ez 38.4–5; Na 3.8–10) and is rich in wealth (Is 45.14–15; Dn 11.43; Job 28.17–19). Notwithstanding their reputation, elsewhere, for being a people far-distant from Israel's borders, the OT attests to the historical presence of Ethiopians within Israel/Palestine. They may have arrived there, originally, as war-captives, since Ethiopians frequently served as mercenaries in foreign armies, or possibly as diplomatic envoys (Is 8.1–7). In Israel, they served in the military (1 Sm 18.21–23; 31–32) and even married the indigenous Jews (Jer 36.14; Zep 1.1; Ps 7).

An Ethiopian, Ebed-melech, an official at the royal court in Judah, rescues the prophet Jeremiah from his punishment at the hands of King Zedekiah. The kindness of this outsider to the persecuted prophet dovetails another biblical theme concerning Ethiopians. The Prophets forecast their inclusion among the chosen people, when the Gentile nations gather at Mt. Zion to worship the God of Israel (Is 11.10–11; Jer 39.15–18; Zep 2.10–12; 3.9–10; Ps 68.29–32; 87.1–7).

Acts 8.26–39 recounts the conversion to Christianity of the treasurer of "Candace, Queen of Ethiopia." That Candace is not a personal name, but rather the title of all the queens of the Meroitic kingdom, indicates that the Ethiopian official stands as an emblem or ambassador for his entire nation, a Gentile people, to whom God has gratuitously extended, according to Luke-Acts, the promise of salvation.

Bibliography: M. STACHOW, "Do You Understand What You Are Reading" (Acts 8:30): A Historical-Critical Reexamination of the Pericope of Philip and the Ethiopian (Acts 8:26-40) (Dissertation, The Catholic University of America, Washington D.C. 1998). B. G. TRIGGER, Ancient Egypt: A Social History (Cambridge 1983). J. A. FITZMYER, The Acts of the Apostles, Anchor Bible v. 31 (New York 1998).

[J. B. WHEATON/EDS.]

ETIOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)

The term may be briefly defined as the assignment of a cause or reason for a custom, a name, etc. This article discusses first the concept of etiology, then the use of etiology in biblical narratives, and finally the question of the historical value of such narratives.

Concept. The word etiology is derived from the Greek $\alpha i \tau i \alpha$, which means cause. In the field of literature a narrative is said to be etiological when it attempts to explain the origins of some custom or institution, some monument or natural phenomenon; when it tries to answer the question why or how does it come about that such and such a thing is what it is today. The subject material ranges from the banal ("How did the pig get a curly tail?") to the basic problems concerning human and cosmic origins. The explanation given is often of a popular, unscientific nature.

In the Bible. Many parts of Scripture abound in etiological narratives, observations, and incidental remarks of all sorts. One simple type of etiology that is found quite often seeks to explain through popular etymology the reason why a particular person or place received such a name: e.g., in Gn 2.23 it is said that ADAM's partner was called woman (Heb. ' $i\check{s}\check{s}\hat{a}$) because she was taken from man ('is); in 3.20 he named her EVE (hawwâ) because she was the mother of all the living $(h\bar{a}y)$; and Eve called her firstborn Cain (qayin) because she had gotten (qānîtî) a male child with the help of Yahweh (Gn 4.1); and the city with the half-built tower was called Babel (see TOWER OF BABEL) because there Yahweh confused (bālal) the builders' language (Gn 11.9). At times more than one explanation is given for the same name: Isaac ($yish\bar{a}q$), which means "he laughs" or "may he laugh," has given rise to various scenes of laughter in the Genesis narrative. Abraham falls on his face and laughs ($yish\bar{a}q$) when God promises him another son, in spite of his age (Gn 17.17); Sara has a similar reaction when she overhears the same promise (Gn 18.9-15); and once Isaac is born, she says that God has given her cause for laughter, and whoever will hear of it will laugh with her (Gn 21.6). There are narratives that explain the origins of sacred places, such as Beer-lahai-roi (Gn 16.7-14) and Bethel (Gn 28.11–22). Others attempt to give an account of various religious practices (CIRCUMCISION, in Gn 17.9-14 and Ex 4.24–26; the SABBATH, in the divine precedent of Gn 2.2-3). The Book of ESTHER intends to show how the feast of PURIM began. An etiological preoccupation is particularly evident in several narratives of the Book of JOSHUA, where the formula, "and so it has remained to this day," or its equivalent, continually recurs (Jos 4.9; 5.9; 6.25; 7.26; 8.28, 29; 9.27; 10.27; etc.). Sometimes a single narrative contains several etiologies: for example, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19) succeeds in explaining why the region south of the Dead Sea is so desolate, why there is only one city in that area, why the name of that city is Segor, and how a woman-shaped pillar of salt came into existence. It also explains in a rather disparaging way the origin of the MOABITES and the Ammonites.

The Bible, however, contains etiological material of a much more profound intent. In Gn 2.21–24 the author explains why "a man leaves his father and mother, and clings to his wife, and the two become one flesh"; by means of the narrative of the rib he suggests that the union of man and woman in marriage is a return to a primitive unity. The story emphasizes that the distinction of the sexes is willed by God [see SEX (IN THE BIBLE)] and that marriage is instituted by Him. Chapters 2 and 3 attempt to explain man's present unhappy state, including the fact of DEATH, the hard lot of a farmer trying to eke out a living from a rocky soil, woman's attraction for man in spite of the harsh treatment she received from him in the ancient East [see WOMAN (IN THE BIBLE)], and the necessity of wearing clothes (see NUDITY), by the story of the fall of man from a far happier state (see PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE). Similarly, Gn 11.1–9 does not merely explain the origin of the place-name Babel, but seeks to give a reason why humanity, although one in origin, now finds itself dispersed in various localities throughout the world, each people speaking its own language.

Historical Value. The question arises: what is the historical value of such narratives? The profusion and diversity of the material at hand make a general answer impossible. Two points may be made, however. First, the factor of inspiration does not change the character of the literary form utilized; there is no reason to believe that etiology in the Bible has greater historical value than etiology outside the Bible. So the question of historicity is not peculiar to the Scriptures; it must be solved within the broader context of etiology in general. Secondly, each instance of etiology must be examined and judged on its own merits. In the vast majority of cases it will be found (when it is possible to arrive at a definite conclusion which is not always the case) that the narrative rests simply on the love of word-play so easily observed in the Bible, on the desire to explain a mysterious monument or some feature of the landscape, or on the author's desire to communicate some deeper teaching, rather than on any real historical basis. Yet this is not to be automatically assumed in every case. The universal rejection by M. Noth in Das Buch Josua (2d ed. Tübingen 1953) of the historical value of etiological stories has been justly criticized by J. Bright (see bibliog.). The historical value of an etiology in any given case will be open to suspicion and must be confirmed by independent documentary evidence, archeological findings, or other reliable sources, before the genuineness of its tradition can be recognized. There are no universal solutions to this problem; each narrative has to be judged on its own merits.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 695–697. K. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 1:1011–12. J. FICHTNER, "Die etymologische Atiologie in den Namengebungen der geschichtlichen Bücher des A.T.," Vetus Testamentum 6 (1956) 372–396. J. SCHILDENBERGER, "Aussageabsicht der inspirierten Geschichtsschreiber des A.T. bei der Komplication von Überlieferungen, sich widersprechenden Doppelberichten und ätiologischen Erzählungen," Sacra Pagina, ed. J. COPPENS et al., 2 v. (Paris 1959) 1:119–131. J. BRIGHT, Early Israel in Recent History Writing (Chicago 1956) 91–100. A. M. DU- BARLE, Les Sages d'Israël (Paris 1946); "Le Péché originel dans la Genèse," Revue biblique 64 (1957) 5–34.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

ETRUSCAN RELIGION

Knowledge of Etruscan religion is derived largely from the study of archeological materials. Although there are many extant Etruscan inscriptions, no key to the Etruscan language has yet been found. There are some names of deities on a clay tablet, some apparent curses on lead tablets, an inscribed bronze liver, a rectangular cippus, and a longer text on the wrappings of a mummy. Ancient writers who mention the Etruscans do so in a fragmentary manner and, apparently, are inclined to mix Etruscan with non-Etruscan elements. Roman writers, such as Livy and Cicero, give valuable information, but the works of Claudius Pulcher, Nigidius Figulus, and others who wrote about the Etruscans at length are preserved only in fragments. Some of these writers mention Etruscan books on religious beliefs and practices, but these are likewise lost.

The occurrence in Roman religion of the thunderbolt as a religious manifestation seems to come from the Etruscans. Their chief god, Tinia, and several others, including Juno and Minerva, whom the Romans adopted, were associated with the hurling of thunderbolts that portended events in human life. An Etruscan specialty was hepatoscopy, the interpretation of signs noted in the observation of the livers of animals. The religious expert known as the haruspex was borrowed by the Romans, along with the science of hepatoscopy.

Belief in an Afterlife. The Etruscans showed much concern for the dead and for their existence in the afterlife. Throughout the course of Etruscan civilization, the dead are conceived as continuing their lives in the great chamber-tombs that were built and furnished elaborately in imitation of Etruscan dwellings. In the fresco paintings in these tombs, the dead are shown on their journey to the lower world in the company of demons, who are often pictured in horrible forms, however, there is no ground for regarding the lower world of the Etruscans as a place of punishment. The funeral games held for the deceased may have influenced the Roman gladiatorial combats. From the fourth century B.C. on, Greek ideas of the underworld, with Hades and Persephone presiding over it, were known to the Etruscans and, by some, incorporated into their own beliefs. Some of the stone coffins or sarcophagi into which the Etruscans placed the bodies of the deceased have been preserved. The lids of such coffins are frequently adorned with full-length sculptured figures, apparently of the dead persons. In some cases, a couple, apparently man and wife, are similarly sculptured. There is an air of serenity and calm in this Etruscan artwork concerning death that seems to indicate a comforting belief in immortality. However, without any considerable literature to make it intelligible, we do not know whether the Etruscans thought of the next life as a place of happiness and eternal reward or whether, like the classical Greeks, they regarded the next life only as a shadowy and gloomy existence.

Mural painting on wall of Etruscan tomb in the Tomb of the Jugglers, sixth century B.C., Tarquinia, Rome. (©Charles and Josette Lenars/CORBIS)

Problem of Interpretation. Etruscan religion, because of our limited knowledge, is a complex and difficult subject. Etruscan, Greek, and Italic elements were intermingled, and there are definite traces of an Etruscan connection with the Near East, whence Herodotus and some other ancient writers claim the Etruscans came to settle in Italy. Etruscan hepatoscopy is identical with that of Babylonia, and certain other elements in Etruscan art and religion point to an Eastern origin. Although the deities concerned with their official cults, such as Juno, Minerva, Mars, and others, are known by these names to the Romans, the funerary gods who have to do with the afterlife seem to be exclusively Etruscan.

Bibliography: M. PALLOTTINO, The Etruscans, tr. J. CAMERON (Baltimore 1955); Etruscan Painting, tr. M. E. STANLEY and S. GIL-BERT (Geneva 1952). C. C. CLEMEN, Die Religion der Etrusker (Bonn 1936). R. BLOCH, Recherches sur les religions de l'Italie antique (Geneva 1976). G. CAPDEVILLE, "Les livres sacrés des Étrusques," in Oracles et prophéties dans l'Antiquité (Paris 1997) 457–508.

[T. A. BRADY/EDS.]

EUBEL, KONRAD

Conventual Franciscan historian; b. Sinning (Bavaria), Jan. 19, 1842; d. Würzburg, Feb. 5, 1923. After being ordained in 1868, he dedicated himself to historical research. In 1887 he was appointed penitentiary at St. Peter's, and during 20 years in Rome continued his historical work. His crowning achievement was his Hierarchia catholica medii aevi, a chronological listing of the popes, cardinals, and bishops of all Christianity according to the alphabetical order of the Latin names of the dioceses.

Bibliography: Works. C. EUBEL et al., Hierarchia Catholica medii (et recentioris) aevi: v.1, 1198–1431 (2d. ed. Münster 1913); v.2, 1431-1503 (2d. ed. Münster 1914); v.3, 1503-1600 (2d. ed. Münster 1923); v.4, 1592-1667 (Münster 1935); v.5, 1667-1730 (Padua 1952); v.6, 1730-1799 (Padua 1958); Die avignonesische Obedienz der Mendikanten-Orden (Paderborn 1900); Geschichte der kölnischen Minoriten-Ordensprovinz (Cologne 1906); ed., Geschichte der oberdeutschen Minoriten-Provinz (Würzburg 1886); ed., Bullarium Franciscanum, v.5-7 (for the years 1303-1431) (Rome 1898-1904); ed., Bullarii Franciscani epitome (Quaracchi-Florence 1908). Literature. Commentarium O.F.M. conventualium 11 (1923) 22-26. F. DOELLE, "Die literarische Tätigkeit des P. Konrad Eubel, O.F.M. Conv.," Franziskanische Studien 5 (Münster-Werl 1918) 307-313. R. RITZLER, "Die archivalischen Quellen der 'Hierarchia catholica'," Studi e Testi 165 (Rome 1952) 51-74.

[J. J. SMITH]

EUCHARIST (BIBLICAL DATA)

This article treats of the origin of the term; then of the Eucharist in its various aspects as found in the Synoptic Gospels and with St. Paul in the First Epistle to the Corinthians; and finally, of the Eucharist as it appears in the Johannine writings.

Origin of the Term. The Jewish form of liturgical blessing (Heb. $b^e r \bar{a} k \hat{a}$) that Jesus used at the Last Supper to institute the Eucharist and that has given its name to this sacred rite and its elements had its OT origins in the praise of God that came spontaneously to the lips of one for whom the Lord had performed some great deed; cf., e.g., Gn 24.27: "Blessed be the Lord"; in Hebrew, bārûk yhwh; in the Septuagint (LXX), εύλογητός Κύριος. It could be at the same time a sort of public proclamation of the name of God and an acknowledgement and confession of the power and glory of the Lord (Ex 18.9–11). Such forms lent themselves easily to use in public or private worship; the initial blessing or praise of God came to be followed by a more or less extensive "remembrance'' ($dvd\mu v\eta\sigma\iota\zeta$) of God's action in nature and in the history of His people (1 Chr 16.12-14; Neh 9.5-37; Sir 51.1-12). A prayer of petition could often be added (Sir 50.22-24). The LXX often translated these forms of praise and proclamation by εύλογείν (to bless, praise) and ἐξομολογεῖν (to confess, acknowledge, praise); cf. Jesus' use of the latter in Mt 11.25. The verb εύχαριστείν, which in classical and Hellenistic usage meant to give thanks, bestow a favor, also came to be used in this same context; the notion of spontaneous praise preceded that of thanksgiving-a nuance that was later lost on the Hellenistic Christian communities; cf. the miracle of the multiplication of loaves in Mk 8.6-7, where, as at the Last Supper (Mk 14.22-23), εύλογείν and εύχαριστείν appear as synonymous.

This prayer of praise or blessing of God, accompanied by a "breaking of bread" and a "remembrance" of the manifold benefits of the Lord, preceded the main part of the PASSOVER Meal and other Jewish festive or fraternal meals. A similar blessing followed, spoken over a cup of wine (the "cup of blessing" or "consecrated cup" of 1 Cor 10.16). In the course of his own $b^{e}r\bar{a}k\hat{a}$ ("while blessing''-aorist participle in Mk 14.22 showing simultaneity), Jesus spoke the words of Eucharistic institution that gave new meaning to this ancient rite: "This is my body; this is my blood." (Is this berākâ of Jesus to be connected with His high-priestly prayer as given in John ch. 17?) An antecedent Passover HAGGADAH, or didactic exposition of the meaning of the meal, may also have prepared the minds of the disciples for this event. While other early names-the BREAKING OF BREAD, the LORD'S SUPPER-have enjoyed only limited use, this action of blessing, thanksgiving, has given an enduring designation to the sacred rite.

The Sources: Liturgical Traditions of the Institution. The earliest extant account of the Eucharistic celebration in the early Church is found in 1 Cor 11.17–34 (c. A.D. 55). On the occasion of abuses that had arisen in the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the Church at Corinth (see AGAPE), St. Paul recalled the traditional report that he had received on the true nature of the Eucharist. Paul received this tradition "from [$\alpha\pi\delta$] the Lord" (1 Cor 11.23), not by some sort of special revelation (whose immediacy would have been better expressed by $\pi \alpha \rho \dot{\alpha}$), but because the Lord Jesus, as institutor of the Eucharist, was the first link in the tradition and because it was by the power and authority of the Lord that the intermediaries, including Paul himself in his role as an Apostle, could be counted on to transmit faithfully the tradition in the Church. To ''receive'' ($\pi \alpha \rho \alpha \lambda \alpha \mu \beta \dot{\alpha} v \epsilon \iota v$) and ''deliver'' ($\pi \alpha \rho \alpha \delta \iota \delta \dot{\sigma} \alpha \iota$) are in fact the equivalents of technical terms for the acceptance and handling on of rabbinical teaching; cf. 1 Cor 15.3–7, where the same terms are clearly used to indicate a historical tradition. This is no denial, however, of the work of Paul himself in fathoming the depths of what he had received.

Plainly, the Pauline account of the institution (11.23-25) is embedded in the framework of a Christian liturgical celebration. The Synoptic accounts (Mk 14.22-24; Mt 26.26-28; Lk 22.19-20), inserted in the course of the Gospel Passion narratives (note the awkward repetition "and while they were eating" of Mk 14.18, 22), likewise owe their present form to liturgical use; their laconic structure shows little interest in the details of a Jewish meal that had become superfluous for most Christians. Matthew manifests a close dependence on Mark; Luke's report is inspired by that of Paul, or at least draws on a liturgical source common to both. The mention of the cup "after the supper" in Paul (1 Cor 11.25) and Luke (Lk 22.20) seems to reflect the separated sequence of a Jewish meal as described above; liturgical practice has joined cup to bread in Mk 14.22-24 and Mt 26.26-28. Divergence of style and vocabulary precludes a Marcan dependence on Paul. Their fundamental harmony amid difference of detail is a precious sign that they have faithfully transmitted the thought of Jesus in His institution of the Eucharist.

The Passover Meal of the New Covenant. It is not certain that the Eucharistic institution actually took place during a Passover meal in the full sense of the term. In any case, the proximity of the feast has influenced the course of the meal, the accounts that the Synoptics give of it, and its theological significance.

The Jewish Passover meal commemorated the liberation from Egyptian slavery—the first great act of redemption by God for His people (Ex 12.1–28), a redemption that formed the preparatory step for the covenant on Mt. Sinai. At the same time, the meal expressed an eager hope and longing for the definitive coming of the kingdom of God. At the Last Supper, in a clear reference to the actions of Moses in Ex 24.8, Jesus established a new covenant "in" (i.e., "by means of," causal) His own blood: "This is my blood of the covenant" (Mk 14.24; Mt 26.28); or the more developed form of Paul (1 Cor 11.25) and Luke (22.20): "This cup is the new covenant in my blood'' (by metonymy, cup stands for blood). The clarifying ''new'' of Paul and Luke recalls the ''new covenant'' of Jer 31.31. This is no distortion; a covenant in the blood of Jesus (''my blood''), replacing the blood of lambs (Ex 12.7) or bulls (Ex 24.5), is of necessity a new covenant. For this theme in the NT see also Rom 11.27; 2 Cor 3.6; Heb 8.6–13; 9.14–15; 9.18–10.39.

The Real Presence and Communion with a Sacrificial Victim. "Body [flesh] and blood" is a sacrificial notion: cf. Lv 17.11, 14; Dt 12.23; Ez 39.17-20 (especially important for linking "flesh and blood" to a sacrificial meal); Heb 13.11-12. At the Last Supper, the Eucharistic blood in the cup "is being shed" (Lk 22.20) or "will be shed" (in NT Greek, the present often replaced the future participle; in any case, the thought is clear; it is the same blood of Jesus that will soon be shed on the cross). A mere appeal to the words of institution themselves is insufficient to show the real presence of the body and blood of the Lord. The copula "is," whether expressed or implied (in Aramaic, Jesus would have said simply, "This my body This my blood"), is no preclusion of a symbolic meaning; cf. Ez 5.5: "this is Jerusalem" (a symbolic action); Mt 13.37-38 (a parable); Jn 15.1, 5 (an allegory).

Among the Semites, however, mere symbols were inadequate for the establishment of a covenant; for this, real victims, not merely signs of them, were required (Gn 15.9-18; Ex 24.5). Added to this is the realistic way in which St. John (see below) and St. Paul speak of the Eucharist. For the latter (1 Cor 10.16-22), it is a "sharing, partaking" of the body and blood of the Lord. As "the table of the Lord, the cup of the Lord," the Eucharist is sacrificial food, to be compared to the sacrificial meals of the pagans, which were thought to effect a real contact or communion with the divinity; see Dn 1.8, 13, 15 (LXX) and Mal 1.7, 12 for the OT background of these terms. The Council of Trent saw in Mal 1.11 an anticipation of the perfect sacrifice of the messianic era. Among the Jews, to eat the victim of a sacrifice was to partake of the fruits of the sacrifice (1 Cor 10.18). For the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (13.10), the Jews have no right to partake of the Christian altar, which is probably to be identified with the (Eucharistic?) body of Christ. In 1 Cor 10.1-6, the manna and the water from the rock (Exodus ch. 16-17; Numbers ch. 20) are "spiritual," both by their supernatural origin and by their existence as prophetic types of the Eucharist. The Eucharist is the food and drink of the Christian in the new Exodus; it is also "spiritual" for it contains the risen body of Christ, which, vivified by the Spirit, dispenses spiritual life and strength to those who partake of it.

The Eucharist, like Baptism in the Pauline theology (Rom 6.3–5), is a sharing in the death and Resurrection of the Lord. But a warning is sounded (1 Cor 10.5–6): the reception of the Sacraments does not free one from the demands of the moral law; see the whole context of 1 Corinthians ch. 10–11. In 11.27–34, Paul explains that a judgment on Christians has already commenced by the Eucharistic presence of the Lord; it is an anticipation of His physical presence (PAROUSIA) at the end of time, the reality of which was a chief article of Christian belief— ''until he comes'' (11.26).

The Expiatory Sacrifice of the Servant of the Lord. Both the blood shed "for many" of Mk 14.24 and sins''---of Mt 26.28 are allusions to Jesus as the fulfillment of the Isaian "Servant of the Lord," whose vicarious sufferings "justify" and "take away the sins of many," i.e., in Semitic idiom, "an unlimited number, all" (Is 53.3-6, 11-12; see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE). The particularized "for you" of Paul (1 Cor 11.24) and Luke (Lk 22.19–20) may well be a liturgical application to Christians present at the Church's Eucharistic celebration; others, however, see in it an original reference to the "covenant which the Lord has made with you" of Ex 24.8. On Jesus as the Servant, see also Mt 8.17; 11.4-6; 12.17-21; 20.28; Mk 10.45; Lk 4.17-21; 22.37 (in the context of the Last Supper); Acts 8.32-33; etc.

The substitutive as well as the atoning role of the blood of Jesus is suggested in Mk 14.24, Lk 22.19-20, and 1 Cor 11.24 by the preposition $\vartheta \pi \epsilon \rho$ (for), which can mean not only "in behalf of," "for the sake of," but also "in place of"; the meanings often merge (cf. Lv 17.11: "it is the blood, as the seat of life, that makes atonement"; Rom 3.24-25; 5.9). By analogy with the blood, the body of Christ "is being given for you" (i.e., in sacrifice: Lk 22.19). In Is 42.6-7; 43.16-21; 49.6, the close union of covenant (communion), Exodus (Passover sacrifice), and Servant (expiation) themes is a preparation for the higher synthesis that Jesus would make in the Eucharist of these distinct yet related ideas. The Servant who is "a light to the nations" and who is to bring "salvation" to the "ends of the earth" is in fact a covenant personified. For cognate ideas, see Is 54.10; 55.3; 56.6; 61.8. Forgiveness of sins is joined to the new covenant in Jer 31.31-34.

The Eucharist as a Permanent Institution in the Church. Although the command to "do this in remembrance of me" is probably an elucidation on the part of Paul (1 Cor 11.24–25) and Luke (Lk 22.19) for the benefit of Gentile readers, still the idea of "remembrance" (Heb. $zikk\bar{a}r\hat{o}n$) in the sense of a liturgical reenactment of some past event is deeply rooted in the OT (Ex 12.14, 26–27; 13.3, 8–9; Dt 16.3; Nm 10.10) and must have been present in the thought of Jesus. In this sense, the whole ritual of the Passover meal was a "remembrance" of the liberation from Egyptian slavery. It made the past vividly present in word and action: bitter herbs; PASSOVER LAMB; UNLEAVENED BREAD (Dt 16.3; the ἄρτος, literally "bread in general," is therefore no misnomer); and the Passover Haggadah by the head of the family (see Paul's teaching in 1 Cor 5.7–8 on Christ as the Christian Passover). The Last Supper blessing given by Jesus over bread and wine was in turn a proclamation of the new Exodus from the slavery of sin by His own coming death.

After His departure, the disciples were to make liturgically present this same mystery, now not in prophetic action, but in "remembrance" of the past. In the words of Paul: "as often as you shall eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the death of the Lord" (1 Cor 11.26). This "proclamation" has been variously explained: as a recital of a primitive passion narrative in conjunction with the Eucharistic celebration (the verb καταγγέλλειν is used in the NT exclusively for the preaching of the "good news"); or as a dramatized action, with torn flesh and flowing blood symbolized by broken bread and crimson wine. In reality, it is by the repetition of both the actions and the words of institution contained in Christ's "remembrance" that the Eucharist receives its full significance, and that the death is "proclaimed." Christ can no longer die (Heb 9.26-28; 10.12–14), but His sacrificial death is made present (1) by the real presence, under the Eucharistic symbols, of the Christ who once upon a time died, who was raised up, and who is now in glory (the Christus passus of St. Thomas Aquinas; see Summa Theologiae 3a, 73.3 ad 3), and (2) by the fruits of His death, which Christians receive in partaking of the Eucharist (Mt 26.26-27; 1 Cor 10.16-21; 11.28-29; Jn 6.51c-58); this doctrine was summarized by St. Thomas (ST 3a, 83.1; 22.3 ad 2;73.4 ad 3).

The Eucharist as an Eschatological Meal. Our understanding of the eschatological aspect of the Eucharist is conditioned by the precise meaning of "kingdom of God" contained in the various accounts. In Mk 14.25 the Eucharistic meal of which Jesus has just partaken appears as a farewell banquet before His death and as a prefigurement of the messianic banquet in the kingdom of God at the end of time. This figure of the future kingdom under the form of a meal is a frequent one in the Bible [Is 25.6; 55.1–5; 65.13; Ps 22(23).5; Prv 9.1–6; Mt 8.11–12; 22.1–14; 25.10; Lk 14.15–24; Rv 3.20; 19.9]. The "henceforth" of Mt 26.29 may hint at the length of time that this interval between the Supper and Parousia had assumed by the time the Gospel was written.

Luke placed the words of Mark before the institution (Lk 22.19b–20 are authentic; their absence from some manuscripts may be due to a confusion over the twofold mention of the "cup" in v. 17 and 20) and added to them a notice about a Passover that Jesus will no longer eat until all is "fulfilled" in the kingdom of God (22.15–18). Despite the Greek style and Lucan vocabulary, such a combination accords well with the Jewish custom of an initial blessing over the Passover (i.e., meal, not lamb, which need not have been here present) and a first cup of wine. It may thus be either a reworking of a historic pre-Lucan tradition about the actual course of events at the Last Supper, or more probably the playing of a theological variation on themes of Mark (14.25) and Paul (1 Cor 11.24–25) by Luke himself; cf. the artificial position of Lk 22.24-30, found in a different context in the other Synoptics-Mk 10.42-45; Mt 19.28; 20.25-28. In any case, the farewell in Luke is to the Jewish Passover, the fulfillment of which is the Eucharistic meal; the latter is not only an anticipation of the messianic meal at the end of time, as in Mark, but also more immediately of the post-Resurrection meals of the risen Lord in that intermediate phase of the kingdom of God that for Luke is the Church; note his predilection for the mention of such meals (Lk 24.30, 41-43; Acts 1.4).

The eschatological and joyous aspect of the Eucharist appears uppermost in the meager accounts that have been preserved of the liturgical "breaking of bread" in the primitive Christian community of Jerusalem (Acts 2.42–47). This is only to be expected. The meals of the risen Lord with His disciples had resumed the series of fraternal repasts that, culminating in the Last Supper, had been broken by His death. After His departure, the disciples, filled with the joy of the Resurrection and the hope of a proximate Parousia, continued to gather and to "bless God," to "give thanks" over the bread and wine of the community meal, a meal that would have included a "remembrance" of the messianic marvels that they had witnessed, including the events of the Last Supper, Passion and death, which were inseparably bound to the Resurrection (cf. Acts 10.39-41, where the meals with the risen Lord climax the apostolic witness to Jesus' life, death, and Resurrection); the repetition of the words of Eucharistic institution ("do this in remembrance of me") would render the Lord present once again in their midst.

For St. Paul, the Eucharistic "breaking of bread" (Acts 20.7–11—on a Sunday, the day of the Resurrection; 1 Cor 10.16) is likewise situated between the death of the Lord and His Parousia. The phrase, "you proclaim the death of the Lord until he comes" (1 Cor 11.26) is an echo of the early Christian hope expressed in the words "MARANATHA" (Come, Lord) in 1 Cor 16.22 and "Come, Lord Jesus!" in Rv 22.20.

Sacred meals with an aura of eschatological anticipation were in use also among the covenanters of the QUM- RAN COMMUNITY (1QS^a 2.17–22; perhaps 1QS 6.2–5). They are another poignant testimony to the Jewish longing for that union with God which has in reality been fulfilled in Christ's covenant meal, the Eucharist.

The Eucharist as a Bond of the Church's Unity. The Eucharistic body of Christ has profoundly influenced St. Paul's doctrine on the Church as the body of Christ: "Because the bread is one, we though many, are one body, all of us who partake of the one bread" (1 Cor 10.17). The "one body" has here the same meaning as "the body of the Lord" in the preceding verse, i.e., the real body of the risen Lord. By their contact with the Eucharistic body, Christians come into vital, dynamic union with the person of Christ. That they are identified with the body of Christ is no mere metaphor, borrowed from social or civil life, for the power and life of the Spirit of Christ is present in each of them (1 Cor 6.15; 12.27; Eph 5.30). The communion (κοινωνία sharing, partaking: 1 Cor 10.16) of the individual Christian with the Eucharistic body is thus the cause of their union, communion among themselves (Acts 2.42).

The Eucharist in St. John. The words of Eucharistic institution are lacking in the Last Supper account of the Fourth Gospel (John ch. 13–17). Instead, John's Eucharistic doctrine is concentrated in ch. 6, where, following an account of the multiplication of loaves (v.1–13) and the walking on the sea (v.16–21), Jesus delivers a long discourse of which the principal theme is that of the "bread of life" (v.26–72.).

In Part Purely Metaphorical. Despite its literary unity, ch. 6 is not to be regarded as purely and simply a promise of the Eucharist. The themes that Jesus develops from the OT refer, first and foremost, to Himself as the Son who has been sent by the Father into the world (v. 39-40) to give life to it by His person and message (v. 33) and who must metaphorically be eaten by faith. The crowd in 6.14 acclaims Jesus as "the Prophet," namely, the eschatological prophet of Dt 18.15, a theme that played an important role in the early Church's preaching (Acts 3.22–23; 7.37). For the MANNA concept, which is the type of Jesus as the "bread of life," see Ex 16.4, 13-15; Ps 77(78).24; Neh 9.15. According to some Jewish circles, the miracle of the manna was to be repeated at the coming of the Messiah; see the Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch 29.8-30.1 [R. Charles, The Pseudepigrapha of the OT (Oxford 1963) 498]. Jesus' words in Jn 6.35, "He who comes to me shall not hunger, and he who believes in me shall never thirst," are an echo of the eschatological ideas found in Is 55.1-2, "All you who are thirsty, come to the water! You who have no money, come, receive grain and eat," and Is 65.13, "Lo, my servants shall eat, but you shall go hungry; my servants shall drink, but you shall be thirsty." The words in Jn 6.45–47, "And they all shall be taught of God," play on a familiar theme of Is 54.13; Jer 31.31–34. Jesus compares Himself to the feast that personified Wisdom prepares for herself in Prv 9.1–6; Sir 24.18–21. The disciple of Christ is likened to the pupil at the feet of Wisdom in the OT.

In Part Purely Literal. The entire discourse, however, cannot be understood in a purely metaphorical sense, although such an interpretation is found among some of the Fathers and later theologians, e.g., Clement of Alexandria and Origen. Cajetan adopted a similar view for the sake of a better defense of the Catholic practice of communion under the species of bread alone: de spirituali manducatione et potatione . . . est ("It is a matter of spiritual eating and drinking"; Commentarium in ST 3a, 80. 12). The Council of Trent made no decision in the matter. The words in Jn 6.51c-58 (52c-59 in the Vulgate and 1941 Confraternity edition) are in fact far too realistic and contain too many undertones of the words of Eucharistic institution to be merely a metaphor for faith in the person of Christ or for the Redemption brought by him. Ultra-realistic expressions are present: "I will give" is a promise for the future, but in John it can also mean "to give in sacrifice"; "for [ὑπέρ, on behalf of] the life of the world"; "bread" (ἄρτος); "drink my blood"; "flesh" (σάρξ), a more Semitic expression than the $\sigma \widehat{\omega} \mu \alpha$ (body) of the Synoptics and St. Paul; "he who eats [τρώγειν, literally, gnaw, munch] my flesh."

Hence, many see in John ch. 6 a uniform transition from reception of Jesus by faith to reception of Him in the Eucharist. Occasioned perhaps by the Passover synagogue readings (6.4, 60) that dealt with the manna in the desert, Jesus would have prepared the minds of the Jews for the Sacrament that he was to institute at the Last Supper.

Double-Meaning Interpretation. The discourse may be envisaged in another fashion. It seems improbable that at such an early date in his ministry Jesus would have demanded, above and beyond a confession of his Messiahship, a belief in the sublime and difficult mystery of the Eucharist. To have done so would be to break the bruised reed and quench the smoking wick (Mt 12.20). One of the characteristics of John's Gospel is that it shows parallels between the Sacraments of the Church and historical events in the life of Jesus. The wine miracle at Cana (Jn 2.1–11), already a sign of the replacement of the Law by the gospel, may point further in John's mind to that greater rite of purification by blood which is the Eucharist; note the proximity of the Passover in 2.13. The miracle of the loaves, a historical event, is described in terms reminiscent of the Last Supper (6.11); this tendency is already to be noted in the Synoptic accounts (Mk 6.41; 8.6; and parallels). The Evangelist, then, would also have seen a deeper sacramental meaning behind a discourse that originally concerned the person of Jesus as Messiah (Jn 6.26–51b, 59–72). To further emphasize the intimate union of faith and Sacrament, the Evangelist or a later editor (cf. ch. 21, which is acknowledged to be a posterior addition) would have inserted 6.51c–58, whose original context lay elsewhere in the Johannine tradition—a version of Jesus' words at the Last Supper, or a Christian homily based on them, whose intention would be to combat a spiritual DOCETISM that would rob the Eucharist of any physical reality.

John's Eucharistic doctrine, like that of the Synoptics and St. Paul, is closely linked to the Passion and death of Jesus and to His second coming (6.54). The efficacy of the Sacraments can in fact come only from the death of Jesus, after he has "given up his spirit," or rather, "handed over the [Holy] Spirit" (Jn 19.30). The blood and water flowing from His pierced side is for the Evangelist a type of the Eucharist and Baptism (cf. 1 Jn 5.6, 8 for a similar symbolism). Jesus, the "true vine" (Jn 15.1–17), feeds the disciples on His own blood, the "fruit of the vine" (Mk 14.25). It is a source for the unity of Christians with Christ and with one another, just as with Paul also the Eucharist makes of Christians "one body" (1 Cor 10.17). From the very Incarnation of the Word, in John's thought (Jn 1.14; 1 Jn 4.2), Jesus has been food for those who believe in Him. In the OT itself, the manna had already been a figure for the "word of life," the divine message (Dt 8.3). The Christian "word of life" is in turn the Gospel message; Christ is this "Word of Life" personified (1 Jn 1.1). Those who believe and listen to this "Word" are already nourished by the divine life.

Bibliography: J. BETZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 3:1142-57. J. COP-PENS, Dictionnaire de la Bible supplement, ed. L. PIROT et al. (Paris 1928-) 2:1146-1215. E. SCHWEIZER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 1:10-21. G. QUELL and E. STAUFFER, "ἁγαπάω, ἁγάπη," in G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935) 1:20-55. G. QUELL and J. BEHM, ''διαθήκη,'' ibid. 2:106–137. W. FOERSTER, ''κυριακός,'' ibid. 3:1095–96. J. jeremias, ''πάσχα,'' ibid. 5:895-903; The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, tr. A. EHRHARDT (New York 1955). J. DELORME et al., The Eucharist in the N.T., tr. E. M. STEWART (Baltimore 1964). O. CULLMANN, Early Christian Worship, tr. A. S. TODD and J. B. TORRANCE (Chicago 1953). A. J. B. HIG-GINS, The Lord's Supper in the N. T. (Chicago 1952). F. J. LEENHARDT, Le Sacrement de la sainte Cène (Neuchâtel 1948); "This is My Body," Essays on the Lord's Supper, tr. J. G. DAVIES (Richmond 1958); "La Structure du chapitre 6 de l'évangile de Jean," Revue d'histoire et de la philosophie religieuses 39 (1959) 1-13. J. DUPONT, "Ceci est mon corps,' Ceci est mon sang," Nouvelle revue théologique 80 (1958) 1025-41. C. VOLLERT, "The Eucharist: Quests for Insights from Scripture," Theological Studies 21 (1960) 404-443. B. COOKE, "Synoptic Presentation of the Eucharist as a Covenant Sacrifice," ibid. 1-44. A. ARNOLD, Der Ursprung des christlichen Abendmahls (2d ed. Freiburg 1939). G. DIX,

The Shape of the Liturgy (2d ed. London 1945; repr. 1960). P. BE-NOIT, "Le Récit de la Céne dans Lc. XXII, 15-20," Revue biblique 48 (1939) 357-393; "The Holy Eucharist," Scripture 8 (1956) 97-108; 9 (1957) 1-14. W. GOOSSENS, Les Origines de l'Eucharistie, Sacrement et sacrifice (Paris 1931). H. LIETZMANN, Mass and Lord's Supper, tr. D. H. G. REEVE (Leiden 1953). G. SLOY-AN," Primitive and Pauline Concepts of the Eucharist," Catholic Biblical Quarterly23 (1961) 1-13. G. ZIENER, "Die Brotwunder im Markusevangelium," Biblische Zeitschrift 4 (1960) 282-285; "Johannesevangelium und urchristliche Passafeier," Biblische Zeitschrift 2 (1958) 263-274; "Weisheitsbuch und Johannesevangelium," Biblica 38 (1957) 396-418; 39 (1958) 37-60. E. KÄSE-MANN, "The Pauline Doctrine of the Lord's Supper," Essays on N. T. Themes, tr. W. J. MONTAGUE (pa. Naperville, Ill. 1964) 108-135. C. SPICQ, L'Épître aux Hébreux, 2 v. (Études bibliques; Paris 1952-53) 1:316-318; 2:425-426, A. FEUILLET, "Les Thèmes bibliques majeurs du discours sur le pain de vie (Jn 6)," Nouvelle revue théologique 82 (1960) 803-822, 918-939, 1040-62, repr. in Études johanniques (Paris 1962) 47-129. H. SCHÜRMANN, Eine quellenkritische Untersuchung des lukanischen Abendmahlsberichtes. Lk. 22,7-38, 3 v. (Münster 1953-57); "Joh. 6, 51c, ein Schlüssel zur grossen johanneischen Brotrede," Biblische Zeitschrift 2 (1958) 244–262; "Abendmahl," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 1:26-31. X. LÉON-DUFOUR, "Le Mystère du pain de vie (Jean VI)," Recherches de science religieuse 46 (1958) 481-523. B. GER-HARDSSON, Memory and Manuscript, tr. E. J. SHARPE (Uppsala 1961) 305, 321-322. P. NEUENZEIT, Das Herrenmahl: Studien zur paulinischen Eucharistieauffassung (Munich 1960). J. P. AUDET, "Esquisse historique du genre littéraire de la bénédiction juive et de l'eucharistie chrétienne," Revue biblique 65 (1958) 371-399; La Didachè: Instructions des Apôtres (Paris 1958). E. J. KILMARTIN, "Liturgical Influence on John 6," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 22 (1960) 183-191; "The Eucharistic Cup in the Primitive Liturgy," ibid. 24 (1962) 32-43. R. E. BROWN, "The Johannine Sacramentary Reconsidered," Theological Studies 23 (1962) 183-206. E. RUCKS-TUHL, Die literarische Einheit des Johannesevangeliums (Freiburg 1951) 220-271. G. BORNKAMM, "Die eucharistische Rede im Johannesevangelium," Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 47 (1956) 161-169.

[C. BERNAS]

EUCHARIST, EXPOSITION OF THE

"Exposition of the holy Eucharist, either in the ciborium or in the monstrance, is intended to acknowledge Christ's marvelous presence in the sacrament" (HCWE 82). In light of the principle found in HCWE 79, however, "exposition must clearly express the cult of the blessed sacrament in its relationship to the Mass" (HCWE 82). For that reason, "Mass is prohibited in the body of the church" while exposition is taking place (HCWE 83). "If exposition of the blessed sacrament is extended for an entire day or over several days, it is to be interrupted during the celebration of Mass" (ibid. 83). During the exposition, customary signs of reverence are used (lighted candles, incense) and "there should be prayers, songs, and readings. . . . To encourage a prayerful spirit, there should be readings from scripture with a homily or brief exhoration" (HCWE 85; 93–94). Silence, song, and praying parts of the Liturgy of the Hours are also appropriate (HCWE 95–96). Exposition ordinarily concludes with benediction and reposition of the sacrament in the tabernacle (HCWE 97–100); however, "exposition which is held exclusively for the giving of benediction is prohibited" (HCWE 89).

"The Last Communion of St. Jerome," painting by Sandro Botticelli, 15th century. (©Geoffrey Clements/CORBIS)

For a more detailed discussion and bibliography in this encyclopedia, see EUCHARIST OUTSIDE MASS, WOR-SHIP OF THE; and EUCHARISTIC DEVOTION.

[N. D. MITCHELL]

EUCHARIST IN CONTEMPORARY CATHOLIC TRADITION

The purpose of this article is not to give a detailed presentation of the history or of the theology of the Eucharist, but to give an overview of directions and trends in Catholic theology in recent years.

Fresh insights and orientations have come from a variety of sources. To begin with, there was the liturgical renewal, starting with the more active participation of congregations and more frequent Communion, and then moving on to the revision of liturgical books for use in the celebration of the Eucharist. A simultaneous revision took place in many of the Christian Churches of the West. While bringing about considerable liturgical convergence in the manner of celebrating, this went hand-in-hand with an ecumenical dialogue that has gone a long way in resolving historical disputes and unveiling common points of faith and doctrine, even while pointing to the legitimacy of differences, especially over concepts of sacrifice and presence. This meeting of the ways in western communities itself occurs within an openness to the eucharistic traditions of the East.

"Miraculous Mass," fresco by Simone Martini, part of the freso cycle "Scenes from the Life of St. Martin," in the St. Martin Chapel, Lower Church of San Francesco, Assisi, Italy, 1321. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

Dialogue and theological inquiry are, in turn, served by greater historical consciousness, a better knowledge of ancient liturgical rites and prayers, and an appeal to scriptural origins that is affected by historical and literary criticism. Past doctrinal and theological formulations of the mystery of the Eucharist in the Church's tradition are also subjected to historical criticism and can, thus, be reconsidered and assimilated within a larger comprehension, opened up by scriptural, patristic and liturgical research. Catechetically, too, there have been new approaches, especially in putting the mystery of the Eucharist in the context of the mystery of the Church, the Body of Christ and in relating it to the mystery of the Trinity [see CHURCH, II (THEOLOGY OF)].

From a historical perspective, it is sometimes said that in the first millennium eucharistic theology was wedded to celebration and in the second became a speculative enterprise that lost touch with celebration. Granting a certain validity to this observation, it is to be noted that even the speculative questions about presence and sacrifice that dominated, first scholastic theology and then posttridentine, were related to an evolving eucharistic practice that had developed before the theology or the doctrine and which included eucharistic devotions and a new manner of hearing Mass for the faithful. Theology, in other words, took a new turn in the wake of changed liturgical and devotional practice. Not even doctrine or speculative theology, therefore, can be properly understood and interpreted unless seen in the context of ecclesial practice. If contemporary eucharistic theology is often related to a historically critical approach to scriptural reconstruction, to ritual studies, to the study of language, to the study of cultures, or to hermeneutics, this too is because of the need to understand and guide a currently developing practice of eucharistic celebration that shows both convergences and diversities, not only among Churches but within each particular Church.

Taking all of this into account, one could speak of a new orientation in eucharistic theology that can be called doing liturgical theology. This is because the focus is on celebration and on its interpretation within the living and richly diverse tradition of the Church. It is within liturgical theology that history, practice, doctrine, the study of rites and texts, and theological elaboration, come together. One might also speak of this as a hermeneutical approach, since it attends to the Eucharist as an event of God's gift in Christ, a gift that comes to the Church and embodies itself in the Church through an act of "language," that is, through ritual action and spoken word.

With the foregoing in view, a summary of new insights from a variety of fields of eucharistic study will be given under these headings: (1) Eucharist, sacrament of the Body of Christ; (2) Revisiting New Testament origins and background; (3) Eucharistic theology as a liturgical mystagogy, and the study of the Great Eucharistic Prayer; (4) The study of controversies, doctrines and past theologies of the West in historical context; and (5) Orientations in contemporary systematic theologies of the Eucharist.

Eucharist, Sacrament of the Body of Christ

By way of stating a common fundamental principle, one could say that a contemporary liturgical theology looks to the Eucharist as the Sacrament of the Body of Christ, Head and members. This plays a part in historical study and in theological and liturgical revision, which is why it is here considered at the outset. Rather than ask only what Christ does in the eucharistic action, or how his body and blood are present, these questions are put in the larger context of the mystery of the Church as the Body of Christ. This vision is aided by a retrieval of the early Christian vocabulary of mystérion and sacramentum. Both terms, one Greek and Eastern, the other Latin and Western, derive from the text of the New Testament where they are used in the original language or in translation, to express the divine counsel and action in bringing about the salvation of humankind through the sending of the Son and the Spirit (e.g. Rom 16.25-26; Eph 2.2-3; 3.9). This MYSTERY originates within the Godhead and is ultimately ineffable, but it is manifested in time in visible and symbolic form, beginning with the history of the salvation of Israel and culminating in the incarnation of the Son and the mysteries of his flesh. If the terms are applied in a particular way to the Church's eucharistic celebration in which it keeps memorial of Jesus Christ, this is because in this celebration the mystery is embodied in ritual form at the heart of the Church.

EUCHARIST IN CONTEMPORARY CATHOLIC TRADITION

Manuscript illumination depicting Christ feeding the five thousand with five barley loaves and two fishes, (Jn. 6.9), by Thoros Roslin, American Gospel Book, 1262.

This means that while the Church lives from the life of Christ and the Spirit that come to it through many channels, it expresses its own life and mystery most aptly and most fully in the celebration of the Eucharist. The Eucharist, in turn, is best appreciated when seen as the Sacrament of the Church, Body of Christ. While the eucharistic action includes proclamation, prayers and diverse rituals, its truth was expressed in early Christian centuries through a focus on that which is most central to its purpose, namely on the eating and drinking with thanksgiving at the common table where is received the gift of the Body and Blood of Christ (see SACRAMENTAL THEOLOGY).

Contemporary theology points to a number of implications of this vocabulary of mystery and sacrament. Gathering for the Eucharist is an act of the local Church, wherein all members of the community come together. This embodiment of Christ's mystery is essentially domestic in the character of its ritual rather than sacerdotal. More than a general relation of Eucharist to Church, it is the relation to the local Church that emerges so that a universal communion in Christ is necessarily related to a communion between such eucharistic Churches.

Detail of the pope placing the miraculous Host on the Altar from the 'Miracle of the Host' by Paolo Uccello. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/ CORBIS)

Seen as a gathering and as the mystery of the local Church, the Eucharist is linked to the fellowship of the Church as lived out in practical detail and especially its diakonia, that is to its service of the needy in its midst. It also embraces the Church's appeal to a living apostolic tradition, its testimony to the word of God, the testimony of its martyrs, the communion of the living with the dead who have died in the faith of Christ and often fortified by the VIATICUM of the sacrament of his Body and Blood. It is related, too, to its travails and its hopes as its members live their earthly pilgrimage in the hope of a divine consummation.

Today, anthropological and ritual studies serve a further appreciation of the symbolism of the bread and wine which expresses the mystery of its communion in Christ. These studies probe the symbolism of meals among peoples, of sharing a common table, and of the bread and wine which are blessed and shared with an invocation of the divinity. Taking a point of departure in ritual, they also enable theology to relate the mystery of the Eucharist, the turns in its celebration and its meaning of life in Christ, to cultural, social and economic realities, and to the place within change of an evocation of past memories and of a people's foundational myths. Placed within this context, the mystery of Christ's embodiment through sacrament and in the body of his Church, is located within the contours of culture and ongoing history.

Revisiting New Testament Origins

In one way or another, the Church in its liturgy, doctrine and theology has regularly taken the Supper Narrative as found in the Synoptics and Saint Paul to be the foundational narrative for eucharistic celebration, especially because of the memorial command. At times this was considered as though one could work chronologically from those texts to trace the development of the Eucharist in the early Church. The first move to a more circumspect approach was occasioned by the influence on the reading of the Scriptures of a historical critical approach. A more hermeneutical approach has now emerged which is more focused on the plot and meaning of the texts and which considers how the memory of the Last Supper is assimilated into the lived memory of diverse Churches, in diverse cultural and historical times.

From Lord's Supper to Last Supper. Scriptural scholars increasingly pointed out that the story as it stands in the New Testament text was much influenced by the practice of the Lord's Supper. This meant the common meals of remembrance at which the faithful came together and in which Christ's death and resurrection were recalled, inclusive of a remembrance of his Last Supper with his disciples on the eve before he was betrayed. These meals were seen, however, to represent a certain diversity from one Church to another and to fit within a larger compass of meal sharing.

Thus consideration of the scriptural roots of the Eucharist took in a larger compass in order to find the right setting in which to place the Supper Narrative. There is what we know of the practice of early communities in keeping memorial of the Lord as they shared the common loaf and the common cup in his name. There are the accounts of the meals of Jesus with others, during his public ministry and after the resurrection, and of the feeding of the crowds, which show that the actions and words of the Last Supper have their setting within Jesus' own continuing relation to sharing a table and to feeding others. Recently, some writers have also drawn attention to the need to relate the narratives of the table action of Jesus on the night before he was betrayed to the account in John's Gospel of the washing of the feet and the love commandment. This Gospel locates these words and action on that same evening of farewell and presents them as another way of expressing the testimony which Jesus, in showing himself in the guise of a servant, left to his disciples.

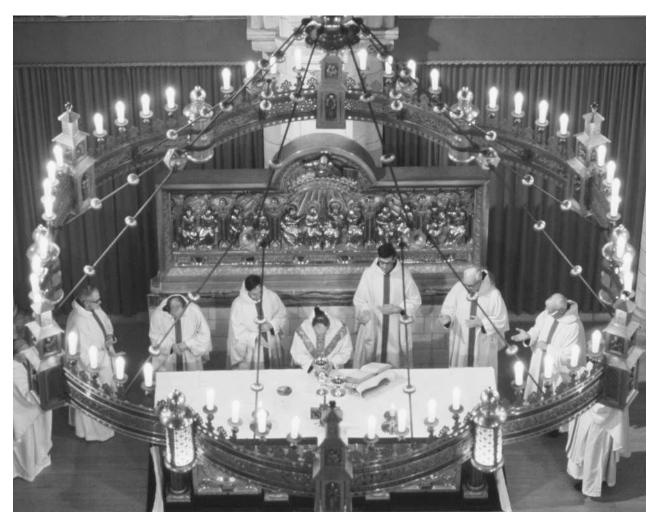

The Last Supper. In the middle of this attention to other texts, the efforts to reconstruct the events of the Last Supper have not been wanting. The concern to find an accurate historical reconstruction is grounded in a desire to discern the mind and the will of Jesus since discovering this is thought by some to be necessary to the meaning of the Eucharist.

In reconstructing the action, words and significance of the Last Supper, with its memorial command, the usual approach is to relate what was done there to its Jewish setting, of Passover and of table ritual. In general, the meaning of table ritual comes from knowledge of meal practice with its memorial narratives, its blessing prayer, its invocations of memorial commands, and the symbolism of the food and drink that are shared. More particularly, efforts to show that the meal shared by Jesus with his disciples was a Paschal Seder are numerous, just as are the counter efforts. Much of the difficulty of this question lies in a deeper difficulty, that is, the little that is known in a clear way of the seder at the time of Jesus.

Woman patient receives Communion from priest. (©David H. Wells/CORBIS)

Certainty about such reconstruction, however, is probably impossible. The effort is surmounted by the hermeneutical turn of theology, that is by the realization that the religious significance of the story of the origins of the Church's Eucharist lies in the story itself, not in its historical reconstruction. That is not to say that historical criticism bears no fruit, but this fruit is found in what it shows us of the context for the meaning of the story. Turning to the narrative as narrative, it is clear that the New Testament accounts present the table action as an event which took place at Passover and as a paschal thanksgiving meal which Jesus shares with his disciples in anticipation of his death. They do not allow us to settle the exact order of the meal as Jesus and his followers celebrated it, but they do reveal the reason for the Passover setting. This is meant both to underscore the paschal significance of Jesus' death as evoked in his words and blessing prayer, and to root the Eucharist of the Church in this meal by way of bringing out its memorial and paschal character.

Interior of Buckfast Abbey during Communion services, Devon, England. (©Christopher Cormack/CORBIS)

Memorial command and action. According to one recension of the Supper Narrative, Jesus gave the memorial command at the end of the meal, when he had completed the action with both loaf and cup (Mt 26.26-29). According to another (1 Cor 11.23-26), he gave the command twice, repeating it after each action. There are many examples in Jewish history of feasts kept and meals shared in virtue of a divine command to keep memorial and this provides the background to the memorial command given by Jesus to his disciples. Memorial is done in obedience to God's command, and it is this which gives it its place and power in the life of a community. It is inherent to covenant, a sign of God's fidelity and of the people's fidelity at one and the same time. Finally the actions of table memorial, of which the Paschal Seder is the primary example, combine the gathering of a community that finds identity in the action, narrative, blessing prayer and the ritual action of shared food and drink. Critics rightly point to the departures of Christian Eucharist from Jewish meal services, but this does not derogate from the fact that its true meaning is served by a constant attention to the interaction of the four elements mentioned.

Sacrifice. Attention to Semitic thought-patterns and practices also give us insight into the attachment of sacrificial language both to the death of Jesus and to the celebration kept in his memorial. In giving the bread and cup to his disciples, Jesus is reported to have used abundant sacrificial imagery in speaking of his death, as he had done also at other times. This evokes many strands in the cultic and historical past of Israel. Among the sacrifices recalled are those of the paschal lamb, the sealing of the covenant at Sinai, the levitical peace-offerings and the metaphoric attribution of sacrifice to the suffering of the Servant commemorated in the Servant Songs of the Book of Isaiah. The fact that such language is evoked at a meal also reminds us of the importance of Communion sacrifice and of the presence among the Jewish people at Jesus' time of those who located true sacrifice in obedience to God's commands, in fellowship and in songs of praise, distancing themselves to some extent in this from the importance given to temple sacrifice. All of this points to the rich and polyvalent significance of the use of sacrificial language which Christians inherited from Jews and which they in turn applied to the death of Jesus, to life lived according to the Gospel, to songs of praise and to their memorial of the death of Jesus at the common table. No narrow definition of sacrifice is possible, but the rich polyvalence of practice and language is pertinent to what is said of Jesus' death and of the memorial supper of Christians.

Eucharistic Mystagogy

It is as difficult to reconstruct the origins and development of the practices of Christian Eucharist as it is to reconstruct the historical facts of the Last Supper. However, we have the written and archeological evidence in hand of Christian celebrations dating over several centuries. We also have evidence in writers such as IRENAEUS OF LYONS, AMBROSE and AUGUSTINE, CYRIL OF JERUSA-LEM, THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM that eucharistic theology was developed as a reflection on the words and rites of the liturgical celebration.

Writers today attempt, for their part, either to appropriate this theology or to embark themselves on a reflection that takes its point of departure in rites and texts as these are now known to us from historical research and textual reconstruction. In following this mystagogical line of exposition, authors since early in the 20th century have pointed to the primacy of the sacramental Communion in the body and blood of Christ, noting that the center or focus of the Eucharist is there and not in the words of consecration. In conjunction with this, given the possibilities offered by textual research, liturgical theology includes the analysis of the rich variety of eucharistic prayers from a number of traditions which are now in hand. It is noted that the significance of the prayer comes out only when it is taken as a blessing prayer over food and drink to be shared, and that the meaning of the Communion rite is enriched by knowledge of the eucharistic prayer.

Communion. The mystérion or sacramentum is located essentially in sacramental Communion, as has been noted above. In other words, the action is of its very nature a communion in the body and blood of Christ, in commemoration of his passion and resurrection and in hope of a part in his now immortal life. The meaning is captured for all time by JUSTIN MARTYR:

We call this food the Eucharist Not as common bread or as common drink do we receive these, but just as through the word of God, Jesus Christ, our Saviour, became incarnate and took on flesh and blood for our salvation, so . . . the food over which we give thanks has been given by the prayer of his word, and which nourishes our flesh and blood by assimilation, is both the flesh and blood of that incarnate Jesus (Apologia I.66.2: PG 6,428).

Eucharistic Prayer. The text just quoted links the Communion to the "prayer of his word," to the giving of thanks over the food. It is to this that much study and reflection is now given.

The great thanksgiving prayer, also known as the anaphora, in its many different forms as known from different Church traditions, provides a rich theology of the Eucharist, as well as of the death and resurrection of Christ, of creation, of salvation history and of the Church. There have been many studies which attempt to reconstruct its early genesis, as well as comparative studies that work within the diversity of texts that have come down to us. The best collection of texts, though by no means complete, remains that of Anton Hänggi and Irmard Pahl, Prex Eucharistica as noted below in the bibliography. The most complete analysis of texts is the 1966–68 study of Louis Bouyer, though it has been greatly completed in the intervening years by way of studies of particular texts or traditions.

The genesis of the prayer is still a matter of conjecture, especially in its relation to Jewish blessing prayers. This may be another impossible quest. In the prayers now known to us from early centuries the structure is not always identical or strictly uniform but as a genre the anaphora combines praise, thanksgiving and intercession. Though it may not have been there from the very beginning, as traditions were consolidated the Last Supper account, with its memorial command, was placed at the heart of most prayers. Sometimes it is inserted into the prayer's thanksgiving and sometimes, as in the Roman Canon or the Liturgy of Mark, into its intercessions. The reason for the inclusion of the narrative has been clarified through structural studies of the prayer's composition. While Latin theology for a long time held the contrary, it seems that it was introduced into an already constituted prayer. Its purpose is not to give the words of Jesus a power in changing the bread and wine but to highlight the memorial command and the action of Jesus at the Last Supper as that to which eucharistic celebration looks back as foundation. To express this, what is said is that the supper narrative appears in the prayer as an embolism which gives warrant to the eucharistic action by recalling Jesus's memorial command. The sacramental efficacy of the prayer does not, therefore, come from a repetition of Jesus' words but from its inner nature as a memorial prayer.

Textual reconstruction provides only a few texts from the earliest Christian centuries, and it shows them to be very simple in structure, following quite closely the structure of Jewish blessing prayers at meals or in synagogue. Later developments of the prayer habitually included parts that are known as the anamnesis and the epiclesis, and these are fraught with theological significance. The first is an avowal that in sharing the bread and wine with thanksgiving, the Church is keeping memory of Christ's death, resurrection and ascension, in anticipation of his promised second coming. The second is an invocation that asks for the sending of the Holy Spirit that the prayer and action of the Church may be sacramentally and spiritually efficacious. As insertions into the early simple structure of the blessing prayer, these two sections act as a kind of poetic but theological explicitation of the meaning of Eucharist.

ANAMNESIS and EPICLESIS together relate the mystery commemorated to the time of the community that gathers, but always in eschatological anticipation. The present time, or presence in time, of those gathered is expressed most strongly in its bodily ritual, which refer it to daily time, to historical time and to cosmic time. The prayer allows the time of Christ to enter this time, as it brings it in turn into the time of Christ. Within the ordinary time of a community, the Pasch occurs sacramentally as a kind of irruption, Christ adventing anew to change the very direction of living by pointing it to the anticipation of the fullness of what has been anticipated and promised through the cross and resurrection.

One cannot look only to that section of the prayer called anamnesis to see how the mystery of Christ is commemorated. Since it is a later addition to the prayer, it is quite succinct and is usually a brief elenchus of the major moments of Christ's Pasch, such as in the Anaphora of John Chrysostom "all the things that were done for us: the cross, the tomb, the resurrection on the third day, the ascension into heaven, the session at the right hand, the second and glorious coming." In the thanksgiving section of the prayers there is a rich variety of metaphors to express the mystery of Christ. For example, the Anaphora of Basil recalls the mystery as the mystery of the kenosis of the Son, while the Anaphora of Addai and Mari posits redemption in the act itself of incarnation for in taking on flesh the Word restored creation, ready though he had to be to endure suffering and death. The prayers of the Alexandrine and Roman liturgies are more explicit in speaking of the sacrifice of Christ, though the sense of this is caught only by evoking the rich variety of Old Testament types, namely the Paschal Lamb, and the sacrifices of Abel, Abraham and Melchizedek. The thanksgiving also provides communities the opportunity to enlarge on what is commemorated by relating the memorial of Christ to the remembrance of creation and God's deeds as recounted in the Old Testament.

The intercessions express the truth of the Communion celebrated, remembering all who in one way or another are gathered into the sacramental commemoration and communion of the mystery of Christ and his Church. The earliest intercession (in the Didache) was simply a prayer for the Church that it may be true to its eschatological call. This was expanded to a naming of many persons, or groups of persons, living and dead, all of whom are remembered at the altar because all are one with the Church that makes memorial.

Sacrifice. It is within eucharistic prayers too that a development of sacrificial language is to be found. The Roman Canon is couched primarily in terms of sacrifice, but all texts, east and west, include some sacrificial language. In the first place, the eucharistic prayer is itself a sacrifice of thanksgiving offered by the Church. In the second place, the gifts of bread and wine, the offerings brought for the life of the community and for the poor, are rendered sacrificial by the inclusion of their offering in the prayer. In the third place, through this eucharistic commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ and through the sharing in his body and blood, the Church is taken into the sacrifice of Christ so that in this sacramental action it is shown forth as itself a living sacrifice and a royal priesthood. For these reasons and in these multiple ways, the Eucharist, as such, came to be called a sacrifice. To highlight that the whole action is done as a memorial of Christ's sacrifice and as a participation in it, it was called the sacramental representation of Christ's own sacrifice. As a result it came about in later times that when the Eucharist was called a sacrifice, this was taken to mean that it is the sacrifice of Christ himself, now however sacramentally offered as it was offered once and for all in the flesh upon the Cross. The full significance of such a theology is clear, however, only in the context of the other uses of sacrificial language within the eucharistic prayers of the Church.

As a result of attention to this liturgical history, and as a result of attention to the mystagogical catechesis of the Fathers of the Church, contemporary writers have retrieved the vocabulary of mystery, sacrament, memorial, anamnesis and epiclesis in elaborating theologies that depart from the rigorously definitional vocabulary of scholastic and of manual theologies. This kind of language too has been taken up in ecumenical dialogues as a way of overcoming past controversies within a retrieval of the larger tradition.

Receiving Past Doctrines and Theologies

For a long time, Catholic doctrine and theology were dominated by the concern with presence and sacrifice, while Protestant theology was dominated by a theology of the Word and its proclamation. What these systems meant then, and what they mean now, can be understood only by placing them in their proper historical context, seeing them as integral to the attempt to express eucharistic faith in the midst of controversies and disputes.

Three historical moments in the development of eucharistic thought are here addressed. The first is that of scholastic theology as the systematic resolution of disputes over the truth of Christ's presence in the sacrament that had gone on for some centuries. The second is that of the failed attempt to forge union between East and West at the Council of FLORENCE. The third is that of the 16th-century disputes between Reformers and the Roman Church, with their corresponding formulations of doctrine.

Scholasticism in context. At two different moments of its development, scholastic theology formulated explanations of Christ's eucharistic presence and of the commemoration of Christ's sacrifice that have prevailed in Catholic doctrine and theology until the present. The teaching on Christ's eucharistic presence reached its zenith in the theology and doctrine of transubstantiation of high scholasticism. The teaching on the sacrifice of the Mass owed its final formulation largely to later scholasticism, as is expounded on the practice of the Mass, almost on the eve of the Protestant REFORMATION.

Presence. To understand scholastic thought on Christ's presence in the sacrament, one has to take account of several of its concerns. The first was to meet practical questions such as those that arose from eucharistic devotion and Mass offerings and which had been highlighted by discussions over the manner of Christ's presence. The second was to meet new currents of philosophical thought, especially those marked by the retrieval of the texts of Aristotle. The third was to provide a systematic or scientific presentation as required by the standards of learning at the new universities, and one that would harmonize faith and reason in the presentation of the eucharistic sacrament.

These disputes date back to the ninth-century divergence between the monks RATRAMNUS and PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS and reached some kind of peak in the 11th century-opposition to the ideas of Berengar of Tours. Leaving a presentation of these controversies to others, the issues of scholastic theology may be best understood by seeing what were the questions that were asked when these issues arose.

From the time of Radbertus and Ratramnus, we can list three distinct questions: (a) what do communicants receive under the sign of the bread and wine; (b) how do the faithful participate in the mystery of Christ's passion, in sign and in truth or reality; (c) what is offered in the eucharistic sacrifice. The point that divided Ratramnus and Radbertus had to do with communion in the mystery of Christ's passion and communion in the Church, the body of Christ. The issue on which they divided was that of the relation of the sacrament and of what was received to the historical reality of Jesus. Ratramnus wished to stress that the mystery has to do with the communion between Christ and his members in the Eucharist that followed when his earthly or "historical" body had been transformed through the resurrection and now enjoys a glorified state of existence. This body cannot be present on earth as was the body in which he was born, lived and died, but whatever is said about the presence of Christ in the Eucharist has to be related to his communion with the Church as his Body.

Radbertus for his part was also primarily concerned with communion through the Eucharist in the mystery of the passion. In the first place, he said that the passion is present in sign (in signo) and in mystery (in mysterio) so that all could partake of its fruits and join with Christ in the spiritual offerings through which they imitate it. On the presence of Christ's body, he said that it was present in sign and in reality (in veritate). He wished to stress that what is present in the sacrament is indeed the same body in which Christ was born, lived, suffered and died, so that communicants are united with him in the mystery of his passion through communion with this body, in sign and in reality. To stress this reality, he failed to attend to the implications for presence of the glorification and transformation of Christ's body through the resurrection and so to the specific sacramental modality of this presence.

In the debate between BERENGAR and LANFRANC (et alii) there was a twofold practical issue: (a) how do the faithful have communion in the passion of Christ, through the bread and wine, and (b) what reverence is to be shown to the reserved sacrament and how may it be itself the object of cult. This latter question sprang from the emergence, at first within the liturgy and later also outside it, of various devotions surrounding the Sacrament, when it was treated in much the same fashion as the relics of the Cross of Calvary and the relics of saints.

Berengar, citing Augustine, stressed that Christ is present in the Sacrament through sign so that all explanation has to be related to what the sign signifies. However, he posed the question in terms of the disjunction: aut in signo aut in veritate (either in sign or in reality), without any third term. He thought that he could use the newly discovered logic of Aristotle to affirm that reality follows appearance, so that what appears is what is present. Hence, in the sacrament of the Eucharist, both the bread and the passion of Christ in which communicants share, are present, the former because of the appearances, the latter because of the sign value, to which Berengar attributed some, unspecified, reality other than subjective.

Whatever Berengar's intentions, he was understood to say that bread and wine are present in reality, and the body and passion of Christ in sign only, even though the sign offers a real communion with Christ in his passion. In response, Lanfranc suggested that some difference can be made between primary substance and secondary substance to explain how bread could appear and serve as sign, not however being present in its primary substance of food, and the body of Christ could be present in its primary substance, but not in its secondary substance of corporeal attributes or appearances.

Apart from these disputes a third element that had to be taken into account by scholastic theology was the inclusion of an article on TRANSUBSTANTIATION in the profession of faith imposed by the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (A.D. 1215) on the ALBIGENSIANS (DS 802). What was at issue in the profession was the power of the priest to consecrate bread and wine, changing them into the body and blood of Christ. To define this active agency, the Council used the word transubstantiate, which was later taken by scholastic theology to indicate the manner whereby Christ becomes present in the Eucharist and not only the fact of that presence.

In discussing the presence of Christ in the Eucharist, scholastic theologians from PETER LOMBARD onward did not concern themselves much with eucharistic devotions. Their intention was rather to uphold the truth or reality of the gift of Christ's body (and blood if the chalice was still given) in sacramental Communion, as this was expressed in the words "this is my body" and "this is my blood." Their answers to this could of course then be used in relation to his presence when the Sacrament was reserved or used in diverse forms of cult. What needed to be avoided was either a crude physicalism or a reduction of the Sacrament to a sign with referent but no inner reality.

It is important to note that the theories of presence were put in the broader context of the meaning of the Sacrament. By and large, the reason given for the institution of the Sacrament at the Last Supper was twofold: (a) communion with Christ in his passion /transitus /Pasch /sacrifice in faith and loving devotion through the Church's remembrance of the mystery and anticipation of its fulfillment; (b) the communion of the Church as one body in Christ, a communion of faith and charity. In this vein, the fruits of sacramental participation were said to be spiritual nourishment and increase of faith in the passion, communion in love, protection against sin, and the building up of the Church as a community in love.

Explanations of Christ's presence and of the manner in which the bread and wine were changed were couched in ways that showed an appreciation of workings of sign and signification, with due attention given to the reality which appears and is given through the sign. THOMAS AQUINAS was the one who most deeply appropriated the philosophy of Aristotle in explaining the relation between sign, cause and reality, but the concern mentioned is found generally among scholastic writers. What happened, however, was that the larger biblical signification of the paschal background, of the gift of food and drink and of the common table was gradually lost to view. Even though this was still evoked in the Summa theologiae of Thomas (III, Q. 73), when he came to the question of meaning and referent he looked solely to the words of Jesus in giving the bread and wine to the apostles (III, Q. 75).

Since these words were taken to point to Christ's body and blood as distinct material realities, what was sought was a philosophical analogy that would allow for the particularity of this unique sacramental presence and the reality of the gift offered to those who approach in faith. In keeping with the use of logic asserted by Berengar, Thomas said that in logic one has to assert a spiritual, not a physical presence, since Christ is physically present in heaven and by all evidence of the senses clearly not physically present in the Eucharist. On the other hand, logic, that is, the meaning of words and sentences in context, is the first and basic indication of what is being offered in this Sacrament, which is truly the body and blood of Christ. The logic of these words points directly to the body and the blood as such, but in virtue of the logic of concomitance, where the body is present, the whole Christ is present, body and blood, soul and divinity. In short, logic indicates a true presence, which is more than presence by sign, but a spiritual presence, which is unlike physical presence. What Aquinas did was to distinguish this from physical presence (per modum loci) and from presence purely through recall of the story (tantum in signo), neither of which could uphold the truth of the Sacrament. He also refused to accept the theory that affirmed the annihilation of the substance of bread and the substitution under its appearances of the substance of Christ's body, since he found this metaphysically absurd.

The analogy then which he offered in the Summa theologiae was that of instant substantial change (exclusion of process by some natural means) and substantial presence. This change is possible because the substance and accident of bread are not totally identifiable and the substantial reality of Christ's body and blood can take on a sacramental and signifying external appearance that is not its own. The negations of this analogy are as important as the affirmations. The analogy has to do with what is present and offered and received in the order of faith, not that of direct physical perception (as though Christ's body and blood in the sacrament could be seen if unveiled) or of reason (as though the object were comprehensible by reason).

DUNS SCOTUS found this explanation philosophically weak and inconsistent with the philosophy of Aristotle to which it appealed. He declared that it is simply impossible to offer an explanation. In line with his thinking of the distinction between God's potentia absoluta (what he could do if he so wished) and his potentia ordinata (what he did in fact do within his salvific design) he said that God might have brought about the eucharistic change in several ways, some of which would have seemed more reasonable, but that in fact he chose the more mysterious way of transubstantiation. Thus later theology was caught between the positions of Aquinas and Scotus, and it is in its latter form that the doctrine appears to have been known to the 16th-century Reformers.

Eucharistic sacrifice. If the nature of eucharistic sacrifice as an offering emerged as a question distinct from sacramental Communion, this was because of infrequent Communion and of the spreading practice of having priests offer the Mass for specific intentions determined by those who gave stipends to have Masses said. It did not in fact much preoccupy earlier scholastic theologians such as HUGH OF SAINT VICTOR, nor even Thomas Aquinas himself, though he clearly knew of the custom. His theory of sacramental representation in Summa theologiae III, q. 83, art. 1, however, could fit the situation, just as it fit the fuller sacramental action in which all took Communion.

In this text, Thomas responded to the question of whether the immolation of Christ is present in the rite of the Mass. He said that the sacrifice of the Cross is made present through representation and through an efficacious communion of its fruits given in reception of the Sacrament. The action in which the sacrifice is represented and the action by which the bread and wine are changed into Christ's body and blood coincide. This is the priest's utterance, speaking in the person of Christ, of the words of Christ over the gifts of bread and wine offered by the faithful. Thus, it is the priest who consummates the sacrifice as it is he, who as instrument of Christ, effects transubstantiation. Through Communion, all present can then benefit from the fruits of the sacrifice represented.

BONAVENTURE seemed more concerned about the offering of sacrifice by priests, both in the Breviloquium (VI. 9) and in his writings to members of the Franciscan Order. The latter show that his interest was spurred by the fact that many of them did indeed offer Mass for stipends and with little participation of the faithful. Why should this be important and how does it affect priestly spirituality? In approaching this question, Bonaventure distinguished between sacrifice and sacrament. When Christ becomes present through the signifying words of the priest, his flesh and blood may be offered as a sacrifice of propitiation, and they may be consumed in sacramental reception in a communion of faith, love and devotion.

This sacerdotal explanation of the offering of sacrifice gained great weight and was strongly proposed by Scotus and by Gabriel BIEL. Following Scotus, Biel elaborated on this in discussing the fruits of this offering and their application, since now one had to explain why the priest offered the Mass for specific intentions (Expositio in Canonem Missae, lectio 26). As representation of the Sacrifice of the Cross, the Mass is of infinite value but its fruits have to be applied, and this is done through the Mass according to a more restricted measure. In various writers, this was said to have to do with the merits of the Church in its currently living members, the merits of the one who offers the stipend or the merits of the priest. This sort of explanation could even give the impression that the Mass is a distinct offering from that of the Cross, though it is done entirely in dependence on it.

When current theology looks back to scholastic theology, it puts its explanations into historical context. It relates them clearly to the kind of issue that was at stake and to the ways of thinking that were then available. This means that questions about presence and sacrifice may be addressed in new contexts which change the questions and through new ways of thinking, even while respect is shown for what was said at that time. Even in scholastic theology, the question of presence was related to what Christ offered to his disciples and now offers to the Church through the elements of bread and wine, as it was also related to the sign value of offering under the appearances of bread and wine and with the invitation to eat and drink. The question of sacrifice is altered through the retrieval of a patristic perspective, that is, the sacramental representation of Christ's sacrifice is located in the act of giving gift and taking in Communion, not solely in the words spoken by the priest. The issue about the value of the Mass arose from what can only be considered an aberration in eucharistic practice, namely, the celebration of the Eucharist wherein only the priest took Communion.

Catholic and Orthodox Churches: The Council of Florence. The first doctrinal controversy to be taken into account is the formulation of differences between Catholic and Orthodox approaches to the mystery of the Eucharist at the Council of Florence, where attempts at reunion effectively failed (see Christian Unity: The Council of Florence, ed. Giuseppe Alberigo. Leuven 1991). As far as sacraments were concerned, the Greeks noted the absence of an epiclesis for the Spirit in the Latin eucharistic prayer, as well as the use of leavened bread by the East and of unleavened by the West. The question of purgatory was, likewise, a matter of dispute, and this involved differences over the western practice of offering the Mass for the deceased. In the definition of the synod aimed at union, Greeks and Latins agreed to differ on these practical points, without imposing any uniform procedure.

These points of debate, however, involve the pneumatological and eschatological understanding of the Church and of its sacraments, and are connected with the difference over the inclusion of the FILIOQUE in the creed. In confessing the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son, Latins took this as the foundation of an ecclesiology which saw a direct relation of the ordained to the Son, both in sacrament and in jurisdiction. At the Mass, the priest was said to speak the words of Christ in Christ's own person (in persona Christi), thus effecting consecration and sacrifice. There was no inclusion of the Spirit in the Roman Canon, but if pressed Latin theologians would say that the gift of the Spirit was one of the effects of Mass and sacrament.

In including an invocation for the sending of the Spirit in the Eucharist and in other sacramental prayers, the Eastern Church expressed the belief that Christ operated in the Church, and was united with it, through the action of the Holy Spirit. The Byzantine liturgical commentator, Nicholas CABASILAS, had offered an irenic resolution to the dispute between Greeks and Latins. He attributed the consecration of the bread and wine to the joint action of Word and Holy Spirit, through the words of Christ and the invocation of the Spirit (A Commentary on the Divine Liturgy, trans. J. M. Hussey & P. A. Mc-Nulty [London 1966] 69-79). The difference however remained. For Latins, the sanctification of gifts and the sanctification of the people are two distinct actions. Greek formulations expressed the view that the people are sanctified with and through the sanctification of their gifts. The invocation of the Spirit, moreover, reflects an ecclesiology which is centered in the Eucharist, where the Spirit is operative, and through which it is formed in the sacrament as the Body of Christ. Communion between Churches could not be attributed, as in the West, to the common submission to the one primatial jurisdiction. It has to come about as a communion between eucharistic communities, so that in some sense each local Church has its own independent, pneumatological and sacramental, center.

The question of eschatology that surfaced in the dispute about making suffrages for the dead is also involved with a sacramental ECCLESIOLOGY. To offer Mass for the dead is to attribute its efficacy for those departed this life to the power of the Church, and to extend ecclesiastical jurisdiction, in some manner, beyond life on this earth. For the East, however, the Communion between the living and the dead has to be seen as sacramental. When the departed are remembered in the Eucharist, it is as members of the communion in the Spirit which binds both the living and the dead, and the sacramental communion of the Body of Christ includes them. If there were disagreements between the Greeks and the Latins over purgatory as a place or state of existence, it had very much to do with this conception of the extension of the authority and power of Church and priesthood.

In recent times, the joint commission for dialogue between the Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches has issued a statement on "The Mystery of the Church and the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity" (The Quest for Unity: Orthodox and Catholics in Dialogue [Crestwood, N.Y. 1996] 53-64). The document presents the eucharistic celebration as that which makes present the Trinitarian mystery of the Church, or that which draws the Church into the communion between Father, Son and Spirit. It takes due note of the traditional terms of anamnesis, epiclesis and koinonia to express this active presence of the Trinity in the Eucharist and to show that the Church is nothing other than a visible and earthly participation in their communion. It speaks of how the communion of members in the Church is expressed in the Eucharist. It locates the manifestation of the universal Church in the eucharistic synaxis of the local Church, thus highlighting the importance of the local Church in the mystery of the Eucharist, even while addressing the apostolic communion that needs to exist between local Churches.

Sixteenth Century disputes and teachings. While not wanting to disregard the role of other Churches of the Reformation, attention is given here to the figures of Martin LUTHER and John CALVIN, since it was primarily their teaching that engaged the attention of the Council of Trent.

Martin Luther on the Lord's Supper. In Martin Luther's theology of the Lord's Supper and in his reform of its liturgy one has to keep in mind the fundamental role of doctrine of justification by faith and not by works, and of the importance he gave to preaching and hearing the Word of God. Already in the work, The Sacrament of the True Body and Blood of Christ and the Brotherhoods (LW 35, 49–73), he had underlined the link between sign, significance and faith. Fidelity to the sign would require restoration of the chalice to laity. The truth of significance is in the fellowship of communicants and incorporation with Christ and the saints, with serious consequences for the way in which the brotherhoods behave. Faith is no mere assent to doctrine but is found in desire, love and trust, attending to the connection between the gift of Christ's body in the flesh and the spiritual body of which recipients are members.

From early in his career as a reformer, Luther found some eucharistic practices abominable. These were the secret Mass, wherein the words of Christ are not proclaimed to the people, the exclusive use of Latin in the Mass, what he called the Private Mass, or the offering of a Mass at which the faithful do not receive communion. Along with this, there went the denial of the chalice to the laity and the acceptance of stipends.

In his early theological treatise, Treatise on the New Testament, That Is, the Holy Mass (LW 35, 94ff), he sketched out his understanding of what he still called the Mass. The Mass as instituted by Christ is a sacrament, not a sacrifice. In the words and signs of Jesus in the Supper Narrative, there is the sign and promise of the forgiveness of sins, to be received in faith, since this alone justifies and not works. This is summed up by Luther in the notion of a testament in which there is testator, heirs, testament, seal or sacrament, bequeathing of blessing of forgiveness of sins, and a command to keep memorial or proclaim the testament.

He sharpened his criticism of Roman practices in The Babylonian Captivity (LW 36, 11–57), finding in the Roman Mass as offered by a priest, a typical example of works righteousness. He excoriated the Church for the denial of the chalice to the laity which amounts to a denial of their priesthood and is against the Lord's command. While Luther strongly affirmed the presence of Christ in the sacrament, he found that the doctrine of transubstantiation treats the body and blood of Christ as a thing, destroys the signs of bread and wine and encourages devotions centered on thing, divorced from faith in the promise.

Later in his life, Luther had occasion to take up the cause of real presence against Ulrich ZWINGLI and others, something on which he expanded in the treatise Against the Fanatics (LW 36, 335-361), which is a work on the true presence of Christ's body and blood in the Lord's Supper. The terminology he chose to express this presence is that of "in, with and under" the bread and wine. He related it to Christ's Lordship over the Church. To illustrate its manner, meaning and purpose he employs some analogies. He compares it to the presence of an angel in a place, in order to undo any notion of the occupation of a physical location by Christ's body. He also compares it to the mystery of the Incarnation, where the divinity makes itself manifest through the humanity. In this context, he speaks of a communication of properties between the humanity and divinity of Christ through the resurrection, which allows the humanity to share in the divine ubiquity.

John Calvin on the Lord's Supper. For Calvin too, the Roman errors about the Lord's Supper are that the Mass is a sacrifice, the silent recitation of the Mass in which the word of Christ is suppressed, and the teaching on transubstantiation.

As John Calvin explains it in the Institutes of the Christian Religion, BK IV.XVII, the doctrine of the Lord's Supper necessarily supposes the doctrine on baptism. In this sacrament, the baptized are made members of God's family, they are promised life, delivered from death and imprinted with the Holy Spirit on their hearts. They are justified by God's free grace and made holy, even though in their works they remain sinners and have nothing of their own on which they can rely. For them, Jesus Christ is the only spiritual nourishment of the soul. This is given in the word of the Gospel and in the visible signs of the bread and the wine added to this word, so that through word and sign the baptized have communion in the body and blood of Jesus Christ. The reason for the institution of the Lord's Supper by Jesus Christ is to seal in the consciences of the baptized the promises of the Gospel, and so to teach reliance in faith on the salvation assured them. In this way, despite their sinfulness they may be led to laud and magnify Christ and strive for the holiness that befits his members.

When he turns to the question as to what is given, Calvin says that it is Jesus Christ, the source and substance of all good, and the fruit and efficacy of his death and passion. The bread is called the body of Christ and the wine his blood, because he is given to those who receive as the substance and foundation of all spiritual benefits. Like Luther, John Calvin rejected the doctrine of transubstantiation as an abomination, but asserted that sacramental Communion is a true communication of Jesus Christ. The bread and wine are visible signs, instruments, representations, of the body and blood which are given, and are signs in no way separable from the reality and substance of what they signify. The body and blood of Jesus Christ, in which he lived on earth, in which he is present in heaven, is made present to the believer by the secret power of the Holy Spirit, who is the bond between Christ and the believer and the bond of the Church which is his Body. Through this gift Jesus Christ operates in the communicant by the Holy Spirit, who is conjoined with the gift and its signs.

The Council of Trent on the Eucharist. When the Council of Trent debated the Eucharist in response to the attacks of the Reformers on Catholic doctrine, it read their own teaching as denials of the truth of the eucharistic sacrament. In the presentation of its own doctrine, it reflected the existing split between offering the Mass and sacramental Communion by dealing with the Sacrifice of the Eucharist and the Sacrament of the Eucharist in two separate decrees. It also failed to resolve the issue of the restoration of the chalice to the laity (and thus of the restoration of the full sacramental sign), but left this as a matter ultimately to be resolved by the pope and the Roman curia. Since the Council was reacting against the Reformers, it also proceeded in large measure by singling out what were considered errors in their writings and by condemning these.

On the subject of Christ's presence, the Council retained and affirmed the standard vocabulary of substantial presence and substantial change, adding that this is aptly called transubstantiation (DS 1636, 1637, 1642). Since the acts of the Council make it clear that the Fathers did not wish to embrace any particular explanation or decide on questions debated between schools of theology, in recent times there is considerable debate as to the exact meaning of this doctrinal teaching, as also about the exact object and meaning of the condemnations pronounced against Reformation teaching.

On a practical level, the Council wished to defend and sustain many of the eucharistic devotions against which the Reformers raged (DS 1643, 1644). However, its explanation of the change that takes place is more closely related to eucharistic celebration than was realized in the manual and catechetical teaching which followed Trent. The exposition of eucharistic faith in the chapters of the decree places the question of Christ's presence in the context of Christ's desire to leave a memorial of his death and spiritual food for his disciples (DS 1638). In interpreting the words of Jesus at the Supper, the offer of his body and blood is related to the blessing (benedictio) which he pronounced over the bread and the wine (DS 1632). If this is transposed to the celebration of the Eucharist by the Church, the conciliar teaching shows an awareness of the link between blessing prayer, consecration of the gifts and Communion that was often forgotten in the theology of the post-tridentine era. This is offered as an explanation of the eucharistic gift that is based on words of Jesus at the Last Supper.

In distinguishing between substance and species, preferring this word to accidents, the Council wanted to distinguish between the proper and definitive reality of what results from the priest's blessing or consecration and the way in which the reality presents itself. As made clear in some of the condemnations or anathemas (DS 1651, 1652), for the Council to reduce this to mere spiritual sign or symbolism, or to say that the body of Christ and the bread are present together, would deny both the truth of the sign and the reality offered. While these condemnations do not reflect a careful reading and understanding of Reformation theology, they do interpret the sense of the conciliar decree. Some contemporary theologians think that a clear distinction needs to be made between what is said by the Council and the thought of scholastic theology, despite the similarity in vocabulary. Scholastic theology, especially Thomism, wanted to give an ontological explanation of both presence and change. The explanations of the conciliar decree are intended to be more logical than ontological, that is, assertions that result from the truth value of the words of Jesus. It is to the scriptures that the Council wished ultimately to point for the truth of the mystery, not to medieval theology.

Thus in recent ecumenical dialogue, it has been agreed that the teachings of Luther, Calvin and Trent, despite the acrimony of the time and the mutual condemnations, were three different ways of attempting to safeguard and explain the same fundamental truth. All referred, on the one hand, to the words of Jesus in the New Testament and on the other to the nature of the sacramental sign left to the Church. They all wished to affirm and teach the self-gift of Christ in sacramental Communion, though Trent was also preoccupied about the presence that remains when the celebration ends. Having examined the disputes in historical context to find the reasons for mutual condemnations and for choosing diverse formulas, the partners in the dialogue between Catholics and Lutherans summarizes what could now be said to be the common teaching of the Churches on the presence of Christ: The exalted Lord is present in the Lord's Supper, in the body and blood he gave, with his divinity and his humanity, through the word of promise in the meal gifts of bread and wine, in the power of the Holy Spirit, for reception by the congregation (Condemnations of the Reformation Era, 115). Beyond this common teaching, differences of explanation still remain but they are not antithetically opposed to one another as was supposed in the sixteenth century.

When the Council of Trent formulated its doctrine on the Sacrifice of the Mass, it had in mind both the defense of the offering of the Mass by priests for the living and the dead and a statement of teaching that would not fall prey to the Protestant objection that this derogates from the once and for all sufficiency of the sacrifice of the Cross. Hence its main doctrinal proposition is that the sacrifice of the Mass is the memorial and representation of the sacrifice of the Cross, in which priest, victim and offering are the same, and only the sacramental manner of offering different from the bloody offering of Calvary (DS 1739).

It also repeated what was then the standard teaching, that the offering of the Mass by the priest is a sacrifice of propitiation and no mere commemoration (DS 1753), and that this serves as one mode of applying the merits of Christ on the Cross to the living and the dead (DS 1743). This was intended to affirm the value of the offering by the priest, even if no faithful received Communion (DS 1747). The Fathers of the Council, however, chose not to take any position on how this application was effected or on the measure of the value attached to the offering. In short, this is a clear case of wanting to defend a practice without offering much doctrinal explanation of how it operates. As a premise to its treatment of the private Mass, the Council did say that the best manner in which the faithful may receive the fruits of the Eucharist is through sacramental Communion. Nonetheless, its teaching distinguishes between two ways of benefiting from celebration of the memorial of Christ's passion. One is by sacramental Communion, the other by the application of the merits of his passion through the offering made by the priest.

Contemporary readings. In contemporary readings of Trent on sacrifice, Catholic theologians note that its teaching was historically conditioned, both by the liturgical practices of the time and by the defensive attitude it took against the accusations of the Reformers. They see the need to bring sacrifice and sacrament closer together in practice and in theology, recognizing that the ordinary mode of participating in the sacramental mystery is through communion in the body and blood of Christ. The separation of the doctrine of the Eucharist into two decrees has to be overcome. In doing this, it is to be noted that the Council itself took the memorial character of the Eucharist as its starting-point in both decrees and that in both decrees it made some link between eucharistic blessing, offering, sacramental change and communion. In this it was faithful to that fuller eucharistic tradition into which contemporary theology now needs to place the conciliar teaching on the specific points that were its dominant concern.

Ecumenically, it is recognized that liturgical reform has gone a long way in bringing Churches together in their practice and in their eucharistic faith. A liturgical celebration in which proclamation of the word, the prayer of thanksgiving and sacramental Communion by all, have due place provides a new foundation for doctrinal and theological explanation. Doctrinally, to find a common stance, appeal is made to the ideas of memorial, representation and sacramental sacrifice. As it has been put by one agreed statement, "it has been found possible to state in common our believing conviction about the uniqueness and full sufficiency of Jesus Christ's sacrifice on the cross, as well as the bearing and scope of the anamnesis in the eucharistic celebration of the church" (The Condemnations of the Reformation Era, 114). For its part, at the head of its treatment of the sacrament of the Eucharist, The Catechism of the Catholic Church chose to place this citation of art. 47 from the Constitution on the Liturgy of the Second VATICAN COUNCIL:

> At the Last Supper, on the night he was betrayed, our Saviour instituted the Eucharistic sacrifice of his Body and Blood. This he did in order to perpetuate the sacrifice of the cross throughout the ages until he should come again, and so to entrust to his beloved Spouse, the Church, a memorial of his death and resurrection: a sacrament of love, a sign of unity, a bond of charity, a Paschal banquet in which Christ is consumed, the mind is filled with grace and a pledge of future glory is given to us.

Apart from finding a language on sacrifice that meets with agreement, giving priority to the gift offered by the Father is another way of stating a point of convergence on Christ's presence, one that helps to establish the connection between sacrifice and presence. As stated in the Faith and Order paper no. 111 of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, "the Eucharist is essentially the sacrament of the gift which God makes to us in Christ through the power of the Holy Spirit" (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry. Geneva: World Council of Churches, 1982, 10).

Past doctrines and theological systems are explained and appropriated into contemporary doctrine and theology in three ways. First, their historical setting is recognized, even as the questions raised are accepted as matters of continued importance. Second, they are read in a new context, one that is in great part constituted by liturgical reforms that bring Churches closer to the early tradition of eucharistic celebration, so that all doctrinal and theological explanation may be related to this. Third, a closer reading of scriptural foundations and patristic teaching offers a new point of departure for critically receiving the formulations and approaches of later eras.

Contemporary Trends in Catholic Theology

Much of Catholic writing on the Eucharist in recent years has to do with revisiting scriptural origins and revisiting the past, as this has been presented here. There has also been a kind of modern liturgical mystagogy, drawing on insights from studies of symbol, ritual, language and culture. There is, however, some move towards a new catechetical and theological synthesis and there have been some important contributions from systematic theologians, of which two will be mentioned here, namely Karl Rahner and Hans Urs von Balthasar, as those who have had the greatest impact on theological thinking about the Eucharist.

As already said, a fundamental principle is that the Eucharist is the Sacrament of the Body of Christ, head and members. What needs to be explained is the communion of Christ with his Church through the celebration of Eucharist in which all take part. The concept of memorial underpins much of the writing about the Eucharist. This seems to be warranted by Scripture, Liturgy and patristics, and it has also proved effective in finding the central point of agreement between Churches of different traditions. With the turn to memorial, the role of the Spirit in the eucharistic liturgy is also emphasized, for it is the gift of the Spirit that makes memorial possible. When it comes to explanation, however, there are diverse ways of understanding what memorial means.

The Second Vatican Council chose to expand on this by attending to the diverse ways in which Christ is present in the liturgy (SC 7), drawing the Church into his mystery, and some theologians have followed this line of thought. Some have followed the orientation of Odo Casel's reading of the patristic and liturgical tradition, by which he speaks of the making present of the Paschal Mystery in the assembly (Das Mysteriengedächtnis der Messliturgie im Lichte der Tradition [Münster 1926). Amending this somewhat by reason of a look at Semitic sources and the relation of the Jewish people to the first Pasch, some (e.g. Cesare Giraudo, Eucaristia per la chiesa) prefer to speak of the Church's being rendered present to the past event of Christ's transitus or passage. There are also those (e.g. Edward Kilmartin, The Eucharist in the West) who attribute the continuing efficacy of Christ's Pasch in the Eucharist to the operation of the Holy Spirit, which draws the faithful into the offering of Christ's sacrifice.

The contribution of Karl RAHNER to eucharistic theology remains of importance. In the first place, he noted that all reflection on the Eucharist must derive from the conjunction in one celebration of proclamation of the Word, thanksgiving blessing and eucharistic gift. To this celebration he attributed the notion of event, seeing in it the event of the grace of Christ's Pasch and of God's selfcommunication in the Church. To explain this event, he used his theory of symbolic causality. Symbolic interaction is the key to human becoming, as it is the key to the presence of one to another. Indeed, the two converge, for one person in becoming present to another, or indeed to a community and a tradition, becomes in the process more fully oneself. By analogy, God can be said to be present to the world through the Word Incarnate and through the symbols by which memorial is kept of his incarnate mysteries. By their own participation in this symbolic interaction, responding to the free and committed offer of the gift of the divine self, the members of the Church become present to God, to each other and to the world. Traditions on eucharistic sacrifice and presence are readily appropriated into this symbolic and dynamic way of looking at the eucharistic memorial.

Building on this, others (see David Power, The Eucharistic Mystery) integrate the role of the paschal narrative, or of the supper narrative more fully. These narratives, with the cross and the death of Christ at their center, disrupt the habitual mythical and metaphysical thinking of peoples. They call for a new relation to the possibilities of being and time, a new perspective on the future, and a new way of naming the God who effaces the divine self in the kenotic gift of the Son and the operation of the Spirit which enables the Church to keep memorial of this kenosis.

Hans Urs von BALTHASAR eschews the language of symbolic causality as an excessive attention to the human and the building of divine analogies on human concepts. Theological language has to find its point of departure in the Cross of Christ and to develop an understanding of the Eucharist that relates to the drama of divine kenosis. Eucharistic theology needs to concentrate on the event of spousal encounter between Christ and the Church in the act of the meal, where the sacrament is eaten and God is thanked. This is constitutive of the Church as his Body and constitutive of the Church's relation to the world.

He traces the relation of the Church to Christ as a share in his relation to the Father which is expressed in eucharistia and which itself originates within the life of the trinity of persons.

Within their eternal relationship, the Son wishes to be nothing but the icon of the Father. The Son is empty of anything that is peculiar to himself outside his relationship to the Father, of anything that is not reflective of the image of the Father. In his incarnate being and through the Cross, the Son continues to live and to act in this kenotic and iconic relation to the Father. By this he enters into the drama of a sinful world offered redemption by God and it is by such a process that he enters with his humanity into the eternal relation of Father and Son. He left the memorial of this Pasch to the Church so that the Church's eucharistic action could be its participation, as spouse of Christ, in the eternal movement of the Son to the Father as it was lived out in the drama of his presence in the world. It is by this same token, that the Eucharist is the sacrament of Communion, of the communion of the Church in the divine communion of persons. Eucharistic sacrifice is then seen as the Church's entry, by Christ's gift, into the divine drama of kenosis, lived out in the world. Transubstantiation, better called substantial conversion, stands for the taking of a form in the present of Christ's engagement with God and with the world, through his spousal communion with his Church. To affirm that Christ is eucharistically present to his Church is to advert to the iconic form in which he offers himself and draws the Church to himself, in his relation to the Father.

Conclusion. The purpose of this entry has been to give an overview of the processes of contemporary Catholic theology in studying and presenting the mystery of the Eucharist. The importance of a renewal of biblical, patristic and liturgical studies was first noted, with some indication of how these have contributed to the celebration and the understanding of the Eucharist. Since Catholic theology depended for several centuries, and up to the present, on scholastic theology and on the teachings of the Council of Trent, it was then shown how these are now being read and integrated into new approaches that are more sensitive to ecumenical dialogue and to contemporary human life. In addition, some information was given about how these approaches affect systematic theology and a brief summary was offered of the contribution of two leading writers of the 20th century.

Bibliography: L. BOUYER, Eucharist: Theology and Spirituality of the Eucharistic Prayer (Notre Dame and London 1968). E. DUMOUTET, Le Christ selon le chair et la vie liturgique au moyenâge (Paris 1932). B. A. GERRISH, Grace and Gratitude: The Eucharistic Theology of John Calvin (Minneapolis 1993). C. GIRAUDO, Eucaristia per la chiesa: prospettive teologiche sull'eucaristia a partire della "lex orandi" (Rome & Brescia 1986). E. J. KILMAR-TIN, The Eucharist in the West: History and Theology (Collegeville 1998). E. LA VERDIERE, The Eucharist in the New Testament and the Early Church (Collegeville 1996). K. LEHMANN, & W. PANNEN-BERG, eds. The Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still Divide? (Minneapolis 1990). X. LÉON-DUFOUR, Sharing the Eucharistic Bread: The Witness of the New Testament (New York/ Mahwah 1982). H. R. MCADOO and K. STEVENSON, The Mystery of the Eucharist in the Anglican Tradition (Norwich 1995). P. MCPAR-TLAN, The Eucharist Makes the Church: Henri de Lubac and John Zizioulas in Dialogue (Edinburgh 1993). G. MACY, The Banquet's Wisdom: A Short History of the Theologies of the Lord's Supper (New York/Mahwah 1992). E. MAZZA, La Celebrazione eucaristica. Genesi del rito e sviluppo dell'interpretazione (Milano 1996). H. B. MEYER, Eucharistie. Gottesdienst der Kirche IV (Regensburg 1989). N. MITCHELL, Cult and Controversy: The Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass (New York 1982). D. N. POWER, The Eucharistic Mystery: Revitalizing the Tradition (New York 1992). K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations IV (New York 1984). E. SCHIL-LEBEECKX, The Eucharist (New York 1968). A. SCHMEMANN, The Eucharist: Sacrament of the Kingdom (Crestwood, New York 1988). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, "The Mass: A Sacrifice of the Church?" In Explorations in Theology, v. III (San Francisco 1993), 185-243. H. WYBREW, The Orthodox Liturgy: The Development of the Eucharistic Liturgy in the Byzantine Rite (New York 1990).

[D. N. POWER]

EUCHARIST OUTSIDE MASS, WORSHIP OF THE

On the feast of Corpus Christi, June 21, 1973, the Congregation of Divine Worship revised the regulations regarding "Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass" (HCWE). Two decades later (in 1994), certain aspects of the teaching found in HCWE were reiterated in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (CCC). "Because Christ himself is present in the sacrament of the altar, he is to be honored with the worship of adoration. 'To visit the Blessed Sacrament is . . . a proof of gratitude, an expression of love, and a duty of adoration toward Christ our Lord"' (Paul VI, Mysterium Fidei 66)" (CCC 1418). This article focuses upon the principles and practices described in both these documents.

Hand tooled metal Communion bowl, 10th Century, Museum of Fine Arts, Tbilisi, Russia. (©Dean Conger/Corbis)

Principles. "Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass'' (79, 81) reaffirms the Church's teaching that the liturgical assembly's celebration of Mass is the "source and culmination of the whole Christian life," and that "prayer before Christ the Lord sacramentally present" in the reserved Sacrament "extends the union with Christ which the faithful have reached in Communion." Thus the liturgical celebration of Mass is both "the origin and the goal of the worship which is shown to the Eucharist outside Mass" (HCWE 2). Thus the altar, not the tabernacle, is the center of Christian worship. But because the Eucharist is reserved, it is fitting and proper that it be adored. The legislation of the Church has always been clear on this point. Participation in the Mass has always been fostered, while exposition of the reserved Eucharist is limited to extraordinary occasions.

The primary and original reason for reservation of the Eucharist is, of course, to provide Communion for the sick and dying (VIATICUM). The secondary reasons are to provide Communion outside Mass and to permit adoration of Christ in the reserved Sacrament. Following the lead of Vatican Council II (Sacrosanctum Concilium, 7), HCWE affirms the many presences of Christ in his Church. "First, he is present in the very assembly of the faithful, gathered together in his name; next he is present in his word, when the Scriptures are read in the Church and explained; then in the person of the minister; finally and above all, in the eucharistic Sacrament'' (HCWE 6). Among these many presences of Christ, the eucharistic presence is distinctive and preeminent: "In a way that is completely unique, the whole and entire Christ, God and man, is substantially and permanently present in the Sacrament" (HCWE 6). For this reason, "it is highly recommended that the place [for the reservation of the Eucharist] be suitable . . . for private adoration and prayer, so that the faithful may easily, fruitfully, and constantly honor the Lord through personal worship" (HCWE 9). Finally, HCWE notes that because the celebration of Mass is source and summit of the Church's activity, "Eucharistic devotions should be in harmony with the Sacred Liturgy, take their origin from the Liturgy, and lead people back to the Liturgy" (HCWE 79).

In light of these principles, HCWE provides liturgical forms for Holy Communion outside Mass (Chapter I), for Communion of the sick and dying (Chapter II), and for worship of the Eucharist outside Mass (Chapter III). Among the latter are exposition and benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, eucharistic processions, and eucharistic congresses.

Exposition and Benediction. "Exposition of the Holy Eucharist, either in the ciborium or in the monstrance, is intended to acknowledge Christ's marvelous presence in the Sacrament'' (HCWE 82). In light of the principle found in HCWE 79, however, "exposition must clearly express the cult of the Blessed Sacrament in its relationship to the Mass'' (HCWE 82). For that reason, "Mass is prohibited in the body of the church" while exposition is taking place (HCWE 83). "If exposition of the Blessed Sacrament is extended for an entire day or over several days, it is to be interrupted during the celebration of Mass'' (HCWE 83). During the exposition, customary signs of reverence are used (lighted candles, incense) and "there should be prayers, songs, and readings . . . To encourage a prayerful spirit, there should be readings from Scripture with a homily or brief exhoration" (HCWE 85; 93-94). Silence, song, and praying parts of the Liturgy of the Hours are also appropriate (HCWE 95-96).

Exposition ordinarily concludes with benediction and reposition of the Sacrament in the tabernacle (HCWE 97–100); however, "exposition which is held exclusively for the giving of benediction is prohibited"(HCWE 89). Historically, benediction probably developed from the showing of the Host at the various stations of the Corpus Christi procession. The first known example of Benediction similar to that common today was at Hildesheim in the fifteenth century. It was a response to the growing desire on the part of the faithful to look upon the Host, a desire enhanced by the earlier theological disputes over transubstantiation and the exact moment of consecration. Concurrent with the strengthening of this desire was the gradual introduction of an evening service for the faithful centered around the Salve Regina, which had been composed in the eleventh century. By 1221 it had been joined to Compline in the Dominican monastery in Bologna. As early as 1250, it was part of a popular evening devotion in France. During the next two or three centuries the two devotions, one to the Blessed Mother, the other to the Blessed Sacrament, were combined, whence Benediction is still known in France as Le Salut.

The rite of benediction given in HCWE is simple; it consists of a eucharistic hymn or song, incensation (if the Sacrament is exposed in a monstrance), a brief period of silence, prayer, a blessing of the people with the monstrance (or ciborium) in the form of a cross (the priest or deacon wearing a humeral veil), reposition of the Sacrament, and concluding acclamation (HCWE 97–100).

Processions. It is for the local ordinary to judge whether eucharistic processions are opportune in today's circumstances (HCWE 101). Some processions, such as the annual procession on the feast of Corpus Christi, have "special importance and meaning for the pastoral life of the parish or city," and hence it is "desirable to continue this procession, in accordance with the law, when today's circumstances permit and when it can truly be a sign of common faith and adoration"(HCWE 102). Such processions "should be arranged in accordance with local customs" (HCWE 104). The priest who carries the Sacrament in procession may wear a chasuble (if Mass has just been celebrated) or cope (HCWE 105). Again, "in accordance with local customs," lights and incense accompany the Blessed Sacrament, which is carried under a canopy (HCWE 106). At the end of the procession, benediction is given and the Sacrament is reposed (HCWE 108).

Congresses. Finally, HCWE speaks of "eucharistic congresses [which] have been introduced into the life of the Church in recent years as a special manifestation of eucharistic worship" (HCWE 109). These large assemblies may be international, national, regional, or local. Their purpose is to deepen understanding of, and devotion to, the Eucharist by gathering "an individual local church," or "the entire local church," or even all the churches "of a single region or nation or even of the entire world" for the sake of manifesting "some aspect of the eucharistic mystery" and expressing through public worship "the bond of charity and unity" (HCWE 109). "Specialists in theological, biblical, liturgical, pastoral, and humane studies" are to be consulted beforehand concerning the place, theme, and program of the congress (HCWE 110). HCWE also encourages sound catechesis and "more active participation in the Liturgy" as appropriate preludes to a congress (HCWE 111). Criteria for celebrating the congress are also provided (HCWE 112). Such gatherings were especially popular in Catholic dioceses during the Jubilee Year 2000.

Historically, the origins of eucharistic congresses can be traced back to the work of Marie Marthe Emilia Tamisier (d. 1910), who first encouraged pilgrimages to places in her native France where eucharistic miracles were commemorated: Avignon, Ars, Douai, Paris, and Paray-le-Monial. The experience of seeing about 60 members of the French Parliament kneel in Margaret Mary Alacoque's chapel at Paray-le-Monial and pledge themselves to resist the secularist policies of the French government, convinced Tamisier of the potential that could be unleashed if Christians were brought together to profess their faith in the Eucharist and in the teachings of Christ. Thus, at the outset there was a socio-political dimension to such gatherings, especially in places where conflict between Church and culture was acute.

A Pontifical Committee for International Eucharistic Congresses was instituted in 1879 by Pope Leo XIII; more than a century later (1986), it was established with new statutes by Pope John Paul II. The first attempts at organizing a eucharistic congress in Europe failed, but one was eventually held at the University of Lille in June of 1881 with 800 people attending from Belgium, England, Spain, France, Holland, and Switzerland. Numerous such meetings followed, and it became customary for the pope ro honor the international eucharistic congress by the presence of a legate a latere. After the congress at Lourdes in 1914, meetings were interrupted by World War I. At the congress in Rome, 1922, Pope Pius XI decreed that future meetings be held every two years. From then until World War II regular international congresses were held, including meetings in Africa, South America, Australia, and the Philippines. International congresses were resumed in 1952, and they have continued (at irregular intervals) until the present time.

See Also: EUCHARISTIC CONGRESSES.

Bibliography: N. MITCHELL, Cult and Controversy: The Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass (New York 1982). Pontifical Committee for International Eucharistic Congresses, I Congressi

Eucaristici Internazionali per una Nuova Evangelizzaione (Città del Vaticano 1991).

[N. D. MITCHELL]

EUCHARISTIC CONGRESSES

These are large assemblies that may be international, national, regional, or local, which seek to deepen understanding of, and devotion to, the eucharist by gathering "an individual local church," or "the entire local church," or even all the churches "of a single region or nation or even of the entire world" for the sake of manifesting "some aspect of the eucharistic mystery" and expressing through public worship "the bond of charity and unity" (HCWE 109).

Historically, the origins of eucharistic congresses can be traced back to the work of Marie Marthe Emilia Tamisier (d. 1910), who first encouraged pilgrimages to places in her native France where Eucharistic miracles were commemorated: Avignon, Ars, Douai, Paris, and Paray-le-Monial. The experience of seeing about 60 members of the French Parliament kneel in Margaret Mary Alacoque's chapel at Paray-le-Monial and pledge themselves to resist the secularist policies of the French government convinced Tamisier of the potential that could be unleashed if Christians were brought together to profess their faith in the Eucharist and in the teachings of Christ. Thus, at the outset there was a sociopolitical dimension to such gatherings, especially in places where conflict between Church and culture was acute.

A Pontifical Committee for International Eucharistic Congresses was instituted in 1879 by Pope Leo XIII. More than a century later (1986), it was established with new statutes by Pope John Paul II. The first attempts at organizing a eucharistic congress in Europe failed, but one was eventually held at the University of Lille in June of 1881 with 800 people attending from Belgium, England, Spain, France, Holland, and Switzerland. Numerous such meetings followed, and it became customary for the pope to honor the international Eucharistic congress by the presence of a legate, a latere. After the congress at Lourdes in 1914 meetings were interrupted by World War I. At the congress in Rome, 1922, Pope Pius XI decreed that future meetings be held every two years. From then until World War II regular international congresses were held including meetings in Africa, South America, Australia, and the Philippines. International congresses were resumed in 1952, and have continued (at irregular intervals) until the present time.

A list of international Eucharistic congresses follows: (1) Lille, 1881; (2) Avignon, 1882; (3) Liège, 1883;

Cardinal Rugambua (left) and Cardinal Browne during the 1963 Eucharistic Congress, 'Our Lady' Cathedral, Munich, Germany. (© David Lees/CORBIS)

(4) Fribourg, 1885; (5) Toulouse, 1886; (6) Paris, 1888; (7) Antwerp, 1890; (8) Jerusalem, 1893; (9) Reims, 1894; (10) Paray-le-Monial, 1897; (11) Brussels, 1898; (12) Lourdes, 1899; (13) Angers, 1901; (14) Namur, 1902; (15) Angouleme, 1904; (16) Rome, 1905; (17) Tournai, 1906; (18) Metz, 1907; (19) London, 1908; (20) Cologne, 1909; (21) Montreal, 1910; (22) Madrid, 1911; (23) Vienna, 1912; (24) Malta, 1913; (25) Lourdes, 1914; (26) Rome, 1922; (27) Amsterdam, 1924; (28) Chicago, 1926; (29) Sydney, 1928; (30) Carthage, 1930; (31) Dublin, 1932; (32) Buenos Aires, 1934; (33) Manilla, 1937; (34) Budapest, 1938; (35) Barcelona, 1952; (36) Rio de Janeiro, 1955; (37) Munich, 1960; (38) Bombay, 1964; (39) Bogata, 1968; (40) Melbourne, 1973; (41) Philadelphia, 1976; (42) Lourdes, 1981; (43) Nairobi, 1985; (44) Seoul, 1989; (45) Seville, 1993; (46) Wroclaw, Poland, 1997; (47) Rome, 2000.

Bibliography: N. MITCHELL, Cult and Controversy: The Worship of the Eucharist outside Mass (New York 1982). Pontifical Committee for International Eucharistic Congresses, I Congressi Eucaristici Internazionali per una Nuova Evangelizzaione (Vatican City 1991).

[N. MITCHELL]

EUCHARISTIC DEVOTION

As Herbert Thurston noted a century ago, a devotional cult of the eucharist outside the liturgy became possible in the Western Church only after the ceremonial reservation of the sacrament developed. While the custom of reserving the sacrament to communicate the sick, the dying, or those absent from the Sunday assembly is itself very ancient (see, e.g., Justin Martyr, First Apology, 65.5), special signs of external adoration (e.g., genuflection, lighted candles) are not. From the first millennium of Church history, there is no reliable evidence for reserving the eucharist so the faithful could ''visit'' it, pray in its presence, or honor it with special marks of devotion. And to this day, the Greek Church knows no devotional cult of the eucharist outside the liturgy.

Visits to the Blessed Sacrament. For more than a millennium there was no uniform manner or place of eucharistic reservation. Sometimes Christians took the sacrament home for communion during the week (Apostolic Tradition, 36–38); sometimes clergy reserved it (without ceremony) in the sacristy. Before the 12th century any ritual or private honor to the Eucharist outside Mass was virtually impossible because there were no tabernacles visible in the churches. The Sacrament was kept privately for emergencies, as the Holy Oils are often kept today. But by the beginning of the 13th century devotions toward the reserved eucharist were emerging. The English Ancren Riwle (ca. 1200) tells anchoresses to kneel down each morning and salute the sacrament "which is over the high altar" with a prayer that begins, "Hail, source of our creation!" Such devotional attention to the eucharist (reserved in church) reflects both a growing consciousness of the important role of Christ's human nature in salvation and a desire by the faithful to see and adore the consecrated Host. Still, there remained considerable variation in the manner of reservation. Vessels of precious metal in the form of a tower or dove (suspended by a cord over the church's principal altar) were common in England and France, while in Germany a "sacrament house'' was sometimes constructed on the north side of the church.

From the 12th and 13th centuries onward, there is mounting evidence that visits to the Blessed Sacrament were made to honor Christ or to pray for special favors. Thomas Becket told King Henry II that he prayed for him "before the Majesty of the Body of Christ." At the end of the 14th century private devotion at the place of reservation was common among lay Christians, monks, and religious women. Luther and other reformers objected to this adoration. The Council of TRENT in its Decree on the Holy Eucharist, 1551, defended the Feast of Corpus Christi and, in general, the honor and adoration given to the Blessed Sacrament. In the next two centuries there appeared many devotional books advocating visits to the place of reservation, notably St. ALPHONSUS LIGOURI'S Visits to the Blessed Sacrament, which has gone through more than 2000 editions in 39 languages since 1745.

Nocturnal and Perpetual Adoration. The devotional practice (perpetual or intermittent) of adoring Christ present in the eucharist thus expanded rapidly during medieval and early modern times. Isolated cases of nocturnal adoration had already appeared in the early 13th century. In 1226 the Holy See approved adoration of the Eucharist, veiled on the altar at Avignon, by request of Louis VII to give thanks for his victory over the Albigenses. Certain practices dating back to the 13th and 14th centuries such as watching before the tomb during the last three days of Holy Week, eucharistic processions, and the exposition of the Host may also have entailed nocturnal adoration. By 1393, a branch of Benedictines devoted explicitly to eucharistic adoration had been established. Yet some notable saints hardly mention eucharistic devotion at all. When, for example, in his Spiritual Exercises, St. IGNATIUS LOYOLA spoke of God's abiding presence in creation, he said not a word about the reserved Sacrament. During the same historical period, however, Philip II of Spain (1527–98) established a eucharistic "vigil" at the Escorial, so that religious, in successive pairs, could pray night and day at the place of reservation.

In time, eucharistic associations emerged whose primary purpose was to promote frequent or perpetual adoration of the reserved Sacrament. In 1810 Giacomo Sinibaldi, Canon of Santa Maria in Via Lata, organized what was to become the Nocturnal Adoration Society, to pay homage to Christ during the night in the various church in which Forty Hours were being held successively. Carmelite Herman Cohen founded a similar society in Paris in 1848. Canonically approved as a pious union in 1851 and raised to the title of archconfraternity in 1858, the Nocturnal Adoration Society promoted the practice of nocturnal adoration through the year and independently of the Forty Hours devotion. In Brussels a movement started in 1848. Under the inspiration of Anna de Meeus became the Archconfraternity of Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Saccrament and the Work for Need Churches. From this society in 1872 came the Congregation of Perpetual Adorers. At Marseilles in 1859 Peter Julian Eymard established the People's Eucharistic League so that laypeople might share the Eucharistic spirit and work of the religious congregation he had founded. Members promised to make at least one hour of eucharistic adoration each month. The Priests' League for Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, founded in 1879, was approved at Rome in 1887. In 1950, a society for Perpetual Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament for diocesan priests was canonically erected with headquarters at Rome.

The Forty Hours Devotion. That having been said, the early-modern emphasis on uninterrupted worship of the Blessed Sacrament ("perpetual adoration")preferably with the Host solemnly exposed on the altar arose, most probably, in connection with the Forty Hours devotion, a continuous period of public prayer "before the face of the Lord" recommended by Pope Clement VII in Graves et diuturnae (1592). "Forty Hours" seems to have originated in Milan (ca. 1527), where the devotion (involving Masses, eucharistic exposition, processions, litanies and special prayers) rotated through the city's numerous churches, creating a year-round cycle of prayer and supplication. In 1731, Clement XII republished, in Italian, the instructions for Forty Hours ceremonies to be followed as issued two decades earlier by Clement XI. While this "Clementine Instruction" was of obligation only in Rome, its use elsewhere was encouraged.

Forty Hours remained popular until the late twentieth century. By decree of June 21, 1973, the Congregation for Divine Worship issued a revised ritual, "Holy Communion and Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass [HCWE]." HCWE does not specifically mention the Forty Hours Devotion. Instead, it simply recommends with the local Ordinary's consent and when suitable numbers of people will be present, in churches where the Eucharist is regularly reserved solemn exposition of the Blessed Sacrament once a year for an extended, even if not strictly continuous period of time. "This kind of exposition," says HCWE 82, "must clearly express the cult of the blessed sacrament in its relationship to the Mass. The plan of the exposition should carefully avoid anything which might somehow obscure the principal desire of Christ in instituting the eucharist, namely, to be with us as food, medicine, and comfort." When continuous exposition is not possible because of too few worshipers, the Blessed Sacrament may be replaced in the tabernacle during the scheduled periods of adoration, but no more often than twice each day (HCWE, 88). The Host should be consecrated in the Mass which immediately precedes the exposition and after Communion placed in the monstrance upon the altar. Mass ends with the prayer after Communion, and the concluding rites are omitted. The priest then may locate the Blessed Sacrament on an elevated, but not too lofty or distant throne, and incense it (HCWE 93-94). Prayers, scriptrual readings, religious silence, homilies or exhortations, congregational singing, and part of the Liturgy of the Hours should be employed during the exposition (HCWE 95-96). This extended exposition is interrupted for Masses celebrated through that period.

Besides exposition, HCWE recommends "devotional services" (HCWE 79), processions (HCWE 101–08), and congresses (HCWE 109–12) as suitable forms which help the Christian people to witness their "faith and devotion toward the sacrament" and "to express their worship publicly in the bond of charity and unity" (HCWE 101, 109). Such devotions are "strongly encouraged when celebrated according to the regulations of lawful authority," and they "should be in harmony with the sacred liturgy . . . take their bearing from the liturgy, and lead people back to the liturgy" (HCWE 79).

See Also: EUCHARIST OUTSIDE MASS, WORSHIP OF THE.

Bibliography: E. DUMOUTET, Le Désir de voir l'hostie (Paris 1926). N. MITCHELL, Cult and Controversy: The Worship of the Eucharist Outside Mass (New York 1982). M. RUBIN, Corpus Christi: The Eucharist in Late Medieval Culture (New York 1991).

[N. D. MITCHELL]

EUCHARISTIC ELEVATION

The act of lifting up the eucharistic elements of bread and wine after the consecration in the Roman Rite of the Mass. The elevation of the bread at this point was introduced into the Mass rite early in the 13th century by Eudes de Sully (d. 1208) or his immediate successor in the Archdiocese of Paris. It was intended to keep the people from adoring the bread before it had been consecrated. During the preceding century many priests held the bread high above the altar while saying the words of consecration. The allegorical tendency of the time saw in this a representation of the lifting up of Christ on the cross, but the simple faithful seeing the eucharistic bread lifted up thought it was already consecrated and proceeded to adore it immediately. To prevent this material idolatry on the part of the people the bishop of Paris forbade priests to elevate the bread until it was consecrated.

At the same time the introduction of the new rite responded to the widespread desire of the people to look at the bread, and it was this desire more than anything else that contributed to the rapid spread of the new rite. Within 50 years, it spread to all the churches of the West and acquired extraordinary importance and popularity.

However, this veneration at times became excessive and often bordered on superstition. People went to any lengths to ensure seeing the elevated host, even calling out to the priest to hold it up higher so that they could see it better. Many exaggerated the efficacy of seeing the elevated host; they even believed that whoever looked at the host in the morning would be protected against misfortune and an unprovided death that day. Many regarded looking at the host as a substitute for receiving the Eucharist; once the Elevation was over they left the church.

The elevation of the chalice became general much later and more gradually, chiefly because the desire of the people to look at the chalice was not as great as their desire to look at the bread. For one thing they could see the bread but not the wine. So we find that the elevation of the chalice was not in common use until the 14th century and was prescribed only with the Missal of Pius V (1570).

The genuflections before and after the elevation were not prescribed until 1570; originally the priest merely made a profound bow at this point. The use of incense at this point in solemn Mass was introduced toward the middle of the 14th century.

The 1969 Roman Rite of the Mass retains the elevation of the bread and the cup at their traditional points during the consecration, followed by a genuflection or profound bow. A second elevation of both the bread and the wine occurs at the doxology of the eucharistic prayer, and a third elevation at the invitation to holy communion.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER (rev. ed. New York 1959) 424–427. j

[W. J. O'SHEA/EDS.]

EUCHARISTIC FAST

Fasting from food and drink before Eucharistic Communion has been a part of Church discipline since the fourth century. Currently the Roman Catholic Church obligates its members to a mitigated form of what at times had been a quite rigorous fast: no food or drink is to be consumed for at least one hour prior to Eucharistic Communion. The discipline, codified in Codex iuris canonici Canon 919, does not prohibit drinking water or taking even solid medicine, nor does it bind the sick and aged or those who are occupied in their care. Priests whose pastoral responsibilities require them to celebrate the Eucharist more than once in a day are bound to the fast prior to the first liturgical celebration only.

The 20th century mitigation of the eucharistic fast has occured in several stages. It can best be understood as a response to the liturgical reform set in motion in 1905 with Pope PIUS X's promotion of frequent, even daily, Communion for the laity. At the time of Pius X's decree the communion fast involved abstention from all food and drink, including water, from midnight prior to the reception of Communion. This discipline, in the context of 20th century socio-cultural realities, was judged to be an obstacle to the pastoral implementation of the ideal of regular lay Communion. Pope Pius XII's 1953 apostolic constitution Christus Dominus eliminated the prohibition against drinking water; in 1957 he reduced the duration of the fast from food and alcoholic beverages to three hours. After the Second Vatican Council, as part of the renewed effort to promote full and active participation in the eucharistic liturgy, Pope Paul VI decreed in 1964 that the eucharistic fast was further mitigated, binding the Church to abstaining from all food and drink for one hour before Communion; in 1973 he dispensed the sick and their caregivers from even this limited obligation.

History of the Practice. The origins of the discipline are hidden in obscurity. Late fourth century North African councils (Hippo in 393; Carthage in 397) legislated that the Eucharist was to be eaten prior to any other food consumption during a day. St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, advocates this practice in his letter to Januarius, claiming apostolic origin for it while admitting it was not Jesus' mandate. Some authors have attempted to ground the practice in certain statements of third century Church orders, but recent critical scholarship has cast doubt on the validity of these efforts.

In evaluating the claim for apostolic origin of the practice, liturgical and canonical historians note the witness of I Corinthians and other first century noncanonical writings that in the primitive church the Eucharist was celebrated in the course of a meal. When the Eucharist and meal were separated, the practice of a community agape persisted, although in what relationship to the Church's eucharistic action is unclear. The fourth century legislation specifically notes that on Holy Thursday the sequence of Eucharistic Communion before other eating does not obligate the Church, leading some contemporary commentators to hypothesize an active memory of an earlier practice, if not its persistence. The fact of the fourth century exception is still handed on by St. Thomas Aquinas, in the 13th century, but as a practice long superseded.

In the present state of historical research scholars can only speculate about the ecclesial currents which gave rise to the early discipline. Once in place, the discipline gained in precision and rigor throughout the medieval period. Some medieval legislators ruled that infants at the breast—who according to ancient custom had first received Communion at their Baptisms—were obligated to the fast. Other legislators required a post-communion fast of several hours as well as a pre-communion fast. In some areas, even those lay people who were not communicants were required to keep the communion fast until the priest had communicated on behalf of the Church at the public liturgy of the day.

Reasons for the Eucharistic Fast. The motivation for the communion fast was most commonly discussed in terms of the basic need for respect for the Blessed Sacrament of the Lord's Body and Blood. Aquinas proposed two other motives for the fast: to respond to the Lord's injunction "Seek first the kingdom of God" (Mt 6. 33); and to avoid the dangers of vomiting from the intemperance that can accompany eating, for which he cites Paul as authority in I Cor 11.21. When the discipline for the eucharistic fast was introduced into the text of the 1570 Missal of Pius V, the norms enunciated there reflected the tradition as it had been received and interpreted by Aquinas. Aquinas' authority seems also to have stabilized the calculation of the fast from midnight, the start of the Roman day.

Subsequent centuries saw a development of the tradition according to the principles of casuistry operative in moral theology in the post-Tridentine period. Casuists concerned themselves with helping fasters by introducing flexibility into the calculation of midnight (through attention to variables like daylight/standard time and the faster's geographical location in relation to legal time zones). They also debated whether items taken into the mouth but not swallowed (mouthwash, chewing gum, tobacco) or items swallowed accidentally (paper or string) broke the fast and required the ingester to abstain from Communion.

These preoccupations with technical transgression, which shaped much catechesis on the eucharistic fast even in the pre-conciliar period, confirm from another direction the wisdom of the relaxation of the discipline. However, the vestiges of the casuistic attitude have resulted in a discipline lacking firm foundation in Christian religious sensibilities and authentic Christian spirituality. At the onset of the mitigation process in the 1950s, Godfrey Diekmann proposed reaffirmation of the spiritual basis for a eucharistic fast in the paschal character of the mystery of salvation. Self-emptying is a necessary moment prior to receiving the divine fullness. It has also been suggested that the pre-communion fast is a way of ritualizing the spiritual hunger which should characterize all those who gather at the eucharistic table.

Bibliography: INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY, Documents on the Liturgy 1963–79 (Collegeville, Minn. 1982). ST. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae 3a 80.8. T. F. ANGLIN, The Eucharistic Fast: An Historical Synopsis and Commentary (Washington, D.C. 1941). G. DIEKMANN, "The Fast Ought Not Prevent Communion," Worship 27 (1953) 516–23. J. M. FROCHISSE, "A propos des origines de jeñne eucharistique," Revue d'Histoire Ecclesiastique 28 (1932) 594–609. J. P. BEAL, J. A. CORI-DEN and T. J. GREEN, eds., New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York-Mahwah, N.J. 2000).

[M. COLLINS]

EUCHERIUS OF LYONS, ST.

Theologian and bishop of Lyons, 432 to 441; d. Lyons, 449. Eucherius came from a Christian, senatorial family. He received an excellent education, was married to Galla, and had achieved high office in the imperial service when he was chosen (c. 432) as bishop of Lyons. His son Salonius became bishop of Geneva before 440; his son (St.) Veranus, who later became bishop of Venice (before 450; d. c. 480), accompanied him to the Council of Orange in 441. On agreement with his wife, Eucherius had earlier retired to the monastic life at Lérins and later to a more solitary way of life on the island of Leros.

Eucherius was known for his preaching. Of his writings, two ascetical tracts in letter form have been preserved: De laude eremi is addressed to St. HILARY OF ARLES (C. 427) and De contemptu mundi, to a pagan relative named Valerian. He also dedicated two exegetical works to his sons: for Salonius, an Instructionum libri duo, in which he followed JEROME in explaining Greek and Hebrew words; and Formulae spiritalis intelligentiae, explaining spiritual exegesis for Veranus. These two works are of importance for the history of the Latin text of the Bible and the VULGATE in France. Eucherius is probably the author of the Passio Acaunensium martyrum, the oldest account of the THEBAN LEGION martyrs. The esteem in which Eucherius was held by contemporaries is attested by the dedication of the second part of John CASSIAN'S Collationes in his honor; as well as by his correspondence with SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, Hilary of Arles, Rusticus, PAULINUS OF NOLA, and SALVIAN.

Feast: Nov. 16.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878-90) 50:686-1214. C. WOTKE, ed., Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 31.1 (1894), O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–1932) 4:567–571. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 541. R. ÉTAIX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 15:1315-17. G. BARDY, Revue biblique 42 (1933) 14-20. A. MONACI, Revista di archeologia cristiana 10 (1933) 19-26, Passio. B. ALTANER, Miscellanea Isidoriana (Rome 1936) 11-32. A. E. ANSPACH, ibid. 340-343. J. G. HIRTE, Doctrina scripturistica . . . sancti Eucherii (Rome 1940). N. K. CHADWICK, Poetry and Letters in Early Christian Gaul (London 1955) 151-160. C. CURTI, "La Passio Acaunensium martyrum," Convivium Dominicum (Catania 1959) 299-327. S. PRICOCO, Per una nuova edizione del De contemptu mundi di Eucherio di Lione (Turin 1967).

[A. NEUWIRTH]

EUCHERIUS OF ORLÉANS, ST.

Bishop; b. late seventh century; d. abbey of Saint-Trond, Belgium, 738. He belonged to an influential MER-OVINGIAN family and from his earliest years was destined for the monastic life with the result that he was professed at the BENEDICTINE abbey of JUMIÈGES c. 709. Seven years later he was elected, against his will, bishop of Orlèans, where his uncle Suavaric had occupied the episcopal see and where his relatives had powerful support. CHARLES MARTEL, returning from his victory against the Saracens in 732, had him arrested and sent in exile to Cologne because his family was hostile to the party of the mayor of the palace. Eucherius bore his disgrace with great resignation and later obtained permission to retire to the Abbey of SAINT–TROND. He was venerated as a saint from the ninth century.

Feast: Feb. 20.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:211–225. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 7.1:41–53. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–1915) 2:462–463. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienneet de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–1953) 12.2:2686. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–1956) 2:428–431. A. DUMAS, Catholicisme 4:661. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 1:234–236.

[É. BROUETTE]

EUDAEMONISM

From the Greek εὐδαιμονία, meaning prosperity or happiness, the ethical theory holding that man's last END, or ultimate GOOD, consists in a state or condition of general well-being or welfare. Throughout the ages this position has been understood in various ways. One may distinguish the ancient version, best represented by Aristotle's treatment in the Nicomachean Ethics; the modification made of the Aristotelian position by St. Thomas Aquinas and other medieval schoolmen; and the modern and contemporary positions that make some claim to this identification.

Basically, all eudaemonisms have in common that they are teleological explanations deriving rules and norms for human moral action from some consideration of the end, or destiny, of man. In ordinary usage, the Greek term is often rendered as happiness or its equivalent. Disagreement over the meaning of happiness provides the basis for varieties of eudaemonism. All of the types agree, however, that the notion of a natural end for man guides his ethical theory and behavior and explains the nature of his beatitude. Early forms of eudaemonism stressed the total satisfaction found in the individual life of the morally good person. Medieval theories adapted the ancient interpretations to Christian revelation about man's sanctification and salvation. Modern and contemporary views tend to emphasize the psychological affective aspects of a naturalistic and temporal achievement of a fully human life.

Early Views. The most apt example of the original formulation of eudaemonism is that of Aristotle. Two concepts of ultimate good for man are developed in Aristotle's ethical treatise. The classic idea of personal welfare or happiness as virtuous living can be understood in an ideal sense. "If happiness is activity in accordance with virtue it is reasonable that it should be in accordance with the highest virtue; and this will be that of the best thing in us. Whether it be reason or something else that is this element which is thought to be our natural ruler and guide and to take thought of things noble and divine, whether it be itself also divine or only the most divine element in us, the activity of this in accordance with its proper virtue will be perfect happiness. That this activity is contemplative we have already said" (Eth. Nic. 1177a 12-18). Here Aristotle founds well-being, or happiness, on well-doing. Thus happiness consists not in merely passive enjoyment but in an action of a kind proper to man, surpassing anything possible to animals. This highest activity appropriate to the nature of man is the best exercise of the supreme power, or faculty, of the human person. Because, for Aristotle, the speculative reason is the noblest power, happiness is an act of knowledge ($\theta \epsilon \omega \rho i \alpha$),

Several characteristics mark the activity of contemplation as that best suited to be the ultimate goal of man's striving. Not only is it the full act of the highest power, but it also deals with the most noble reality as object of thought. Contemplative thought is the most continuous occupation possible and offers man the purest and most refined pleasure. It is the most self-sufficient of the virtues, not requiring more than a moderate possession of material goods or necessitating any social relationships for its essential fulfillment. Of all man's actions the most leisurely and unwearied, contemplation is loved for its own sake and not as a means to some further end. A final property of contemplation, which establishes it as the natural beatitude of man, is its likeness to the life of the gods. Its very similarity to the blessed activity of divine beings makes contemplation itself somehow divine.

By reason of this sublimity, however, the life of contemplation is achieved only by those few men who are capable of attaining to philosophical wisdom and who are free from care about the lesser necessaries of life. Therefore, Aristotle proposes a second kind of happiness to be reached by the majority of men: those who live according to the moral virtues are happy men (ibid. 1178a 8–1178b 2). The active life is one of harmony and pleasure, which most befits the human estate, that is, the composite nature of man in the midst of his social and political context. Less exalted and less perfect than $\sigma oqi\alpha$ is $qp \acute{o}v\eta \sigma \iota \varsigma$ (practical wisdom), but it constitutes the felicity possible to most men.

Medieval Development. Aristotle's eudaemonism was too limited and exclusive to satisfy the Christian view of a common end for all mankind. What was wanting in his theory was supplied by the theologians of the Middle Ages. In the light of divine revelation THOMAS AQUINAS and other schoolmen transformed the Greek position into one of heavenly destiny. Christian eudaemonism placed happiness for man in God as revealed in Scripture and criticized the Greek philosophers for allowing that perfect beatitude could be achieved in this life, for describing it as fully dependent on human effort and achievement, and for their failure to account for the resurrection of the body as part of man's ultimate situation.

Aquinas accommodated all of the positive and some of the negative features of Aristotelian eudaemonism in his treatment of beatitude (ST 1a2ae, 1–5). He agreed that happiness, subjectively considered, could not be merely power, virtue, or state of being; rather it was the activity, or the operation, of the intellect grasping immediately the most intelligible and spiritual object. This reality was identified as the true and living God of revelation, infinite, immutable, and perfectly satisfying all the demands of a good worthy to be happiness objectively considered. No earthly good—neither riches, honors, power, bodily pleasures nor goods of the soul—could so qualify. For Aquinas, the vision of the Divine Essence is supernatural in the sense that it requires the presence of the light of glory (lumen gloriae) to assist the natural power of the mind, that it is possible only after physical death, and that it is ultimately gratuitous in the merits of Christ. Joy or delight is the consequence of the possession of God in contemplative knowledge. Both bodily fulfillment in spiritualized integrity and social relationships among the blessed are additions to the essential happiness of the beatific vision.

Modern Trends. With the separation of philosophy from theology accomplished in the modern period, eudaemonistic theory appeared again in naturalistic forms. None of these use the power-activity-object analysis. Instead, they propose an ultimate state or condition that the moral person ought to attain. This may be described as the harmony of the whole life with its human activities and the consequent or concomitant affective states (G. SANTAYANA). Self-realization or self-perfection theories also relate to happiness of the individual. Hedonisms, simple or qualified, identify happiness with pleasure. Some move from the individual to the social perspective, either emphasizing the total evolutionary process (H. SPENCER) or becoming utilitarianisms with happiness as the welfare of the majority (J. BENTHAM, J. S. MILL). Contemporary divisions include psychological value theories and interest and affective state theories. All maintain some teleological element but manifest great diversity in the interpretation of welfare or happiness. (See HEDONISM; UTILITARIANISM.)

See Also: MAN, NATURAL END OF; GOOD, THE SUPREME; VALUE, PHILOSOPHY OF.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Commentary on the Nicomachean Ethics of Aristotle, tr. C. I. LITZINGER (Chicago 1964), bks. 1, 10; C.gent. 3.1-63. J. HIRSCHBERGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 3:1167-68. K. H. MISKOTTE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed Tübingen 1957-65) 2:723-26. s. PIGNAGNOLI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:204-07. É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955). J. M. SCHULHOF, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908-27) 5:571-72. T. E. HILL, Contemporary Ethical Theories (New York 1950). J. LEONARD, Le Bonheur chez Aristote (Brussels 1948). R. SHEEHAN, The Philosophy of Happiness according to St. Thomas (Washington 1956). J. MULLANEY, "The Natural Terrestrial End of Man," The Thomist 18 (July 1955) 373-95. W. E. MAY, "The Structure and Argument of the Nicomachean Ethics," The New Scholasticism 36 (1962) 1-28.

[M. G. HUNGERMAN]

EUDES, JOHN, ST.

Missionary in France, founder of seminaries and congregations, spiritual writer and promoter of the devotion to the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary; b. Ri (Orne), France, Nov. 14, 1601; d. Caen, France, Aug. 19, 1680. He came from a devout country family, and was sent to the Jesuit college in Caen in 1615. He took minor orders in 1620 and was received into the congregation by Pierre de BÉRULLE, founder of the Oratory. He was ordained on Dec. 20, 1625, and continued his preparation for a preaching career under Charles de Condren. When an epidemic of the plague broke out in 1627, Eudes volunteered to care for the stricken in his own Diocese of Sées, Normandy. Again in 1631 he heroically shared the lives of the plague victims in the area of Caen.

In 1633 he began his long career as a parish missionary. His unusual gifts as a preacher and confessor made his missions highly successful and earned him a reputation for fervor and eloquence. Though he labored mostly in Normandy, his mission field extended into Brittany, Bourgogne, and the Île-de-France. By 1676 Eudes had preached more than 100 missions, some of them lasting from several weeks to several months.

Eudes also concerned himself with the spiritual improvement of the parish clergy. Beginning in 1641 he gave frequent conferences for priests directed toward the duties of their state in life. He soon realized, however, that the more basic need was the establishment of seminaries for the proper training and spiritual formation of candidates for the priesthood. As superior of the house of the Oratory in Caen, Eudes sought to establish a seminary there and won the approval of the bishop of Bayeux and Cardinal Richelieu. The project had the support of Father de Condren, then superior general, but his successor, Father Bourgoing, opposed the project. After much prayer and counsel, Eudes decided to leave the Oratory, and on March 25, 1643, he founded a society of secular priests (without vows), the Congregation of Jesus and Mary. The new group was dedicated to the formation of a well-trained and virtuous clergy by conducting seminaries for the diocesan priesthood. Through the work of Eudes and his associates seminaries were established at Caen (1644), Coutances (1650), Lisieux (1653), Rouen (1658), Évreux (1667), and Rennes (1670).

Aided by the Visitandines, Eudes founded also a religious society for women. This society, the Congregation of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge, originated at Caen in 1641 and follows the Rule of St. Augustine. It was intended to provide a refuge for women of ill fame who wished to do penance. The congregation was approved by the bishop of Bayeux (Feb. 8, 1651) and by Pope ALEX-ANDER VII (bull of Jan. 2, 1666). During Eudes's lifetime three other houses were established in Brittany.

EUDISTS

Eudes was a noted spiritual writer. His works include: La Vie et le royaume de Jésus dans les âmes chrétiennes (1637), Le Contrat de l'homme avec Dieu par le saint baptême (1654), Le Bon confesseur (1666), and Le Mémorial de la vie ecclésiastique (1681). These practical meditations were built on a simple doctrine, dominated by Jesus as the source of all sanctity and Mary as the model of the Christian life. Drawing inspiration from scriptural texts and from medieval piety, Eudes composed two Offices, one in honor of the Sacred Heart of Mary (1648) and the other in honor of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (1672). He developed the basis for these devotions in his book Le Coeur admirable de la très sacrée Mère de Dieu, published posthumously in 1681. His 12th and last book is devoted entirely to the "divine Heart of Jesus." At the time of his beatification in 1909, Eudes was declared by PIUS X to be the "father, doctor, and apostle of the liturgical cultus of the Sacred Hearts." He was canonized by PIUS XI, May 31, 1925.

Feast: Aug. 19.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes, 12 v. (Paris 1905–09); Selected Works, ed. W. E. MYATT and P. J. SKINNER, 6 v. (New York 1946–48); En tout la volonté de Dieu: saint Jean Eudes à travers ses lettres, ed. C. GUILLON (Paris 1981); Le Royaume de Jésus, saint Jean Eudes, ed. G. OUELLET (Montréal 1988). D. SARGENT, Their Hearts Be Praised: The Life of St. John Eudes (New York 1949), bibliog. P. HÉRAMBOURG, St. John Eudes: A Spiritual Portrait, tr. R. HAUSER (Westminster, Md. 1960). C. BERTHELOT DU CHESNAY, Les Missions de Saint Jean Eudes. Contribution à l'histoire des missions en France au XVIIe siècle . . . (Paris 1967). N. BERMÚDEZ V., El bautismo en la doctrina de San Juan Eudes (Madrid 1978). P. MILICENT, Saint Jean Eudes: un artisan du renouveau chrétien au XVIIe siècle (Paris 1985).

[C. BERTHELOT DU CHESNAY]

EUDISTS

The Congregation of Jesus and Mary (CJM; Official Catholic Directory #0450), whose members are known as Eudists, is a small society of priests founded in France by St. John EUDES in the 17th century. It is engaged mainly in the training of diocesan clergy and education.

Origin and Development. When the founder initiated the society in 1643, his aim was twofold: to provide seminaries for the formation of clergy according to the decrees of the Council of Trent and to preach parochial missions. The establishment of a seminary in Caen, Normandy, was the immediate reason for the birth of the new society; for Eudes, at that time an ORATORIAN, had not been able to persuade his superiors to start this seminary, then badly needed in that province. Soon other bishops of Normandy and Brittany asked him to establish similar foundations: Coutances (1650), Lisieux (1653), Rouen (1658), Évreux (1667), and Rennes (1670). At the same time Eudes and his confreres carried on their work of preaching parochial missions in towns and villages all over France. After the death of Eudes (1680) and under the rule of his first three successors—Jean Jacques Blouet de Camilly (1680 to 1711), Guy de Fontaines de Neuilly (1711 to 1727), and Pierre Cousin (1727 to 1751)—the society took charge of seven other seminaries in France. After that the number of houses remained practically unchanged under the government of the next four superiors—Jean Prosper Auvray de Saint-André (1751 to 1770), Michel Lefèvre (1770 to 1775), Pierre Le Coq (1775 to 1777), and Pierre Dumont (1777 to 1790).

When the congregation was dissolved in 1790 by the French Revolution, its membership stood at about 100 priests and a few lay brothers. They had charge of the 13 seminaries mentioned above, and in addition, three minor seminaries. The latter were special establishments where seminarians who could not pay for their tuition and support received a combination of classical education and theological instruction. The Eudists also had four colleges of the humanities at Lisieux (1653), Avranches (1693), Domfront (1727), and Valognes (1729); three parishes; and two residence houses, principally for their mission preachers.

One of the main services rendered by the congregation to the Church in France during the 17th century was the strong stand it took against Jansenism; because of this, the clergy in Normandy remained in greater part preserved from the heresy. The traditional devotion of the Eudists to the Holy See caused them to refuse generally to take the schismatic oath imposed upon the French clergy by the Constituent Assembly. Three who were martyred during the massacres of Sept. 2 and 3, 1792, were François Lefranc, famous for his book indicting Masonic plots; Claude Pottier; and François Hébert. Four other Eudists also gave their lives during the persecution.

19th- and 20th-Century Revival. After the Revolution the society was revived in 1826 when Louis Blanchard, former superior of the seminary in Rennes, convened the surviving Eudists and was elected superior general. He died soon afterward (1830); and his successor, Jérôme Louis de la Morinière (1830 to 1849), was able to increase the number of members only to about 40. Upon the request of his friend Bishop Simon BRUTÉ, he sent a few priests to start an establishment in Vincennes, Indiana, but this venture was short-lived. Under Louis Gaudaire (1849 to 1870) the congregation slowly consolidated itself, while remaining centered mainly in Brittany.

New vitality was realized through the leadership of Ange Le Doré, who ruled the society for nearly half a century (1870 to 1916) and whose influence was felt in the general affairs of the Church in France during the struggles with the anticlerical Third Republic. The three seminaries he founded in Mexico were later wiped out by the revolution in that country, but he successfully planted his congregation in Colombia (1883) and in Canada (1890). When he died, the Eudists numbered 270, as against 85 in 1870. Another achievement of Le Doré was the rediscovery of the personality and works of John Eudes, through historical research and the publication of his forgotten spiritual writings. Albert Lucas (1916 to 1930) strove to repair the losses inflicted by World War I; he also revised the constitutions in accord with the 1917 Code of Canon Law.

The congregation remains dedicated chiefly to work in seminaries and education. Like the Oratorians and Sulpicians, the Eudists do not take religious vows and have no special habit distinguishing them from the diocesan clergy.

The generalate is located in Rome; the North American provincialate in Quebec, Canada; and the United States regional headquarters in Seneca, New York.

Bibliography: E. GEORGES, La Congrégation de Jésus et Marie, dite des Eudistes (Paris 1933). G. DE LA COTARDIERE, La Congrégation de Jésus et Marie, Eudistes au Canada, 1890–1940 (Besançon 1946). L. SAMSON, Les Eudistes en Amérique du Sud, 1883–1926, 3 v. (Paris 1949–55). C. BERTHELOT DU CHESNAY, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAU-DRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:1331–35.

[G. DE BERTIER DE SAUVIGNY/EDS.]

EUGENDUS OF CONDAT, ST.

Abbot; b. Franche-Compté, c. 450; d. Condat, Jan. 1 c. 510–17. According to the vita traditionally attributed to a fellow monk and disciple, Eugendus (Oyend) as a child was entrusted to Saints Romanus and Lupicinus, founders of the monastery of Condat (later Saint-Oyend; today, Saint-Claude). There until his death he lived in mortification, study, and prayer, esteemed for his humility and his learning, which included a knowledge of Greek, remarkable for his day. As abbot he rebuilt the monastery, destroyed by fire, and patterned its life on the eastern monasticism of BASIL and John CASSIAN.

Feast: Jan. 1.

Bibliography: Vita in J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 1:553–559. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 3:154–166, authenticity questioned by B. KRUSCH; defended by L. DUCHESNE, in Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire 18 (1898) 5–16. Analecta Bollandiana 17 (1898) 367–368. Vies des páres du Jura, tr. as The life of the Jura fathers: The Life and Rule of the Holy Fathers Romanus, Lupicinus, and Eugendus, tr. T. VIVIAN, K. VIVIAN, and J. B. RUSSELL (Kalamazoo, Mich. 1999). R. POUPARDIN, "Étude sur les vies des saints fondateurs de Condate et la critique de M. Bruno Krusch," Moyen-âge 11 (1898) 31–48. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:39. J. L. BAU-DOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 1:9–11. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:5–6.

[G. M. COOK]

EUGENE I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Aug. 10, 654 to June 2, 657; d. Rome. His was an aristocratic Roman family; he was a man of conciliatory disposition, outstanding for his sanctity. He accepted election by the Roman clergy after they had resisted pressure by Emperor CONSTANS II for more than a year to replace MARTIN I, who was under arrest. Eugene probably realized Martin would never be restored and feared the possibility of a Monothelite pope. In a letter of July 654 Martin had mentioned three ecclesiastical officials who were his deputies in governing the Church, but in a letter of September 655 he prayed especially "for the one who is now ruling over the Church," a statement interpreted as acquiescence or approval of Eugene's election. The Roman archives begin Eugene's reign in 654, but he cannot be considered incontestably to have been pope until after Martin's death in 655. Eugene sent representatives to negotiate about MONOTHELITISM with Constans, who immediately requested Eugene's recognition of Peter, newly appointed patriarch of Constantinople. Through these representatives Peter forwarded a synodal letter to Eugene, but it was so vague in regard to the two wills in Christ that the clergy and people, assembled to hear it read in St. Mary Major, rejected it and forbade Eugene to begin Mass until he, too, formally renounced it. This so enraged Constans that only a new Arab threat prevented him from arresting Eugene as he had Martin. Eugene was buried at St. Peter's. It was probably Eugene whom WILFRID OF YORK met when he visited Rome, 654.

Feast: June 2.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 1:341–342. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Graz 1956) 1:234;2:699, 740. Patrologia Latina ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 87:129. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1858–66) 90. Acta Sanctorum June 1:214–216. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux (Paris 1907–38) 3.1:460. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 1.1:406–412. A. CLERVAL, Dictionnaire de théology catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1912) 5.2:1488–89. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tubingen 1930–33) 2. A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds. Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935) 5. O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941). D. MAL-LARDO, Papa sant' Eugenio I (Naples 1943), and review in Analecta Bollandiana 65 (1947) 320. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) 2:67–68. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1950–53) 1. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 4:673–674. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1171. P. PLANK, Lexikon des Mittelalters 6 (München-Zürich 1992–1993). J. M. SANSTERRE, Dizionario biografico delgi italiani, 43 (Rome 1993). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 75.

[C. M. AHERNE]

EUGENE II, POPE

Pontificate: c. Feb.-May 824 to August 827. The Annales Einhardi (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 1:212) indicate that he was cardinal priest of St. Sabina and enjoyed the support of the local nobility in his contest with another papal candidate; he was upheld also by WALA, counselor of LOUIS THE PIOUS (Vita Walae 1:28; Patrologia Latina 120:1604). The coemperor LOTHAIR I met Eugene in Rome and there (November 824) promulgated a Constitutio Romana (Monumenta Germania Historica: Capitularia 1:322-324) designed to restore order to the papal domains after the troubles under PASCHAL I. Its chief provisions were an oath of fidelity to the emperor on the part of papal subjects, the establishment of a mixed papal-imperial commission to oversee justice, and the guarantee of free papal elections to the Roman citizenry, thus confirming the pact of 817 and eliminating the Roman synodal enactment (769) that such elections be the exclusive business of the clergy. The oath taken by Eugene in ratifying the consti*tutio* was henceforth to be taken by his successors before their consecration.

The question of ICONOCLASM arose anew in this pontificate (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 2:473-551). An embassy of the Byzantine Emperors Michael II (820-829) and THEOPHILUS (829-842) reached Louis the Pious at Rouen (Nov. 17, 824), asking his good offices with the pope in an effort to prohibit the veneration of images. A first Frankish mission had failed to achieve this purpose, but Louis eventually secured papal permission to have his theologians examine the question (Nov. 1, 825). Late that same year, the Western sovereigns dispatched a letter and a new mission to the pope, hinting that he should send a papal commission along with a Frankish legation to Constantinople to affirm the Western position on images. Louis's fear that Eugene would not consent to this (ibid. 2:533) was apparently sound; there is evidence neither of papal letters nor of a mission to the East.

Other acts of this pontificate, indicating the return of papal initiative, include a response to BARNARD OF VI-ENNE (Patrologia Latina 105:643–644), an instruction on ordeals (Patrologia Latina 129:985–687), a fragment concerning the Abbey of FARFA, and a commendation of St. ANSGAR and companions who commenced their missionary labors in Denmark in the fall of 826. Wide-ranging disciplinary legislation was laid down in 38 canons by the Roman synod of Nov. 14 and 15, 826 (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Concilia 2:552–583).

Bibliography: P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198 (Graz 1956) 1:320–322, 2559, 2564. Liber Pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 2:69–70; 3:122. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304 (London 1902–32) 2.1:156–182. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale (Bologna 1947). J. HALLER, Das Papstum (Stuttgart 1930–33) 2:27–29, 38–39. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Munich 1954–59) 2:208–214. O. BERTOLINI, in Studi medioevali in onore di Antonino De Stefano (Palermo 1956) 43–78. T. NOBLE, "The Place in Papal History of the Roman Synod of 826," Church History 45 (1976) 434–54. S. SCHOLTZ, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1995). J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 101–102.

[H. G. J. BECK]

EUGENE III, BL. POPE

Pontificate: Feb. 15, 1145, to July 8, 1153; b. Bernardo Pignatelli; d. Tivoli. Bernardo Pignatelli was born near Pisa. He was most likely of humble origin and was probably educated in Pisa. By 1128 he was almost certainly serving as the prior of Saint Zeno. Sometime around 1135 Bernardo met St. BERNARD, joined the CIS-TERCIAN abbey of CLAIRVAUX, and subsequently became the abbot of Saint Anastasio at Rome. In 1145, on the same day that his predecessor Lucius III died, Bernardo became the first Cistercian pope. He was an unexpected choice, and the precarious political climate at the time of his election made his transition to the Holy Office difficult. The popular commune rejected the pope's temporal powers, and Bernardo's refusal to support the Roman senate forced him to flee to Farfa, where he was consecrated. He then took up residence in VITERBO and remained there until December 1145, when an agreement with Rome permitted him to enter the city. The compromise with the Romans broke down just after Christmas, and in January 1146 he was forced to flee again to Viterbo.

On Dec. 1, 1145, Eugene had proclaimed the Second CRUSADE in a papal bull, Bulla cruciata. On March 6, 1146, he renewed the bull and commissioned St. Bernard to preach the crusade. The following year, Eugene himself traveled to France in order to promote the cause, returning to Italy in June 1148. Louis VII of France did take up the cross, and through the influence of St. Bernard, King Conrad III of Germany eventually joined the expedition as well. But the crusade, which became bogged in a futile siege of Damascus, never reached the Holy Land and ended in failure. The circumstances surrounding the Second Crusade, however, did generate some development in medieval political thought; it ultimately led to the classic formulation of the two-swords theory, which can be found in St. Bernard's didactic letters to Eugene.

The pope also rejected a proposal for a new crusade, which was marked by anti-Byzantine bias, and which most probably would never have reached the Holy Land. It was sponsored by Louis VII of France and Roger II of Sicily, an inveterate enemy of Byzantium. Although Roger had been responsible for Eugene's return to Rome in 1149, the pope had no intention of breaking his relationship with Conrad III of Germany, an ally of the Greeks.

Following St. Bernard's advice, Eugene worked to elevate the moral life of both the secular and regular clergy. He held synods at Paris in 1147, Trier in the winter of 1147/48, and Rheims in March 1148. While attending the last, Eugene evaluated the orthodoxy of Gilbert de La Porrée, and under the influence of St. Bernard several of Gilbert's propositions were corrected. Eugene also gave guarded approval of the visions of Hildegard of Bingen, the founder and abbess of the convent at Rupertsberg who was also a noted poet and composer. In 1149 he spotted the talented Nicholas Breakspear (the future Pope Adrian IV) and eventually made him papal legate to Scandinavia. At Cremona, on July 15, 1148, Eugene excommunicated the radical reformer ARNOLD OF BRESCIA, who had become a leader of the Roman Commune and bore some responsibility for Eugene's earlier exile from Rome. The pope also intervened in England and supported Archbishop Theobald of Canterbury in his relations with King Stephen. In addition he deposed William Fitzherbert from the See of York in 1147. Finally, in 1153, Eugene concluded the Treaty of Constance, an accord in which FRED-ERICK I BARBAROSSA agreed to defend the papacy in return for an imperial coronation. It outlined an arrangement of mutual assistance for pope and emperor but Eugene did not enjoy even the limited benefits of that agreement, since he died in Rome later that same year. Despite his involvement in both diplomatic and ecclesiastical affairs, Eugene managed to continue a life of deep personal devotion and austere simplicity. His cult was authorized by Pius IX in 1872.

Feast: July 8.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 180:1013–642. J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum

Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757–98) v. 21. J. M. WATTERICH, ed., Pontificum romanorum . . . vitae, 2 v. (Leipzig 1862) v. 2. P. JAFFÉ, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, 882-1198, ed. s. LÖWENFELD, 2 v. (2d ed. Leipzig 1881-88; repr. Graz 1956) 2:20-89. L. DUCHESNE, ed., Liber pontificalis, v. 1-2 (Paris 1886-92) v. 2. JOHN OF SALISBURY, Memoirs of the Papal Court, ed. and tr. M. CHIBNALL (New York 1956). C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907-38) v. 51. H. K. MANN, The Lives of the Popes in the Early Middle Ages from 590 to 1304, 18 v. (London 1902-32) v. 9. H. GLEBER, Papst Eugen III, 1145–1153, unter besonderer Berücksichtigung seiner politischen Tätigkeit (Jena 1936). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v. 9.1. P. BREZZI, Roma e l'Impero medioevale, 774–1252 (Bologna 1947). F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (2d ed. Munich 1956) v. 3. A. JAKOBS, Eugen III und die Anfänge europäischer Stadtsiegelinebst Anmerkungen zum Bande IV der Germania Pontifica (Köln 1980). M. HORN, Studien zur Geschichte Papst Eugens III (1145–1153) (New York 1992). J. A. WATT, "Spiritual and Temporal Powers," Cambridge History of Medieval Political Thought, ed. J. H. BURNS (Cambridge 1988) 367-423

[J. A. SHEPPARD]

EUGENE IV, POPE

Pontificate: March 3, 1431 to Feb. 23, 1447. b. Gabriel Condulmaro, Venice, c. 1383. Condulmaro was a monk who followed the rule of St. AUGUSTINE. Having been brought to the papal court by his uncle GREGORY XII and made cardinal (1408), he went to Constance at his uncle's abdication, July 4, 1415. Under Martin V he governed the March of Ancona and Bologna for a time. As Pope, Eugene confirmed the convocation of the Council of BASEL, but soon prorogued it. The fathers refused to obey, adopted and extended the principle of CONCILIAR-ISM enunciated at the Council of CONSTANCE, and finally forced Eugene to withdraw his dissolution (Dec. 17, 1433). Meantime, continuing his predecessor's negotiations with the Greeks, he agreed to hold a council of union in Constantinople, but yielded to Basel's insistence that it be held in the West. When Basel split on the question of the site (May 7, 1437), Eugene undertook to implement the agreement with the Greeks, hired a fleet, and brought the Emperor, the patriarch, and a retinue of 700 to Ferrara, which he had named as the site (Sept. 18 and Dec. 30, 1437) of the transferred Council of Basel. The council opened on Jan. 8, 1438.

A popular insurrection forced Eugene to abandon Rome. He came to Florence (June 4, 1434), traveled to Bologna (April 22, 1436), and reached Ferrara (Jan. 24, 1438). The Greeks arrived in early March. The council was solemnly inaugurated on April 9, but the doctrinal sessions did not begin until October 8, at the demand of the Greek Emperor, although informal (and inconclusive) discussions on purgatory were held in June and July. In 14 sessions, from October 8 to December 13, there was free debate on the legality of the addition of the FILIOQUE to the Creed, without agreement. In the meantime Eugene, responsible for the upkeep of the Byzantine delegation, was in arrears with his payments and in financial straits. On Jan. 10, 1439, by arrangement with the Greeks, the council moved to FLORENCE, which offered better financial conditions. In March, eight sessions on the doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Spirit produced no agreement, and various other expedients were equally ineffective. On May 27 Eugene spiritedly exhorted the Greeks, thereby giving a new impulse that resulted in agreement on the Procession (June 8) and on PURGATO-RY, the PRIMACY, and the Eucharist in the following weeks. Union of the two Churches was proclaimed in Laetentur caeli on July 6, 1439. Thereafter Armenians, Copts of Egypt, Syrians, and the Chaldeans and Maronites of Cyprus were in turn united with the Holy See. Basel had "suspended" Eugene on Jan. 24, 1438, and "deposed" him on June 25, 1439. The Pope replied in Moyses vir Dei (Sept. 4, 1439), challenging the ecumenicity of the earlier phases of Constance and condemning Basel. At Eugene's death, even though Basel and its antipope FELIX V still continued in schism, most of the Christian West supported him.

Eugene always retained the ideals of a religious and as pope lived a simple, regular, and abstemious life. He was charitable to the needy of all classes and readily supported Observant reforms in various religious orders. He was loyal to his ideals in resisting the conciliarism of Basel; to his helpers, even if some of them were less worthy; and to his obligations—supporting René of Anjou at the cost of Aragon's hostility and promoting the crusade against the Turks that ended in defeat at Varna (Nov. 10, 1444). Intelligent without being learned, he was more concerned with rebuilding Rome than with beautifying it. Typically, he desired an unostentatious tomb. He died a poor man. The union with the Greeks achieved by his council was shortlived, but it set the principle for all unions-identity of faith with freedom in matters of rite. It also checked the rabid conciliarism of Basel that threatened to alter the traditional constitution of the Church.

Bibliography: J. GILL, The Council of Florence (Cambridge, Eng. 1959), and literature there cited; Eugenius IV: Pope of Christian Union (Westminster, Md. 1961). D. BORNSTEIN, "Giovanni Dominici, the Bianchi, and Venice: Symbolic Action and Interpretive Grids," The Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 23 (1993) 43–171. A. ESCH, "Überweisungen an die Apostolische Kammer aus den Diözesen des Reiches unter Einschaltung italienischer und deutscher Kaufleute und Bankiers. Regesten der vatikanischen Archivalien 1431–1475," Quellen und Forchungen aus Italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken 78 (1998) 262–387. R.

Pope Eugene IV receiving a copy of "Tres Dialoghi" from the hand of the author, Antonio da Rho.

KAY, "The Concilliar 'Ordo' of Eugenius IV," Councils and Clerical Culture in the Medieval West 16 (1997). PH. LUISIER, "La letter du Partiarche Copte Jean XI au Pape Eugèene IV," Orientalia Christiana Periodica 60 (1994) 87–129. L. SCHMUGGE, "Salmanticensia Poenitentiariae," in Life, Law, and Letters: Historical Studies in Honour of Antonio García y García (Rome 1998) 779–93. M. SPREMIC, "La Serbia gli Stati italiani e la crociata del XV secolo," Clio 32 (1998) 467–78. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 241.

[J. GILL]

EUGENE II (III) OF TOLEDO, ST.

Archbishop; b. Toledo, Spain; d. there, Nov. 13, 657. Born of a royal Visigothic family of Spain, he became a cleric in the cathedral of Toledo and then a monk in the monastery at Saragossa where his uncle (St.) BRAULIO was abbot. There he studied theology and literature and began his career as a writer. When Braulio became bishop (631-656), he appointed Eugene archdeacon of the church of St. Vincent. In 645 King Chindaswinth (641-652) recalled Eugene to Toledo and named him archbishop of that see at the death of Eugene I (646). Eugene's nephew ILDEPHONSUS, who later succeeded him as archbishop, described Eugene as a man of small stature and frail health, but zealous in spiritual and intellectual activity (De vir. ill. 14; Patrologia latina 96:204). For 11 years Eugene admirably governed the See of Toledo. He reformed the chant (see MOZARABIC RITE), rearranged the feasts of the Spanish liturgy, and played an important role in the Councils of Toledo in 646, 653, 655, and 656; the last two were held under his direction. Eugene was buried in the basilica of St. Leocadia in Toledo. USUARD was the first to include him in his martyrology (875). Eugene's writings included a volume of prose and a treatise De Trinitate, both of which are now lost, a collection of short poems on various subjects, two letters, and a revision of Dracontius's Laudes Dei and Satisfactio, undertaken at the request of Chindaswinth. His poems, which were in the classical tradition, were undistinguished in content but influenced later Christian Latin poets such as Albar of Córdoba.

Feast: Nov. 13.

Bibliography: Works. Monumenta Germaniae Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1825–) 14:229–291, 300–301. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 87:347–418. Literature. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 1:194–197. M. MADOZ, "San Eugenio de Toledo," Historia general de las literaturas hispánicas, ed. G. DIAZ PLAJA, v.1 (Barcelona 1949) 127–129. F. J. E. RABY, A History of Christian–Latin Poetry from the Beginnings to the Close of the Middle Ages (2d ed. Oxford 1953) 127–128. P. B. GAMS, Die Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 3 v. in 5 (Regensburg 1862–79; repr. Graz 1956) 2.2:132–135.

[M. G. MCNEIL]

EUGENIA, ST.

Abbess of Hohenberg (MONT SAINT-ODILE) in Alsace, c. 722 to c. 735. She succeeded her aunt, St. ODILIA, as abbess. Her father was Duke Adalbert of Alsace, and she seems to have had two sisters, (St.) Attala (c. 697–741) and Gunlind, who also became abbesses. Eugenia was revered for her holy life and wise government and was buried in the Chapel of St. John the Baptist close to her aunt, thus sharing in the honor pilgrims paid to the patroness of Alsace. Few of her relics remained after the raids of the Swedes in the Thirty Years' War.

Feast: Sept. 16.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 5:332–335. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:679.

[F. M. BEACH]

EUGENICUS, MARK, METROPOLITAN OF EPHESUS

Chief Greek opponent of the union achieved in Florence; b. Constantinople, c. 1392; d. June 23, 1445. Until he was orphaned at the age of 12, he was educated in his father's school, then by John Chortasmenos and the philosopher Gemistos PLETHON. Mark Eugenicus (baptized Manuel) taught for a time before giving his property to the poor in his 26th year. He then became a monk on the island of Antigone, and took the name of Mark. Forced to return to Constantinople by Turkish troop movements in 1422, he lived in the monastery of the Mangani, where he gained a reputation for learning and sanctity. In view of the Council of FLORENCE he was made metropolitan of Ephesus (c. 1436) and procurator of the Patriarchate of Alexandria; he went with the Greeks to Italy, where he first wrote a fervid exhortation to the Pope to eliminate the FILIOQUE, and thus angered the Emperor.

Changed to procurator of Jerusalem and then of Antioch, Mark was chosen as one of six Greek speakers; in all but three sessions at Ferrara and Florence he was the sole Greek speaker. In the discussions on purgatory he became increasingly hostile to Latin doctrine. The addition to the Creed he declared to be the cause of the schism and also illegal because it was forbidden by the Council of Ephesus; he proclaimed that the filioque doctrine was opposed to Scripture, the Councils, and the Fathers. He accused the Latins of falsifying the texts of their own Doctors who taught the filioque.

He was the only Greek prelate consistently to oppose union, did not sign the decree of union, and returned to Constantinople in the Emperor's ship. There he became the center of antiunionism. On the election of the unionist Metrophanes as patriarch, Mark escaped to his episcopal see (May 15, 1440), which he had not yet visited. However, he soon set off for Mt. Athos. After being arrested on imperial orders and confined in a monastery of Lemnos for about two years (during a Turkish siege of the island), he was released probably in mid-1422. Returning to Constantinople, he continued his antiunionist propaganda until at the approach of death, he persuaded George Scholarius (later Patriarch GENNADIUS II) to succeed him in the task. After 14 days of atrocious pain Mark died on June 23, 1445 (or 1444).

Mark was an austere monk and an unflinching champion of orthodoxy as he saw it; he was learned in the Fathers, capable of arguing with the Latins about metaphysics and, strangely, capable also of accusing them of falsifying texts. His prestige assisted his propaganda, which was a skillful blend of serious theological writing and the most blatant argumenta ad hominem to suit the people he was addressing, with no little ridicule and invective of opponents. He had a receptive audience in the ill-educated monks and populace of Constantinople. Consequently, he was the most effective single influence that destroyed the union. Soon after his death he was reputed a saint, and his brother wrote a liturgical office for his feast. He was officially canonized by the Orthodox Greek Church in 1734.

Among his writings are 72 Kephalaia (Chapters) explaining his theology. Three discourses on purgatory, 56 syllogisms against the Latins, with a patristic florilegium, an address to the Pope, and a confession of faith, mark in part his interventions in the Council of Florence. He wrote a letter to George of Methone against the Latin rite, an encyclical and many tracts against the union, as well as liturgical and homiletic, ascetical, dogmatic, and eulogistic treatises.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 160:1080–1200, contains his works. K. MAMONIS, "Mark Eugenicus, Life and Work," Theologia 25 (1954) 377–404, 521–575, in Gr. J. GILL, The Council of Florence (New York 1959) L. PETIT, "Documents relatifs au Concile de Florence," Patrologia orientalis 15.1 (1920) 5–168; 17.2 (1923) 309–522; Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 9.2:1968–86. V. LAURENT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 7:11–12. V. GRUMEL, Estudis Franciscans 36 (1925) 425–448. G. MERCATI, Opere minori, 5 v. (Studi e Testi 76–80; 1937–41) 4:101–106. Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich 755–758.

[J. GILL]

EUGENIUS VULGARIUS

Grammarian; place and date of birth and death unknown. He lived in southern Italy and was known for his literary activity during the pontificate of SERGIUS III (904–911). Unlike Sergius, he defended the legality of the election of Pope FORMOSUS (891–896) and the validity of the Holy Orders conferred by him. His arguments as well as his literary form were inspired by AUXILIUS OF NAPLES, although Vulgarius exhibited a greater knowledge of classical and Byzantine culture. Later he abandoned the Formosan cause and composed a submissive letter to SERGIUS III. His writings include Insimulator et actor (Patrologia Latina, ed. J.P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 129:1103–12), De causa formosiana libellus (Dümmler 117–139), Letters and Poems (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Poetae [Berlin 1826–] 4:412–440).

Bibliography: E. DÜMMLER, ed., Auxilius und Vulgarius (Leipzig 1866). M. MANITIUS Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters (Munich 1911–31) 1:433–436. G. BAADER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 3: 1778–79.

[S. P. LINDEMANS]

EUHEMERUS

Euhemerus of Messene; c. 340–260 B.C.; famous for his theory of the natural origin of the gods and religion. His only known work was the Sacred Record IEpà ἀναγραφή in at least three books, of which Jacoby identifies 11 fragments, along with 15 more in the remains of Ennius's Latin version. It was an autobiographical romance in which the author claimed to have visited Panchaea, an island in the Indian Ocean. There he found a golden stele with an inscription setting forth the deeds of Uranus, Cronus, and Zeus, just rulers of Panchaea, who had been deified, or had caused themselves to be deified. Euhemerus described also the natural products and social structure of his imaginary kingdom in sober, realistic terms, using the geographical discoveries of Alexander's admirals, details drawn from contemporary knowledge of Persia, Arabia, and Egypt, and utopian theories of government (cf. Hippodamus of Miletus in Aristotle, Politics 1267b–1268a). Euhemerus was primarily a rationalistic philosopher of religion, but the realism of his work has sometimes caused him to be regarded as a geographer or historian.

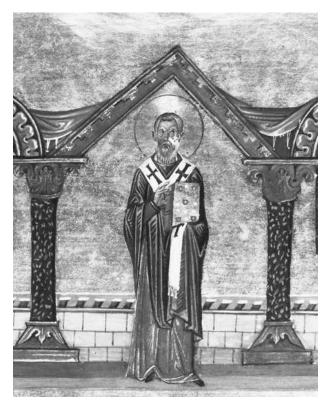

Ennius's translation made Euhemerus known to the Romans, and promoted the development of religious skepticism among them. Christian writers, both Greek and Latin—Clement of Alexandria, Minucius Felix, Lactantius, and Augustine—found him useful in their apologetic against pagan religion and its origins. The term ''Euhemerism'' was coined in the 19th century to signify the rationalistic interpretation of myths and religion.

Bibliography: Fragments in F. JACOBY, Fragmente der griechischen Historiker (Berlin 1923) 1: No. 63. F. JACOBY, "Euemeros (3)," Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1907) 6.1:952–972. J. GEFFCKEN, "Euhemerism," Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 5:572–573. J. W. SCHIPPERS, De ontwikkeling der Euhemeristische godencritiek in de Christelijke Latijnse literatuur (Groningen 1952).

[H. S. LONG]

EULALIUS, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: Dec. 27, 418 to April 3, 419. At the death of Pope Zosimus (417–418), a small group of priests and deacons gathered in the Lateran basilica, and on Dec. 27, 418, elected as pope the archdeacon Eulalius who was a Greek like the deceased pope. The next day a sizeable majority of the clergy chose the elderly presbyter Boniface I (418-422). The city prefect supported Eulalius and recommended him to the emperor Honorius (395-423) at Ravenna. When a delegation of Boniface's supporters arrived at court, the emperor thought it best to have both claimants appear at a synod in Ravenna, but the synod proved inconclusive, and Honorius decided upon a second, larger one to be held in Spoleto in June of 419. In the meantime, both claimants were to stay out of Rome. Boniface complied with the imperial order, but Eulalius hoped that if he took up residence in the city while Boniface was absent, he could win popular support. The plan backfired when trouble broke out between the supporters of the two claimants. The prefect expelled Eulalius for violating the emperor's order, and on April 13, the angry Honorius decreed in favor of Boniface. Eulalius accepted defeat and withdrew from Rome. In 422, as Boniface felt death near, he told the emperor that trouble would arise if Eulalius tried to return to Rome after his death, yet, when the pope died, Eulalius did not return to the city, even though his followers urged him to do so. After the election of Celestine I (422–432), Eulalius accepted a bishopric in Campania, where he died in 423.

St. Eulogius, Patriarch of Alexandria, manuscript painting in the "Menologion of Basil II."

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, ed., History of the Church (New York 1980), 2:261. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 39–40. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976), 452–455.

[J. F. KELLY]

EULOGIUS, PATRIARCH OF ALEXANDRIA, ST.

Fl. 580 to 607; a theological controversialist; b. Antioch, Syria; d. Alexandria. Eulogius was a monk who became a priest and abbot of the Deipara, or Mother of God, monastery at Antioch, and in 580 he became patriarch of Alexandria. He met the future Pope GREGORY I in Constantinople (c. 582). Of his correspondence with Pope Gregory between 595 and 600, only Gregory's letters are extant. In one of these, written probably in June 598, the pope gives details of AUGUSTINE OF CANTER-BURY's successful mission in England. In 595 the Pope urged Eulogius to oppose the usurpation of the title of universal patriarch by JOHN IV THE FASTER, patriarch of Constantinople (582–595). In Bibliotheca PHOTIUS preserved an account of 11 dogmatic orations of Eulogius and of his books against Novatianism (Patrologia Graeca 103:532–536) and against the Severian Monophysites (ibid. 103:934–955). See NOVATIAN AND NOVATIANISM.

In theology Eulogius was a Chalcedonian who followed the doctrine of St. BASIL OF CAESAREA via JOHN THE GRAMMARIAN, whose apology he knew evidently only through long citations in SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH's Contra Grammaticum. In contrast with contemporary theological opinion represented by the De sectis (c. 580), he denied ignorance in Christ, and this doctrine became part of the ordinary magisterium of the Church through Pope Gregory I. The authenticity of his Homily for Palm Sunday (Patrologia Graeca 103:2408–64) has been challenged, since a similar sermon is attributed to CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (ibid. 43:427–438) and EPIPHANIUS (ibid. 77:1050–72).

Feast: Sept. 13; Feb. 13 (Greek Church).

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 86.2:2937–64. V. N. BENEŠEVIČ, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 24 (1928) 802. Acta Sanctorum Sept. 4:83–94. B. AL-TANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 620. J. J. DELANEY and J. E. TOBIN, eds., Dictionary of Catholic Biography (New York 1961) 389. C. MOELLER, Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 46 (1951) 683–688. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:691–693. O. BARDENHEWER, Theologische Quartalschrift 78 (1896) 353–401.

[F. DE SA]

EUNOMIUS OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Bishop of Cyzicus and chief exponent of Anomoeanism; b. Cappadocia, c. 335; d. Dakora, Cappadocia, c. 394. Eunomius joined the Arian leader Aëtius in Alexandria as disciple and secretary, and moved with him to Antioch where he was ordained deacon. He became bishop of Cyzicus in 360 (according to Philostorgius) or 366 (according to Socrates), but was soon forced to resign because of his extreme views. After Aëtius died in 366, Eunomius assumed leadership of the radical wing of ARI-ANISM, organized its communities and defended its doctrine in writing. He was often exiled and changed residence; he died at his family estate at Dakora in Cappadocia. Little remains of his extensive literary production, since the Emperor ARCADIUS ordered it to be burnt in 398. Most of it is known through refutations by Basil of Cappadocia, Gregory of Nyssa, and Apollinaris. Fragments of his Apology have been preserved along with part of a second Apology in answer to Basil's refutation, and a confession of faith addressed to the Emperor Theodosius I in 383. His adversaries accused him of reducing theology to technology: indeed, Eunomius shows himself a subtle dialectician, using Aristotelian methods to defend doctrines of Platonic inspiration, speaking, e.g., of the descending triad of the consubstantial Trinity.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster MD 1950) 3:306–309, with bibliog. M. SPANNEUT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 15:1399–1405. X. LE BACHELET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:1501–14, doctrine.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

EUPHEMIA, ST.

Fourth-century martyr under Diocletian; d. Chalcedon, c. 303. Her passio, though not historically trustworthy, describes her multiple sufferings; and St. Asterius of Amasea (d. 410) relates that she was "burnt alive after her teeth were knocked out with a hammer." The date of September 16 found in the Fasti consulares of Vienne could be that of her martyrdom. In the fourth century a basilica was erected in her honor at Chalcedon and became an important pilgrimage center; both MELANIA THE YOUNGER and the mysterious pilgrim Aetheria visited it. In 451 the Council of CHALCEDON was held in this basilica, and the saint is said to have manifested her miraculous assistance. Shortly before the Persian invasion of the city (617), her relics were taken into Constantinople and placed in the old church of St. Euphemia. Many encomia were written in her honor; those by the ninth-century Theodore Bestes and Constantine, bishop of Tion, on the finding of her relics are of some note. Her cult spread rapidly, based as it was on the Council of Chalcedon and the miraculous narrations in her passio. The many authors mentioning her example or her relics include PAULINUS OF NOLA and PETER CHRYSOLOGUS. Many churches were dedicated in her honor: in the East, at Daphne near Antioch, at Oxyrhyncus in Middle Egypt; on the shore of the Adriatic, at Zara, Aquileia, Grado, and Ravenna; in the Mediterranean basin, at Malta and Carthage; and above all in Italy, at Tivoli between 492 and 496, and in Rome, where Pope St. SERGIUS (d. 701) restored the title to the Church of St. Euphemia on the Viminal hill. In the Milanese liturgy she was named in the Canon of the Mass. In the West during the Middle Ages her cult was widespread in Brittany, Alsace, and Austria.

CHAGATHEY HS GAP ELAGIA DECATVERAN

SS. Agatha, Pelagia, and Euphemia, detail of a 6th-century mosaic in S. Apollinare Nuovo, Ravenna.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 5:252–286. A. DELE-HAYE, Les Origines du culte des martyrs (Brussels 1933). A. S. LEWIS, ed. and tr., Select Narrations of Holy Women, from the Syro-Antiochene or Sinai Palimpsest, 2 v. (London 1900). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienneet de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:745–746. A. M. SCHNEIDER, A. GRILLMEIER, and H. BACHT, Das Konzil vom Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:291–302.

[L. VEREECKE]

EUPHRASIA, ST.

Virgin and ascetic; b. Constantinople, 380; d. c. 410. Euphrasia was the daughter of a senator of Constantinople, Antigonus, who died shortly after her birth, and was related to the Emperor THEODOSIUS I (379-395), who took her and her mother under his protection. Theodosius arranged a betrothal for Euphrasia, at the age of five, to the son of a wealthy senator. Two years later she and her mother withdrew from the court to Egypt, where they settled near a convent of nuns. At age seven Euphrasia, at her own insistence, was given over to the care of the nuns to be trained in the ascetic life; and at 12 she declined her betrothed, who then desired marriage. An heiress, she transferred her fortune to the emperor, probably ARCADI-US (395–408), to be used for charity. She died at the age of 30; St. JOHN DAMASCENE mentions her in his third Oratio de imaginibus.

Feast: March 13; July 24 and 25 (Orthodox Church).

Bibliography: G. DE JERPHANION, Analecta Bollandiana 55 (1937) 7. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, (Brussels 1957) 3:631. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 2718–21.

Feast: Sept. 16.

[E. D. CARTER]

EUSE HOYOS, MARIANO DE JESÚS, BL.

Also known as Fr. Marianito, diocesan priest; b. Oct. 14, 1845, Yarumal (Diocese of Antioquia), northwestern Colombia, and baptized the following day; d. July 12, 1926, Angostura, northeastern Colombia.

The eldest of the seven children of Pedro Euse (of Norman heritage) and Rosalía de Hoyos Echeverri, Mariano was educated at home in order to ensure a Christian formation. Even as a child he took time from his farming duties to teach other children the catechism. When he decided to become a priest (age 16), he was entrusted to the care of his uncle, Fr. Fermín Hoyos. On Feb. 3, 1869, Mariano entered the Medellín seminary. He was ordained (July 14, 1872), assigned as assistant to his uncle at San Pedro (1872-1876), then to Yarumal (1876-78) and Angostura (1878). As assistant to his ailing pastor, Rudesindo Correa, he supervised the completion of the church edifice. Upon Correa's death, Fr. Marianito became pastor and committed himself to caring for the needy during civil war. When his own safety was threatened several times he was forced into hiding. He was known for his poverty, his selfless charity, his simple but effective preaching, and his pastoral zeal, particularly in his ministry to farmers and children. He died after a long illness.

Marianito was buried in the chapel of the Virgin of Carmen, Angostura, which he had constructed. His incorrupt body was translated to the parish church on July 11, 1936. His cause for beatification was introduced Oct. 10, 1980. He was declared venerable (March 3, 1990) and a miracle, the cure of Colombian Fr. Rafael Gildardo Vélez Saldarriaga's prostate cancer, at his intercession approved (March 26, 1999). At his beatification (April 9, 2000) by John Paul II, Marianito became the first Colombian-born blessed.

Feast: July 13.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

EUSEBIA OF HAMAY, ST.

Benedictine abbess; d. March 16, 680 or 689. Eusebia, the daughter of St. ADALBALD, was elected abbess of Hamay at the age of 12 (perhaps 23), in accord with the medieval custom of thus gaining for the abbey the patronage of a powerful family. After the murder of Adalbald, Eusebia's mother, St. Rictrude, considering her too young for such responsibility, transferred the entire community of Hamay to Marciennes, whither she had retired with her two younger daughters, and where she was abbess. Eusebia's desire to return to the abandoned monastery induced Rictrude to reestablish the community at Hamay. Eusebia ruled wisely until her death at the age of 40.

Feast: March 16.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 2:445–456. J. MABIL-LON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 2:944–951. Analecta Bollandiana 20 (1901) 460–463; 62 (1944) 159–164. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1: 2736–38. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:710. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 3: 351–352. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:333–335.

[M. B. RYAN]

EUSEBIA OF SAINT-CYR, ST.

Abbess and martyr; d. Marseilles, France, 838. She was a BENEDICTINE nun and abbess of Saint-Cyr in Marseilles. According to the legend, which has as its basis her epitaph, she and 39 of her sisters were martyred by the Saracens. She may, however, have lived as early as the sixth or seventh centuries. Her tomb is to be found in the church of SAINT-VICTOR IN MARSEILLES.

Feast: Sept. 20; Oct. 12 (Marseilles).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 4:292–295. A. M.. ZIM-MERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:80–82. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4: 710–711. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienneet de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 1.2:1989–91; 10.2:2239–41. S. VERNE, Sainte Eusébie, abbesse, et ses 40 compagnes martyres à Marseille (Marseilles 1891).

[P. BLECKER]

EUSEBIUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: April 18, 309 to Aug. 17, 309. A violent controversy over the LAPSI, who claimed the right to be received back into ecclesiastical communion without submitting to the customary prolonged penance, was raging when Eusebius succeeded MARCELLUS I. According to the inscriptions of Pope DAMASUS I, the civil authority finally intervened, and Emperor Maxentius exiled both Eusebius and Heraclius, the leader of the opposition, to Sicily. After Eusebius' death his body was brought back to Rome and buried in the cemetery of Callistus. According to the Liber pontificalis, he was a Greek and had been a physician, but little reliable information about him survives.

Feast: Formerly Sept. 26, now Aug. 17.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum, Sept. 7:245–250. K. BIHL-MEYER and H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte (Paderborn 1962) 1:167–168. A. FERRUA, ed., Epigrammata Damasiana (Vatican City 1942) 129–136. J. N. D. KELLY Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 26. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. 3 (Freiburg 1995), s.v. "Eusebius, heilig, Papst." B. SODARO, Santi e beati di Calabria (Rosarno 1996), 52–56.

[R. K. POETZEL]

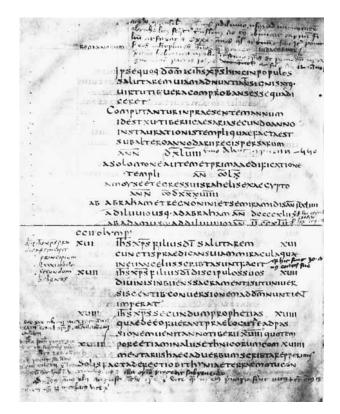

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA

Bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, apologist, Biblical exegete, and the earliest Church historian; b. c. 260; d. c. 339. Nothing is known of his family; but it was at Caesarea that he was baptized, as an adult, and entered the ranks of the clergy. In a city where ORIGEN had taught for so many years, Eusebius was heir to a scholarly tradition mediated to him through PAMPHILUS, who had been a pupil of Pierius at Alexandria. Pamphilus had also collected a library, which was a center for scholarly work. So close did Eusebius draw to his older companion in friendship and in the furtherance of literary and textual labors that he adopted the name Eusebius Pamphili, the son or servant of Pamphilus, and it is by this name that he was commonly designated.

Life. The work of the scholars of Caesarea was not disrupted by the persecution of 303 to 313. Eusebius was himself at times away from the city, e.g., at Tyre and in Egypt, where, as at Caesarea itself, he witnessed martyrdoms. The imprisonment (308) and martyrdom (310) of Pamphilus deeply affected him. He commemorated his friend in a Life, in three books, no longer extant. He may himself have been imprisoned, but the accusation of apostasy, made long afterward at the Council of Tyre (335), cannot be regarded as more than another of the reckless accusations current at that period; it is most unlikely that an apostate would have been chosen as bishop of Caesarea c. 313.

By this time Eusebius was a voluminous writer whose interests covered every field of Christian literary activity. He also had close friendships with other bishops, such as Paulinus of Tyre and Theodotus of Laodicea in Syria. Eusebius preached at the dedication of a church at Tyre c. 316.

When the Arian controversy began (c. 318), Eusebius had already had occasion to express his opinion on the issues involved, particularly in his Demonstratio Evangelica. His support was well worth having; ARIUS (c. 320) regarded him as one of his chief supporters. In theology Eusebius was the heir to Origen and later Alexandrian teachers, but in his statement on the relations between Father and Son, it is the SUBORDINATIONISM of Origen that is most prominent. At the Council of Antioch (c. 324), Eusebius and two others were provisionally excommunicated for their adherence to Arian views. Their case was referred to a great council called to meet at Ancyra; but Emperor CONSTANTINE I changed the venue of the council to Nicaea. After the council Eusebius explained what had happened in a letter to his own church.

Folio from a 5th- or 6th-century manuscript of Jerome's Latin version of Eusebius's "Chronicle" (MS Auct. T. 2. 2.6, fol. 111v).

It has commonly been held that Eusebius presented the creed of Caesarea as a basis on which the creed of the council was constructed, but, in view of his personal excommunication, it is more likely that he produced his creed, with a declaration of his lifelong fidelity to it, as evidence of his own right faith. His creed was approved by the emperor, but the Creed of Nicaea, which Eusebius regarded as derived from his own, contains little that is distinctively Caesarean, and the key word HOMOOUSIOS and the description of the Son as "true God" are not Eusebian. There is clearly some misunderstanding in Eusebius's letter, or a clumsy endeavor to minimize the consequences of the acceptance of the Council's terms. He appears to have shared the feelings of others that the use of homoousios of the Son implied a rending of the divine substance. Eusebius signed both creed and anathemas, more from a desire for peace and under the influence of Constantine than from genuine conviction.

He was soon involved in the quarrels and intrigues of the following years, during which the leading supporters of Nicaea were attacked, and Arius, without assenting to the Nicene decisions, was rehabilitated. Eusebius quarreled with EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, a leading supporter of Nicaea. Eustathius accused Eusebius of perverting the Nicene faith; and the latter replied with an accusation of SABELLIANISM; the quarrel may also have had its roots in Eustathius's outspoken criticism of Origen. That Eusebius took part in the expulsion of Eustathius about 330 there can be no doubt, but he refused translation to Antioch, a refusal for which he was warmly commended by Constantine.

St. ATHANASIUS and MARCELLUS OF ANCYRA, among others, were also exiled. Athanasius failed to appear at a council called by the emperor in 334 to meet at Caesarea to deal with accusations (nondoctrinal) against him, because of his suspicions of Eusebius; but in 335, under threat of imperial displeasure, he came to the Council of Tyre. Eusebius was one of the judges and was the subject of the taunt about his behavior in the persecution. Athanasius did not wait for condemnation, but appealed to Constantine, who summoned the council to assemble at Constantinople. Eusebius and a few others obeyed after attending the dedication of the church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. Athanasius was sent into exile.

Thereafter the celebration of Constantine's Tricennalia took place, at which Eusebius delivered a panegyric on the emperor, for whom he had conceived an extreme admiration: he elaborated a new theory of the relations of Church and Empire, made necessary by the changed circumstances of the time. The final controversy of Eusebius's life was with Marcellus of Ancyra, a strong supporter of Nicaea, whose theology was regarded as Sabellian. Marcellus and Eusebius had long been antipathetic to each other: after Marcellus was exiled in 336. Eusebius wrote two works, Against Marcellus (2 books) and On the Theology of the Church (3 books), in which, while pointing out the errors of Marcellus and defending various friends, he did not himself stand forth as a supporter of Nicaea, though it is clear he had by then moved somewhat nearer to the theology of the council.

Late in his life Eusebius produced his Theophania, on the manifestation of God in the work of His Word. The five books are extant in Syriac, and are largely repetitions of passages and topics culled from his other works. After the death of Constantine in 337, Eusebius wrote his Life of Constantine, a panegyric on the benefactor of the Church, who had shown singular favor to the author. It is wrong, however, to regard Eusebius as a toady of the Emperor; they probably met only twice, at the Council of Nicea and at the Tricennalia. Eusebius was dead by the time of the Council of Antioch in 341. His life, written by Acacius, his pupil and successor at Caesarea, is not extant.

Writings. A noteworthy tendency in his writings is an almost excessive reliance on sources, which sometimes reduces his work to strings of quotations. This may be described as the writing of fully documented apologetic or history, but it can also be considered as a failure to digest what he had read and to consolidate the results of his reading. He himself disclaimed originality. This is not to say that on occasion he did not write well; and in view of prevailing fashions his rhetoric can be excused. In numerous cases he preserved portions of works no longer extant. His works may be grouped under the heads of (1) text, exegesis, and topography of Holy Scripture, (2) apologetic works, and (3) historical works and panegyric.

Exegete. His textual work was undertaken both in collaboration with Pamphilus and by himself. Surviving manuscripts bear witness to this work, carrying inscriptions such as "corrected by the hand of Eusebius Pamphili." It is no wonder that Constantine sent to Eusebius for texts of Scripture for use in the churches of Constantinople.

Eusebius wrote also extensive commentaries, still largely extant, on ISAIAH (after 324) and on the Psalms (c. 330–335) and may have written others; his method of exegesis is a blend of allegorism and literalism. He wrote Gospel Questions and Solutions (before 312) in which he examined divergencies in the narrative of the Gospels, and a General Elementary Introduction in ten books covering the whole course of Christian instruction; four books (7–10) are extant under the title of Eclogae Propheticae. Of several works dealing with Biblical topography only the Onomasticon survives. This is a geographical dictionary of the Bible, but it has many gaps and shows great inconsistency in the treatment of different entries.

Apologist. Eusebius was primarily an apologist, and this designation of him extends even to his Ecclesiastical History, which is a vindication of Christianity against heathens and heretics. Some of his apologetic works were directed to the needs of his own time; such is his Against Porphyry, the Neoplatonist detractor of Christianity, in 25 books (before 303). This work is lost, but large por-tory was first in seven books, down to A.D. 303. Eusebius was well aware that he was a pioneer; while his history is still our chief primary source for its period, it must be noted that Eusebius was limited by the sources available to him. These are practically all Greek sources: he is almost entirely ignorant of the rise and development of the Latin Church. Moreover, it is hardly to be expected that he could handle adequately a subject such as heresy.

Mention must be made also of the Martyrs of Palestine, which exists in longer and shorter versions: the former is extant only in a Syriac version; the latter is closely attached to book eight of the Ecclesiastical History.

must have been written between 337 and 339. It is a panegyric; Eusebius himself regarded it as such and it should not be judged otherwise. But certain doubts have been expressed about this work. It appears to be unknown to other 4th-century authors, and some have thought that it was written much later by someone who embodied genuine documents in it. Others have suspected the genuineness of the documents included by the author; however,

Constantinian Panegyric. The Life of Constantine tions of it are probably embedded in other writings, as Eusebius constantly reused materials.

In his Against Hierocles he refuted the comparison made by Hierocles, a high official and notorious persecutor, between Christ and APOLLONIUS OF TYANA. Pamphilus and Eusebius collaborated in writing a Defence of Origen, who had been attacked by METHODIUS OF OLYM-PUS and others. Eusebius himself added a sixth book. Only book 1 is extant, in the Latin translation of RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA.

Of wider significance are the Praeparatio and Demonstratio Evangelica (in 15 and 20 books respectively). The former is a refutation of pagan mythology, oracles, and astrology; an exposition of the Jewish Scripture, with testimonies from heathen writers that support these; and a demonstration of the so-called plagiarisms of the philosophers from the Old Testament and of the contradictions of Greek philosophical teaching. The Demonstratio (the first ten books are extant) deals with the fulfillment of prophecy in Christ, His Incarnation and earthly life, and the resumption in Christianity of a pure religion professed by the ancient Patriarchs. The Theophania has already been mentioned.

Historian. The Chronicle of Eusebius, an epitome of world history down to 303, based partly on the work of JULIUS AFRICANUS, is extant only in Armenian and in Jerome's Latin adaptation (continued to 378). Eusebius prefaced to the actual chronological tables accounts of various nations, in which he made cross-references to events of Jewish history. Chronological works of this kind had long been used by Christians to demonstrate the antiquity of Jewish achievements on which Christianity was based.

This annalistic method was carried over by Eusebius into his Ecclesiastical History, in which his narrative is divided by notices of the accessions of Roman emperors and by the episcopal successions of the sees of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In its final form the History consists of ten books and extends to the victory of Constantine over Licinius in 324. But it is clear from indications in certain manuscripts, and from internal evidence of rehandling of material in books 8–10, that earlier editions of the History existed. The last three books deal with the years of persecution, followed by peace, from 303 onward, and, with this restriction of subject matter, are very different from the books in which Eusebius dealt with the general history of the Church.

In his preface Eusebius listed the subjects with which he intended to deal, and the last two, the martyrdoms of his own time and the divine succor afforded at the last, look like additions. It is therefore quite likely that the his-ania has alone of these has been discovered on papyrus, quite apart from the Life, and the tenor of the others is well suited to the Constantinian period. The whole theory of the Christian empire, elaborated in this work (and in Eusebius's oration at the Tricennalia), is in keeping with the first days of tolerance and collaboration that were so soon blighted by the reigns of CONSTANTIUS II and JULIAN THE APOSTATE.

Later authors vary in their estimate of Eusebius, as his great services to Christian scholarship were countered by his attachment to the Arians.

Bibliography: Works. Patrologia Graeca v.19-24; Die griechischen christlichen schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (1902-); Eng. editions of his Ecclesiastical History, tr. K. LAKE and J. E. L. OULTON, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; New York 1926-32:) ed. and tr. H. J. LAWLOR and J. E. L. OULTON, 2 v. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; 1927-28), with introd. and commentary; French ed. and tr. G. BARDY, 4 v. (Sources Chrétiennes 31, 41, 55, 73; 1952-60), with introd., nn., and indexes; Oration at the Tricennalia, ed. and tr. E. C. RICHARDSON (A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers 2d ser. 1; 1890) 581-610, rev. tr. with introd. and nn.; Evangelica Praeparatio, ed. E. H. GIF-FORD, 4 v. in 5 (Oxford 1903), with tr. and nn.; Evangelica Demonstratio, tr. W. J. FERRAR, 2 v. (London 1920); Against Hierocles, tr. F. C. CONYBEARE in PHILOSTRATUS, The Life of Apollonius, 2 v. (Loeb Classical Library; New York 1912) 2:484-605; Life of Constantine, ed. and tr. E. C. RICHARDSON, loc. cit. 411-580. Literature. D. S. WALLACE-HADRILL, Eusebius of Caesarea (London 1960), with bibliog. R. LAQUEUR, Eusebius als Historiker seiner Zeit (Berlin 1929). H. BERKHOF, Die Theologie des Eusebius von Caesarea (Amsterdam 1939). J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960), theology. J. R. LAURIN, Orientations maîtresses des Apologistes chrétiens de 270 à 361 (Analecta Gregoriana 61; 1954) 94-145, 344-401. N. H. BAYNES, Byzantine Studies and Other Essays (New York 1955) 168-172. K. M. SETTON, Christian Attitude towards the Emperor in the 4th Century (New York 1941) 40–56. A. A. T. EHRHARDT, Politische Metaphysik von Solon bis Augustin, 2 v. (Tübingen 1959) 2:259–292.

[J. STEVENSON]

EUSEBIUS OF EMESA

Bishop and writer; b. Edessa, c. A.D. 300; d. Antioch, before 359. He was educated in Edessa, Scythopolis, Caesarea of Palestine, Alexandria, and Antioch. Eusebius was chosen by the Arians to rule the See of Alexandria in 340; but knowing the popular attachment to the exiled Athanasius, he declined. Shortly afterward he became bishop of EMESA (Homs), capital of Lebanese Phoenicia and ancient center of pagan sun worship. There he was accused of astrology and later, of SABELLIANISM. Resigning his see, he accompanied the Emperor Constantius on an expedition against the Persians c. 348, some years before his death.

St. Jerome credits Eusebius with considerable eloquence and mentions his writings against the Jews, pagans, and Novatians, as well as a commentary on Galatians and homilies on the Gospels (Vir. ill. 91), but Jerome exaggerates his attachment to ARIANISM (Chron. an. 347). Eusebius' writings, the subject of intensive contemporary research (29 discourses in an old Latin version have recently been restored to him), indicate that he was a moderate semi-Arian, dependent on EUSEBIUS OF CAE-SAREA in his CHRISTOLOGY and Trinitarian theology, more prone to the literal exegesis of Antioch than to Alexandrian allegorism.

Bibliography: J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:348–351. É. M. BUYT-AERT, Eusèbe d'Émèse: Discours conservés en latin, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 26–27; 1953–57); L'Héritage littéraire d'Eusèbe d'Émèse (Louvain 1949); "On the Trinitarian Doctrine of Eusebius of Emesa," Franciscan Studies 14 (1954) 34–48. D. AMAND DE MENDIETA, "La Virginité chez Eusèbe d'Émèse et l'ascétisme familial dans la première moitié du IV^e siècle," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 50 (1955) 777–820.

[É. DES PLACES]

EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA

Fourth-century bishop, leader of the anti-Nicene reaction; d. c. 341. Probably a native of Syria, Eusebius studied with the future heretic ARIUS under LUCIAN OF ANTIOCH; he was first made bishop of Berytus in Phoenicia, then promoted to the metropolitan see of Nicomedia (c. 318), where he gained high favor at the court of the Emperor Licinius. He actively supported Arius against ALEXANDER, Patriarch of Alexandria, and was responsible for the rapid spread of the Arian conflict. Eusebius welcomed Arius after Arius's first condemnation, wrote numerous letters to fellow bishops in Arius's defense, and held a synod in Bithynia that nullified Arius's excommunication.

In 324, when CONSTANTINE I defeated Licinius and entered Nicomedia, Eusebius escaped reprisals through the protection of Constantia, wife of Licinius and sister of Constantine. The tone of the Emperor's letter to Bishop Alexander and Arius indicates that his information on the Arian controversy came from Eusebius. At the Council of NICAEA I (325) Eusebius acted as spokesman for the Arian faction; Athanasius constantly referred to it as "Eusebius and his fellows." A document composed by Eusebius was read at the council, causing great indignation among the Fathers. When the Nicene Creed was proposed, he rejected the term HOMOOUSIOS, but in the end he signed the creedal statement under pressure from Constantine.

About three months later, according to Philostorgius, Eusebius disavowed his signature and was immediately exiled to Gaul by the Emperor. In 328, having presented a retraction, he was recalled from exile and restored to his see, perhaps by a second assemblage (328) of the Council of Nicaea. He regained his influence at the court and assumed the leadership of a widespread reaction against the Nicene Council and Creed (328-341). Eusebius tried at first to remove the most powerful leaders of the Nicene party. Thus (c. 330), EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH was condemned and deposed by a synod held in Antioch. About the same time (or in 336), MARCELLUS OF ANCY-RA, under accusation of SABELLIANISM, met with the same fate. But Eusebius's main adversary, ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, who had succeeded Alexander in 328, proved difficult to eliminate. Twice he managed to vindicate himself from accusations brought before Constantine; but in 335 the Synod of Tyr, at Eusebius' instigation, condemned Athanasius; he was deposed and sent into exile to Gaul.

Eusebius baptized Constantine at Nicomedia shortly before the Emperor's death in 337. He retained his prominent position under Constantius II and obtained the see of Constantinople, the imperial city from 330. His last known action was to preside over the Dedication Council of ANTIOCH in 341; he died soon afterward. Eusebius left no major writings; three of his letters have been preserved.

Bibliography: ATHANASIUS, Werke, ed. H. G. OPITZ, v. 3.1 (Berlin 1934) 15–17, 65–66, letters. A. LICHTENSTEIN, Eusebius von Nikomedien (Halle 1903). G. BARDY, Recherches sur St. Lucien d'Antioche et son école (Paris 1936) 296–315. G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:1539–51. J. QUASTEN, Patrology 3:190–193. M. SPANNEUT, Dictionnaire [V. C. DE CLERCQ]

EUSEBIUS OF SAMOSATA, ST.

Opponent of ARIANISM; d. 380. Eusebius is mentioned as bishop of Samosata in 361 at the synod of Antioch that elected Meletius as successor to Bishop Eudoxius. When the Arians attempted to seize the acts of the synod, Eusebius met them with heroic and successful refusal (Theodoret of Cyr, Histoire ecclesiastique 5.4.8). In 372, with GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, he aided in the election of BASIL OF CAESAREA and later received several letters from both Basil and Gregory. A sensitive and zealous apostle, he was exiled in Thrace by the Arianinfluenced Emperor Valens from 374 to 378; but he was recalled by GRATIAN. A short while later he was killed by a brick thrown by an Arian woman.

Feast: June 21.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5:204–208. P. BEDJAN, ed., Acta martyrum, 7 v. (Paris 1890–97) 6:335–377. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:607–608. H. R. REYNOLDS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–87) 2:369–372. M. SPANNEUT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15:1473–75. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 475. G. BARDY, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, ed. A. FLI-CHE and V. MARTIN (Paris 1935) 3:261–283.

[J. HAMROGUE]

EUSEBIUS OF VERCELLI, ST.

Bishop, monastic founder, and anti-Arian polemicist; b. Sardinia, Italy, early fourth century; d. Vercelli, August 1, 371. He became a member of the Roman clergy under Pope JULIUS. When consecrated first bishop of Vercelli c. 344, he established a community life for his clergy, and he is considered a founder of the CANONS REGULAR. He was also instrumental in the establishment of new dioceses near Vercelli, e.g., Turin and Embrun. Eusebius attended the Council of Milan in 355 as legate of Pope LIBERIUS and with Dionysius of Milan upheld the orthodoxy of St. ATHANASIUS against the politically intimidated Western episcopate. He was exiled in the East until the death of CONSTANTIUS II, was liberated under Julian, and in 362 attended the Council of Alexandria with Athanasius and approved its lenient decisions for the reconciliation of compromised bishops. Returned to Italy, he collaborated with HILARY OF POITIERS against the Arians; he died peaceably in his own diocese. Of his correspondence, three letters have been preserved, and the first seven books of a De Trinitate previously attributed to Athanasius or Vigilius of Thapsus are now ascribed to him by many patrologists. He also translated Commentaries on the Psalms by EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (Jerome, Ep. 61.2), now lost, and may have authored the pre-Jerome version of the Gospels preserved in the Codex Vercellensis.

Feast: Aug. 2 (formerly Dec. 16, anniversary of his consecration).

Bibliography: De Trinitate and Epistulae, ed. V. BULHART (Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 9; 1957) 1–110. Eusebio di Vercelli e il suo tempo, ed. E. DAL COVOLO, R. UGLIONE, and G. M. VIAN (Rome 1997). Patralogiae cursus completus, series latina, ed. A. HAMMAN (Paris 1957) 1:1741–42, 305–307. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 429. V. DE CLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15:1477–83. Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS 105–111.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

EUSTACE, MAURICE

Martyr; place and date of birth unknown; d. November 1587. He was the eldest son of John Eustace of Castlemartin and his first wife Elizabeth Pebhard. After being educated at Douai, Maurice entered the Jesuit novitiate at Bruges. His father wrote to his superiors and requested them to send him home, as he was his heir and only son of his first marriage. On returning home, Maurice reminded his father that he could make one of his other children his heir and returned to Bruges against his father's wishes, but was advised by the Jesuits to return home, as his place appeared to be in the world.

His father had him appointed a captain of cavalry. He was denounced as a Jesuit and as a participant in the Baltinglaso rebellion by a younger brother, eager to inherit. His father's will, probated in 1580, named his son William his heir. Maurice denied rebellion, but openly confessed his Catholic faith. Adam Loftus, Lord Chancellor, offered him his daughter in marriage, and a large dowry if he would change his faith. Maurice refused and was executed.

See Also: IRISH CONFESSORS AND MARTYRS.

Bibliography: D. MURPHY, Our Martyrs (Dublin 1896). R. BAGWELL, Ireland under the Tudors, 3 v. (London 1885–90). Genealogical Office MSS. Dublin: Fisher Wills: Anglo-Irish Pedigrees.

[J. G. BARRY]

EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL, ST.

Abbot; b. Burgundy, c. 560; d. Luxeuil, France, April 2, 629. A nephew of Miget, bishop of Langres, he became a monk at the Abbey of LUXEUIL toward the end of the sixth century and was placed in charge of the monastic school there. He followed his abbot, the Irish missionary COLUMBAN, into exile (c. 610), but was sent back to take his place as abbot (c. 612). Chlotar II later requested him to convince Columban to return to Luxeuil from BOBBIO, but Eustace was unsuccessful. He preached throughout the countryside around the abbey and was a companion of AGIL on a missionary journey to Bavaria. Upon his return (c. 617), he found himself forced to oppose the monk Agrestius, who had left the monastery to preach, but now was speaking in open support of the heresy of the THREE CHAPTERS and in opposition to the severity of the abbey's rule. At the Synod of Mâcon the abbot promoted the condemnation of Agrestius and his adherents (626-627). The BENEDICTINE RULE, which Agrestius had advocated, was introduced at Luxeuil only by Eustace's successor, Abbot Waldebert. Eustace was buried at Luxeuil, where his relics remained until c. 966, when they were transferred to the Abbey of Vergaville in Lorraine. The body disappeared in 1670, but the site remained a center of pilgrimage until the French Revolution. Eustace's life was written by a contemporary, JONAS OF BOBBIO (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum, 4:119-130); he has been mentioned in the martyrologies since the 10th century.

Feast: March 29.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863–), March 3:781–787. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 2773–74. C. PERRY, La Vie de Saint Eustase, 2^e abbé de Luxeuil (Metz 1649). P. A. PIDOUX DE MA-DUÈRE, Vie des saints de Franche-Comté, 4 v. (Lons-le-Saunier 1908–09) 2:178–185. A. M.: ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:385–389. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 3:624–626. G. BARDY, Catholicisme. 4:714–715. T. DE MOREMBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 16:12. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 87:1045–56.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, ST.

Bishop and theologian; b. Side in Pamphylia; d. before 337. Eustathius (or Eustace) was bishop of Beroea in Syria before the Arian conflict, was transferred to the metropolitan See of Antioch (probably 324), and took part in and may even have presided at the Council of Nicaea (325). One of the first and most relentless opponents of Arianism, he was deposed and exiled (c. 331) to Trajanopolis in Thrace by Emperor CONSTANTINE; there is no evidence of his return. Some friends, uncompromising Nicaeans, formed a Eustathian faction that survived as a separate group until 482-485. Of his many works 20 titles are known. Extant are one complete exegetical treatise, On the Witch of Endor against Origen, and some hundred fragments. His most important work seems to have been Adversus Arianos, in at least eight books. Eustathius's Trinitarian theology implies, between God and the Word, a relation of Father to Son. His Christology lays strong stress on the distinction and integrity of the two natures in Christ against the Arians. He was the first to attempt a Logos-Man Christology against the prevalent Logos-Sarx doctrine, and it is in his opposition to the latter theory that he merits a significant place in the history of doctrine. He was not a forerunner of NESTORIUS, for his soteriology and certain nuances of his Christology demand a unicity of person in Christ. In scriptural matters, he cites the Pentateuch and the Gospels in the so-called Lucian recension, denounces the abuses of allegorism, and gives a reasoned and realistic interpretation of the text. In doctrine as well as exegesis, Eustathius would seem to have been an authentic Antiochene.

Feast: July 16.

Bibliography: M. SPANNEUT, ed., Recherches sur les écrits d'Eustathe d'Antioche (Lille 1948); Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 16:13–23. R. V. SELLERS, Eustathius of Antioch and His Place in the Early History of Christine Doctrine (Cambridge, Eng. 1928).

[M. SPANNEUT]

EUSTATHIUS OF SEBASTE

Bishop and first promoter of monastic life in eastern Asia Minor; b. c. 300; d. 377 or 380. Eustathius, the son of Bishop Eulalius, probably also of Sebaste, Armenia, entered the clergy and studied at Alexandria under ARIUS, whom his father supported at the Council of Nicaea. Probably influenced by Egyptian monasticism, he propagated cenobitism in his native country; but excesses in his ascetical movement, from which Messalianism later derived, brought upon him the censure of his father, and later of various synods. Twenty canons of the Council of Gangra (c. 340) are directed against certain practices of the Eustathians, e.g., unbecoming dress, contempt of marriage, and neglect of parental or filial duties. Nevertheless, shortly before 357 Eustathius was promoted to the metropolitan See of Sebaste, and soon afterward he joined efforts with BASIL OF ANCYRA and the Homoiousian party to head off the Anomoeans. He attended all the councils of the time: Ancyra (358), Sirmium (358), Seleucia (359), Constantinople (360), Lampsacus (364), and even Rome (366), where, having signed the Nicene Creed, he was received in communion by Pope LIBERIUS. After 371 he joined the Pneumatomachian sect and, as a result, engaged in a bitter feud with BASIL THE GREAT, whom he had initiated in the monastic life. At the Council of Cyzicus (376) he signed a creed that affirmed the homoiousios for the Son but denied the full divinity of the Holy Spirit.

See Also: ARIANISM.

Bibliography: F. LOOFS, Eustathius von Sebaste und die Chronologie der Basilius-Briefe (Halle 1898). S. SALAVILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2: 1565–74. J. GRIBOMONT, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 4.2:1708–12; Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 16:26–33; Studia Patristica, v.2 (Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 64; 1957) 400–415.

[V. C. DE CLERCQ]

EUSTOCHIA OF PADUA, BL.

Benedictine nun; b. Lucrezia, in Padua, Italy, 1444; d. there, February 13, 1469. She was the daughter of a nun and was born and educated in the convent of San Prosdocimo. After a more observant group replaced the old community there, she sought admission, which was granted reluctantly. Her profession was long delayed because, while she was sometimes obedient, gentle, and charitable, she was often stubborn and ill-tempered, and showed signs of diabolical possession. When suspected of being the cause of the abbess's mysterious illness, she was even in danger of being burned as a witch. Finally a wise and patient confessor intervened, and she took vows and won the respect and even the reverence of the community. Miracles were attributed to her, and her body was found incorrupt when it was transferred several years after her death to a more honorable place. Her cult, confirmed in 1760, is liturgically celebrated at Padua. She is sometimes referred to as Eustochius (or Eustochium), which was her religious name.

Feast: Feb. 13.

Bibliography: G. C. CORDARA, Vita virtù e miracoli della B. Eustochio vergine padovana (Venice 1768). A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 1:207–209. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATT-WATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 1:325–327.

[N. G. WOLF]

EUSTOCHIUM, ST.

Virgin; b. Rome, c. 368; d. Bethlehem, Palestine, late 418 or early 419. The third of the four daughters of St. PAULA OF ROME, she consecrated herself to a life of virginity and was trained in the austere life by her widowed mother and St. MARCELLA. Paula and Eustochium Julia were among the noble Roman ladies given spiritual guidance and scriptural instruction by St. JEROME during his stay in Rome (382-385). Upon Jerome's departure, they followed him to the East and, after a trip to Egypt, settled at Bethlehem. In the religious community established there under Jerome's spiritual leadership, Paula supervised three convents for women. Paula died in 404, and Eustochium succeeded to her mother's position. The eulogy on Paula written by Jerome (Ep. 108) gives much detail on their life in Bethlehem. Jerome addressed numerous letters to Paula and Eustochium and also dedicated some of his scriptural commentaries to them. Eustochium in her youth was addressee of one of the most famous of Jerome's epistles (Ep. 22), a lengthy treatise on virginity. Eustochium and Paula are the ostensible authors of another long letter preserved among Jerome's correspondence (Ep. 46), but this letter may actually have been drafted, or rewritten, by Jerome.

Feast: Sept 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 7:589–603. JEROME, Epistulae, ed. I. HILBERG, 3 v. (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 54–56; 1910–18), letters 22, 46, 54, 107, 108, 151, 153, 154; Letters, ed. T. C. LAWLER, tr. C. C. MIEROW, v.1 (Ancient Christian Writers 33; 1963), passim. F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1, 2; 1922), passim. ST. JEROME, Epistula di misser sanctu Iheronimu ad Eustochiu, ed. F. SALMERI (Palermo 1999), letters of Jerome and Eustochium with ample bibliographic references.

[T. C. LAWLER]

EUTHANASIA

The term "euthanasia," from the Greek eu thanatos meaning "well," "good," or "easy" dying/death, has today become more commonly equated with one form of dying, namely, "mercy killing," considered by the Catholic Church to be direct or active euthanasia. Official Church teaching describes direct/active euthanasia as "an act or omission which, of itself or by intention, causes death in order to eliminate suffering" and judges that such an act "constitutes a murder gravely contrary to the dignity of the human person and to the respect due to the Living God, His Creator." (Catechism of the Catholic Church [CCC], #2277) The adjectives direct and active have ethical significance. They are used to distinguish those actions that voluntarily induce death from those indirect or passive actions of a more palliative nature (e.g., morphine for pain management) that may unintentionally shorten life, or decisions to forego further interventions (omissions) judged to be medically futile in recognition and acceptance of the inevitability and imminence of death. In Catholic moral teaching, indirect and passive euthanasia are considered to be ethical while direct and active euthanasia are unethical.

History. Direct euthanasia has historically deep roots in human society. It was a common practice in ancient Greece, and later in Rome, as evidenced by the suicidal act of Zeno (c. 263 B. C.), the founder of the Stoic school of philosophy, who took poison rather than endure an agonizing foot injury. In contrast, physicians in the Hippocratic School of medical ethics opposed euthanasia (and abortion), pledging "I will neither give a deadly drug to anybody if asked for it, nor will make a suggestion to this effect." The later widespread influence of Christianity in Europe reduced the practice of euthanasia, teaching that human life is a gift entrusted to us by God and that direct killing of the innocent violates the commandment "Thou shalt not kill." Nineteenth-century developments in anesthesiology reopened discussions of the "good death" with advocacy, for example, of the use of chloroform to end life in cases of hopeless and painful illness.

Pro-euthanasia supporters in the United States began to actively campaign in some states for the legalization of euthanasia. While prominent medical societies opposed euthanasia on the grounds that it was unlawful, ethical arguments were less prominently employed outside the religious communities. The outbreak of World War II and the discovery of the Nazi death camps tended to quiet the voices of advocacy for about a decade.

In the United States legal and ethical discussions about euthanasia and "the right to die" became more prominent in the face of the 1975 medical/legal case of Karen Ann Quinlan who went into a coma after allegedly mixing tranquilizers with alcohol, surviving biologically for nine years in a "persistent vegetative state" even after New Jersey Supreme Court approval to remove her from a respirator. There developed widespread public concern about "lives not worth living" and the possibility of at least voluntary euthanasia if it could be ascertained that the patient would not have wanted to live in this condition. The Vatican's 1980 Declaration On Euthanasia affirmed and reiterated the Catholic position that "nothing and no one can in any way permit the killing of an innocent human being, whether a fetus or an embryo, an infant or an adult, an old person or one suffering from an incurable disease, or a person who is dying." The Declaration went on to state that "no one is permitted to ask for this act of killing, either for himself or herself or for another person entrusted to his or her care, nor can he or she consent to it, either explicitly or implicitly. Nor can any authority legitimately recommend or permit such an action. For it is a question of the violation of the divine law, an offence against the dignity of the human person, a crime against life, and an attack on humanity."

In 1990 retired Michigan pathologist Jack Kevorkian assisted a woman with Alzheimer's disease to end her life, the first of his over 130 reported assisted suicides until his imprisonment in 1999. For some leaders of the euthanasia movement, like England's Derek Humphrey (Final Exit: The Practicalities of Self- Deliverance and Assisted Suicide for the Dying), Kevorkian's blatant challenge to existing laws prohibiting euthanasia and assisted suicide and some of his intemperate rhetoric constituted a setback for pro-euthanasia activists. Nonetheless, legislation supporting physician-assisted suicide (PAS) survived a 1997 voter referendum in the State of Oregon.

In April 2001, the Netherlands became the first nation to pass legislation allowing doctors to end the life of patients who are experiencing irremediable and unbearable suffering, who are aware of all other medical options, and who have sought a second professional opinion. The law allows patients to leave a written request for euthanasia, giving doctors discretion to act when patients become too physically or mentally ill to decide for themselves. Several other countries— Switzerland, Colombia, and Belgium—tolerate euthanasia.

Catholic Moral Teaching. Catholic moral teaching on this issue is rooted in the premise that "human life is the basis of all good, and is the necessary source and condition of every human activity and of all society." (Declaration) Life is held to be a gift from God, the Creator, who retains ownership of the gift. Human persons are stewards of their gift of life and have an obligation to exercise responsible stewardship. Responsible stewardship includes the limited right of disposal, for example the donation of a non-vital organ or tissue, like skin or one kidney, but not the absolute right of disposal of life itself, as in suicide. The traditional Catholic understanding of responsible stewardship maintains that persons must employ ordinary or proportionate means to preserve life and may employ extraordinary or disproportionate means. The latter include all medicines, treatments, and operations that cannot be obtained or used without excessive expense, pain, or other inconvenience, for the patient or for others, or which, if used, would not offer reasonable hope of benefit for the patient.

In this definition the term "excessive" is understood as the undue burden associated with pursing the purpose of life, not the burden that the therapy or procedure used to prolong life would entail. The determination of "disproportionate" is largely subjective, i.e., what would this patient consider to be unduly burdensome? In rejecting or even discontinuing the employment of disproportionate means, "one does not will to cause death; one's inability to impede it is merely accepted. (CCC 2278) To insist upon doing "everything" to ward off death when the biological life being sustained will no longer support cognitive function and a potentiality for human and humanizing relationships is a type of vitalism and overly zealous treatment. The Christian belief in personal RES-URRECTION and eternal life frees the believer and his or her family and care-givers to allow "letting go" of this gift of biological life entrusted to the person by the Creator in order to attain the greater gift of eternal life with God.

The disputed question of omitting or discontinuing the delivery of artificially induced nutrition and hydration has been largely resolved in Catholic teaching within the context of the "disproportionate means" principle. The Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Services from the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops (June 15, 2001) states: "There should be a presumption in favor of providing nutrition and hydration to all patients, including patients who require medically assisted nutrition and hydration, as long as this is of sufficient benefit to outweigh the burdens involved to the patient." Hydration and nutrition are normally considered part of comfort or palliative care, but in particular cases may become disproportionate medical means and be omitted or discontinued.

In Catholic teaching, all persons are encouraged to provide advance directives for their health care, excluding, of course, requesting being euthanized, in the event they become unable to provide care direction for themselves. Initial Catholic opposition to "living wills" and proposed civil legislation to guarantee a patient's right to decline treatment gradually dissipated with the recognition that advances in medical technology, in many instances, could prolong a person's life, at least biologically, to the point where death and dying, not life and living, is prolonged.

In a certain sense, an executed advance directive is a patient's defense against the over technologizing of medical health care. The preferred advance directive is "durable power of attorney for health care" that designates or appoints an agent to make health care decisions for the patient and/or gives instructions regarding future health care decisions. This living-agent approach has advantages over the written "living will" document that tends to be very specific about treatments or procedures not to be employed, but may not be relevant for the medical situation facing this patient at this time. In durable power of attorney for health care the appointee knows the patient and is better able to make decisions consonant with the values and beliefs of the patient irrespective of specific clinical procedures or treatments.

In the document EVANGELIUM VITAE (1995) Pope JOHN PAUL II reiterates the constant teaching of the Catholic Church when he states: "I confirm that euthanasia is a grave violation of the law of God (emphasis his), since it is deliberate and morally unacceptable killing of a human person. This doctrine is based on the natural law and upon the written word of God, is transmitted by the Church's Tradition and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium." (EV65) Whether the killing is done by another or is a suicidal act, the rationale for its rejection is that God alone has sovereignty over life and death. The phenomenon of so-called "assisted suicide," especially "physician assisted suicide," has been debated in many countries and has been given legal protection in some, as noted above. However, assisting in the suicide of another places one in the situation of being a formal cooperator in their morally evil act and, therefore, as culpable as the one requesting and carrying out the act. "Mercy" and "compassion" are offered as the justification for providing a patient a terminal escape from suffering. However, "even when not motivated by a selfish refusal to be burdened with the life of someone who is suffering, euthanasia must be called a false mercy, and indeed a disturbing 'perversion' of mercy. True 'compassion' leads to sharing another's pain; it does not kill the person whose suffering we cannot bear." (EV 66) A special perversity is seen in such actions carried out by family members or physicians who, above all, are expected to minister lovingly to a suffering relative or professionally to a patient.

The Church considers the euthanizing of one who has in no way requested it or who has never consented to it to be a form of murder. "The height of arbitrariness and injustice is reached when certain people, such as physicians or legislators, arrogate to themselves the power to decide who ought to live and who ought to die. . . . Thus, the life of the person who is weak is put into the hands of the one who is strong; in society the sense of justice is lost, and mutual trust, the basis of every authentic interpersonal relationship, is undermined at its root." (EV 66)

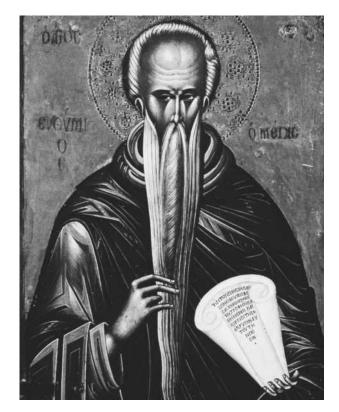

Bibliography: Declaration on Euthanasia (Vatican City 1980). Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Services (Washington, D.C. 2001). "Nutrition and Hydration: Moral Considerations" (Pennsylvania Conference of Catholic Bishops 1992). B. ASHLEY and K. O'ROURKE, Health Care Ethics: A Theological Analysis, 4th Edition (Washington, D.C. 1991). P. CATALDO and A. S. MORACZEWSKI, Catholic Health Care Ethics: A Manual for Ethics Committees (Boston 2001).

EUTHYMIUS I, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

February 907 to May 15, 912; b. Seleucia, Isauria, c. 834; d. Constantinople, Aug. 5, 917. Euthymius entered a monastery on Mt. Olympus, Bithynia, as a youth and eventually became abbot of St. Theodora in Constantinople, as well as confessor to Emperor LEO VI the Wise (886-912). He used his influence over the Emperor to protect many of the officials in the party of PHOTIUS from the political reprisals of Stylianus Zautzes, father of Leo's mistress Zoe. He refused to appear at the imperial court, but on being appointed syncellus, he accepted a monastery built for him near the palace. After the death of Leo's first wife, he refused to sanction the Emperor's marriage with Zoe and was banished for two years but was recalled after Zoe's death. When Leo was denied a dispensation for a fourth marriage (see BYZANTINE CHURCH, HISTORY OF) by Patriarch NICHOLAS I MYS-TICUS, the Emperor appealed to the "four other patriarchs," who granted it. He deposed Nicholas and nominated Euthymius as the new patriarch; but the latter refused the see until he was certain that Nicholas had resigned and that the "four patriarchs" through their representatives had pronounced again in favor of the dispensation. As patriarch he refused to enter the name of the Emperor's fourth wife in the DIPTYCHS and degraded the priest who had blessed their union. After the death of Leo VI, Nicholas was reinstated as patriarch and took revenge on the banished Euthymius. With heroic charity, Euthymius forgave him and the two were reconciled before his death. The life of Euthymius was written by a contemporary, and he was accepted as a saint in the Greek Church in 991. The Vita insists on Euthymius's competence as a preacher but only a few of his sermons are certainly authentic: three on the feast of St. Anna (Dec. 9) and one on the Theotokos. He also composed a canon or hymn on the Theotokos and an encomium of Hierotheos. The history ascribed to him of the first seven general councils and the Synod of Photius's rehabilitation (879-880), may have been composed 500 years later by Euthymius II (1410–16).

Bibliography: V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople 625–629. P. KARLIN-HAYTER, ed., "Vita S. Euthymii," Byzantion 25–37 (1955–57) 1–172; with Eng. tr. Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich 549–550. R. JANIN, Catholicisme 4:728–729. M. JUGIE, Échos d'Orientalia 16 (1913) 385–395, 481–492; 23 (1924) 286–288; ed. and tr., Patrologia Orientalis 16 (1922) 489–514; 19 (1926) 441–445. F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, Eng. 1948) 111–117. J. DARROUZÈS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 16:58–59. V. GRUMEL, "Observations diverses sur la question photienne," Diskussionsbeiträge zum 11. Internationalen Byzantinistenkongress, München 1958 (Munich 1961) 48–54.

[M. J. HIGGINS]

St. Euthymius the Great, Monastery at Mount Athos, Greece. (© Chris Hellier/CORBIS)

EUTHYMIUS THE GREAT, ST.

Abbot and Byzantine monastic founder; b. Melitene, Armenia, 377; d. Palestine, Jan. 20, 473. Of a religious family, Euthymius was orphaned early and educated by the bishop of Melitene, Otreus. On his ordination, he was charged with the spiritual care of the ascetics and monasteries of the city, but he fled to Palestine in search of solitude and entered the monastery of Pharan, where he became a friend of St. Theoctistus. Several years later the two monks retired to a hermitage and on being joined by others, Theoctistus (d. 467) founded a laura or cenobitic monastery. The followers of Euthymius later forced him to establish a laura called after him. Its church was consecrated by Bishop Juvenal of Jerusalem in 429. Euthymius organized a way of life in which, after a period of formation, the monk retired to a solitary cell and met with others only for liturgical and spiritual functions. After the death of Euthymius it was reorganized as a cenobium.

By his reputation for sanctity Euthymius converted many nomad Saracens, and had encampment bishoprics (parembolai) created to care for them (Vita 20–21). His advice was sought by several Oriental bishops who took part in the Councils of EPHESUS (431) and CHALCEDON (451). Although he appears not to have written any works, his principles of the monastic life and ascetical sayings were recorded by his disciple St. CYRIL OF SCYTHOPOLIS in one of the great early Byzantine hagiographical works, the Vita s. Euthymii.

Feast: Jan. 20.

Bibliography: I. HAUSHERR, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER (Paris 1932–) 2:2687–90. J. DARROUZÈS, ibid. 4:1720–22. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 16:61. E. SCHWARTZ, ed., Kyrillos von Skythopolis (Texte und Untersuchungenzur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 49.2; 1939). S. VAILHÉ, ''S. Euthyme le Grand,'' Revue de l'Orient Chrétien NS 4 (1909) 256–263. H. CHARLES, Le Christianisme des Arabes nomades (Paris 1936) 40–43. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 198, 203. D. CHITTY, Excavation of the Monastery of St. Euthymius 1929: Quarterly Statement for the Palestine Exploration Fund (London 1930). A. BARROIS, Revue Biblique 39 (1930) 272–275.

[J. BENTIVEGNA]

EUTRAPELIA

From the Greek εὐτραπελία meaning ready wit or liveliness, is a term used by scholastic theologians to signify moderation in the use of recreation. As a virtue eutrapelia was introduced into the study of morals by ARISTOTLE (Eth. Nic. 4.8), and in modern speech it goes commonly by the name of recreation. Constant work and application cause weariness of mind and body, and the normal cure for this is play. However, this need for relaxation should be in accord with the demands of right reason, which require that recreation involve nothing morally evil, that the participant should not lose self-control altogether, and that the norms of prudence be followed as regards time, circumstances, and social relationship. Defect in the matter of eutrapelia would consist in taking too little recreation, which leads to austere moroseness, or in being boorish in one's social relationships. Excess in recreation would occur if one were to become too fascinated by the delight that accompanies play and thus neglect the serious matters of life. St. THOMAS AQUINAS included eutrapelia in his scheme of virtues under the potential parts of temperance. Offenses against this virtue ordinarily are not grave, and at most would consist in a hindrance to good social life. Too little play can be worse than too much.

Bibliography: ARISTOTLE, Nicomachean Ethics 1128a. THOM-AS AQUINAS, ST 2a2ae, 168.2. F. L. B. CUNNINGHAM, ed., The Christian Life (Dubuque 1959) 740–741.

[W. HERBST]

EUTYCHES

Constantinopolitan abbot and heretic, considered the father of MONOPHYSITISM; b. c. 375; d. 454.

As Archimandrite of an important monastery during the mid-400s in the outskirts of Constantinople, Eutyches enjoyed great influence at the court of Theodosius II through his godson, the eunuch Chrysaphius. In his fidelity to the formula rather than the theology of St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, and in his anti-Nestorian zeal, he recognized only one nature in Christ. THEODORET OF CYR wrote his Eranistes (447) against Eutyches without naming him. He was denounced as a heretic by Eusebius of Doryleum before the synodos endemousa on Nov. 8, 448, and at first refused to obey the summons of the Patriarch FLAVIAN. Finally making an appearance on November 22, he obstinately refused to confess that there were two natures in Christ and was condemned and deposed. Pope LEO I confirmed this judgment (Epist. 23, 29, 30). Although rehabilitated by the Robber Council of Ephesus in 449, he was exiled after the assumption of emperorship by Marcian and Pulcheria in 451. Nothing further is known of his life.

Pope Leo in his Tome to Flavian called Eutyches "an ignorant, imprudent old man" for having asserted under questioning at Constantinople that there were two natures before, but only one after the Incarnation. He was thus forced into denying a concrete and individual existence for the human nature of Christ, and into holding that, as the human nature was absorbed by the divinity, Christ's flesh was not consubstantial with ours. St. Leo indicates that Eutyches did not truly understand the theological issue, and, on being challenged, obstinately refused to recede from what he erroneously thought was the opinion of St. Cyril.

Bibliography: M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:1582–1609. R. DEVREESSE, "Les Premières années du monophysisme," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 19 (1930) 251–265. R. DRAGUET, "La Christologie d'Eutychès," Byzantion 6 (1931) 441–447. P. T. CAMELOT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart 1:229–242. H. BACHT, ibid. 2:197–222.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

EUTYCHIAN, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Jan. 4, 275, to Dec. 7, 283. Beyond the dates of his pontificate, no reliable reports on Eutychian are extant, and no documents ascribed to him are authentic. Despite the fact that no persecution marked his reign, the Liber pontificalis, which stated that he was a Tuscan, the son of Marinus, reported that he buried 342 martyrs and ordered that martyrs should be interred in dalmatics. Not a martyr himself, Eutychian was buried in the cemetery of Callistus where his Greek epitaph has been discovered. He is credited, probably erroneously, with establishing the custom whereby first fruits were blessed on the altar.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Eccesiastical History. G. SCH-WAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 3:1214. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 23.

[E. G. WELTIN]

EUTYCHIANISM

Eutychianism is a species of MONOPHYSITISM, the Christological heresy that held that in Christ after the hypostatic union, there is only one nature (physis). Eutychianism is usually considered to be the strict or authentic type of Monophysitism and is to be distinguished from mitigated forms such as Severian Monophysitism (see SE-VERUS OF ANTIOCH). Eutychianism thus understood includes, besides the teaching of EUTYCHES himself, doctrines that his opponents commonly attributed to him as well as similar doctrines of later times, whether or not they claim the patronage of Eutyches or have any historical connection with him. Eutychianism so defined embraces all doctrines in which the immutability of the Eternal Word, or the perfect consubstantial integrity of the human nature in Christ, are attacked or denied.

Eutyches was the recognized leader of the mid-5thcentury monks at Constantinople. Not a good theologian, but influential in ecclesiastical politics, he engaged in theological controversy to prevent the revival of NESTO-RIANISM. His own doctrine came under fire when he was accused of heresy by Bp. Eusebius of Doryleum, the man who had been the accuser of NESTORIUS a generation earlier (431).

Eutyches was condemned by FLAVIAN, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the synod of 448. The condemnation was based on Eutyches's refusal to admit that in Christ there are two natures after the union and that Christ's flesh is that "of a man." Eutyches was a friend of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA and slavishly devoted to Cyril's terminology, especially the famous phrase: "one nature of the Incarnate Word." The phrase actually had come from the heretic APOLLINARIS OF LAODICEA, but Cyril had been able to interpret and use it correctly. Eutyches was incapable of this.

Eutyches would admit that Christ was of two natures before the union and that Christ's flesh was consubstantial with that of the Blessed Virgin. He held strongly that Christ was true God and true man. He denied any confusion or change of either nature in the union. But he feared that the statement that there were two natures after the union, or that Christ's flesh was the flesh "of a man," involved admitting two persons in Christ, or Nestorianism. Though reinstated by the Robber Council of EPHESUS in 449, he was definitively condemned at the Council of CHALCEDON in 451. He was exiled and thereafter disappears from history.

In the aftermath of opposition to Chalcedon in Egypt and Syria, many doctrines were attributed to Eutyches by his opponents, such as the absorption of Christ's humanity in the divinity, the unreality of Christ's humanity, a heavenly origin of Christ's humanity, the commingling of the humanity and divinity to form a third substance, and transformation of the divinity into the humanity with Christ ceasing to be God. Eutyches did not hold these doctrines, although they did spread among some of the less educated Monophysites. But in refuting them, the orthodox champions often ascribed them to Eutyches himself. The identification of their proponents, except in very few cases, seems to be impossible. Their attribution to Eutyches has no solid foundation. There was more ignorance than malice in his refusal to accept the doctrine of Chalcedon. LEO I characterized him as unlearned, unqualified, and imprudent.

Bibliography: R. V. SELLERS, The Council of Chalcedon (London 1953). P. T. CAMELOT, in A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, 3 v. (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:229–242; 2:197–222. B. EMMI, Angelicum 29 (1952) 1–42. G. BARDY, in A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'égise depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) 4:211–222. M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 5.2:1582–1609.

[G. OWENS]

EUTYCHIOS OF ALEXANDRIA

Patriarch of Alexandria, Melchite historian and theologian, whose Arabic name was Sa'īd ibn Batrīq; b. Fostāţ (Cairo), Egypt, Aug. 17, 877; d. Alexandria, May 11, 940. He first dedicated himself to the study of medicine, about which he wrote copiously. On Feb. 7, 933, he was elected patriarch of Alexandria. His literary fame is due mainly to his Annals (Nazm al-Jawhar). This book, a general history of the world, was begun while he was a layman and was dedicated to his brother, 'Īsā ibn Batrīq, a practicing physician. In it Eutychios follows the pattern of the Byzantine chronologists in writing, without any systematic plan, a religious and profane history from the beginning of the world to his own time, ending with A.D. 938; it was continued down to A.D. 1027 by a relative of his, Yahyā ibn Sa'īd of Antioch. Chief emphasis is given to the history of the Church and of the Muslim Caliphates. The Nestorian and the Monophysite heresies are discussed and refuted at length. The value of Nazm al-Jawhar varies with the different sources Eutychios uses for his information. As with other Greek and Syrian writers of that period, he did not hesitate to include many popular legends. However, much factual information relating to contemporary practices cannot be found anywhere else. This alone would make the book invaluable. It soon became very popular, circulated widely, and was used as a source by such different historians as the Copt, al Makīn; the Arab, al Maqrīzī; and the Frenchman, William of Tyre. The author's special views on the heterodoxy of the Copts (Jacobites) and on the early Maronites (whom he identifies as Monothelites) earned for him the severe criticism of their historians.

Eutychios is, most probably, the author of the theological Book of Demonstration (Kitāb al-Burhān), a work usually attributed in the manuscripts to St. Athanasius the Great. In the first part of this work, the author treats of creation, the destiny of man, the perfections of God, and the Incarnation. In the three other parts, he gathers all the Biblical texts relating to the dogmas described and discussed previously. All four parts were written by one author—a member of the Greek Melchite Church—in Arabic, without traces of any translation, except for Biblical citations, some time before 944. All indications tend to prove Eutychios of Alexandria the sole author of Kitāb al-Burhān. Eutychios also wrote Disputation Between a Christian and a Heretic, and a book on the creation of the angels.

Bibliography: EUTYCHIOS OF ALEXANDRIA, Annales, ed. L. CHEIKHO et al. (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium 50–51, Scriptores arabici, ser. 3, v.6–7; 1906–09), Arabic text only; Latin tr. E. POSOCK (Oxford 1658), repr. Patrologia Graeca 111:907–1156; The Book of Demonstration (Kitāb al-Burhān) I–II, ed. P. CACHIA, Eng. tr. W. M. WATT (CSCO 192, 193, 209, 210; Scriptores arabici, v.20–23; 1960–61). G. GRAF, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur, 5 v. (Vatican City 1944–53) 2:32–38. J. M. NEALE, A History of the Holy Eastern Church, 2 v. (London 1847) 2:181–183. F. NAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 5.2: 1609–11.

[L. MALOUF]

EUTYCHIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Patriarch from 552 to 565 and 577 to 582; b. Theium, Phrygia, 512; d. Constantinople, April 5, 582. Eutychius made his studies in Constantinople and returned to Amasea, where he was ordained, became a monk and archimandrite or abbot. While stationed as the apocrisiari- us of the metropolitan of Amasea at Constantinople, he was selected by Justinian I to replace Patriarch Mennas (d. Aug. 24, 552); he entered into relations with Pope Vigilius I, residing in the capital because of the controversy over the Three Chapters, and presided over the Council of Constantinople II (June 553). He was banished by Justinian (565) for his opposition to Aphthartodocetism to which the Emperor had been persuaded in his old age; but was restored as patriarch by Justin II in 577. With the papal apocrisiarius at Constantinople, later Pope Gregory I, he engaged in a controversy on the resurrection of the flesh, resulting apparently from a tract on Origenism written by the patriarch that has not been preserved. He likewise wrote against the Monophysite interpretation of the Trisagion. Fragments of a treatise on the Eucharist have been preserved, as have his letter to Pope Vigilius and the decision of the Council of Constantinople prepared under his guidance. He died during Vespers for the octave of Easter, having received a visit from the Emperor Tiberius. His vita was written by his disciple and companion Eustratius; and in 1246 his body was brought to Venice, where it was interred in the church of St. George the Great.

Feast: April 6 (Oriental Church).

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 86.2:2267–2406. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 16:94–95. Das Konzil von Chalkidon: Geschichte und Gegenwart. Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich 380, 410. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3:1215. Histoire du Bas-Empire, ed. J. R. PALANQUE 2:654–681. V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople 244–249, 260–263.

[J. BENTIVEGNA]

EVA OF LIÈGE, BL.

Recluse; b. c. 1210; d. after 1264. The only source for her life is the Vita Julianae (Acta Sanctorum April 1:433-475), most of the information for which was contributed by Eva herself. Her influence and affluence indicate that she belonged to a family of high social standing. She was the intimate friend of JULIANA OF LIÈGE and, doubtless encouraged by the latter, she embraced the life of the recluse in a cell attached to the church of St. Martin at Liège. The history of the origin of the Feast of CORPUS CHRISTI demonstrates her constant contact with outstanding theologians of the day. In 1264 she received from Pope URBAN IV, together with the bull Transiturus, a personal message and a copy of the Office of the feast composed by THOMAS AQUINAS. Her relics were elevated in the church of St. Martin at Liège in 1622 and her cult was approved by Pope LEO XIII in 1902.

Feast: May 26; March 14 at Liège.

-007 TC MOL

A portion of the second part of Evagrius Ponticus's "Letter to Melania" in a 9th-century Syriac manuscript (Add. MS 17192, fol. 63r).

Bibliography: S. ROISIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 16:114–117. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 4:777–778. ABBÉ JOSEFF, Vie de sainte Ève, recluse de St. Martin à Liège (Liège 1903). CLO-TILDE DE STE. JULIENNE, Histoire d'un glorieux passé Julienne de Cornillion, ste. Ève de St-Martin de la Fête-Dieu (Brussels 1924). A. ERNST, Zwei Freundinnen Gottes (Freiburg im Breisgau 1926).

[T. C. CROWLEY]

EVAGRIUS PONTICUS

Fourth-century monk and mystical theologian; b. Ibora in the Hellespont, 345; d. Cellia, Egypt, 399. Although exalted for a time as the equal of the great Church Fathers, he was suspected of heresy after 400, and condemned at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553); Evagrius's reputation darkened gradually until in 1920 scholars turned renewed attention to him.

Life. Evagrius was selected as a lector by (St.) BASIL, and ordained a deacon by GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS at Constantinople in 379; after assisting at the Council (381), he remained with the Patriarch Nectarius as theologian collaborating in the anti-Eunomian controversy (Palladius, Hist. laus. 38). After an interval, he journeyed to Jerusalem (382) and resided in the monastery founded by MELANIA THE ELDER on the Mount of Olives. In 383 he became a monk in Egypt, and he subsequently settled in the Nitrian Valley for two years, and spent 14 years in the Desert of Cellia, supporting himself by copying manuscripts. With Macarius and Ammonius as spiritual fathers, he gradually exercised great influence on the monks through his writings and mystical doctrine.

Works. Besides several treatises preserved in the original Greek, his writings come down in Syriac and Armenian translations or under the name of orthodox teachers such as NILUS OF ANCYRA. Palladius, Socrates (Hist. Eccl. 4:23), and Gennadius (Vir. ill. 11) mention several collections of his ascetical maxims. One of these, the Monachikos, is divided in two sections: the Praktikos for uneducated monks (100 ch.) and the Gnostikos for cultured ascetics (50 ch.). The Gnostic Centuries (Problemata gnostica), 600 concise sentences for meditation in six books dealing with ascetic and doctrinal problemsangels, the Trinity, the restoration of all things in God-is extant in two very different versions; one corrected against Origenistic tendencies, the other apparently faithful to the original. The Antirrhetikos in eight books described the eight principal vices to be overcome by the monk, and offset them with Scriptural quotations. It is preserved in Syriac and Armenian. The Mystic Sentences or Mirror for Monks and Nuns, was translated by RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA into Latin (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 40:1277-86) with an introduction preserved in Evagrius's letters 19 and 20.

Sixty-seven of Evagrius's letters are preserved in Syriac and Armenian. One in Greek (Basil, Epist. 8) confutes Arian doctrine on the Trinity, consubstantiality of the Son, and divinity of the Holy Spirit. Of considerable doctrinal importance also is his Letter to Melania the Elder (the second part was edited by G. Vitestam, Lund 1964).

The manuscript tradition has preserved a Hypotyposis (Patrologia Graeca 40:1253–60), Selecta in Psalmos, and a Commentary on Proverbs culled from the catenae of Scripture and other patristic writings and reclaimed for Evagrius by U. v. Balthasar [Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie 63 (1939) 86–106; 181–206] and M. Rondeau [Orientalia Christiana periodica 26 (1960) 307–40]. Four tracts on monastic perfection—Ad Eulogium monachum, De malignis cogitationibus, De octo spiritibus malignis, and De oratione (Patrologia Graeca 1093–1233)—attributed to St. Nilus have been claimed for Evagrius.

Doctrine. In theology Evagrius follows the De Principiis of ORIGEN but in more radical form, constituting the system condemned by the Council of Constantinople II in 553. In the beginning existed a henade (oneness) formed by the universe of rational beings created equal, to know God, which is "essential knowledge." Following a fault, these spirits were separated from God, each experiencing a fate in accordance with the degree of the fall. These fallen intellects are called souls and were joined to bodies. By asceticism and contemplation, these intellects can progressively return to God; and there will be a time when all make this return and the original henade will be reestablished (APOCATASTASIS). As the body does not belong to the essence of the soul, the resurrection will be only a provisional step. Those "who see God'' will be incorporeal.

In his earlier works, as in the Letter to Melania, the Christology of Evagrius is orthodox following the Cappadocian fathers; but in his later works such as the Gnostic Centuries, the Selecta in Psalmos, it has been rethought in an Origenistic sense. Christ is only an intellect, similar to those forming the original henade; but in contrast to the others he has remained united to the Oneness, and as such is inalterably united to the Word who is God. This intellect, to reveal to them "essential knowledge" and lead them back to God.

Asceticism and Mysticism. The return to God is accomplished in two steps: the ascetical (praktike) way and the contemplative (gnostike). The ascetical is the "spiritual method whose goal is to purify the passionate part of the soul"; it aims at removing obstacles to contemplation, delivering man from his passions, and purifying the intellect of sense reactions; it is directed toward apatheia or impassibility. Evagrius analyses the passions and their working with finesse. He popularizes the eight capital vices (reduced later to seven capital sins), viz, gluttony, fornication, avarice, sorrow, anger, discouragement (acedia), vainglory, and pride, and distributes these vices according to the tripartite schema of his psychology: the first three deal with the concupiscible appetite, anger with the irascible, and vainglory and pride are attributed to the intellect. Sorrow and discouragement are intermediary vices. Sins and passions are interwoven and follow a rigorous pattern. To overcome them, Evagrius recommends an attack on each in its proper order.

The Contemplative Life is developed in two degrees: natural contemplation (physikē), which is subdivided into a contemplation of the body (secondary), and a contemplation of the logoi or reasons (primary); and progressive contemplation in which the intellect, by simplifying itself before the undetermined, empties itself of all forms, and comes to see in itself the light of God. "At the hour of prayer, the contemplative soul resembles the heavens where the light of the Holy Trinity shines" (Cent. suppl. 4). "The naked intellect [nous] becomes that which sees the Trinity" (Cent. 3.15).

Influence. Evagrius had a profound influence as founder of monastic mysticism, which was spread among the Greeks (St. JOHN CLIMACUS, MAXIMUS CONFESSOR, Dorotheus, and the Hesychasts); among the Latins through John CASSIAN, who adopted his ascetic doctrine; and among the Syrians, the Nestorians and the Monophysites, who consider him their great doctor of mystical theology.

Bibliography: ÉVAGRE LE PONTIQUE, Traité de l'oraison, ed. I. HAUSHERR (Paris 1960). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 3:169–76. S. MARSILI, G. Cassiano e Evagrio Pontico (Rome 1936). A. GUILLAUMONT, Les ''Kephalaia gnostica'' d'Évagre le Pontique (Paris 1963). A. and C. GUILLAUMONT, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.2:1731–44. O. CHAD-WICK, John Cassian (Cambridge, Eng. 1950). F. REFOULÉ, Orientalia Christiana periodica 26–27 (1960–61) 221–66; Revue de l'histoire des religions 163 (1963) 11–52.

[F. REFOULÉ]

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS

Sixth-century Byzantine lawyer and historian; b. Epiphania, Coelesyria, 536; d. after August 594. Evagrius wrote an Ecclesiastical History that goes from the Council of Ephesus (431) to August 594 and includes secular history also. He is orthodox and reliable (except in chronology), makes use of good sources (listed at the end of book five for books one to four), and was a contemporary and often eyewitness of events in books five and six; his work is important and authoritative. Evagrius was attorney for Gregory, Patriarch of Antioch, drew up his official reports, and accompanied him as professional adviser when he appeared before a synod in Constantinople to clear himself of a charge of incest. He published a collection (now lost) of miscellaneous compositions together with the patriarchal, official reports that earned him an honorary questorship from the Emperor Tiberius II; he was given an honorary prefecture by Emperor Maurice for a panegyric on the occasion of the birth of his first son, Theodosius.

This information is derived from Evagrius's Ecclesi-astical History. One of his earliest memories was of being taken by his parents as a child of three to Apamea to kiss the relic of the true cross and see it exposed for solemn public veneration. He says that he published his book in his 58th year (594). Two years before, the bubonic plague had come back for the fourth time during his life; he had caught it on its first onslaught 52 years earlier, while still a schoolboy of six, and had lost a daughter and grandchild in the most recent visitation. His wife, and many of his kin, as well as many of his town and country servants, had died of the plague. Pondering the death of his children, he was perplexed as to why the calamities did not happen to pagans with numerous offspring. Although he had not disclosed his doubts to anyone, he received a letter from St. Simeon Stylites the Younger, advising him to abandon such ideas as displeasing to God. Evagrius married a second time, and during the festivities occurred the great earthquake at Antioch of Oct. 29, 589. He says the whole city was taking part in the celebration at public cost; this gives an idea of his prominence in Antioch.

Bibliography: EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, The Ecclesiastical History, ed. J. BIDEZ and J. PARMENTIER (London 1898); Eng. tr. by E. WALFORD, . . . A History of the Church (London 1845). B. AL-TANER, Patrology 277. K. KRUMBACHER Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur 245–247. S. VAILHÉ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:1612–13. P. PEETERS, Analecta Bollandiana 65 (1947) 35–40. G. MORAVCSIK, Byzantinoturcica, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1958), bibliog. M. J. HIGGINS, "Chosroes II's Votive Offerings at Sergiopolis," Byzantinisches Zeitschrift 48 (1955) 89–102.

[M. J. HIGGINS]

EVANGELARY (BOOK OF GOSPELS)

Liturgical book containing selected pericopes (Greek pericope, for a selection "cut around") from the Gospel, arranged in a manner to be read at the Eucharistic Liturgy or Liturgy of the Hours for the feasts and seasons of the liturgical year. Its name comes from the Greek euaggelion, meaning Gospel. The evangeliary emerged as a book separate from the Lectionary in the Eastern churches and was designed for the use of the deacon whose task it is to proclaim the Gospel. While some Evangelaries contained the Gospel readings, others contained only tables indicating passages to be read, as well as the Sundays and Holy Days on which they are to be read. Known to the Greeks as an Evangelistarium, to the Latins as a Capitulare, and elsewhere as a Synaxarium, the name Evangelary, though of recent origin, has been universally adopted. The Evangelaries were highly venerated, and therefore text and cover were often richly ornamented.

Following the custom of the Synagogue, the Scriptures of the Old Testament were read at the primitive Christian assemblies. As the Canon of the New Testament was determined, certain extracts from it were included in these readings. Justin relates that when the Christians met together, they read the Memoirs of the Apostles and the writings of the Prophets (Apol., I, lxvii). Tertullian, Cyprian, and other writers bear witness to the same custom; and in the West the order of lector existed as early as the third century. Particular passages were most likely chosen by the presider and it is clear that on certain festivals, the Scripture relating to them would be read. Gradually a more or less definite list would naturally result from this method.

St. John Chrysostom in a homily delivered at Antioch exhorts his hearers to read beforehand the Scripture passages to be read and commented on in the Office of the day (Homilia de Lazaro, iii, c. i). In like manner other Churches would form a table of readings. In the margin of the ms. text it was customary to note the Sunday or festival on which that particular passage would be read, and at the end of the manuscript, the list of such passages, the Synaxarium or Capitulare, would be added. Transition from this process to the creation of an Evangelary, or collection of all such passages, was easy. Fragments of Evangelaries in Greek date from the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, but most of the surviving books date from the ninth century onwards. In like manner, there are Lectionaries in the Latin Churches as early as the fifth century. The Comes of the Roman Church dates from before St. Gregory the Great (P.L., XXX, 487-532). From the tenth century onwards Gospel lessons, together with the Epistles and prayers, were united in a new liturgical book, called the Missal.

At the time when the various Gospel passages began to be collected in book form for use in liturgical celebrations, the various families of the Gospel text and its translations were already in existence; and those Evangelaries simply reproduce the particular text favored by the Church which compiled it. Since the Second Vatican Council special provision has been made for a Book of Gospels as distinct from the Sacramentary. The General Instruction of the Roman Missal states that this liturgical book deserves special veneration. Thus it is to be carried in the entrance procession and may be enthroned on the altar. According to traditional liturgical practice the Book of the Gospels is kissed as a sign of veneration and is incensed in the same way as the Most Blessed Sacrament, relics of the holy Cross, images of the Lord exposed for public veneration, gifts for the sacrifice of the Mass, the altar cross, the paschal candle, the priest and the people.

Bibliography: E. DICKMANN, A. HEDWIG, and P. SPRANG, Das Echternacher Evangelistar Kaiser Heinrichs III.: Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek Bremen Ms. b. 21 / (Wiesbaden 1995). A. VON EUW, Liber viventium Fabariensis: Das karolingische Memorialbuch von Pfäfers in seiner liturgie- und kunstgeschichtlichen Bedeutung (Bern 1989). B. KLÖSSEL-LUCKHARDT, Das Evangelistar MA 56 des Herzog Anton Ulrich-Museums (Braunschweig 1992). E. PALAZZO, A History of Liturgical Books from the Beginning to the Thirteenth Century (Collegeville 1993). C. VOGEL, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources translated and revised by W. STOREY and N. RASMUSSEN (Washington, DC 1986).

[M. S. DRISCOLL]

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE

An association formed (1846) at London to unite evangelical Protestants on the basis of their common doctrines; it originated as a reaction to the growth of the OX-FORD MOVEMENT within the Church of England and the conversion of John Henry NEWMAN and other leaders to Catholicism. John A. James, pastor of a London Congregationalist church, is credited with having originated the idea of a union of individual Christians on Reformation principles, but Edward Bickersteth, an evangelical Church of England minister long active in the Church Mission Society, became its chief architect. In 1845, after preliminary meetings at Glasgow, Manchester, and London, a Conference on Christian Union was held at Liverpool. The organizational meeting at London in August 1846 was attended by 800 delegates representing 50 separate churches in Europe and America. Friedrich Tholuck of Halle, Adolphe Monod, and the historian J. H. Merle d'AUBIGNÉ were the most influential representatives of Continental Protestantism. The large American delegation included Lyman BEECHER, Samuel H. Cox, and Samuel S. SCHMUCKER, the chief promoter of the Alliance in the U.S. Division over the issue of slavery in America presented one of the meeting's few jarring notes. Agreement on a series of doctrinal propositions was reached, expressing belief in the inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the Scriptures; private judgment; the unity and Trinity of God; the utter depravity of human nature; the Incarnation, atonement, and mediatorial intercession of Christ; justification by faith alone; the work of the Holy Spirit in conversion; the immortality of the soul; and the divine institution of the Christian ministry, baptism, and the Lord's Supper. Merle d'Aubigné addressed the first conference on the persecution of Lutherans in Russia and later conferences took a leading part in obtaining relief for Protestants in Italy and Spain, for Methodists and Baptists in Sweden, and for Armenian Christians and other victims of intolerance. The Alliance also promoted a week of prayer for Christian unity in January. World conferences were held periodically in Europe and in 1873 at New York.

The composition of the American branch tended to reflect the Presbyterian and Reformed heritage more than other denominational beliefs, and Philip SCHAFF played an important role in its development after the Civil War. He was chiefly responsible for the organization (1867) of the Evangelical Alliance for the U.S., being one of its dominant figures until his death in 1893. Josiah Strong became the executive secretary of the American branch in 1885 and played an important part in focusing its attention on the problems of urban America. National conferences held at Washington in 1887 and at Boston in 1889 dealt with the problems of the unchurched masses, immigration, and social justice. Strong's effort to make the Alliance a vehicle for the SOCIAL GOSPEL proved to be unsuccessful and resulted in his resignation in 1898. The Alliance provided the groundwork for the Federal Council of Churches in the U.S. and was superseded by it in 1908 (see NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A.).

St. John the Evangelist on Patmos writing his gospel from "The Book of Hours of the Blessed Virgin Mary." (©Angelo Hornak/ CORBIS)

The World's Evangelical Alliance commemorated its centenary at London in 1946. It continues to be active in Great Britain as a fellowship of evangelical churches dedicated to Christian renewal and ecumenism on a doctrinal basis. Annual reports assess the work of British Evangelicalism, and annual conferences promote evangelical renewal.

Bibliography: Evangelical Alliance, Report of the Proceedings of the Conference held at Freemasons' Hall (London 1847). S. S. SCHMUCKER, True Unity of Christ's Church (New York 1870); The Church of the Redeemer (Philadelphia 1867). D. S. SCHAFF, The Life of Philip Schaff (New York 1897). Evangelical Alliance for U.S.A., National Perils and Opportunities (New York 1887); National Needs and Remedies (New York 1890). R. ROUSE and S. C. NEILL, eds., A History of the Ecumenical Movement, 1517–1948 (Philadelphia 1954).

[R. K. MACMASTER/EDS.]

EVANGELICAL AND REFORMED CHURCH

Organized by German Calvinists and Lutherans, it united with the Congregational Christian Church in 1957 to form the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST (see CALVINISM; LUTHERANISM). As a separate denomination it existed for only 23 years. When formed in 1934 through the union of two churches, the Evangelical Synod of North America and the Reformed Church in the U.S., the combined membership totaled about 620,000.

Immigrants from the Palatinate region of Germany brought their Reformed beliefs with them when they came to the American colonies (see REFORMED CHURCH-ES). Driven from their homeland because of the devastation of the Thirty Years' War and the campaigns of Louis XIV, many of the settlers accepted the hospitality of William PENN. Few ministers accompanied the immigrants; schoolteachers and devout laymen conducted worship services. A teacher, John Philip BOEHM, concluded the first communion service according to the Reformed order on Oct. 15, 1725, at Falkner Swamp, a tiny settlement 40 miles north of Philadelphia. This date is usually taken as the beginning of the Reformed Church in the U.S. Later the Reformed Church of Holland took an interest in these German Reformed colonists and sent Michael SCHLAT-TER to organize Reformed congregations in 1746 (see NETHERLANDS REFORMED CHURCH). He formed a coetus or synod the next year, which remained under Dutch supervision until 1793. When the church achieved its complete independence in that same year it reorganized as the Synod of the German Reformed Church. It expanded into Ohio, Wisconsin, North Carolina, and elsewhere and dropped "German" from its official name in 1869. Philip William OTTERBEIN withdrew from its fellowship to form the UNITED BRETHREN in Christ, and John Winebrenner, to found the General Eldership of the CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

The other denomination in the 1934 merger was established by German immigrants who came to America and settled in the Middle West a century after those who organized the Reformed Church. They sympathized with the union of Lutheran and Reformed traditions that had been ordered by King Frederick of Prussia in 1817. Foreign mission societies in Basel, Switzerland, and Barmen, Germany, sent help and missionaries to these evangelicals in the Mississippi Valley. Rev. Louis Nollau and five others formed a ministerial association in 1840 to which congregations were admitted in 1849. In 1866 this loose federation assumed a synodical character and took the name German Evangelical Synod of the West, later changed to the Evangelical Synod of North America.

The Evangelical Synod and the Reformed Church in the U.S. both drew their memberships from the German-American community, followed the AUGSBURG CONFES-SION and Luther's and the HEIDELBERG CATECHISMS, developed a liberal theology, and were governed according to a modified presbyterian polity. In 1929 a plan of union was accepted for the United Brethren in Christ, Reformed Church, and Evangelical Synod but eventually only the latter two bodies merged. This union took place on June 26, 1934, at Cleveland, Ohio.

At the time of the merger the two churches had congregations in 38 states but were especially strong in Pennsylvania and the Middle West. They supported an extensive social welfare program that included ten hospitals, ten children's homes, 18 homes for the aged, and institutions for epileptics. They sponsored three seminaries and eight colleges. In 1934 the Reformed Church reported 345,000 members and the Evangelical Synod 273,000.

The Constitution of the Evangelical and Reformed Church reaffirmed the confessions, catechisms, and creeds of the former churches but added: "Wherever these doctrinal standards differ, ministers, members and congregations, in accordance with the liberty of conscience inherent in the gospel, are allowed to adhere to the interpretation of one of these confessions. However, in each case, the final norm is the word of God."

The church observed the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; the latter was celebrated four times a year and was understood as a memorial service. Several prominent theologians, including Paul TILLICH and Reinhold NIEBUHR, were ordained ministers of the Evangelical and Reformed Church. The local church was governed by elected representatives. An equal number of laymen and clergy attended the annual synod and the general synod, which met every three years. The church was administratively divided into 34 synods. In 1957, it became a part of the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST.

[W. J. WHALEN/EDS.]

EVANGELICAL CHURCH

Originally known as the Evangelical Association and the So-Called Albright People. This denomination originated (1800–03) under the leadership of Jacob ALBRIGHT (Albrecht) among German-speaking people in Pennsylvania; it merged in 1946 with the Church of the UNITED BRETHREN to become the Church of the EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN. In April 1968, the Evangelical United Brethren merged with the Methodist Church to become the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

When Albright's itinerant preaching career as a Methodist among German-Americans received little encouragement from the Methodist Church, he organized several classes or groups of his followers in 1800. In 1803 a meeting of his supporters "certified" Albright as "a truly evangelical minister," but it was only in 1807 that an official conference named Albright's followers as the Newly Formed Methodist Conference. The new organization, however, was technically not a part of the Methodist Church of Francis ASBURY (1745-1816); so the 1809 annual conference changed the name to the So-Called Albright People, a title that became the Evangelical Association in the first general conference of 1816. As the new denomination spread, the English language gradually displaced German in preaching and in religious publications, and vigorous missionary activity was inaugurated. In 1839 a general missionary society was organized, and its efforts extended first to Germany and Switzerland and later to Japan, Russia, Poland-Latvia, and Africa. Between 1891 and 1894 disagreement over polity and administration led two-fifths of the membership to withdraw and form the United Evangelical Church. After nearly three decades of separation, the two groups were reunited in 1922 as the Evangelical Church. The resulting organization entered a new merger in 1946 when it joined a kindred, contemporary denomination, the United Brethren in Christ, to form the Evangelical United Brethren, which in turn merged with the Methodist Church in 1968 to become the United Methodist Church.

The Evangelical Church was Arminian in doctrine and its articles of faith corresponded closely to those of METHODISM (see ARMINIANISM). The Evangelicals held firmly to the divinity as well as the humanity of Christ, the sufficiency of Scripture for salvation, and emphasized Christian perfection and sanctification. Two sacraments were professed, Baptism and the Lord's Supper. Baptism was accepted as a sign of the new birth of the Christian; the Lord's Supper was declared to be a representation of man's redemption by the sufferings and death of Christ, while the changing of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ was denied as unfaithful to Scripture. The organizational structure of the Evangelical Church corresponded generally to that of the Methodist Church. A general conference that met every four years elected bishops who were neither ordained nor consecrated as such, but who presided at the annual conferences and decided all questions of law between general conference sessions. At the time of its merger the Evangelical Church had approximately 250,000 members in 25 states, predominantly in Pennsylvania.

Bibliography: R. W. ALBRIGHT, A History of the Evangelical Church (Harrisburg, Pa. 1942). J. BERNESDORFER, Pietism and Its Influence upon the Evangelical United Brethren Church (Philadelphia 1951). R. S. WILSON, Jacob Albright: the Evangelical Pioneer (Myerstown, Pa. 1940). A. D. GRAEFF et al., The Pennsylvania Germans, ed. R. WOOD (Princeton 1942). R. YEAKEL, History of the Evangelical Association, 2 v. (Harrisburg, Pa. 1924) v.1, 1750–1850.

[R. MATZERATH/EDS.]

EVANGELICAL CHURCH IN GERMANY (EKD)

In German, Evangelische Kirche in Deutschland (EKD), a federation (Bund) of Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches comprising the great majority of the Protestant churches in a united Germany. Although it reflects the doctrinal and institutional complexity of German Protestantism in its structure, its foundation in 1948 was a significant ecumenical achievement. At the beginning of the 21st century, the EKD comprises the following 24 Lutheran, Reformed and United "regional churches" (landeskirchen):

1. Evangelische Landeskirche Anhalts (Evangelical Church of Anhalt)

2. Evangelische Landeskirche in Baden (Evangelical Church of Baden)

3. Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche in Bayern (Evangelical Lutheran Church in Bavaria)

4. Evangelische Kirche in Berlin-Brandenburg (Evangelical Church in Berlin-Brandenburg)

5. Evangelisch-Lutherische Landeskirche in Braunschweig (Evangelical Lutheran Church in Brunswick)

6. Bremische Evangelische Kirche (Evangelical Church of Bremen)

7. Evangelisch-Lutherische Landeskirche Hannovers (Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Hanover)

8. Evangelische Kirche in Hessen und Nassau (Evangelical Church of Hesse und Nassau)

9. Evangelische Kirche von Kurhessen-Waldeck (Evangelical Church of Hesse Electorate-Waldeck)

10. Lippische Landeskirche (Church of Lippe)

11. Evangelisch-Lutherische Landeskirche Mecklenburgs (Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Mecklenburg) 12. Nordelbische Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche (North Elbian Evangelical Lutheran Church)

13. Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche in Oldenburg (Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Oldenburg)

14. Evangelische Kirche der Pfalz (Evangelical Church of the Palatinate)

15. Pommersche Evangelische Kirche (Pomeranian Evangelical Church)

16. Evangelisch-reformierte Kirche (Evangelical Reformed Church in Bavaria and Northwestern Germany)

17. Evangelische Kirche im Rheinland (Evangelical Church of Rhineland)

18. Evangelische Kirche der Kirchenprovinz Sachsen (Evangelical Church of the Province of Saxony)

19. Evangelisch-Lutherische Landeskirche Sachsens (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Saxony)

20. Evangelisch-Lutherische Landeskirche Schaumburg-Lippe (Evangelical-Lutheran Church of Schaumburg-Lippe)

21. Evangelische Kirche der schlesischen Oberlausitz (Evangelical Church of Silesian Oberlausitz)

22. Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche in Thüringen (Evangelical Lutheran Church in Thuringia)

23. Evangelische Kirche von Westfalen (Evangelical Church of Westphalia)

24. Evangelische Landeskirche in Württemberg (Evangelical Church of Württemberg)

Origin. During the Reformation the Lutheran and Calvinistic churches in the Holy Roman Empire came to be organized as state churches on a territorial basis. What at first had been an emergency solution later became the normal form of church government. Thus various systems of administration by secular authorities (princes, cities) arose. In addition, there was the separation between LUTHERANISM and CALVINISM, which was only partially overcome through the creation of "United" churches (doctrinal or administrative unions of Lutheran and Calvinistic churches) in Prussia and some minor German states in the 19th century. When after the collapse of the monarchy (1918) the Protestant churches reorganized themselves independently, the main problem was to combine a certain degree of national unity with territorial and confessional independence. A rather weak Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchenbund (1922) was superseded by a centralized Deutsche Evangelische Kirche (1933), which, however, was paralyzed by the ensuing struggle against Nazi penetration. It was not until after World War II that a satisfactory solution was found.

Structure. The EKD is based upon the gospel of Jesus Christ as contained in the Scriptures and interpreted by the ancient symbols and whatever confessions of faith are accepted by the member churches, including:

> The Lord's Prayer, The Apostolic creed, The Nicene creed, Luther's 95 Theses, Luther's Small Catechism, The Augsburg Confession of Faith (1530), The Heidelberg Catechism (1563), The Barmen Theological Declaration (1934), The Leuenberg Agreement (1973).

Thus the EKD does not interfere with the confessional affiliation of its members, although the common basis is emphasized.

The EKD is essentially a federation of independent regional churches (landerskirchen), which in turn are federations of local churches, without superseding the autonomy, ecclesial heritage, and traditions of its members. Structurally, it comprises the following three administrative levels: the Synod, the Executive Council (Rat de EKD) and the Church Conference of member churches. The EKD is also a member of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES.

Bibliography: Amtsblatt der evangelischen Kirche in Deutschland (1946–). H. BRUNOTTE, Die Grundordnung der evangelischen Kirche in Deutschland (Berlin 1954). G. WASSE, Die Werke und Einrichtungen der evangelischen Kirche (Göttingen 1954).

[H. SCHÜSSLER/EDS.]

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA

On Jan. 1, 1988, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA) officially began its life. The constituting of this new Lutheran Church body was the culmination of a long series of efforts to bring diverse Lutheran synods and groups in North America together. The ELCA joined the 2.9 million member Lutheran Church in America (LCA), the 2.3 million member American Lutheran Church (ALC), and the 100,000 member Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches (AELC). Even though the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod (LC-MS) is not a part of the ELCA, the new church represents one of the largest bodies in world Lutheranism, with a baptized membership of 5.3 million.

Steps toward Union. Each of the constituting churches had its distinct history. The ALC began its at the constituting convention in Minneapolis in 1960. It was characterized by such distinctive traits as the attempt to integrate the work of theological education; the effort toward Lutheran intersynod cooperation; and the approval of alternate routes to ordained service, with emphasis on members of minorities. The AELC, which had its roots in the LC-MS, began to function in 1977. After a major theological struggle with the Missouri Synod involving the dismissal of personnel from Concordia Seminary in St. Louis, a new church was formed. From the outset the leadership of the AELC considered the denomination as an alternative to the LC-MS and its continuation was to be reviewed every 10 years. The AELC was marked by its commitment to inclusivity and its growth in an understanding of ministry. The LCA, since its inception in 1962, was represented by the incorporation of many ethnic strands. Its desire for inclusivity was highlighted by its social statement on race relations in 1964 and its admission of women to ordination in 1970. The ecumenical thrust of the LCA was dramatically marked by its overture toward union with the ALC and AELC at its convention in Louisville, Kentucky, in 1982.

When the three churches agreed to unite in 1982, they first formed a Commission for a New Lutheran Church. The commission, which consisted of 70 members, planned the merger that was finally approved by church conventions in 1986. At the ELCA constituting convention, held from April 30 to May 3, 1987, in Columbus, Ohio, the Rev. Dr. Herbert W. Chilstrom was elected bishop of the ELCA.

Constitution. The Constitution of the ELCA and that of its synods and regions begins with a Confession of Faith that reaffirms its belief in the Triune God and confesses Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior. The ELCA Statement of Purpose states that the Church is a people created by God in Christ who are empowered, called, and sent. The ELCA Principles of Organization articulate the constitutional commitment to a new church through a mandate to include women, persons of color, and persons whose primary language is other than English in all areas of the life of the church; and a structure that calls for interdependency among congregations, synods, and churchwide organizations as they strive to fulfill their mission to witness to Jesus Christ.

ELCA members form about 11,000 congregations, served by 16,000 clergy. They are divided into 65 synods and 9 regions, and each synod is headed by a bishop. The Conference of Bishops, which consists of the 65 synodical bishops, as well as the bishop and secretary of the ELCA, provides spiritual enrichment and opportunities to discuss issues of importance to the church for those who serve in these roles. The Churchwide Assembly, which is composed of delegates elected by the synods, meets biennially to evaluate ELCA programs, elect officers, and conduct other business of the church.

The work of the main office, located in Chicago, Illinois, is divided among 4 administrative offices, 6 program divisions, 5 supporting commissions, the ELCA

Publishing House, the Women of the ELCA, and the Board of Pensions (Address: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, 8765 West Higgins Road, Chicago, Illinois, 60631).

The ELCA has entered into full communion partnerships with the the Presbyterian Church (USA), the United Church of Christ and the Reformed Church in 1997, the Moravian Church in 1999, and the Episcopal Church in 2000.

Bibliography: H. W. CHILSTROM, Foundations for the Future: The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America at the Threshold of a New Millennium (Minneapolis 1988). EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA, Constitutions, Bylaws, and Continuing Resolutions: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (Minneapolis 1988). E. T. BACHMANN, The Ecumenical Involvement of the LCA Predecessor Bodies: A Brief History 1900-1970 (New York 1983). E. C. NELSON, Lutheranism in North America 1914-1970 (Minneapolis 1972). W. G. VOLKER, A Handbook and Directory for Congregational Leaders (Minneapolis 1988).

[D. J. SWAN/EDS.]

EVANGELICAL UNITED BRETHREN

Two churches founded by German-speaking METH-ODISTS in the U.S., namely, the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Evangelical Church, merged in 1946 to form the Evangelical United Brethren (EUB). In 1968, the EUB merged with the Methodist Church to form the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH. Historically, both the Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Evangelical Church originated in Pennsylvania in the early 19th century. Their founders preached an Arminian theology to the German immigrants in this area who were mainly Lutherans and Calvinists (see ARMINIANISM). Since the Methodist bishops refused to incorporate German-speaking congregations into their church, separate church organizations were established that closely paralleled METHODISM.

Philip William OTTERBEIN (1726–1813), a German Reformed minister, came to America in 1752. Along with a Swiss Mennonite preacher, Martin BOEHM (1725-1812), he conducted revivals in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. In 1774 Otterbein became pastor of an independent German congregation in Baltimore, Md. His and Boehm's converts were known as New Reformed German Methodists, or New Mennonites. A conference (1800) drew up plans for the new church, which adopted the name United Brethren in Christ in 1821. A minority seceded in 1889 to form the Church of the UNIT-ED BRETHREN in Christ (Old Constitution).

The Evangelical Church was founded by Jacob AL-BRIGHT (1759-1808) who left LUTHERANISM to become a Methodist preacher. He began working among the Germans in Pennsylvania in 1796 and formed an evangelistic association in 1803. This body took more definite form after his death and became known as the Evangelical Association after 1816. Like the United Brethren Church the Evangelical Association underwent a schism. About 40 percent of the members left the main body in 1891, but most of the dissenters returned in 1922. A minority refused to rejoin the parent church and formed the Evangelical Congregational Church. The Evangelical Church served a membership of 250,000 at the time of its merger with the United Brethren in Christ in 1946.

The EUB was essentially Methodistic in doctrine, polity, and liturgy, but it also displayed traces of its Lutheran, Mennonite, and Reformed heritages. For many decades it limited its missionary work to German Americans, but the use of German in worship was curtailed during World War I.

[W. J. WHALEN/EDS.]

EVANGELICALISM

In its widest sense, the term signifies a body of doctrine regarded as the essential message of the Gospel. Although the precise meaning of Evangelicalism has varied with different historical contexts, it is generally applied to the doctrine of salvation by faith in Christ. In the era of the Reformation, those who followed Martin Luther in placing a new stress on this doctrine were commonly designated as Evangelicals. The term was used in this sense to distinguish the churches of the Lutheran tradition from those of the Calvinist tradition, which were commonly known as Reformed. Many Lutheran synods in the United States and Europe use the term "Evangelical" as part of their official designation.

The Evangelical Revival in the 18th century, characterized by PIETISM in Germany and METHODISM in England, gave a new sense to the term. Since the 18th century, particularly in English-speaking lands, Evangelicalism has been used to designate the school of Protestantism that maintains that the essence of the Gospel consists in the doctrine of salvation by faith in the atoning death of Christ. In this sense, Evangelicalism has been represented by a tradition within the Anglican communion, as well as by those churches that developed from the 18th-century Evangelical Revival. The Evangelical tradition, in both groups, stressed the authority and inspiration of the Bible and the depravity of fallen nature and its need for a Redeemer, and regarded the sacraments as symbols rather than as means of grace. The Evangelical tradition in worship denied that ordination confers any supernatural power on the minister and stressed the reading of Scripture and the importance of evangelistic preaching.

In England, the Evangelical party found more in common with the Nonconformists than with the High Church wing of the Establishment, and cooperated readily with them in missionary and social-welfare efforts in the 19th century. Similar cooperation among the Protestant churches took place in North America in the same period. From this mutual sharing, the EVANGELICAL AL-LIANCE developed as an institution in 1846, and a general sense of a community of Evangelical doctrine shared by many denominations grew up over a longer period. The division between liberals and fundamentalists in the early 20th century, particularly in American Protestantism, brought a somewhat different emphasis to the term. A school of theology, conservative in outlook and closely akin to the fundamentalist view, developed in the United States after 1940 under the general designation of Evangelicalism. Conservative American Protestantism adopted the term, since the forming of the NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF EVANGELICALS in 1942, as a substitute for fundamentalist or conservative, but with the same meaning.

In England. The Evangelical Revival became influential within the Church of England in 1735. The preaching of John and Charles WESLEY and of George WHITEFIELD stimulated many members of the Established Church to develop a more personal piety and inner religion. The movement was never separatist, and the ordination of Francis ASBURY in 1784 was the first overt step toward separation of the Wesleyan movement from the Church of England. Whitefield found a warm welcome in Scotland, where an Evangelical party developed within the Church of Scotland, and in North America. The GREAT AWAKENING, which swept over the American colonies after 1740, had an impact on all the Protestant churches. The growth of Methodism in England and America and the growth of other closely related churches marked the closing decades of the 18th century. In both countries, the Evangelical movement found reflection in missionary efforts. The English Evangelicals organized the Church Missionary Society and the Religious Tract Society in 1799, as well as the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1804. Through the so-called Clapham Sect, Evangelical churchmen were instrumental in developing reform and social welfare. Henry Ryder, bishop of Gloucester, and Charles Sumner, bishop of Llandaff, brought the Evangelical party to the Bishops' Bench after 1815.

Opposition to the OXFORD MOVEMENT characterized much of the Evangelical activities in the mid-Victorian period. The Parker Society was organized in 1840 to publish the writings of the English Reformers. English Evangelicals stressed home missions and open-air preaching in industrial areas in the latter part of the 19th century; they sponsored the revival meetings of Dwight L. MOODY in 1875. Evangelicalism was somewhat on the defensive in Great Britain in the 20th century, but it experienced a marked revival in 1947 and 1948.

In the United States. Evangelicalism in the United States has been closely linked to efforts at interdenominational cooperation on a basis of shared doctrine. Reflecting the contemporary English development, American Protestants united to form the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in 1812, the American Bible Society in 1815, and other cooperative ventures. The writings of Samuel S. SCHMUCKER and Philip SCHAFF stressed the common heritage of Evangelical Protestantism, as did the publications of William A. Muhlenberg, who blended Evangelical doctrine and Catholic practice in the Episcopal Church. The development of an American branch of the Evangelical Alliance after the Civil War drew its strength from a shared doctrinal inheritance. After Schaff's death, a new stress on the social Gospel led to the supplanting of the alliance in 1908 by the Federal Council of Churches. To many Evangelicals, the new body was tainted with liberal theology, and they found a more congenial association in the fundamentalist movements.

Several leaders of the fundamentalist crusade were theologians of considerable stature, such as J. Gresham Machen and Benjamin B. WARFIELD, although the movement as a whole was characterized by anti-intellectualism and biblical literalism. These theologians and their successors provided a transition from the older fundamentalism to the new Evangelicalism. Recognizing the blunders of the fundamentalists in their attitude toward science and reason, the modern Evangelicals found spokesmen in Gordon Clark, Bernard Ramm, and Carl F. H. Henry. The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Fundamentalism, published by Henry in 1947, had a marked influence in developing a social concern among Evangelicals.

"The Statement of Faith" adopted by the National Association of Evangelicals in Chicago in 1943 stressed the inspiration and authority of Scripture; the Trinity; the Divinity, Virgin Birth, and Bodily Resurrection of Christ; and his atoning death and message of salvation. The much smaller AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, similarly conservative, was formed in 1941. The National Association of Evangelicals sponsored the National Association of Christian Schools (1947) to promote Christian day schools and a National Sunday School Association (1949) to provide uniform lessons. In the field of foreign missions, the Evangelical Foreign Mission Society (1945) centralized the activities of a large number of small mission societies and has been adamant in opposing any concession to local rites or non-Christian customs. The Evangelicals, although recognizing the need for union in Christ, have resisted the ecumenical movement, fearing its tendency to downgrade doctrine for the sake of organizational unity. They claim to have separated from the neo-orthodox and liberal theologians on their understanding of the Bible and from the fundamentalists on questions of social ethics.

Bibliography: L. E. ELLIOTT-BINNS, The Early Evangelicals (London 1953). J. D. MURCH, Cooperation without Compromise: A History of the National Association of Evangelicals (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1956). M. A. SHIBLEY, Resurgent Evangelicalism in the United States: Mapping Cultural Change since 1970 (Columbia, S.C. 1996). G. ROSSELL, The Evangelical Landscape: Essays on the American Evangelical Tradition (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1996). A. E. MCGRATH, A Passion for Truth: The Intellectual Coherence of Evangelicalism (Leicester, Eng. 1996). L. I. SWEET, The Evangelical Tradition in America (Macon, Ga. 1997). H. A. HARRIS, Fundamentalism and Evangelicals (Oxford/New York 1998). C. SMITH and M. EMERSON, American Evangelicalism: Embattled and Thriving (Chicago, Ill. 1998). G. J. DORRIEN, The Remaking of Evangelical Theology (Louisville, Ky. 1998). R. STEER, Church on Fire: The Story of Anglican Evangelicals (London 1998). R. H. BALMEM, Blessed Assurance: A History of Evangelicalism in America (Boston, Mass. 1999). G. CARTER, Anglican Evangelicals: Protestant Secessions from the Via Media, c. 1800-1850 (Oxford 2000). T. P. RAUSCH, Catholics and Evangelicals: Do They Share a Common Future? (New York/Downers Grove, Ill. 2000).

[R. K. MACMASTER/EDS.]

EVANGELII NUNTIANDI

Apostolic exhortation of Pope PAUL VI, "On Evangelization in the Modern World," issued Dec. 8, 1975, following the third ordinary assembly of the Synod of Bishops (Sept. 27 to Oct. 26, 1974). The assembly was charged with clarifying the church's evangelizing identity in a way that did justice both to traditional theology and to the liberationist construction of mission and evangelization. Unable to arrive at a synthetic position and publish a document, it handed the results of its deliberations to Paul VI for his elaboration and study. The exhortation comprises seven chapters.

The exhortation's unifying concern is with the organic nature of evangelization as a fundamental concept and focal image of the mission and ministry of the church. It articulates the answers to three questions: (1) how can "the hidden energy of the Good News have a powerful effect on the human conscience?"; (2) how and to what extent is "that evangelical force capable of transforming the people of this century?"; and (3) "what methods should be followed in order that the power of the Gospel may have its effect?" (EN 4). In chapter one, the pope roots the church's evangelizing mission in the person and work of Jesus. As evangelization was central to the life of Jesus, so it is to the life of the church. In chapter two, "What Is Evangelization?" the concern is to show that "evangelizing means bringing the Good News into all the strata of humanity and through its influence transforming humanity from within" (EN 16) in a way that permeates cultures "without being subject to any one of them" (EN 20). In that process, witness is primary but proclamation is necessary to make what is implicit explicit and to make it capable of drawing new members into the Christian community (EN 22–23).

Chapter three, "On the Content of Evangelization," confronts both those who overemphasize the inner dimensions of Christian conversion and those who accentuate the public and the political, but downplay the spiritual. This chapter envisages a church vitally inserted in the dramas of the day, armed with an anthropology that is always aware of humanity's tendency to confuse its temporal accomplishments with permanent achievements, while forgetting the need for constant conversion of heart (EN 35–37). This emphasis in the exhortation is widely taken as Paul VI's warning that changing social structures that lead to sin and oppression will not suffice as the sole focal image of the Christian mission in the world.

In sections on the "methods" (chapter four) "beneficiaries" (chapter five) and the "workers" (chapter six) of evangelization, Pope Paul advocates the use of all modern means to spread the gospel message among all peoples and all strata of every society, including "dechristianized" and non-Christian peoples. In regard to the latter, the pope teaches both that respect is due to followers of other traditions, but also that "the religion of Jesus . . . objectively places human beings in relation with the plan of God . . . which the other religions do not succeed in doing, even though they have, as it were, their arms stretched out to heaven" (EN 53).

Of special importance in chapter six, where the pope differentiates the proper roles of the various orders of the church in the evangelization of the world, is the stress he places on the role of the laity, whose field of work is "the vast and complicated world of politics, society and economics, but also the world of culture, of the sciences and the arts, of international life, of the mass media" (EN 70). In chapter seven, the pope emphasizes the action of the Holy Spirit (EN 75), displaying his consciousness of the need for a fully Trinitarian theology of religion and evangelization.

[W. BURROWS]

EVANGELIST

A preacher of the gospel or an author of one of the four Gospels. The English word comes, through the Latin evangelista, from the Greek noun εὐαγγελιστής, from the verb εὐαγγελίζεσθαι (to announce good news). Evangelist is a title of an activity (not of an office) of early Christian missionaries and proclaimers of the GOS-PEL (εὐαγγέλιον, literally "good news"). Although the words εὐ $\alpha\gamma\gamma$ έλιον and εὐ $\alpha\gamma\gamma$ ελίζεσθαι occur frequently in the New Testament, the word εύαγγελιστής is found there only three times: (1) Acts 21.8, concerning PHILIP the deacon; (2) in Eph 4.11, where the word appears after "apostles" and "prophets" and before "pastors" and "teachers" and where, therefore, it refers to Christian missionaries who have received a special CHARISM; and (3) in 2 Tm 4.5 concerning Timothy (cf. 1 Thes 3.2, where Timothy is called "a servant of God in the gospel of Christ''). The work of the evangelist consisted more in the proclamation of the glad tidings of Christ's Redemption to those who had not yet heard them than in the instruction and pastoral care of those who had already accepted the faith and been baptized. It was Christ who first announced the glad tidings of salvation (Mt 4.23; 11.5; etc.) and who sent the Apostles for the same purpose (Rom 1.1; 1 Cor 1.17); later the term evangelist was applied to those men whom the Church sent as missionaries to preach the same good news.

The use of the word Evangelist in reference to the authors of the four Holy GOSPELS dates from the third century; it is thus used by St. HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME in speaking of St. Luke (On Antichrist 56), and by TERTUL-LIAN (Against Praxeas 21.23) and St. DIONYSIUS OF AL-EXANDRIA (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 7.25.8) in speaking of St. John.

Although originally "the four living creatures" of Ez 1.10 and Rv 4.7 had nothing to do with the four Evangelists, the application of these symbolic figures to the four Evangelists began as early as the second century, apparently by St. IRENAEUS (Her. 3.11.8). At first there was some inconsistency in the application of the individual symbols; but by the end of the fourth century, thanks especially to the great authority of St. JEROME, the following relationship was fixed: the human-faced figure represented Matthew, because of Matthew's genealogy of the humanity of Christ; the lion-faced figure represented Mark, because of Mark's mention of the voice of the Baptist in the desert; the ox-faced figure represented Luke, because of Luke's mention of the Jewish priest Zachary; and the eagle-faced figure represented John, because of the soaring flight of John's prologue.

In Christian iconography the portrayal of the four Evangelists by these four symbols, usually surrounding the figure of Christ in glory, has been common since the fifth century, both in monumental mosaics in the churches and in miniatures in the Gospel books. However, there has been a concomitant tradition in Christian art of showing the four Evangelists in fully human form.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 705. G. FRIEDRICH, G. KIT-TEL Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:734–735. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 3:1253–54. Iconography. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 3.1:476–480. K. KÜNSTLE, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst (Freiburg 1926–28) 1:609–612. J. H. EMMINGHAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 3:1254–55.

[M. J. HUNT]

EVANGELISTS, ICONOGRAPHY OF

The Evangelists, as a tetrad, are frequently represented in Christian art, especially in manuscript illumination. They appear in human form or in symbolic guise.

When represented as human figures, the Evangelists are either standing or seated and engaged in composition of the Gospels. Both types were developed from classical figures of philosophers or writers; they were introduced by Christian artists during the 2nd or 3rd century. The seated figure in the posture of meditation is the closest to the classical prototype (Stauronikita cod. 43). Several early Christian sarcophagi contain the first representations of the Evangelists as human figures (sarcophagus of Concordius, Arles). In manuscripts they are usually represented in full-page miniature or as standing portraits, which can sometimes be inserted between text columns. Byzantine artists developed the portrait seen in profile view, while in the West the frontal type was preserved from the classical period. The mosaics in S. Vitale in Ravenna show the Evangelists, each with a codex, in a landscape background. The ivory chair of St. Maximian (Ravenna, 6th century) preserves an excellent example of the early standing portraits; the Evangelists are presented in three-quarter frontal poses, each holding a Gospel Book inscribed with a cross. In the Middle Ages they were represented in typological association with the four great Prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel (south transept window, Chartres Cathedral). They were associated in the late medieval period with the four Latin Doctors of the Church: Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, and Gregory.

The symbolization of the Evangelists by four winged creatures is derived from the vision of Ezekiel and Revelation (4.6–8). To Matthew was assigned the human figure; to Mark, the lion; to Luke, the ox; and to John, the eagle. The Evangelists were assigned their symbols on the basis of the opening passages of each one's Gospel: the man to Matthew, since he narrates the genealogy and birth of Christ; the lion to Mark, because he begins dramatically with the vox clamantis in deserto (like the sound of the king of beasts); the calf to Luke, because he describes the sacrifice of Zachary; and the eagle to John, since he commences with the preexistence of the Logos in heaven. The symbolic tetrad stands also for different phases in the life of Christ: the man of Matthew, for the Incarnation; the lion of Mark, for the Resurrection (the medieval lion roared its stillborn cubs to life); the calf of Luke, for the sacrificial death on the cross; and the eagle of John, for the Ascension. These symbols often are represented in apocalyptic scenes like the Majestas Domini (mosaics of S. Pudenziana, Rome), as well as Ascensions (Rabbula Codex). A hybrid formation of the Evangelists wearing the heads of their symbols is found chiefly in the art of southern France and Spain (Sacramentary of Gellone, 11th century).

"St. John the Evangelist Writing His Gospel," painting from a 12th-century English Gospel.

"Saint Matthew and Saint John the Evangelist," 17th-century painting by Francisco de Ribalta. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./ CORBIS)

Bibliography: F. X. KRAUS, Real–Encyklopädie der christlichen Alterthümer, v.1 (Freiburg 1882) 458–463. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 5:845–852. A. M. FRIEND, "Portraits of the Evangelists in the Greek and Latin Manuscripts," Art Studies (1927–29). F. VAN DER MEER, Majestas Domini (Paris 1938). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.1:476–480.

[S. TSUJI]

EVANGELIUM VITAE

Pope JOHN PAUL II's eleventh encyclical letter, "The Gospel of Life," issued on the feast of the ANNUNCIA-TION, March 25, 1995. In 1991 an extraordinary consistory of the college of cardinals met to discuss "threats to human life in our day." The cardinals asked the pope to affirm the "value of human life and its inviolability" with the authority of the Successor of Peter. To this end, the Holy Father wrote a personal letter to each bishop, asking him to cooperate in the development of this encyclical. Evangelium vitae appeals to "each and every person, in the name of God: respect, protect, love and serve life, every human life" (5).

The encyclical unfolds in four chapters. Chapter one, "Present-Day Threats to Human Life," is an indictment of the growing "culture of death." By applying the story of Cain and Abel to the present-day situation, the pope shows that the fratricidal urge to take the lives of others lies at the heart of abortion and euthanasia, and of other deadly trends, such as the arms race. He shows how the exaggerated and even perverse claims of freedom from constraints in these areas are identical with Cain's selfserving question, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Underlying these claims is a mentality that "carries the concept of subjectivity to an extreme": the self no longer recognizes the equal rights of other selves, especially those less able to defend themselves. The state, even in democratic countries, risks being subverted by such claims and becoming the tool of the strong, to be used against the weak. The "sense of God" is diminishing, along with the sense of human solidarity. The result is a "practical materialism," in which suffering has no value. What is needed is a "civilization of love and life," which cannot exist without self-sacrifice. The Church summons all people to "choose to be unconditionally pro-life," in the name of the Risen Christ, whose "blood speaks more eloquently than that of Abel."

Chapter two, "The Christian Message Concerning Life," is a meditation on the proclamation that in Jesus Christ, good is powerful enough to triumph over evil. His death, freely accepted, resulted in new life for himself and for those who believe in him. The biblical teaching on life, from the creation of the world through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, reveals its triumphant value, without diminishing the central Christian irony that "life finds its center, its meaning and its fulfillment when it is given up."

Chapter three, "God's Holy Law," is a reflection on the Fifth Commandment, especially as it regards the death penalty, abortion, and euthanasia. The pope sets out the limits of self-defense for individuals and the state and questions the use of the death penalty: punishment "ought not go to the extreme of executing the offender except in cases of absolute necessity: in other words, when it would not be possible otherwise to defend society. Today, however, as a result of steady improvements in the organization of the penal system, such cases are very rare, if not practically non-existent." If such is the case with regard to the guilty, how much more care should be taken to protect the lives of the innocent? By "the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, and in communion with the Bishops of the Catholic Church, I confirm that the direct and voluntary killing of an innocent human being is always gravely immoral." The acceptance of abortion, in many areas, "in the popular mind, in behavior and even in law itself," is a "telling sign of an extremely dangerous crisis in the moral sense, which is becoming more and more incapable of distinguishing between good and evil." Considering it more necessary than ever to "to call things by their proper names," the pope, using the words of Gaudium et spes 51, calls abortion and infanticide "unspeakable crimes." He then reflects in some detail on the innocent victim of abortion, the child, already conceived and genetically distinct and whole. He also considers those involved in the decision to terminate the child's life.

including the mother, father, doctor, nurses, and those legislatures that have legalized this "unspeakable crime" in many countries. At the other end of life's spectrum lies the question of euthanasia, "an action or omission which of itself and by intention causes death, with the purpose of eliminating all suffering." The pope condemns euthanasia as "senseless and inhumane," although it is often presented as "logical and humane." Another symptom of the culture of death, euthanasia is "a grave violation of the law of God." At the same time, the pope upholds the Church's traditional teaching that one may decide to forego "aggressive medical treatment" (extraordinary means) that "would only secure a precarious and burdensome prolongation of life," which he has elsewhere called a "prolongation of dying."

Chapter four, "For a New Culture of Human Life," is an outline of the "culture of life" based on Matthew 25: "Whatever you did for one of these least brothers of mine, you did for me." It outlines how the People of God can become a "people of life": by proclaiming, celebrating, and serving the gospel of life, by making Christian families "sanctuaries of life," and by bringing about a "transformation of culture." Such a transformation calls for a "general mobilization of consciences and a united ethical effort to activate a great campaign in support of life." This gospel of life is for the whole human family; Mary and the Church are revealed as "mothers," that is, bearers of life; and although the forces of evil may menace life, the Resurrection of Jesus Christ means that, ultimately, "death shall be no more."

Bibliography: For the text of Evangelium vitae, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 87 (1995): 401–522 (Latin); Origins 24, no. 42 (April 6, 1995): 689–727 (English); The Pope Speaks 40 (1995): 199–281 (English). For a commentary, see: WM. KEVIN WILDES and ALAN C. MITCHELL, eds., Choosing Life: A Dialogue on Evangelium Vitae (Washington, D.C. 1997).

[D. CLARK]

EVANGELIZATION, NEW

The term "new evangelization" was first used, it seems, by the Latin American bishops at their general conference at Medellin, Colombia, in 1968. JOHN PAUL II made it a major theme of his pontificate. In an address to the Latin American bishops at Port-au-Prince, Haiti, on March 9, 1983, he called for an evangelization that was "new in its ardor, its methods, and its expression." Evangelization, he insisted, cannot be new in its content, since its theme is always the one gospel given in Jesus Christ. If it arose from ourselves and our situation, he said, it would be a mere human invention, but the ancient and perduring gospel can and must be heralded with new energy and in a language and manner adapted to the people of our day. In his encyclical on missionary activity, REDEMPTORIS MISSIO (1990) he declared: "I sense that the moment has come to commit all of the Church's energies to a new evangelization and to the mission ad gentes. No believer in Christ, no institution of the Church, can avoid this supreme duty: to proclaim Christ to all people" (RM 3). In the same encyclical and in many other pronouncements, John Paul II linked the new effort of evangelization with the preparation for the Great Jubilee of the year 2000.

The essentials of the program were already identified by PAUL VI, who took the name Paul to signify his intention to model his conduct of the papacy on the ministry of the Apostle of the Gentiles. Wishing to engage the whole Church more decisively in the dissemination of the gospel, he chose as the theme for the Synod of Bishops in 1974 "the evangelization of the modern world." On the basis of materials provided by that synod he issued in 1975 his great apostolic exhortation Evangelii nuntiandi. Looking back at the accomplishments of Vatican II, which had ended just ten years earlier, Paul VI declared that the council had sought above all else "to make the Church of the twentieth century ever better fitted for proclaiming the gospel to the people of the twentieth century" (EN 2).

The new evangelization has certain features in common with evangelization at any time. By its very nature, evangelization must be Christocentric. Because the traits of Jesus Christ have sometimes been overlaid by secondary and accidental considerations, the new evangelization seeks to start afresh by contemplating the features of Jesus and his central message as set forth in Sacred Scripture. Evangelization clearly proclaims Jesus Christ as its source and goal, and fosters a deep personal relationship to him.

Like all evangelization, again, the new evangelization is governed by the Holy Spirit. Paul VI and John Paul II agree in teaching that the Holy Spirit is the principal agent of evangelization (EN 75; RM 21, 30). "It was not by chance," wrote Paul VI, "that the great inauguration of evangelization took place on the morning of Pentecost, under the inspiration of the Spirit" (EN 75). The new evangelization is predicated on the realization that evangelization cannot succeed if it is conducted by purely human efforts. Missionary dynamism, according to John Paul II, is born of the Holy Spirit, who moves the Church to spread its faith.

Besides recalling these constants, the new evangelization has a number of distinctive features, which may be enumerated as follows:

> 1. Evangelization is broadly conceived so as to include not only the initial announcement of the gospel but the entire process whereby human persons and the world are transformed under its vivifying impact. John Paul II distinguishes three phases. "First" or "primary" evangelization occurs when the gospel is initially proclaimed to those who do not as yet know Christ. Then, through continuing evangelization, which includes pastoral care, believers are enabled to place their lives ever more fully under the influence of the gospel. In a third phase, the Church undertakes the re-evangelization of those who have fallen away or allowed their faith to grow cold (RM 33). The Church, insofar as it is an institution of men and women here on earth, continually needs to be evangelized (EN 15).

2. Evangelization extends not only to persons but to cultures. It is frequently hindered by an unwholesome split between faith and culture. Paul VI called attention to the need for what he called the "evangelization of cultures" (EN 20). John Paul II agreed with Paul VI that cultures themselves need to be regenerated by an encounter with the gospel. At Santo Domingo in 1992 he insisted that the new evangelization must strive to render human cultures harmonious with Christian values and open to the gospel message.

3. Evangelization includes social teaching. In affecting cultures it has an inevitable impact on social structures. Thus no sharp line of demarcation can be made between the spiritual and temporal realms, as though the latter ought to be purely secular and immune to religious or supernatural influence. In evangelizing, the Church cannot remain indifferent to the suffering, inequities, and oppression that afflict so much of the world's population. Paul VI insisted that while the mission of the Church must not be reduced to the dimensions of a purely temporal project, evangelization must concern itself with justice, liberation, development, and peace (EN 31-32). According to John Paul II the Church's mission is primarily to awaken consciences and thereby motivate them to work for a more authentic human development. The Church has no mission to work directly on the economic, technical, or political levels (RM 58).

4. To be effective in our day, evangelization must make use of the mass media of social communication, including the radio, television, and the Internet. These media are not substitutes for the written word or for person-to-person contact, but they serve as needed supplements, gaining audiences who would otherwise not be reached. Paul VI therefore declared that Church would be guilty in God's sight if it failed to use powerful means of communication that are being perfected in our day (EN 45). John Paul II, with a reference to the Apostle Paul's proclamation of the gospel in Athens, pointed out that the culture of the new media is itself a modern "Areopagus" or forum in which the Church's missionary activity must be conducted in order to reach the heart of modern civilization (RM 37).

5. In the new evangelization, special care will be taken to respect the dignity and freedom of the persons being addressed. In earlier times Christian rulers sometimes applied psychological and physical force to induce people to accept the true faith. The new evangelization, by contrast, presupposes acceptance of Vatican II's Declaration on Religious Freedom, which taught that in matters of religion people should be encouraged to make free and responsible judgments without external pressure. Recognizing that the assent of faith must by its very nature be free, the Church avoids offensive proselytization. Both Paul VI and John Paul II have insisted that in evangelizing the Church proposes the truth of the gospel but imposes nothing (EN 80; RM 39). In the last analysis, freedom and truth converge, for, according to the saying of Jesus, "The truth shall make you free" (Jn 8:32)-a saying frequently quoted by John Paul II.

6. In the new evangelization, missionary proclamation is combined with dialogue, which respects the point of view of the persons addressed and seeks to meet their real concerns. Dialogue is an aid to proclamation because it enables the evangelizer to discern the dispositions and convictions of the hearers and thus to engage them more effectively. In dialogue both parties are allowed to express themselves with the hope of learning from one another. Dialogue, however, contains an element of proclamation, because it requires each party to express itself frankly and honestly.

Dialogue takes different form according to the audiences being addressed. Paul VI in his encyclical Ecclesiam suam (1964) distinguished three circles: humanity as a whole, the monotheistic religions, and non-Catholic Christianity. Since Vatican II official dialogues have been set up with nonbelievers, with non-Christian religions, with the Jews, and with Christian churches and communities. These dialogues are not directly aimed at conversion but at mutual understanding, mutual respect, and convergence. Such dialogues, beneficial though they undoubtedly are, do not take the place of missionary proclamation. In the words of John Paul II, "Dialogue is not in opposition to the mission ad gentes; indeed it has special links with that mission and is one of its expressions" (RM 55).

Ecumenical dialogue is likewise pertinent to evangelization. It aims to discover, emphasize, and augment the shared beliefs of Christians, with a view to more effective common witness. Paul VI and John Paul II tirelessly reiterated the importance of mutual reconciliation among Christians for the effective proclamation of the gospel to the world (EN 77; RM 50).

7. In the past evangelization has often been seen as the special province of priests and religious professionally dedicated to missionary work. Following in the footsteps of Vatican II, both Paul VI and John Paul II have insisted that it is the whole Church that received the commission to evangelize (EN 15; RM 62, 71). Lay Christians, through incorporation into Christ by baptism, confirmation, and the Eucharist, are called to bear witness to the faith by word and deed. Christian parents are the first evangelizers of their children. The clergy have a special responsibility to organize and oversee the task of evangelization and to stimulate the faithful to rise to their responsibilities. Members of religious orders and congregations dedicated to evangelization are specially called to testify to the radical challenge of the gospel.

The program of the new evangelization introduced by Vatican II and the subsequent popes is one of the most dramatic developments in modern Catholicism. In recent centuries the Catholic Church, polemically arrayed against Protestantism, has insisted more on fine points of doctrine than on the basic Christian message. The faithful, imbued with these defensive attitudes, have found it difficult to rise to the challenge of the new evangelization, which calls for positive proclamation of the basic Christian message. In countries such as the United States terms such as "evangelization" appear to have a Protestant ring; they often evoke the image of radio and television preachers whose doctrine and methods are antithetical to Catholic tradition. A further difficulty comes from the preoccupation of some Catholics since Vatican II with projects of inner-church reform. Since their energies are taken up in debates with other Catholics, they tend to lose interest in looking outward beyond the present membership of the Church. Under the influence of modern secularism and agnosticism, some have lost confidence in the saving power of Christ and the gospel.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, the evangelical turn in Catholic official teaching has been welcomed by many Catholics, perhaps especially in eastern Asia, Latin America, and Africa. The bishops of the United States have responded affirmatively in several excellent documents. In 1992 they approved the document "Go and Make Disciples," setting forth a national plan and strategy for evangelization in the United States. Increasing numbers of adults are received into full communion each year, thanks to programs such as "Renew," "Life in the Spirit'' seminars, and the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

Bibliography: Paul VI, Apostolic Exhortation "On Evangelization and the Modern World" (Evangelii nuntiandi) (Washington, D.C. 1975). John Paul II, Encyclical Mission of the Redeemer (Redemptoris missio) (Washington, D.C. 1991). R. MARTIN and P. WILLIAMSON, eds., Pope John Paul II and the New Evangelization (San Francisco 1995). H. CARRIER, "Gospel Message and Human Cultures" (Pittsburgh 1989). A. DULLES, "John Paul II and the New Evangelization," Studia Missionalia 48 (1999): 165–80.

[A. DULLES]

EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES, CONGREGATION FOR THE

The Congregatio pro Gentium Evangelizatione, or Congregation for the Evangelization of the Peoples (CEP) is the successor to the historic Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. It carries out its predecessor's tasks of coordinating and directing the missionary activity of the Church. This entry covers the history and activities of CEP since 1967. For its history prior to 1967, see under PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE.

"Propagation of Faith" Becomes "Evangelization of Peoples." The fifth and sixth chapters of Vatican II's Decree on Missionary Activity (Ad gentes, 1965), on the organization of missionary work and cooperation in it, were drafted to overcome the commonly held idea that missionary work was primarily the responsibility of religious orders and societies of apostolic life. That idea had become practically established in the minds of the Catholics over the 500 years since the beginning of the modern missionary movement, and was enshrined in the "ius commissionis" approach to foreign missions, whereby mission lands were carved out and assigned to specific religious orders. The centralization of these groups in Rome and their loyalty to the Holy See, moreover, made them ideal centripetal forces to counteract the centrifugal nature of missionary activity as it was conceived in its classic modern period- i.e., as work by professional missionaries that brought the Faith and the Church from Europe to the antipodes of the earth.

Ad gentes brought missionary theology in many respects into harmony with Lumen gentium and attempted to establish the principle that mission is the work of the entire church, not just professional missionaries, since "The Church on earth is by its very nature missionary" (Ad gentes 2). To animate this effort, Ad gentes 29 charged the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith with becoming an "instrument of administration and an organ of dynamic direction . . . [using] scientific methods and instruments adapted to modern conditions," according to norms that were to be laid down by the Pope, aided by "consultors and experts" with expertise and experience.

These principles were ratified and implemented by Pope Paul VI in Part III of his motu proprio Ecclesiae Sanctae (Aug. 6, 1966), and in his apostolic constitution on the renewal of the Roman Curia, Regimini ecclesiae universae (Aug. 15, 1967), articles 81-91. In Regimini, the new name of the venerable Congregation is given as the Congregatio pro Gentium Evangelizatione. Despite the new name, in both documents, the clear purpose of Pope Paul was to continue its traditional coordinating role, while placing special emphasis on promoting indigenous priestly vocations and helping both missionaries and the whole church appropriate its missionary identity (Regimini ecclesiae universae 82). The key words from Ad gentes that appear to have characterized the Pope's intentions were to become "an organ of dynamic direction" of works within its traditional competence, not to take stock of, or begin a radically new kind of evangelization of areas such as Latin America and the traditional European heartlands of Catholicism, which were already in 1967 showing signs of decline from their former levels of activity.

What was new in Regimini was the call for three new secretariats founded in the wake of Vatican II to be represented at CEP, and for CEP to have representation in each of them-the Secretariats for Christian unity, for Non-Christians, and for Non-Believers (Regimini ecclesiae universae 83). This effectively constitutes the Holy See's recognition that a new era in ecumenical relations had arisen. In it Christian mission had to be carried out with sensitivity to those who in former years were often thought of only as potential "objects" of missionary activity, and not as members of venerable faith traditions or followers of sincerely held convictions of non-belief in religions as paths that assisted their members attain transcendent goals. Since 1967, then, CEP has found itself active in the work of the secretariats that have succeeded those mentioned above, namely the Pontifical Councils for Interreligious Dialogue and for Christian Unity, in whose offices is housed the Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews.

CEP Under John Paul II. On June 28, 1988, Pope John Paul II issued the apostolic constitution Pastor Bonus ("The Good Shepherd"). Following the promulgation of the New Code of Canon Law on Jan. 2, 1984, Pastor Bonus is dedicated to updating the legislation and organization of the Roman Curia. His stated purpose in the long historical-theological introduction (Pastor Bonus 1–13) is making the Holy See a ministry of service (diakonia) for the entire church, which he refers to as "a communion" marked simultaneously with a "primatial and collegial nature," and in which all "power and authority of the bishops bears the mark of diakonia or stewardship" (Pastor Bonus 2). Pastor Bonus functions as John Paul's rationale for the authority of the Roman Curia as enjoying "a truly ecclesial character" (Pastor Bonus 7), exercised ministerially for the benefit of the whole church.

Articles 85 through 92 of Pastor Bonus are dedicated to indicating how CEP is to serve. In essence, its tasks remain those that evolved from 1622 to the Second Vatican Council, but they accentuate CEP's role of promoting research in mission theology, spirituality, and pastoral work (Pastor Bonus 86). CEP is to care for promoting missionary vocations internationally and in territories it directs and has responsibilities for the education of secular clergy and catechists (Pastor Bonus 88). In line with the Pope's overall concern in Pastor Bonus to rationalize the work of the Curia, he states that CEP's role in appointing bishops and erecting dioceses in its territories is analogous to that of the Congregation of Bishops (Pastor Bonus 90) and is carried out under papal authority and with its approval. Finally CEP is charged with administering its own and funds of others destined to assist the missions.

Of more than passing importance is an issue not raised in the document. Although missiologists by 1988 had come increasingly to speak of mission, including missio ad gentes, as transcending geographical boundaries, CEP is still charged with directing mission as if it were an activity moving from the so-called "mature churches" in Europe and North America for the benefit of the so-called "young churches" in Asia, Africa and Latin America. Yet the number of missioners coming from the North was rapidly declining and their average age rising. Between 1968 and 1998, the number of U.S. Catholic missioners, according to the U.S. Catholic Mission Association dropped from 9,655 to 5,883. Between 1992 and 1999, the average age of priests and religious sisters in that group rose from 59.2 to 64.4 and 57.7 to 64.2 respectively. Since figures from Europe are analogous, if CEP's primary role is in directing missionary efforts from the North to the South, its efforts are soon going to be less needed. That is not, however, the entire picture, since there is a rapid growth in the number of ad gentes missioners sent into mission from Asia, African, and Latin America, lands that hitherto had been thought of as objects, and not subjects of mission.

Under Pastor Bonus, the task of developing structures of ministry that could invigorate evangelization and re-evangelization efforts in areas such as Europe, North America, and Latin America are not within the scope of a geographically and missiologically circumscribed CEP. None of CEP's nor other curial agencies' publications avert to the need to re-examine entrenched attitudes and consider new approaches to mission. Many missiologists argue that sclerotic attitudes hinder the Church from exploring creative ways of bringing in new cohorts of young men and women needed to engage non-Christians and non-practicing Christians effectively in the new areopagi that the Pope and CEP continue to assert should be the objects of mission today.

CEP's Work for Mission. Granted the need to question whether the geographical scope of its activities today correspond to what Pope John Paul II in Redemptoris Missio article 37 called the "new areopagi" of mission, there is no disputing the fact that CEP has become ever more involved in the work of the world church in the territories it has responsibility for, which include Asia, Oceania, most of Africa, and parts of Latin America and the Caribbean. A great deal of CEP's work is involved with the process of erecting, dividing, and supporting "mission" dioceses, as well as in appointing bishops and other key mission leaders, such as seminary rectors. The number of dioceses under CEP's jurisdiction was 1,049 as of October 2000. In a given year, as many as 30 to 40 percent of new Catholic bishops ordained worldwide are carried out under CEP's guidance and nomination for approval by the Holy Father.

Bibliography: B. JACQUELINE, "Le droit missionnaire après le Concile: observations sur la compétence de la S C pro Gentium Evangelizatione seu de Propaganda Fide," Atti del Congresso internazionale di diritto canonico. La Chiesa dopo il Concilio. Roma, 14–19 gennaio 1970 (Milan 1972) 825–32. A. REUTER, "Drei nachkonziliäre Instruktionen der S C pro Gentium Evangelizatione," Ius populi dei: Miscellanea in honorem Raymundi Bidagor, ed. R. BIDAGOR (Rome 1972) 467–518. T. SCALZOTTO, La sacra congregazione per l'evangelizzazione dei popoli nel decennio del decreto "Ad gentes." (Rome 1975).

[W. R. BURROWS]

EVANS, PHILIP, ST.

Welsh martyr; b. Monmouth, 1645; d. Cardiff, July 22, 1679. Evans was educated at St. Omer and on Sept. 7, 1665, entered the Society of Jesus; after ordination at Liège in 1675 he was sent to work in South Wales. Three years later his zeal made him a marked-man in the fierce outburst of persecution fomented by the fantastic "plot" concocted by Titus Oates. In November 1678, John Arnold of Abergavenny, a Calvinist, justice of the peace, and priest hunter, offered, in addition to the customary £50, another £200 for the arrest of Evans. Evans refused to desert his people and was caught on December 2 at the house of Christopher Turberville, at Skier in Glamorgan, where he was then stationed as chaplain.

At Cardiff he refused the oath of allegiance and for three weeks was placed in solitary confinement in an underground cell. For a long time no one would testify to Evans's priesthood until an old woman and her daughter were suborned to swear that they had heard Evans say Mass and preach and had received absolution from him. After six months, on May 3, 1679, Evans was brought to trial. In court the two witnesses repeated their evidence, which was supported by an apostate dwarf, who, at the prompting of Arnold, declared that he had heard Evans say that ''in no short time you will see in England no other religion but the Catholic.'' Evans was found guilty of being a priest and returned to prison, where, being a talented musician, he found consolation in music.

On July 21, when news was brought to him that he was to be executed the next day, he was playing tennis: "What hurry is there," he asked. "Let me first play out my game." On July 22, after bidding farewell to some friends, he was taken to execution with Bl. John Lloyd, with whom he had been tried. The place was Gallows Field (at the northeast end of what is now Richmond Road), Cardiff. Evans, suffering before Lloyd, said to him, "Adieu, Mr. Lloyd, though for a little time, for we shall shortly meet again." Philip Evans was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI in 1970.

Feast: July 22.

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: T. P. ELLIS, Catholic Martyrs of Wales (London 1933). J. STONOR, Six Welsh Martyrs (Postulation pamphlet; London 1961). R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:166–167. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time. (London-New York 1885–1902) 2:186–187. H. FOLEY, ed., Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 5.2:882–891.

[G. FITZHERBERT]

EVARISTUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 99 or 96 to 108? According to IRENAEUS (Adv. Haer. 3.3), he succeeded CLEMENT I as pope. The LIBERIAN CATALOGUE and other sources list him after Anacletus. A sixth-century recension of the Liber pontificalis describes him as a Greek of Antioch, the son of a Jew from Bethlehem. Even if this were not so, his Greek name testifies to the continuing foreign influence in the Roman community. Liber pontificalis also ascribes to him the appointment of clergy to the 25 parishes in Rome and the creation of the seven-man college of deacons, a completely unreliable tradition. His episcopacy lasted seven, eight, or nine years according to Eusebius (Chron. Hist. 3.34; 4.1; 5.6), nine or 13 years according to different recensions of the Liber pontificalis. If Clement died in the third year of TRAJAN'S reign, as Eusebius (3.15) says, Evaristus may have become bishop as late as 101. The tradition that he was martyred is doubtful due to the silence of Irenaeus on the matter. Evaristus is one of the most obscure of popes. Modern excavations indicate that he was not buried near Peter in the Vatican.

Feast: Oct. 26.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, The Ecclesiastical History, tr. K. LAKE and J. E. L. OULTON, 2 v. [Loeb Classical Library (London-New York-Cambridge, Mass.) 1926–32]. L. DUCHESNE, Liber pontificalis (Paris 1186–92) 1:XC–XCI. J. P. KIRSCH, *Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche*² (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1260. J. N. D KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 8.

[E. G. WELTIN]

EVE

The first woman, wife of Adam, and ancestress of all mankind. This article will consider first the biblical data on Eve, and then the place of Eve in dogmatic theology.

In the Bible

The name Eve (Hebrew, hawwâ) was given, according to Gn 3.20, by the first man to his wife. It occurs only four other times in the Bible: Gn 4.1, Tb 8.8, 2 Cor 11.3, 1 Tm 2.15. Since Eve is the mother of all the living, by popular etymology, the name is related to the Hebrew word for life, hayyâ. The first name given to her by her husband, after God had made her from the man's own body to bring her to him as ''a helper like himself,'' was ''woman ['iššâ], for from man ['îš] she has been taken'' (Gn 2.23). The profound unity and complementary character of man and woman are, thereby, symbolized by the sacred author.

As mother of all the living, Eve plays a very significant role in the context of Gn 3.20. Man had just been punished by being reduced to his natural state of being mortal. In the author's mind, Eve would seem to be the means by which man may attain at least some sort of continued existence.

The woman's role in the Fall is not that of a temptress, since no such action is described in Gn 3.6b, but, that of the first human transgressor of a covenant law (Gn 2.17). Hence, woman's low condition in Israel society, her pains in childbirth, and her husband's dominion over her (Gn 3.16).

Latin tradition, through a mistranslation of Gn 3.15b, introduced the image of Eve crushing the serpent's head that was later transferred to the Blessed Virgin Mary and became a symbol of her Immaculate Conception (see PROTO-EVANGELIUM). Although this meaning is not found in the original text, Eve, nevertheless, as mother of all the living, is an apt figure for the Mother of all those alive in Christ.

Bibliography: E. MAGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:1640–55. A. M. DUBARLE, "Les fondements bibliques du titre marial de nouvelle Eve," Revue du sciences religieuses 30 (1951) 49–64.

[T. R. HEATH]

In Theology

Among the Fathers of the Church, Justin was the first to add the feminine counterpart to the Christ-Adam parallel. He contrasts MARY, Blessed Virgin, with Eve, seeing in the former obedience and life and in the latter disobedience and death. Clement of Alexandria, Irenaeus, Methodius, Tertullian, and Augustine all commented on Eve, but usually to bring out Mary's greatness. Augustine sees a symbol in the account of Eve's creation from the side of Adam. She is made from man's bone to give her some of man's strength, and in the place of the removed rib the man has flesh to give him some of woman's tenderness (Gen. ad litt. 9.18.34, Patrologia Latina 34:407). Aquinas writes that the manner of production of the woman from the side of man signifies the social union of man and woman, "for the woman should neither exercise authority over the man [cf. 1 Tm 2.12] and so she was not made from his head; nor is it right for her to be subject to man's contempt as his slave, and so she was not made from his feet." He also sees a Christian sacramental symbol there, "for from the side of Christ sleeping on the cross the sacraments flowed, namely blood and water, by which the Church was established" (Summa theologiae 1a, 92.3). Scholastics generally follow patristic studies on Eve, seeing her either as a contrasting type of Mary or of the Church.

With the advance of knowledge in scientific fields, especially in those dealing with the origins of man (see EVOLUTION), many questions arise. Is Eve only a symbol or a historical personage? Can there be many Eves? Did she share in the gifts given to her husband? While there has never been any formal definition of the Church concerning Eve, the cautions of Pius XII regarding recent teachings on Adam would apply also to her. Whatever is said about Eve must be consistent with Catholic doctrine on ORIGINAL SIN and the immediate creation of the soul by God [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 3896–97; see ADAM (IN THEOLOGY)].

"Adam and Eve," engraving by William Morris. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Catholic scholars since M. J. Lagrange have accepted the general theory of the literary form of the creation accounts in Genesis. The woman plays a prominent role both in creation, where her appearance is seen as the finishing touch to all that God has made, and in the paradisal sin, where the beliefs and practices of pagan religions current at the time of the authorship of the account are contrasted. These beliefs deified the female principle and regarded sexual excess in the fertility rites as an act of worship. But in practice, women were treated as socially inferior and the creature of man's pleasure. The CREATION STORY tells us of the dignity of woman, her equality with man, and the divine origin of the differences in sex. The account of the sin warns against woman's idolatrous attempts to share the divine prerogative of procreation by participating in the fertility rites of the pagan gods, since that is abominable to God and punished by Him. The Catholic teaching about the dignity of woman, her vocation as a child of God, equal in nature and grace to man, and the sacredness of the marital relationship is thus seen

Eve plucking the apple from the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, Burgundian bas relief, c. 1135–40, from the north portal of Autun Cathedral. (Marburg-Art Reference, Art Resource, NY) grounded in the Genesis story (see WOMAN, CATHOLIC TEACHING ON).

See Also: GENESIS, BOOK OF.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. Tables générales 1:14510-51. H. JUNKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 3:1215-16. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 90-102, and commentary by H. D. GARDEIL in Somme théologique I. 90-102: Les Origines de l'homme, tr. A. PATFOORT (Paris 1963) 423-451. J. COPPENS, La Connaissance du bien et du mal et le péché du Paradis (Louvain 1948). J. DE FRAINE, The Bible and the Origins of Man (New York 1962). A. M. DUBARLE, Le Péché originel dans l'Écriture (Paris 1958). C. HAURET, Beginnings: Genesis and Modern Science, tr. and ed. E. P. EMMANS (2d ed. Dubuque 1964). M. M. LABOURDETTE, Le Péché originel et les origines de l'homme (Paris 1953). J. L. MCKENZIE, Myths and Realities (Milwaukee 1963) 146-181. R. J. NOGAR, The Wisdom of Evolution (Garden City, NY 1963). H. RENCKENS, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. NAPIER (New York 1964). A. ROBERT and A. TRICOT, Guide to the Bible, tr. E. P. ARBEZ and M. P. MCGUIRE, 2 v. (Tournai-New York 1951-55; v. 1, rev. and enl. 1960) 1:174, bibliog. on European and American lit. to 1960. L. F. HARTMAN, "Sin in Paradise," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 20 (1958) 26-40, with fine bibliog. C. REILLY, "Adam and Primitive Man," Irish Theological Quarterly 26 (1959) 331-345. C. VOLLERT, "Evolution and the Bible," Symposium on Evolution (Pittsburgh 1959) 81-119.

[E. H. PETERS]

EVERARD OF YPRES

Writer; b. Ypres, Belgium; d. Clairvaux. Everard studied under GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE at Chartres, Paris, and Poitiers. From 1162 to 1165 he was a cleric in France of Hyacinth, the future CELESTINE III. A teacher at the University of PARIS for most of his life, Everard wrote a compendium (summula) of Canon Law sometime after 1180 and addressed a letter to URBAN III (1185-87) to denounce some alleged errors concerning the Trinity and the God-Man. He remained an ardent admirer of his master Gilbert and during the reign of Celestine III (1191–98) wrote his principal work, a Latin Dialogue between Ratius and Everard, in which Gilbert's cause is defended by a fictitious Greek, called Ratius, who strongly disagrees with St. Bernard's interpretation of Gilbert's theology. Ratius is also quite critical of certain aspects of monastic life. A letter addressed to Everard by a certain "Brother B." reexamines and questions statements made in the Dialogue and in the letter to Urban. Everard spent his last years as a Cistercian at Clairvaux.

Bibliography: N. M. HARING, "A Latin Dialogue on the Doctrine of Gilbert of Poitiers," Mediaeval Studies 15 (1953) 243–289: "The Cistercian Everard of Ypres . . .," ibid. 17 (1955) 143–172.

[N. M. HARING]

EVERGISLUS, ST.

Bishop; d. before 594. According to the historically worthless 11th-century vita, Evergislus was the protégé, later archdeacon, of SEVERIN OF COLOGNE. According to the same vita, he stopped to pray one night in a church at Tongres, Belgium, and was set upon by robbers and murdered (c. 455). However, Evergislus is rather to be identified with the Bishop Ebregesilus or Eberigisil, whom the more reliable information of GREGORY OF TOURS puts among the emissaries sent by King Childebert II (590) to restore order in a convent of women at Poitiers. Gregory relates also that Evergislus erected a church in honor of St. Mallosus at Birten. The relics of Evergislus are now in the parish church of St. Peter in Cologne. Evergislus is the first bishop of COLOGNE to bear a German name; contrary to the 11th-century report, he seems not to have died a violent death.

Feast: Oct. 24.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 10 650–661. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2365–70. Analecta Bollandiana 6 (1887) 193–198 (the incredible 11th century Vita). L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15); v.3.

[W. A. JURGENS]

EVERYMAN

An English morality play of the late 15th century, the finest representative of the genre, and the one best known outside the circle of historical scholars (see DRAMA, MEDI-EVAL, 2). Of undetermined authorship, it is now generally conceded to be a close translation of a Dutch play, Elckerlijc, although a number of attempts have been made to prove the priority of the English text. The success of the play with modern audiences is a tribute to the universality of its thematic elements and to the artistry of its dramatic structure. While it is the culmination of a long series of experiments with a nonrepresentational, allegorical drama on the problem of salvation, it transcends the limits of its era to become one of the great plays of all time.

To indicate the indebtedness of the work to a tradition, as well as its artistic superiority to its models, it is necessary to consider, first, its relation to two themes dominant in late medieval art and literature (the DANCE OF DEATH and the ARS MORIENDI); secondly, its structure as a theater piece capable of interesting audiences of many types and times.

Everyman accosted by the figure of Death in a woodcut on the opening page of an edition of Everyman, printed by John Scott in St. Paul's Churchyard, London, about 1530.

Relationship to Two Medieval Themes. The Dance of Death, known to Continental literature as the danse macabre, has been traced to a French custom of preaching on the theme of death and illustrating the sermon by a solemn processional dance, in which a skeletal figure impersonating Death led one victim after another away toward the tomb, each being garbed as representative of a type, e.g., king, lawyer, shepherd. This graphic exemplification of death as leveler is regarded by some scholars as the origin of the entire morality-play genre, and it is unquestionably a central force in the poetry and painting of late medieval Europe. The somber power of its theme lent itself to meditation on the inevitability of death, but it also invited exploitation of death's horrors, especially in the pictorial representation of physical decay.

A sensationalism of technique in the danse macabre brought the theme into disrepute as an excess of flamboyant art, an excess that may account for the development of an ars moriendi tradition, an art of dying well, with the emphasis upon spiritual truths and practical preparation for death. This second tradition undoubtedly owed much to late medieval inroads of the epidemics that repeatedly swept away large segments of the population. These catastrophes often meant death unattended by the parish clergyman, who might himself have been among the earliest victims because of his ministrations to the dying. The ars moriendi treatise, first associated with the name of the French theologian Jean GERSON and widely imitated throughout Western Europe in the 15th century, was a manual for the dying, intended to assist a person in overcoming the terrors and temptations of the last illness and to console him with thoughts of God's mercy and generosity. It was, therefore, an antidote to the danse macabre, whether consciously written for that purpose or not.

Plot and Structure. The first dramatic incident in Everyman is an encounter of its hero with Death, who has come suddenly upon the stage to summon him for the final reckoning with God. This event is a restrained but stark confrontation between the soul and the heavenly messenger, and the journey upon which Everyman sets out so reluctantly is an adaptation of the processional Dance of Death. Relentlessly fulfilling his task, Death refuses delay, but concedes that Everyman may have as companion on the journey anyone bold enough to undertake it. There follows a series of encounters with allegorical representations of Everyman's associates and possessions (Fellowship, Kindred, Worldly Goods, etc.), all of whom decline the dubious honor of the invitation. Deserted by all but Good Deeds, Everyman belatedly attempts preparation for death, aided by Knowledge (i.e., self-knowledge) and Confession. In this part of the play, the dramatist has used abstract characters as a means of adapting to the theater the homiletic material of the ars moriendi tradition and of structuring into a dramatic conflict the spiritual experiences of the final hours. Accompanied to the edge of the grave by such physical powers as Strength, Five Wits, and Discretion, Everyman enacts a powerful denouement in which he commends his soul into the hands of God.

Structurally, the play is a series of recognitions (in the Aristotelian sense of anagnorisis), each followed by a reversal (peripeteia). Without postulating that the author had a knowledge of Greek drama, one can nevertheless find in the play these essentials of dramatic design that are universal elements of successful theater. Each recognition is an illumination that Everyman has been evading and each one serves to increase the tension of his conflict with the antagonist, Death, who remains present as an invisible force, although the personified character withdraws after delivering the initial summons. The recognition of betrayal by one earthly value after another creates a corresponding momentum in the direction of spiritual gain, and thus the falling line of Everyman's physical defeat is counterbalanced by a rising action that culminates in the salvation of his soul. The tension of each crisis is followed by a brief respite as Everyman's self-knowledge assesses the material loss and prepares for the next spiritual gain. The perilous encounters maintain audience suspense until the denouement, the final release of tension. This effects a restoration of tranquility—the catharsis that only great and serious drama achieves.

Implementing the crises and forward movement of the play is a highly complex pattern of speeches ranging from a rapid, stichomythic dialogue through lengthy admonitory expositions by Knowledge and Shrift, reaching greatest dramatic power perhaps in Everyman's own expressions of fear, disillusionment, contrition, and joy. It would be a mistake, however, to exaggerate the naturalism of speech and style, for the morality play is essentially a nonrepresentational art—Knowledge, for example, has no personality and no power of speech in real life. The successful dramatic illusion of reality, however, is created by the literary and mimetic resources of stylized diction and rhythm, carefully modulated according to the rules of an English prosody inherited from the old alliterative poetic tradition. Rhythm, diction, characterization, and incident, then, combine to make this play an art work vastly superior to the Dance of Death, enriched as it is by the spiritual traditions of the ars moriendi.

Bibliography: J. Q. ADAMS, ed., Chief Pre-Shakespearean Dramas (Boston 1924), text of play. H. CRAIG, English Religious Drama of the Middle Ages (Oxford 1955). É. MÂLE, L'Art religieux de la fin du moyen-âge en France (5th ed. Paris 1949). G. R. OWST, Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England (2d ed. rev. New York 1961). A. P. ROSSITER, English Drama from Early Times to the Elizabethans (New York 1950). A. WILLIAMS, The Drama of Medieval England (East Lansing 1961).

[E. C. DUNN]

EVESHAM, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery at Evesham, Worcestershire, England. According to tradition, it was founded by St. Egwin, Bishop of WORCESTER, in 702. From 941 to 969 and from 976 to c. 989, during which years it was in lay hands, the abbey church was served by secular priests. BENEDICTINE monks were restored c. 989 by the bishop of Worcester. Under Abbot Aelward (1014–44), a relative of King Canute, Evesham began to be independent of the bishops. Abbot Aethelwig (1059–77) regained much land lost under secularization. Aethelwig was an adviser of WILLIAM I (the Conqueror), who entrusted seven Midland counties to him. In 1069 to 1070, during the harrying of the North, Aethelwig made his abbey a relief center for refugees, and in 1073 to 1074 he sent three monks to begin the restoration of monasticism in northern England. He bequeathed money for a new church, which was erected by his successor. In 1095 to 1096 Evesham monks were sent to Denmark to found a priory at Odense. Evesham helped to reform this daughter house in 1174, though contact ceased in the next generation. A cell was founded also at Penwortham, Lancashire, in 1140. In 1189 Roger Norreys, the deposed prior of Canterbury, was transferred to Evesham. The new abbot persecuted the monks and wasted the revenues. An attempted episcopal visitation by the bishop of Worcester, however, united all factions in the abbey. Thomas of Marleberge, the monks' spokesman and a brilliant canonist, won exemption for the abbey during a protracted suit at Rome in 1204 to 1206. This, and the interdict in the following year, prolonged the tyranny of Roger Norreys at Evesham until 1213, when he was deposed by a papal legate. Marleberge himself was abbot of Evesham from 1229 to 1236. He was probably its most learned abbot and coauthor of its chronicle. The abbey's jurisdiction over the churches in the Vale of Evesham was confirmed in 1248. The 14th and 15th centuries were peaceful, though the abbey suffered severely in the Black Death of 1348 to 1349. In 1466 Evesham took over the decayed Abbey of Alcester (Warwickshire), which became a dependency. The abbey was surrendered in 1540. The buildings were demolished and only a detached bell tower remains.

Bibliography: Sources. W. D. MACRAY, ed., Chronicon abbatiae de Evesham (Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, 244 v. 29; 1863). G. R. C. DAVIS, Medieval Cartularies of Great Britain (New York 1958) 44. F. WORMALD, ed., English Kalendars before A.D. 1100 (London 1934-) 1:16.27; English Benedictine Kalendars after A.D. 1100 (London 1939-) 1:21. H. A. WILSON, ed., Officium ecclesiasticum abbatum, secundum usum Eveshamensis monasterii (Henry Bradshaw Society 6; 1893). Literature. The Victoria History of the County of Worcester, ed. J. W. WILLIS-BUND et al., 4 v. (Westminster, Eng. 1901-24) v.2. BENEDICTINES OF STAN-BROOK, Saint Egwin and his Abbey of Evesham (London 1904). R. R. DARLINGTON, "Aethelwig, Abbot of Evesham," English Historical Review 48 (1933) 1-22, 177-198. L. WEIBULL, "S:ta Maria i Evesham och s:t Knut i Odense," Scandia 13 (1940) 196-205. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England, 943-1216 (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1962). D. KNOWLES and R. N. HADCOCK, Medieval Religious Houses: England and Wales (New York 1953) 58, 65, 63.

[H. P. KING]

EVIL

"Evil" can be defined as that which opposes, or is the antithesis of, what is good. There is no precise articulation of the nature of evil in the creeds of the Church, nor is there any explicit or definitive Christian doctrine of evil. For biblical writers God's reality was accepted unquestioningly, and evil was accepted as an inevitable aspect of the world. Since evil was (and remains) the source of incredible human suffering and anguish, the biblical response did include appeals to God for understanding, and petitions to God to reduce suffering. The classic example is Job, but there are many other biblical writings that address the issue of understanding God's relationship to evil (cf. Ps 10:1, 22:1, Lam 2:20–22, Jn 9:1–5, Lk 13:1–5, etc.).

In Scripture. While the Scriptures display remarkable consistency and coherence about God and evil, the sacred authors did not produce a systematic theology of evil and suffering, nor did they theorize about God's hidden will in permitting evil and suffering, with a few exceptions (cf. Ps 10:1; Ps 22:1; and Ps 42:9; Lam 2:20-22; Jn 9:1-5, Luke 13:1-5; etc.). Evil is understood predominantly, though by no means exclusively, as divine punishment for sin (cf. Jer 44:22-23; Gal 6:7-8; Mt 7:18-19; Am 3:8; Lam 3:38; Is 45:7; etc.). Other explanations attribute evil and suffering to divine warnings and tests of faith (2 Cor 8:2; 1 Pt 1:6-7; etc.), to divine discipline (1 Cor 11:32; Dt 7:4-7; Heb 12:5-12; etc.), and as a means of expiation or atonement for sin-as displayed in Israel's sacrificial system of mandatory expiation (Lev 1-7; Jgs 2:18; Jer 8:21; Ps 126:5-6; etc.). The New Testament provides some unique perspectives on evil and its relationship to God; it teaches, for example, that evil has redemptive value, a view inspired especially by the Servant Songs in Isaiah (Is 41:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13-53:12), and patterned on Christ's suffering on behalf of all humanity (cf. Mk 10:38-39; Lk 14:27, etc.). Most importantly, perhaps, the New Testament teaches that suffering is not in every instance to be understood as directly attributable to a divine purpose, but that free creatures, both human and angelic, are the source of much, perhaps all, evil. The older view that God causes evils for justifiable reasons was softened, accordingly, by this understanding of human and angelic free will as the source of much suffering. Evil was understood as the result of satanic forces under the leadership of Satan, the personification of evil, yet also an ontological reality: "the lord of this world" (cf. Jn 12:31; Jn 14:30; Jn 16:11; Jn 17:31; 2 Cor 4:4; Eph 2:2; 6:12; etc.), "the adversary" (1 Pt 5:8), the "tempter" (1 Thes 3:5; 2 Cor 11:3), etc., who endlessly goads humanity into sin and brings about trials to discourage us and weaken our resolve for goodness (cf. 1 Thes 2:18; 1 Tm 4:1-7), etc. The human mind was thought to be the battleground for spiritual warfare between God and the demonic (2 Cor 10:3-5; Eph 6:10-12). Christ conducted spiritual warfare in His ministry, exorcizing evil spirits and showing by example that evil is an affront to God and must be resisted. Christian theology holds that Christ defeated Satan by the Cross and Resurrection, freeing us from the bondage to sin and the fear of death (Heb 2:14-15; 1 Cor 15). Christ urged His disciples to continue the fight against evil and He gave them power and authority to do so in His name (cf. Lk 9:1; Lk 10:19; etc.). So focused was Christ's battle against evil powers that St. Paul's letters defined Christ's atoning death as a ransom to Satan (Gal 3:20; 1 Tm 2:6; Col 2:15; Rom 3:25; and cf. Mt 20:28; Heb 2:14; 3:15; 1 Jn 3:8; etc.), a view held by the Church for a millennium until St. Anselm of Canterbury (1033-1109) proposed an alternative view of Christ's death as an atoning satisfaction for humanity's sinful rebellion against God, rather than for a ransom to be paid to Satan (see ATONE-MENT).

The Source of Evil. Traditionally, Christian theologians have referred to the Adamic Fall (Gn 3) for an understanding of the source of evil, the view that evil emerges from the misuse of human freedom. While this had been foreseen by God, the gift of freedom, nonetheless, was an essential and fundamental gift from God, one that distinguishes humanity from all other creatures and gives man alone the ability to choose good and evil. The misuse of freedom by Adam and Eve (Gn 3) introduced sin and suffering into a world created good (see SUFFER-ING). This "original sin" largely corrupted human nature, though not completely. As St. Augustine explained (City of God XIII, 14), the corruption is inherited "seminally" ("in the seed") by Adam and Eve's progeny. Ours is a world, accordingly, in which we are estranged not only from God, but from our spiritual nature, the world itself, and one another. This understanding of the Fall of humanity into corruption and sin became the dominate Christian explanation for evil and suffering. Interestingly, the Old Testament makes no mention of the Adamic Fall after the account in Genesis 3. The account was revived in the intertestamental books of Jubilees and 2 Enoch, and taken into Christianity by St. Paul's image of Christ as the second Adam who had overturned the sin of the first Adam (Rom 5:12-17; 1 Cor 15:21-22; Rom 5:16). The more common Old Testament view is that evil and suffering have their source in the breaking of the covenant established by Yahweh with the patriarchs Abraham and Moses. A further (and much less influential) view of evil's origin is found in the account of the sinful mating of the "sons of God" with "the daughters of men," caused by their "evil imagination" (Gn 6:5), an event that led to God's punishment by the catastrophic flood (Gn 6). The sinful actions noted in Gn 6:5 were elaborated in the Watchers legend in 1 Enoch in the intertestamental period. By the time of Christ, the account of the Fall in Genesis 3 had been coalesced with the "evil imagination'' account used in Rabbinic Judaism, and taken up by St. Paul who taught that Adam's Fall was explained by an ''evil imagination'' that was passed on to his progeny (see Hick, Evil, 202–5; see also 2 Esdras 3:21–22: ''For the first Adam, burdened with an evil heart, transgressed and was overcome, as were also all who were descended from him''). Augustine developed the theory of concupiscence (lust, sexual desire, etc.) as the source of evil within humanity, a theory that was integral to his defense of human freedom and doctrine of original sin (see Evans, Augustine, 132–67, etc.). St. Thomas later adapted this view, but with a more positive and optimistic emphasis about the condition of the human soul (see Summa theologiae I. Qs 81–82; Rahner, ''Concupiscentia'').

Kinds of Evil. A common division of evil is that into metaphysical, physical, and moral, as explained in the following sections.

Metaphysical Evil. The metaphysical notion of evil comes from LEIBNIZ. This type of evil results, in the opinion of some, from the mere finitude of created beings, i.e., from the absence of a perfection not required for the natural integrity of creatures. According to this conception, evil would affect all created beings universally and without any fault on their part. This view was revived in the twentieth century by several philosophers [cf. M. Heidegger, Sein und Zeit (Halle 1927) pp. 175-180; K. Jaspers, Philosophie (Berlin 1932) 2: 196–199; J. P. Sartre, L'Etre et le Néant (Paris 1943) p. 481], for whom original sin is the universal perception of a nature in anguish, conscious of its limits and native imperfection. Such a metaphysical notion of evil can be contested since finitude in itself is not an evil. It is indeed the negation of a higher perfection (e.g., man is not an angel), but not as a privation (e.g., man is not deprived of the perfections proper to an angel). If there is evil in the notion of metaphysical evil, it may be in the fact that limited and finite creatures inevitably will choose evil over good, and must deal consciously with the inevitability of the ultimate threat of finite existence: death. For the Christian, however, death itself is not an evil, but has been overcome by Christ and eternal life gained. "The last enemy that will be destroyed is death" (1 Cor 15:26).

Physical Evil. Physical evil is that affecting a nature, i.e., a being defined by an essence or by an ensemble of properties. It must not, therefore, be restricted to corporeal evil, for it is much wider in scope, and can be attributed to any nature, corporeal or spiritual, whose integrity it alters. Moral pain or sorrow is a physical evil in that it deprives the soul of its natural equilibrium, just as blindness deprives the body of its natural integrity. The same holds true for all psychological ills affecting spiritual powers, such as psychoses and neuroses. In this category of physical evil are often included cataclysms—earthquakes, typhoons, epidemics—that afflict greater or lesser areas of the earth. Writers like VOL-TAIRE draw arguments against divine providence from these events. Yet evil property so-called does not lie in these cataclysms, which after all flow from natural laws. Evil rather lies in the sufferings, often great and terrible, that accidentally follow in the wake of such phenomena. What is implied here, then, is basically the problem of SUFFERING, with its correlative, that of the PROVIDENCE OF GOD.

Material things can lack the integrity that is proper to their natures. In speaking of non-living things, we sometimes say they are "altered," such as bad wine, i.e., wine that has turned sour or has been diluted. But the evil, properly speaking, is not in such things: howsoever altered or imperfect in their own order, they are what they are by virtue of natural laws. It is man who classifies them as good or bad according as they suit his needs or not. Poison, for instance, is a natural thing, and as such it is good. Evil lies in using poison in a harmful manner, as an instrument of murder. In this case, the evil is in man. Among living beings, natural evil consists in suffering, both physical and moral, that destroys emotional harmony and equilibrium, which constitute the proper perfection of a sensible being as such.

On the matter of suffering, one must distinguish between man and animal. Man is par excellence the subject of suffering; not that he suffers more, quantitatively, than animals, but because he is aware of his suffering. An animal suffers pain without being able to reflect upon it. Awareness of pain serves only to intensify the evil. But this situation provides man with an opportunity to dominate and conquer suffering-an ability that the animal, being identified with suffering and so to speak drowned in it, does not possess. Man can accept suffering as expiation, if he is guilty, or as an act of fortitude, if he is innocent. From this, it should be evident that for man suffering is not an absolute evil, or at least, if it is really an evil, it is not the evil in itself. Whatever the suffering, it can be either vanquished or diminished by means provided by science, or else overcome by the courage of the one experiencing it, and thus be further ordained to man's moral and spiritual welfare. What would be classifiable as absolute evil, on the other hand, is suffering that could serve no purpose.

The brute animal as subject of suffering does not pose the same problem. Lacking reason, it lacks also a proper finality within itself. The brute is one among many, an instrument in the service of man. Man can use such things for his own advantage, though within the bounds of right reason. Were he unnecessarily to inflict sufferings upon them, he would offend God who requires of man that he make wise use of creation. Man would also degrade himself in seeking perverse satisfaction in the suffering of a sensible creature.

This leads to the problem of DEATH. Death is exclusively the concern of man, for man alone knows that he will die and is capable of anguish as he faces death. Is death an evil? While this problem calls into play all the conceptions of mankind, one may still reduce it to its essential elements. In any event, death cannot be the evil. Either man dies completely, or his soul survives the ruin of the bodily organism. If he dies completely, death takes away the problem: evil annihilates itself in its very realization. Moreover, how could death appear as an evil, a privation, for a being destined by nature to die completely? Death appears as evil only to the being that aspires not to die, and perceives this aspiration as fulfilling a need of its nature. This is the case for man, who seems unable to banish the scandal of death. We are here face to face with mystery-a mystery on which Christian faith alone can shed light. For faith teaches us not only that the conditions of man's dying are the result of a fault affecting the destiny of all mankind, but also that the trial that is death is the very door leading the faithful to an eternity of happiness (De malo 5.4-5).

Understood biblically, such physical evils are the result of a fallen world, a world corrupted by the prideful evil imagination of humanity (Gn 3). Thus, while historical skeptics like Hume, Voltaire, John Stuart Mill, etc. and contemporary atheists like Michael Martin and William Rowe have argued that the horrors of physical evils are decisive evidence against belief in God, Christians believe that such evils are the price we pay for living in a fallen world. In the writings of St. Augustine and St. Thomas, furthermore, the world is described as an aesthetic whole that is good from God's perspective, while the parts are evils and seen (often) only as such (see Confessions VII, 22; CG XI, 16-18, 22; etc). Despite the fallen nature of the world, God uses evils for good ends (Rom 8:28), for example, as means for expiation for our sins, or as means by which to achieve good ends not otherwise attainable, etc. Physical evils, moreover, are to be understood as unavoidable byproducts of natural laws that are goods in themselves, being necessary to support human life. As St. Thomas explained:"Many good things would be taken away if God permitted no evil to exist; for fire would not be generated if air was not corrupted, nor would the life of the lion be preserved unless the ass was killed" (Summa theologiae I. Q48). This, indeed, is a partial explanation for the long-held Christian belief in o felix culpa ("O happy fault"), attributed to St. Augustine and others but first used in the 5th century or, perhaps as late as the 7th century (in the Exsultet in the Roman Missal). This belief holds that it is better to have a world in which there is evil than a world without evil, since evil must be seen in the light of Christ's redemptive act. Evil is "fortunate" because is has merited such a great and wonderful redeemer (O felix culpa quae talem ac tantum meruit habere redemptorem). Physical suffering, then, is not an absolute evil: God remains in sovereign control and "works together all things for good for those who love God" (Rom 8:28), as should we (cf. Rom 12:21, etc.). The very nature of physical evils cannot be divorced from the providence of God; we must not attribute these sufferings directly to divine causation, but the good which results is God's work.

Moral Evil. Moral evil, consisting essentially in the disorder of the will, is called fault or sin. This species of evil presents the greatest problem, raising as it does the crucial question: how can its existence be reconciled with the infinitely good providence of God?

In contrast to physical evil, moral evil is that found in a rational and free nature as such. Properly the soul is its immediate subject, or more precisely, the will, with its power of obeying or disobeying the norms of moral conscience and the divine law. Moral evil is therefore a privation of rectitude required by the natural law, a privation affecting a free will, which through its own fault lacks a perfection it ought to have (De malo 2.1–2).

Moral evil or the disordered will, however, is itself an "evil of nature," viz, an evil to which a rational and free nature is subject. While this pertains to the general category of physical evil, of which it is a species, its specific nature is such as to justify the distinction between physical and moral evil. Physical evil, as already defined, is always an evil suffered, whether this affects a corporeal or a spiritual nature; such evil is received in a nature whose integrity it violates. Conversely, moral evil results from the voluntary activity of an agent who, in depriving himself of a perfection to which he is obliged by nature, inflicts upon himself a self-mutilation. Moral evil is thus properly constituted by this very activity (De malo 1.3).

This point is important in a consideration of evil, for it is precisely in the disordered will that evil assumes its tragic and mysterious character. Though the evil of the world with its attendant sufferings may be a heavy burden on man's reason, the perversity of the will, by which man denies his proper nature and insults God, is an even greater oppression. Thus, it would seem that the essence of evil resides in this perversity, which gives rise also to the evils of the world. In fact, Judeo-Christian revelation considers this moral lapse, inaugurated by Adam and transmitted to all humanity through original sin, as the first cause of all the ills of the world, viz, suffering, interpersonal conflicts, injustice, violence, and wars (cf. St. Augustine, Vera relig. 12.23: "Evil is either sin, or the punishment due to sin").

Since it is voluntary privation, a refusal to consider here and now the moral rules for right action for the purpose of a good that is not the good, evil is a consequence of liberty. Such a "negative positivity," such placing of a negation or a refusal, makes the will disordered and defines evil properly so-called (malum culpae: moral fault, sin). It is obvious from this that the problem of evil appears primarily as a voluntary perversion; it is the problem of the nature and form of this "power of nothingness" that springs from a nature endowed with liberty. Put in this way, the problem of evil is above all a problem for Christians. Pagans, except for those involved in Greco-Oriental religions, were aware only of the physical ills affecting humanity, namely, misery, ignorance, and errancy.

Evil as Privatio Boni. The view of evil as "untruth" (ARISTOTLE) and as having no reality in itself (PLOTINUS), was developed by St. Augustine in his debates with Manichean dualists who distinguished between spirit and matter, rejecting the flesh (MATTER) as evil and demonic. Augustine defended Christian belief against the Manichean objection that the Christian God, as the creator of all things, must then be the creator of evil as well. AUGUS-TINE responded with the privatio boni view of evil that he had found in NEOPLATONISM: God, he argued, creates only what is good and, as such, evil has no genuine reality of its own (ens reale), but rather, is to be understood as a subjective human concept (ens rationis) (see Enchiridion XI, etc.; see also St. Thomas, Summa theologiae I, Q49; De Malo I, 3; etc.), as parasitic on the good and as that that deprives a good creation of its good (see Schwarz, Evil, ch. 2 and Hick, Evil, ch. 3). St. Augustine (cf. On Nature and Grace; Enchiridion XI-XIV), and later St. Thomas (Summa theologiae I, Q14, 46, etc.), explained this as the corruption of our divinely given "telos," the falling away from the good intended for us by God, a view of evil described by St. Augustine variously as privatio, deprivatio, corruptio, amissio, vitium, defectus, indigentia, and negatia. What God creates is good and that which deprives the good has no ontological status.

Satan and Evil. Another view of evil gives it a much clearer ontological status, but that has been long neglected by most theologians and rejected by the secular world's fascination with reason and the scientific method during the past three centuries. This view of evil has its basis in the biblical teaching that Satan and his demonic horde of fallen angels (Mt 25:41, 2 Pt 2:4) have been engaged in spiritual warfare against God. It has been argued that after Augustine, the centrality of the spiritual warfare theme was subsumed under the more dominant theme of the all-encompassing providence of God. Rarely has the spiritual warfare theme been exploited by theologians in response to the theodicy issue (see Boyd, God at War). While God permits satanic evil powers to wreck havoc on the world, the Church has been given "all power and authority to cast out demons" (cf. Mt 10:1-8; Mk 16:17; Lk 10:19; Lk 9:1-2) and, indeed, has an obligation to do so. As the ministry of Jesus and his disciples demonstrated, evil is not to be explained away as serving some mysterious divine providence, at least not in every case. Evil, rather, is to be resisted and defeated, except in those instances in which God is enacting just punishment or achieving some greater good through His permission of evil, a permission that allows evil uses of free will in both humanity and satanic forces. Amos 3:6 ("Does evil befall a city unless the Lord has done it?") warns of God's coming punishment if the people do not repent. By permitting the destruction of the kingdom as a deed of Satan, God accomplished His purpose, since the evil of the people had to be punished (see Boyd, God at War, 150-52). The point here, however, is that not all evil is to be seen as the means by which God fulfills His purposes. Indeed, the evil misuse of free will by humanity (and satanic powers) causes evils that God does not seek; yet in His incomprehensible goodness, God salvages whatever good can be achieved in these evils (Rom 8:28).

Bibliography: G. BOYD, God at War (Downers Grove 1997). G. R. EVANS, Augustine on Evil (Cambridge 1982). D. R. GRIFFIN, God, Power and Evil (Philadelphia 1976). J. HICK, Evil and the God of Love, rev. ed. (New York 1978). G. H. JOYCE, Principles of Natural Theology (New York 1972). K. RAHNER, "Why Does God Allow Us to Suffer," Theological Investigations XIX (New York 1983); "Concerning the Relationship between Nature and Grace" and "The Theological Concept of Concupiscentia," Theological Investigations I (Baltimore 1961). H. SCHWARZ, Evil: A Historical and Theological Perspective, tr. M. WORTHING (Minneapolis 1995). R. A. SUNGENIS, Not By Faith Alone: The Biblical Evidence for the Catholic Doctrine of Justification (Santa Barbara, CA 1997). B. L. WHITNEY, Theodicy: An Annotated Bibliography on the Problem of Evil, 1960–1991 (Bowling Green State University 1998).

[R. JOLIVET/B. WHITNEY]

EVIL EYE

Belief in the evil eye is a universal phenomenon and is attested to from the remote past. It is found, for example, in ancient Babylonia, Egypt, in the Greco-Roman world, and Talmudic Judaism. The eye is looked upon not only as the window of the soul, but as its visible center from which the rays of sight emanate. Certain human beings (and animals; for example, the serpent) are reputed to be endowed with a glance whose fluid is capable of causing even mortal hurt, deliberately (on the part of sorcerers) or not, to men, especially to young children, to animals (cattle, primarily), and to things (dwellings, harvests, and personal property). The evil eye causes harm through its envy, the venom of which it projects by its glance and thus poisons its object or victim. There are sovereign remedies, which may be permanent (such as representations of the evil eye vanquished by more powerful forces, inscriptions, or amulets of ludicrous or obscene character) or instantaneous (such as an obscene gesture, or spitting). In the early Christian centuries, the evil eye was expanded as the action of the devil, the Invidus or Envious One par excellence, and the forms of protection became progressively Christianized (cruciform amulets, Christian abbreviations, inscriptions, invocations to God, to the angels, and to various saints).

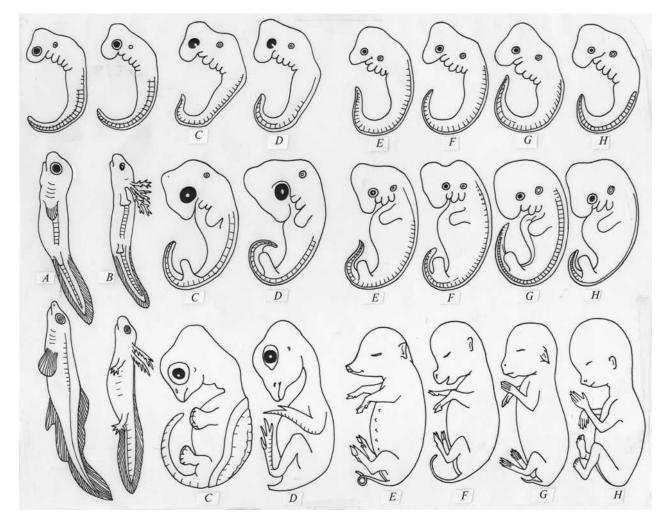

Bibliography: F. T. ELWORTHY, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS (Edinburgh 1908–27) 5:608–615. B. HELL-ER, "Böser Blick," Encyclopaedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Berlin 1928–34) 4:979–982. D. FREY, Dämonie des Blickes (Wiesbaden 1953). B. KÖTTING, "Böser Blick" Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, ed. T. KLAUSER (Stuttgart 1941 [1950]–) 2:473–482, with bibliog. S. THOMPSON Motif-Index of Folk-Literature (Bloomington, Ind. 1955–58) v.6, s.v. "Evil Eye." S. SELIGMANN, Die Zauberkraft des Auges und das Berufen (Hamburg 1922).

[G. M. SANDERS]

EVODIUS OF ANTIOCH, ST.

Bishop of the primitive Church, d. c. 64. Eusebius mentions Evodius as the first bishop of Antioch (Chronology ad ann. 2058; Histoire ecclesiastique 3.22), following the chronicle of JULIUS AFRICANUS (221); while Origen (Hom. 4 in Lc., Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 3:938) speaks of him as second bishop of Antioch after St. Peter. He was probably succeeded by IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH, who speaks of himself as bishop of Syria, indicating that it was the only church in the region at that early date. No ancient document attests to the martyrdom of Evodius; and the attempt to connect him with the Evodias mentioned by St. Paul (Phil 4.2) fails before the fact that this person was almost certainly a woman. The sixth-century chronicler JOHN MALALAS states that Evodius was the first to use the name Christian, and Nicephorus Callistus (Histoire ecclesiastique 2.3) mentions Evodius as the author of several writings. But neither of these statements has historical foundation. Evodius is not mentioned in the MARTYROLOGY OF ST. JEROME, or in that of Bede; his name was introduced into the Martyrologium Romanum parvum by Ado and thence passed into the later martyrologies.

Feast: May 6 (Latin Church); April 28, June 30, Sept. 7 (Greek Church).

Vertebrate embryos at three comparable stages; development comparison between fish, salamander, tortoise, chick, hog, calf, rabbit, and human. (Catholic University of America)

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum May 2:98. G. SALMON, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–87) 2:428–429. R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 16:133. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:834. A. VON HAUCK, Geschichte der altchristlichen Litteratur, 2 v. in 4 (Leipzig 1893–1904) 1.2:781–782; 2.1:116–122.

[J. HAMROGUE]

EVOLUTION

The International Darwin Centennial Convention (Chicago 1959) defined evolution as an irreversible process of developmental change in time, which during its course generates novelty, diversity, and higher levels of organization. It operates in all sectors of the phenomenal universe but has been most fully described in the biological sector. The general statement of evolution explicitly asserts that the natural history of organisms has been and is being accomplished by materials and forces belonging to the organic world, and that no miraculous intrusion is needed to account for the proliferation of new forms.

Philosophical Evaluation

A key issue that contemporary evolutionary theory poses for the philosopher is how best to express both the extent and the limitations of the concept of evolution. Since the publication of Charles DARWIN's Origin of Species (1859), a tendency has developed to make of scientific evolution a philosophical principle for evolutionism. But to regard all things as in a state of flux and to make change the sole principle of all knowledge, the sole property of all activity and behavior, and the sole condition of all laws, art, morals, religion, and history is to extend evolution far beyond its documented limits.

Evolution is not a philosophical principle. The value of this theory is great, especially in the biological sciences, but it has important limitations. There is a sense in which all cosmological events have a history, a spatiotemporal context, but of equal importance is the stability of nature and of physical laws. When scientists speak of the evolution of life, of chemical elements, of planets, of the stars and galaxies, the concept of evolution is extended metaphorically. Even in the purely scientific sphere, evolution is not a single-valued term, equally tested in every area of science. For example, in speaking of the evolution of man, one must understand the limited sense in which the term is extended to man's unique psychosocial conditions. Man's spiritual endowments, his intelligence and freedom, necessitate new nonbiological principles of development. Man, in a real sense, fashions his own evolution, his own future niche, his destiny. Though subject to the conditions of time and place, man's work, his art, his language, his morals, his religion, and his history are within man's control and subject to his intelligence and freedom. Evolutionism as a philosophical principle-variously expressed in the ideologies of HIS-TORICISM, EXISTENTIALISM, and Marxism-cannot derive verification of its assumptions from biological evolution.

Nor is evolution an ultimate explanation of reality. It is not intrinsically bound up with any one metaphysical system. Thus it is not intrinsically materialistic, or mechanistic, or vitalistic; it is not intrinsically atheistic, or pantheistic, or theistic. Yet evolution, like all great scientific theories, needs a philosophical context, and this must be provided by disciplines other than biology and anthropology.

Stability and Change. Although change and its mechanisms have preoccupied evolutionists for many decades, evolutionary change would be meaningless without its corollary, stability. The organic world and its species are amazingly stable. Many representatives of vertebrate families have existed for millions of years unchanged. Although genetic mutation, natural selection, and isolation are natural phenomena, organisms strenuously resist change. And when a variation does come about, the general process is (1) to proliferate, (2) to adapt functionally, (3) to stabilize and find equilibrium, and (4) to become extinct. Extinction of species, so dominant a part of the evolutionary process, is the result of specialization and overstabilization.

The important philosophical insight here is that nature is to be seen in terms of two tendencies, two correlative principles both of being and of knowledge, namely, change and stability. The importance of knowledge of history for the understanding of the cosmos has been clarified by studies of the evolution of organisms. Indeterminism in cosmology and physics, brought to light by relativity and the quantum theory, has meant the death of physical determinism and of the view that the universe is fixed in all of its parts and its development. Nevertheless, science remains founded upon the stability of the cosmos. Hence, science of nature built upon stability alone or change alone must remain fragmentary and illusory. Realism is maintained by applying both correlative principles.

Natural Species. How best to define natural species has always been a problem for both the logician and the naturalist. The theory of evolution has forced the concept of SPECIES to refer to something more fluid and developmental. Traditional philosophies of nature, based upon the teachings of PLATO and ARISTOTLE, tended to define natural species like numbers, claiming that they are immutable, eternal, indivisible, and necessary. The Platonic tradition divided nature into kinds of essences with fixed properties that were, in turn, immutable, eternal, indivisible, and necessary. In his biological works, Aristotle repudiated dialectical classifications that attempted to place all of nature into sic et non categories. But until natural history accumulated real evidence for the transformation of organic species, the concept of natural species tended to be identified with that of an immutable, eternal essence.

Although Darwin, and others since, thought that a species was but an arbitrary category for individually distinct organisms, contemporary evolutionists insist that real specific discontinuity exists in nature. Yet, the classical morphological basis of taxonomy is giving way to a more dynamic biological concept of populations. Natural species are not fixed physiological or morphological types, as Linnaeus defined them. They are interbreeding populations isolated reproductively from other interbreeding populations. Where this genetic and ecological definition cannot be applied (e.g., to nonsexual organisms), the old morphological concept is valuable. But the concept of fixed essences has been replaced in biology by a more dynamic concept of relatively stable populations.

This latter concept corresponds favorably with the Aristotelian concept of NATURE, the intrinsic principle of activity and behavior. The term "ESSENCE" designates the principle of the being of a thing; the term "nature" designates the principle of activity. The physical nature of an organism could be known and its essence remain unknown. Nature is no more fixed than is the relation between the generator and the generated, and, unlike essence, the nature admits of the developmental orientation implied in a true evolution of species. Organisms are not immutable, necessary, eternal, and indivisible. The type of concept that denoted essences of this description is not compatible with evolutionary development, whereas the concept of nature can fully embrace evolutionary theory and a true transformation of natural species.

Higher from Lower. Without reinstituting the debate between Darwin and Lamarck concerning innate tendencies toward perfection, can one say that there is evidence for progress and direction in the known course of evolution? Is there a real sense of evolutionary movement from the lower forms to the higher, from the less perfect to the more perfect? To the biologist, lower and higher or less and more perfect can be judged only in terms of the capacity of the organism to secure its survival. Purpose and finality in evolution are not a priori inferences; but a posteriori, the biologist can observe a direction in evolution in terms of relative survival value. Life has tended to occupy every available niche to ensure the perdurance of the biotic community on this planet. The biologist defines life in terms of an active capacity to transform environmental energies into living energy; in such transformation the organism attains some measure of independence from the environment. Biologically, life is higher and more perfect to the extent that it attains greater independence in any single ecological niche. In this sense, vertebrates are higher than invertebrates, vascular plants than nonvascular plants, reptiles than fishes, birds than reptiles, mammals than birds, and man than other primates.

Furthermore, greater freedom from the control of the environment is achieved by the greater complexity of parts and more integral subordination of parts to the whole organism. This direction to higher complexity and integration is observed also in the fossil record of plants and animals. The general course of evolution has been from the simple forms to the highly complex forms of life. The primary, universal goal of evolution is survival, and although the future of any species cannot be predicted a priori, its history in retrospect can be seen to have followed orderly laws. Those laws have brought forth higher forms from the lower forms in the sense defined. To this extent the natural philosopher may speak of a hierarchy within organic nature.

For the philosopher, the question naturally arises: how can higher organisms arise from lower organisms? The biologist describes the evolutionary process in terms of mutation and selection pressures acting upon an interbreeding population, with isolating mechanisms moving parts of the population further and further from the original through races, varieties, and subspecies all the way to new species. This progress is entirely natural. But the natural philosopher asks for an account of the efficient causes that are sufficient to educe these higher effects. Does this process necessitate the intrusion of nonbiological causes?

The resolution of this problem can be found in the complex interplay of both univocal and equivocal agents acting upon organic matter to produce an effect slightly different from the univocal parent. Mutations are caused by many factors outside the univocal agent, such as cosmic rays and chemical changes caused by atmospheric conditions. Again, many parent-progeny endowments remain latent and are induced only by the requirements of adaptation. No single univocal agent is sufficient to explain the origin of the bird from reptile stock, but a unified complex of univocal and equivocal causes, some acting quite per accidens over a long period of gradual change, are sufficient reason for the origin of the new species. This unified convergence of univocal and equivocal causes would be sufficient to explain the natural origin of life by biopoesis, provided that the dynamic order of causes could be accounted for. Although the development of life manifests the presence of some opportunism and randomness, the dynamic order of the whole process must be accounted for.

Chance and Order. In all evolution, CHANCE is an important factor. Environmental forces command adaptation on the part of the organism. The organism itself has very limited power to dominate its ecological niche; moreover, although the environment tends to be stable, it too is subject to chance alterations. Genetic mutations are apparently caused by chance concurrence of environmental events. Does this influence of chance destroy any basic ORDER in the history of organisms? By no means. Evolutionary history cannot be predicted a priori, but neither is it random.

The relation of chance and order in evolution can be compared to the tossing of a coin. In the individual toss, the chance of heads occurring is 50–50, even though one cannot predict the next individual toss. But in 1,000 tosses, one can predict the chances of heads to be about 500 times. Actuarial tables are constructed upon this statistical principle. The same principle applies to evolution. The forces of nature that bring about change and variation are complex and unpredictable in the individual event or phylogeny, but the general process of speciation takes place according to verifiable physical and biological laws. Every biological law restricts evolution. And although the scientist cannot predict the course of evolution from these laws, he can explain the course of evolution that has ever been under the dominance of these laws. The application of the laws of statistics to organic populations has become a very useful tool in analyzing events of the group when cosmic influences upon the individual are too complex to yield orderly treatment. Events, then, that seem to occur quite by chance at the level of the individual are subject to regular laws at the level of the group. Thus, in the general course of evolution, a dynamic order prevails.

Order and God. It is this dynamic order of the organic world-so dependent upon the order of the microcosm on the one hand and upon the order of the megalacosm on the other-that raises for philosophers the question whether or not the ultimate explanation of evolution demands the existence of a transcendent cause as designer. The classical arguments for the existence of God obtain with as much force in a dynamic unfolding order as they do in a universe of static order alone, if not more. Thus, for many thinkers, organic evolution must necessarily be theistic to be complete. This is not to say that God in His intelligent providence and governance of this dynamic order is seen to make a miraculous intrusion upon the natural causes and laws with which He has endowed His creation. In a real sense the laws of nature are the operation of His governance. The dynamic order of nature, especially in the unfolding process of evolution, thus makes the inference of a sufficient coordinating and governing cause seem a necessity.

For other thinkers this cause is intrinsic to the cosmos, a conclusion that leads to PANTHEISM. For one who subscribes to ATHEISM, on the other hand, no such cause is needed. Philosophically, neither the pantheistic nor the atheistic position accounts sufficiently for the organization and the governance of the dynamic order of the cosmos, both of which demand the operation of intelligence and will. A being endowed with such faculties would of necessity be spiritual and transcendent to the cosmic order.

Bibliography: R. J. NOGAR, The Wisdom of Evolution (New York 1963). P. G. FOTHERGILL, Evolution and Christians (New York 1961). J. DE BIVORT DE LA SAUDÉE, ed., God, Man and the Universe (New York 1953). F. C. BAWDEN et al., Symposium on Evolution (Pittsburgh 1959). E. C. MESSENGER, ed., Theology and Evolution (London 1952). C. HAURET, Beginnings: Genesis and Modern Science, ed. E. P. EMMANS (Dubuque 1955). B. VAWTER, A Path through Genesis (New York 1956). J. LEVIE, The Bible: Word of God in Words of Men, tr. S. H. TREMAN (New York 1962). L. R. WARD, God and World Order (St. Louis 1961). P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, The Phenomenon of Man, tr. B. WALL (New York 1959). M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. (Chicago 1952) 1:451–467. A. M. DUBARLE, The Biblical Doctrine of Original Sin, tr. E. M. STEWART (New York 1965).

[R. J. NOGAR]

CATHOLIC TEACHING

Man, intelligent, free, graced, and the recipient of revelation, has a relationship beyond other creatures to God, his Creator. Hence, there are theological dimensions to such evolutionary postulates as the historical origin of mankind from lower animal forms, the present state of human nature in a condition of dynamic flux, and future goals of the race to be achieved, perhaps, through man's conscious control of his own evolution.

Pope Pius XII confined the question of man's genesis to "the origin of the human body as coming from preexistent and living matter" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 3896). The human SOUL, spiritual and immortal, is not explained by purely material antecedents. Man may share biological continuity with lower animals, but there is at least some measure of psychic and moral discontinuity.

To the question "What is the origin of man?" Scripture gives a religious answer. The Book of GENESIS teaches that God is man's Creator and Father and that man is the most excellent of earthly creatures, a creature "made to the image and likeness of God" (Gn 1.3). The Genesis account is a "popular description of the origin of the human race . . . in simple and figurative language adapted to the mentality of a people" in a nontechnological culture (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3898). In his hymn of praise of the Creator, the sacred writer may have taken something (under inspiration) from popular, nonbiblical narrations.

Traditional Idea. For most of Christian history the possibility of evolution in its modern connotation was imagined only as most improbable speculation. The traditional idea that God had created things as they are, fixed in species, did not have a serious rival. Evolution (transformism) came into prominence chiefly through the work of Charles Darwin (The Origin of Species, 1859) and Alfred R. Wallace. Early proponents of Darwinism (e.g., T. H. Huxley in England and Ernst Haeckel in Germany) were militant materialists, atheists, or agnostics (Huxley's term). Many churchmen responded to evolution as to an attack upon Christianity, and an unfortunate atmosphere of controversy was the result. In a famous debate, typical of the times, Anglican bishop Samuel Wilberforce confronted Huxley at Oxford in 1860. In Dayton, Tennessee, in 1925 the celebrated "monkey trial" of John T. Scopes saw Clarence Darrow ridicule the fundamentalist ideas of William Jennings Bryan.

Statements of the Fathers and theologians before Darwin are not strictly ad rem, since the issue had not even been raised. St. Gregory of Nyssa is sometimes cited as an evolutionist, but he also held that man was privileged above other creatures in being formed by God's own hands. St. John Chrysostom held the view, hardly evolutionary in the modern sense, that Adam's body was lifeless before it received a soul. St. Augustine taught that in the beginning God created rationes seminales, the seeds or germs of all things that would eventually develop in time. These seminal causes were postulated to account for the appearance of new things without contradicting the doctrine that God had created all things simultaneously. Augustine also proposed principles applied in 1893 by Pope Leo XIII to cases of apparent conflict between science and the Bible: "Whatever they [scientists] can really demonstrate to be true of physical nature, let us show to be capable of reconciliation with our Scriptures" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3287); and "the Holy Spirit [in the Scriptures] . . . did not intend to teach men these things in no way profitable unto salvation" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3288).

After Darwin. Although churchmen after Darwin regarded evolution as inopportune and dangerous, no official statement of condemnation issued from Rome, and no written work was placed in the INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS for that reason. The record of the attitudes of theologians, however, shows considerable change since mid-19th century. The provincial council of Cologne (not ecumenical) in 1860 declared that the theory of transformism whereby some lower form spontaneously became a human body was contrary to Scripture and to the faith. Vatican Council I in 1870 was content to repeat the commonsense advice: the same God gives revelation and reason; one truth cannot contradict the other (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3017). In 1909 the Biblical Commission refused to call into question the literal and historical meaning of Genesis in cases "which touch the fundamental teachings of the Christian religion" but ruled that one is not bound to seek for scientific exactitude of expression in the first chapter of Genesis and that free discussion of the six days of creation is permitted (June 30, 1909; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3512–19). In 1948 a letter to Cardinal E. Suhard from the secretary of the Biblical Commission noted that the replies of the Biblical Commission in 1909 are "in no way a hindrance to further truly scientific examination of the problems in accordance with the results acquired in these last 40 years" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3862).

In 1950 the encyclical HUMANI GENERIS marked the starting point of a new development. Materialism and pantheism were condemned, caution and moderation were counseled in reinterpreting Scripture, but evolution was expressly recognized as a valid hypothesis:

The teaching authority of the Church does not forbid that, in conformity with the present state of human sciences and sacred theology, research and discussions on the part of men, experienced in both fields take place with regard to the doctrine of evolution. [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3896]

Pope John Paul II, in a discourse to the Pontifical Academy of Sciences (Oct. 22, 1996), reiterated Pius XII's teaching from Humani generis on the direct creation of the human soul by God. He cast the whole topic of evolution in the terms of a Christian anthropology, insisting that both theology and the sciences must be judged by what Christian faith knows about human nature: namely, that man is made in the image and likeness of God. The Christian has no objection to evolutionary theories in se, but only those that, because of their philosophical principles, do not do justice to who man is. "The theories of evolution which, because of the philosophies which inspire them, regard the spirit either as emerging from the forces of living matter, or as a simple epiphenomenon of that matter, are incompatible with the truth about man. They are therefore unable to serve as the basis for the dignity of the human person" ("Discourse," 5).

Bibliography: R. COLLIN, Evolution: Hypotheses and Problems, tr. S. J. TESTER (New York 1959). D. L. LACK, Evolutionary Theory and Christian Belief (London 1957). S. TAX, ed., Evolution after Darwin, 3 v. (Chicago 1960).

[O. W. GARRIGAN/EDS.]

EVRARD OF BÉTHUNE

Grammarian, polemicist; b. Béthune, Pas-de-Calais, France. Little is known of his life: several historians have considered him to have been two persons, the first living before 1124, the other dying shortly after 1212. It is certain, however, that his major work, the Antihaeresis (ed. J. Gretser, Ingolstadt 1614) could only have been written during the second part of the 12th century or at the beginning of the 13th. This work outlines at length the fundamental beliefs of the CATHARI in order to refute them. In this polemic Evrard successfully criticized the arbitrary scriptural interpretation of the Cathari. Then he discussed the WALDENSES, and finally the Jews, for whom he proposes texts that are difficult to interpret and that he feels might confuse them. His other work, the Graecismus [ed. A. J. Wrobel, Corpus grammaticorum Medii Aevi (Brussels, 1887) 1], a much-used textbook during the Middle Ages, is a versified Latin grammar based on the interrelationship of Latin and Greek. Evrard aspired to a good style and showed literary knowledge, particularly of early medieval Latin authors; but his writing is mediocre, and his thought not very worthwhile: often he extols faith at the expense of the work at hand. His treatise against the Cathari, however, is extremely helpful for determining their beliefs: J. B. BOSSUET used it in his Histoire des variations des églises protestantes to show the differences in doctrine between the Waldenses and the Cathari.

Bibliography: A. WAUTERS in Biographie nationale de Belgique, v.6 (1878) 747–751. U. CHEVALIER, Répertoire des sources historiques du moyen-âge (Paris 1905–07) 1:1261. E. FARAL, Les Arts poétiques du XII^e et du XIII ^e siècle (Paris 1924) 38–39. M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 3:747–751. F. VERNET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 4.2:1995–98. É. GRIFFE, Catholicisme 3:1230. M. GRABMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:627–628.

[É. BROUTTE]

ÉVROUL (EBRULF), ST.

Abbot; b. Bayeux, France, c. 617; d. Dec. 29, 706. He had served for some time in the Merovingian royal court. After he and his wife separated, he spent the remaining 22 years of his life as abbot of the Abbey of SAINT-ÉVROULT, which he had founded and which was later named after him. He was also active in missionary work around his monastery, and he founded several other houses in the area. ORDERICUS VITALIS, a monk of Saint-Évroult in the 12th century, mentions Évroul but places him in the sixth century. His relics were lost during the religious wars and the French Revolution, but his cult is still popular in Normandy.

Feast: Dec. 29.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 1:335–342. ORDERICUS VITALIS, Historia ecclesiastica, bk. 6, ch. 6–9. La vie de saint Evroul: poème normand du XIVe siècle, ed. S. SANDQVIST (Lund 1992). A. M.. ZIMMER-MANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 3:493–497. L. MUSSET, 1302. T. DE MOREMBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 16:220–221.

[P. BLECKER]

ÉVROUL OF SAINT-FUSCIENAU-BOIS, ST.

Abbot; b. Beauvais, France, sixth century; d. near Oroër, France, July 25c. 600. His dates are not at all certain, and it has been maintained by some scholars that his activity should be placed a full century later. Reputedly, Évroul (Ebrulf or Evroult) was promoted to sacred orders by the bishop of Beauvais because of his exemplary conduct. Some reports claim that the monks at Saint-Fuscienau-Bois petitioned that he be appointed their abbot, but other accounts say that royal influence determined the appointment. These uncertainties stem from the fact that this Évroul has at times been confused with ÉVROUL (EBRULF) of Ouche; a vita written centuries after the saint's lifetime contributes little of solid historical evidence. Local tradition reports that Évroul died on his way to Oroër and was buried there, but later (838) his relics were taken to the cathedral in Beauvais. His cult became popular at an early date in the areas in which he had lived and worked.

Feast: July 25; July 27 in Beauvais.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 6:192–198. A. M.. ZIM-MERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:505. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 4:855; Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961–) 4:892–893. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés (Mâcon 1935–39) 2:2683. Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v.14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 10: 1302. T. DE MOREMBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 16:220–221.

[H. DRESSLER]

EWALD, SS.

Two Anglo-Saxon missionaries; d. northwestern Germany, Oct. 3 c. 690. According to BEDE (Histoire ecclesiastique 5.10) there were two brothers, priests of the English nation bearing the same name, Ewald, who were differentiated by the color of their hair, one called Black Ewald and the other White (Fair) Ewald. Both lived for a time in Ireland and wished to dedicate their lives to the conversion of the Saxons. They arrived in the area somewhat north of the lower regions of the Lippe River and tried to establish contact with the Saxon leaders, but their efforts were thwarted by the local pagans who felled White Ewald with one blow of the sword and tortured Black Ewald before slaving him. According to Bede's account the martyrs' bodies were thrown into the Rhine River but were miraculously recovered by their companions. In the time of Pepin (d. 714) the martyrs' relics were brought to Cologne and placed in the church of St. Clement, now renamed St. Cunibert.

Feast: Oct. 3.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 2:180–207. A. M.. ZIM-MERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 3:127, 129–130. A. SCHÜTTE, Handbuch der deutschen Heiligen (Cologne 1941) 120. W. LEVISON, England and the Continent in the Eighth Century (Oxford 1946) 58. E. HEGEL, Kirchliche Vergangenheit in Bistum Essen (Essen 1960) 13–14, 29. A. FRANZEN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 16:221–223.

[H. DRESSLER]

EWING, THOMAS AND CHARLES

Father and son. Thomas was a statesman and lawyer; b. West Liberty, Ohio County, Va., Dec. 28, 1789; d. Lancaster, Ohio, Oct. 26, 1871. Of Scotch-Irish and Presbyterian background, he married Mary Wills Boyle, a Catholic, and was received into the Church (1871) by Abp. J. B. Purcell of Cincinnati, Ohio. As a lawyer Ewing was prominent in important court litigation that tested the validity of charitable trusts, the binding force of national church incorporation, and land titles in the West. He was a friend and adviser of Archbishop Purcell and an opponent of KNOW-NOTHINGISM. Ewing served in the U.S. Senate (1830–36, 1850–51) and was secretary of the treasury (1841); he organized the interior department as its first secretary (1849–50) and was delegate to the Peace Conference of 1861. His son, Thomas, served in the Congress and in the Union Army. His daughter, Ellen, married Gen. William T. Sherman.

Charles was the head of Catholic Indian Missions and a Civil War general; b. Lancaster, Ohio, March 6, 1835; d. Washington, D.C., June 20, 1883. He studied at the Dominican College near Lancaster, Ohio; at Gonzaga College, Washington, D.C.; and at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville. In 1860 he was admitted to the practice of law in St. Louis, Mo., and became a captain in the 13th Infantry Regulars of the Union Army. While fighting in the Arkansas and Mississippi campaigns, he was wounded three times at Vicksburg and was subsequently made a lieutenant colonel. He served as acting inspector general during the Atlanta campaign under Gen. William T. Sherman, his brother-in-law. At the end of this campaign he was cited for gallantry and promoted to brigadier general. After the war he returned to his law practice, and in 1873 he became head of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions.

Bibliography: E. E. SHERMAN, Memorial of Thomas Ewing of Ohio (New York 1873).

[T. O. HANLEY/J. L. MORRISON]

EX CATHEDRA

Canonized in the language of the Church in the definition of papal infallibility (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3074), ex cathedra symbolically expresses the supreme authority within the Church of the Roman pontiff. Extended in the form of ex cathedra Petri, it symbolizes the Roman pontiff's title to that supreme authority and to the charism of INFALLIBILITY that accompanies it: because he is the successor of Peter, head of the college of Apostles. Where GALLICANISM, abusing the distinction between sedens and sedes, sought to separate the authority of the Roman pontiff from that of Peter, VATICAN COUNCIL I (ibid.) by using the formula ex cathedra rejected that separation. Through succession to his chair, or supreme office, in the Church, the authority and infallibility of Peter lives on in the Roman pontiff. See Also: CHAIR OF PETER; DEFINITION, DOGMATIC; PRIMACY OF THE POPE; TEACHING AUTHORITY OF THE CHURCH (MAGISTERIUM).

Bibliography: A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales 1:916–917. M. J. SCHEEBEN, Handbuch der katholischen Dogmatik, v.1 (Freiburg 1948) 231–242.

[E. G. HARDWICK]

EX CORDE ECCLESIAE

Apostolic constitution issued on Aug. 15, 1990 by John Paul II; intended to supplement the apostolic constitution on ecclesiastical faculties and universities, Sapientia Christiana (1979), by providing for non-ecclesiastical universities and other Catholic institutions of higher learning a description of their nature and purpose and general norms to govern their activities.

After an introduction (nos. 1–11), the text is divided into two parts. The first, "Identity and Mission" (nos. 12–49) briefly describes the nature of a university and locates Catholic identity in the Christian inspiration of individuals and the whole community, "reflection in the light of the Catholic faith upon the growing treasury of human knowledge, to which it seeks to contribute by its own research," "fidelity to the Christian message as it comes to us through the Church," and an institutional commitment to the service both of the People of God and of the whole human family (no. 13). Research undertaken at a Catholic university should be characterized by the search for the integration of knowledge, a dialogue between faith and reason, ethical concern, and a theological perspective (nos. 15–20).

The next sections discuss the university community—teachers, students, and administrators (nos. 21– 26)—and the university's place and role in the Church, both universal and local, and the responsibility of bishops to promote and assist in the preservation and strengthening of Catholic identity, with due regard to the autonomy of the sciences, including in theology, and to academic freedom (nos. 27–29).

The mission of the Catholic university is described, first, in terms of its service to Church (no. 31) and to society (nos. 32–37). For the latter the emphasis falls on the university's becoming an "instrument of cultural progress," bringing to bear Christian "ethical and religious principles," promoting social justice, and encouraging interdisciplinary research projects. The Catholic university should also be a place in which pastoral ministry assists an integration of faith and life, demonstrating this by opportunities for community worship and concern for the poor and those suffering injustice (nos. 38–42). The institution should promote the dialogue between the Gospel and culture, with special reference to local cultures and contemporary problems. It should in particular promote a dialogue between Christian thought and the modern sciences. It should encourage and contribute to ecumenical dialogue (nos. 43–47). In all these ways the Catholic university will make an indispensable contribution to the Church's primary task of evangelization (nos. 48, 49).

The second part of the document is devoted to eleven general norms to supplement other ecclesiastical legislation. Article 1 requires that they be applied locally and regionally "taking into account the statutes of each university or institute and, as far as possible and appropriate, civil law." The general norms and local or regional applications to be incorporated into governing documents and university statutes are, as necessary, to be brought into conformity with them. Article 2 legislates for the Catholic identity, which is to be made known in a public document and to be promoted by the influence of Catholic teaching and discipline over all university activities, with due regard taken for the freedom of conscience of each person and for the autonomy and freedom of the various disciplines. Article 3 lists three different ways in which a Catholic university may be established: by the Holy See, an episcopal conference, or a local bishop; by a religious institute or other public juridical person; by other ecclesiastical or lay people. Article 4 entrusts the primary responsibility for maintaining and strengthening Catholic identity to the university itself and its officials. All teachers and administrators are to be informed about this Catholic identity and expected to promote or at least respect it in ways appropriate to the different disciplines. Catholic teachers, particularly in theology, are to be faithful to Catholic doctrine and morals, and others are to respect them; non-Catholic teachers and students are to recognize and respect Catholic identity, and non-Catholic teachers are not to constitute a majority within the institution; education of all students is to include a formation in ethical and religious principles and courses in Catholic doctrine are to be made available.

Article 4 requires that the university remain in communion with the universal Church and with the local Church; bishops are to promote the good of the institution and have a right and duty to supervise the preservation and strengthening of their Catholic identity; the institution is to make periodical reports to the competent church authority on the university and its activities. Article 6 makes provisions for the pastoral ministry at the institution. Article 7 encourages cooperation among Catholic universities and between them and the programs of governments and other national and international organizations on behalf of justice, development, and progress. Articles 8 to 11 provide transitional norms for the application of these norms. The bishops of the United States in November 1999 authorized a set of norms for the application of Ex corde ecclesiae and sent these to Rome for approval.

Bibliography: For the text of Ex corde ecclesiae, see: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 83 (1991): 249–339 (Latin); Origins 20, no. 17 (October 4, 1990) (English); The Pope Speaks 36 (1991): 21–41 (English).

[J. A. KOMONCHAK]

EX MORE DOCTI MYSTICO

An office hymn which was traditionally prescribed for Matins during Lent until Passion Sunday. It is written in iambic dimeter and has been attributed to GREGORY THE GREAT. The author is preoccupied with the mystical meaning of the number 40 for the days of Lent, as was Gregory, especially in two of his "Homilies on the Gospels" (2.24.4 and 2.31.6). The eight strophes and doxology exhort the faithful to observe the fast of Lent. Perhaps the author had in mind the Benedictine Rule (49), where the monk is told during Lent to partake less of speech, food, drink, sleep, and amusement. A prayer for mercy is put on the lips of the assembly, asking that they may please God in this life and hereafter.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 2:83; 51:55, text. A. S. WAL-POLE, ed., Early Latin Hymns (Cambridge, Eng. 1922) 321–323. H. LAUSBERG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1312.

[M. M. BEYENKA]

EX OMNIBUS AFFLICTIONIBUS

A bull of PIUS V dated Oct. 1, 1567, that condemned the propositions attributed to Michel de Bay, or BAIUS (1513–1589), professor of the university Faculty of Theology at Louvain, Belgium, and to his followers. These propositions had not been numbered at the beginning, with the result that the authors divided them according to circumstances into 76, 79, 80, the division into 76 being the oldest and probably the best. The first 60 were taken, but not always literally, from the writings of Baius. The others must have come from his followers, but no reference is indicated and nowhere is Baius mentioned.

The rejection of these propositions was a rejection of the extreme formulas at which Baius had arrived by holding strictly to the vocabulary and the ideas of the Fathers, especially to those of St. Augustine, and by rejecting in a block all doctrinal development coming from scholastic theology. Thus, he was led to dangerous ambiguities particularly in the notions of natural and SUPER-NATURAL. For example, the condemnation of propositions 21 to 24 maintains the free and supernatural character of man's calling to the BEATIFIC VISION, and that of propositions five and six proscribes the idea that before the Fall man could naturally attain to eternal life. Also condemned were various formulas in which Baius seemed to reduce liberty to the simple absence of constraint, and others in which Baius expressed his exaggerated pessimism in regard to the consequences of original sin, maintaining that all the actions of unbelievers are sins and their virtues in reality vices, and also that free will, left to itself, can only sin. On the whole, these propositions treat difficult problems, and their exact interpretation raises complex questions that for a long time were violently debated among theologians. Moreover, the final clause, in which the propositions are qualified in block and in which the meaning changes considerably according to the position of the comma, provoked the famous controversy of the COMMA PIANUM. Contrary to common usage, this bull was not printed, but merely transmitted to the Faculty of Theology at Louvain. In 1569 Baius sent to Rome several apologies in which he acknowledged as his own only about 30 of the condemned propositions, which he furthermore claimed to be in accord with the doctrine of the Fathers; and in fact he did not really accept the censure. It was only in 1570 that he somewhat unwillingly signed a disavowal. In view of the cloudy situation, Gregory XIII thought it his duty to renew the condemnation issued by his predecessor. Hence, he reproved the same propositions in the bull, Provisionis nostrae, of Jan. 25, 1580, to which Baius submitted the following March 24. Later the bull, Ex omnibus, was renewed in the bull, In eminenti, of Urban VIII against Jansen in 1642 (date of signing).

See Also: ELEVATION OF MAN; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; JANSENISM.

Bibliography: H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖENMETZER (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 1901–80. H. DE LUBAC, Surnaturel: Études historiques (Paris 1946); Augustinisme et théologie moderne (Paris 1965).

[L. J. COGNET]

EX OPERE OPERANTIS

A technical term literally meaning "from the work of the doer," to be distinguished from EX OPERE OPERA-TO, which refers to the grace-conferring power inherent in the sacramental rite itself, as an action of Christ. Ex opere operantis refers to the role and value of the recipient's or minister's moral condition in causing or receiving sacramental grace.

Peter of Poitiers (d. 1205) first applied to baptism the distinction between the rite that is performed and the one who performs the rite. Graphically, he compares an action in the natural order to the sacramental action: "When the Jews put Christ to death their deed was evil; but the death of Christ was approved and willed by God" (Sententiarum libri quinque 1, c.16). The application of the principle to the Sacraments was logical, and soon followed. Innocent III (d. 1216) distinguished between sacrilegious action and sacramental celebration: "Although the action of the one who acts (opus operans) is sometimes unclean, yet always the act done (opus operatum) is clean" (De Sacro Altaris Mysterio 3.6). In the middle of the 13th century the two formulas were commonly used to point out the difference that exists between Christian Sacraments and Mosaic rites. Actually, the teaching behind the formulas was as old as the doctrine of the objective efficacy of Sacraments, especially of baptism and orders, which Augustine (d. 430) developed against DON-ATISM, which asserted that Sacraments administered by notoriously unworthy ministers were invalid.

In the 12th century theologians used the distinction to show that Mosaic rites (with the probable exception of circumcision) conferred grace upon the recipient according only to the measure of his faith and fervor, ex opere operantis; and that, on the contrary, Christian Sacraments confer grace ex opere operato upon the soul capable of receiving it. The Council of Trent (1545–63) defined the term ex opere operato in order to deny the Reformers' contention that Sacraments caused grace exactly as did the Mosaic rites, but it did not deny that the faith and fervor of the (adult) recipient condition the measure of grace received.

Ex opere operantis ecclesiae. Theologians commonly teach that the only limit to the measure of grace conferred ex opere operato is the degree of faith and fervor in the recipient. This limiting arises, ex opere operantis, from the measure of the recipient's cooperation at the time of receiving the rite.

In the 20th century, theologians began a discussion of the recipient's cooperation, specifically his genuine intention to participate together with the minister in the sacramental action, as a necessary element in perfecting a Sacrament as a practical sign of grace. This discussion enlarged the meaning of ex opere operantis, and is of particular value in determining precisely the active role of the laity in the offering of Holy Mass.

It should be added that the term is not to be confused another technical phrase, ex opere operantis Ecclesiae, that expresses the efficacy of strictly liturgical prayer, an effectiveness that is due to the action of the Church as the Mystical Body of Christ. Bibliography: P. L. HANLEY, The Life of the Mystical Body (Westminster, Md. 1961). C. O'NEIL, "The Role of the Recipient and Sacramental Signification," Thomist 21 (1958) 257–301, 508–540.

[P. L. HANLEY]

EX OPERE OPERATO

Scholastic theology employs ex opere operato (from the work worked) to distinguish what is accomplished by the minister of a sacrament from the activity of the minister, the opus operantis (the work of the one working). This distinction was drawn in order to locate the source of the sanctifying effect in the sacramental rite itself, and not in the holiness of the minister. The Council of Trent used this terminology in its Decree on the Sacraments, Session XIII (1547), canon B: "If anyone says that grace is not conferred ex opere operato through the sacraments of the new law . . . let that one be anathema." In the modern ecumenical context, it is worth repeating that Trent's use of ex opere operato, while it includes the idea that the efficacy of sacraments does not depend on the holiness of the minister, was primarily intended to oppose those who denied the objective mediation of grace through the sacraments of the Church. This limited use, however, was often overlooked by post-Tridentine Catholic School theology. As a result the theological content of ex opere operato was frequently equated with the valid administration of a sacrament.

Christ the Primordial Sacrament. One can begin with the idea that a sacrament, celebrated according to the prescription of the Church, is an objective, infallible offer of the grace signified. All that is needed for a "saving event" to take place is the openness on the part of an apt, and properly disposed, subject, for the reception of the sacramental grace. But this purely juridical interpretation of ex opere operato needs to be deepened theologically. Modern Catholic theologians work out the deeper dimension along the lines of THOMAS AQUINAS, who, in his later works, prefers to speak of the efficacy of the sacraments as derived "from the merit, or the passion of Christ," and who never uses ex opere operato in his Summa Theologiae. This approach is correct because a sacrament can be said to confer grace, or be efficacious, ex opere operato, only if it is an act of Christ himself, an authentic sacramental representation of the mystery of Christ's saving work, in and through the community that merits the title church of Christ (E. Schillebeeckx). However, frequently contemporary theologians are content to refer to Christ as the efficient instrumental cause of the sanctifying activity of the Father. This point of view, which stresses the downward movement of the selfcommunication of the Father through Christ in the Holy Spirit, needs to be broadened.

Christ is not only the primordial sacrament of the divine-human love of humanity and, therefore, the personal cause of the sanctification offered in the Sacraments of the Church. He is also the primordial sacrament of the divine-human love of the Father and, therefore, the reason why the prayer of the Church finds acceptance before the Father. Evidently both of these aspects of the sacramentality of Christ are involved in sacramental celebrations, a theme that is given some consideration in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. Moreover, they come into play in an order that corresponds to the sacramental activity of the Church.

Sacramental Incorporation. Sacramental celebrations signify some human and social situations into which the subject of the sacrament is being incorporated (e.g., membership in the Church through Baptism). But, for the eyes of faith, what is denoted is understood to connote a special mode of incorporation into the mystery of the Church: the life of faith in Christ. As social sacrament of salvation, the Church expresses this twofold meaning by reaching out to the subject through the symbolic gesture, and by the accompanying sacramental verbal formulas that explicitly refer to the deeper meaning of the activity. Both gesture and word express the desire of the Church for the sanctification of the subject, and are intended to evoke a corresponding desire in the subject.

As acts of the Church sacraments have an essentially epicletic orientation (see EPICLESIS). Some essential verbal formulas of the sacraments are explicit invocations addressed to God (e.g., ordination prayers). But even when the indicative, active form is used (e.g., "I baptize you . . ."), as act of the Church it is only understandable as a petition before God. However, the confidence that the Church manifests is grounded on the conviction of faith that what she does serves as transparency for what Christ is doing in and through the sacramental acts of His Church. Because Christ is the head of the Church, the symbolic action represents Christ reaching out to the subject, and the sacramental word is inserted by Christ himself into His "eternal intercession" before the Father.

When one adds to this consideration the witness of faith of the traditional churches of the East and West that the realization of the sacraments, and the sanctification of the subjects of sacraments, also depend on the work of the Holy Spirit, the full meaning of the term ex opere operato is made accessible. It can be stated in this way: sacramental celebrations are efficacious ex opere operato because the symbolic actions and intercessory prayer of the Church are the representation and actualization of the twofold aspect of the sacramentality of Christ. The personal source of the correspondence between the activity of the Church and the activity of Christ is the one Holy Spirit, whom Christ possesses in fullness and shares with His Church. Because the intercession of the Church, made in, with and through Christ the High Priest (sacrament of the divine-human love of the Father), in the power of the Holy Spirit, is always heard by the Father, sacramental celebrations are always the offer of the sanctifying Spirit, made by the Father through the Risen Lord (sacrament of the divine-human love of humanity), in accord with the signification of the sacramental signs instituted by Christ. Consequently, there is a sending of the Spirit by the Father through the Risen Lord to the apt subject, who is open in faith to receive the grace proper to the sacrament.

Bibliography: E. H. SCHILLEBEECKX, Christ, The Sacrament of the Encounter with God (New York 1963) 82–89. Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents, ed. A. FLANNERY (Collegeville 1975) 1–36.

[E. J. KILMARTIN]

EXARCH

Exarch, in Greek, ἕξαρχος, ruler, originally the title given the governor of a province called a diocese under Diocletian's division of the Eastern Prefecture (297). In the organizational development of the Church, patterned in conformity with the political divisions of the Roman Empire, bishops of such dioceses assumed in addition to the title of exarch expanded jurisdiction over those metropolitans within this political unit. In addition to those heads of sees who acquired the patriarchal title at the Council of Nicaea (325), the bishops of Ephesus, Caesarea, and Heraclea, capitals of the respective dioceses of Asia, Cappadocia and Pontus, and Thrace, functioned as exarchs. With the elevation of the See of Constantinople to a patriarchate consequent upon its becoming an imperial residence, conflict arose over the extent of the exarchs' jurisdiction. This was resolved at the Council of Chalcedon (c.9), which reduced their status to that of a metropolitan, permitting their retention of this honorary title and place in the order of precedence next after the five patriarchs. Although mentioned as late as the Council of 680, the office of exarch gradually diminished in importance in the Church's reorganization, being replaced in the West by an apostolic vicar and later primate; in the East it still retained its traditional place. Autocephalous churches, especially those of Cyprus, Ipek, Ochrida, and Trnovo, emphasizing their autonomy, used this title-at times even daring to usurp that of patriarch. In 1870 at the reconstitution of the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, its head, residing in Constantinople, took the title of exarch. Oriental Patriarchs on occasion appoint exarchs with subordinate bishops for semi-independent groups of their jurisdiction throughout the world. The present usage of the term exarch denoting an emissary explains the reason for its being applied even to a minor prelate assigned to a particular mission. Traditionally, Eastern Catholic canonical tradition recognized three kinds of exarchs: (1) those with a territory of their own; (2) apostolic exarchs; and (3) patriarchal or archiepiscopal exarchs who govern a territory not yet constituting a canonically erected diocese.

See Also: EXARCHY.

Bibliography: J. FARIS, *The Eastern Catholic Churches: Con*stitution and Governance according to the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (Brooklyn 1993). V. POSPISHIL, Eastern Catholic Church Law (Brooklyn, NY 1996).

[L. NEMEC]

EXARCHY

The term exarch denotes a delegate and was applied to various higher and lower dignities in the ecclesiastical hierarchy of the Eastern Churches. Exarchos was the official title given during the late Roman Empire to the governor of a civil diocese, which was divided into provinces. The ecclesiastical organization was formed parallel to this civil division of the Empire. The bishop was the superior of the paroikia, the metropolitan headed the eparchia, and the chief bishop of a civil diocese had the position of an exarch.

Besides those sees that later acquired patriarchal title and jurisdiction, namely, Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, exarchial jurisdiction was enjoyed by the metropolitans of Ephesus (Diocese of Asia), Caesarea of Cappadocia (Diocese of Pontus), and Heraclea (Diocese of Thrace). However, the bishop of the newly established imperial residence in Constantinople overshadowed them so completely that these exarchs vanished from the scene.

The dignity of supra-metropolitan exarch was revived repeatedly in the Orthodox churches. Orthodox patriarchs appoint exarchs, who have subordinate bishops, for semi-independent groups of their jurisdiction, e.g., the exarchs of the Russian Church in various parts of the world.

The indefinite meaning of the term exarch (delegate) was the reason for its application to other representatives of patriarchs, archbishops, and even bishops; in some places it is a minor honorary title for diocesan priests, conferred upon them by their bishop. The visitors of stauropegial convents, i.e., monasteries that are exempt from the jurisdiction of the local bishop and directly subject to the patriarch, are also called exarchs. They are usually appointed to this office in a permanent manner and supervise all the stauropegial monasteries within the patriarchate.

Historically, Eastern Catholic canonical tradition recognized three kinds of exarch: (1) exarch with a territory of his own, (2) apostolic exarch, and (3) patriarchal (archiepiscopal) exarch.

Independent exarch. The exarch with a territory of his own is equivalent to a territorial abbacy in the Latin canonical tradition and is the superior of an independent monastery (monasterium sui iuris). He is in charge of a territory separated from every other diocese, with his own clergy and people. An example is the Exarchial Monastery of the Byzantine Italian Basilian Fathers of St. Mary of Grottaferrata near Rome (Italy), founded by SS. Nilus and Bartholemew in 1004 (see GROTTAFERATA, MONASTERY OF). The exarch-archimandrite is entitled to wear episcopal insignia with the exception of the saccos.

Apostolic exarch. An apostolic exarchy is established outside the patriarchate where the erection of a diocese is not yet feasible. Traditionally, Apostolic exarchs corresponded to the vicars and prefects apostolic of the Latin rite. Due to emigration, groups of Eastern Catholics are now found in all continents, far from their native regions. If their number is sufficiently large, the Holy See might erect ecclesiastical provinces and dioceses, e.g., for the Ukrainians in Canada and the United States. If this is not yet possible, they may be organized in apostolic exarchies.

The apostolic exarchs govern an ecclesiastical territory that is not subject to a Patriarch, Metropolitan or Major Archbishop, when, because of the small number of faithful or for some other grave reason, eparchies (i.e., dioceses) are not established. Such an exarch enjoys the same rights and faculties as residential bishops.

Patriarchal (archiepiscopal) exarch. Such an exarch is appointed in patriarchates and archiepiscopates (i.e., a territory governed by an Oriental archbishop) for a region where an eparchy (diocese) is not yet established. The jurisdiction of this exarch is ordinary but vicarious; i.e., he rules the exarchy in virtue of his office in the name of the patriarch or archbishop major. He is appointed by the patriarch (archbishop) with the advice of the permanent synod of the patriarchate (archiepiscopate) and can be removed only with the consent of the same synod. His rights and duties are equivalent to those of the apostolic exarch, with the difference that he is entirely dependent on his patriarch or archbishop. He has the general jurisdiction of a bishop

Bibliography: J. FARIS, *The Eastern Catholic Churches: Con*stitution and Governance according to the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches (Brooklyn 1993). V. POSPISHIL, Eastern Catholic Church Law (Brooklyn, NY 1996).

[V. J. POSPISHIL/EDS.]

EXCLUDED MIDDLE, PRINCIPLE OF THE

The principle of the excluded middle is stated by AR-ISTOTLE: "There cannot be an intermediate between contradictions, but of one subject we must either affirm or deny any one predicate" (Meta. 1011b 23–24). His treatment of this PROPOSITION is in Book Γ of the Metaphysics, which is devoted largely to the manifestation and defense of the first principles of DEMONSTRATION.

Aristotle's Explanation. The proposition is made clear from the definitions of the true and the false, for it is false to say of what is that it is not, or of what is not that it is; and it is true to say of what is that it is, and of what is not that it is not. If anyone says something is, he either says something true or something false. If he is saying something true, the thing is; if he is saying something false, the thing is not. The same applies if he says something is not. Either the affirmation or the negation is true. The man who holds to an intermediate between contradictions does not grant that one must say of a being that it is or is not, nor of a nonbeing that it is or is not.

Contradictory Opposition. The basis for the principle of the excluded middle is found in the notion of contradictory opposites (see OPPOSITION). Things that are opposed as affirmation and negation are such that it is always necessary that one should be true but the other false (Cat. 13b 1-3). Since contradiction is a relation between terms opposed as affirmation and negation, it is an opposition between being and nonbeing; thus it makes no difference whether the subject actually exists or not. For example, it always is true or false that Socrates is ill. If Socrates actually exists, he is either ill or not. If he does not actually exist, it is false to say he is ill and true to say he is not ill, for he cannot be ill if he does not exist. Contradictory opposites are therefore quite different from contrary opposites that demand a common subject. The contradictory of "Socrates is ill" is not "Socrates is well," but "Socrates is not ill." Contradictory opposition is between being and nonbeing expressed in affirmative and negative statements; it is between being and nonbeing absolutely, and not within a genus. Either of the two opposites may be true or false, but not both true or both false at the same time.

Future Contingents. When two enunciations are in contradictory opposition, is it necessary that one be true and the other false? This question has concerned logicians and philosophers since the time of Aristotle (Interp. 18a 28–19b 4). His answer is that propositions about the past or the present must be true or false; likewise, for any universal proposition and its contradictory one must be true and the other false; but for a singular proposition about the future, the case is different. For propositions about the past or the present there is a state of affairs against which the truth or falsity of a proposition can be measured, and this is true regardless of whether the propositions are about necessary or contingent matter. But for singular propositions about the future, there is no state of affairs that can be enunciated truly or falsely. Although singular propositions in necessary or impossible matter do have a determinate truth or falsity, future singular propositions in contingent matter do not.

To illustrate his discussion, Aristotle used the now celebrated example of the sea battle that will or will not take place tomorrow (ibid. 18b 24). If it is true now that the sea battle will take place tomorrow and false that it will not take place, a deterministic position is assumed that eliminates CONTINGENCY and makes all events necessary. Aristotle rejects such a position, "for there is a difference between saying that that which is, when it is, must needs be, and simply saying that all that is must needs be, and similarly in the case of that which is not" (19a 24–27). Rather, he says that neither contradictory is determinately true or false now. This allows for no intermediate between "the sea battle will take place" and "the sea battle will not take place." One or the other of these contradictions will be true and the other false, but neither is so now. The reason lies in the fact that at present the sea battle, however likely it may be, exists only potentially, and there is a possibility that it will never actually come to be.

Other Interpretations. Because of their strict determinism, Stoics held the determinate truth or falsity of every proposition, eliminating the possibility of future contingents. EPICURUS, on the other hand, is reported by Cicero (De fato 21) to have denied that every proposition is true or false.

St. THOMAS AQUINAS, in a commentary that exceeds the limits of mere exposition, sheds considerable light on Aristotle's position by analyzing the reasons that account for contingency, namely, the potentiality inherent in matter and the freedom of the human will (In 1 perih. 13, 14, 15).

Some recent historians of logic have alleged that Aristotle called the principle of the excluded middle into question in that "he will not allow it to be valid for future contingent events" (Bocheński, 63) or that he tried to hold the principle of the excluded middle while denying the principle of bivalence (W. C. and M. Kneale, 47–48). The Kneales call the principle that every statement is true or false the principle of bivalence, and formulate the principle of excluded middle, "Either P or not-P," where "P" marks a gap into which a declarative sentence may be inserted." However, they regard the two principles as equivalent and consider Aristotle's treatment of singular future contingents a mistake. The Kneales' delineation of the mistake is too involved for condensation here; while they regard it as of considerable philosophical interest, they deem it of no logical importance.

Scholz (86–88), following Moritz Schlick, takes the position that "in every proposition there inheres truth or falsity as a timeless property." A statement such as "Event E will occur on such and such a day" is a timeless statement and is true or false now. But since the truth or falsity of that proposition cannot be calculated on the basis of propositions about present events, we cannot know whether the proposition is true until the point of time has passed. In his view the proposition is true whether we know it or not.

John Stuart Mill (183) denied that an assertion must be either true or false on the ground that there is a third possibility, the unmeaning. He said, for example, "Abracadabra is a second intention" is neither true nor false. F. H. BRADLEY (155) countered by pointing out that a proposition without meaning is no proposition, and that if it does mean anything, it is either true or false.

See Also: FIRST PRINCIPLES; CONTRADICTION, PRINCIPLE OF; TRUTH; FALSITY.

Bibliography: G. GIANNINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 4:1171–72. J. M. BALDWIN, ed., Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology, 3 v. in 4 (New York 1901–05; repr. Gloucester 1949–57). A. E. BABIN, The Theory of Opposition in Aristotle (Notre Dame, Ind. 1940). H. W. B. JOSEPH, An Introduction to Logic (2d rev. ed. Oxford 1916). L. S. STEBBING, A Modern Introduction to Logic (London 1930). W. C. and M. KNEALE, The Development of Logic (Oxford 1962). H. SCHOLZ, Concise History of Logic, tr. K. F. LEIDECKER (New York 1961). I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, A History of Formal Logic, tr. I. THOMAS (Notre Dame, Ind. 1961). F. H. BRADLEY, The Principles of Logic, 2 v. (2d rev. ed. London 1922) v.1. J. S. MILL, A System of Logic (New York 1904). N. RES-CHER, Studies in the History of Arabic Logic (Pittsburgh 1964) ch. 5.

[H. J. DULAC]

EXCOMMUNICATION

The term excommunication (excommunicatus ἀκοινώνητος) first appeared in Church documents in the fourth century. As the term suggests, excommunication involves a varying degree of "exclusion from the communion of the faithful" (1917 CIC c.2257.1). From the beginnings of Christianity the central realization and embodiment of "the communion of the faithful" has always been the Eucharistic Communion; hence it is from the Eucharist as the center of the common socio-mystical life of the faithful in Christ's Body, the Church, that the excommunicate is primarily excluded. This is the prime factor characterizing excommunication in all the stages of its historical development.

History

New Testament. Faced with the scandal of a gravely sinful brother who resisted all correction and rebuke, the New Testament $\dot{e}\kappa\kappa\lambda\eta\sigma$ (α was constrained to isolate such a sinner from its midst (1 Cor 5.2, 13), without necessarily taking away his membership in the community (see 1 Cor 5.11). The Church was, however, no holy remnant ruthlessly ridding itself of sinners (see Mt 13.28–30); rather it remained open to the return of the penitent sinner, so that the segregation of the obdurate sinner had a hopeful outlook (see 2 Thes 3.15; 2 Cor 2.5–11). Even when St. Paul uses a seemingly harsh curse formula, there is still the perspective of hope (see 1 Cor 5.4–5; 1 Tm 1.20).

Mt 18.15–18 is the classical locus in which the Church, after having vainly tried to turn a sinful brother from his ways, is presented as competent to dissociate the sinner from its midst by a judgment that is divinely ratified. If there can be a "binding" of the sinner in his sinful alienation from God and from God's people, there always remains the alternative of a "loosing" of the same sinner, providing he repents and heeds the voice of the Church (see BINDING AND LOOSING).

Patristic and Medieval Period. Two factors distinguish the penitential practice of the ancient Church from that of later ages. First, until about the sixth century the grave sinner was permitted to avail himself of the Church's sacramental penitential procedure only once in his lifetime. Second, the canonico-disciplinary phases of penance, imposed by ecclesiastical authority, were closely inserted into the strictly sacramental elements of penance in a unified procedure. The grave sinner, resolved to make his peace with God in the Church, presented himself to the bishop, who assigned him, by a liturgical excommunication, to a special category of Christians with a separate and juridically inferior status in the Church, i.e., to the class of penitents (ordo paenitentium), and imposed on him a varyingly protracted period of public penitential works. At the close of this period of onerous penance, during which the penitent was publicly cut off from the central life of the Church, the bishop lifted the liturgical excommunication, reconciling the penitent to God in the Church, and receiving him once again into communion with the Church, primarily into the Eucharistic life of the Church and then into a sharing in its whole common life. The excommunication of the sinner was thus assumed into the sacramental penitential process, being an integral part of the satisfaction performed in view of an ultimate reconciliation with God in the Church. The ancient Church accordingly wished as little dissociation as possible between what today we would call the internal and the external forums, between sacramental penance and the canonical penalty of excommunication.

The decisive step in the widespread development of a canonical excommunication separated from sacramental penance was the gradual introduction, starting in the sixth and seventh centuries, of a sacramental penitential procedure that was repeatable. Once it became possible for the grave sinner to approach the Sacrament of Penance more than once, then inevitably a more simplified procedure had to be introduced into sacramental penance; and by about the 11th to the 12th centuries the external forms of the administration of Penance had become much the same as we know them today. One result of this development was the gradual, clear emergence, from the 7th century onward, of a canonical disciplinary excommunication, dissociated from its former prominent place within sacramental penance, and as a consequence, applied, not to repentant, but to impenitent sinners. By the high Middle Ages, and for centuries afterward, the interior and exterior forums were, both in theory and in practice, less intimately associated than in patristic times. See St. Thomas, In 4 sent. 18.2.2 sol. 1.

Conclusion. Once it has become clear that any culpable dissociation from the full visible common life of the Church marks some measure of disruption of the full interior life of grace in the Body of the Lord, there is less likelihood of an excessive separation of delict and sin, and of excommunication and penance. Just as the theology of sacramental penance has regained a firmer ecclesial dimension in that the res et sacramentum of the Sacrament is often described as peace with the Church, so too canonical excommunication can be seen in this orientation as a firmer delineation of the sinner's alienation from full communion, and the lifting of the censure can be placed as a preliminary stage to the sacramental absolution conferring on the repentant sinner that peace with the Church which means peace with God.

See Also: ANATHEMA; PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF; SCHISM; SOCIETY (CHURCH AS); VISIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

Bibliography: B. POSCHMANN, Penance and the Anointing of the Sick, tr. and rev. F. COURTNEY (New York 1964). P. ANCIAUX, The Sacrament of Penance (New York 1962). W. DOSKOCIL, Der Bann in der Urkirche (Munich 1958). K. RAHNER, De paenitentia: Tractatus historico-dogmaticus (3d ed. Innsbruck 1955).

[F. X. LAWLOR]

Canon Law

Breaches of ecclesial faith or order may lead to the declaration or imposition of ecclesiastical penalties. Accordingly, Church members are deprived of certain spiritual or temporal goods of the Church, either temporarily or permanently. Expiatory penalties highlight the ecclesial goods of restoring community order, repairing scandal, and precluding further disciplinary violations. Censures or so-called medicinal penalties are geared much more toward reconciling the offending party with the community.

The most ecclesially significant censure is excommunication, described in the 1917 code as excluding one from the communion of the faithful and entailing various inseparable effects (cc. 2257–2267). The present law does not define this most serious penalty, but simply specifies its inseparable effects, i.e., various prohibitions to one's involvement in the Church's public life (c. 1331). The first part of this canon indicates the effects of any excommunication, and the second describes specific effects of excommunication when there has been a formal intervention by ecclesiastical authority. This may involve either administrative procedure or judicial process before a collegiate court of three judges (c. 1425n1, 2).

An intervention may involve a declaration that an automatic excommunication (latae sententiae) has been incurred; or it may entail the infliction of a so-called ferendae sententiae excommunication. The intervention of Church authority lends a special solemnity to the legal situation and results in more serious restrictions on the penalized party, e.g., invalidity and not simply illiceity of prohibited acts of ecclesiastical governance.

Some restrictions affecting the excommunicated person are liturgical in character, e.g., prohibition of active ministerial participation in the Eucharist and other acts of public worship and prohibition of celebrating the sacraments or sacramentals or of receiving the sacraments. During the code revision process it had been proposed to exempt penance and anointing from the aforementioned prohibition, but it was finally decided that the excommunicated person needed to have the penalty remitted before receiving any sacraments. Some restrictions flowing from excommunication are governmental in nature, e.g., prohibitions of holding various ecclesiastical offices, exercising various ministries or functions, or positing acts of governance. If an excommunication has been formally inflicted or declared, such a person is also barred from enjoying privileges already acquired, validly acquiring any ecclesiastical dignity, office, or function, and receiving certain ecclesiastical income.

The current law is somewhat circumspect about establishing censures, especially excommunication; such penalties should be reserved for the most serious disciplinary violations (cc. 1318;1349). Not surprisingly the law notably reduces the number of excommunications specified in the 1917 code. Nine ecclesiastical offenses may make a guilty party liable to an excommunication; seven involve latae sententiae or automatic penalties; two entail ferendae sententiae penalties. The following offenses may lead to a latae sententiae excommunication: apostasy, heresy, schism (c. 1364nl); violation of sacred species (c. 1367); physical attack on the pope (1370); absolution of an accomplice (c. 1378nl); unauthorized episcopal consecration (c. 1382); direct violation of confessional seat by confessor (c. 1388n2); and procuring of an abortion (c. 1398). Finally two offenses may warrant a ferendae sententiae excommunication: pretended celebration of Eucharist or conferral of sacramental absolution by one not a priest (c. 1378); and violation of the confessional seal by an interpreter or those other than confessor (c. 1388n2).

Bibliography: T. GREEN, "Book VI: Sanctions in the Church," J. CORIDEN, et al., eds., The Code of Canon Law: A Text and Commentary (New York 1985) 906–907; 932.

[T. J. GREEN]

EXEGESIS, BIBLICAL

By Biblical exegesis is meant the exposition of a passage or a book of the Sacred Scriptures. After an introductory section treating of the nature and forms of Biblical exegesis, this article offers an account of its history to show how the Bible was interpreted throughout the centuries.

Since the Bible as a divinely inspired book is a unique work of literature, its exegesis differs in many respects from the interpretation of other ancient documents.

Nature. On the one hand, the Sacred Scriptures are the products of many human authors who lived at various times over at least a millennium and wrote in several different literary genres; on the other hand, all the Scriptures were written under divine inspiration and so have God as their principal author. Therefore, Biblical exegesis employs not only the sciences that are used in the study of other ancient documents that come from a culture differing considerably from the modern, such as philology, history, archeology, and so forth, but also the theological disciplines that enable the exegete to obtain a deeper understanding of God's word and revelation as contained in the Scriptures. A synthesis of the theological exegesis of the Bible forms the basis of BIBLICAL THEOLOGY. Sciences that are auxiliary to Biblical exegesis are the rules of interpretation or Biblical hermeneutics (see section 3, below) and the study of each book as a whole, which is the subject of biblical introductions.

Forms. Even a translation of the Scriptures is, to a certain extent, a form of exegesis; for unless a version is extremely literal, it involves a considerable amount of interpretation in the sense of explanation. The more free or paraphrastic a translation is, the more exegetical it is. Short exegetical notes, usually written on the margin of the page of a Bible, are known as Biblical GLOSSES. In former times an exegetical note, especially if rather long, was known as a SCHOLIUM. A collection of exegetical notes excerpted from the writings of the Church Fathers form so-called Biblical CATENAE.

The fullest form, however, of Biblical exegesis is that of biblical commentaries. The scope of a strictly scientific commentary is to set forth as faithfully as possible the thought of the author by using all available scientific means insofar as they apply, such as textual criticism, literary criticism (to ascertain the specific type of literary genre in which the book is written; see FORM CRITICISM, BIBLICAL), philology (see BIBLICAL LANGUAGES), geography (see PALESTINE), history, and so forth. But since every book of the Bible is not only a human document but also a record of God's revelation, a genuine commentary should set forth also the religious message or KERYGMA of the book. Moralizing conclusions, however, that do not flow directly from the Biblical text belong to HOMILETICS rather than to exegesis. In the Middle Ages such moralizing notes were often called postils or in Latin postillae, from the full phrase post illa verba textus (after the words of the text).

Bibliography: R. SCHNACKENBURG and K. H. SCHELKE, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg, 1957–66) 3:1273–74. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1069–71.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

History of Exegesis

In the various periods of history, ever since the Bible was accepted as the inspired word of God, men have endeavored to explain and interpret its meaning through what is known as Biblical exegesis. But every age has had its own characteristic exegesis.

EXEGESIS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Modern stress on the essential unity of the Bible has drawn attention to the necessity of understanding how and to what extent the OT is used in the NT. The reader of any Bible edited with copious marginal references to OT texts knows how extensively NT writers cite the OT directly or indirectly.

Quotations from the Old Testament. In the NT there are more than 200 direct quotations from the OT, more than half of which, 118, are found in the Pauline Epistles (see L. Venard, Guide to the Bible [Tournai-New York 1951-55, rev. and enl. 1960] 1:679). If references of all kinds are counted, the total number is about 350, of which about 300 are cited according to the Septuagint (LXX) version. Matthew's manner of quoting the OT is noteworthy; when he is using Greek sources (i.e., when he depends on Mark) he retains their Greek wording; when working independently, he generally quotes an OT text according to the Hebrew, though on occasion the influence of the LXX can be traced. For example, in Mt 21.16 Psalm 8.3 is cited according to the LXX for apologetic reasons; see A. Wikenhauser, New Testament Introduction, tr. J. Cunningham (New York 1958) 195. Except for the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who always quotes the LXX exactly, most NT authors show little concern for exactness in their quotations. Their practice of free rendering of OT texts must not be ascribed to memory lapses, but rather to common literary custom or, as in many Pauline texts, to an exegetical purpose; see E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the OT (London 1957) 14-15. Some NT writers use interesting combinations in their OT quotations. Paul, for instance, uses three types of combined texts: (1) OT texts strung together to form a single quotation [e.g., Rom 3.10-18 is composed of Ps 13(14).1-3; 5.10; 139(140).4; 9B(10).7; Is 59.7-8; Ps 35(36).2]; (2) chain quotations or hāraz (e.g., Rom 9.25-29); (3) looser midrashic commentary (e.g., Romans ch. 9-11; Galatians ch. 3). See Ellis, op. cit., 11, 186 for charts of Pauline combinations.

Interpretations of Old Testament Passages. The NT interpretation of the OT reveals the following characteristics: (1) the allegorical method, so venerated by interpreters of ancient literature and so extensively used by the Alexandrian Jew Philo, is employed only infrequently by NT writers. Paul expressly says that his interpretation of the story of HAGAR and ISHMAEL (Gn 21.9-21) is by way of allegory (Gal 4.21-31). The story of Melchizedek (Gn 14.18-20) receives similar treatment in Heb 7.1-10. Such examples, however, are rare. The allegorical method is not characteristic of NT interpretation of OT texts. (2) Though their interpretations were generally literal in the wide sense of being based on the literal meaning of the OT text, NT writers exercised a great deal of freedom with respect to the original historical sense of the OT text quoted. Nevertheless, these writers were always conscious of the OT as history, and it is not likely that they would ever be unmindful of the historical setting of the OT texts they used; see C. H. Dodd, The Old Testament in the New (Philadelphia 1963) 8. (3) Literary allusions to OT words, phraseology, and imagery abound, reflecting the NT writer's familiarity with the OT. (4) OT texts are sometimes cited by way of illustration or analogy, as Dt 21.23 in Gal 3.13. (5) OT texts, especially from the Prophets, are sometimes cited as direct proof of a NT writer's argument. Such is the use of the Servant of the Lord Oracles from Is 42.1–4; 49.1–7; 50.4–11; 52.13–53.12 (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE).

For St. Paul's exegetical method and relation to rabbinical exegesis, see especially: W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (London 1948, rev. ed. 1955, repr. 1964) and J. Bonsirven, Exégèse rabbinique et exégèse paulinienne (Paris 1939). From his study of the NT writers use of the OT, C. H. Dodd [According to the Scriptures (London 1952)] concludes that individual passages cited are often only pointers to the OT total context, which is really the basis of the argument.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

JEWISH EXEGESIS

A natural division of the Jewish exegesis of the OT is between that of the Talmudic period (from the beginning of the 1st to the end of the 8th Christian century) and that of the Middle Ages (from c. 800 to c. 1300).

Talmudic Period. The object of the rabbinical exegesis from the 1st century B.C. to the end of the 8th Christian century was twofold: (1) to determine precisely the true meaning of the text, and (2) to establish the Biblical basis for the HALAKAH or system of jurisprudence composed of traditional legal decisions, commandments of the ancient Fathers, and prescriptions of the Scribes, and to support the HAGGADAH or nonjuridical interpretations and traditions forming an immense literature that was historical, folkloristic, and homiletic in character (see A. Vincent, 42-69; J. Bonsirven, Dictionnaire de la Bible suppl. ed. L. Pirot, et al. [Paris] 4:561-569; and A. Robert and A. Tricot, Guide to the Bible [Tournai-New York 1951-55] 684-693, especially the translator's notes). To achieve the first object required a literal exegesis, and in fact this became characteristic of Jewish juridical commentaries of the 2nd century of the Christian Era. However, the use of texts as proofs sometimes led to an abuse of the literal sense.

Jewish exegesis is found in a great body of rabbinical literature, which is composed of the following: (1) the MISHNAH and its additions in the TOSEPHTA (explanatory notes on oral traditions not included in the Mishnah); (2) the GEMARAH, written in Aramaic, which commented on, applied, and widely extended the teaching of the Mish-nah, as well as incorporating non-Mishnah material; and (3) the midrashim (see MIDRASHIC LITERATURE), which were rabbinical commentaries on either the legal texts of the Bible (halakah) or on the historical or moral texts (haggadah). The Mishnah and its commentary, the Gemarah, comprise the TALMUD. See Vincent, 54; and A. Robert and A. Tricot, Guide to the Bible, rev. and enl. ed. (Tournai–New York 1960) 1:685–687, footnotes.

The Torah (Mosaic Law) was always considered to be the basis of all prescriptions applied to new circumstances of Jewish life, no matter how far removed from the Law these appeared to be. They were linked to the Law by certain logical rules. Hillel had these seven: (1) from the less to the greater and from the simple to the difficult, (2) from like to like by analogy, (3) according to one passage in the Law, (4) according to two passages in the Law, (5) from the general to the particular and from the particular to the general, (6) explanation of one text by another, and (7) explanation of a text by the context. Rabbi Ishmael ben Elisha (d. c. 135) increased these seven to 13; to Rabbi Eliezer ben Yose (d. c. 150) 32 are attributed. See Vincent, 46. In spite of its well-known defects, Talmudic exegesis contains much that is of permanent value to Biblical scholarship, as some of the early Fathers, as well as the scholastic and Reformation exegetes, were well aware. Historians of exegesis are not unmindful of the contribution of early rabbinical exegesis to the treasury of Christian interpretation.

Middle Ages. Biblical exegesis in the strict sense, as distinct from the use that the Talmudic rabbis made of the Bible, began among the Jews in the 9th century primarily as a reaction against the Karaites, a Jewish sect that arose toward the end of the 8th century. The Karaites rejected the traditional teachings of the Talmud and demanded a return to the Bible understood in the literal sense. The orthodox rabbis were therefore forced, in defense of traditional Judaism, to study the Hebrew Scriptures and explain their literal sense $(p^{e}\check{s}^{-t})$ in conformity with orthodox Judaism. A contributing factor was the contact that the rabbis of the time made with Arabic scholars, particularly in Spain, whose grammatical and lexicographical studies in connection with the study of the QUR'AN led the Jewish scholars to make similar studies of the Hebrew Bible. An additional reason for the improvement in Jewish exegesis in the Middle Ages was the growing interest among Jews as well as among Muslims and Christians in Aristotelian philosophy, which led to a more rational method in the study of the Sacred Scriptures.

The pioneer of the new Jewish exegesis was the archopponent of the Karaites, Gaon SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH (822–942). The study of the Scriptures was only one of his many fields of interest, but here, besides his Arabic translation of the Bible, he produced the first Hebrew dictionary and the first Hebrew grammar. In the East, however, where he lived, he had no scholarly successors. His influence was felt, instead, in Spain and later in France. Spanish Jewry of the Middle Ages had several important Hebrew philologists, such as Menachem ben Saruk (c. 910–c. 970), Dunash ben Labrat (c. 920–c. 990), Judah ben David Hayyuj (c. 940–c. 1010), and especially Jonah Marinus (Abū'l Walīd Merwān Ibn-Janah; c. 990–c. 1050), the greatest Hebrew grammarian of the Middle Ages.

The medieval Jewish exegetes built on the work of these philologists. The most important of the commentators in Spain was Abraham ben Meïr IBN EZRA (c. 1092-1167). On the whole, his Biblical commentaries are based on the literal sense, often arrived at by philological or grammatical arguments. A product of the Spanish school, though he spent most of his life in Egypt, was the renowned Jewish scholar MAIMONIDES (Moses ben Maimon; 1135–1204). Although he wrote no commentary, in his works, particularly his Guide to the Perplexed, he explained many Biblical passages according to philosophical or even rationalistic principles. The influence of the Jewish exegetes of Spain soon reached France. At Troyes in northern France the renowned Talmudist, RASHI (Rabbi Shelomoh ben Yishaq; 1041-1105), produced popular commentaries on almost all the books of the Hebrew Bible. The commentaries of his grandson, Samuel ben Meïr, known also as Rashbam (c. 1085-c. 1160), though more diffused, are of greater scientific value. At Narbonne in southern France the Kimchi (Kimhi) family, Joseph (c. 1105-c. 1170) and his sons Moses (d. 1190) and particularly David (c. 1160-1235), wrote Biblical commentaries that are still valuable for their philological and grammatical observations. The commentaries of the Spanish Jewish scholar, NAHMANIDES (Moses ben Nahman, known also as Ramban; c. 1195-c. 1270), though containing much valuable material, indulge too often in mystical, cabalistic speculations. After the 13th century medieval Jewish exegesis fell almost completely under the spell of the CABALA, and the works of this period are thus practically worthless from an exegetical viewpoint. But the writings of the earlier Jewish lexicographers, grammarians, and exegetes proved extremely useful to the Christian Hebraists of the later Middle Ages and the Renaissance [see HEBREW STUDIES (IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH)], and they still merit study by modern Biblical scholars.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

PATRISTIC EXEGESIS

The history of exegesis in the patristic period (extending to the beginning of the 7th century) can best be treated by considering separately the Fathers before Origen, Origen, the school of Alexandria, the school of Antioch, and the Latin Fathers (see PATRISTIC STUDIES).

Before Origen. The Apostolic Fathers left no Biblical exegesis in the strict sense. They used the Biblical text either to support their exhortations to lead a fruitful Christian life or, as in the case of Pope St. CLEMENT I in his First Epistle to the Corinthians (c. A.D. 98), to form a spiritual mosaic of scriptural texts. Generally, the Apostolic Fathers did not attempt to prove their teaching from Biblical texts. A notable exception, however, was the author of the Epistle of BARNABAS, who had recourse to an allegorical and typical interpretation of the OT to prove that the Jews failed to understand properly God's will and the Mosaic Law, even its clearest precepts; for example, God's inspired precept regarding abstinence from certain meats really commanded the Jews to flee from the particular vices signified by impure animals (see G. Bardy, Guide to the Bible, [Tournai-New York 1951-55; v.1, rev. and enl. 1960] 1:695). The Christians, said the author, were the first to understand the OT properly.

The Apologists of the 2nd century, in addressing unbelievers, could hardly appeal to the OT as proofs of their teaching but had to be content to urge the antiquity of the OT over pagan works. Although it was not characteristic of the Apologists, St. JUSTIN MARTYR (d. c. 165) used arguments from the Prophets effectively in both his first Apology and his Dialogue Against Trypho. Secondcentury heretics attacked this type of proof by trying to underscore the apparent contradictions between the teaching of the OT and that of Jesus; hence the origin of Marcion's Antithesis and Apelles's Syllogisms. St. IRENAEUS (c. 140-c. 202) in his Adversus Haereses and TERTULLIAN (c. 160-c. 230) in his Contra Marcionem and in other works defended the OT against the heretics. Heracleon (2nd century), a Gnostic, wrote the oldest commentary on St. John, using principally the allegorical method. Ptolemy, another Gnostic, in a Letter to Flora, was probably the first one to attempt to place exegesis on a firm, scientific foundation. (For the light shed on Gnosticism by the discovery of numerous Coptic texts near Nag' Hammâdi in Egypt, see CHENOBOSKION, GNOSTIC TEXTS OF.)

Origen. The first Biblical scholar to study critically the LXX was Origen (c. 185–c. 254), one of the most important figures in the early history of exegesis (see ORIGEN AND ORIGENISM). His many exegetical writings appear in scholia (simple notes on difficult or obscure passages; see SCHOLIUM), commentaries, and homilies. He wrote scholia on the first four books of the Pentateuch, on Isa-iah, Ecclesiastes, the Psalms, Matthew, John, Galatians, and Revelation. He commented on Genesis ch. 1–4, on several Psalms, twice on the Canticle of Canticles, and on Matthew, Luke, John, and the Pauline Epistles except 1 and 2 Corinthians and Timothy. In 1941 at Tura, a few miles south of Cairo, a papyrus containing fragments of the original Greek of Origen's commentary on Romans was discovered. His homilies, about 200 of which have been preserved, were delivered at Caesarea in Palestine.

Unlike his predecessors, Origen set down his ideas on hermeneutics, especially in the fourth book of his De principiis. Applying Plato's threefold distinction of body, soul, and spirit to the senses of Scripture, Origen taught that Holy Scripture contained (1) a corporeal or historical sense, which seems to be simply the ordinary proper literal and historical sense that the Biblical text directly conveys; (2) the psychic or moral sense, generally ignored by Origen in practice, which seems to be concerned with moral correction and is often indistinguishable from (3) the spiritual sense, which embraces all other senses that can be derived from the Biblical text. Origen never claimed that all Scripture contained this threefold sense. He believed that it was possible for the sacred author to err, on rare occasions, regarding the corporeal sense, which would then have to be rejected. Again, allegory was not present in every text. Origen thought that the corporeal sense was sufficient for the needs of the simple faithful, but that the perfect sought a deeper meaning hidden beneath the words. At times his allegory is exaggerated, but he made a permanent contribution to textual criticism, typology, and the allegorical method which was to characterize the exegetical school of Alexandria.

School of Alexandria. The foundation of this first Christian theological school (see ALEXANDRIA, SCHOOL OF) is commonly attributed to St. PANTAENUS, of whom very little is known. He was born in Sicily and became a convert to Christianity from Stoicism and taught at the exegetical school of Alexandria toward the end of the 2nd century (c. 180).

Clement, Dionysius, and Eusebius. Pantaenus was succeeded by his pupil CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 150–c. 215), a scholar of vast erudition, who was strongly influenced in his exegetical method by the allegorical one of Philo. Clement believed that it was of the very nature of higher truths that they should be communicated only through symbols. He acknowledged three senses of Scripture: the literal, the moral, and the prophetical or allegorical. He believed that all Scripture must be interpreted allegorically. His major works, Stromata, Paedagogus, and Protrepticus are remarkable for their wealth of Biblical erudition.

St. DIONYSIUS (c. 190–265), Bishop of Alexandria from 247 to 265, stated his exceptical principles in a work entitled On the Promises, written in response to an attack on the allegorists by a certain Bishop Nepos. St. Dionysius confessed that much in Revelation was beyond his comprehension, but he did not doubt that it contained many profound and hidden senses. It seems that Dionysius wrote commentaries also on Ecclesiastes and Luke.

EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (c. 260–c. 339) as a historian was inclined to the literal sense in his exegesis, but he had received training in the allegorical method from PAM-PHILUS (d. 310), a pupil of Origen. In his commentaries on Isaiah, the Psalms, and Luke, Eusebius was generally free from allegorical exaggerations.

Athanasius and Didymus. Of the works of St. ATHA-NASIUS (c. 295–373), who was more a defender of orthodoxy and a shepherd of souls than a professional exegete, we have only fragments, a commentary on the Psalms, and a little work titled Interpretation of the Psalms, which reveals his ideas on how to profit best from a prayerful study of the Psalter.

DIDYMUS THE BLIND (c. 313-c. 398), for many years the head of the school of Alexandria, wrote commentaries on a large number of the books of the OT and the NT, which were highly praised by St. Jerome. The fraction of these commentaries that has been preserved reveals these characteristics: there are two senses of Scripture, the literal and the spiritual; the OT must be interpreted allegorically and, whenever possible, messianically, if it is to be fully understood: his interpretation of the NT is generally according to the literal sense. As a true disciple of Origen, Didymus had learned from experience to control prudently all allegorical applications. G. Bardy (A. Robert and A. Tricot, Guide to the Bible, rev. and enl. [Tournai-New York 1960] 1:700) suggests that the commentaries of Didymus on Genesis, Job, and Zechariah have apparently been recovered through the discovery of the papyri at Tura (see above).

Cappadocian Fathers. Among the great Cappadocians who were strongly influenced by Origen and the Alexandrians were St. BASIL (c. 329-379), St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (c. 330-c. 390), and St. GREGORY OF NYSSA (c. 335–394), the younger brother of Basil. St. Basil used Scripture primarily for the instruction and edification of the faithful. His homilies On the Hexameron as well as those on various Psalms reflect his intention to use the Bible to nourish the spiritual life of his hearers. St. Gregory of Nazianzus used Scripture in much the same fashion. He was above all else a theologian, and he treated the Scriptures primarily as a locus theologicus in his conflicts with the Arians and Apollinarists. The finest exegete of all the Cappadocians was the highly gifted St. Gregory of Nyssa. Although he was an allegorist to the core, he nevertheless knew how to use effectively the literal sense when necessary, e.g., in his De hominis opificio and Explicatio Apologetica in Hexaemeron. His other works include homilies on Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, the Lord's Prayer, and the Beatitudes, as well as a homily on the titles of the Psalms, in which he observes that Holy Scripture does not narrate historical facts for their own sakes but in order to teach man how to live virtuously.

Cyril. St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (d. 444), the great opponent of the Nestorians, was a thoroughgoing allegorist in both his Adoration and Worship in Spirit and Truth and Glaphyra. The former was written to prove the complete harmony between the OT and the NT, whereas the latter interpreted typically (especially with regard to the person of Christ) passages selected from the Pentateuch. In his commentaries on Isaiah and the Minor Prophets, Cyril leans more toward the historical literal sense, but not always with complete success. His commentary on St. John's Gospel is concerned mainly with doctrinal content and the refutation of heresy.

School of Antioch. The foundation of the Antiochian school (see ANTIOCH, SCHOOL OF) at the end of the 3rd century is generally attributed to St. LUCIAN OF ANTIOCH (c. 240-317), famous for his role in establishing the Greek textus receptus. We know nothing of the exegesis of Lucian. The school's history may be divided into three periods: (1) From Lucian to the coming of Diodore of Tarsus (i.e., from c. 280 to 360), (2) from Diodore to Theodore of Mopsuestia (i.e., from 360 to 428), and (3) the period of decline (i.e., from 428 to 500). The exegetical principles of Antioch were directly opposed to those of its rival, Alexandria. Antioch insisted upon expounding the literal and historical meaning of the text. The typical sense (theoria) was acknowledged and carefully determined. The allegorical method of Alexandria found little welcome at Antioch.

The following are the more important Antiochians: St. EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH (d. c. 335), in his On the Witch of Endor, attacked the allegorical method of Origen. DIODORE OF TARSUS (c. 330-c. 392), the teacher of St. John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia and one of the most illustrious of the Antiochians, wrote many exegetical works on the books of the OT and the NT. His exegesis is strictly literal, though he accepts the typical when it is well founded upon the literal and historical sense. The exegesis of St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (c. 349-407) is found chiefly in this great preacher's homilies. He never formulated any rules of interpretation, but he accepted the literal sense, both proper and improper (i.e., allegorical) and the typical. He was concerned primarily with what he could draw from the sacred text for the good of souls.

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (d. 428) is the bestknown Biblical pupil of Diodore. The Council of CON- STANTINOPLE II (553) condemned some of Theodore's opinions on the nature of inspiration and the books to be excluded from the Canon and his restriction of the number of messianic Psalms to four [i.e., Psalm 2; 8; 44 (45); 109 (110)]. Even today it is difficult to evaluate properly his exegetical works. He is well known for his boldness and strict adherence to the literal and historical sense. He explained his exegetical principles in two works now lost: De allegoria et historia and De perfectione operum contra allegoricos. (But on these works see the translator's note three in A. Robert and A. Tricot, Guide to the Bible [Tournai-New York 1960] 1:702.) On the exegetical method of Theodore of Mopsuestia see especially the two works of R. Devreese: "La Méthode exégètique de Theodore de Mopsueste," Revue biblique 53 (1946) 207-241, and Essai sur Theodore de Mopsueste, Studi e Testi 141 (1948).

THEODORET OF CYR (d. before 466) deserves special mention for his solid interpretation of the Scriptures, which had enduring popularity. He claimed no originality but composed his commentaries only after assiduously studying the best of patristic exegesis. But he was, in fact, far more than a mere copyist and compiler. His many works were often cited in the Biblical CATENAE as authoritative. Faithful to the Antiochian school, he was principally concerned with the literal sense; yet a good deal of solid typology is often expounded in his works. He wrote commentaries on the Psalms, on the Song of Songs, and on all the Prophets, and he considered special questions on the Octateuch and the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles. His exposition of the Pauline Epistles is considered by some to be second only to that made by St. John Chrysostom. Theodoret was the last of the great Antiochians.

Others associated with the School of Antioch were: St. EPHREM THE SYRIAN (c. 306–373), who wrote commentaries in Syriac on all the books of the Bible; APOLLI-NARIS OF LAODICEA (d. c. 390); SEVERIAN OF GABALA (d. after 408); and Polychronius of Apamea (d. c. 430), the brother of Theodore of Mopsuestia. ADRIANUS (fl. 1st half of the 5th century) composed an Introduction to Holy Scripture that set forth the principles of the Antiochians. The insistence of the Antiochians on the historical literal sense proved to be the correct position for sound exegesis according to the mind of the inspired author.

Latin Fathers. The exceptical principles of both Antioch and Alexandria found adherents among commentators of the West. Since no exceptical schools existed there during the patristic period, the following order of authors is simply chronological. TERTULLIAN (d. after 220), who gave the West its theological Latin, wrote no commentaries on Sacred Scripture, but he frequently interpreted Biblical texts in his writings, generally in the literal sense. St. HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME (d. c. 236) wrote many works in Greek that exhibit Alexandrian influence. One would expect allegory in his commentary on the Canticle of Canticles, but it appears also in his work on Daniel. St. VICTORINUS OF PETTAU (d. c. 303) commented on many books of the OT and the NT. However, only his work on the Apocalypse has survived. The influence of Origen is reflected also in the works of St. HILARY OF POITIERS (d. 367), whose exegesis is strongly allegorical. A commentary of his on Matthew and another on the Psalms (partly preserved) are extant. A part of his Tractatus mysteriorum, a work on OT prophecies, was recovered in 1887. St. AMBROSE (d. 397) composed no commentaries in the strict sense on the books of the Bible. His exegesis, found chiefly in his many homilies on various books of the OT and NT, is allegorical and well balanced, and it reflects the preacher's concern for the formation and salvation of souls.

St. JEROME (d. 419 or 420) is the patron of Biblical studies. His Latin translation of the Bible, his many commentaries on the OT and NT books, especially on the prophetical books, and his knowledge of the principal Biblical languages and of the country and customs of the Holy Land itself have merited for him a special place in the history of Biblical studies. His exegesis, at first strongly allegorical, became more and more literal. We have his commentaries on Ecclesiastes and the Prophets in the OT and on Matthew, Galatians, Ephesians, Titus, and Philippians in the NT. An unknown author referred to as AMBROSIASTER or Pseudo-Ambrose composed an excellent literal commentary on the Pauline Epistles c. A.D. 380, probably at Rome. Tyconius the Donatist wrote the first Latin treatise on Biblical HERMENEUTICS, Liber Regularum, c. A.D. 370.

St. AUGUSTINE (d. 430) used allegorical and mystical interpretations in his preaching, but he preferred literal exegesis in his theological writings. Though he himself was not well equipped for scientific exegesis, he insisted upon the necessity of learning, and especially of philological training, for the proper study of the written word of God. He interpreted the first few chapters of Genesis four times: De Genesi contra Manichaeos libri 2 (c. 389); De Genesi ad litteram imperfectus liber (c. 393), more literal than the previous work; the story of creation, allegorically interpreted, in the last three books of his Confessions (c. 400); and De Genesi ad litteram libri 12 (c. 401), his major work on Genesis. Other important exegetical works of Augustine include: several books of Quaestiones and Locutiones on the Heptateuch; Enarrationes in Psalmos, probably his best exegetical work; De consensu Evangeliorum, a study of parallel passages in the Gospels; Quaestiones on the Gospels and on certain texts in Romans; and (in treatises or homilies) the Sermon on the Mount, the Gospel of St. John, Galatians, and the beginning of Romans. In his De doctrina christiana he set forth his ideas on the nature of exegesis and on the relation of Scripture to theology.

Worthy of mention are also St. PETER CHRYSOLOGUS (d. c. 450), who expounded allegorically many NT passages in 176 homilies; Cassiodorus (d. c. 580), who interpreted the Psalms and the NT literally; and the long influential St. GREGORY THE GREAT (d. 604), who interpreted allegorically Job (Moralia), Ezekiel, and the Gospels and whose primary interest in exegesis was pastoral.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

FROM THE PATRISTIC TO THE MEDIEVAL

Medieval exegesis of Scripture comprehends the Biblical hermeneutic employed by Western theology from about the year 600 to 1500 as well as the Biblical literature, e.g., commentaries, which is the product of this hermeneutic. It poses two questions: How did the medieval theologians interpret Holy Scripture, and in what literary form did they express their exegesis? Because in the course of the Middle Ages the level of culture was so diversified century by century and nation by nation, the extant exegetical literature, of which the larger portion is still unedited, is of very uneven quality. Owing to its rich variety, it is impossible to characterize it accurately in universal terms. Certain traits, however, are clear and salient. It is mystical, in that it held the superiority of the spiritual sense of Scripture over its literal; conservative, in its rigid adherence to the patristic tradition; functional, in its concept of Scripture as the book par excellence for both theological and spiritual formation and for the edification of the Christian faith; and Latin, in that it rested on the text of the Biblia Vulgata Latina and the Latin Fathers and used Latin as its literary medium.

Sense of Scripture. Medieval exegesis is firmly rooted in the patristic tradition, which it developed in its own characteristic spirit. Its ultimate inspiration was the school of Alexandria and the hermeneutic of ORIGEN (d. c. 254), who, under the influence of the Neoplatonism of PHILO JUDAEUS (d. c. 50), taught that a multiplicity of senses (meanings) can be found in the sacred text. "For just as man," he wrote, "consists of body, soul and spirit, so in the same way does the Scripture, which has been prepared by God to be given for man's salvation" (De Principiis 4.2.4). Thus, according to Origen, the sense of Scripture is threefold: somatic, psychic, and pneumatic. That is, a given text of Scripture may simultaneously yield three different levels of meaning: the literal, the moral, and the spiritual. The transmission of this doctrine to the medieval world was largely indirect, through the Latin Fathers, since Greek was a virtually unknown language in the Western Church of the early Middle Ages. For example, the teaching of EUCHERIUS OF LYONS (d. 449) in his Formulae spiritalis intelligentiae attests to the influence of Origen in the West, when he wrote: "The body of Sacred Scripture, as it is handed down, is in the letter; its soul is in the moral sense, which is called tropicus; its spirit is in the higher understanding, which is called anagogic." The concept of the senses of Scripture that John CASSIAN (d. 435) presents in his Collationes (8.3) substantially agrees with this teaching. But it is perhaps St. GREGORY THE GREAT (d. 604) who must be regarded as the principal initiator and greatest patron of the medieval doctrine of the four senses. In the second book of his homilies on Ezekiel (Hom. 9, n. 8) he explains the functional character of the tetrad of Biblical senses in this way: "The words of Holy Scripture are square stones, for they can stand on all sides, because on no side are there rough spots. For in every past event that they narrate, in every future event that they foretell, in every moral saying that they speak, and in every spiritual sense they stand, as it were, on a different side, because they have no roughness." These two conceptions of the multiple (threefold and fourfold) senses of Scripture dominate medieval exegesis. The fourfold sense was generally preferred to the threefold, to which it was reducible, and the spiritual was invariably preferred to the literal sense. Augustine of Dacia, OP (d. 1282), of the school of St. Thomas, epitomized this medieval hermeneutic in his celebrated distich:

Littera gesta docet, quid credis allegoria, Quid agis moralis, quo tendis anagogia.

This fourfold division of the senses (the literal, the spiritual-including the allegorical, the moral, and the anagogic) of Scripture invaded all areas of medieval life. It was especially appreciated because it harmonized with the Neoplatonic sacramental concept of the universe: the visible (literal) both concealing and revealing a deeper, invisible reality (spiritual). It was also employed as a basic program in library classification (at Salvatorberg), in preaching (Robert de Basevorn), and in education (Hugh of Saint-Victor). It remained classical in Biblical studies until the coming of the Protestant Reformers and the Renaissance humanists, who rejected it with derision in favor of a more direct, historical, literal exegesis. But as late as the end of the 16th century there were still Catholic theologians, e.g., Francisco de TOLEDO (d. 1596), who believed that the doctrine of the fourfold sense of Scripture was to be held de fide.

Literal Sense. For the medieval exegete historia and littera are almost synonymous. Both are to be treated with reverence as the foundation of the higher spiritual sense. Fundamental, therefore, to medieval exegesis is the literal interpretation of Bible history, which included both the past event as well as its inspired narration. For the exegete knew that divine revelation was manifest to mankind in and through historical events and that Scripture was the inspired record of these saving events. His approach to Bible history was religious and theological rather than scientific and critical, though in the high Middle Ages the emphasis began to shift toward the learned element of exegesis. Holy Scripture represented the source book of faith in Christ who was the Lord of history. Literal exegesis was ordered to the discovery in the sacred text of the res gesta, divine revelation as a past event. For example, the literal exegesis of the Passion narratives [see PASSION OF CHRIST, I (IN THE BIBLE)] concluded to the death of Jesus as a historical event. It avoided its theological significance as pertaining to the spiritual rather than the literal sense of the text. For the medieval exegete history and the historical sense were superficial, exterior, sensible, and though it was a fundamental sense, a deeper, more mystical, theological sense was sought. Once the ultimate meaning or significance of the res gesta (the historical event) was grasped, exegesis passed into the spiritual order. To remain on the level of the historical and the literal would be unworthy of the exegete. It would be a betrayal of the primary function of Christian exegesis, the discovery and exposé of the mystery of Christ that must be sought on a higher level than littera. Therefore, abandoning the letter (the Jewish exegesis of the Old Law), the Christian exegete turned to the spirit (the Christocentric exegesis of all Scripture). The movement was from the literal to the spiritual sense, from history to allegory; and the validity of this motion was persuaded by the Pauline text: "The letter kills, but the spirit gives life'' (2 Cor 3.6).

Spiritual Sense. The central task of spiritual exegesis is to uncover the deepest meaning of the res gesta that literal exegesis has discovered in the text. Its function is completed in answering three questions: (1) What is the theological (allegorical) meaning of this historical event? (2) What is its moral (tropological) meaning? (3) What is its eschatological (anagogic) meaning? The method is well illustrated by the traditional exegesis of the word Jerusalem: in the literal sense it is the city of the Jews; in the allegorical sense, the Church on earth; in the tropological sense, the virtuous Christian; and in the anagogic sense, the Church in heaven. Discernible in the spiritual sense is an ascending order, from letter to spirit, from the terrestrial to the celestial, from reading to contemplation, from event to reality. Based on history, it rises to faith; through faith Christian virtue is born; by Christian virtue eternal life is attained. These three spiritual senses make up the mystical order. They involve a conversio, allegory from the past Christ to the present Christ; tropology, a life reform by the act of Christ; anagogy, a renewal of the present in virtue of the future. Allegory demands a conversion of thought, tropology of morals, anagogy of desires. Allegory builds up the faith, tropology charity, anagogy hope. Allegory yields the sense of dogma, tropology of morality, anagogy of mysticism. Spiritual exegesis, therefore, was essentially ordered to the religious experience.

Despite the apparently systematic character of this hermeneutic, it tended in the course of the Middle Ages to disintegrate. Its understanding of the sacred text was frequently capricious, arbitrary, subjective, and tortured, and in the course of time it tended to drift more and more away from the sacra pagina into an uncontrolled mysticism. By the eve of the Reformation it was exhausted, ready to be replaced definitively by a hermeneutic resting on and tied to the literal (historical) sense of the text.

[R. E. MCNALLY]

MONASTIC EXEGESIS

The history of medieval exegesis unfolds in two successive stages of development: the monastic (c. 650–1200) and the scholastic (c. 1200–1500), which are distinctively different in method, scope, and purpose. In the monastic phase, Biblical studies were ordered to meditatio and contemplatio. The Bible stood in the center of the monastic liturgy, which was the core of the spiritual life. In the scholastic, quaestio and disputatio were fundamental to Biblical studies. Up to about 1250 Biblical studies dominated the academic program of monastery and university.

General Characteristics. The monastic approach to Scripture was pious and volitional, whereas the scholastic, learned and intellectual. Representative of the former is the first sermon of St. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (d. 1153), In Cantica Canticorum (Patrologia Latina 183:785-789), while PETER LOMBARD's (d. 1160) prologue to his Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul [Miscellanea Lombardiana (Novara 1957) 110-12;Patrologia Latina 191:1297] illustrates scholastic exegesis. For both monk and schoolman the Bible was the regina scientiarum, not only because it contained God's inspiration and revelation, but also because it was the deposit of all true wisdom and piety, the focus of all true education and learning. Its exegesis was an almost infinite task because of its mira profunditas, that wondrous profundity, which scarcely any man could ever fathom. But the exegete's progressive uncovering of this profound deposit of truth made possible the progressive development of dogma. Education was ordered to preparing the exegete; and the task of exegesis, the interpretation of Scripture, coincided with the task of theology. Up to the end of the 13th century the terms theologia and Sacra Scriptura coalesced in meaning. This is illustrated by the way these expressions were used interchangeably. Thus St. THOMAS AQUINAS (d. 1274) wrote: "Haec est theologia quae sacra scriptura dicitur" (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.4), and St. Bonaventure: "Sacra scriptura quae theologia dicitur" (Breviloquium. Prologus). Exegesis was accepted only inasmuch as it corresponded to the faith of the Church. Of Scripture, HUGH OF AMIENS (or Rouen; d. 1164) wrote: "Legit et tenet Ecclesia" (Dialogi 5.12). The Church reads the Holy Scripture, which it holds as its own. It is in terms of this ecclesial point of view that the medieval exegete held the formula: Sola Scriptura. All revelation is contained in Scripture, if one listens to it in the sense in which the Church reads it-"in fide Catholica tracta," as St. AUGUSTINE (Gen. ad litt. 12.37.70) had written.

Irish Monastic Exegesis. One of the most important centers of early medieval exegesis was Ireland, which by the middle of the 7th century had acquired a reputation for learning surpassed only by Visigothic Spain. The high excellence of Ireland is well attested by St. BEDE the Venerable (d. 735), who mentions the number and quality of the young Anglo-Saxons who went there to study the Bible. Representative of the most original Biblical scholarship of early Ireland is the pseudo-Augustinian work (c. 650) De mirabilibus sacrae Scripturae (Patrologia Latina 35:2149-2200), which in its historico-literal approach to the sacred text shows the continuing influence of Antiochene hermeneutics. In fact, from the extant Biblical commentaries of early Ireland it appears that certain of its scholars, with a marked penchant for the learned and the critical, preserved the tradition of Antioch long after it had ceased to be influential elsewhere. In commenting on the sacred text, the Irish stressed the quaestio, patristic literature, natural science, and philology. Of the tres linguae sacrae, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, only the last was known; there is no evidence in Irish exegesis of a mastery of Hebrew or Greek. Moreover, despite their scientific pretensions, much of their Biblical literature shows the strong influence of the spiritual element of Alexandria, at times even to the point of fantasy. By establishing Continental centers of learning (e.g., the Abbeys of St. GALL, BOBBIO, Peronne, WÜRZBURG, LUXEUIL) they helped to prepare the subsequent CAROLINGIAN RE-NAISSANCE of Biblical studies. Outstanding among the early Irish students of the Bible was JOHN SCOTUS ERIGE-NA (d. c. 877), one of the few scholars (besides Sedulius Scotus of Liège and HILDUIN OF SAINT-DENIS) of that day who had a good knowledge of the Greek language.

Benedictine Monastic Exegesis. The Irish monastic movement, which had been initiated by St. COLUMBAN (d. 615), yielded in the course of the 8th century to Benedictinism, under whose aegis a network of monastic schools (e.g., the Abbeys of REICHENAU, FULDA, CORBIE, SAINT-RIQUIER) spread across Europe. True to its tradition, the Benedictine Order concentrated on Biblical studies, even in the face of serious intellectual obstacles. Of necessity, exegesis rested solely on the corrupt text of the Vulgata latina of St. Jerome, which, even after the Carolingian revisions (e.g., of ALCUIN, c. 800), was still far from perfect. Rare was the scholar who was able to read the Greek text of the NT, and the Septuagint was for all practical purposes an unknown book. By the year 700 Greek had disappeared from the West; and since there had never been in Latin Christendom a strong Hebrew tradition, this important Biblical language played no part in early medieval exegesis. The exegete, therefore, was forced to rely on commentaries such as St. JEROME's Quaestiones hebraicae in Genesim, from which various isolated Hebrew and Greek words might be excerpted to support his exegesis. At times, if he was fortunate, he might enjoy the assistance of a Jewish scholar of Hebrew. Early medieval exegesis, therefore, was built neither directly nor immediately on the Biblical languages, nor was it guided by historical, textual, or literary criticism.

Decisive in early medieval exegesis were the Fathers of the Church, authorities par excellence by reason of the official character of their witness to the ancient Christian tradition. But the exegete approached them with a reverence that was disproportionate. Too frequently his reliance on them was servile, unreasoned, narrow, rigorous, and at times simply mechanical even to the point of obscurantism. The intellectual heritage of the Fathers was neither fully transmitted to the medieval world nor fully understood by it. Certain of the works of a few Greek Fathers, such as St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, St. GREGORY OF NYSSA, Origen, and EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, were disseminated in the Latin translations of St. Jerome, RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA, EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, DIONYSIUS EXIG-UUS, the school (Vivarium) of CASSIODORUS. But in general, the writings of the Greek Fathers were not well known. However, a much larger portion of the corpus of the Latin Fathers was transmitted to the early Middle Ages. Here interest centered especially about the works of the golden tetrad: St. AMBROSE, St. Jerome, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory the Great. But many early medieval Bible students were acquainted with these Fathers only partially, through FLORILEGIA, Biblical CATENAE, or collections of sententiae (e.g., Liber scintillarum of Defensor of Ligugé). Their knowledge of the Fathers derived from isolated citations and was in consequence out of context. Thus, until St. ANSELM OF CANTERBURY (d. 1109), no scholar comprehended the theology of St. Augustine as a system of thought. When a Biblical problem was posed, it was solved by citing patristic authorities, generally without identification. Frequently, spurious Bible commentaries were circulated under the names of the Fathers (e.g., Pseudo-Jerome, Expositio quattuor evangeliorum; Patrologia Latina 30:531–590) and were used as such. The result at times was naïve and simplistic.

Biblical apocrypha such as The Book of Henoch, The Assumption of Mary, The Lord's Letter, and The Acts of Pilate also were a factor in early medieval exegesis. Rejected by the Church, they enjoyed no dogmatic authority; their use seems to have been largely confined to supplying those imaginative situations and concrete details of which Scripture is silent.

Exegesis of Carolingian Renaissance. Carolingian Biblical literature can be divided into four general catagories: (1) collections of quaestiones, e.g., Wicbod's Liber quaestionum (Patrologia Latina 96:1105–68); (2) collections of sententiae, e.g., SMARAGDUS's Expositio comitis (Patrologia Latina 102:15–552); (3) Biblical homilies, e.g., REMIGIUS OF AUXERRE's Homiliae duodecim (Patrologia Latina 131:865–932); and (4) the continuous sustained commentary on the text, e.g., Bede's In Marci evangelium expositio (ed., D. Hurst, Corpus Christianorum. Series latina 120:431–648). These literary forms, rooted in the patristic tradition, remained despite subsequent development basic to the Middle Ages.

In the early medieval period St. Bede the Venerable stands out as the most competent master of exegesis, Bl. RABANUS MAURUS (d. 856) as the least original but the most prolific. The exegetical work of St. PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS (d. c. 860), with his fine sense of the literal, and that of John Scotus Erigena (d. c. 877), with his philosophical acumen, is marked by a fresh, advanced approach to the text of Scripture. In these two exegetes the distant future is foreshadowed. The last days of the Carolingians saw the rise of the school of Auxerre under HAIMO (d. c. 865), HEIRIC (d. c. 876), and his pupil Remigius (d. c. 908). The work of the first two shows that "theological discussion was becoming a normal part of exegesis," while Remigius is significant for his contribution to "the development of Biblical scholarship" (B. Smalley). In the whole period between 650 and 900 Bible exegesis had made imperceptible but important advances: preservation of the patristic, development of criticism, and discussion of the sacred text in terms of theological problems.

Exegesis of Cathedral Schools. The period from 900 to 1028 forms an interim in the progressive development of Biblical studies. The acute crisis in which civilization had been caught at this time was not conducive to serious study. Furthermore, Cluniac monasticism (see CLUNIAC REFORM), so dominant in the religious life of this century, inclined to the liturgical usage of Scripture rather than to its scientific study. In the course of the 10th century the new cathedral schools (e.g., Chartres, Avranches, Paris, Rheims, Tours) tended more and more to take over leadership from the old monastic schools, though the abbey of BEC (Normandy), in the theological tradition of LANFRANC (d. 1089) and St. Anselm (d. 1109), continued supreme. However, in the new cathedral schools, where a vigorous intellectual life was flourishing, academic interest centered, not in Biblical exegesis, but in the arts and sciences. Still, the heavy stress that was placed on secular studies, especially on dialectic, served as a fundamental preparation for the subsequent development of exegesis. By putting at the service of exegesis logic (dialectic), philology (grammar), and criticism (hermeneutic), the school of Chartres under its celebrated master, FULBERT (d. 1028), formulated a program of study that flowered later on in the century.

Exegetical School of Laon. The first half of the 12th century is marked by the rise of two schools of the highest importance in the history of medieval exegesis: the school of ANSELM at Laon (d. c. 1117) and the School of St. Victor at Paris. As early as 1100 the school at Laon was a thriving center of learning with a reputation sufficiently high to attract Biblical students from all over Europe. The contribution of this school of exegesis is to be sought principally in Anselm's conception of scientific method: theological and Biblical systematization. The fruition of the program, insofar as it touches theology, came to fullness in the Liber Sententiarum of Peter Lombard (d. 1160), a student of Anselm; to perfection in the Summa Theologiae of St. Thomas (d. 1274), who had commented on the Sentences of Peter. The Biblical systematization of this school is incarnate in the so-called Glossa ordinaria, which is basically the work of Anselm. As it stands today, this glossary (marginal and interlineal) on the whole Bible (individual words, phrases, texts, etc.) represents a compilation that was originally based on authentica (the Fathers) but later conflated by magistralia (the Doctors). In time (13th-14th centuries) it became one of the most important handbooks for Biblical studies, in fact the backbone of the academic lectio.

Exegetical School of Saint-Victor. The school of Saint-Victor (Victorine school) was founded about 1110 by WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX (d. 1121), a student of Anselm of Laon. Its most distinguished master, HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR, lectured there from 1118 until his death in 1141; and by the new program of Biblical studies, which he devised on the basis of St. Augustine's De doctrina Christiana, he exerted considerable influence on the development of exegetical method. For Hugh the study of the Bible was to rest on a profound, exact, almost universal education. His Didascalion, which presented a full academic propaedeutic to exegesis, put scientia at the service of biblica. This signified a new understanding of the function of lectio. Instead of sharply distinguishing the literal and the spiritual senses and considering the latter as culminating in perfect anagogy (contemplation), Hugh joined history (literal) and allegory (doctrinal) in distinction to morality. In forging this link he emphasized the historical foundation of doctrine; but while insisting on the literal sense as primary and basic to exegesis, he did not exclude the spiritual; for the finality of Bible study is simultaneously realized in knowledge (history and doctrine) and in virtue (morality and contemplation). The task of exegesis is triple: to explain letter, sense, and sentence. On the right understanding of these elements the right exegesis of the text rests. One of the most learned Victorines was ANDREW OF SAINT-VICTOR (d. 1175), whose exegesis (e.g., on the Octateuch) is characterized by its preoccupation with the literal and historical, especially with Hebrew learning. The relatively slender influence of his work, which is the product of an original, objective, critical mind, was out of proportion to its intrinsic value.

Biblical Moral School of Exegesis. The Victorine tradition was continued and developed by "the Biblical moral school" of PETER COMESTOR (d. 1179), PETER CANTOR (d. 1197), and STEPHEN LANGTON (d. 1228). For them the spiritual sense is still paramount; but their interest is more in the direction of tropology (moral) than allegory (doctrine), of the practical (homily) more than the speculative (theology). By about 1150 exegesis was in transition from old to new style. St. Bernard stands out as the last great representative of the monastic tradition, while in GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE (d. 1154) and Peter Lombard-both students of Anselm of Laon-the new learning of the university is foreshadowed. Both the traditional method and function of exegesis were being seriously questioned by dialecticians such as PETER OF POITIERS and Adam of the Petit Pont (d. 1181). ROBERT OF MELUN (d. 1164), author of the Summa sententiarum, ridiculed the slavish adherence with which the exegetes clung to the Glossa, while Peter Comestor criticized the Liber sententiarum of Peter Lombard for its excessive dialectic. The Biblical ferment of the mid-12th century would grow into the revolution of the following century, when theology and exegesis would separate as distinct intellectual disciplines.

[R. E. MCNALLY]

SCHOLASTIC EXEGESIS

High Middle Ages. The legacy of the 12th century is the intellectual setting that it created for Bible study. First, under the inspiration of Peter ABELARD (d. 1142) exeges is dared to submit the traditional patristic authorities to a rigorous, critical examination. Second, in posing new quaestiones on the basis of textual criticism and probing dialectic, it forced exegesis to reconsider its function, especially in relation to theology. Third, it put at the disposal of exegesis a valuable new learned literature, e.g., the Historia scholastica of Peter Comestor, the Liber sententiarum of Peter Lombard (both of which Stephen Langton equated in importance), the Glossa ordinaria of Anselm, and a series of handbooks for Biblical studies.

From the high Middle Ages on, exegesis was an academic exercise of the schola, the studium generale, and the university. Students (auditores) gathered about the master (lector) to hear his exposé of the sacra pagina. Their edited transcriptions of the lecture formed the reportatio, the source of much modern knowledge of medieval exegesis. The scholastic method of Biblical interpretation was rooted in the old monastic lectio, the reading and commenting on Scripture. The quaestiones that were posed were answered by citations from the Fathers. Later the Glossa provided a standard, traditional interpretation. But in the course of the 12th century the early schoolmen developed a more critical approach to exegesis. The new questions that they posed required a more intensive and learned treatment. In all probability the disputatio grew from the tension between lectio and quaestio. In the second half of the century the disputatio extended its scope, becoming more theological, speculative, and dialectical, and tending to drift from the sacred text that it was designed to interpret. Under the influence of Aristotelian dialectics the quaestiones became more refined and sophisticated, the disputationes more subtle and metaphysical. By the time of Stephen Langton disput atio had almost completely broken off from lectio to find in the Liber sententiarum of Peter Lombard a new center of interest and discussion. By about 1250, at Paris and Oxford, it had definitively separated from lectio. While the exegete was left free to concentrate on the text of Scripture, the theologian assumed an independent role and a new theological method: the application of metaphysics to the content of revelation to make it intelligible and systematic. (See THEOLOGY, HISTORY OF.)

Throughout the 13th and 14th centuries the Fathers were still cited by the exegete (e.g., St. Thomas's Catena Aurea), at times side by side with such authors as Plato, Cicero, Averroës, and others. With the coming of the university system in the early 13th century, exegesis became systematic, especially since Scripture was divided into chapters. Frequently the contents of Scripture were reduced to categories; e.g., materia, modus, utilitas, and intentio of the author; or according to the causes: materialis, formalis, finalis, and efficiens. More and more the literal sense was cultivated without neglecting the spiritual. St. ALBERT THE GREAT (d. 1280) insisted on the primacy of the literal sense as the basis of the spiritual, which he conceived as an expository commentary useful for pedagogy. His disciple, St. Thomas Aquinas, faithful in general to traditional exegesis, approached the sacred text from the point of view of its doctrinal content. Perhaps his greatest legacy to exegesis was his Expositio continua, a sustained gloss on the Gospels that ranks with the Glossa ordinaria of Anselm and the Glossaria of Stephen Langton. St. BONAVENTURE (d. 1274) admitted a manifold sense of Scripture but restricted its extension, refusing to see in the sacred text infinite mystical meanings. While accepting the validity of literal and spiritual senses, he insisted that their occurrence and interpretation should be verified in each case.

Late Middle Ages. In the late Middle Ages the postilla (post illa verba of the text) was developed as a more complete, flowing, detailed, integrated commentary on the text. At the same time, philology was stressed as an indispensable auxiliary to exegesis. Conspicuous here was ROGER BACON (d. 1292), whose Compendium studii developed the character of the relation of philology to exegesis as fundamental for scientific progress. His axiom is significant: Notitia linguarum est prima porta sapientiae. Philology is not to dominate but to serve exegesis, as dialectic was serving theology. The exegete must interpret Scripture on the basis of the original languages rather than of imperfect Latin translations. In 1311 the Council of VIENNE ordered the cultivation of Hebrew studies for exegesis [see HEBREW STUDIES (IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH)]; in the course of the 15th century Greek became more common in Biblical studies.

In the history of medieval exegesis no one since St. Jerome (d. 420) knew the Hebrew Old Testament as perfectly as NICHOLAS OF LYRA, OFM (d. 1340), master of Hebrew, Jewish, and Arabic literature. The critical and independent skill with which he explored the sacred text in his commentaries (e.g. Postillae perpetuae in Vetus et Novum Testamentum) mark him out as an original scholar. While ready to consult the patristic tradition in his exegesis, he refused to be bound by it. "The writings of the Fathers," he wrote, "are not of such great authority that no one is allowed to think in a contrary sense in those matters which have not been determined by Sacred Scripture itself." But the authentic Catholic spirit that animated his work is beyond question. He knew how to distinguish the scholastic from the ecclesial, the academic from the authoritative, to reject unfounded traditional exegesis, and to repudiate the arbitrary mystical senses in favor of the literal and historical. The influence of his spirit on the Reformers gave rise at a later date to the saying: Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset (If Lyra had not played on his lyre, Luther would not have danced).

With the coming of the Reformation and humanism, which employed the disciplines of the new learning, criticism, philology, and history, the usefulness of medieval exegesis as a hermeneutical system was virtually terminated. Face to face with this new critical spirit and its scientific technique, medieval exegesis ceased to be relevant and was discarded.

[R. E. MCNALLY]

FROM THE MEDIEVAL TO THE 19TH CENTURY

Renaissance Exegesis. The 14th century produced almost no exegetical works of permanent value. Three outstanding writers of the period were: the Dominicans Meister ECKHART (d. 1327) and NICHOLAS TREVET (d. c. 1330) and the Franciscan Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1349). Eckhart wrote two commentaries on Genesis, one literal and the other allegorical, as well as expositions of Exodus, Wisdom, Sirach, and 1 Corinthians and a very long commentary on John. More philosophical and theological than exegetical, these works are heavily indebted to the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas. Nicholas Trevet revealed his good knowledge of Hebrew in his strictly literal commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Chronicles, and the Psalms.

Nicholas of Lyra's exegesis reflected the beginnings of a new scientific approach to exegesis which, after many vicissitudes in succeeding centuries, would eventually prevail. His best known work, Postillae perpetuae in Vetus et Novum Testamentum, exercised wide influence. The Postillae, which completed and renewed the Glossa Ordinaria of Anselm of Laon, was almost exclusively literal in its interpretations (see Spicq, 336). Lyra refused to accept the interpretations of the Fathers unless, in his judgment, they conformed to the literal sense of the text. During the course of the Middle Ages, Biblical exegesis had made great progress over previous centuries. It had become more and more theological and more than ever before concerned with the literal sense intended by the sacred author. The future would remedy the period's two chief defects: an imperfect knowledge of philology and an inadequate sense of the Bible as the record of God's intervention in history.

The decline in the 15th century of scholastic exegesis and the return to allegory and moralizing is reflected in the works of Jean GERSON (d. 1429) and DENIS THE CAR-THUSIAN (d. 1471).

In the 16th century profound changes in Biblical studies took place, caused by the new emphasis on the study of Greek and Hebrew, the improvement in basic scriptural tools, and the exegetical principles of the Reformers, which were partially followed and partially controverted by 16th- and 17th-century Catholic exegetes.

Biblical Philology. Through the efforts of Johann REUCHLIN (d. 1522), the two Johannes Buxtorfs (father d. 1629; son d. 1664), and the Anglican John Lightfoot (d. 1675), Biblical scholars were provided with better Hebrew grammars, dictionaries, Hebrew and Aramaic concordances, and a better knowledge of rabbinical literature. The works of such scholars as Desiderius ERASMUS (d. 1536), Santes PAGNINI (d. 1541), and Robert ESTIENNE (d. 1559) enriched the field of textual criticism. The publication of the first POLYGLOT BIBLES (at Alcalá, 1514-17; Antwerp; 1569-72; Paris, 1628-45; and London, 1653-57) made easier the comparison of different Biblical texts. The principles to be followed in the restoration of the Hebrew text were set forth by the Protestants Jacques Cappel (d.1624) and his brother Louis (d. 1658) in their Critica Sacra (1634).

Reformation Exegesis. The translation of the Bible into German by Martin LUTHER (d. 1546) is an admitted literary masterpiece. However, neither his OT commentaries nor those of Huldrych ZWINGLI (d. 1531), Philipp MELANCHTHON (d. 1560), or John CALVIN (d. 1564) made any advance over similar works of their predecessors. The Reformers' polemical aims rendered objective, scientific exegesis difficult. They admitted the inspiration of the Bible but claimed that one's private judgment was sufficient to arrive at its evident sense. Rationalistic exegesis, the logical consequence of this principle, was soon evident in the writings of Hugo GROTIUS (d. 1645) in his Annotationes in Vetus Testamentum and in those of Jean LE CLERC (d. 1736) in his Moysis libri quinque.

Catholic OT commentaries of the period include: Tommaso de Vio CAJETAN (d. 1534), who commentated on all the OT except the Song of Songs, the deuterocanonical books, and the Prophets, and whose exegetical principles involved him in a celebrated 16th-century controversy [see T. A. Collins, "Cajetan's Fundamental Biblical Principles," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 17 (1955) 363-378]; Johannes MALDONATUS (d. 1583), whose OT exegesis was not equal to that of his famous Gospel commentaries; St. Robert BELLARMINE (d. 1621), who wrote an excellent commentary on the Psalms; Cornelius a LAPIDE (d. 1637), whose voluminous commentaries on all the OT books except Job and the Psalms enshrine what is best in patristic exegesis and provide useful homiletic material; Jacques Bonfrère (d. 1642), who wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Chronicles; and, last but not least, Simon de Muis (d. 1644), whose Commentarius litteralis et historicus in omnes Psalmos et selecta Veteris Testa*menti cantica cum versione nova ex Hebraico* is surprisingly modern.

For the history of exegesis, however, the most significant 17th-century Catholic Biblical scholar was Richard SIMON (1638–1712), called the founder of Biblical historical criticism. In his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament Simon showed his keen awareness of the problems raised by the careful study of the Pentateuch, and he was the first to perceive the organic development of the OT books. His views were bitterly opposed by some as scandalous and a danger to the faith. Despite some serious defects, Simon's work won for its author a permanent place in the history of exegesis.

Eighteenth-Century Exegesis. The 18th century made little positive contribution to the history of exegesis. The works of Augustin CALMET (1672–1757) reached a new peak in Catholic exegesis, but they lacked originality. His literal commentaries on the books of the OT and the NT were solid works of great erudition and exercised great influence especially in France. Textual criticism received contributions from Charles F. Houbigant (d. 1784), Bernard de MONTFAUCON (d. 1741), Pierre SABATIER (d. 1742), Benjamin Kennicott (d. 1783), Robert Holmes (d. 1805), and Giovanni Battista de ROSSI (d. 1831).

[L. F. HARTMAN]

OLD TESTAMENT EXEGESIS IN 19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES

A new era began with Jean ASTRUC's (d. 1766) Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux dont il parait que Moise s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genese (1753). The 19th century would see this literary dissection (of the Pentateuch especially) carried to extremes. Only the principal authors and their proposals can be noted here.

Literary Criticism of Pentateuch. Johann Gottfried Eichhorn (d. 1827) offered the documentary hypothesis, which added other sources to the Yahwistic and Elohistic ones. Alexander GEDDES (d. 1802) proposed the fragment hypothesis in 1792. G. H. A. Ewald (d. 1875) countered with the supplement hypothesis, according to which a fundamental historical document (Grundschrift) was supplemented by several other sources. Hermann Hupfeld (d. 1866) further extended the documentary hypothesis in 1853 by distinguishing three basic documents: a basic source called First Elohist, a Yahwistic source, and a Second Elohistic one. In 1854 Eduard Karl August Riehm (d. 1888) proposed Deuteronomy (D) as a fourth source, and in 1869 Theodor Noeldeke (d. 1930) extended the Documentary Hypothesis to the whole Hexateuch. He proposed three sources from the 10th and 9th century B.C. according to the following chronological order: (P) Priestly Code or First Elohist; (E) Second Elohist; (J) Yahwist, and a fourth source (D), dating from just prior to the reform of Josia (621 B.C.). Noeldeke suggested that the Pentateuch attained its final form under Ezra, who successfully promulgated it.

Wellhausen School. The brilliant Julius WELL-HAUSEN (d. 1918) championed the ideas of E. G. E. Reuss (d. 1891) and Karl Heinrich Graf (d. 1869) in proposing his own widely accepted hypothesis. The classic Wellhausen thesis of the literary sources of the PENTATEUCH reads as follows: a 9th-century B.C. Yahwistic and an 8thcentury B.C. Elohistic source (the latter reflecting the religious traditions of the Northern Kingdom), a fusion of J and E by the Prophets, Deuteronomy, and the Priestly code. S. R. Driver (d. 1914) in England, Léon Gautier (d. 1897) in France, and many leading scholars in Germany promoted the Wellhausen thesis. A pivotal point in the Wellhausen school was the conclusion that the principal codes of Law were composed after, not before, the period of the Prophets, who were the real founders of Israelite monotheism, fraudulently attributed to Moses. The solemn promulgation of the Law was deferred until after the Babylonian Exile. For a fuller history and elaborate bibliography of the history of OT criticism, see J. Coppens, The Old Testament and the Critics, tr. E. A. Ryan and E. W. Tribbe (Paterson, N.J. 1942).

In applying their theories to the whole of the Bible members of the Wellhausen school distinguished the literary history of the Israelites into three periods: (1) that of the ancient Prophets, (2) that of the composition of the various codes of the Torah (admitting that some parts of these codes, e.g., the Book of the Covenant, may well have been contemporaneous with the work of the Prophets), and (3) that of the didactic and apocalyptic literature (see Coppens, op. cit. 35-36). Wellhausen himself as well as others, notably, Abraham Kuenen (d. 1891) in 1869, Bernhard Duhm (d. 1928) in 1873, and B. Stade in 1905 and 1911, added to the documentary theory a reconstruction of Israel's religious history founded upon the philosophy of G. W. F. HEGEL (d. 1831) as applied to Israel's religion by certain scholars of the school of W. M. L. De Wette (d. 1849), especially J. K. Wilhelm Vatke (d. 1882). According to this school, the history of Israel's religion ought to conform to an evolutionary pattern alleged to be observable in all human history. It was claimed that the religious experience of Israel began with an animism or polydaemonism, evolved into a national henotheism, and finally, under the impetus of the great prophetical movement, as mentioned above, it developed into the ethical monotheism of the exilic and post-exilic periods (see G. E. Wright, ed., The Bible and the Ancient Near East [New York 1965] 3-5).

Post-Wellhausen research has considerably altered many positions originally assumed concerning the dates assigned to the four classic sources (J, E, D, P), the unity of these documents and their relative chronology, and the late date assigned by Wellhausen for the origins of all the Deuteronomic or sacerdotal laws. These researches were carried on especially by K. F. R. Budde (1890 and 1902), Immanuel Benzinger (1921), Rudolf Smend (1921), Gustav Holscher (1923), and Otto Eissfeldt (1925), among others. More recently, Gerhard von Rad, R. H. Pfeiffer, P. Romanoff, and Sigmund Mowinckel have sought for other special sources for certain parts of the Torah.

Study of Predocumentary Traditions. At the turn of the century a new phase of critical scholarship began with the work of Hermann GUNKEL (d. 1932) and H. Gressmann (d. 1927), who turned their attention to the study of the individual units of tradition contained within the various documents. It became quickly apparent that the dating of a given document by no means dated the material or traditions contained therein. The modern study of the Patriarchs clearly demonstrates this (see R. de Vaux, Revue biblique 53 [1946] 321-348; 55 [1948] 321-347; 56 [1949] 5–36). The new attention being paid to the Biblical traditions in their pre-literary form makes it abundantly clear that, whereas documents containing these traditions may be arranged chronologically, the material they contain cannot be as easily arranged chronologically, and as a consequence they cannot be confidently used to support an evolutionary theory of the development of Israel's religion.

As John Bright has noted (G. E. Wright, ed., op.cit. 7–8), all this has led scholars to abandon classical Wellhausenism without abandoning the documentary hypothesis, which stands or falls independently of Wellhausen's views; "and, so far at least, it seems in general to have stood." Opposition to Wellhausen, in whole or in part, came from several outstanding scholars, including E. König (d. 1936) and R. KITTEL (d. 1929). The search for the oral and written sources of the OT books continues.

Catholic Reaction. Catholic scholarship showed little interest in these literary problems until the end of the 19th century. M. J. LAGRANGE (d. 1938) faced the problem squarely in 1898 with his "Les Sources du Pentateuque" [Revue biblique 7 (1898) 10–32]. In his last published article, "L'Authenticité mosaïque de la Genèse et la théorie des documents" [Revue biblique 47 (1938) 163–183], he acknowledged the existence of documents and proposed that E was used by Moses who sketched the outline for J, which was written by an associate. P was a sort of Summa containing only essentials. Many Catholic OT scholars now agree that the documentary hypothesis is valid in principle as at least a partial answer to the problem of the origin of the OT books.

Rationalistic Criticism. In the 19th century another strong current, which came from the 18th century, was rationalistic criticism. Among its principal exponents were: G. E. LESSING (d. 1781), who divorced religion from the Bible; J. S. Semler (d. 1791), who taught that Scripture accommodated itself to contemporary prevailing beliefs; I. KANT (d. 1804), for whom exegesis meant extracting from the Bible ethical truths only; and G. W. F. Hegel, who held that each religion, with its own legends, images, and myths, reflects a stage in a religious evolutionary process; consequently, OT narratives should be interpreted merely as the myths of Israel's religion. The theory of Israel's religious evolution from lesser forms was strengthened by the works of E. B. Tylor (d. 1917) in 1871, H. SPENCER (d. 1903), J. Lippert (d. 1909) in 1881, B. Stade in 1884, and F. Schwally in 1892. Monotheism, the last stage in Israel's religious evolution, was attributed to the work of the Prophets. The panbabylonian school of Hugo Winckler (d. 1913), Friedrich Delitzsch (d. 1922), and others (see PANBABYLONIANISM) attributed it to a hidden monotheism in Mesopotamia (see A. Robert and A. Tricot, Guide to the Bible, rev. and enl. [Tournai-New York] 1:713-722).

Twentieth-Century Exegesis. At the turn of the 20th century, despite variety concerning details, there was substantial agreement on most OT problems among all leading scholars (see H. H. Rowley, "Trends in OT Study," The Old Testament and Modern Study [London 1961] xv-xxxi). After World War I, however, a greater variety of positions on fundamental points emerged. Scholars now recognized a far greater unity in the Bible than before. This led to a renewed interest in the BIBLICAL THEOLOGY of the OT (see R. C. Dentan). During the mid-20th-century there arose new knowledge, new approaches to old problems, new applications of older principles, and new tests of conclusions long since held sacred. A host of new OT scholars won a permanent place in the history of exegesis (W. F. ALBRIGHT, J. Bright, M. Burrows, W. Eichrodt, F. V. Filson, A. Gelin, H. W. Hertzberg, R. A. F. MacKenzie, J. L. McKenzie, S. MOWINCKEL, J. Lindblom, M. Noth, G. von Rad, H. H. Rowley, P. W. SKEHAN, R. de Vaux, and A. Vincent, to name but a few). There was a gradual tendency among 20th-century exegetes to adopt a more conservative opinion on many OT problems.

During this period Catholic Biblical scholarship came of age. Inspired by the directives of the Church, Catholic scholars in both Europe and America won for themselves honored places in Biblical studies. New Catholic Biblical societies were formed, new scientific journals founded, scholarly Biblical faculties erected, and many praiseworthy Catholic OT works continued to appear.

Among the tendencies evident in modern OT studies, the following may be noted: in Pentateuchal criticism new stress was placed on the oral traditions behind the main sources, new sources were discovered, and reconsideration was given to the dates assigned to the old sources; there also existed a widespread tendency to interpret as rituals many historical and prophetical texts as well as many Psalms; there was a strong proposal from the Scandinavian school that the traditio-historical method of investigation were more fruitful than literary criticism in solving various OT problems.

[L. F. HARTMAN]

NEW TESTAMENT EXEGESIS IN 19TH AND 20TH CENTURIES

The exegesis of the principal reformers, M. Luther, J. Calvin, and P. Melanchthon, had ignored the interpretation of the Church and was subjective and mystical in character and far removed from traditional historical enquiry.

Rationalistic Exegesis. The rationalists, in the name of the "ENLIGHTENMENT," sought to emancipate themselves from the "darkness" of Christian revelation. Their fundamental principles denied the existence of the supernatural and affirmed that only what is rational is real. In France, England, and Germany charges of fraud and deception were hurled against Christ and His Apostles. H. S. REIMARUS (d. 1768) attributed the beginnings of Christianity to the Apostles, who had idealized the person and teachings of Christ. Heinrich E. G. Paulus (d. 1851) claimed that the Gospels narrated the testimony of witnesses more or less subject to hallucinations. In his Life of Jesus (1835) D. F. STRAUSS (d. 1874) held that the Gospel texts, which the rationalists found so difficult, were really mythical in origin. F. C. BAUR (d. 1860) tried to reconstruct the history of the early Church before the appearance of the Gospel myths. Bruno BAUER (d. 1882) maintained that Christ's very existence was a myth. All these writers used Hegelian philosophy as a foundation for their rationalistic exegesis (see HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM).

Reaction to these extreme positions came from J. Ernest RENAN (d. 1892) and especially such liberal Protestants as Bernhard Weiss (d. 1918), Karl Theodor Keim (d. 1878), E. G. E. Reuss (d. 1891), Albert Reville (d. 1906), H. J. HOLTZMANN (d. 1910), and A. von HARNACK (d. 1930). The liberals themselves, however, were opposed by those who wished to free the study of Christ and the Gospels from all philosophies, e.g., Johannes Weiss

(d. 1914) and William Wrede (d. 1906). Another strong current at the turn of the 20th century was syncretism, which sought to trace Christian teachings back to various elements in Near Eastern religious speculations, especially those derived from Hellenism. For good summaries of NT trends in the 20th century, see A. Hunter; R. H. Fuller. Only the highlights can be noted here.

Quest for the Historical Jesus. Most influential was the eschatological approach of Albert Schweitzer (d. 1965), in his Von Reimarus zu Wrede [1906; The Quest of the Historical Jesus, tr. W. Montgomery (New York 1961)], which forced NT scholars to face the problem of eschatology in the Gospels. In his detailed story of the quest for the historical Jesus in the 19th century Schweitzer had revealed the aim of the search: to discover the original teachings of Jesus and through these teachings to test the authenticity of the Church's version of Christianity. The historio-critical method that was used promised objective and scientific results, but unfortunately the method (as it had been used especially by Wrede and Wellhausen) demonstrated quite clearly that the liberals had not reconstructed a very scientific portrait of the historical Jesus after all (see Fuller, 26-27).

Form Criticism. A new and somewhat original approach to the study of the Gospels strongly supported this conclusion. Biblical FORM CRITICISM focused its attention upon the several literary forms or types found in the Gospel narratives. Through an analytical and comparative study of these various literary forms the form critic hopes to be able to retrace the preliterary history of the Gospel traditions. The studies of M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tübingen 1919), Eng. tr. by B. L. Woolf, From Tradition to Gospel (London and New York 1934); K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (Berlin 1919); R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (Göttingen 1921), Eng. tr. of 3rd ed., 1957, by John Marsh, History of the Synoptic Tradition (New York 1963); and M. Albertz, Die synoptischen Streitgesprache (Berlin 1921) showed that the Synoptic Gospels were not written as biographies of Jesus but rather to enshrine the faith of the early Church. The critics claimed that the Gospels could not be used as a source for the reconstruction of the portrait of the historical Jesus because they had been written on a theological rather than an historical basis. These critics claimed further that any quest for the historical Jesus, taking that word historical in its usual modern sense, would prove to be in vain. Dialectical theologians, such as Karl Barth and Martin Kähler, maintained it was unnecessary, since the object of our faith is not the Jesus of history but the Jesus of faith, whose saving action is proclaimed in the KERYGMA. For a balanced judgment and bibliography of form criticism, see A. Wikenhauser, New Testament Introduction (New York 1958), Eng. tr. by J. Cunningham, 253–277.

Demythologizing. In 1941 Rudolf Bultmann delivered his now famous lecture, Neues Testament und Mythologie, in which he offered an outline of a program to demythologize the NT (see DEMYTHOLOGIZING). Much scholarly literature has been published in the course of the debate concerning NT myths (H. W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma and Myth I [London 1960], Eng. tr. by R. H. Fuller, for "New Testament and Mythology" [1–44] and bibliography [224–228]). For a dozen years (1941–53) a most heated debate raged over Bultmann's aims and methods.

The New Quest. The debate, while hardly finished, occasioned a return to the quest of the historical Jesus. This began in 1953 when Ernst Käsemann, one of Bultmann's outstanding pupils, delivered a lecture in which he turned his attention to the old problem of the Jesus of history. The story of this new quest, as well as an evaluation of contributions by Käsemann, G. Bornkamm, H. G. Conzelmann, and others has been well told by J. M. Robinson in A New Quest of the Historical Jesus (London and Naperville 1959); see also Fuller, 25–53.

Synoptic Studies. Modern studies in the Synoptic Gospels exhibited a significant shift of emphasis in many areas (see SYNOPTIC GOSPELS). Formerly little attention was paid to the Evangelists' personal contributions to their Gospels. As Fuller (71) remarked, the Synoptic Evangelists were considered more as simply collectors of oral traditions, as men standing at the end of a pipeline collecting in a bucket what came through, arranging it a little, perhaps, but making little personal contribution to NT theology. By the mid-20th century more attention was paid to the distinctive interpretation each Evangelist applies to the traditions at his disposal and the principles that guide him in the arrangement of these traditions for his own kerygmatic purposes. The problem of distinguishing the main strata or layers of Synoptic material remained only partially solved and continued to invite new and improved solutions. The Synoptic problem intrigued a new generation of NT scholars, as it always did in the past. The scholars in the forefront of modern studies in the Synoptic Gospels were G. Bornkamm, R. Brown, J. M. Robinson, H. G. Conzelmann, and W. Marxsen, among many others. For further details, especially concerning the Lucan writings, see Fuller, 70-100.

Johannine Studies. In Johannine studies, too, a remarkable change took place during the 20th century. No longer were commentators concerned primarily with the questions of authorship, date, and provenance. The earlier critics were intent upon studies of vivisection, partition, and rearrangements of the original order of the Fourth Gospel. Many now agreed with C. H. Dodd that it is "the duty of an interpreter at least to see what can be done with the document as it has come down to us before attempting to improve upon it."

Other modern positions on principal Johannine problems may be stated briefly. (1) Regarding authorship, most scholars were content to attribute the Fourth Gospel to an unknown disciple of the Apostle (so, more or less, C. H. Dodd, C. K. Barrett, and R. Bultmann), although R. H. Lightfoot noted that no one has shown it is impossible that the Apostle John was the author. (2) Regarding the date, the general tendency was toward A.D. 100 or even earlier. (3) On the question of John's relation to the Synoptics there was a shift from the older position that claimed John knew and used at least Mark and Luke to the total rejection of any dependence (so Dodd and Bultmann but not Barrett). B. Noack in Zur Johanneischen Tradition (Copenhagen 1954) and S. Schulz in Untersuchungen zur Menschensohn-Christologie im Johannes Evangelium (Göttingen 1957) made important contributions to the study of pre-Johannine material imbedded in the Johannine discourses (see Fuller, 112-115). (4) Whereas the older view of an Aramaic origin for the Fourth Gospel was received indifferently, few modern scholars rejected entirely M. Black's contention that there are Aramaic logia enshrined in the Fourth Gospel's discourses (see M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts [Oxford, 2nd ed. 1954]). (5) Various proposals were offered in the important study of the sources of Johannine theology. The more important sources suggested were: the OT and rabbinic literature (the conservative view), Greek philosophy and Greek religion (the older liberal view), the OT plus Greek influences by way of Hellenistic mysticism (so Dodd, Barrett, and others), and GNOSTICISM (so Bultmann and his school with variations in details) (see Fuller, 118–125).

The discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS opened up new avenues of approach to many Johannine problems. More recent studies arising from the material of the QUM'RAN COMMUNITY seemed to tend, at least in some measure, toward conservative positions in the questions of authorship, date, and provenance.

Pauline Studies. At the beginning of the 20th century the great problem concerning the Pauline Epistles was their authenticity. A century later only the Ephesians and the Pastorals are considered by some to be doubtfully authentic. The old question of the meaning of the term GA-LATIA is still being debated, though the weight of critical scholarship seems to be on the side of the defenders of the South-Galatian theory, who claim Paul used the term politically (see GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE). The provenance of the CAPTIVITY EPISTLES, the destination of the 16th chapter of Romans, and the literary unity of 2 Corinthians still exercise NT scholars.

Especially in the mid-20th century new and significant studies were published, including R. Bultmann, *The*ology of the New Testament, tr. K. Grobel (2 v. London 1955–56), which devoted more than 300 pages in v. 1 to an anthropological treatment of Pauline thought; J. Munck, Paul and the Salvation of Mankind, tr. F. Clarke (London and Richmond 1959), which stressed the concept of SALVATION HISTORY in Paul's writings [see C. K. Barrett, From First Adam to Last (New York 1962) for a similar treatment and R. H. Fuller, 54–68 for an appraisal of both Bultmann and Munck]; and R. Schnackenburg, New Testament Theology Today, which was widely consulted for all modern aspects of NT theology.

Catholic Exegesis. In the period following the Council of Trent Catholic exegesis was understandably characterized by a strong apologetic spirit, prompted by the polemical writings of the Protestants. Until about the middle of the 19th century Catholic exegetical works were, for the most part, little more than excellent compilations of Patristic citations fashioned into a strong defense of the chief doctrines of the Church and providing a treasury of homilectic source material. There were, of course, notable exceptions. J. MALDONATUS (d. 1583) composed excellent commentaries on the Gospels, which supplanted all previous Gospel commentaries (see J. M. Bover, "El P. Juan Maldonado, Theologo y escriturario," Razón y Fe 34 [1934] 481-504). G. ESTIUS (d. 1613) wrote outstanding expositions of the Pauline and Catholic Epistles, which became classics. The NT commentaries of Cornelius a Lapide (d. 1637) were, like his OT works mentioned above, mosaics of Patristic quotations and references (see R. Galdos, "De scripturisticis meritis Patris Cornelii a Lapide," Verbum Domini 17 [1937] 39-44, 88-96).

From the middle of the 19th century Catholic Biblical works of a more learned and scientific nature began to appear. Many now-famous collections had their beginnings after the mid-19th century: Cursus Sacrae Scripturae, Étude Bibliques, Exegetisches Handbuch zum A.T., Die Hl. Schrift des N.T., Die Hl. Schrift des A.T., Verbum Salutis, Herders Bibel Kommentar: Die Hl. Schrift für das Leben erklart, La Sainte Bible (Pirot-Clamer), Regensburger Neues Testament, and Die Echter-Bibel. Also many biblical periodicals under Catholic auspices made their appearance at this time: Revue Biblique, Biblische Studien, Biblische Zeitschrift, Biblische Zeitfragen, Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen, Biblica, Verbum Domini, The Catholic Biblical Quarterly, Revista Biblica, Estudios Biblicos, Cultura Biblica, Biblische Warte, Lumière et Vie, Bible et Vie Chrétienne, and The Bible Today. Evidence of the vitality of Catholic Biblical studies in the 20th century could be found in Catholic scholars' active participation in both national and international Congresses, whether sponsored by Catholic organizations or others.

Credit for the impetus given to Catholic Biblical studies must be accorded first to the Roman Pontiffs, Leo XIII for his encyclical PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS, Benedict XV for his encyclical SPIRITUS PARACLITUS, and especially Pius XII for his encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU. With full support and encouragement from the Church a new generation of highly equipped NT scholars emerged from such centers of Biblical studies as Rome, Jerusalem, Louvain, Paris, and Washington, D.C. Among the more familiar names of Catholic NT scholars of the latter half of the 20th century are those of B. M. Ahern, P. Benoit, M. E. Boismard, R. Brown, S. Lyonnet, B. Rigaux, K. H. Schelkle, R. Schnackenburg, C. Spicq, D. M. Stanley, B. Vawter, and A. Voegtle, to mention but a few. These and other outstanding scholars faced the more difficult problems of NT exegesis and made significant contributions to such questions as the historicity of the Gospels, the nature of the Evangelical parables, the unfolding and development of Pauline thought, and many thorny questions concerning the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, as well as such problems as the relation between the Bible and tradition as sources of revelation and the nature of Biblical inspiration.

In discussing the 20th century as a whole, special mention should be made of the rise of Biblical scholarship among American Catholics, who, after slow beginnings, made great progress. The Catholic Biblical Association of America (1936–), especially under its executive secretary L. F. Hartman (1948–), and The Catholic Biblical Quarterly (1939–) under a series of capable editors (W. REILLY, M. GRUENTHANER, E. F. Siegman, R. E. Murphy, and B. Vawter) received deserved praise for their efforts in behalf of the study of the Bible in America.

Bibliography: Pontifical Biblical Commission, "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church," Origins 23, no. 29 (Jan. 6, 1994) 497-524. R. M. GRANT, A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible (rev. ed. New York 1963). A. VINCENT, Judaism, tr. J. D. SCANLAN (London 1934). W. BACHER, Die exegetische Terminologie der jüdischen Traditionsliteratur (Leipzig 1899). W. BACHER, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901-06) 3:164-174. M. MIELZINER, Introduction to the Talmud (New York 1925) 115-187. S. ROSENBLATT, The Interpretation of the Bible in the Mishnah (Baltimore 1935). B. SMALLEY, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (2nd ed. New York 1952; repr. Notre Dame 1964). C. SPICQ, Esquisse d'une histoire de l'exégèse latine au moyen âge (Paris 1944). R. C. DENTAN, Preface to Old Testament Theology (rev. ed. New York 1963). H. H. ROWLEY ed., The Old Testament and Modern Study (Oxford 1951). R. H. FULLER, The New Testament in Current Study (New York 1962). A. M. HUNTER, Interpreting the New Testament, 1900-1950 (Philadelphia 1951). E. KÄSEMANN, Essays on New Testament Themes, tr. W. J. MONTA-GUE (London 1964). W. KLASSEN and G. F. SYNDER, eds., Current Issues in New Testament Interpretation (New York 1962). R. SCH-NACKENBURG, New Testament Theology Today, tr. D. ASKEW (New York 1963). A. ALLGEIER, "Exegetische Beiträge zur Geschichte des Griechischen vor dem Humanismus," Biblica 24 (1943) 261-288. B. ALTANER, "Zur Kenntnis des Hebräischen im Mittelalter," Biblische Zeitschrift 21 (1933) 288-308. B. BISCHOFF, "Wendepunkte in der Geschichte der lateinischen Exegese im Frühmittelalter," Sacris erudiri 6 (1954) 189-281. M. D. CHENU, "Les Deux âges de l'allégorisme scriptuaire au moyen âge," Revue de théologie ancienne et médiévale 18 (1951) 19-28. H. DE LUBAC, Exégèse médiévale, 2 v. in 4 (Paris 1959-64). A. KLEINHANS, "De studio Sacrae Scripturae in ordine Fratrum Minorum saeculo XIII," Antonianum 7 (1932) 413-440. M. L. W. LAISTNER, "Antiochene Exegesis in Western Europe during the Middle Ages," Harvard Theological Review 40 (1947) 19-31. A. LANDGRAF, "Zur Methode der biblischen Textkritik im 12. Jahrhundert," Biblica 10 (1929) 445-474. J. LECLERCQ, L'Amour des lettres et le désir de Dieu (Paris 1957). P. MANDONNET, "L'Enseignement de la Bible selon l'usage de Paris," Revue thomiste NS 12 (1929) 489-519; "Travaux des Dominicains sur les Saintes Écritures," Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX 5 v. (Paris 1895-1912) 2.2: 1463-82. R. E. MCNALLY, "Medieval Exegesis," Theological Studies 22 (1961) 445-454; The Bible in the Early Middle Ages (Woodstock Papers 4; Westminster, Md. 1959). B. SMALLEY, English Friars and Antiquity in the Early Fourteenth Century (New York 1960). F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium biblicum medii aevi, 7 v. (Madrid 1949-61).

[L. F. HARTMAN]

EXEMPLARISM

An epistemological or ontological teaching that makes extensive use of the notion of exemplar in explaining intelligent activity, both human and divine. An exemplar (Lat. exemplum, meaning a pattern or model) can be generally described as that in imitation of which something is made (or done) by an agent who himself determines the goal of his activity, i.e., an intelligent agent. According to this description, exemplar refers not only to a pattern or idea according to which a work is madeits usual meaning in philosophy-but also to a model for human action, as when Christ is spoken of as the Divine Exemplar. In any case, an exemplar is something whose likeness an intelligent agent seeks to realize as best he can, either in his action or in his work. Indeed it is a measure in the light of which he works to achieve a determinate effect. As such it exerts its own special type of CAUSALITY (see EXEMPLARY CAUSALITY).

The historical importance of this notion lies in the fact that it has figured prominently in theories of ultimate reality proposed by such noted minds as Plato, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas, to mention but a few. For the Christian theologian it holds special significance because of its association with the doctrine of the Word, "in Whom all created things take their being" (Col 1.16). This article, however, treats the subject philosophically and is not directly concerned with its theological applications (see EXEMPLARITY OF GOD). Its purpose is to trace the main historical development of exemplarism among the philosophers of the West, paying special attention to the doctrine of divine exemplarism found in Augustine and Aquinas. A brief report on the status of that doctrine in modern philosophy is also included, and, where appropriate, some indication given of its possible significance for the individual human person.

Platonic Exemplarism. Among the ancients PLATO is the first to propose a theory of forms or ideas as causes of sensible reality. Rejecting the position of his predecessors that the material universe can be adequately explained in terms of one or more material principles moving about by chance, he proposed instead that the essential distinction and order in things is the result of mind. In the Timaeus he holds that the demiurge, being good and wishing to communicate his goodness, fashioned the universe after an ideal pattern (29A). Again, in the Laws he maintains that the ruler of the universe has ordered all things with a view to the excellence and preservation of the whole (903B). Thus, according to Plato, the universe has been made and is ruled by an allpowerful and good being who acts in light of a preconceived end.

Subsistent Archetypes. While it would be logical to assume that the universe's plan is in the mind of its ruler and maker, there is good reason to believe that Plato regarded the world's pattern to have its own existence apart from the mind of the demiurge (cf. Tim. 28A). This is almost certainly the case with regard to the archetypes of the various classes of sensible reality. In the Timaeus, for instance, the statement is made that sensible changing things are ''likenesses of real existences modelled after their patterns in a wonderful and inexplicable manner'' (50). The ''real existences'' to which Plato refers are abstracted class concepts that he hypostatized and regarded as co-causes with material elements in the original production of things.

Strictly speaking, then, Plato's demiurge is not a creator, but is conceived as a human maker with the existence of matter (and forms) definitely assumed. Nor, ironically, can it be said that the forms are true exemplars, since they exist apart from the intentional order. In other words, a sensible substance's archetype would have to be that substance's idea existing in the mind of its maker. Still, it is to Plato's credit that he was the first philosopher to recognize that the universe manifests an intelligent plan, thereby revealing the wisdom and goodness of its maker.

Aristotle's Reaction. As generally known, ARISTOT-LE, Plato's long-time disciple and friend, found it necessary to repudiate his teacher's doctrine of ideas. According to the Stagirite, the ideas are not needed to explain sensible being and becoming, and furthermore, positing their existence leads to many absurd consequences (cf. Meta. 991a 8-b 9). On his part, however, he was unable to pursue the sound suggestion of PARTICIPATION contained in Plato's doctrine. Consequently, for want of a doctrine of CREATION, exemplarism does not figure prominently in his thought, and despite his expressed approval of the view that the universe is ruled by mind, one finds no evidence in Aristotle's writings that he consistently regarded this ruler as governing according to a preconceived plan. Indeed, as more than one Aristotelian scholar has noted, Aristotle's conception of God precludes Him from knowing any being except Himself.

Augustine's Divine Exemplars. With the advent of Christianity, a doctrine of creation enters the mainstream of Western European philosophy, and with it a doctrine of divine exemplarism. St. AUGUSTINE, though sympathetic to much in Plato, as a Christian had to reject the latter's doctrine of ideas, at least in its original form. Thus, according to Augustine, the archetypes of things are not, as Plato had erroneously thought, realities subsisting apart from the divine mind (Divers. quaest. 83.46.1-2). Nor are they contained in some intellect distinct from the First Principle, as PLOTINUS had maintained. Consequently, while he admired the Plotinian doctrine of the Nous in view of its close resemblance to the Christian doctrine of the Word, Augustine could not accept the emanation theory underlying it, according to which the universe proceeded by necessity from the One via the Nous and World Soul.

In the Christian view of creation, the universe was made directly by God in light of a plan that He had freely determined upon. Moreover, for Augustine, the ideas of all created things are contained in the Word, the Second Person of the Trinity, who is the same in substance with the Father. As to how one can in any sense acknowledge a plurality of Ideas in the divine intellect without at the same time compromising the divine simplicity, Augustine left no answer. Lacking an existential doctrine of participation, he was unable to root the divine ideas in the divine essence as imitable (Civ. 11.29). Finally, inasmuch as all things are made through Him, there can be nothing that is essentially EVIL—a point worth noting since Augustine, while a Manichean, had held an opposite position.

Exemplarity in Aquinas. While Augustine had relied primarily on his Christian faith to form his views on creation and exemplarism, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, though doubtlessly influenced by revelation, arrived at many of the same truths philosophically. His unique existential approach to reality enabled him to establish quite readily, by reason alone, the existence of an Absolute Being who is at once the ultimate efficient, exemplary, and final cause of all of finite reality. This provided a rational foundation for his Judeo-Christian belief in God as the Self-Existing Being (''I am Who am'') and Creator and Lord of the universe.

Doctrine of Creation. In his philosophy of creation, Aquinas sharply opposed both his Greek and Arabian predecessors, all of whom had viewed the universe as necessarily eternal. Although of the opinion that the universe's beginning in time is a truth entirely de fide, he also insisted, strictly on metaphysical grounds, that it would always require to be created, and freely (Summa theologiae 1a, 46.1). On this last point, St. Thomas took particular issue with the Arabian philosopher, AVICENNA, who taught that the universe proceeded from a plurality of causes by way of a necessary emanation beginning from God, the absolutely simple Being. Aquinas rejected such a theory of the universe's origin for several reasons: (1) It maintained that creatures can create; (2) it reduced God to the finite level by having a creature proceed from Him by natural necessity; and (3), of most concern here, it denied the role of divine wisdom in creation, since, according to this account, the distinction and order found in things proceeds not from the intention of a first agent, but from the accidental convergence of many causes, which is to say from CHANCE (De pot. 3.16).

In Aquinas's view, the multitude and distinction of things making up the order of the universe must be traced to the intellect of the first agent, God. For God, who alone is responsible for the original production of things (since only a being in act by its whole substance can produce the whole substance of another being—ibid. 3.4) has brought things into existence with a very definite purpose in mind. This purpose could only be to reflect His goodness. And inasmuch as that goodness is more adequately represented by a multitude of beings than it would be by any one creature alone, divine wisdom itself is responsible for the multitude and distinction of created things (Summa theologiae 1a, 47.2).

Multitude and Simplicity. In answer to the question posed by Neoplatonists as to how multitude and distinction can arise from an absolutely simple Being, St. Thomas had the following reply. God, in creating, does not act through any natural necessity but through His own intellect and will (De pot. 3.16 ad 5). Now in knowing His own essence perfectly, God knows it not only as it is in itself, but also as it can be participated in by creatures according to some degree of likeness. Consequently, in the very act whereby He knows Himself, God also knows the proper type of each and every thing He would and could create. It is in this manner, therefore, that the divine intellect can be said to contain many ideas without detriment, however, to the divine simplicity (ST 1a, 15.2).

St. BONAVENTURE, although not employing the notion of participation in his solution to this problem, would appear to be saying basically the same thing as Aquinas when he argues that the divine essence, since it is outside any genus, can be the likeness of each and every creature. (In 1 sent. 35.1.2 ad 2). For Aquinas, the divine essence is itself the exemplary cause of all finite reality, insofar as it is understood by God, with the proportion that each creature to be produced has to it (De ver. 3.2).

Participation of Existence. As just seen, St. Thomas, like Augustine before him, corrects Plato's theory of ideas by making the divine essence the supreme archetype in light of which each finite being is made and of which it can be said to participate according to some degree of likeness. In a word, the Platonic ideas are rejected in favor of the one Being to whom alone existence is proper. Since such a Being is the fullness of existence, all other beings participate (by way of likeness) in His infinite existence by receiving their existence from Him (C. gent. 1.75). Hence, while Aquinas borrowed the notion of participation from Plato, he adapted it to meet the demands of his own existential philosophy, within which context it comes to mean a participation in the perfection of EXISTENCE rather than in some absolute class idea that alone is regarded to be fully real. Since the essence of the finite being is a certain potentiality for existence that receives its actual existence from God, it is originally a possible imitation of the divine essence in the intellect of God (ibid. 1.54).

Divine Knowledge. A doctrine of divine exemplarism is therefore employed by St. Thomas to explain the determinate nature that characterizes the existence of each finite being and upon which gradation in being is consequent. Such a doctrine also implies God's providence and eternal law, for existence is conferred upon the creature in a determinate manner so that it can realize in its completed state the measure of the divine goodness for which it has been made. Furthermore, for Aquinas, even matter, although having no actual existence of its own, participates in some way in existence and therefore finds its prototype in God, but as part of the idea of the composite (De pot. 3.1 ad 12). Consequently, God's archetypal knowledge includes a knowledge of things, not only according to their specific or class nature, which is consequent upon form, but also according to their very INDI-VIDUATION, which is consequent upon matter (ST 1a, 14.11; De ver. 2.5).

On this particular question Aquinas opposed by anticipation the opinion of WILLIAM OF OCKHAM that seemingly denies to God archetypal knowledge of the various classes of things (for, according to Ockham, only the individual is real), as well as the views of certain ancient Greek philosophers and their followers who denied to God any knowledge of singulars. The importance of St. Thomas's position for the individual human person cannot be overemphasized, since it holds that each individual reality, oneself included, is known and loved by God as a reflection of Himself. As regards evil, since it is a privation of being, it bears no likeness to the divine essence and, consequently, has no exemplary idea in God, even though it is known by God as a certain absence of His goodness in the creature (De ver. 3.4).

Ontological Truth. St. Thomas's doctrine of exemplarism also contributes to a better understanding of the TRUTH OF BEING. Since the finite being is said to receive its existence from God, its truth is to be seen in its necessary conformity to the divine intellect. Hence, independent of their conformity to the human intellect, all things are essentially true by virtue of their necessary conformity with their proper mental types in the divine mind (ibid. 1.4). As Truth Itself, God is necessarily the ultimate source of the truth or intelligibility of every finite being. Thus is He said to be "the Light of the World," for it is according to an idea of Himself as imitable that all things are made and in Him that all creatures find their truth and ultimate meaning. In theological terms the end of creation is therefore to be seen in the glorification of the God-Man, since "through Him and for Him all things were made'' (Col 1.17). In St. Thomas's doctrine of the truth of being there is no room for the RELATIVISM so typical of contemporary thought.

Modern Philosophy. With the emergence of the modern period of Western European philosophy, the doctrine of exemplarism all but totally disappears. True, among the moderns one finds both René DESCARTES and G. W. LEIBNIZ accepting the Christian doctrine of creation, but little provision is made for it in their respective theories of reality. Thus, the proofs they generally advance for God's existence do not proceed from the fact of contingent existence, but from the concept of the perfect being.

Descartes. As regards exemplarism, Descartes maintained, in the voluntarist tradition, that the essences of things and their intrinsic possibility are contingent upon the divine will. Therefore, man's essence, for example, instead of being from all eternity a possible imitation of the divine essence in the divine intellect, is the product of divine decree, for, if God had so willed it, man could have been something other than a rational animal. Such a theory places the divine will beyond the law of contradiction, and in so doing, undermines the possibility of knowing God analogically. In his mechanistic explanation of the physical universe Descartes also dispensed with the need for divine CONCURRENCE and PROVIDENCE.

Leibniz. On the other hand, Leibniz's theory concerning the order of possibles-an order that he regarded as eternal in its own right-went to the opposite extreme of Descartes's position, making the divine will in some way subject to that order. In other words, he also failed to see that the intrinsic possibility of things is rooted in the divine essence as imitable. What is more, his intellectual determinism, according to which one must always choose the greater good, led him to deny of God liberty of specification with respect to His effects. Thus, having willed to create, God must create the best of all possible worlds. Leibniz's error here obviously consisted in not recognizing that the divine goodness is in no way bound to any created order of things, that it can be manifested in some degree in any universe God freely should choose to create.

Other Moderns. B. SPINOZA completely rejected the idea of a free creation, regarding all finite beings as modes of God's infinite substance.

A current of thought quite different from the RATIO-NALISM of DESCARTES, Spinoza, and Leibniz developed within the British empirical school, whose most notable representatives are T. HOBBES, J. LOCKE, and D. HUME (see EMPIRICISM). This school characteristically denied to the intellect any object in reality distinct from that of sense, thereby giving rise to POSITIVISM. Since their theories of knowledge restricted the human mind to the order of sense appearances, thus challenging the very possibility of metaphysics, none of the empiricists can be found supporting a doctrine of ideas.

Nor did this doctrine fare any better with modern IDEALISM, which originates from Immanuel KANT. In the idealistic stream of thought, no sharp distinction is drawn between the world and absolute mind, the result usually being some form of PANTHEISM.

Contemporary Schools. Finally, as regards the status of exemplarism in contemporary philosophy, it need only be noted that a doctrine maintaining the world to be a reflection of God's infinite goodness and beauty can hardly find fertile soil in the current schools of philosophy, all of which question the very possibility of proving God's existence and generally equate reality with the world of change.

See also. EMANATIONISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography: E. H. GILSON, The Christian Philosophy of Saint Augustine (New York 1960). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philopsophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–) 2:71–73, 258–270. J. D. COLLINS, History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). H. PINARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VA-CANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 3.2:2150–63. G. FAGGIN, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:47.

[T. J. KONDOLEON]

EXEMPLARITY OF GOD

The doctrine that God, besides being the efficient and final cause of CREATION, is also its exemplar. An exemplary cause is the model according to which something is made or done. The extramental model, if there be one, responds to an IDEA in the mind of the maker or doer. The exemplary cause is necessarily and intimately united with the final and efficient causes in producing an effect. However, it is properly called an extrinsic formal cause because of its affinity to the intrinsic formal cause, which intrinsically actualizes and specifies the effect. Thus, in educing the form (intrinsic formal cause) out of the clay, the potter (efficient cause) is guided by his idea (exemplary cause) of a vessel which must hold two quarts of water (final cause).

The doctrine of EXEMPLARISM began to be formulated when man first questioned how "the many" could come from "the one," or how one exemplar could be multiplied in many individuals. The scholastics solve the difficulty by saying: it is true that no creature can perfectly represent or imitate the divine perfection, which is infinite; but God, who is a voluntary agent, produces many creatures so that what is lacking to one creature's representational capacity is supplied by another's (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 1a, 47.1). The degrees of imitation of the divine essence range from the pure potentiality of prime matter to the superior beings which, while they approach God, can never be equal to Him because of His infinity (Summa contra Gentiles 2.45, 46). The uncreated ideas are many, and yet do not destroy the divine simplicity because they are identified with the divine essence. They are said to be "many"-even infinite in number-inasmuch as God knows His essence as imitable by creatures in an infinite number of ways (Summa theologiae 1a, 15.1-3; 44.3; In Dion. de div. nom. 4.2; 5.3).

The uncreated exemplars can be said to be the total idea that God has of Himself as imitable by creatures. Indeed, the Word is this total idea because He is the perfect expression, always actual, of the infinite number of ways that creatures can imitate God; and, in fact, "all things were made through him [the Word]" (Jn 1.3). Hence it is that the Word is the exemplar of creation, and that Christ is "the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of every creature'' (Col 1.15, 16; cf. Prv 8.30; St. Thomas, In Ioann. 1.2; In Col. 1.4).

See Also: CAUSALITY, DIVINE; EXEMPLARY CAUSALITY; IMAGE OF GOD; LOGOS; SIMILARITY.

Bibliography: A. AMPE, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 4.2:1870–78. L. VAN DER KERKEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1294–95. P. BEILLEVERT, Catholicisme 3:276–288. H. VOLK, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. H. FRIES (Munich 1962–63) 2:494–517. T. M. SPARKS, De divisione causae exemplaris apud S. Thomam (River Forest, Ill. 1936).

[C. J. CHERESO]

EXEMPLARY CAUSALITY

A special type of CAUSALITY associated with the doctrine of exemplarism and mainly discussed by scholastic philosophers and theologians. It specifies the determination or form of an effect as this is preconceived by an intelligent agent. While scholastics generally agree that the exemplary cause is not itself a fifth type of cause, they part company on the question to which of the traditional four it is more properly reduced. Some conceive it as a type of EFFICIENT CAUSALITY and others classify it under the causality of FORM; a third, and possibly more acceptable, position regards it as an aspect of FINAL CAU-SALITY.

A few thinkers, such as DUNS SCOTUS and F. SUÁREZ, regard exemplary causality as within the order of efficient causality, no doubt because of the exemplar's close connection with the will of the intelligent agent. Even St. THOMAS AQUINAS, who considered the exemplar to be a type of formal cause, occasionally refers to it as an operative idea (De ver. 2.3 ad 3; Summa Theologiae 1a, 15.1 ad 2). This is because the exemplary form or idea exerts its influence upon the effect only through the will (Summa Theologiae 1a, 14.8). It thus touches upon the very causality of the efficient cause, whence it is said to be an operative or productive idea.

Strictly speaking, however, since the exemplary cause is of the intentional order, being the idea of some form or determination to be realized in the effect, it is not a type of efficient cause. Rather its function is to direct the agent, measuring his action every step of the way. Because the exemplary cause is the form of the work as preconceived by the intelligent agent, St. Thomas and many of his followers regard it as reducible to the genus of formal cause. However, they then speak of it as being an extrinsic formal cause. While this view is certainly tenable, for the exemplar is a preconceived form, it has the weakness of doing violence to the intrinsic-extrinsic division of causes, according to which division the formal cause is intrinsic to the being of its effect.

Consequently, since the exemplary cause is extrinsic to the effect and exerts its influence as an idea in the intentional order, it is more properly reducible to final cause. Thus, while the final cause considered as a preconceived form of a work exerts an attractive influence upon the will of the agent, it performs at the same time a secondary role of measuring the agent's action; in the latter respect it is an exemplar. Since one might think that the exemplary cause is not always of the intentional order because the artist often selects for his model something already in existence—it must be noted that the object selected has been assimilated to the intellect of the artist, and that even in this case the artist is working under the influence of an idealized form (cf. De ver. 3.2).

Thus, while the exemplary cause does touch upon the areas of efficient and formal causality, precisely as exercising its influence as an idea in the intentional order it can be identified with the final cause.

See Also: EXEMPLARISM; NEOPLATONISM; EMANATIONISM.

Bibliography: C. A. HART, Thomistic Metaphysics: An Inquiry into the Act of Existing (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1959). G. GIRARDI Metafisica della causa esemplare in San Tommaso d'Aquino (Turin 1954). A. FOSSATI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienze, littere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1929–39) 2:46–47.

[T. KONDOLEON]

EXEMPLUM

A minor genre of medieval literature; a short moralized narrative used to illustrate the abstract theme of a sermon. Although such a device has probably been used informally by religious teachers in every age of the world, the exemplum as a literary type had definite historical associations and a limited period of florescence and decline. It was not characteristic of the PREACHING tradition in Europe until the 12th century, probably because of the strong emphasis on allegorical exegesis in scriptural commentary and homiletic method in the patristic period. The 12th-century renaissance in western Europe, which produced so much historical writing in Latin and such distinguished experiments in vernacular narratives as the lai and the romance, provided the impetus and the materials for the rise of the exemplum. In the early 13th century the movement of the preaching friars in various countries, committed to religious instruction of lay people through the vernacular sermon, created the great vogue of the exemplum for a century and more.

The anecdotes that form the substance of the type could be either religious or secular, and either historically true or fictional. The whole range of human experience was material for this sermon technique, and could be used for the fundamental purpose of providing a moral lesson. Often the exotic legend or the comic fable, by its inherent charm or amusing quality, provided the more disarming vehicle for the applied moralité. The personal reminiscenes of the preacher himself, or his reading of a historical literature, gave him the opportunity of creating a reportorial art, and this same skill often enabled him to adapt an anecdote that was centuries old so as to include local details or contemporary reference delightful to the listeners. Surviving exempla reveal the fondness for homely realism and a satirical spice that explain much in the comic spirit of late medieval and Renaissance writers such as Chaucer and Boccaccio. Narratives of conjugal life and its tensions humorously presented, antifeminist satire, jests told by the lowly and humble at the expense of the powerful and wealthy-these are the essence of many exempla. No better illustration of these qualities can be found than the "Nonnes Preestes Tale of the Cock and Hen." The homely but subtle exemplum on pride, told by Chaucer's pilgrim chaplain may well be the masterpiece of the The Canterbury Tales.

The 13th century was the era in which manuscript collections of exempla were first made and circulated as reference volumes for preachers. Such compilations had various principles of arrangement. Some of them were alphabetized by the virtues and vices commonly discussed in sermons, and contained the relevant anecdotes in serial order. This pattern is found in John of BROMYARD's Summa predicantium. Others were organized around a common theme, e.g., the fall of great men, and thus achieved a superior unity, as in Chaucer's "Monk's Tale," in which the repeated catastrophes create a sense of tragic irony. Continental collections are generally regarded as superior to those made in England. Among the best-known are those connected with the names of JACQUES DE VITRY, Étienne de Bourbon, VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS, and CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH. One such volume, gathered originally in England is a great work; known as the GESTA ROMANORUM, it contained and circulated widely a number of stories later elevated to masterful literary art by Shakespeare.

Bibliography: J. T. WELTER, L'Exemplum dans la littérature religieuse et didactique du moyen âge (Paris 1927). J. A. MOSHER, The Exemplum in the Early Religious and Didactic Literature of England (New York 1911). G. R. OWST, Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England (New York 1961). R. CANTEL and R. RICARD, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932—) 4.2:1892–1902.

[E. C. DUNN]

Exemption, in general, is a privilege whereby persons, places, or things are removed from the jurisdiction of a superior to whom they would otherwise be subject. Canon Law recognizes exemptions of persons other than institutes of consecrated life (for example, cardinals in Codex iuris canonici c. 357 §2), but it is the former which has been of primary interest in the history of the Church. In the Latin Church, the exemption of institutes of consecrated life implies their removal from the governance of the local ordinaries and their subjection to the Supreme Pontiff or other ecclesiastical authority (see Codex iuris canonici c. 592). This article traces the development of exemption as a canonical institution. Since this development was largely determined by the evolution of the religious state (status religiosus) and by changes in the historical situation of the Church, the five divisions of the article are chronological.

Preparations. The problem of exemption, or more precisely, episcopal exemption, did not arise in an acute form in the earlier centuries of MONASTICISM. It was only with the emergence of predominantly clerical communities after the sixth century, that it became necessary to balance the bishop's right to control the exercise of priestly ministry within his diocese against the rights of an abbot to direct the life and work of his subjects. By the middle of the fifth century, however, certain guiding principles had already emerged: the Council of CHALCE-DON (451) decreed that the bishop's permission was needed to erect a monastery and that monks must be subject to the bishop. The Council of ARLES (455) distinguished external affairs and those works of the monastery that were to be subject to the bishop from the monastery's internal affairs, in which the abbot's government was to be free of episcopal interference. During the 6th century this was the basis of most legislation regulating the relationship of monasteries and bishops, although with some local variations (African usage generally favoring greater freedom for the monastery and European usage demanding greater subjection to the bishop). Pope GREGORY THE GREAT (590-604) supported and refined the principle of Arles, especially with regard to monastic freedom from episcopal interference in electing abbots and in administering temporal goods; Gregory's frequent interventions in disputes between bishops and monks gave rise to a firm jurisprudence on many points.

Early Instances of Exemption. The first known instance of episcopal exemption in the proper sense of the term is the one granted by Pope HONORIUS I to the monastery of BOBBIO in 628. The motives for this grant were the personal prestige of its founder, St. COLUMBAN, the traditional monastic organization of the Church in the British Isles, and the special ethnic and geographical situation at Bobbio; precedents suggesting the juridical possibility of such a grant included the Germanic usage of the ecclesia propria (Eigenkirche, or PROPRIETARY CHURCH) and the Roman-law institution of immunitas, e.g., of military personnel from civilian jurisdiction. Among other early examples of exemption are the two monasteries of Benevento (714 and 741) and those of Fulda (751) and FARFA (775). CLUNY was exempt from its foundation (912) and was later allowed to communicate its exemption to other monasteries joining the CLUNIAC REFORM; this concession by Rome, in support of a particular reform, was later to become a pattern for much wider communication of privileges among religious.

Late Medieval Period. The foundation of the CIS-TERCIANS (1119) and of the MENDICANT ORDERS a century later, gave rise to new motives for exemption: centrally organized orders working in several dioceses could accomplish their purpose only if they had considerable autonomy. Consequently, in the later medieval period all religious came to enjoy exemption from the authority of the local ordinary. This of course raised difficulties of its own; the wide granting of full exemption seriously weakened the authority of bishops and readily lent itself to abuses. Protests were voiced at the Councils of CON-STANCE (1414–18) and Fifth LATERAN (1512–17), but no legislative changes were found to meet the problem.

Tridentine Period. Strong steps to limit occasions for such abuses were taken at the Council of TRENT (1545–63) and in the papal legislation that followed the council. Some powers over religious (especially over nuns) were given back to bishops; more importantly, the number of persons enjoying exemption was sharply reduced, especially when quasi-religious communities lacking solemn vows were rigorously excluded from any share in the canonical privileges of religious. At the same time (1549) PAUL III, in the constitution Licet debitum, granted complete exemption to the JESUITS.

Modern Era. The period following Trent was characterized by the flowering of the great congregations of simple vows. These enjoyed a sort of partial exemption not unlike that which had been favored by GREGORY THE GREAT, i.e., with the internal regime of the community free of the bishop's authority, but with its external works subject to him. A few of the new congregations were actually given the privilege of exemption (e.g., the REDEMP-TORISTS and PASSIONISTS), but most managed with a concurrently emerging jurisprudence of their own, whose major steps were the papal constitutions Quamvis iusto (BENEDICT XIV, 1749), and Conditae a Christo (LEO XIII, 1900). During the 20th century, the differences between exempt and nonexempt religious have been gradually but steadily diminished. The 1917 Code of Canon Law reasserted and strengthened the authority of bishops over all apostolic works in their territories. This authority, reiterated in conciliar and postconciliar documents, found expression in Codex iuris canonici c. 678, which subjects members of institutes to the authority of bishops in reference to the care of souls, public exercise of worship and other apostolic works. Further, while the 1983 Code refers to exemption in canon 591, the concept has almost been completed eliminated (see Huels).

Bibliography: A. SCHEUERMANN, Die Exemtion nach geltendem kirchlichen Recht mit einem Ueberlick über die geschichtliche Entwicklung (Paderborn 1938). E. FOGLIASSO, "De extensione iuridici instituti exemptionis religiosorum logice atque historice considerati," Salesianum 9 (1947) 1–64, 147–206, 318–359; Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 5:637–665. J. D. O'BRIEN, The Exemption of Religious in Church Law (Milwaukee 1943). J. HUELS, "The Demise of Religious Exemption," The Jurist 54 (1994) 40–55. D. J. KAY, Exemption: Origins of Exemption and Vatican Council II (Rome 1990).

[R. W. CROOKER/R. KASLYN]

EXETER, ANCIENT SEE OF

The Ancient See of Exeter was a diocese of southwest England. In 909 Abp. PLEGMUND OF CANTERBURY subdivided the Diocese of Sherborne into three dioceses: Somerset, Cornwall, and Devon (residential city at Crediton). In 1040 Devon and Cornwall were reunited and in 1050 Exeter replaced Crediton as the see city. The Saxon abbey church became the cathedral of Bp. Leofric (1046–70), the first bishop of Exeter. Bishop William Warelwast (1107-37), nephew of William the Conqueror, began building the Norman cathedral that was consecrated in 1133. The present Decorated cathedral, which retained the twin Norman towers over the north and south transepts, was begun c. 1275 and finished 90 years later, much of the work being done by Bps. Walter Bronescombe (1258-80), WALTER DE STAPELDON, Peter Quivil (1280-91), and John of Grandisson (1327-69), who added the famous minstrel's gallery in the north clerestory. The clock in the north transept is attributed to Peter Lightfoot, monk of GLASTONBURY. Bishop Peter COUR-TENAY gave the Peter Bell. Only a few fragments of the original Saxon church remain.

Important manuscripts in the episcopal library include the deed of EDWARD THE CONFESSOR that installed Leofric, the Exeter Book of AS poetry given by Leofric (tr. B. Thorpe, 1842), and the "Exon Domesday." Exeter was apparently the only English cathedral where all dignitaries and canons swore an oath to the bishop. Also, the chapter acknowledged the bishop's rights over a vacant deanery. Exeter was the site of a flourishing theological school. Later bishops included Edmund LACY (1419–55) and the reformer Miles COVERDALE (1551–53). In 1559 Exeter was made an Anglican bishopric.

Bibliography: G. OLIVER, The History of the City of Exeter, ed. E. SMIRKE (London 1861). E. A. FREEMAN, Exeter (4th ed. New York 1895). R. J. E. BOGGIS, A History of the Diocese of Exeter (Exeter 1922). K. EDWARDS, The English Secular Cathedrals in the Middle Ages (Manchester, Eng. 1949). V. HOPE and L. J. LLOYD, Exeter Cathedral: A Short History and Description (Exeter 1973). N. ORME, Exeter Cathedral as it Was 1050–1550 (Exeter 1986). M. J. SWANTON and J. ALLAN, Exeter Cathedral: A Celebration (Crediton 1991). F. KELLY, Medieval Art and Architecture at Exeter Cathedral ([s.l.] 1991).

[N. DENHOLM-YOUNG/EDS.]

EXISTENCE

In its root meaning, the word "existence" stands for presence or being present, the affirmation, manifestation, or appearance of something in any category, whether this be in nature, where it is known as material existence, or in mind, where it is known as ideal existence.

Notion of existence. Existence thus signifies the fact that something is present in nature or in mind, and this in a precise spatiotemporal way. It therefore preeminently asserts reality in act and points to BEING as the exercise or actualization of reality of any kind. As such, existence is primarily distinguished from and opposed to NONBEING or nothing; only secondarily is it distinguished from the possible (see POSSIBILITY). The possible differs from nothing in that nothing cannot be conceptualized and resists passage into being, whereas the possible can be conceptualized by mind and thus pass into being. Yet when the possible does not de facto pass into being, it has no existence in reality, that is, no existence in the full, true, and proper sense. Existence thus includes a content and is thereby related to ESSENCE. It is, in fact, the actualization of essence, its de facto placement (existere) in reality, since essence was possible before being actualized. One may say that essence exists in reality to the extent that it has passed from the sphere of possibility to that of actuality. Since it does not do this by its own powerotherwise possibility would become identical with reality-but through an external principle or cause, such existence implies the agency of some causal principle.

The affirmation of existence can be extended to formal logic and there signifies the attribution of a predicate to a subject. Similarly in the field of mathematics, one speaks of the existence of irrational numbers and of *n*dimensional space, to the extent that such entities or postulates are logically consistent and imply consequents of use in the mathematical sciences.

Exeter Cathedral, Devon, England. (©Michael Nicholson/CORBIS)

Intentional levels of existence. The idea of existence, like that of reality in general, can be located on various intentional levels and distinguished according to its proper content at each level. One can thus speak of experimental existence, which is immediately sensible, and of existence that is imagined or fictive, ideal, logical, artistic, moral, legal and so on, depending on the intentional medium used to represent a particular reality.

Primary Experience of Existence. Existence in its full, proper, and primary sense is that which is affirmed by immediate sensible and mental experience, whether this be direct or indirect and whether it come from experience that is external (objective existence) or from that which is internal (subjective existence). Such existence presents itself to thought in an immediate manifestation. It is in this sense that Aristotle claims it would be ridiculous to try to show the existence of nature (Phys. 193a 3) and that St. Thomas Aquinas advances the fact of selfperception against the Averroists (De unit. intell. 3). The de facto existence of external experience, for example, of the books on the table where I write or of the street I see from the window, is primary and is in a certain sense the foundation for the existence of internal experience (St. Thomas, In 3 sent. 23.1.2). But even the existence of internal experience is immediate; it is made evident in reflective awareness of life and activity on the part of the knowing subject. Its focus is the existence of the acts and functions of the subject's perception and of states of his soul, to the extent that these deal with the instinctive and reflective life of the individual (ibid. ad 3).

Existence of Soul and Its Faculties. Concomitantly and by implication, the individual comes to an awareness, though indirect and conditioned by his experience, of the proximate principles that produce his knowing acts. These are his powers or faculties, namely, (1) the sense faculties, recognized through sense experience, (2) the intellect, known in the act of understanding, and (3) the will, known in the act of volition (De malo 6.1 ad 18). The circle of existential experience, extending all the way to the intellect, is integrated in the unity of the soul's essence (In 3 sent. 23.1.2 ad 3). The presence or perception of the existence of these acts and potencies implies the presence of, and thus a profoundly basic insight into, the existence of the soul as a first principle, as well as some knowledge of its nature (De ver. 10.8 ad 8 in contrarium).

Existence of Privations. Privations are indirectly yet immediately perceived; these include all evils, whether of the physical order (bodily pains, sickness) or of the moral order (the malice of an act, of a bad habit or vice). Although not "real" in the strict sense, privations can be said to have existence without a proper essence, inasmuch as they are not "something," but merely indicate the fact of lack or absence in an apt subject. (See PRIVA-TION.)

It should be noted that the various perceptions of existence and the activities that produce them are complementary. In fact, when the structure of the object is disturbed, the subject loses the perception of the existence of the ego itself, and experience runs wild as in a dream world where there is no distinction between appearance and reality.

Mediate Knowledge of Existence. When knowledge of existence does not result from PERCEPTION but from DEMONSTRATION, it is referred to as mediate knowledge of existence. This applies to realities that are not or cannot be immediately present to the knowing subject, either because they are distant (in space) or absent (in time), or because their mode of existence transcends space and time, as for example, spiritual substances and God. Mediate knowledge of the existence of things distant or absent can result from various kinds of demonstration, depending on the type of knowledge proper to such objects, for example, experimentation, physico-mathematical demonstration, and scientific construction. Such demonstration can also convey an immediacy of experience, as seen, for example, in the physical and biological sciences. On the other hand, knowledge of the existence of superior or transcendent beings, for example, God, remains always and solely mediate knowledge, that is, knowledge achieved through demonstration. The starting point is the existence of created things precisely as these reveal themselves as effects of divine omnipotence, and the demonstration itself invokes the principle of CAUSALITY (St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae 1a, 2.1–3). Even so-called religious conversion and mystical experience cannot, strictly speaking, provide an immediate perception of the existence of God or of His attributes, but only that of particular effects associated with the spiritual life and its development.

Existence of the Supernatural. The only certain experience of the existence of the supernatural is the experience of the act of faith. In fact, without a special divine revelation no one can be certain of being in grace, but can only have conjectural knowledge of this (ibid. 1a2ae, 112.5). But everyone can, and should, have certainty of the existence of faith. Even though supernatural faith depends on a divine influx, it does require an act of man's intellect and will, and he himself can have a direct knowledge of this from both an objective and a subjective standpoint (ibid. 1a2ae, 112.5 ad 2; 2a2ae, 2.1 ad 3). The explanation for this lies in the fact that while the intellect is the foundation of man's unity of perception and thus can know both the existence and the nature of all the potencies that are actualized, including acts of the will, the will establishes in man a unity of action (ibid. 1a, 82.4 ad 1). For this reason, as S. A. Kierkegaard proved against G. E. LESSING and modern philosophers, the Christian's act of faith constitutes the decisive proof and the surest commitment the human person can have for God.

Formal Existence. In the abstract areas of logic, mathematics, art, morality, and the formal sciences in general, existence is not considered as an extramental and extrasubjective datum and fact. Thus it does not have the same connotation as existence in the strict sense as this is applied to factual reality.

HISTORY OF THE CONCEPT OF EXISTENCE

It is to Aristotle's credit that he distinguished with semantic rigor the problem of existence from that of essence ($\tau \delta \ \delta \tau \tau \ \tau \delta \ \delta \iota \delta \tau \tau$). For him, the first is related to the external causes, efficient and final, whereas the second is related to the intrinsic causes, matter and form (Anal. post. 78a 22–79a 16; Meta. 1041a 15–1041b 33).

Greek thought. In the terminology of ARISTOTLE, existence has two modes of being, potential and actual, since the plant exists in "some way" in the seed even before generation, as does the animal in the egg (Meta. 1046a 10–36). Yet for Aristotelian thought, which rises above the myth of origins and does not recognize the problem of creation, existence has no meaning in itself. Being means always and only an essence as actualized; spiritual and incorruptible essences are always actual, while material essences pass from potency to act in the eternal cycle of generation and corruption (cf. Gen. et cor. 335b 4). On the other hand, since ideas or pure forms do not exist in themselves, temporal existence is the only reality proper to material essences; to speak about the existence of "separate Ideas" is "to use empty words and poetical metaphors" (Meta. 1079b 26). For this reason, and because the world was viewed as eternal and matter as uncreated, Greek thought gave maximum significance to existence as the unique form for real being. In such a context, God Himself exists to the extent that His essence is an act like the property of an essence, or as a pure act of understanding; this distinguishes Him from other substances and forms (Meta. 1072b 25; 1074b 33).

For PARMENIDES, as opposed to Aristotle, existence is the presence of varied sensations gathered into a unity, into the truth of being that is the act of the intellect; likewise for HERACLITUS, the unity and truth of existing things is guaranteed by the logos. Both, therefore, affirm the truth of existence through the agency of the intellect. This truth of being, the pinnacle of Greek thought, was materialized by the Stoics when they identified the $\lambda \delta \gamma \circ \varsigma$ with the $\pi \vartheta \rho \tau \epsilon \chi \nu \iota \kappa \delta \nu$ or $\pi \nu \epsilon \vartheta \mu \alpha$ diffused through nature; thus the development of existence was entailed in the necessary evolution of the destiny ($\epsilon \iota \mu \alpha \rho \mu \epsilon \nu \eta$) of the All.

A similar process, but in a direction opposite to that of the Stoics, was the Neoplatonic concept of creation. In the thought of PLOTINUS, there is an emanation of the three primary Hypostases from the overflowing of the One according to the principle that each Thing complete in itself tends to reproduce itself (Enneads 5.1.6). According to PROCLUS, this takes the form of a procession that repeats and produces the hierarchy of formal values in the real order of participation (Elements of Theology, prop. 25–39). Thus, at the close of Greek philosophy, existence is reabsorbed into essence, real causality into formal derivation, and the $\pi \rho \hat{\alpha} \gamma \mu \alpha$ into the $\lambda \delta \gamma \circ \varsigma$.

Early Christian conceptions. The passage from the classical to the Christian concept of existence is marked especially by the knowledge of total creation through the free agency of divine will (Gn 1.1). Created existence is thus given an absolute and total dependence on God, and God's role in creation is conceived as a historical intervention, a real relation of temporal reality to the freedom of the divine will. Divine life in this way became transcendent and clearly above involvement in the world. Granting creation, the existence of the world is a contingent fact—as far as God is concerned, because He need not have created it; as far as the world is concerned, because its existence remains always dependent on a continuation of the divine influx (St. Gregory, Moral. 16.37; Patrologia Latina, 217 v. [Paris 1878–90] 75: 1143).

Thus a new aspect was seen in the concept of existence apart from its dependence on essence: the essence of things is related, according to the EXEMPLARISM of St. AUGUSTINE and of PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, to the knowledge of God, that is, to the divine intellect insofar as this conceives in itself the forms of the things it creates.

Arabian philosophy. Thus the Christian concept attributed the greatest possible concreteness to existence. On the other hand, ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY, faithful to the Neoplatonic concept of creation as necessary emanation through successive levels, denied God's direct knowledge of, and therefore providence over, the singulars that are the true existents. Yet in the thought of AL-FĀRĀBI and AVICENNA, closer to the theology of the KALĀM, God was conceived as necessary existence and the creature as possible existence. From this followed the basic contingency of existence came to be identified with divine causality sustaining the created world (see CAUSALITY, DIVINE).

In Arabian philosophy, existence, as an existential affirmation corresponding to the $\tau \delta \epsilon \hat{\iota} v \alpha \iota$ and to the $\delta \tau \iota$ of Aristotle, is indicated by the word ann $\bar{\iota} yya$ (the anitas of the Latin versions). This can also indicate the concrete existent that is the individual, as well as the subsisting archetypal idea. The Arabs could therefore distinguish essence (mah $\bar{\iota} ya$), existence as actualization of the essence (huw $\bar{\iota} ya$), existence as actuality or realized essence (wugud), and finally existence as fact and realization of fact (ann $\bar{\iota} yya$).

Scholasticism. At the beginning of the thirteenth century, the schoolmen followed for the most part the direction of Avicenna and reduced existence to a "relationship of dependence'' of the creature on God. This formulation appears most clearly in ROBERT GROSSE-TESTE (In 2 anal. post. 1.1). It received almost universal acceptance until recent times, although directly opposed to the Thomistic concept, which is treated fully below. Its chief promoter, HENRY OF GHENT, introduced a new terminology; discussing the structure of the finite, he distinguished a twofold esse, an esse essentiae, and an esse actualis existentiae (Quodl. 1.9). Thus existence, for him, indicated the simple fact of being or, rather, the passage of an essence from possibility to actuality; but since the creature remains ever dependent on divine causality, existence retained also an accidental connotation based on extrinsic participation.

Modern philosophers. This development was jeopardized by modern philosophers, who reduced the "moment of existence" to the sphere of PHENOMENA, that is, to immediate sense experience or so-called empirical reality. The significance of methodical doubt from R. DES-CARTES to D. HUME, I. KANT, and G. W. F. HEGEL, was that it considered as nonreality the whole realm of immediacy that was suppressed by making a new start with the cogito.

In Spinoza's monism, single existents are finite realities, united in the one Substance while themselves remaining multiple and transitory. B. SPINOZA reasserted the scholastic concept of existence under its formal aspect, but without its theological basis, and thus introduced a new rationalist concept of existence. His metaphysical "indifference," assigning existence to the realm of the irrational, was accepted by G. W. LEIBNIZ through the principle of SUFFICIENT REASON, implied both by the creation of this world as the best possible and by the appearance within it of single, real existents. C. WOLFF attempted a further clarification in terms of the realistic principles of the scholastic tradition. Defining existence in the Leibnizian manner as complementum possibilitatis, he explains that such completion signifies, in natural theology, dependence on God; in cosmology, the order of contingent things in the material world; and in psychology, the activity of the human mind in conceiving its thoughts.

In his precritical period, Kant found this definition to be too vague, as he did those of A. G. Baumgarten (existence is "complete inner determination") and those of C. A. Crusius (who reduced this to spatiotemporal determination), for failing to explain why existence is distinguished from possibility. Kant, therefore, inverted the order: for him, possibility presupposes and bases itself upon existence. Returning then to the Avicennianscholastic concept that existence cannot be deduced from essence, Kant in the critical writings conceives existence as an a priori category of the mind, a second instance of the modality opposed to nonbeing and situated between possibility-impossibility and necessity-contingency. Thus existence was related to space and time, as in Crusius's exposition, with the difference that the relation was a priori or transcendental (Critique of Pure Reason A 80, B 105). Unlike Hume, for whom existence, like substance and causality, is a subjective operation, or "idea," of the imagination derived from experience, Kant relates existence to the operation of the pure intellect as a category.

For existence Kant uses the two terms Dasein and Existenz almost indifferently; these acquire clearer distinction in the Hegelian dialectic. Dasein is the instance of empirical immediacy and multiplicity, and thus of nontruth, of the pure presentation of phenomena as leading to the mediation and to which pure being corresponds as identical to nonbeing; Existenz, on the other hand, indicates the instance of what Hegel calls "second immediacy" or "reflected immediacy" or "simple essential immediacy," which follows upon the mediation of essence and therefore explains the dialectical identity of contraries in action. Existenz may be called the instance of externality based on essence (Wesen), which is the moment of the underlying interiority, and their synthesis is reality (Wirklichkeit). In Existenz, the Sein of the Dasein has been brought back to its foundation (Grund), and Hegel can say that essence has "passed" into Existenz. In more formal terms, Existenz is defined as "the immediate unity of reflection-on-itself and of reflection on something else."

Contemporary philosophy. In post-Hegelian philosophy, and in particular with S. A. KIERKEGAARD and K. MARX, existence has asserted its primacy through definitions of the truth of being, although in different ways. In Kierkegaard and in Christian EXISTENTIALISM, existence lies in the act of freedom to choose the Absolute and to base oneself on it; in Marxism and in atheistic existentialism, on the other hand, existence is the choice of the finite. In Marxism this choice finds functional expression in the principles of collectivity and of class, while in leftist existentialism it finds expression as a function of the isolated individual.

In this way, existentialism and Marxism represent the distillation of modern philosophy. Putting the source of thought in doubt, they make the will and activity of the subject the foundation for the truth of both knowing and being, and this, as Hegel himself affirmed, following F. H. JACOBI, through a "leap" (Sprung) that is the dialectic itself. With such a subjective basis for the truth of being, will becomes the essence of the subject himself: modern metaphysics, therefore, as a metaphysics of SUBJECTIVI-TY, considers the essence of being to lie in the sense of willing. Thus existence passes from simple "fact," "position," "state," or "mode" of the real to some principle like the fundamental act of subjectivity.

THOMISTIC NOTION OF ESSE

Greek thought, unable to transcend essence in act or to conceive creation as a total origin of being, limited itself to conceiving existence as a fact. Christian philosophy likewise stopped at the fact of creation and regarded existence as a "given" based on the dependence of creatures on divine causality. The scholastic expression of this concept was formulated by thinkers who maintained the real identity of essence and existence, conceding essence and existence the same meaning (and distinction) as the possible and the real. Modern thinkers, making a "decision" (will) in favor of radical doubt as the source of thought, progressively freed themselves from essence as "content" and foundation, and elevated existence to real and theoretical priority by seeing it as act and related to the structure of being. Thus did the absence of a theoretical basis for existence as act in antithomistic scholasticism influence the rise and development of modern philosophy.

Meaning of esse. St. THOMAS AQUINAS was unique in conceiving being as id quod est, that is, the real subsistent that is a synthesis of essentia and esse; the term existentia indicates, for him, the simple "given" or fact and has no special theoretical relevance. Aquinas took his point of departure, however, from Avicenna (In 1 sent. 8.1.1.4). The synthesis or compounding of essentia and esse constitutes ens; essence is the content and esse the activating action, and ens is related to and includes both (In 4 Meta. 2.558). The concept of ens commune, the most common predication for all things, but requiring further determination by generic, specific, and individual notes, differs markedly from the divine esse, which is PURE ACT (De pot. 7.2 ad 6). The passage from esse commune to intensive esse is effected through the notion of PARTICIPATION. Ens is both concrete and universal in the sense of being the primary participant and the primary participation (In Boeth. de hebdom. 2).

In the synthesis that is ens, esse is the more formal principle, or the ACT par excellence, and this on two distinct levels. In the predicamental sense esse is the activation of essence, which itself is related to esse as potency (De pot. 7.2 ad 9). In the transcendental sense, to the extent that any other act or perfection pre-supposes and is founded on esse, the latter is the actualization of every act and the perfection of all perfections (Summa Theologiae 1a, 4.1 ad 3; 1a2ae, 2.5 ad 2). Esse is, therefore, the primary act, the simplest, most formal, most intimate, and most immediate (De anim. 1 ad 17, 9; De ver. 23.4 ad 7; Summa Theologiae 1a, 8.1; C. gent. 1.23). Consequently, as primary and absolute perfection, in itself including and transcending all perfections, esse is the most appropriate of all the names that can be attributed to God, or better-in light of the teaching on ANALOGYthe least inappropriate (In 1 sent. 8.1.3; De pot. 2.1; Summa Theologiae 1a, 13.2). Thus understood, esse is the proper effect of God and indicates the radical production of creation that affects not only BECOMING but primary matter itself and pure spiritual substances (Comp. theol. 1.68; C. gent. 3.66). This can be called the "intensive notion" of esse, as distinguished from the notion of existentia of the formal-predicative kind of Aristotle and the formal-causal (extrinsic) kind of the Augustinian-Avicennian tradition.

Esse and God. Thus, while God is Esse as the simplest Pure Act that transcends every finite intellect, a creature is most properly called ens in the sense of id quod habet esse (In lib. de caus. 6). The very nature of the creature, by contrast with God who is the esse per essentiam, is to be an ens per participationem. This implies both the total dependence of creature on Creator (Comp. theol. 1.68) and the composition of essence and esse as two constitutive and really distinct principles, related as potency and act (De spir. creat. 1). Both derive from precisely the same metaphysical necessity, and the one presents itself as completing the other. In this unique concept of esse the following notions are unified: 1. The Biblical concept of God as "He Who Is." In reserving the name of esse for God, St. Thomas follows a constant Hebrew and Christian tradition. The former, beginning with PHILO (De vita Moysis 1.14), found technical expression in M. MAIMONIDES (Dux perplex. 1.57), while the latter was affirmed among the Latins by St. Augustine and among the Greeks by Pseudo-Dionysius (De div. nom. 1, 5) and St. Gregory of Nyssa (C. Eunomium 8). 2. The Aristotelian concept of act as perfection and hence affirmation that is prior to and more perfect than potency. Thus, while there can be no potency without an accompanying act, act can well exist without potency (Meta. 1049b 10, 1051a 4). This metaphysical principle has its full intelligibility and truth only in the Thomistic concept of the ipsum esse, according to which God is called Esse Subsistens. The so-called formae subsistentes, the intelligences of Aristotelianism and of Neoplatonic EMANATIONISM are subsistent only in the formal sense, that is, as lacking matter, and not in a real way. In Thomism, esse is conceptually clarified through the Aristotelian notion of act, just as the speculative exigencies of the Aristotelian notion of act are fully realized only in the Thomistic concept of esse. 3. The Platonic concept of participation. The Aristotelian notions of potency and act, like those of matter and form, of SUBSTANCE and ACCIDENT, and of particular and universal, find their basic expression in the difference between the participated and the participating. In esse these obtain a theoretical consistency that can be applied to entities whose existence is not subject to change and coming-to-be.

Originality of the Thomistic concept. M. Heidegger makes esse the goal and highest end of philosophy, but affirms that the problem is to "think of being without thought" [Der Satz vom Grund (Pfullingen 1957) 148–156]; St. Thomas, on the other hand, shifting the emphasis from essentia to esse in his notion of ENS, furnishes a foundation sought in modern thought by radical DOUBT and in IDEALISM by the transcendental.

St. Thomas does not consider ens, like other notions that are always determined in themselves, as defined species in a genus, for ens transcends genera and species: the principle is already in Aristotle (Meta. 998b 22–26), but Aquinas understands it more profoundly. Again, St. Thomas never derives the concept of ens from a reflective process of ABSTRACTION, but gives it an absolute priority in the intentional order as the principle through which all other notions and insights are obtained (De ver. 1.1). Apprehension of ens is the first act of the agent intellect, which becomes the principle of development in the intellectual life (In 4 Meta. 6.605). This is followed by that of non-ens (De pot. 9.7 ad 15) and by the formulation of the principle of CONTRADICTION, which is the first principle of the intellect (Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2). Thus the notion of ens and the principle of contradiction flowing from it appear from the beginning in a transcendental sense and require practically a priori for understanding and furnishing an awareness of reality in terms of object and subject.

The absolute and necessary beginning of thought also finds its intentional expression in ens. This concept affirms the unity of perception of the knowing subject in the Thomistic sense of id quod est and id quod habet esse, and presents itself as the union of empirical experience, revealing being in actuality, and the act of the mind furnishing in a more or less confused way the content of reality as present. This initial evidence of a simultaneous sharing of ens between extramental reality and its apprehension by mind as present in act provides a basic reference for the structure of perception in general and for the later determination of the TRUTH of being. The Thomistic notion of ens, therefore, expresses not only its original synthesis of essence and esse, but attests and guarantees the constitutive sharing of being in man and of man in being, explaining why man seeks himself in being and why being clarifies itself in man. Unlike the transcendental Ich denke, which reduces being to the objectivity of the object (see Heidegger, Der Satz vom Grund, 154), ens links man to reality while setting him apart from himself and from the world, so that he may transcend both the SELF and the world in the search for Ipsum esse as the transcendental ABSOLUTE, principle and first cause of all reality and truth.

Knowledge of esse. Some modern authors hold that the Thomistic concept of esse, as an act of being in the strict sense, is seized by the mind in the act of JUDGMENT or in the synthesis of subject and predicate (F. Sladeckzek, K. Rahner, M. D. Roland-Gosselin, J. B. Lotz). They do this because they do not distinguish between existentia as an empirical datum (essentia in actu) and esse as a most intimate and profound constitutive principle: The first is accessible to experience and expresses itself in the judgment, whereas the second reveals itself only to the most advanced metaphysical reflection. Existentia, therefore, is affirmed either through a judgment of perception that attains the present singulars or through demonstration by means of a principle of causality or of similarity (per signum). Essence is known by abstracting the universal from particulars, based on an induction that is a function of the COGITATIVE power influenced by the intellect and above all by the principle of contradiction; thus it expresses itself through DEFINITION and through judgments in the formal order of "nature considered in itself." The activity that unveils esse in Thomistic metaphysics has a unique character and could be called a resolutio that is proper to metaphysics. When St. Thomas attributes to simple APPREHENSION the knowledge of material essences through abstraction and assigns the ipsum esse rei to the second act of the mind (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.3), he is speaking of an esse that pertains to the ontological, logical, and phenomenological orders, and not strictly of the esse that in God is His essence and in creatures is a substantial act distinct from essence and the effect of God Himself.

In Thomistic metaphysics, proceeding as it does from act to act, resolving the less perfect to the more perfect, the Esse Ipsum constitutes the final reference for every actuality. Its apprehension is neither intuitive nor abstract but rather a type of "dialectical emergence." Just as the apprehension of ens underlies the perception of reality, the apprehension of first principles, and the abstraction of essences, so the apprehension of esse as metaphysical act presupposes existential perception as much as intuition and abstraction, and is located at the apex of their convergence. It is obtained, for St. Thomas, by recourse to ARGUMENTATION; this, however, is purely revelatory, bringing to light the originality of esse or demonstrating the real distinction between esse and essence in creatures and their identity in God. It is a "dialectical" kind of knowledge to the extent that esse as such is act and not content; thus the apprehension of esse occurs "by emergence," whereby the concept of act is approached as a first principle and foundation, and so reveals the ultimate stage of agreement between intellect and reality.

See Also: EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS; ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE; MATTER AND FORM; POTENCY AND ACT.

Bibliography: C. A. HART, Thomistic Metaphysics (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1959). T. C. O'BRIEN, Metaphysics and the Existence of God (Washington 1960). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, Introduction to the Philosophy of Being (New York 1955). L. DE RAEYMAEKER, The Philosophy of Being, tr. E. H. ZIEGELMEYER (St. Louis 1954). J. F. ANDERSON, The Bond of Being (St. Louis, 1949). É. H. GILSON, L'Être et l'essence (2d ed. Paris 1962); Being and Some Philosophers (2d ed. Toronto 1952). J. MARITAIN, Existence and the Existent, tr. L. GALANTIÈRE and G. B. PHELAN (New York 1948). C. FABRO, "La problematica dell 'esse' Tomistico," Aquinas 2 (1959) 194-225; La nozione metafisica di partecipazióne secondo S. Tommaso d'Aquino (2d ed. Turin 1950); Participation et causalité selon S. Thomas d'Aquin (Louvain 1961); Partecipaziéne e causalité secondo S. Tommaso d'Aquino (Turin 1960); "Dell'ente di Aristotele all' 'esse' di S. Tommaso,'' Aquinas 1 (1958) 5-39; ''Dell'ente, dell'essere e del nulla," La Philosophie et ses problèmes . . . études . . . offert à R. Jolivet (Paris 1960); "Per la determinazione dell' "essere," Tijdschrift voor Philosophie 23.1 (1961) 97–129; "The Problem of Being and the Destiny of Man," International Philosophical Quarterly 1 (1961) 407–436. A. THALHEIMER, Meaning of the Terms: "Existence" and "Reality" (Princeton 1920); Existential Metaphysics (New York 1960). J. DE FINANCE, Être et agir dans la philosophie de Saint Thomas (Paris 1945). J. B. LOTZ, Das Urteil und das Sein (Pullach-Munich 1957). J. HEGYI, Die Bedeutung des Seins (Pullach-Munich 1959). A. MARC, L'Idée de l'être chez Saint Thomas et dans la scholastique postérieure (Paris 1933).

[C. FABRO]

EXISTENTIAL ETHICS

Existential ethics, as distinguished from situational ethics, refers to the contemporary attempt of Catholic theologians, especially in Germany, to work out a concrete, existential, individual ethics that will supplement traditional scholastic ethics, which they regard as limited to an abstract, essential, universal frame of reference. These thinkers, insisting on the uniqueness of the individual moral situation, deny the sufficiency of any straightforward application of universal moral principles to such a situation. According to them, the general moral norms do not cover the existential moment of self-commitment in a concrete situation, and therefore cannot tell the individual what he must do. In other words, the will of God for an existing individual in a concrete situation cannot be adequately expressed in terms of conclusions from the NATURAL LAW. The norms of the natural law can give no more than a "case" of the general, and so cannot express the complete moral demands of the individual situation. For there is a positive individual element belonging to the concrete moral act that escapes even the subtlest CASU-ISTRY.

Individual vs. Situational Ethics. This is not to say that the concrete duty of the individual is not also a case and an application of a universal law or laws. It is indeed this; in fact, it receives a large part of its justification from the general law. But beyond this exemplification of the universal it is the expression of an individual call that demands a comparably individual answer. Or, to put it in another way, whereas the "cases" of the universal law can be known and stated in objective universal concepts, the individual, concrete, moral duty has a uniqueness that can be expressed fully only in a kind of nonobjective, peculiarly personal, subjective knowledge. This contrast between objective and subjective existence reflects the existentialist and phenomenological cast of the thinking of the theologians espousing this type of ethics (see EXIS-TENTIALISM; PHENOMENOLOGY).

Existential ethics is similar to situational ethics in this emphasis on the individual and subjective side of moral experience. It is distinguished from situational ethics in that it undertakes its portrayal of the strictly individual duty within the framework of a traditional, universal, essential ethical theory. Existential ethics, then, is best understood as a complement and corrective to traditional Thomistic ethics rather than as a complete, independent system. For this reason, if for no other, it would escape the condemnation of purely situational ethics that was promulgated by the Holy See in 1952 [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 413–19].

Uniqueness of the Situation. Perhaps existential ethics can be best described in terms of the concrete moral challenge each man has to face. This challenge has a double aspect. It can be described according to its content and according to its mode of realization. In both of these aspects the style and approach of phenomenological existentialism exert a strong influence. The content of the moral act is described phenomenologically so that in addition to the objective description of the object and circumstances traditionally discussed, existential ethics adds "the sense of the concrete situation" (Heidegger's Befindlichkeit). For example, a traditional moralist will give as essential circumstances of stealing that the property belong to someone else and that it be taken against his reasonable will; or of fornication that the two persons be unmarried. The existentialist would say that this describes the objective, "essential" situation. To it he adds "the sense of the concrete situation," i.e., the reality out of which the individual's distinct being is formed and which the individual in turn determines. It contains a personal sense of finitude and contingency and a sense of being cast out into the world with no roots or supports of one's own. It is a point of tension with objective and subjective factors. In a sense, it is the point of intersection of the universal laws that apply to a given situation, plus a peculiarly individual law that applies to the person at this specific point of his historical development. From this there comes an individual imperative, tailored to the present state of a soul, an individual arrangement and predetermination for men as individuals standing at particular crossroads of life.

"I-Thou" Relationship. In addition to this emphasis on the uniqueness of each individual situation, existential ethics lays great stress on the "I-Thou" relationship between each person and those who come into his life, and between each person and God. Here, as in every variety of existentialism, we find a sharp distinction drawn between persons and things or objects. Traditionally, we are told, moralists missed the importance of this distinction and tended to treat persons as they did objects. They set up an objective framework of rights and duties that dealt with cold abstractions expressed in universal norms. From this it is difficult to reach down to the warm, living concreteness of moral experience.

The existentialists prefer to have man establish a loving "I-Thou" relationship with his neighbor. They claim that man can often know what this personal relationship demands of him without his having to go through any complicated coordination and application of universal moral principles. Love is the key to this intuition of duty. It keeps one from considering the individual as a composite of universals and reveals his unique personal being.

The "I-Thou" relationship to God is built around the same loving commitment to another person. No longer is God a remote legislator. Instead, He is the infinite Thou, who calls man personally and immediately. This call is indeed a command, but much more than a universal commandment. God's commanding will is a clear call and is morally binding, even in what have been traditionally considered as matters of counsel. Thus a call to the religious life would seem to bind under pain of sin. This call of God, which can refer to any area of life, religious or secular, is not heard by all men. One has to be well attuned to God's voice to hear His call, and this takes a "charismatic art" of discernment of spirits and a special prudence. This discernment and prudence are the outgrowth of a personal immediacy with God that is inspired by faith and love.

In view of this orientation to love rather than law, it is not surprising that the proponents of existential ethics look on morality as a personal challenge to surrender oneself to God that outstrips all objective norms and any purely legal morality. Man must act from his whole heart with a firm grasp of inner truth. He has to be aware of the divine demand on him personally to engage himself totally in the concrete moral challenge. When he does, he will realize that this alone will give him the truly personal life that alone can satisfy him, namely, one in which he comes to grips with absolute, transobjective moral value in direct confrontation with God.

Evaluation and Critique. Historically and ideologically existential ethics can be considered as an attempt to integrate the subjective elements of Protestant theology and the phenomenological insights of existentialism into Catholic moral theology. Taken in this light, it is not an attack on traditional views, but an attack on the exaggerated objectivism of extreme voluntaristic nominalism and its accompanying legalism. Existential ethics emphasizes the personal in a way that augments without contradicting traditional moral theology. It claims to give a less artificial and more realistic moral theory by putting the loving will of God at the center of all morality. Man's personal response to God's personal love for him is not the observance of a commandment but the loving embrace of His will.

The one outstanding figure in the discussion of existential ethics is Karl RAHNER, who exposes this doctrine in his Gefahren im heutigen Katholizismus (Einsiedeln 1950) and Das Dynamische in der Kirche (Freiburg 1958). Two other moral theologians, Joseph Fuchs and Bernard Häring, lean toward existential ethics, but cannot properly be called proponents of it.

There has been favorable reaction to the proposals of these thinkers among Catholic moral theologians. Many have approved their emphasis on love and have, in their turn, suggested that charity be put at the heart of moral theology. There have been, however, three main objections to the moral theories of existential ethics. First, some theologians-protestations of its proponents to the contrary notwithstanding-think that existential ethics undermines traditional objective morality and falls into a dangerous SUBJECTIVISM. These critics reject the claim that existential ethics is but an extension of traditional Catholic morality, which goes beyond it without denying it. Secondly, and this complaint is more widely voiced, some hold that existential ethics wipes out the distinction between commandment and counsel. For, in some instances at least, it would seem that one is supposed to perceive a command from God to enter the religious life or to marry some particular person, and so understands that he is obliged to enter religion or marry the person in question. Thirdly, some Thomists object that existential ethics is based on a misunderstanding of the role of prudence in the direction of human action, and in reality solves only a pseudo-problem.

It is unlikely that existential ethics will be generally accepted by Catholic theologians until these points are clarified to their general satisfaction.

See Also: PRUDENCE; MORAL THEOLOGY; HUMAN ACT; MORALITY.

Bibliography: F. BÖCKLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1301–04. J. D. GERKEN, Toward a Theology of the Layman (New York 1963) 54–81, 107–52. J. FUCHS, "Situation Ethics and Theology," Theology Digest 2 (1954) 25–30. This appeared originally as "Situationsethik in theologischer Sicht" in Scholastik 27 (1952) 161–83. W. A. WALLACE, "Existential Ethics: A Thomistic Appraisal," The Thomist 27 (1963) 493–515.

[J. V. MCGLYNN]

EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS

A METAPHYSICS that is existence-oriented, as opposed to one that is essence-oriented. The term is usually applied to the 20th-century emphasis within THOMISM that stresses the existential significance of philosophical (and theological) ideas, i.e., the way in which such ideas indicate or connote forms or aspects of that which either "is" or "can be" (see EXISTENCE). Proponents of existential metaphysics have been concerned mainly with ontological doctrines relating to the nature of being and of God, of potency and act, of the transcendentals, of essence, analogy, causality, and substance, as well as with the notions of man, the soul, freedom, nature, time, eternity, morality, the good, love, charity, and grace.

Origins. According to existentialist Thomists, the assertion of the primacy of the act of existing and of the centrality of its significance throughout all areas of knowledge seems novel, not because it is absent from the thought of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, but because that thought was formerly not studied in its original context. As recently as 1929, they point out, MARÉCHAL defined metaphysics in Wolffian fashion as "the science of essences, or of possibles" [Revue néo-scolastique de philosophie 31 (1929); reprinted in Mélanges Joseph Maréchal (Brussels 1950) 1:106], while three years later R. GARRI-GOU-LAGRANGE held that the object of metaphysics is "the intelligible being of sensible things, their essence confusedly known'' [Le réalisme de principe de finalité (Paris 1932) 30]. These and similar teachings accented ESSENCE as the absolutely certain, self-evident, universal, and necessary ground of the principles of identity, sufficient reason, and causality; they created the impression that SCHOLASTICISM, and Thomism itself, was basically a rationalistic essentialism (see RATIONALISM). Such a conception, they stress, missed the capital point, often made by St. Thomas himself, that the act of existing (esse) makes anything "to be," and to be all that it "is": "esse est actualitas omnis formae vel naturae" (st, 1a, 3.4); "esse est inter omnia perfectissimum . . . perfectio omnium perfectionum" (De pot. 7.2 ad 9). Therefore, considered maximally, the act of existing "includes in itself every perfection of being" (omnem perfectionem essendi), while transcending them all (De spir. creat. 8 ad 3). "Essence," or QUIDDITY, on the other hand, is but "that through which and in which a being [ens] has existence [esse]" (De ente 1). Thus the term essence in Thomism designates precisely a subject-measure of esse [see G. Phelan, "The Being of Creatures," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 31 (1957), 118-125; W. Carlo, "The Rôle of Essence in Existential Metaphysics," International Philosophical Quarterly 2 (1962) 557-590].

Yet the type of Thomistic metaphysical doctrine that may be described as a rationalistic essentialism has never been universally accepted among Thomists. In the early 1930s Jacques Maritain presented Thomism as an "existential" philosophy, always tending toward and terminating in existence [Sept Leçons sur l'être (Paris 1934) 28–31]. Somewhat earlier Aimé Forest expounded a "concrete" and "existential" approach to the metaphysics of St. Thomas [La structure métaphysique du concret selon S. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1931; 2d ed. 1956)], stressing the composition of essence and existence as constituting the primary form of the structure of created being, leading up to God as the universal cause of "being" (essendi). At about the same time, André Marc argued that this same composition, or distinction, lies at the very core of the Thomistic notion of being ["L'Idée de l'être chez Saint Thomas et dans la scolastique postérieure," Archives de philosophie 10 (1933) 1-144]. A few years later, in the work of Fabro and Geiger, one finds an elaborate interpretation of the Thomistic metaphysics of existential PARTICIPATION, according to which the distinction between essence and esse is not a simple application of the Aristotelian doctrine of potency and act, but rather represents an original insight of St. Thomas implying the primacy and centrality of esse. For Fabro, in particular, participation means the sharing of esse; the creature "is" that which shares esse [C. Fabro, La nozione metafisica di partecipazione secondo S. Tommaso d'Aquino (Milan 1939); L.-B. Geiger, La Participation dans la philosophie de S. Thomas d'Aquin (Paris 1942; 2d ed. 1952)].

For English-speaking audiences, however, it has been principally the work of J. Maritain and É. Gilson that his brought to the fore this notion of an existentially oriented metaphysics (see THOMISM, 2, 3). As already noted, Maritain had made this point in the 1930s. In the 1940s he developed it further (e.g., in his Court Traité de l'existence et de l'existent, [Paris 1947 Eng. tr. 1948]). Yet the fact remains that the difficulty and the profundity of Maritain's writing have obscured the point for many. In North America, especially, it was left to Gilson to make the matter clear in a series of scholarly works whose influence there, above all, has been unparalleled by that of any other writer. Indeed, the phrase "existential metaphysics of St. Thomas'' (as opposed to "essential ontologies," scholastic or other) may be said to be the hallmark of the Gilsonian influence on this continent.

Gilson's Thesis. In the late 1920s and early 1930s Gilson was already insisting that the "philosophy" of St. Thomas could not be divorced from his theology since it in fact existed only within that context; that his integral thought is centered upon Being—which "is" God; and that since philosophy is necessarily about being, it cannot but be, ultimately, about God. For indeed God's self-given name is "He who is" (Ex 3.14), and this means precisely the very act of existing: ipsum esse, as St. Thomas explains (Summa theologiae 1a, 13.11). Thus Gilson, as early as the Gifford Lectures of 1931–32, was showing that Christianity, in raising man's thoughts to the consideration of the Self-subsisting Act of Being—ipsum esse, or ipsum esse per se subsistens, had revealed to metaphysics the radically existential nature of its object. Accordingly, the problem of being, thanks to revelation, was expressly raised from the Platonic and Aristotelian "plane of intelligibility" to the "plane of existence'' [L'Esprit de la philosophie mediévale (Paris 1932) 54-55; Eng. tr. (New York 1940) 51, 80, 82]. As he later remarked, "to use our own modern terminology let us say that a Christian's philosophy is 'existential' in its own right" [God and Philosophy (New Haven 1941) 4:1]. Detailed application of this general Christian "existentialism" to Thomism was made soon thereafter, the author contrasting "essentialist ontologies," which equate being and essence, with "the existential ontology" of St. Thomas, which affirms "the radical primacy of existence over essence [Le Thomisme (4th ed. Paris 1942; 5th ed. 1944) part 1, chs. 1, 4].

Such an existentialist metaphysics, however, is not an "existentialism-without-essence"-a formula that may be said to characterize much contemporary non-Thomistic, and especially atheistic, EXISTENTIALISM, or "apocryphal existentialism," (''l'existentialisme apocryphe'') as Maritain calls it [Court traité . . . (Paris 1947) 13]. Authentic existentialism is radically different; in fact it is simply the reverse because it affirms that esse is in no case without essence, but rather that esse is the "act" of which "essence" is the inseparable measure or mode, save in God, whose essence "is" esse. In other words, the primacy of the act of existing over essence cannot be understood as a primacy of esse over ens: to remove essentia from ens would be to take the "what" out of the "what-is." "There is no real being which is not an actually existing essence and an existent conceivable through the essence which defines it'' [Gilson, "Existence and Philosophy," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting (1946) 9].

Esse, of course, is not ens, except in God; but rather is the "act" that makes ens "to be," and to be totally; whereas essentia, in all created things, is the factor within ens, or created substance, that makes it to be "what" it is. And the "is" is prior to the "what" as "act" is prior to "potentiality," insofar as the latter term is understood to signify a certain receptive capacity relative to the esse, or act of existing, that is received (C. gent. 2.53; st 1a, 77.1).

Christian Philosophy. For Gilson, "a Christian's philosophy is existential in its own right." Such a philosophy, therefore, necessarily, even if implicitly, involves the consideration of being in terms primarily of esse. This is so because God Himself, who "is" Being, has taught man that His own proper name is "Esse" (Ex 3.14). To characterize a philosophy as Christian, Hebrew, Hindu, or Mohammedan is not to define its "essence," but rather to indicate its "state," or its actual condition in the person philosophizing [see Maritain, De la philosophie Chrétienne (Paris 1933) 37-39]. For philosophy is a "work of reason"; indeed, philosophical wisdom, according to St. Thomas, is objectively a perfect work of reason: "perfectum usum rationis" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 45.2). Nevertheless, reason is not any less reason for existing in a Christian, a Hebrew, a Hindu, or a Muslim. Thus it makes sense existentially and historically to designate a philosophy as Christian, Hebrew, Hindu, or Muslim. The concern here is only the first of these, and precisely as formulated in the question: What is the relationship of existential metaphysics to the notion of a philosophy elaborated under the aegis of Christian revelation in general and of the "I-am-who-am" in particular?

According to Aquinas, if God is self-subsisting esse and if the subject of metaphysics is that whose act is esse universally present in everything else ("common being"; Summa theologiae 1a, 105.5; C. gent. 2.45), then this science in its totality is radically "existential." But that God "is" Esse, although knowable by natural reason, was known, or known determinately, thanks only to revelation. This is a matter of historical fact. So, in saying that God is "He who is," or ipsum esse-only this scholastic exegesis is metaphysically relevant hererevelation, and not reason, was establishing the act of existing (esse) "as the deepest layer of reality as well as the supreme attribute of the divinity" (GILSON, God and Philosophy, 41). Consequently the Christian metaphysician henceforth could not adequately philosophize about being unless his thinking was focused upon the "act" (esse) that alone makes his object "to be." Indeed, esse, as the "act" par excellence, is the source of all that deserves the name of "being." At the same time it is in all things the deepest, inmost presence: "esse est illud quod est magis intimum cuilibet, et quod profundius omnibus inest'' (Summa theologiae 1a, 8.1).

These truths about being, and any others that are rationally ascertainable, are not regarded by Aquinas as withdrawn from the domain of philosophy because they happen to have been revealed. For truth about God is twofold, viz, that which can and that which cannot be investigated by reason; and it is fitting that both should be offered to man's belief through a divine revelation (C. gent. 1.4, 5). Now, knowledge of God under the aspect of being is accessible to reason because universal "being" is the adequate object of the intellect intellectus facultas entis; capax universi. This knowledge of God is, precisely, metaphysics about Him; and it is called natural theology. Since the ultimate object of philosophy and of theology is the same, viz, God, or the Ens that is Esse, there is objectively no conflict between them [Gilson, Elements of Christian Philosophy (New York 1959)]. In this, however, there is no implication that their subjects are the same. God is not that of which metaphysics formally treats, which is "common being"; He is its Principal, or extrinsic Cause (In Boeth. de Trin. 5.4). Moreover, if metaphysics is ineluctably existential because it concerns that whose "act" is "to be," it does not follow that the pure "To Be," which is God, is its starting point. The opposite is true: metaphysics begins its investigation by considering the being of external, sensible things, and ends with God as the absolute Act of Being, who is their Cause.

See Also: CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY; FAITH AND REASON; THEOLOGY, NATURAL.

Bibliography: "The Philosophy of Being," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 21 (1946) 1-207. J. F. ANDERSON, The Bond of Being (St. Louis 1949); "Some Disputed Questions on Our Knowledge of Being," Review of Metaphysics 11 (1957-58) 550-568. THOMAS AQUINAS, An Introduction to the Metaphysics of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. J. F. ANDERSON (Chicago 1953), selected texts. C. A. HART, Thomistic Metaphysics (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1959). É. H. GILSON, L'Être et l'essence (2d ed. Paris 1962); Being and Some Philosophers (2d ed. Toronto 1952); The Christian Philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas, tr. L. K. SHOOK (New York 1956). J. MARITAIN, Existence and the Existent, tr. L. GALANTIÈRE and G. B. PHELAN (New York 1948); A Preface to Metaphysics: Seven Lectures on Being (New York 1939). E. L. MASCALL, Existence and Analogy (New York 1949); He Who Is (New York 1948). E. G. SALMON, The Good in Existential Metaphysics (Milwaukee 1953).

[J. F. ANDERSON]

EXISTENTIAL PSYCHOLOGY

A comprehensive scientific theory that attempted to integrate the contributions of various behavioral sciences, and should therefore be distinguished from existential philosophy, psychiatry, and psychotherapy. Existential psychology required for its integration basic and comprehensive notions concerning man's nature. It found some of these in its existential attitude toward man, others in its phenomenological approach, and still others in contributions from different schools of psychology and psychiatry. It sought to advance the understanding of human existence by encouraging the dialogue between the behavioral sciences and the phenomenology of man, and by integrating the theories and data of psychology and psychiatry into a science based on knowledge of man's essential nature.

Basic Constructs. The ultimate aim of every science is systematic explanation and orderly understanding. In the 1960s the science of psychology began to move toward the construction of comprehensive theories that could integrate the phenomena and constructs of its various schools. Although such phenomena are interrelated, being themselves expressions of man's nature, the interrelationship can be made explicit only when they are expressed in the same language or—what is analogous integrated within a common frame of reference. Such a common frame of reference is that provided by a phenomenological description of the original experiences that are differently interpreted by the various schools. The fundamental structures of such experiences, however, require a comprehensive concept for their further integration, and the existential psychologist finds this in the notion of existence.

Existence. The term existence in this context refers to the fact that man's essence is to find himself bodily with others in the world. Man "ex-sists"-literally, he stands out. Such a notion of existence unites the subjective, physiological, objective, and social aspects of man's behavior. The student of human behavior splits it into many aspects and studies these in isolation, thereby producing a variety of psychologies such as social, behavioral, physiological, introspectional, and psychoanalytical. The reintegration of these aspects presupposes a return to the original experience of behavior in its unity, which is to be found in the notion of existence itself. An integrational construct in existential psychology may be defined as a concept referring to observed phenomena that can be used for the integration of the greatest number and variety of such phenomena, as studied by different schools of psychology and psychiatry.

Subordinated Constructs. While existence (or existential) is one fundamental construct used in this comprehensive theory of psychology, subordinated constructs also are needed to develop a full theory. Examples are: mode of existence, existential world, existential transference, the centered self, ontological security, and insecurity. Such constructs function to connect the phenomena uncovered by various schools of psychology with the fundamental construct of existence.

Relation to Differential Constructs. Existential psychology and its constructs must transcend differential psychologies and their corresponding constructs if it is to integrate these within a common frame of reference. Existential constructs are therefore designed to transcend the predominantly subjective, objective, or situational connotations of differential constructs; they represent instead fundamental human characteristics that are rooted in experience. Rather than being function-oriented, they are person-oriented.

Existential psychology is thus a comprehensive theoretical psychology of human behavior that is conceived as a Gestalt of observable differentiations of an original intentional-behavioral relationship of man to the world. Behavior itself is the observable differentiation of man's intentional relationships. For methodical reasons, one can emphasize in this behavioral relationship three components: (1) the "intending" subject-pole, man; (2) the embodiment of this intentionality in measurable behavior; and (3) the "situated" object-pole of the resulting intentional behavior.

Differential psychologies concentrate on one or other of the main profiles of man's existence, thereby temporarily abstracting some aspect from the whole of man's behavior. This methodical restriction gives rise to methodically restricted constructs. Such constructs have their own validity and utility, provided they are not proposed as absolute symbols of the whole reality of human behavior.

Dualism and Integration. Scientific psychology was for the most part rooted in IDEALISM or EMPIRICISM, emerging as it did in a cultural atmosphere saturated with Cartesian dualism. Every attempt to found a scientific psychology, therefore, started from either an idealist or an empiricist view of human nature. Idealism led quickly to introspectionism, which considered the contents of CONSCIOUSNESS the legitimate and exclusive object of the new science. Empiricism, on the other hand, gave rise to BEHAVIORISM, which saw quantifiable bodily behavior isolated from consciousness as its exclusive subject matter. To be truly comprehensive, a psychology of existence must use constructs that are neither introspectionist nor behaviorist, but rather transcend the methodical limitations of both. Only in this way can it integrate their findings, without distortion, into a higher unity.

Psychoanalytic Theory. An appraisal of Freudian psychoanalysis from the viewpoint of comprehensive psychology shows that this too was developed within a framework of Cartesian dualism. S. Freud did not assume an original existential unity between man and the world. In Freudian theory, man is biologically fixed by a pattern of innate and instinctive drives, and this prior to his having any dealings with a world that is in principle alien to his being. The world, rather than being constitutive of man's existence, is purely a collection of foreign objects to which his fundamentally fixed biological structure reacts.

Later analytic development is toward a less dualistic view of man and his world, but seems still incapable of transcending the split between man and world on which psychoanalytic theory was originally based. Thus the cultural, interpersonal school of psychoanalytic thought rejects the idea that man's impulsive and emotional behavior emerges from innate instinctive drives within the organismic box. They substitute the perspective of environmental conditions, social pressures, and cultural patterns for the perspective of autonomous instinctual subjectivity; this in itself implies an underestimation of the relatively free subject-pole who interacts with his culture. They elucidate one aspect of human existence and are able to see the whole of human reality in the light of this. The "situational" aspect, it is true, is everywhere present in man, even in the innermost reaches of his being, and furnishes a valuable and fruitful insight, even if it is confined to only one aspect of human existence.

Differential Psychologies. Differential psychologies deal with isolated profiles of human behavior. Many of these profiles exhibit features, processes, and laws that have parallels in the activities of animals, plants, and inanimate objects. These similar aspects are abstracted, however, from the whole of man's behavior and objectivized for methodological reasons. The full meaning of such isolated features of behavior can be grasped only when they are reintegrated into the whole. Their sense becomes clear when perceived in the light of the properly human qualities of man as a whole; these characterize all profiles of his behavior and their mutual interdependency. Such comprehensive, all-pervading, specifically human qualities cannot be forced into the mechanical models of differential psychologies concerned with stimulus-response, punishment-reward, tension-reduction, or homeostatic models. Such frames of reference are equally applicable to nonhuman beings. Consequently, mechanistic constructs reflect precisely that in man which is not specifically and exclusively true of human behavior as such. The foundational constructs of existential psychology, on the other hand, point to precisely those unique qualities that set man apart from every other type of being. This puts existential psychology in a privileged position to connect the data and theories of differential psychologies.

Philosophy and Phenomenology. The discipline traditionally concerned with man's fundamental characteristics is philosophy or philosophical anthropology; this studies the being of man in the sense of his nature or his essence. Existential psychology must create similar constructs that represent the specifically human characteristics of behavior. Some constructs, however, are inadequate to this task; when obtained from a merely empirical study of certain groups, for example, they are capable only of integrating the data pertaining to those groups. Constructs obtained from an explicitation of man's very being, on the other hand, are, in principle, broad enough to integrate psychological data from all periods of human history and from all classes of men, even as these are obtained and interpreted by the various differential psychologies.

Theoretical interpretations are incompatible to the extent that they are influenced by incompatible philosophical anthropologies. The criterion that thus determines the selection of existential constructs is the principle of applicability. This principle states that the scientific theorist of human behavior should only borrow philosophical assumptions or constructs that can be used to integrate and explain the findings of differential psychologies. This judgment regarding the adequacy of an assumption or statement is thus a selective one and constitutes a psychological and not a philosophical judgment.

The integration of contributions from differential psychologies presupposes a study of these psychologies to distinguish what is based on real experience from unverified models, hypotheses, and implicit philosophies. The methods used to root such constructs in experience are the methods of natural observation and of phenomenology. Natural observation places one, as it were, in the field of phenomena to be studied, and enables him to describe these phenomena as they first appear. The phenomenological method then leads him to the inner structure of these phenomena, and liberates his perception of this structure from both personal and cultural prejudices that may be present in natural observation and description.

Conclusion. Existential psychology thus studied the intentional-functional behavior of persons who exist with others in a meaningful world. Such behavior also exhibits mechanical features that are abstracted for close observation and study by differential psychologists. Since these features are peripheral and not the unique core of intentional behavior, they are perceived in existential psychology as personal differentiations; as such, they are still permeated by the uniquely human characteristics represented in the fundamental existential constructs.

See Also: PERSONALITY; EXISTENTIALISM; PHENOMENOLOGY.

Bibliography: R. F. CREEGAN, "A Phenomenological Critique of Psychology," Philosophy and Phenomenological Research 9 (1948-49) 309-315. V. J. MCGILL, "The Bearing of Phenomenology on Psychology," ibid. 7 (1946-47) 357-368. H. P. DAVID and H. VON BRACKEN, eds., Perspectives in Personality Theory (New York 1957). A. GURWITSCH, The Field of Consciousness (Pittsburgh 1964). A. E. KUENZLI, ed., The Phenomenological Problem (New York 1959). R. C. KWANT, Encounter, tr. R. C. ADOLPHS (Pittsburgh 1960). W. A. M. LUIJPEN, Existential Phenomenology (Pittsburgh 1960). R. MAT et al., eds., Existence: A New Dimension in Psychiatry and Psychology (New York 1958). S. STRASSER, The Philosophy of Behavior (Pittsburgh 1960); Phenomenology and the Human Sciences (Pittsburgh 1963). J. H. VAN DEN BERG, The Phenomenological Approach to Psychiatry (Springfield, Ill. 1955). A. L. VAN KAAM, The Third Force in European Psychology (Greenville, Del. 1960); "Assumptions in Psychology," Journal of Individual Psychology 14 (1958) 22-28; "The Impact of Existential Phenomenology on the Psychological Literature of Western Europe," Review of Existential Psychology and Psychiatry 1 (1961) 63–92; "Existential Psychology as a Comprehensive Theory of Personality," ibid. 3 (1963) 11–26; "Humanistic Psychology and Culture," Journal of Humanistic Psychology 1 (1961) 94–100; Existential Foundations of Psychology (Pittsburgh 1966).

[A. L. VAN KAAM]

EXISTENTIAL THEOLOGY

A theological orientation, rather than a systematized body of doctrine, that derives its inspiration from the efforts of Rudolf BULTMANN (1884–1976) to 'DEMYTHOL-OGIZE'' the Sacred Scriptures.

The epithet, existential, is based on the outlook postulated by Bultmann for any valid study of the WORD OF GOD in the Bible, especially the New Testament KERYG-MA. According to Bultmann, the propositions contained therein can be viewed as theologically significant only insofar as they speak of man's existence. The kerygma thus consists of an organic series of judgments concerning the "possibilities" that lie before man. These judgments have the effect of calling to man's attention his properly existential situation. They tell him that he stands before the God who cannot be "considered," i.e., whose being may not be objectivized and thus analyzed, but who is known only in the decision in which He is encountered as another Thou.

This regulative outlook involves peculiar views concerning both the text of the Scriptures and texture of human nature. According to Bultmann and his disciples, the former is a fabric of "myths" that must be put to the test of the existential analysis. Here it suffices to understand the mythical character of the Scriptures as expressing a view of the universe radically different from our modern scientific grasp of it. For Bultmann this opposite view included ideas about cosmogonies at variance with one another, as well as differing notions about the eruption into nature of forces foreign to its ordinary processes.

Bultmann's description of human nature as Dasein is a frank adoption of the terminology and thought structure of M. Heidegger in this regard (see EXISTENTIALISM, 2). To be man is thus to be in such a way that through and in one's own being, being as such is "put to the test." To exist as man, therefore, means to have before oneself the possibility of decision; and when this possibility is realized, man exists authentically. For Bultmann, again, the "historicity" of Dasein is this very being of man in so far as—distinguished from all other being (Vorhandensein)—it can (but need not!) be.

If, then, the Gospels can be "demythologized" for modern man, they will be for him—as they are for men of every age-the doorway to faith, i.e., an existential understanding of oneself (Selbstverständnis). Thus the existential theologian or exegete sees as his task: (1) to be in vital relation with reality; (2) to examine the sacred text in which this relation is expressed, directly or indirectly; (3) to reexpress this relation so as to make evident the problematic or "historical" character of human existence. Whether or not the events represented in the Bible have objective historical validity does not really matter, because their representation has a function altogether different from putting one into contact with something that happened at a given moment in the history of the world. Note that this is not a flat denial on the part of the existential theologian of the historical objectivity of Gospel events. His interest lies elsewhere, and it is dominated by the idea that in the life of Jesus the existential condition of man is laid bare. Faith in Christ consists in the constantly renewed realization that it is possible to accept the grace of God.

To sum up, then, Bultmann attempted to express his understanding of the meaning of the Gospel in terms borrowed from existential (Heideggerian) philosophy. This understanding is based on the idea that, in order validly to speak of God, one must also and of necessity speak of man. The sole content of the Gospel, therefore, is the constant confrontation of man by God in the former's condition of historicity, i.e., the possibility of authentic existence in faith.

The use of the existential analysis to prepare the way for a valid Biblical exegesis also raises the question of the relation between faith and philosophy. Bultmann himself maintained that real confrontation with reality depends on the Biblical word—another distinctively Protestant thesis. The question is then whether or not this is an altogether sound expression of the complete givenness of faith.

Bibliography: H. W. BARTSCH, ed., Kerygma and Myth, tr. R. H. FULLER (London 1953). R. MARLÉ, Bultmann et l'interprétation du Nouveau Testament (Paris 1956). I. N. WALTY, "Bulletin du théologie protestante," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 42 (1958) 349–370. H. SCHLIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 2:768–769. E. FUCHS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 1:1511–1512.

[M. B. SCHEPERS]

EXISTENTIALISM

The philosophy of existentialism, as the name itself implies, indicates a special concern with the problem of EXISTENCE—not with each and every type of existence, but with human existence. Although there may be foreshadowings of existentialism in St. AUGUSTINE, R. DES-CARTES, and B. PASCAL, the inspiration of contemporary existentialism is to be found in the writings of the Danish Lutheran S. A. KIERKEGAARD (1813–55). Kierkegaard was convinced that his countrymen had a false notion of what it means to be a Christian. As he saw it, too many of them regarded Christianity as a doctrine to be understood speculatively and to be grasped intellectually. This to him was but the acceptance of the erroneous notion of G. W. F. HEGEL, who had taught that it was the role of speculative philosophy to comprehend all the mysteries of religion, even those of Christianity having to do with the Trinity and the Incarnation.

Kierkegaard for his part insisted that Christianity is not an abstract doctrine to be approached in an impersonal and dispassionate manner as though it were a system of speculative truths. On the contrary, Christianity is a way of life, a mode of living that consists in appropriating and assimilating the message of Christ into one's own existence. If one wanted to call Christianity a doctrine, he should understand that it is a doctrine that proposes to be realized in existence; that the true way of understanding the doctrine of Christianity is to understand its task as one of existing in the doctrine, not of speculating on it.

In his polemic against Hegel and against those Danes who accepted the speculative approach to Christianity, Kierkegaard emphasized a number of ideas, such as existence and the existent, the individual, decision and choice, passion, fear and trembling, dread and despair. These notions have become pivotal for those writers who are usually designated as existential. A partial listing of existentialists whose works have become known to American audiences would include, among the more philosophical, men such as N. BERDIĂEV (1874-1948), M. BUBER (1878–1965), M. HEIDEGGER (1889–), K. JAS-PERS (1883-1969), G. MARCEL (1889-1973), J. ORTEGA Y GASSET (1883-1955), J. P. SARTRE (1905-1980), P. TILLICH (1886–1965), and, among the more literary, writers such as E. Albee (1928-), F. Arrabal (1932-), S. Beauvoir (1908-1986), S. Beckett (1906-1989), A. Camus (1913-1960), J. Genet (1910-1986), E. Ionesco (1912-), F. Kafka (1883-1924), H. Pinter (1930-), R. M. Rilke (1875-1926), and M. UNAMUNO Y JUGO (1864-1936).

Although it would be impossible here to give a detailed and adequate exposition of the various teachings of these existentialists, they do adopt certain basic notions that can be indicated in a general way.

Existence and the Individual. First, in all existentialist thought there is an absorbing interest in human existence or human living. This existence is not that of the physical or chemical level or that of the biological realm; rather the existence in question is what might be designated broadly as ethical or moral existence, for the existentialist is concerned with the problem of what it means really to exist as a man; how does one live a truly human life; what are the characteristics of authentic human endeavor? In Heidegger's expression: other realities are, man alone exists. Questions about the chemical composition of man, the biological functioning of his organs, or the physical constitution of the world in which he lives are of little interest to most existentialists. Their concern is with man and with man's existence, i.e., the existence that marks him off from all the other beings in this universe. Kierkegaard's question: how does one exist as a true Christian, has been broadened into the question: how does one exist as a true human being?

The existence in question here is not that of abstract man, of man in general. Human existence, human living, as the existentialist views it, is always achieved by a man in the here and now, in a concrete situation with a host of particular and accidental circumstances surrounding it. The concern of the existentialist is not with the general and the universal, but with the singular and the individual.

This interest in the individual arises for several reasons. Most existentialists are wary of systems of speculative thought as avenues of approach to problems of human existence. The existentialist regards such systems as abstracting from the particular and unique features in each human situation that make human living the complex and difficult thing it is. This was Kierkegaard's constant complaint against the pure thought of Hegel, and it has been repeated by most existentialists in relation to any abstract view of human existence. The disdain for the universal and the abstract in other existentialists arises from their intense interest in human freedom. Since the very nature of freedom consists in some sort of contingency and indetermination, namely, the power to will something or not to will it, freedom becomes a rather awkward theme in a speculative system such as Hegel's that regards all natures as necessary deductions one from the other. The existentialist sees this determination and necessity as the enemy of all he holds as precious. This is true especially of Sartre and Camus, who make freedom the very essence of man. Then, too, most existentialists see the abstract and the universal as an indignity toward man; for these perspectives degenerate human existence, the human being, the individual person, into an object, a thing, an "it." From such a preoccupation arises the realization of the inhumanity of the view of modern technology wherein man is an impersonal number and a mere member of a group. This protest against the technological attitude is basic to the existentialism of such thinkers as Jaspers and Marcel.

The interest of existentialism in the existing individual not only explains its suspicion of the abstract consideration of human affairs, but also explains why much existentialist writing has taken the form of the novel, the short story, the autobiographical essay, and the play. All these types of literature easily lend themselves to the vivid description and analysis of the human individual groping for an answer to a unique human situation.

Consciousness and Freedom. Because existentialism is concerned with the individual as a conscious self and a responsible agent, as a subject and a "thou" rather than as an object and an "it," CONSCIOUSNESS and FREE-DOM are central themes in all existentialist thought. Man becomes truly existent only when he lives an intensely conscious life in which he is vividly aware of all the exigencies, decisions, and problems of human living. The existentialist demands that men should become conscious of themselves as reflective beings whose existence must be interpenetrated with thought. He insists that they become fully alive to the richness inherent in each experience; that they live a life that is vibrantly alert to all the anguish, burden, and care of existence.

Too many men, Heidegger complains, are mere followers of the crowd; they are men whose personal judgments are only dull echoes of the anonymous "they say." The man of existence, on the contrary, is the self-thinking man, the man of decision, the free man; for if men should be conscious beings, they should be conscious primarily of their freedom, and of the personal danger into which their freedom plunges them.

One becomes free only by having a personal interest in things, by making decisions, and by consciously following one's choice. Although objective science and the scientific method demand that the knower be disinterested and free from passion, existentialism contends that the individual be personally involved in the situation, that he make his decision with passionate concern. Far from advocating disinterestedness, the existentialist urges that the self become totally engaged in life, that one have a strong and radical commitment to existence, that one consciously, freely, and passionately be involved in one's ultimate concern.

Because the man of existence is fully committed to life and all that it entails, he is aware that his freedom carries with it the heavy burden of responsibility. In Kierkegaard's view, one truly becomes a Christian only when as an adult he assumes full responsibility for all the consequences of his infant Baptism. Sartre sees each individual as the arbiter of all values who must assume therefore the awesome responsibility of being the supreme legislator for his total destiny. Camus regards the real man, the lucid man, as the man who realizes that there are no guilty men, only responsible ones; and, in the existentialism of Heidegger the very existential meaning of the true man is care or concern.

Anguish and Absurdity. Closely intertwined with the notions of freedom, decision, and responsibility are those of abandonment, anguish, dread, fear, and trembling. Because the existentialists have emphasized man in his concreteness and INDIVIDUALITY, there is a tendency among them to describe him as alone, solitary, cut off from his fellowmen. The note of abandonment arises also because for many existentialists there are no objective moral standards to guide man in his choice. Each man is "on his own"; he is abandoned to his own personal decision. If the onerous weight of responsible decision means ANXIETY and anguish of spirit, the existentialist's awareness of the fragile instability of human existence, which can be snuffed out by a myriad of uncontrollable events, adds to that anxiety. There is also in existentialism the insistence on the alienation of modern man, who finds himself estranged from the world of nature by his reflective consciousness and at cross-purposes with his fellowmen by his freedom. Like the stranger of Camus, modern man finds himself a lone outsider for whom the reasons and certainties of a past generation are no longer satisfying or assuring. Existence results in bewilderment, anxiety, and frustration. This searing anguish finds expression in Heidegger's notion of human existence as a movement toward the nothingness of the grave and in Sartre's lament that life is a useless passion.

Another salient theme in existentialism is that of AB-SURDITY. In all existentialist literature there is an interest in the nonrational, using that term to signify whatever escapes the comprehension of man. This nonrational element in existence is often called "the absurd." Kierkegaard designates Christ as the absurd; for the fact that God became man out of love for man is something incomprehensible to human reason. The Incarnation cannot be understood by reason; it must be grasped by the leap of faith. Absurdity in Sartre's existentialism signifies the absolute gratuity or contingency of things. Since there is no God to conceive of essences according to the philosophy of Sartre, there is no reason for the things of the physical world, either for their essences or for their existence. They just are; and since they are what they are without reason, they are absurd. In the essays of Camus the notion of absurdity has a somewhat different connotation. Camus admits that there are scientific explanations and descriptions of various parts of the universe, but he denies that there is any all-embracing, comprehensive truth for the whole of reality. There are truths, partial truths, but there is no Truth, no final and decisive reason making the universe a rational whole for man. Marcel makes a distinction between a problem and a mystery: the former is open to human solution, while the latter, as something beyond human comprehension, is a matter for faith. This interest in the absurd is the bond of unity among a number of playwrights such as Genet, Beckett, Ionesco, and Albee, whose plays are portrayals of the absurd in modern existence.

God and Nothingness. Finally, for many of the existentialists the common setting in which human existence seeks its goal is the absence of God. Although Berdĭǎev, Marcel, and Jaspers are theists, the atheistic existentialism of such men as Sartre, Camus, Kafka, Rilke, and the dramatists of the Theater of the Absurd has been more influential. Heidegger's private opinion concerning the existence of God may be open to question, but it is commonly agreed that in his writings he philosophizes as though there were no divinity.

There is little if any attempt made by these existentialists to argue against the traditional proofs for the existence of God; atheism is simply taken for granted. Sartre makes a rather brief attempt to disprove the existence of God, but his procedure clearly indicates that he has misunderstood the traditional notion concerning the divinity. For example, Sartre speaks of God as Causa Sui; his explanation of what this definition means indicates that God, in his view, would be a contradictory and selfdenying notion. God would be for him an unconsciousconscious being, a full-empty absolute. Camus seems to suggest that the problem of human suffering is the reason for his denial of the existence of a Supreme Being.

Existentialism for these thinkers is a serious attempt to describe an existence from which God has been banished and for which man alone can be the ultimate reason. Man thus becomes the new transcendent for man. He is the unique being through which all being reveals itself; he is the first source of order and meaning in the universe; he is the sole lawgiver in the domain of morality; and he is the creator of all values and ends. Existence is to be what man makes it to be. One can understand the interest of these existentialists in the writings of F. W. NIETZ-SCHE.

Such ATHEISM could explain the morbid gloom, the heightening anxiety, and the sheer absurdity of life that one often finds in existentialism of this type. Existence has no antecedent explanation nor has it any permanent fulfillment. One strives to be absolutely free, to be consistent with one's fundamental choice; but one should not become serious, to use Sartre's expression, since all human actions are equally doomed to failure.

The absence of God makes death an absolute, an absolute that is regarded by some as an absurd stupidity, by others as a ludicrous monstrosity. In either case, the negation of death, as these writers indicate, should overshadow all the activities of human existence.

Nor is death the only negation. Negativity, negation, and emptiness become recurring themes. Being, as Heidegger envisages it, is filled with nothingness. In Sartre, consciousness is described as a negativity, since consciousness is always consciousness of an object, that is, of something that is not the actually knowing consciousness. Freedom for him is also negation since it is a thrust toward the future goal that is not yet possessed. (See NON-BEING.)

This note of negation shows itself in another characteristic that is fairly common to existentialists of the atheistic type, viz, an extreme emphasis on the dark side of human existence. Frustration, annoyance, and sorrows are part of all human living, but existentialism seems centered on them. There is very little joy and gladness in existentialist literature, whether one considers the short stories of Kafka, the novels of Sartre, or the plays of Camus. The tragic, the irrational, and the depraved are constantly employed in these works to indicate man's freedom as a crushing responsibility in an existence that is seen more as a condemnation to loneliness than as a call to knowledge, love, and service of others.

Critique. Many critics regard existentialism as an unbalanced view of existence. In their opinion it is a protest that has become too extreme. Arising in Kierkegaard as a warning against the rigid rationalism of Hegel, it has become in many of its adherents a denial of the relevance of any general and abstract truth concerning man, his nature, and his activity. Protesting against the artificiality and hypocrisy of much in bourgeois morality, it has become for some a repudiation of any and every standard of objective morality, including that of Christianity. Morality is said to be completely situational and entirely personal. Aware of the inhumanity that a misguided technology can bring about in modern life by its tendency to regard men as mere numbers, the existentialists have so extolled the inwardness, the subjectivity, and the absolute freedom of the individual that social life becomes philosophically indefensible.

One can well understand why Pope Pius XII on Aug. 12, 1950, in his encyclical Humani generis called existentialism "the new erroneous philosophy."

See Also: EXISTENTIAL ETHICS; EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS; EXISTENTIAL PSYCHOLOGY; EXISTENTIAL THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: E. L. ALLEN, Existentialism from Within (London 1953). W. BARRETT, Irrational Man (New York 1962). H. J. BLACKHAM, Six Existentialist Thinkers (London 1952). J. D. COL-LINS, The Existentialists (Chicago 1952). M. ESSLIN, The Theatre of the Absurd (New York 1961). R. HARPER, Existentialism: A Theory of Man (Cambridge, Mass. 1948). F. H. HEINEMANN, Existentialism and the Modern Predicament (2d ed. New York 1954). H. KUHN, Encounter with Nothingness (Hinsdale, Ill. 1949). V. M. MARTIN, Existentialism (Washington 1962). C. MICHALSON, ed., Christianity and the Existentialists (New York 1956). K. F. REINHARDT, The Existentialist Revolt (Milwaukee 1952). J. A. WAHL, A Short History of Existentialism, tr. F. WILLIAMS and S. MARON (New York 1949).

[V. M. MARTIN]

EXMEW, WILLIAM, BL.

Carthusian priest, martyr; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn, London, England, June 19, 1535. William studied Classics at Christ's College, Cambridge, before joining the Carthusians at the London Charterhouse, where he soon became vicar. The year he was named procurator (1534), Henry VIII sought the express acknowledgment from the Carthusians and other prominent subjects of the validity of his marriage to Anne Boleyn and the right of their children to succeed to the throne. Their refusal led to the execution of their prior, St. John HOUGHTON (May 4, 1535). Two days after Houghton's death, Exmew and the vicar Humphrey MID-DLEMORE were denounced to Thomas Cromwell by Thomas Bedyll, a royal commissioner, as being "obstinately determined to suffer all extremities rather than to alter their opinion" in regard to papal supremacy in spiritual matters. Both were thrown into Marshalsea prison three weeks later together with their fellow monk Sebastian NEWDIGATE. For 13 days they were manacled in a standing position to a post. Then they were taken to the Tower of London, tried at Westminster (June 11), and condemned to death for high treason for denying Henry's claim to supremacy over the Church of England. Exmew was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 9, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). L. HENDRIKS, London Charterhouse: Its Monks and Its Martyrs (London 1889). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

EXODUS, BOOK OF

The Hebrew title for the second book of the Pentateuch is $w^e \cdot \bar{e}lleh \ \bar{s}^e m \hat{o}t$ ("and these are the names") the opening words of the Masoretic Text. The Greek version took its title from the subject matter of the opening chapters—'Έξοδος [(the) going out (from Egypt)]. The title of the book in the Vulgate and English Versions— Exodus—is a literal rendering of the Greek title. The contents, origin, and theology of the book will be treated in this article.

A scene from Exodus Chapter 32, in which Moses carries the tablets of the Testimony down the mountain to where the Israelites are dancing around the image of a golden calf. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Contents. The Book of Exodus may be divided into six sections. The first section (1.1–12.36) tells the story of Israel in Egypt. Here one learns of the oppression of the Israelites, the birth and adoption of MOSES, his flight to Madian and sojourn there, and his call by YAHWEH. Having received instructions regarding his mission and the power to work miracles, Moses returns to Egypt to confront pharaoh with the divine command: "Let My people go." The obduracy of pharaoh and the crescendo of plagues occupy most of the remaining material of this section (see PLAGUES OF EGYPT). With the final plague, the death of the first-born of the Egyptians, the Israelites win their freedom, and with the celebration of the Passover ritual (see PASSOVER, FEAST OF) they prepare to depart from the land of slavery.

The second section (12.37–18.27) treats the Exodus, itself, and the wandering in the desert. The easy "Way of the Land of the Philistines" being excluded, Moses leads his people across the Sea of Reeds on to the rugged terrain of the Sinai Peninsula. Throughout the narrative special emphasis is laid on the divine assistance accorded the Israelites. The victory paean of ch. 15 constitutes a glorious and joyful hymn of praise and simultaneously presents one of the oldest pieces of Hebrew poetry. To the subsequent complaints of the people, Yahweh responds with MANNA, quail, and water from the rock. Through Moses' intercession, He also grants them victory over the Amalekites. The section closes with the institution of the office of Judges [see JUDGES (IN THE BIBLE)].

The third and most important section (19.1–24.18) deals with the Covenant. Yahweh summons His chosen leader to Mt. Sinai (see THEOPHANY), and through him proposes a unique union with Israel: ". . . you shall be my special possession, dearer to me than all other people, though all the earth is mine" (19.5). The Decalogue (see COMMANDMENTS, TEN) and subsequent Code of Alliance (see BOOK OF THE COVENANT) announces the stipulations incumbent upon Israel in view of this union. Having received the Code of Alliance, Moses and the people solemnly ratify this pact with the sprinkling of the sacrificial blood [see COVENANT (IN THE BIBLE)].

The fourth section (25.1–31.18) is concerned with instructions for the establishment of worship. Detailed commands concerning the size, construction materials, and adornments of the TENT OF MEETING are listed (see ARK OF THE COVENANT). Also in this section are the divine institution of the priesthood, and specific instructions regarding the consecration of priests and their vestments. Further injunctions concern the sacrifices to be offered (see SACRIFICE, III).

The rather brief fifth section (32.1–34.35) tells of the chosen people breaking faith with Moses and their erection of the golden calf. The further mediation of Moses averts the destruction of his people and wins a renewal of the covenant with Yahweh. Once again God grants the tablets of the law to his earthly leader.

The sixth and final section (35.1–40.38) describes the fulfillment of the divine instructions. There is extensive repetition of the material contained in the fourth section. The section closes as the cloud (see 24.15.–18) covers the Tent of Meeting and the glory [see GLORY (IN THE BIBLE)] of Yahweh fills the dwelling; this is a sign of legitimacy and approval of the newly built sanctuary and represents the proper conclusion of the entire book.

Origin. In antiquity there was little challenge to the Mosaic authorship of Exodus. (The Gnostics in the early ages of the Church objected and maintained that it was an apocryphal Jewish document). Under the influence of renaissance scholarship, however, serious doubts arose. As early as the 16th century, the lawyer Andreas Masius judged that there were non-Mosaic additions to the text. Still greater contributions were made in the 19th century when scholars demonstrated that various sources were employed in the compilation of the text.

Historically, the literary authorship of some parts of the covenant section (19.1–24.18) may perhaps be attributed to Moses. In line with ancient Near Eastern practices, the essentials of this covenant would soon have been put into writing and preserved for periodic renewal on the part of the people (see, e.g., Jos 24.16–28).

Illuminated page of Exodus from a Hebrew Bible, 1299. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Alongside this written material, an ever-growing body of oral traditions developed. This process continued after the conquest of Canaan. As Hebrew life became more sedentary in Canaan and hence more complex, there was a constant need for new legislative materials. Since these legal developments adhered to the principles instituted by the earlier Mosaic legislation, there was never a problem about attributing these later sections to Moses. With the definitive establishment of the Israelites in Canaan, separate traditions of historical and legal materials began to develop in the north and south of Palestine. There have been numerous efforts to explain these traditions and how they finally found their way into the Pentateuchal text. Most scholars favor the hypothesis according to which the Pentateuch is essentially a compilation of four older written sources, the documents of the YAHWIST, the ELOHIST, the DEUTERONOMIST, and the PRIESTLY WRITERS; on the date and nature of these documents, see PENTATEUCH. The sources used in the composition of Exodus are generally divided as follows.

To the Yahwistic source belong: 1.6, 8–12; 2.15–23a; 3.7–8, 16–20; 4.1–16, 19–20a, 22–31; 5.1–23; 6.1; 7.14–18, 23–29; 8.4–11a, 16–28; 9.1–7, 13–21, 23b–34; 10.1–7, 13b–19, 28–29; 11.4–8; 12.21–23, 29–30; 13.21–22; 14.5–7, 10–14, 19–20, 21b, 24–25, 27b, 30–31; 15.22–25, 27; 16.4; 17.1b–2, 7; 19.20; 24.1–2, 9–11; 32.9–14; 33.7–11; 34.1–5, 10–28.

To the Elohistic source belong: 1.15–22; 2.1–14; 3.1–6, 9–15, 21–22; 4.17–18, 20b–21; 7.20b–21a; 9.22–23a, 35; 10.8–13a, 20–27; 11.1–3; 12.31–36, 37b–39; 13.17–19; 15.20–21; 17.3–6, 8–16; 18.1–27; 19.21–25; 20.1–21, 23–26; 21.1–37; 22.1–30; 23.1–32; 24.3–8, 12–15a, 18b; 31.18b; 32.1–8, 15–35; 33.1–6, 12–23; 34.6–9.

To the Priestly source belong: 1.1–5, 7, 13–14; 2.23b–25; 6.2–30; 7.1–13, 19–20a, 21b–22; 8.1–3, 11b–15; 9.8–12; 11.9–10; 12.1–20, 28, 37a, 40–51; 13.1–2, 20; 14.1–4, 8–9, 15–18, 21a, 22–23, 26–27a, 28–29; 16.1–3, 5–36; 17.1a; 19.1–2a; 24.15b–18a; 25.1–40; 26.1–37; 27.1–21; 28.1–43; 29.1–46; 30.1–38; 31.1–18a; 34.29–33; 35.1–35; 36.1–38; 37.1–29; 38.1–31; 39.1–43; 40.1–38.

To later redactors belong: 15.1–19; 19.2b-19; 20.22; 34.34–35. The Deuteronomistic source is not represented in Exodus.

Theology. The Exodus, viewed as a complexus of election, deliverance, and covenant, has long been hailed by biblical scholars as the cardinal dogma of the OT religion. What the Incarnation is to the NT, the Exodus is to the OT; without it the Israelite religion cannot be understood. The basic historical facts of the special election of the Israelites, their rescue from slavery in Egypt, and the singular pact that they sealed with Yahweh are strongly attested; in fact, the whole religious and civil existence of ancient Israel depend on it. The literary form in which the sacred writer conveys these facts may be termed a religious interpretation or explanation of history, and a clear epic tone is noted throughout. Hence, the scenes and imagery should not be interpreted as eyewitness reporting.

The importance of the Exodus complexus cannot be exaggerated. The choice of the Israelites by Yahweh was something unique: "You alone have I favored more than all the families of the earth" (Am 3.2). As a consequence of this choice, Israel was the recipient of constant divine benefactions, the first of which was her deliverance from Egypt, a dogma fondly recalled by prophet and psalmist alike: "It was I who brought you up from the land of Egypt and who led you through the desert for 40 years, to occupy the land of the Amorrites" (Am 2.10). "I, the Lord, am your God who led you forth from the land of Egypt; open wide your mouth and I will fill it" [Ps 80(81).11]. The covenant too was something unique. Other Semitic peoples felt varying degrees of closeness to their deities, a relationship between god and people founded, for example, on imagined ancestry. Not so was the relationship between Yahweh and Israel. Here a strict, formal agreement was entered into. This covenant endowed the Israelites with distinctive prerogatives and made of them God's special possession, a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation (19.5–6).

Of great theological importance, also, is the legal material contained in the book, more specifically, the Decalogue and the Code of the Alliance. Of the Decalogue prescriptions, numbers four to ten provide legislation stemming from the natural law itself and are found already mentioned in earlier Semitic codes. However, the Book of Exodus presents a new approach. In older codes the violation of these precepts was regarded as an offense against a fellow man. In Exodus they also constitute an offense against God. The Decalogue further emphasizes the dogma of monotheism and the duty of honoring the one true God. The liturgical legislation of the book served as the foundation of subsequent Israelite developments in this sphere.

See Also: LAW, MOSAIC.

Bibliography: La Sainte Bible, ed. L. PIROT and A. CLAMER, 12 v. (Paris 1935–61). L'Exode, M. NOTH, Exodus, tr. J. S. BOWDEN (Philadelphia 1962); Echter Bibel: Altes Testament, ed. F. NÖTS-CHER, 4 v. (Würzburg 1955–59) Exodus. J. E. PARK and J. C. RYL-AARSDAM, Exodus, G. A. BUTTRICK, et al., eds. The Interpreters' Bible, (New York 1951–57) 2:188–197. P. W. SKEHAN, 'Exodus in the Samaritan Recension from Qumran,'' Journal of Biblical Literature 74 (Boston 1955) 182–187.

[J. E. HUESMAN]

EXOMOLOGESIS

A Greek word for confession, to God or to man, either of God's greatness (Rom 14.11) or of one's sins (Mt 3.6; Didache 14.1). Technically this word designated confession of one's sins as a part of early penitential discipline. It meant (1) the normally private confession to the bishop before receiving a public penance (ST. CYPRI-AN, Enchiridion patristicum 553); (2) the whole of external exercises of that public penance (TERTULLIAN, ibid. 315); or (3) the public general confession prior to the reconciliation granted by the bishop (Op. cit. 569).

See Also: CONFESSION, AURICULAR; PENANCE, SACRAMENT OF.

Bibliography: G. W. H. LAMPE, A Patristic Greek Lexicon (Oxford 1961—) 1:499–500. E. VACANDARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 3.1:854–861.

[G. GILLEMAN]

EXORCISM

The act of driving out or warding off DEMONS or evil spirits from persons, places, or things that are, or are believed to be, possessed or infested by them or are liable to become victims or instruments of their malice. According to Catholic belief, demons are fallen angels who have rebelled against God. Excluded from friendship with God, they retain, nevertheless, their natural power of acting upon men and the material universe for their own evil purposes. This power is limited by Divine Providence, but it has been given wider scope in consequence of the sin of mankind. Exorcism is nothing more than a prayer to God (sometimes made publicly in the name of the Church, sometimes made privately) to restrain the power of the demons over men and things. This article summarizes the history of and present practice of the church in regard to exorcism, then adds some theological points.

History. The ancient Egyptians and Babylonians as well as other ethnic groups sometimes attributed certain diseases to demoniacal possession, and they believed in the efficacy of magical charms and incantations for banishing the demons. In the Old Testament, the Book of Tobia relates a devil that was said to have killed the seven husbands of Sara (6.14). Subsequently, "the angel Raphael took the devil, and bound him in the desert of upper Egypt" (8.3).

Acknowledging the reality of demonic possession, Jesus drove demons out of their victims, not by collusion with Beelzebub, the prince of devils, but by the finger of God (Mt 12.22–30; Mk 3.22–27; Lk 11.14–26). Christ also empowered the Apostles and Disciples to cast out the demons in His name (Mt 10.1; Mk 6.7; Lk 9.1). He committed this same power to believers, generally (Mk 16.17), but the exercise of such power was subject to certain conditions, namely, prayer and fasting (Mt 17.20; Mk 9.28). The Acts of the Apostles records how Paul drove a divining spirit out of a girl who brought her masters much profit by soothsaying (16.16–18; cf. 19.12). No doubt, the other Apostles exercised this power too.

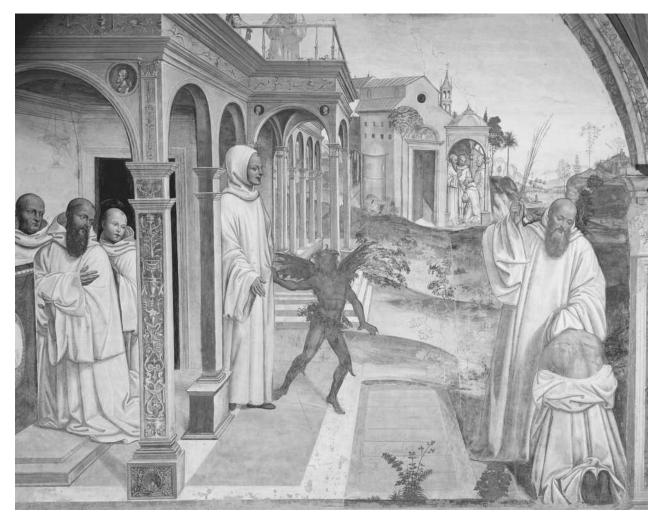

After the apostolic age, the primitive Christians continued to exercise demons. Justin Martyr (100?–165?) speaks of numberless demoniacs throughout the whole world, who were exercised by Christian men in the name of Jesus Christ even though they could not be exorcised by those who used incantations and drugs (2 Apol. 6). Tertullian (160?–230?) complains of the ingratitude of the pagans, who called the Christians enemies of the human race, even though the Christians exorcised the pagans without reward or hire (Apol. 37). Origen (185?-254?) remarks that the name of Jesus expelled myriad evil spirits from the souls and bodies of men (Contra Celsum 1.25). Lactantius (d. beginning of the 4th century) writes that the followers of Christ, in the name of their master and by the sign of His passion, the cross, banished polluted spirits from men (Instit. 4.27). Cyril of Jerusalem (315?-386?) notes that the invocation of the name of God scorches and drives out evil spirits like a fierce flame (Catech. 20.3). These remarks are typical of the attitude of the early Church, for which an exorcism was an invocation of God against the harassment of devils. Frequently the invocation was accompanied by some symbolic action, such as breathing upon the subject, or laying hands upon him, or signing him with the cross. The invocation might be expressed by calling upon the name of Jesus, or cursing the devil, or commanding him to depart, or reading a passage from Sacred Scripture.

Medieval manuscript illustration of a priest driving out the devil during an exorcism, Chartres, France. (©Christel Gerstenberg/ CORBIS)

Not only did the early Church exorcise demoniacs, but it also subjected catechumens to exorcism as a preparation for baptism. Catechumens were not considered to be obsessed as demoniacs were; but as a consequence of original sin (and of personal sin in the case of adults), they were subject more or less to the power of the devil, whose "works" and "pomps" they were called upon to renounce. This exorcism preceding baptism may be explained then in two ways: it was a symbolical anticipation of deliverance from the power of the devil through baptism, and it was a means of restraining the devil from impeding the reception of the Sacramant (cf. St. Thomas, Summa theologiae 3a, 71.2). Cyril of Jerusalem describes one manner of exorcism before baptism by which the catechumen was stripped and anointed with exorcised oil from head to foot (Catech. 20.3).

"Saint Benedict Exorcises a Demon from a Possessed Man," fresco painting by Il Sodoma, the Abbey of Monteoliveto Maggiore, Siena, Italy. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

Present Practice. Today the Church maintains its traditional attitude toward exorcism. It recognizes the possibility of diabolical possession, and it regulates the manner of dealing with it. The Code of Canon Law allows authorized ministers to perform solemn exorcisms not only over the faithful, but also over non-Catholics and those who are excommunicated (c. 1152). A solemn method of exorcising is given in the Roman Ritual. In most of the Eastern and Western rites, exorcisms continue to serve as a preparation for baptism. Exorcisms also form a part of the blessing of such things as salt, water, and oil; and these, in turn, are used in personal exorcisms and in blessing or consecrating places (e.g., churches) and objects (e.g., altars, sacred vessels, church bells) connected with public worship or intended for private devotion. In exorcising and blessing these objects, the Church prays that those who use them may be protected against the attacks of the devil.

Bibliography: J. FORGET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:1762–80. A. RODEWYK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1314–15. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:964–978. A. STENZEL, Die Taufe (Innsbruck 1958). L. BOUYER, The Paschal Mystery: Meditations on the Last Three Days of Holy Week, tr. M. BENOIT (Chicago 1950).

[E. J. GRATSCH]

Theology. The New Testament's witness to Christ's decisive victory over the powers of evil, a victory proclaimed by the Savior Himself in word and deed (cf. Lk 11.20; Jn 12.31), is the foundation for any theology of exorcism. The authority and ability to cast out devils was entrusted to the Twelve (Mk 3.14–15; cf. Mt 10.1; Lk 9.1), though all "those who believe" are also envisioned as sharing this power (Mk 16.17; Lk 10.17–19; cf. Origen, Contra Celsum 7.4). Satan's loss of power is, in fact, a continuing sign of man's Redemption (1 Jn 5.18). This conviction is echoed by the Fathers (e.g., Tertullian, Apol.; Hilary of Poitiers, In Ps. 64.10) and by the schools of the Middle Ages (cf. St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 90.2).

In the performance of an exorcism it is always the Church that prays through the instrumentality of the exorcist, so that the efficacy of the rite is analogous to that of the sacramentals. At the same time, it is obvious from the Gospels themselves that the exorcist's faith and integrity play a determining role in the outcome of the exorcism (Mt 17.14-20; Mk 9.13-28; Lk 9.37-43). For this reason the Church exercises the greatest caution in authorizing clerics who have received the power of exorcism through Holy Orders to put it to use. This is not true, of course, of the exorcisms employed during the rite of baptism, but of those uses of the power that an apparently authentic instance of possession has required. Of those cases of possession against which exorcism proves to be ineffective, one can only say that an error of judgement has been made as to the true nature of the phenomenon or that for reasons of His own, God has withheld the rite's efficacy. Recourse to this latter explanation should be infrequent, to say the least, since the question of the Church's ability to carry on the essential work of its founder and master is at issue.

See Also: BAPTISM (LITURGY OF); DIABOLICAL OBSESSION; DIABOLICAL POSSESSION (IN THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: Satan, ed. BRUNO DE JÉSUS-MARIA et al. (New York 1952). L. CRISTIANI, Evidence of Satan in the Modern World, tr. C. ROLAND (New York 1961).

[L. J. ELMER]

Liturgy. In liturgy and theology an exorcism is the Church's prayer that the power of God's Holy Spirit free a person from sin and evil and from subjection to the devil, the spirit of evil. In popular understanding exorcism generally refers to the driving out of a demon who has possessed a person. The Church, however, is reluctant to admit a supernatural possession in particular cases, since most apparent cases can be explained by pathological conditions. Both modern biblical scholarship and current psychological theory and practice are inclined to admit a supernatural explanation only when a natural explanation has been proved impossible. A practical indication of this reluctance is the 1972 abolition of the office of exorcist with the other minor orders (Paul VI Min-Quaedam).

Exorcisms in the form of prayers for protection from evil do remain in the baptismal rituals. The Rite for Infant Baptism (Ordo Baptismi parvulorum, May 15, 1969; second editio typica, June 24, 1973), for example, contains a prayer of exorcism at the end of the prayer of the faithful and litany, prior to (optional) anointing with the oil of catechumens (which functioned historically as an exorcism). But where the first edition spoke of freedom from the power of darkness (a potestate tenebrarum), the second speaks rather of "original sin" (ab originalis culpae labe, BaptCh 49).

More elaborate exorcisms may be found in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults. Exorcism is described as showing the "true nature of the spiritual life as a battle between flesh and spirit" (ChrInitAd 101) and the formulas (ibid. 113–118; 373) speak of preservation from sin and evil. The scrutinies, intended to purify and strengthen the candidate (ibid. 154), contain rites of exorcism whereby "the Church teaches the elect about the mystery of Christ who frees from sin. By exorcism they are freed from the effects of sin and from the influence of the devil, and they are strengthened in their spiritual journey and open their hearts to receive the gifts of the Savior" (ibid. 156). The ritual's formulas (ibid. 164, 171, 178, 379, 383, 387) reflect this understanding.

Similarly, the blessing of baptismal water in the rituals and the blessing of water at the beginning of the order of Mass in the Sacramentary no longer contain an exorcism of water (or of the salt, use of which is optional).

Scepticism regarding demonic possession and deemphasis of exorcism in no way imply denial of the power of evil customarily spoken of as the devil or Satan.

Bibliography: R. BÉRAUDY, "Scrutinies and Exorcisms," in J. WAGNER, ed., Adult Baptism and the Catechumenate. Concilium 22 (1967) 57–61. J. CORTÉS and F. GATTI, The Case against Possessions and Exorcisms (New York 1975). L. MITCHELL, Baptismal Anointing (London 1966). R. WOODS, The Occult Revolution (New York 1971).

[J. DALLEN]

EXPERIENCE

A term rooted in the Greek $\dot{\epsilon}\mu\pi\epsilon\iota\rho(\alpha)$, from which the word empirical is directly derived, and in the Latin expe- rientia, whose verb form experiri means to try, to put to the test, to know by experience, and whose past participle furnishes the term expert. Thus, experience is sometimes connotative of a certain wisdom or skill in the practical order. This article explains the philosophical usages of the term, particularly in EPISTEMOLOGY, that are distinctive of Greek, medieval and modern, and contemporary thought.

Greeks. While current practice tends to use the term experience in a sense wide enough to include a solitary chance encounter, with little or no reflection to account for it, this is not exactly the manner in which the Greeks used the term. Their $\dot{\epsilon}\mu\pi\epsilon\iota\rho\dot{\alpha}$ is translated as experience. But this translation comes via the Latin experientia, and while the Latin tends to retain an implication of being expert, this must be supplied in the English translation. In other words, while the present-day connotation of experience is that of generating knowledge, this was not so for the Greeks. In their view, experience is generated through repetition and is dependent on practical knowledge. Thus, experience for them is more like empirical knowledge. And it is only in this sense that Saint Thomas Aquinas's commentary on Aristotle's Metaphysics can be understood: "In men the next thing above memory is experience, which some animals have only to a small degree. . . . But above experience, which belongs to particular reason, men have as their chief power a universal reason by means of which they live'' (In 1 meta. 1). And in like manner, one should understand Aristotle's comparison of experience with art: "It is from memory that men acquire experience, because the numerous memories of the same thing eventually produce the effect of a single experience. Experience seems very similar to science and art, but actually it is through experience that men acquire science and art" (Metaphysics 981 a 4).

This notion of experience as a certain knowledge of particulars became somewhat modified among the Stoics, a philosophical movement founded by Zeno of Citium (see STOICISM). According to Zeno and his followers, experience arises from recollections, which follow from perception. The Stoics maintained that reality consisted only of corporeal objects. Thus, the gods, the soul, and qualities must be interpreted in terms of matter. The Epicureans agreed with the Stoics in this respect; in their development of theories of scientific knowledge, experience became the criterion of judging the truth and falsity of opinion.

Scholastics and Moderns. Through the interpretation of scientific theories in terms of experience, the natural sciences came to be known as experimental sciences. For ROGER BACON, experience became the determinant of scientific proof: "I now wish to unfold the principles of experimental science, since without experience nothing can be sufficiently known. . . Aristotle's statement, then, that proof is reasoning that causes us to know is to be understood with the proviso that the proof is accompanied by its appropriate experience, and is not to be understood of the bare proof." (Op. mai. 6.1).

While PHILOSOPHY, since the time of Aristotle, has traditionally been called scientific knowledge, no one in the scholastic tradition made any pretense to identify philosophy with the experimental sciences. However, with the rise in stature of the latter, particularly in England, philosophers such as T. HOBBES, J. LOCKE, D. HUME, and H. SPENCER tended more and more to associate philosophy with the natural sciences. Subsequently, epistemological theories were developed exclusively in the light of the methods of modern science. At least the claims are set forth to develop such theories according to a "rigorous scientific method." Thus, experience becomes a byword in practically all modern theories of knowledge. The classical work of D. J. B. HAWKINS is nothing more than a critique of such usage.

In these theories of knowledge, experience is used in two ways: (1) intrinsically, as a certain conscious awareness, in much the same way as the ancient Stoics used the term; and (2) extrinsically, as pertaining to the things in the world that one encounters.

When experience is considered in the first way, the same naïve problems that beset ancient MATERIALISM reappear in modern interpretation of sense data. Sense data are there not understood as something extrinsic to the knowing subject; rather, they are themselves impressions produced in the senses in the act of PERCEPTION. Hence, the first intimation of CONSCIOUSNESS is not an awareness of something in nature, but the impression that the thing in nature has aroused in man. And the same theory of reconstruction that DEMOCRITUS devised to explain how one can form an IDEA reappears in the writings of B. RUSSELL and of Mao Tse Tung.

Considering experience in the second way, rather than make it something of consciousness alone, John Dewey treats it in much the same way as man's actions are treated in descriptive BEHAVIORISM, viz, strictly in terms of environment. His theory of knowledge regards experience as an extrinsic relation (the referent) to the knowing subject, with no so-called metaphysical structure (e.g., the intellect) to account for the concepts whereby man understands reality. Dewey's unmistakable influence is seen in modern theories of learning, defined in such expressions as "responses to stimulating situations" and "processes of adaptation."

Contemporaries. Contemporary EXISTENTIALISM tends to give practical philosophy precedence over the speculative. The latter as impugned is static, and thus opposed to the dynamic character of the experience involved in the practical. This development has encouraged the use of phenomenological methods in contemporary scholastic philosophy and theology (see PHENOMENOLO-GY). There, experience takes on new dimensions as circumscribing the transcendental relation of the ego. Some have been led to reject traditional SCHOLASTICISM because of a resulting erroneous view of the nature of speculative knowledge, as though the human INTELLECT can achieve a contemplation of TRUTH in a completely static state, without a dynamic discursus being necessary to arrive at some type of resolution. As a result of the false dichotomy introduced between dynamism and "staticism," prominence is given to experience in contemporary philosophies that stress the notion of encounter. The metaphysics of Aristotle and Saint Thomas Aquinas, however, rejects such a prominence of dynamism; its aim is to go beyond discovering the truth of being that can be experienced to a discovery of the truth of being that defies sensory perception.

See Also: EMPIRICISM; POSITIVISM; METAPHYSICS, VALIDITY OF; KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; SENSATION.

Bibliography: M. M. ROSSI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:72–82. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriff, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:357–65, 397–400. D. J. B. HAWKINS, The Criticism of Experience (New York 1946). J. L. LENNON, "The Notion of Experience," The Thomist 23 (1960) 315–44.

[R. J. MASIELLO]

EXPERIENCE, RELIGIOUS

In its primary signification experience denotes the impression and immutation of a conscious rational subject resulting from actual contact with things, from living through an event or events. The actuality and concreteness of the contact distinguishes experience from what is ideal or imaginary and locates it largely in sensation and feeling, not, however, to the exclusion of intellectual and volitional elements, as long as direct intuitional contact with reality is involved. Every experience would seem to involve at once cognitional and appetitive (both emotional and volitional) elements, with the latter, however, predominating; experience is not mere knowing but more a matter of being affected by the object. As such it is largely subjective, with emphasis upon affectivity. The experience is not limited to the mere passive immutation of the subject but includes as well his vital responses, especially the spontaneous ones. A secondary meaning of the term extends it to signify a state of accumulated experiences, representing achieved habitual attitudes of a cognitional, volitional, or emotive kind. The kinds of experience are numerous and varied. It may be individual or collective; conscious or subconscious; natural or supernatural; and in terms of the area wherein the experience occurs—aesthetic, moral, metaphysical (e.g., the intuition of one's own being), religious, etc.

Religious experience is thus some sort of awareness of and response to the divine, largely achieved in terms of discerning the divine presence or one's total dependence upon divinity. This may be immediate or mediated, but is necessarily subjective either entirely so or with varying degrees of foundation in external reality and history. It is in opposition to abstract rational thought and not infrequently accompanied by such phenomena as revelation, inspiration, voices and visions, conversion, etc.

The Term in History. Religious experience is doubtlessly as old as man himself; yet it is only from the time of the Protestant reformers that it assumes a singular and predominant role in religious life. In the four centuries from Luther to William James there is one common note in all of Western Christianity aside from Catholicism, namely, that religious experience is the ultimate criterion and rule of faith. Every constraint of dogma, authority, and speculative reason is to give way to it.

The Reformers. Martin LUTHER took as his point of departure the doctrine of the Fall as radically corrupting man, despoiling him of even the proper use of his natural powers. Religion is man's experience first of his own sinfulness and then of the bestowal upon him of justification that comes to him from without by an exterior imputation of the merits of Christ. Man, then, is purely passive in his justification, of which, however, he experiences a personal conviction. Faith is no longer a belief in dogmas but a faith in salvation, a sort of confidence or trust. John CALVIN acknowledged this same corruption of man in the Institutes of the Christian Religion and explained salvation by recourse to the Holy Spirit, who "touches" interiorly the heart of man. The affective satisfaction accompanying these illuminations and inflammations of the Spirit attests to their authenticity against deceptive experiences.

Jansenism. Cornelius JANSEN, M. de Bay (see BAIUS AND BAIANISM), and P. Quesnel, loosely grouped together in the movement known as Jansenism, represent a sort of semi-Protestantism within Catholicism. To human nature there is assigned only weakness and corruption; all good originates in the order of grace. But Jansen in the Augustinus described grace as an experienced delectation that determines the assent of the will. This was an excessive depreciation of theoretical reason with an extolling of affective life and sentimentality. The soul was represented as capable of an immediate feeling of the rapport between itself and God. The writings of all three of these authors were condemned by the Church (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 1901–80, 2001–07, 2010–12, 2400–2502). Blaise PASCAL, without being committed to the Jansenist position, did come under its influence and insisted upon salvific knowledge of God as "felt by the heart, not reason."

I. Kant and F. D. F. Schleiermacher. The writings of these philosophers introduced a new phase in the Protestant understanding of religious experience. Kant's idealism and agnosticism enhanced religious subjectivity and gave philosophical justification to the Lutheran position on the powerlessness of reason. The norms of religious faith were made to be purely practical and subjective. SCHLEIERMACHER made the very essence of religion to consist in sentiment. According to him, concepts of the speculative reason are no more than superstition. Religious experience is a purely emotive state resulting in an immediate impression of the divine; each experience is at once valid but deficient so that the only authentic form of piety is tolerance. Later writers attempted to regulate this experience by the norms of Scripture (H. Plitt, Evangelische Glaubenslehre, 2 v. Gotha 1863–64) or to situate it in the moral crises precipitating conversion (F. R. Franck, Christian Certainty, tr. M. J. Evans, Edinburgh 1886).

S. Kierkegaard. Reacting against the pantheism inherent in Hegelian metaphysics, Kierkegaard concerned himself with the personal predicament of man "existing before God" (The Concept of Dread and Christian Discourses, tr. W. Lowrie, London 1944, 1940). In anguish and despair man becomes aware of his lack of self-sufficiency and is thus led to religious experience that consists in an act of commitment to God. This act rests upon an awareness of God that amounts to a personal encounter; historical faith is of no avail here, and the experience cannot be rendered in concepts. Ultimate truth is pure subjectivity, demanding that God "break in" upon the soul.

Modernism. A. LOISY and G. TYRRELL were prime spokesmen in a movement that maintained that dogmatic formulas were not valid norms for truth, these being merely the product of a sociological and humanistic experience of the Christian community reflecting upon a revelation it could not grasp. The variance of this from Catholic teaching is noted in the condemnatory decree of the Holy Office Lamentabili issued under Pius X (Enchiridion symbolorum 3401–66).

Pragmatism. H. BERGSON (The Two Sources of Morality and Religion, tr. Andra and Brereton, New York 1954) and W. JAMES (The Varieties of Religious Experi*ence*) reduced religious faith to the order of subjective utility. Bergson's anti-intellectualism led him to locate religion in experiences arising out of practical activity. Their value is entirely a pragmatic one in a philosophy of pure "becoming." James's contribution consisted in the analysis of the content of such experiences, largely in terms of their psychological manifestations. These occur in the "subliminal self," are largely instances of "psychological automatism," require no belief in a personal God, and are primarily therapeutic in value.

Contemporary Thought. The social crises of the times have provoked even greater concern with subjective religious experience. This is manifest in the purely philosophical writings of many existentialists and phenomenologists, such as E. Husserl, M. Heidegger, and K. Jaspers; it continues to animate the mainstream of orthodox Protestantism as in the crisis-theology of Karl Barth; in Catholicism it has earned the increasing concern of G. Marcel, L. LAVELLE, R. Guardini, K. Rahner, E. Schillebeeckx to mention but a few.

Positive Analysis. Genuine religious experience does hold a place within Catholic theology, never, however, so as to deteriorate into complete subjectivism. Such experience is not, then, a criterion for belief except in a secondary sense, that is, by reference to a historical faith and especially with regard to the Incarnation as a historical event, which is an objective precondition to experience. Three instances will illustrate how such experiences may occur. (1) Human crises-these occur under God's providential guidance effecting those dispositions of soul in which man becomes acutely and intuitively aware of his limitations, his sinfulness, and his need for God. Such experiences can be either preparatory for grace or conducive to further advancement in grace already possessed. They can involve the direct intervention of God (as in the case of Saint Paul struck down on the road to Damascus) but need not do so. (2) Charismatic graces-these are graces that do not as such sanctify the individual but are given rather for the common utility of the Christian community. As visions, private revelations, prophecies, and miracles, they manifest in extraordinary fashion the purposes of God and can occasion a heightened sense of the divine. (3) Faith and the Sacramentsat the very heart of Christianity, common to all in varying degrees of intensity, is a personal awareness of the interrelationships and exchanges with God achieved in an act of belief mediated by the Church and given loving expression in the liturgical acts of shared community worship. This contact depends upon God's saving act toward man realized in the Incarnation, Passion, death, Resurrection, and Ascension of Christ. These events are also utilized by God as instrumental causes in the communication of that grace, which they express symbolically. Religious experience is not this ontological reality introduced into the soul by God with the initial assimilation it achieves; it is rather the personal and quasiintuitive awareness of what occurs psychologically in man's consciousness. The donation of grace depends (God willing it) upon man's free cooperative response. God's invitational love effects a passive immutation of the soul obscurely open to experience, in which the divine presence is discerned. It then appears possible within the obscurity of faith to know and love in some highly personal and more concrete way the Triune God. The soul thus moves beyond the abstract concepts of faith to a true experience involving interpersonal relationships. This experience is not direct and immediate, not an intuition properly speaking; only the beatific vision is such. Here there is only, at the most, a contuition, a contact in knowledge and love, with God in His very presentiality, but only through the medium of experiencing His created effects within the soul. Saint Thomas characterizes this as quasi-experimental knowledge (In sent. 1.14.2.2 ad 3; De virt. in comm. 12 ad 11). In its more sublime instances this becomes infused contemplation elicited by the gift of wisdom (cf. Summa theologiae 1a, 43.5 ad 2), which may, but need not be, accompanied by mystical phenomena.

The content of this experience is varied: a sense of sin, of the presence of God, of the victory of Christ, of freedom from the spirit of fear, of fellowship with Christ, of being begotten of God, of sonship, of the indwelling of the Trinity, of entering upon relationships to the Father, in the Spirit, through the Son (Rom 6.4; Gal 2.20; 1 Jn 3.6; Rom 8.15; Col 1.2; Gal 4.6; Rom 5.5).

Faith is not only an intellectual assent to conceptually formulated truth; it is at the same time a loving surrender to a Person. The believing act is an encounter with God, in Christ, and not merely as object but as subject. What is known obscurely is not merely what, but who God is. Such encounter, moreover, cannot be unilateral. The sacramental act, then (above all, in the Eucharist), is first of all a symbolic expression of belief and free acceptance, the vital, conscious response of man to God's initiative in the dialogue of grace. This is undergone in a dark but authentic quasi-intuition of the Person and timetranscending presence of the God-Man.

Bibliography: H. PINARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT 5.2:1786–1868. H. M. HUGHES, J. HAS-TINGS ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27). F. SCHLEIERMACHER, The Christian Faith, ed. H. R. MACKINTOSH and J. S. STEWART (Edinburgh 1928; Torchbook 2 v. 1963). W. JAMES, The Varieties of Religious Experience (New York 1902; repr. 1963). J. MOUROUX, The Christian Experience, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1954). H. PINARD, "La Théorie de l'expérience religieuse: San évolution de Luther à W. James," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 17 (1921) 63–83, 306–48, 547–74.

[W. J. HILL]

EXPERIENCE THEOLOGY

One of the tendencies in modern Protestantism to affirm that the doctrines of the Christian faith are derived from an analysis of the subjective faith experience. It is clearly discernible in the thought of F. SCHLEIERMACHER and may be traced to his attempt to wed RATIONALISM and philosophical ROMANTICISM. To Schleiermacher's way of thinking, dogma was the rational expression of a certain religious sentiment (this latter being described as the feeling of total dependence on God). He attempted to avoid radically individualistic SUBJECTIVISM, moreover, by observing that authentic religious sentiment includes the experience of Christian fellowship. Christian dogmas, then, will reflect what is common to all such experience. A quasi-tradition is thus established, which, however, Schleiermacher considered to be altogether secondary with reference to the experience.

In the school of Erlangen (K. von Hofmann and F. H. R. Frank) the emphasis is placed more on the genuine experience of rebirth, to which is attributed the objective renewal of faith. Even such thinkers as R. SEEBERG and A. RITSCHL show that they were influenced by these trains of thought, insofar as they make the experience of the awesome power of faith the occasion for the critical interpretation of dogmatic tradition.

The difficulty here, of course, is in discerning precisely how one's own experience is related to what is directly the object of faith. One aspect of this relation is certainly expressed in the term love-knowledge. Communion with God in love is assuredly a principle through which Christian doctrine is better understood; and when such communion is attributed to the Church, we have a factor of dogmatic development. The proponents of experience theology (Erfahrungstheologie), however, seem to identify such communion with revelation; and such a position is scarcely tenable.

Bibliography: K. BARTH, Church Dogmatics, tr. G. T. THOM-SON (New York 1955–) 1.1:6.3. W. LOHFF, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freibrug 1957–65) 3:981–982. F. E. SCHLEIERMACHER, The Christian Faith, ed. H. R. MACKINTOSH and J. S. STEWART (Edinburgh 1928).

[M. B. SCHEPERS]

EXPERIMENTATION, MEDICAL

Principles

Medical experimentation raises a moral question as far as it submits human subjects either to medical treatments not as yet scientifically established or to procedures employed only for the purpose of discovering some truth or of verifying some hypothesis. If the experiment entails any significant risk or hardship for the subject, the matter becomes theologically one of moral rights and duties relative to proper respect for human life and health.

Experimentation admits of two possible objectives: benefit to the individual who submits to experimental measures, or the advance of medical science and consequent benefit to the common good. Accordingly as one or the other purpose is sought exclusively, or at least is paramount in the intention of the participants, two distinct moral problems present themselves.

For the subject's benefit. When the good of the individual patient is the physician's exclusive or predominant concern, the canons of good medicine will dictate the course of a treatment that it is the doctor's duty to provide. Thus, if a sure remedy is available, it should ordinarily be employed in preference to treatment of doubtful efficacy. Or if the only choice of remedy lies among several that are at best doubtful, the most promising should generally be used. The patient is entitled in justice to the surest means reasonably available for achieving the object of his medical contract, viz, the cure or control of his malady.

But it is also true that if a proven remedy would entail exceptional expense, pain, or other hardship, the patient may be justified in choosing instead a treatment whose effectiveness is as yet incompletely established but that circumvents the disadvantage presumably inherent in his using the proven procedure. The patient, in other words, may legitimately run the risk, even though it be considerable, of a less certain remedy, provided there is a proportionately serious reason for so doing. A fortiori, if there is little or no risk involved in accepting a remedy of dubious efficacy, it is undeniably the patient's right to make that choice for any reasonable motive.

But a decision of this kind is the patient's prerogative and not the doctor's. Hence the doctor must prefer the certain to the uncertain remedy, or the more probable to the less probable, unless the patient's rightful choice to the contrary is explicitly expressed either by him or by his legitimate representative, or unless this consent can be reasonably presumed.

For the benefit of others. In order to discern the limitations to be placed on human experimentation undertaken for the benefit of others, one must appreciate two moral truths. The first is simply a denial of that extremist philosophy that we have come to identify as totalitarianism and that would subject the individual completely to the community or state by subordinating all individual rights to the prior claims of the common good. Such a philosophy, in its most blatant form, found expression in the experimental excesses encouraged and practiced under Nazism and later repudiated by the free world in the formulation at Nuremberg of a ten-point statement of limitations to be placed on medical experiments performed on human subjects. Put positively, this principle asserts that, with regard to his life and bodily integrity, each individual possesses a God-given right of immunity from unprovoked attack by any other person. No individual, therefore, can legitimately be considered an expendable member of society to be exploited for the common good. For this reason it follows, in the words of Pius XII, that "the doctor can take no measure or try no course of action without the consent of the patient." Consequently, laudable as may be the desire to contribute to the advancement of medical science, doctors are nonetheless restricted in their human experimentation by this inalienable right of any individual to forbid such use of his organic entity. As the first rule of the Nuremberg Tribunal expresses it, "The voluntary consent of the human subject is absolutely essential."

The second pertinent principle denies what might be called extreme individualism on our part and imposes certain basic limitations on each one's right to dispose of his own life and bodily members. Because of his creaturehood, man must admit himself to be essentially dependent upon his Creator. In context, this dependence means that man is not the absolute master of his body and life. He is not proprietor of himself, but rather a custodian entrusted with the care of "property" that belongs strictly to God. He may, therefore, administer this trust only in compliance with the divine will as manifested to him in various ways.

The first corollary from this principle is the prohibition of the natural law against suicide. To intend directly the termination of one's own life is to usurp a right that belongs exclusively to God. There are circumstances in which we are justified in risking our lives if necessary for the achievement of some momentous good; but in such cases, death, if it should occur, is the unintended byproduct of an act legitimately performed for another reason and is not imputable as a moral evil. Even for the laudable purpose of advancing medical science, no one would be justified in making his own death the intended means to that end.

A second consequence of the same principle relates to bodily damage short of death that for one or another reason one might inflict upon himself or allow another to inflict. We are responsible to God not only for life itself but also for our physical integrity, and only within certain limits may we legitimately mutilate our bodies or suppress their natural functions. According to the principle of totality, for example, one is allowed to sacrifice a bodily member should this be necessary or useful for the good of his own person as a whole. But this principle has no application in a context of investigative procedures undertaken exclusively for the benefit of others. Does any other principle ratify the risking of one's bodily integrity for altruistic motives?

Certainly there are circumstances wherein the principle of charity-i.e., love for fellow man-does legitimatize a certain degree of bodily self-sacrifice on behalf of others. Theologians unanimously agree, for example, that blood transfusions and heterologous skin grafts are morally permissible. On the strength of the same principle, many moralists of highest repute vigorously defend some forms of organic transplantation inter vivos, always with certain qualifications that sound medicine would also stipulate. Finally, although one may not intend his own death as a means of saving another's life, it is sometimes permissible deliberately to perform a heroic act that will have two immediate effects, viz, preservation of another's life and the unintended but inevitable loss of one's own. In none of these instances does any bodily benefit accrue to the donor subject. In fact, the contrary is true, especially where the sacrifice of an organ or risk to life is concerned.

Conclusion. It is clear that the immanent teleology of our corporal being does admit of a certain ordination to the benefit of others. In terms of experimental medicine, it would also seem that charity would countenance a limited degree of risk to life or bodily integrity in circumstances that make human experimentation genuinely necessary. But where does one draw the line beyond which one may not licitly go in this regard? No general answer, applicable to all cases indiscriminately, is possible. Each individual case must be judged on its own merits. An attempt must be made to judge whether there is sufficient reason to justify the necessary risk or harm entailed in the particular procedure contemplated. However, the following generic norms can be suggested as morally safe in practice: (1) When bodily damage or risk to life is foreseen as insignificant, there is no valid reason to forbid a willing subject to consent to the procedure in question. (2) No one may legitimately consent to a procedure that entails certain death as a necessary means of achieving the experiment's purpose. (Although it has been suggested by some that a criminal already justly condemned to death might licitly choose this form of execution, such a possibility would represent the sole exception to an otherwise universal rule.)

In the vast intermediate area where hazard to life or health may range from notable to very serious, the maximum limit of permissible risk cannot be sharply defined. But it would seem safe to say that, for a proportionately grave reason, a subject may for the benefit of others authorize and submit to any experimental procedure that will not seriously and permanently impair his functional integrity or cause serious risk of life. Implicit in this concession is the supposition that the procedure has been adequately tested short of human experimentation, that it promises reasonable hope of achieving a good proportionate to the risk, and that all reasonable care is taken to avoid even unintended harm to any who submit to the experiment.

Bibliography: PIUS XII, "Ce premier Congrès," (Address, Sept. 13, 1952) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 44 (1952) 779–789; English tr. Catholic Mind 51 (May 1953) 305–313; "Nous sommes heureux," (Address, Sept. 30, 1954) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 46 (1954) 587–598; English tr. Catholic Mind 53 (April 1955) 242–252. G. A. KELLY, Medico-Moral Problems (St. Louis, Mo. 1958) 261–269. C. J. MCFADDEN, Medical Ethics (5th ed. Philadelphia, Pa. 1961) 249–255. T. J. O'DONNELL, Morals in Medicine (2d ed. rev. and enl. Westminster, Md. 1959) 113–120. J. PAQUIN, Morale et médecine (3d ed. rev. Montreal 1960) 365–371. J. J. LYNCH, "Human Experimentation in Medicine: Moral Aspects," Linacre Quarterly 27 (1960) 62–67.

[J. J. LYNCH]

Recent Developments

Medical and public concern. Medical research and experimentation have provided the physician with considerably improved methods for dealing with human disease and dysfunction. Among these are antimicrobial agents for a variety of infectious diseases; organ transplantation for dealing with total kidney failure and selected heart conditions, as well as other organs such as the liver; better surgical techniques for repair of injuries to tissue and bone; chemotherapy and radiation therapy for cancer control; sophisticated diagnostic techniques such as computerized tomography (CAT); magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), ultrasonography, and numerous other laboratory tests which provide to the physician with more precise information about the condition of his patient; and a host of drugs to deal more effectively with hypertension, anxiety, pain, hormonal deficiencies, allergies, and many other human physical and mental dysfunctions. In addition, the recently completed Human Genome Project promises a bright future for the diagnosis and treatment of diseases at the genetic level.

As the benefits of medical research became more evident in everyday life, increased private and governmental funding has provided the means for still more research. Thus, national support (federal, state, industrial, and private nonprofit) for health research and disease in 1961 was $1.1 billion, while for 1976 it was about $5.1 billion, representing approximately 3.6% of a total health cost of $141.1 billion (National Institutes of Health 1977-Basic Data). The proposed 2002 budget for NIH alone is $23.1 billion (CNN.com).

Parallel with the increase in medical research has been an augmentation in the medical profession's concern about the ethical aspects of human experimentation. One measure of this increased interest is the notable increase in the number of publications in the medical literature which deal with the ethical dimensions of human experimentation. Public and professional interest has also been aroused with the revelation of several apparently flagrant examples of the violation of basic human rights associated with medical research. Such occurrences, it must be stressed, are rare. Recently considerable public interest has developed around the possibility of human cloning (after the announcement in February of 1997 of a cloned sheep, Dolly, with the consequent surfacing of many ethical questions. Similarly, the issue of the use of human stem cells for research and therapy has resulted in intense ethical discussions.

Governmental action. In 1974 Congress passed and the President signed into law, the National Research Act, establishing the National Commission for the Protection of Human Subjects of Biomedical and the Behavioral Research (Title II of Public Law 93-348). The elevenmember commission assumed the task of (1) identifying the basic ethical principles which should undergird research involving human subjects; (2) developing appropriate guidelines; (3) making recommendations for administrative action to the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW). Over the subsequent years there have been structural changes in the Federal agencies so that the current relevant agency is the Office for Protection from Research Risks located in the Department of Health and Human Services (DHHS). The relevant Federal Regulations may be found in the Code of Federal Regulations, Title 45, Part 46, Protection of Human Subjects.

The early basic regulation governing the protection of human subjects in biomedical and behavioral research were published in the Federal Register on May 30, 1974. These regulations required, among other items, that (1) the risks be outweighed by the sum of benefits to the subject and the importance of the knowledge to be gained; (2) the rights and welfare of the subject be adequately protected; (3) legally effective, informed and free consent be obtained; (4) the research be reviewed at timely intervals. Each research site is to set up an Institutional Review Board (IRB) to review every research protocal involving human subjects. Without the IRBs approval that research may not proceed. Other regulations governing research when the subjects are fetuses, pregnant women, or the products of in vitro fertilization were issued on Aug. 8, 1975. These were modified and augmented by regulations published on Jan. 11, 1978. Proposed policies governing the use of psychosurgery in practice and research were issued on May 23, 1977, while publication of and invitation of public comment on the report and recommendations of the National Commission regarding research involving children appeared in the Federal Register on Jan. 13, 1978. All these regulations have been periodically updated. Part of a refinement and updating process initially included, and continues to include, consultation with the scientific community and interested public groups or individuals. The Federal Register remains a reliable information source of changes in Federal Regulations regarding the protection of human subjects in medical research.

Church teaching. Vatican Council II and Popes John XXIII and Paul VI in the area of medical research have primarily applied and reinforced what Pope Pius XII had already said at some length. In his address to the Pontifical Academy of Sciences on April 27, 1968, Pope Paul VI stated: "The Holy See intends to show that the Catholic Church respects scientific research, recognizes its freedom within its own domain, and looks forward eagerly to its present and future conquests" (The Pope Speaks 13 [1968] 108). In an earlier address to pediatric cardiologists, the pope stated the supreme rule for medical practice and research: "that man is the subject, the basis and the end' of life in society . . .'' (May 12, 1967; The Pope Speaks 12 [1967] 365). The pope's abiding concern is shown when he addressed the European Association of Hospital Doctors on April 28, 1973 and noted the need to "reconcile legitimate and necessary research with the personal rights of the patient, who can never be sacrificed as if the matter involved merely a part of humanity ordained to the good of the whole" (Pope Speaks 18 [1973] 69–71). Finally, Pope Paul reiterated his central theme: "In this field of medical ethics, we would like once more to stress its foundation: unconditional respect for life, from its beginning" (Paul VI to the doctors of Flanders, April 23, 1977, Osservatore Rom May 5, 1977, 9). In his turn, Pope JOHN PAUL II made a number of notable contributions to the field of medical ethics. Among these are the following: The Splendor of Truth (VERITATIS SPLENDOR) 1993; The Gospel of Life (EVANGELIUM VITAE) 1995; and several documents issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, and aproved by John Paul II, Declaration on Euthanasia (1980) and Instruction on Respect for Human Life in Its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation (Donum Vitae) (1987).

From these quotations and other papal statements it is evident that relative to medical research the magisterium asserts three main points: (1) Medical research is necessary and good but must be for the true welfare of human beings. (2) Human life must be respected by the individual and others at all stages of its existence; therefore, research risks are to be limited by the requirements of justice and charity. (3) Human persons are individually of inestimable value and may not under any conditions be used as mere means; consequently, informed and free consent is an absolute condition for human experimentation.

Informed consent. In practice, perhaps the area of greatest difficulty is the process of obtaining truly informed and freely given consent from the potential research subject. Government regulations provide a framework and a mechanism to assure some degree of compliance with the regulations. Nonetheless, ultimately the protection of the subject's basic human rights devolves on those doing the research. The assessment of the risk/benefit ratio depends much on the experimenter's own understanding of the research about to be undertaken. Obtaining appropriate informed consent from the potential research subjects rests in large measure on the researcher's having an attitude of profound respect towards human beings and on his ability to express the expected benefits and reasonably anticipated hazards in a manner that adequately informs and freely elicits the appropriate consent. Special groups such as the poor, the sick, employees, medical and graduate students are considered to be "consent prone" and thus require particular care to assure the absence of coercion. Other groups such as fetuses, the mentally retarded, children, and prisoners are especially vulnerable and thus are generally inappropriate for human experimentation, unless there is serious need and additional safeguards for the good and safety of the individual research subject are rigorously observed and enforced.

Bibliography: B. M ASHLEY and K. D. O'ROURKE, Health Care Ethics, A Theological Analysis, 4th ed., T. L. BEAUCHAMP and L. WALTERS, Contemporary Issues in Bioethics (Belmont, Calif. 1978). R. L. BOGOMOLNY, Human Experimentation (Dallas, Tx. 1976). P. CATALDO and A. S. MORACZEWSKI, Catholic Health Care Ethics: A Manual for Ethics Committees (Boston, Mass. 2001). C. FRIED, Medical Experimentation: Personal Integrity and Social Policy (New York 1974). B. H. GRAY, Human Subjects in Medical Experimentation (New York 1975). N. HERSHEY and R. D. MILLER, Human Experimentation and the Law (Germantown, Md. 1976). J KATZ, Experimentation with Human Beings (New York 1972). W. E. MAY, Human Existence, Medicine and Ethics (Chicago, III. 1977). National Academy of Sciences, Experiments and Research with Humans: Values in Conflict (Washington, D.C. 1975). T. J. O'DONNEL, Medicine and Christian Morality (New York 1976). P. RAMSEY, The Patient As Person (New Haven, Conn. and London 1970). S. J. REISER, A. J. DYCK, and W. J. CURRAN, Ethics in Medicine: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Concerns (Cambridge, Mass. 1977). J. J. SHINNERS, The Morality of Medical Experimentation on Living Human Subjects in the Light of Recent Papal Pronouncements (Washington, D.C. 1958). M. B. VISSCHER, Ethical Constraints and Imperatives in Medical Research (Springfield, Ill. 1975).

[A. S. MORACZEWSKI]

EXPIATION

Expiation is a general concept denoting all acts and means whereby a sacred order to which harm has been done is restored. In any given religious structure the meaning of expiation depends on (1) the nature of the sacred order to which harm has been done—this order can be one that is established by a god, it can be the will of God Himself, or it can also be an impersonally conceived order; (2) the various concepts of the harm or evil that has been done (see SIN).

The interdependence of the meanings of expiation, holiness, and sin accounts for the closeness of expiation to other concepts in many contexts. The Latin root word expiare means not only to atone for sins but also to placate or appease the wrath of a god. The words expiation, penance, and penalty are often interchangeable. In primitive cultures penal procedure and expiation are often hard to distinguish. The justice of the death penalty for incest in interior Celebes is thought of as self-evident because it confines the evil to the criminals and protects the community. Among the ancient Nordics the same place served as a center for cult and for the execution of justice. Thus sins can be atoned for or punishment inflicted because of the cultic order that protects the common weal. Castigation or self-castigation (in monastic life) to expiate for sin in Christianity, Buddhism, and Jainism is a related phenomenon. In most instances expiation in monastic life, however, is more properly understood as a form of mortification or purification. Purification implies not only the cleansing from evil or sin, but more widely the preparation for the holy, whether in cult and liturgy or in ascetic and monastic life. The confession of sins is probably the most widely attested element of expiation ceremonies. As an integral part of expiation it occurred long before Christianity, e.g., in the Egyptian, Babylonian, Hittite, Israelite, Chinese, and Japanese religions. Outside the Christian sphere of influence, R. Pettazzoni collected evidence of the practice from some 100 primitive tribes scattered over the world. The major emphases in expiation rites and concepts may be presented under four headings.

Concrete Removal of Sins. Expiation rites in primitive religions are often accomplished by such physical means as spitting, vomiting, or drawing of blood. Many ceremonies resemble magic operations, by removing a substance representing the cause of a malady. Among the Kagaba (Colombia, South America) a man who committed a crime is acquitted of his guilt by a process in which pebbles symbolizing the perpetrated evil are removed. Quite common are the burning and ablution of sins. In Brahmanism a priest ritually identifies the guilt of a person with a piece of the wooden, sacrificial post and throws it in the fire, thus physically annihilating the sacrificer's guilt. Ablutions with water, baths, and especially the sprinkling with blood are widely considered effective means of expiation, making people, devotees, and even things free from pollution, impurity, evil, and sin (see Ex 12.7). Among the Teutons the sprinkling of blood cleansed the participants in the sacrifice and purified the idols and walls of the temple.

Concreteness in expiation rites is particularly clear in the confession of sins that accompanies or precedes the specific acts. It is particular sins that are declared and are atoned for. Among the Kikuyu (East Africa) the declaration of each sin is followed by expectoration. Bath and confession of sins are both part of the expiatory ceremony among the Bashilange (Congo) and the Thonga (southeast Africa). Although in almost all cases of declaration of sins only the presence of a priest or medicine man is needed, there are, however, exceptions that emphasize the concreteness. Among the Dagari (Upper Guinea) the husband listens to his wife's confession of conjugal infidelities while she is in childbirth. Frequently, expiatory rites with confessions of sins are performed in times of crisis. Sins are feared for their concrete presence and consequences, and their declaration and expiation are to be understood as an equally concrete riddance. The concreteness of these ceremonies is by no means lost in the more advanced cultures and the great religions. Ritual baths and washings occur, for instance, in the religions of Israel, Islam, and Hinduism.

Cultic and Social Forms. The ritualistic writings of Brahmanism describe expiation ceremonies in great detail. The Vedic student who breaks his celibacy wears the skin of an ass and begs for alms while publicly proclaiming his transgression. The function of society in the expiation rite, though not absent elsewhere, is thus strongly accentuated. Religions that are strongly developed on the cultic side often show forms of vicarious expiation. The sins of Israel, e.g., were carried away by the goat for Azazel (Leviticus ch. 16).

In several religions priests play an important mediating role. The most typical example of kings mediating between gods and men and atoning for the transgressions of the people was in Babylon. At the New Year's festival the king did penance on behalf of the people, was divested of his regalia, and was cultically humiliated before being reassured of the god's (Marduk's) favor and reinstated as king. Special penitential prayers and fixed days for expiation rites have a great importance in cults. Brahmanic ritualism developed special rites ($pr\bar{a}yaścitta$) to atone for ritual mistakes. Higher cults in general have special ceremonies and prayers for sins that are unwittingly committed, thus often continuing the concrete concept of sin as a material thing.

Mental Explation. This form of explation plays a crucial role in religions and religious institutions that are devoted to meditation and meditation techniques: monasticism, Buddhism, and Indian philosophies such as Sāmkhya and YOGA (see INDIAN PHILOSOPHY). In most cases of advanced meditation techniques the purely mental purification is accompanied or preceded by moral purification.

Humiliation before God. Humiliation is the natural concomitant of all religions that are monotheistic or emphasize God's mercy. The act of humiliation is the result of God's mercy and power rather than a means to effect purification. Humble devotion to the god Vishnu has been stressed in India by Rāmānuja and Madhva. (See HINDU-ISM.) The latter and his followers in particular see in bhakti the highest bliss. Faith in the most merciful God and the experience of mere creatureliness and sinfulness may make expiation the principal act of man; "Against Thee have we sinned" (Jer 14.7). The act is clearly expressed at the beginning of the Mass in the Confiteor and at the beginning of most Protestant liturgies in the Confession of Sins, followed by the remission of sins or assurance of pardon. Different, yet not unrelated is the basic attitude of Islam (submission).

See Also: EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE); EXPIATION (IN THEOLOGY).

Bibliography: R. PETTAZZONI, "Confession of Sins: An Attempted General Interpretation," in his Essays on the History of Religions (Leiden 1954) 43–54; "Confession of Sins and the Classics," ibid. 55–67; La Confession des péchés, 2 v. (Paris 1931–32). H. FRANKFORT, Kingship and the Gods (Chicago 1948). R. J. THOMPSON, Penitence and Sacrifice in Early Israel Outside the Levitical Law (Leiden 1963). H. OLDENBERG, Die Religion des Veda (Berlin 1894). F. HEILER, Das Gebet (5th ed. Munich 1923). A. MÉDEBIELLE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) Suppl 3 (1938) 1–262, esp. 3–48, with bibliog. L. H. GRAY et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 5:635–671.

[K. W. BOLLE]

EXPIATION (IN THE BIBLE)

A blotting out or removal of sin; hence, the renewal of communion with God. The supreme act of expiation is Christ's death on the cross, the meaning of which is illuminated by a number of Old Testament themes. This article deals first with the idea and practice of expiation in Old Testament times, then with relevant New Testament texts.

In the Old Testament. In Israel a strict correlation is observable between expiation and SIN, and the sense of both is controlled by the COVENANT. Sin is the breaking of the covenantal stipulations, whether moral or ritual; expiation is the wiping out of sin so as to restore the covenantal relationship between the sinner or the sinful people and Yahweh. This stands in pointed contrast to the religions of the world that surrounded Israel during the whole Biblical period-the polytheistic nature-religions of the ancient Near East and the Greek and Hellenistic religions of the Mediterranean. Outside Israel, religion consisted in coming to terms with the gods so as to assure the well-being of the people or of the individual, and the direct purpose of expiatory acts was to allay the gods' often capricious wrath. (See SACRIFICE, II). Here as elsewhere, the faith of Israel may be said to account for its own uniqueness inasmuch as it consciously defines itself as a response to the self-revelation of Yahweh, a moral God and Lord of history.

Terminology and Ritual Expiation. In the vocabulary of expiation the Hebrew verb kippēr has first importance. Twice in the Old Testament it occurs in a profane sense according to which one placates an angry or ill-disposed man (Gn 32.21; Prv 16.14). As a religious term it has two uses. God expiates sin, i.e., He wipes out, removes, or forgives it; in passive forms of the verb, sin is expiated, i.e., wiped out, removed, forgiven. In liturgical usage kippēr means to expiate or to perform expiatory rites. The subject of the verb is Moses, Aaron, or the officiating priest. The object is the sin that is wiped out or the person or place that is cleansed of sin. The object is never God, and the meaning to placate God or His anger is not found.

Despite the relatively late redaction of the Levitical code, explatory rites are of great antiquity in Israel (see Mi 6.6–7). This is clear from the archaic features in the concept and rite itself of the hattairit, or SIN OFFERING, e.g., the idea of the explatory efficacy of blood that supposed the association of the animal's blood with its life; since the life, which is sacred and a divine gift par excellence, was considered to be in the blood, blood was regarded as peculiarly apt to explate, i.e., to purify or to win forgiveness. The most important text, Lv 17.11, is part of the Law of HOLINESS, but the concept was certainly much older. [See SACRIFICE, III (IN ISRAEL)].

The explatory ceremonies prescribed in the Book of LEVITICUS are of interest not only in themselves, but also for the light they throw on certain aspects of the New Testament theology of expiation. In the Old Testament ritual, the sin offering is distinguished from other sacrifices by the ritual disposal of the blood (Lv 4.5-7, 16-18, 25, 30, 34; 5.9), of the fat or choice portions (4.8-10, 19, 26, 31, 35), and of the remainder of the victim (4.11-12;etc.). If the sacrifice was offered to expiate the sin of the high priest or of the whole people, the blood was brought into the Holy Place [see TENT OF MEETING; TEMPLES (IN THE BIBLE)] and sprinkled before the veil of the HOLY OF HOLIES, smeared on the horns of the altar of incense, and the remainder poured out at the base of the altar of holocausts. The fat was burned on the altar of holocausts, and the ashes were carried outside the camp to a "clean place" where the rest of the victim was burned. If the sacrifice was offered for the sin of an individual lay person, the blood was smeared on the horns of the altar of holocausts and the remainder poured out at the base of the altar. The fat was burned on the altar of holocausts, and the remainder was consumed by the priest or priests. There is no evidence that the sacrifice was conceived as a substitute for the sacrifice of the life of the offerer, nor that the shedding of the victim's blood in any way signified a vicarious punishment; and from the disposal of its remains it is clear that the victim was considered holy rather than impure and laden with sin (Lv 6.18-22).

Expiation assumed an ever more dominant role in Israelite religion from the exilic period to the end of the Old Testament period. Nearly half the later legislation on sacrifice was concerned with expiatory offerings: the ancient sin offering (hatta~t) and guilt offering (asam) and the HOLOCAUST, which was now given an expiatory significance (Lv 1.4). The same tendency is evident in the importance attached to the Day of ATONEMENT (Lv 16.1–34), distinguished by its expiatory sacrifices, the confession of the people's sins, and the driving of the sinladen SCAPEGOAT into the desert. However, rites alone do not automatically win forgiveness. Without inner conversion, as the Prophets and later the rabbis frequently insisted, cultic rites are meaningless.

The Servant of the Lord. The peak of the Old Testament theology of expiation is reached in the fourth of the Deutero-Isaian Songs of the SUFFERING SERVANT (Is 52.13–53.12), where the religious tradition stream of ransom and redemption [see REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE)] converges with that of expiation. The term ' $\bar{a}s\bar{a}m$, which occurs in Is 53.10, had the sense of expiatory offering to God or expiatory sacrifice long before the redaction of the priestly code, as may be seen in 1 Sm 6.3–4, 8, 17. As indicated above, much of the material in the Levitical legislation is very ancient, so much so that, although a distinction of sorts is made between the sin offering ($hat!t\bar{a}'t$) and guilt offering (' $\bar{a}s\bar{a}m$), the original distinction (if there was one) had been forgotten by the time of the priestly code's last redaction. Although the LXX changed the meaning of Is 53.10, ' $\bar{a}s\bar{a}m$ was nevertheless understood in terms of explatory sacrifice. In this passage, the suffering and death of the Servant is vicarious, undergone for the sake of others, and so takes on the sense of a ransom for their redemption.

In the Septuagint (LXX) translation of the third century B.C., kippēr is rendered mainly by έξιλάσκεσθαι; but the meaning of έξιλάσκεσθαι in profane Greek, "to render propitious," is lost, and the word is used to express the meanings of kippēr discussed above. Other renderings of kippēr are ἁγιάζειν (to sanctify), καθαρίζειν (to purify), and ἀφαιρεῖν (to take away). In the three passages in which ἐξιλάσκεσθαι has God for its object (Mal 1.9; Za 7.2; 8.22), the Hebrew verb so rendered is ḥillâ (to implore favor), not kippēr.

Last Stages of Development. The acute consciousness of sin in late Old Testament Judaism inspired an intense concern with means of expiation. Cultic expiation continued to have first importance, although certain movements on the margin of "official" Judaism repudiated the efficacy of the Temple cult (see QUMRAN COM-MUNITY). Judaism, in the last centuries before Christ, attributed an expiatory value to fasting, alms, prayer, sufferings, and, above all, death, but the efficacy of expiatory sacrifice and of these other means of expiation was understood to depend on the sinner's inner conversion. Death, as the greatest of sufferings, could expiate sin, and the death of the Jewish martyrs had expiatory value for all Israel. It is remarkable, however, that in Judaism this concept remained unrelated to the figure of the Servant of Yahweh until the second Christian century. The idea of a messiah whose suffering and death would have vicarious expiatory value seems to have remained foreign to Jewish thought. The apocrypha attest the expectation that eschatological Israel would be purified of sin, but this is understood to be the result of the messianic judgment; that is, the messiah is pictured not as destroying sin by winning its forgiveness, but as condemning and destroying the sinners themselves.

In the New Testament. The whole mission of Jesus was concerned with the redemption of man from sin [see REDEMPTION (IN THE BIBLE)]. His exorcisms, cures, and other miracles were aimed at subverting the dominion of Satan and inaugurating the eschatological kingdom of God. Above all, Jesus conceived His mission as the fulfillment of the role of the Servant whose expiatory death would ransom the world (Mk 10.45; Mt 20.28). This is underscored in the words of institution in the Last Supper accounts, where, beside the theme of the Servant's expiatory self-sacrifice for "the many," i.e., for all (cf. Mk 14.24 with Is 53.12), the death of Jesus is alluded to as the sacrifice that seals the covenant. Conscious reference to the sacrifice of Jesus as PASSOVER LAMB is also probable. As the covenant sacrifice is at the same time an expiatory offering, the $q\bar{a}h\bar{a}l$, or eschatological community, born of this covenant is essentially defined by the forgiveness of sins.

The combination of motifs in Is 52.13-53.12 accounts for the diversity of ways in which references to this text find expression in the New Testament. In Mk 10.45 Jesus says He has come to give His life as a ransom $(\lambda \dot{\nu} \tau \rho \sigma \nu)$ for the world (see 1 Tm 2.6); elsewhere the idea of ransom is replaced by that of expiatory sacrifice (e.g., in Rom 3.25). In either case Jesus freely offers His own life for the forgiveness of the sins of men. This central affirmation was early epitomized in catechetical formulas that drew on the Servant oracles for two motifs: the "handing over" of Jesus (Gal 2.20; Rom 4.25; 8.32) and His death "for our sins" (1 Cor 15.3) or "for us" (Rom 8.32; Eph 5.2). The Servant theme was apparently a significant element in early Christian preaching (Acts 3.13, 26; 8.32-35), and the messianic blessing of the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2.38) no doubt supposes consciousness of the expiatory value of Christ's death, although this theme was not exploited in the early kerygmatic discourses. Christ's definitive expiation of sin is a substantial datum of the theology of St. PAUL, St. John (Jn 1.29; 10.11-15; and passim), and the Epistle to the Hebrews (7.27 and passim). It is "in his blood" that we are justified and saved (Rom 5.9); it is "the blood of Jesus" that "purifies us from all sin" (1 Jn 1.7; Heb 9.14).

The New Testament writers, in speaking of the expiation of the sins of the world by Christ, understand this to be the work of God Himself in faithfulness to His promises of salvation. The New Testament nowhere depicts Christ as a victim of the Father's anger or displeasure. Christ is never compared to the sin-laden scapegoat, nor is the sacrifice of His life conceived as a punishment reserved for sinners to which He submits in their place. Expiation is seen rather as man's return, in and through Christ, to the Father. It is the forgiveness and reconciliation that only Christ can accomplish and that He does accomplish, out of love and in His blood, for men.

See Also: ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. By L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 167–175. W. KORNFELD et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 9:1152–56. A. MÉDEBIELLE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 3:1–262. K. KOCH et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 6:1368–73. E. SJÖBERG, Gott und die Sünder im palästinischen Judentum (Stuttgart 1938). J. JEREMIAS, "Das Lösegeld für Viele (Mk. 10, 45)," Judaica 3 (1948) 249–264. L. MORALDI, Espiazione sacrificale e riti espiatori nell'ambiente biblico e nell'Antico Testamento (Rome 1956). S. LYONNET, "De notione expiationis," Verbum Domini 37 (1959) 336–352; 38 (1960) 65–75, 241–261; "Expiation et intercession," Biblica 40 (1959) 885–901. E. LOHSE, Märtyrer und Gottesknecht (2d ed. Göttingen 1963).

[B. F. MEYER]

EXPIATION (IN THEOLOGY)

The concept, explation, may be considered as it is applied to the work of Christ (in SOTERIOLOGY) or as it is applied to certain works and orientations of Christian SPIRITUALITY.

Soteriology. Christ's redemptive work is many sided. Some of its aspects correspond to those of the SIN it has destroyed. Sin is not only an aversion from God, but also an illicit conversion to a created reality; it gives rise to guilt and penalty. Expiation is an aversion counter to the illicit conversion, and works on the penalty aspect of sin; it is an aversion from a created reality through voluntary suffering and removes the cause of the sinner's alienation from God in order to restore him to holiness and divine favor.

Christ, the Suffering Servant, the new Adam, expiated the penalty of men's sins by His suffering and death, and effected the at-one-ment of man with God. He thereby revealed God's infinite love and mercy, satisfied the divine justice (so exacting because so intimately related to the divine love), and manifested the villainy of sin.

Since there are no consequences of sin in Christ, vicarious expiation does not mean that Christ was punished in man's place; a penalty is a punishment only when paid by the guilty one, and an element of punishment is that it is against the will of the person punished. There is no substitution here of persons but of effects. Christ freely accepted out of love and obedience sufferings that are the penalty exacted for men's sins, but not their punishment.

This doctrine, found in the teaching of the Church [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (Freiburg 1963) 1690, 1691, 1740, 1743, 3438; Pius XI, Miserentissimus Redemptor, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 20 (1928) 169–170], is well summed up by Pius XII in Haurietis aquas: "The mystery of the divine Redemption is first and foremost a mystery of love Since men could in no way expiate their sins, Christ . . . by shedding His precious blood was able to restore and perfect the bond of friendship between God and men . . ." [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 48 (1956) 321–322].

The interpretation of Christ's Person as the Suffering Servant and of His work as a universal explation valid for all of mankind, since all of mankind is somehow present in Christ, is found both in the Greek and Latin Fathers. The doctrine found in Origen (Comm. in Rom. 3.8; Patrologia Graeca 14:946-951), Athanasius (Inc. 9; Patrologia Graeca 25:111), and Eusebius of Caesarea (Demonstr. evangel. 10.1; Patrologia Graeca 22:724-725) is well expressed by St. Cyril of Alexandria: "Christ having suffered for us, how could God any longer demand from us the penalty of our sins?" (Ador. 3; Patrologia Graeca 68:297). In St. Augustine one finds the whole Latin tradition clearly affirmed: "By His death, that one most true sacrifice offered on our behalf, He purged, abolished, and extinguished . . . whatever guilt we had'' (Trin. 4.13.17; Patrologia Latina 42:899).

Although vicarious satisfaction is for Anselm in the Cur Deus homo, the essence of Redemption, he does not omit the explatory aspect. Christ's death was a placular sacrifice, but not a punishment inflicted by a vindictive God.

For St. Thomas, he who has sinned deserves to be punished, to suffer something contrary to his will (Summa theologiae 3a, 86.4). But this penalty, to expiate sin, must be freely accepted. What is most important is not the suffering, but the love with which it is accepted (Summa theologiae 3a, 14.1 ad 1). Christ expiated for men because "the head and members are but one mystical person" (Summa theologiae 3a, 48.2 ad 1).

For the reformers and, more so, for Calvin in whom the doctrine is definitively formulated, Christ's Passion was a punishment substituted for that of guilty mankind. ". . . Christ . . . took upon Himself and suffered the punishment that by the righteous judgment of God hung over all sinners, and by this expiation the Father has been satisfied" [Institutes of the Christian Religion 2.16; ed. J. T. McNeill, tr. F. L. Battles, 2 v. (Philadelphia 1960) 1:505]. This doctrine, although not generally accepted in contemporary Protestantism, where more emphasis has been given to the divine mystery of love, can still be found in some 19th-century theologians [see R. W. Dale, The Atonement (London 1875); J. Denney, The Christian Doctrine of Reconciliation (New York 1918)].

Since the Reformation some preachers of the 18th and 19th centuries, such as Bossuet, Bourdaloue, Mont-sabré, Wiseman, and Faber, have obscured the mystery of Redemption by a too great stress on the penal element [see Philippe de la Trinité, What is Redemption? tr. A. Armstrong (New York 1961) 16–37].

Although the great theologians of the 17th and 18th centuries avoided such views, some modern theologians have held that the redemptive value of Christ's death is found primarily in the penal element. C. Pesch [Das Sühneleiden unseres göttlichen Erlöses (Freiburg 1916)] was, because of such a doctrine, strongly attacked by J. Rivière, for whom the primal value of Christ's death is to be found in His love. Suffering and love are to one another as matter and form.

Expiation of itself cannot explain the whole of Redemption, but it is an essential element in the salvific work of Christ. It has been absorbed in the satisfaction theory, where it plays the role of an essential material element.

Bibliography: J. RIVIÈRE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 13.2:1912-2004. L. MORALDI, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932-) 4.2:2026-45. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 4:961-963. P. NEUENZEIT, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962-63) 2:586-596. D. BERTETTO, Il mistero della colpa secondo S. Tommaso (Alba 1953). P. EDER, Sühne (Basil 1962). P. GRECH, The Atonement and God: The Main Theories in Modern English Theology (Rome 1955). P. HARTMANN, Le Sens plénier de la réparation du péché (Louvain 1955). T. H. HUGHES, The Atonement (London 1949). E. L. KENDALL, A Living Sacrifice (London 1960). D. LEWIS, De necessitate passionis ac mortis Christi ad satisfaciendum pro genere humano, secundum s. Thomam (Rome 1958). R. T. A. MURPHY, The Dereliction of Christ on the Cross (Washington 1940). J. M. O'LEARY, The Development of the Doctrine of St. Thomas Aquinas on the Passion and Death of our Lord (Chicago 1952). E. QUARELLO, Peccato e castigo nella teologia cattolica contemporanea (Turin 1958). L. RICHARD, Le Mystère de la Rédemption (Tournai 1959). H. E. W. TURNER, The Patristic Doctrine of Redemption (London 1952). Basilio de San Pablo, "Irenismo en soteriología," in Semana Española de Teologia, eleventh, 1951 (Madrid 1952) 455-503. G. GRAYSTONE, "Modern Theories of the Atonement," The Irish Theological Quarterly 20 (Dublin 1953) 225-252, 366-388. N. LADOMERSZKY, "Essai d'étude sur le dogme de la Rédemption dans la théologie contemporaine," Euntes docete 2 (1949) 321-348. G. OGGIONI, "Il mistero della redenzione," in Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica, 2 v. (Milan 1957) 2:237-343. J. RIVIÈRE, "Un Dossier patristique de l'expiation," Revue des Sciences Religieuses 2 (1922) 303-315. J. SOLANO, "Actualidades cristológicosoteriológicas," Estudios eclesiásticos 24 (1950) 43-69; "El sentido de la muerte redentora de N.S. Jesu Cristo y algunas corrientes modernos," ibid. 20 (1964) 399-414.

[L. RICHARD]

In Spiritual theology. The Church, from its beginning, canonized the sentiment that led repentant man to offer God works of expiation, to satisfy for his own sins and the sins of others. The sacrifice of Jesus Christ on the cross was sufficient to satisfy divine justice for all of man's sins. But the followers of Christ are invited to share in their master's work of Redemption by offering to God in Christ's name their good deeds and their penitential works freely assumed, not for themselves only but others also. For it is held that within the Mystical Body the fruit of expiation can be communicated to others, a thought that has inspired many loving and generous souls to voluntary suffering and penitential discipline not for their own sins alone. Through their INCORPORATION IN CHRIST by Baptism, the Christians' own deeds participated in the merits of the Redeemer. Thus every follower of Christ can, by his own actions, extend the forgiving effects of the Savior's suffering and death.

This teaching of the Christian revelation has attracted many people to a life of expiation. Led by a desire to share the work of the Redeemer, they have imposed on themselves a way of mortification, sometimes extreme. Martyrs went to their death gladly with this in view. Virgins dedicated themselves to a life of prayer and fasting in order to bring to needy sinners the justifying effects of Christ's sacrifice. The penances of the early hermits had the same motivation. From these beginnings came monastic life, which organized the practices of those who sought a life of expiation in union with the Savior. Each of the many religious communities in the Church has an expiatory function, in that they offer their members opportunities to practice virtue to win forgiveness of their own and others' sins.

Spiritual writers agree that some expiatory practices are necessary in the life of every Christian. Devotional practices and penitential works, such as attendance at Mass and observance of special times of fast and abstinence, as well as other penitential works, are part of the program of expiation that the Church offers its members. In modern times the popes constantly remind the faithful of their need for expiation by prayer and good deeds, [see, for example, the apostolic constitution Poenitemini of Pope Paul VI (Feb. 17, 1966) ch. 1–2]. Expiatory prayers are enriched with indulgences, and the devotions to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, to Our Lady of Lourdes, and of Fatima, which are recommended by the popes, have a strong element of expiation.

See Also: ATONEMENT; REPARATION; SATISFACTION OF CHRIST.

Bibliography: P.POURRAT, Christian Spirituality, tr. W. H. MITCHELL et al., 4 v (Westminister, Md. 1953–55) 1:36–48,, 74–129. V. TAYLOR, Forgiveness and Reconciliation (2d ed. New York 1946; repr. 1960). PIUS XI, Miserentissimus Redemptor (encyclical, May 8, 1928) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 20 (Rome 1928) 165–178. PIUS XII, Fulgens corona (encyclical, Sept. 8, 1953) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 45 (Rome 1953) 577–592. The Raccolta (New York 1952) 173–183.

[P. F. MULHERN]

EXSULTET IAM ANGELICA TURBA

The opening words of the praeconium, or hymn of praise, sung by the deacon in celebration of Christ's Resurrection after the Lumen Christi procession has entered the church for the solemn service of the EASTER VIGIL.

Laus (consecratio, benedictio) cerei, that is, "praise (consecration, blessing) of the candle," is a not infrequent title of this hymn in the oldest MSS, since it is sung in connection with the blessing and offering of the paschal candle, the light of which symbolizes the glory of the risen Christ.

Date, Authorship, Place of Origin, Diffusion. Evidences for this practice date from the late fourth and early fifth centuries. A famous letter in which the author (St. Jerome?) refuses the favor requested by Praesidius, deacon of Piacenza, to help him with the composition of a laus cerei, was written in 384. Less than 40 years later, St. Augustine, in his City of God (15.22), quoted the first three hexameters of a laus cerei, which he had composed years before. Two Benedictiones cerei are included among the works of ENNODIUS, Bishop of Pavia (d. 521). From the fact that individual clerics were free to compose their own texts, it may be concluded that at one time variations of this hymn were fairly numerous. Only nine, however, have survived in their entirety: (1) the Exsultet, still in use wherever the Roman rite is followed; (2) the formula of the "Old" Gelasian Sacramentary (Incipit: Deus mundi conditor); (3) the Ambrosian text, still sung in Milan; (4 and 5) the two Benedictiones of Ennodius; (6) an interesting text of the Visigothic period preserved in a unique manuscript of the Escorial; (7) the Vetus Itala text, called also Beneventan; (8 and 9) the Benedictio lucernae and Benedictio cerei, comprised in the Visigothic-Hispanic (Mozarabic) Ordinal. To this list may be added a tenth laus cerei, of African origin, which, if not complete, seems to lack only an explicit statement of the celebritas for which it was composed and the concluding petitions for ecclesiastical and civil authorities, for clergy and people.

Of these texts, the Exsultet is considered one of the oldest and by at least one scholar, Dom Pinell of Montserrat, as antedating all the others. On stylistic grounds, notably by reason of the rhythmic clausulae, it is assigned to the fifth century (Di Capua) and by some to the late fourth. This latter date is certainly correct if St. Ambrose (d. 397) was the author. The points of contact in diction and style with his works are numerous enough in the Exsultet, the best known and most important being an all but literal quotation from the saint's exposition of Luke (2.41): Nihil enim nobis nasci profuit [Ambrose: Non prodesset nasci] nisi redimi profuisset. It is not surprising that certain authors are convinced, or at least strongly inclined to believe, that the famous bishop of Milan was the author (Capelle, Pinell). Others, again, find in this praeconium stylistic defects that they consider unworthy of Ambrose (Fischer, Huglo). Unless new discoveries of an unexpected sort are made, the debate will probably never be settled. The author, whoever he was, had an intimate knowledge of Ambrose's works, was reared in the same rhetorical tradition and worked in northern Italy or Gaul, this latter possibility being suggested by the occurrence in the Missale Gothicum, a Gallican book written c. 700 (but containing older material), of certain passages found in the Exsultet to say nothing of stylistic resemblances. In any event, the Exsultet was known in Gaul, and it is an interesting fact that what may be called the triumphal course of this remarkable hymn began in Gaul. There it was included by the scribes in copies that they made of liturgical books brought up from Rome-at first, in addition to the Roman text (the second of the ten documents mentioned above), but this latter was finally omitted altogether. ALCUIN, indeed, placed the Exsultet at the beginning of his supplement to the Gregorian Sacramentary sent up to Charlemagne by Pope Adrian I, and finally it came into use at Rome itself to the exclusion of the other text.

"Crucifixion," miniature painting from a manuscript "Exsultet Roll" from the Abbey at Monte Cassino, Italy.

The modern text of the Exsultet, i.e., the praeconium following the Lumen Christi procession, is to be found in any official edition of the Roman Missal published after 1951.

Contents. The Exsultet is in two sections, the first being a prologue, which constitutes about one-fifth of the entire composition and has the form of an elaborate invitatory of which the second half is an "apology" on the part of the deacon, who requests the aid of his listeners' prayers. This leads into the second section, properly called the laus cerei, which is preceded by a dialogue such as is used before the Eucharistic prayer of the Mass. What follows is an elaborate proclamation of this paschal festivity that commemorates the slaving of the true Lamb, a proclamation of this night that destroyed the darkness of sin and restores the faithful to grace and holiness. Adam's sin was "profitable," indeed, and a "happy fault" that had so great a Redeemer. (This passage was expunged in certain churches and monasteries for some time during the Middle Ages.) God is asked to accept this burning sacrifice, which Holy Church through its ministers offers by the oblation of a candle, a product of the industry of the bee. (Originally, there followed at this point an elaborate praise of the bee, which was later deleted.) The praise of this night is resumed, the night that despoiled the Egyptians and enriched the Israelites; the night in which things of heaven are joined to things of earth. God is asked that this candle may continue unfailingly to destroy the darkness of this night, that it may mingle with the lights of heaven. In conclusion, there is a brief prayer for the tranquillity of God's servants-the clergy and the devoted people of God-in this paschal celebration.

Pentecost Exsultet. Through many centuries there was sung in the cathedral of Besançon, France, during the vigil of Pentecost, an adaptation of the Easter Exsultet to the mystery of Whitsunday—a liturgical curiosity of no little interest. An attempt to introduce this custom at Reims seems to have had short-lived success.

Bibliography: J. BRAUN, "Osterpräconium u. Osterkerzenweihe," Stimmen aus Maria-Laach 56 (1899) 273-286. G. MERCA-TI, Paralipomena Ambrosiana (StTest 12; 1904) 24-43. A. FRANZ, Die kirchlichen Benediktionen im Mittelalter, 2 v. (Freiburg i. Br. 1909; repr. Graz 1960) 1:519-553. H. M. BANNISTER, "The Vetus Itala Text of the Exsultet," Journal of Theological Studies 11 (1909–10) 43–54. G. MORIN, "Pour l'authenticité de la lettre de S. Jérôme à Présidius," Bulletin d'ancienne littérature et d'archéologie chrétiennes 3 (1913) 52-60. F. DI CAPUA, "Il Ritmo nella prosa liturgica e il Praeconium Paschale," Didaskaleion NS 5.2 (1927) 1-23; repr. in Scritti minori, 2 v. (Rome 1959) 1:441-459, E. H. KANTOROWICZ, "A Norman Finale of the Exultet and the Rite of Sarum," Harvard Theological Review 34 (1941) 129-143. B. CAPELLE, "L' Exultet Pascal oeuvre de Saint Ambroise," Miscellania Giovanni Mercati 1:219-246. B. FISCHER, "Ambrosius der Verfasser des österlichen Exultet?" Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 2 (1952) 61-74. C. MOHRMANN, "Exultent divina mysteria," Ephemerides liturgicae 66 (1952) 274-281. G. BENOIT-CASTELLI, "Le Praeconium paschale," ibid. 67 (1953) 309-334. M. HUGLO, "L'Auteur de l' Exultet pascal," Vigilae christianae 7 (1953) 79-88. A. STRITTMATTER, "The Pentecost Exultet of Reims and Besançon'' in Studies in Art and Literature for Belle da Costa Greene, ed. D. MINER (Princeton, N.J. 1954) 384-400. A. GUNY, Catholicisme 4:1014-16. H. A. SCHMIDT, Hebdomada Sancta, 2 v. (Rome 1956-57) 1:291-292; 2:627-650, 809-826, 976-977. J. M. PINELL, "La benedicció del ciri pasqual i els seus textos," Liturgica 2 (1958) 1-119. L. KUNZ and H. LAUS-BERG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER (Freiburg 1957-65) 3: 1318-19. P. VERBRAKEN," Une Laus cerei africaine," Revue Bénédictine 70 (1960) 301-312. L. EIZEN-HÖFER, "Die Feier der Ostervigil in der Benediktiner Abtei San Silvestro zu Foligno um das Jahr 1100," Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 6 (1960) 349-353. For the study of the Exsultet Rolls (28 and three related rolls are extant): E. BERTAUX, L'Art dans l'Italie méridionale (Paris 1904) 213-240. M. AVERY, The Exultet Rolls of South Italy (Princeton 1936) v.2, 53 pp. of text, 206 plates, v. 1 unpub. G. B. LADNER, "The 'Portraits' of Emperors in Southern Italian Exultet Rolls and the Liturgical Commemoration of the Emperor," Speculum 17 (1942) 181-200. "Mostra storica nazionale della miniature, palazzo di Venezia (Rome)," Catalogo (Florence 1953) 47-52. J. WETTSTEIN, Sant' Angelo in Formis et la peinture médiévale en Campanie (Geneva 1960) 128-151.

[A. STRITTMATTER]

EXSULTET ORBIS GAUDIIS

An office hymn that was traditionally prescribed for Vespers and Lauds on the feasts of Apostles and Evangelists outside Easter time. It is composed of six Ambrosian strophes in iambic dimeter. The author is unknown but the hymn is found as early as the tenth century in a hymnal of Moissac Abbey. It underwent extensive revision in the Roman Breviary of 1632. In contrast to the 1632 revision, the original version, beginning Exsultet caelum laudibus, was considered more beautiful. The hymn echoes a number of the scriptural references to the Apostles.

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:125–126, for text. J. JU-LIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 1:360–361. M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948) 354–356. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, MD 1957) 140–141, for tr. J. SZÖVÉRFFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:342.

[J. P. MCCORMICK]

EXTENSION

As a primitive term, extension can be defined only ostensively, by pointing to a corporeal substance, the parts of which are distinguished by their positions. But extension is synonymous with neither corporeity nor materiality. To be extended is to be dimensively quantified and this results, formally, in the distinction and ordering of material integral parts. The term is more abstract than corporeity and may refer to both natural (or physical) and mathematical QUANTITY, this latter defining sets of properties and relations that have no immediate physical counterpart. A material principle of SUBSTANCE requires dimensive quantity but is ontologically prior to it. Though normally referred to continuous quantity, extension may be said of contiguous parts and even of interrupted segments joined by an intermediary. By analogy, the term may refer to nonquantitative measures as in LOGIC, where, opposed to intension, it signifies the magnitude of a nonnumerable multitude or class. In mathematics, extension shares in the analogy of the term SPACE.

Distinctions. Within scholastic philosophy, one finds a distinction between the order of parts of an extended entity relative to a locating boundary on the one hand, and the order of parts relative to the whole of that entity on the other. The former specifies external or local extension; the latter, a mutual externality of parts, specifies internal or situal extension. [See PLACE; SITUATION (SITUS).] This distinction emphasizes the factual ordering of dimensive quantity and reflects a controversy. Against the general conviction, some held that extension is primarily a property of occupying space (see F. SUÁREZ, Disp. meta., 40.4). The general argument has been that an intrinsic distinguishing order of parts must be prior to any principle of external relation. The theological analysis of the doctrine of the EUCHARIST led to this distinction, since there must be some account given of the natural extension of Christ's Body, which is manifestly not circumscribed in the Sacrament.

Dimensive quantity does not necessarily entail external extension. Physical extension is known sensibly by the perception, usually both visual and tactile, of the external dimensive relations that material substances bear toward their environment, and intellectually it is grasped by the measurability and divisibility that it founds. More detailed physical data raise questions about the type of continuity found in nature and the character of the smallest unit with its relations to complex aggregates.

That extension is an objective attribute of material things is an essential element in a realist philosophy, but apart from a rejection of the dynamistic reduction of extension to forces, positions, and motions of unextended points, there is no agreement upon the ultimate physical matrix of extension (e.g., ether, protomatter, or subnuclear particles), nor upon the character of its dividing boundaries. Such knowledge, depending upon a precise understanding of sensible matter, is never more than dialectical, reflecting the state of research at any given time. Recent physical theory tends to support the notion that the universe is an extended plenum determined generally and in its fundamental units by some formal principles of unity and organization.

Other Views. Unable to conceive of material substances as composed ontologically of principles such as primary matter and substantial form, R. DESCARTES (1596–1650) considered body as such, res extensa, a species of substance. He inadequately distinguished substance from its quantitative extension, which he took to be a universal matrix for enfigurement and a requirement for motion. As a result, his philosophy of nature remains ambiguous. Impenetrability or solidity must be attributed by him to some vortex motion in an extended fluidlike plenum; yet this plenum is entirely undifferentiable and, in fact, a mathematical construct.

G. W. LEIBNIZ (1646–1716) was not more concrete, for he understood extension to be an internal representation to each MONAD of the order of coexistence of all monads—the unitary, immaterial, simple substances that constituted his universe. The perception of extension was not, therefore, a sensation, but a God-given harmonious adaptation within each monad.

Influenced, most probably, by this position, I. KANT (1724–1804) thought extension to be an analytical element of the concept body, hence an a priori form or contribution of the mind itself, which orders the content of sense experience, giving the objects and their extensive relations as man knows them. In effect, Kant identified physical and mathematical extension, since both are traced to the internal form of sensuous intuition. The distinction between a sensed objective property and a conception abstracted from the externality of corporeal substance is therefore lost.

Mathematical Extension. The abstraction of the notion of extension can yield either a mathematical or a physical conception; subsequent applications of the notions, especially to realms beyond direct sensation, thereupon become analogical. The mathematical notion, analogical even within that science, is first seen in Euclidean geometry as an abstraction from physical continua, which in three dimensions yield a homogeneous isotropic space. Chronologically, multidimensional spaces were the next analogues, but the concept of extension did not radically change until the arithmetization of geometry.

The essence of this development was the establishment of a correspondence between sets of numbers and geometric elements, so that continuous extension could be represented by continuous algebraic or numeric functions. Successive generalizations of such functions led to interpretations of extension that are far removed from the notion obtained in abstraction. Thus understood, in terms of the analytic properties of algebraic expressions, extension takes on as many meanings as the formal consistency of the multiple systems permits, including systems not having "smoothness" or perfect continuity. Finally, the whole of geometry and hence the interpretation of mathematical extension was given a further dialectical interpretation in terms of point sets. Extension then became a set of abstract relations, the link with quantity being the foundation of the opposition between the elements or terms of the relations, otherwise known as situs.

See Also: CONTINUUM; MATHEMATICS, PHILOSOPHY OF.

Bibliography: JOHN OF ST. THOMAS, Ars Logica, v.1 of Cursus philosophicus Thomisticus . . . , ed. B. REISER, 3 v. (Turin 1930–37); Eng. tr. Material Logic: Basic Treatises, tr. Y. R. SIMON et al. (Chicago 1955). L. A. FOLEY, Cosmology: Philosophical and Scientific (Milwaukee 1962). P. BORNE, "De ente materiale et spirituale sub respectu extensionis et inextensionis," Divus Thomas 42 (1939) 240–253, 349–369, 461–494.

[C. F. WEIHER]

EXTRAVAGANTES

Extravagantes is a term introduced after the publication of the Decretum of GRATIAN to describe all papal texts not found in, but "circulating outside" (extravagantes), that collection. After Gregory IX had promulgated his authentic series of extravagantes in 1234 (see GREGORY IX, DECRETALS OF), suppressing all others, the term was used with reference to texts that appeared after his compilation. Similarly, when an authentic collection of post-Gregorian Extravagantes was published by Boniface VIII in 1298 in the LIBER SEXTUS, to the abrogation of all others, the word Extravagantes denoted decretals that came after the Sext. In fact, since the CLEMENTINAE that were issued in 1317 were not an exclusive collection like the Decretals and Sext and since no other authentic collection of decretals appeared from 1317 until the Roman edition of the CORPUS IURIS CANONICI in 1582, all other papal decretals after 1298 are, properly speaking, extravagantes not to the Clementines but to the Sext. However, the extravagantes printed in the Corpus of 1582 do not cover all papal decrees from the Sext onward, for the Corpus simply took over two unofficial collections of post-Sext extravagantes that Jean Chappuis, a Parisian lawyer, had published in his edition of the Corpus (1500, 1503). These, in fact, did not go beyond 1484 (Sixtus IV).

The first, the extravagantes of John XXII, is a collection of 20 decretals of John XXII from 1317 to 1320, which Gesselin de Cassanges put together and glossed in 1325. These extravagantes, which were already well known (see, e.g., John Koelner de Vankel, Summarium Extravagantium Ioannis XXII, Cologne 1483, 1488, 1493, 1494, 1495), were arranged by Chappuis under 14 titles and 20 chapters taken from the Decretals of Gregory IX.

The second, Extravagantes communes, is a collection of 70 decretals from Urban IV (1261–64) to Sixtus IV (1471–84), which Chappuis put together in 1500 from decretals "commonly circulating" and to which he added four more in 1503 (one from Benedict XII; three from John XXII, which were also in Gesselin's extravagantes but had had an independent existence since 1319, when William of Mont Lauzun composed a commentary on them). Chappuis distributed these extravagantes in five books after the manner of the Decretals, but there are no entries in Bk. four on marriage. The bulk of the decretals come from the period 1261 to 1342 (one of Urban IV; one of Martin IV; 11 of Boniface VIII, including UNAM SANCTAM; six of Benedict XI; six of Clement V; 33 of John XXII; two of Benedict XII); there are only five from the period 1342 to 1458 (Clement VI, Martin V, Eugene IV, Callistus III), with four from Paul II (1464-71) and six from Sixtus IV (1471-84).

These two sets of extravagantes are uneven in quality, on occasion repeating material of the Sext or Clementines. They were never received in the schools, and the Roman edition of 1582 did not authenticate them as collections. The usual citation is by book, title, and chapter for the Communes (CorpIurCanExtravagCom 1.8.1) and by title and chapter for those of John XXII (CorpIur-CanExtravag Jo XXII 4.1).

Bibliography: E. FOURNIER, Questions d'histoire du droit canonique (Paris 1936), pt. 2: "Les Recueils de décretales 'extravagantes' de 1234 à 1294." A. M. STICKLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:67. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts, 3 v. in 4 pts. (Stuttgart 1875–80; repr. Graz 1956) 2:59–67. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini: v. 1, Historia fontium (Turin 1950) 1:268–272. A. TARDIF, Histoire des sources du droit canonique (Paris 1887). A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v. 1–5 (Mechlin 1928–); v. 1, Prolegomena (2d ed. 1945) 1:373–375. P. TORQUEBIAU, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 4:640–643.

[L. E. BOYLE]

EXTRINSICISM

The tendency, especially among philosophers and theologians, to stress the exterior or superficial elements in some complex reality, or to give principal attention to the juridical or moral aspects of a problem rather than to the interior, constitutive, or ontological elements. It is not a definite school of thought on a particular problem, or even a clearly espoused position. Many theological questions have been treated in this way, and the tendency can best be described by seeing its application to three topics: grace, morality, and the Church.

Of all the theological tracts, the one on GRACE has, perhaps, been the most effected by extrinsicism. Pela-gianism, an early heresy, involved essentially an extrinsicism. For the Pelagian, grace is not something needed to transform, elevate, and move man to salvation, but rather something that makes salvation easier. There is no necessary connection between grace and salvation for the Pelagian (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM).

In opposition to the Catholic teaching according to which justification involves an interior renewal of man that removes grave sin, the early reformers—such as Luther and Calvin—thought of justification as something entirely extrinsic, not a freeing from sin, but a hiding of sin; not an interior transformation, but an acceptance of the sinner by God (see IMPUTATION OF JUSTICE AND MERIT).

St. Thomas Aquinas and his followers considered that by the very presence within man of habitual or sanctifying grace, grave sin is excluded, and man is made an adopted child of God, truly capable of works proportioned to eternal life. The nominalists in general rejected much of this teaching, tending toward a radical extrinsicism. For them grace is only a moral resemblance to God; there is no absolute connection of grace and adoption or grace and sinlessness, and men's works are not—even under grace—truly proportioned to SUPERNATURAL LIFE. They compared grace to money, worthless in itself, but given value by a legal decree of public authority. Scotus held a middle ground, i.e., that grace is connected with men's adoption but does not formally cause it (see NOMI-NALISM).

In the area of moral, or ethical, conduct this extrinsicism can also be found. It is the tendency to give undue importance to the external expression of the law or to the merely exterior observance of the law. It is usually called by some other name, e.g., legalism or Pharisaism. The basic moral code of man is, first of all, interior. This is true both of the NATURAL LAW, which is a participation in the intellectual creature of God's plan for ordering things to their goal (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 91.2), and of the new law, the law revealed by God to lead men to Himself in Christ. This new law is essentially the grace of the Holy Spirit and only secondarily particular precepts or written laws (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 106.1). It would be a mistake, of course, to ignore laws or regulations that govern even exterior conduct, but the underlying directive principle is essentially interior.

Frequently the nature of the Church is expressed inadequately because principal and almost exclusive attention is given to exterior elements: the VISIBILITY OF THE CHURCH, its social structures, laws, external conduct, etc. Part of this may be due to a reaction to early Protestants, who denied these important visible elements and social structures. It is true that these exterior elements do pertain to the Church, but it is, first of all, a community of life with God in Christ. The exterior elements are, as it were, the sacrament of this interior life. See CHURCH, II (THEOLO-GY OF).

Extrinsicism, then, is a tendency affecting much of philosophical and technological thought. In an extreme case it can involve heresy (e.g., Pelagianism, merely imputed justification). More frequently it involves a less profound analysis of reality, but even here it may cause serious difficulties, both speculative and practical.

[J. HENNESSEY]

EXUPERIUS OF TOULOUSE, ST.

Bishop; date and place of birth uncertain; local tradition places his tomb at Blagnac near Toulouse. As bishop of Toulouse c. 405 to 411, Exuperius (or Exsuperius; Spire in French) completed the basilica begun by his predecessor, St. Silvius. It was dedicated to the first bishop of Toulouse, St. Saturninus, whose relics were brought there. St. JEROME dedicated the Commentarii in Zachariam to Exuperius, praised his steadfastness during the Vandal invasion (Epist. 123), and, in a letter to Rusticus of Marseilles (Epist. 125), praised his generosity. Exuperius sought the advice of INNOCENT I on several points of Scripture and discipline. His reply is an important document (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. Löwenfeld and F. Kaltenbrunner n.405). GREGORY OF TOURS (Historia Francorum 2:13) took note of his career.

Feast: Sept. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 7:583–589. S. LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (Paris 1693–1712) 10:617–620, 825–826; 12:268, 285, 322. G. BAREILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:2022–27. A. BUT-LER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:664–665. É.GRIFFE, La Gaule chrétienne à l'époque romaine, v.2 (Paris 1957); Catholicisme 4:1017.

[G. E. CONWAY]

EYMARD, PIERRE JULIEN, ST.

Religious founder; b. La Mure d'Isére, near Grenoble, France, Feb. 4, 1811; d. there, Aug. 1, 1868. From his early years Eymard had a strong devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. Weak health and paternal opposition were obstacles to his priestly vocation. Illness forced him to leave the novitiate of the Oblates of Mary Immaculate after three months. Subsequent to his father's death (1831) he entered the major seminary in Grenoble and was ordained in 1834. He served in parish work in the Diocese of Grenoble until 1839 when he joined the MARIST FATHERS. During his 17 years in this congregation he acted as provincial superior and as rector of the College of La Seine-sur-Mer and organized the Third Order of Mary. He sought also to form within the Marists a group dedicated to adoration of line Blessed Sacrament but his superiors did not consider this activity within the proper scope of their apostolate. After gaining permission to leave the Marists, Eymard founded (1856) in Paris the BLESSED SACRAMENT FATHERS and acted as their superior-general for the rest of his life. In 1863 he obtained from the Holy See official approval of the congregation. By 1868 the institute had seven houses in France and two in Belgium, 16 priests, and 34 other members. In 1858 Eymard founded, together with Marguerite Guillot, the Servants of the BLESSED SACRAMENT, a cloistered contemplative congregation for women. Eymard intended perpetual exposition and adoration of the blessed sacrament to be the main purpose of both congregations, but he urged members to engage in any other form of apostolate that would attract souls to the Blessed Sacrament. He founded also the Blessed Sacrament Confraternity, which is still widely popular. His writings consist of the constitutions he composed for his congregations and a posthumously published collection of his sermons and conferences. He was beatified July 22, 1925, and canonized Dec. 9, 1962.

Feast: Aug. 1.

Bibliography: Eymard Library, tr. from the French, 9 v. in 10 (New York 1938–48). M. DEMPSEY, Champion of the Blessed Sacrament: Saint Peter Julian Eymard (New York 1963). N. B. PEL-LETIER, Tomorrow Will Be Too Late: A Life of Saint Peter Julian Eymard (Cleveland, Ohio 1992).

[J. ROY]

EYRE, THOMAS

First President of Ushaw College; b. Glossop, Derbyshire, 1748; d. Ushaw, May 8, 1810. His education for the priesthood began in 1758, when he and his brothers entered Esquerchin, the preparatory school for the English college at Douai. Following his ordination, Eyre stayed on at Douai as prefect and master of rhetoric and poetry until 1775, when he was assigned to the Stella Mission near Newcastle. Between 1775 and 1794 Eyre combined missionary work with scholarship, editing the works of John Gother and gathering materials for the purpose, unfulfilled, of continuing Dodd's Church History. In 1794 Bp. William Gibson, Vicar Apostolic of the Northern District, charged him with the care of the northern students who had been forced to leave Douai during the French Revolution, and were then temporarily installed at Tudhoe under John Lingard (later a great historian). After a few months at Pontop Hall, a new college was founded at Crook Hall, Durham, under Eyre's presidency. In 1803 Gibson obtained the freehold estate of Ushaw, four miles from Durham, and Eyre moved the college there in July 1808. He continued to serve as first president until his death two years later.

Bibliography: A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 2:199–202. The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:966–967. R. C. LAING, ed., Ushaw College Memorial (Newcastle 1895).

[H. F. GRETSCH]

EYSTON, CHARLES

English antiquarian who wrote about pre-Reformation monastic foundations; b. East Hendred, Berkshire, 1667; d. there, Nov. 5, 1721. Eyston, scion of an ancient Catholic family, succeeded to his father's estate in 1691. He married Winifred Dorothy Fitzherbert in 1692, and of their numerous children, several daughters entered the convent, while one of the sons became a Jesuit. Eyston was devoted to antiquarian researches, and formed a friendship with the famous scholar, Thomas Hearne, who included Eyston's "A Little Monument to the Once Famous Abbey and Borough of Glastonbury" in his History and Antiquities of Glastonbury (Oxford 1722). This was later reprinted by R. Warner in History of the Abbey of Glaston and the Town of Glastonbury (Bath 1826). Hearne's appreciation of Eyston in Reliquiae Hearnianae stated: "He was a Roman Catholick and so charitable to the poor that he is lamented by all who knew anything of him . . . an excellent scholar and so modest that he did not care to have it at any time mentioned." Eyston wrote also an unpublished study of "Old Pious Dissolved Foundations of England . . . ," which was in the family library at Hendred for many years.

Bibliography: A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 2:204–205. T. HEARNE, Reliquiae Hearnianae (London 1869). The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:969–970.

[H. F. GRETSCH]

EYZAGUIRRE, JOSÉ ALEJO

Chilean clerical and political leader; b. Santiago, July 13, 1783; d. there, Aug. 4, 1850. He graduated from the University of San Felipe with a degree in Canon Law and pursued ecclesiastical studies in Lima until his ordination in 1807. When he returned to Chile, he served for three years at the cathedral of Santiago as vicar-general of the bishopric and as canon. Vicar Apostolic MUZI, sent by the Holy See in 1824 to solve various Church problems in Chile, wished to consecrate Eyzaguirre auxiliary bishop of Santiago, but the government, knowing him to be a supporter of the diocesan bishop whom it had just exiled, withheld consent. In 1823 Eyzaguirre was delegate to the constitutional congress, and during the two following years he was president of the congress. He became dean of the ecclesiastical council in 1840. When the Archbishopric of Santiago became vacant in 1843, he was chosen capitular vicar and, in spite of resistance, proposed to the Holy See as archbishop. His refusal to accept government intervention in matters of ecclesiastical authority led him in 1845 to relinquish the government of the archdiocese, which he had administered as archbishop-elect. At the time of his death, he was dean of the cathedral, and also councilor of state, a position he had held since 1844. This priest of great piety and apostolic spirit, who lived a humble and ascetic life, was a bulwark against the abusive meddling of the civil power in ecclesiastical affairs.

Bibliography: L. F. PRIETO DEL RÍO, Diccionario biográfico del clero secular de Chile (Santiago de Chile 1922).

[J. EYZAGUIRRE]

EYZAGUIRRE, JOSÉ IGNACIO VÍCTOR DE

Chilean clerical and political leader, founder of the South American College in Rome; b. Santiago, Feb. 25, 1817; d. on board ship in the Mediterranean, Nov. 16, 1875. His family was distinguished in political and religious affairs. He was ordained after becoming a lawyer. At 27 he was chosen a member of the Faculty of Theology of the University of Chile and secretary of its Academy of Sacred Sciences. In 1850 he published Historia eclesiástica, política y literaria de Chile, which was awarded a prize by the university and was later translated into French. Between 1847 and 1852 he served as dean of the Faculty of Theology of the University of the University of Chile and vice president of the chamber of deputies.

The violent turn of political events in Chile, which compromised his priestly character, caused him to leave the country and to travel in Europe for four years. These travel experiences, which included a tour of the Holy Land, were described in El Catolicismo en presencia de sus disidentes (Paris 1855), translated into various languages and praised by Pius IX, Montalembert, Lacordaire, and García Moreno. The pope wished to make him a titular bishop and to have him join the papal diplomatic service, but Eyzaguirre declined. However, he did offer to assist in the establishment of a seminary in Rome for the education of priests for Latin America. For two years he unselfishly toured all the countries of the vast hemisphere to interest the bishops in the undertaking. In 1858 he was able to inaugurate in Rome the South American College, which has achieved considerable prestige. Pius IX honored Eyzaguirre for his work as founder with the title prothonotary apostolic ad instar participantium. In 1859 he published Los intereses católicos en América, which contains his travel impressions and reflects the condition of the Church in the New World. The following year, the Holy See utilized his experience and entrusted him with a difficult religious mission in Ecuador, Peru, and Bolivia. At the time of his death he was returning to Rome after having made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land.

Bibliography: C. SILVA COTAPOS, Monseñor José Ignacio Víctor Eyzaguirre (Santiago 1919).

[J. EYZAGUIRRE]

EZEKIEL

Third of the Major Prophets of the Old Testament. As an Israelite Prophet, Ezekiel is unique in many ways. He was, as far as is known, the only Prophet to receive his call to prophecy, not in Palestine, but in a foreign land of exile. Unlike any of the canonical Prophets who preceded him, he displays an intense interest in cultic and ritual matters. Other Prophets (Jeremiah, for example) had also been priests, but Ezekiel was the first to prophesy in strictly priestly terms; besides the strong priestly cast of the ch. 40 to 48 complex, his prophetic sermons (e.g., 18.5–23) often read like a priestly tôrâ. There is certainly a literary connection between Ezekiel and the Law of HOLINESS (Leviticus ch. 17-26), elaborated in priestly circles during the Babylonian captivity (the direction of the dependence is debated). Nevertheless, Ezekiel was a Prophet before he was a priest. In his employment of the characteristic symbolic action (e.g., Ez 6.11; 21.19; 33.22) he excels all the other Prophets. Strongly tied to the classical prophetic tradition, he also often resembles the older $n^e b\hat{i}'\hat{i}m$, especially in his (probable) influence by ecstatic experience [see PROPHETISM (IN THE BIBLE)].

Ministry and Message. It is customary to divide Ezekiel's prophetic ministry into two parts, the point of separation being the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 B.C. According to Ez 1.2, his call to prophecy took place in Babylonia during the fifth year of King Jehoiachin's captivity, i.e., in 593 B.C. Because the account in the Book of Ezekiel is composite [see EZEKIEL, BOOK OF] and because various of Ezekiel's earlier oracles seem to suppose his presence in Jerusalem, some modern scholars believe that the prophet's initial call took place in Palestine and that only after 587 (and not in 597, the year of Joachin's deportation) did Ezekiel join the Judean exiles in Babylonia. However, this hypothesis is unnecessary if one concedes that Ezekiel could be present in Jerusalem "in spirit" (Ez 8.3) and could thus apostrophize its inhabitants from afar. Neither is it necessary to suppose, therefore, that he physically journeyed back and forth between Jerusalem and Babylonia.

"The Nativity with the Prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel," three part panel from front predella of Maesta altarpiece by Duccio di Buoninsegna. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Although he was called to be a prophet preeminently to the Israel in exile (Ez 3.4–11), Ezekiel's early prophetic activity much resembles that of Jeremiah. Like Jeremiah he prophesied the inevitability of Jerusalem's destruction for its continued sins, and like Jeremiah he condemned King Zedekiah's suicidal policy of resistance to Babylon. He warned the exiles against their illusory hope of a speedy end of the exile of 597. He, likewise, witnessed against their betrayal of the hopes of Jeremiah, who had seen in them the beginning of the new Israel (Jer ch. 24; 29). Having received generous treatment from their Babylonian conquerors, the displaced Judeans had settled down to adopt their ways as their fathers had the ways of the Canaanites. To the old vices condemned by the preexilic prophets, the exiled "house of rebellion" (Ez 2.5–6; 3.9, etc.) added sins of idolatry and religious syncretism.

After the definitive destruction of Jerusalem, Ezekiel's prophecy became one of consolation. Though he entertained no illusions concerning the shortcomings of his fellow exiles, he knew that in them lay the hope of the future and that they must, therefore, be prepared for their destiny. His prophecy of this period includes a utopian constitution of the new Israel, outlining its religion and cult and its economic, political, and moral life. Doubtless one of the most influential aspects of his prophecy was his elaboration of the doctrine of personal retribution (ch. 18; 33). His last dated prophecy (29.17) was of April 26, 571 B.C.

Ezekiel in Christian and Jewish History. Ezekiel's influence on Christianity was pervasive, but indirect rather than direct. He is the prophet least cited or alluded to in the Gospels, probably because in the traditional sense of the word he possessed no messianic teaching (see MES-SIANISM); as J. Steinmann has said, Ezekiel's "messiah" was the new Temple. On the other hand, Ezekiel's work was extensively used by the author of Revelation for its apocalyptic imagery, and through this medium it greatly influenced early Christian art.

Ezekiel is known as the father of JUDAISM. The doctrines of resurrection, personal immortality, and religion of law all have their roots in his prophecy. His often mysterious visions considerably affected the development of apocalyptic and the later mysticism of the CABALA (e.g., the merkābâ, the vision of the divine throne in ch. 1; 10). The prophet figures prominently in the art of the famous synagogue of DURA-EUROPOS. On the other hand, however, rabbis of the school of Shammai regarded Ezekiel as an apocryphal book, chiefly because of its conflicts with the Mosaic Law as finally codified in the Pentateuch.

Bibliography: W. ZIMMERLI, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:844–847. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 737–739. For additional bibliography, see EZEKIEL, BOOK OF. Iconography. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955–59) 2.1:373–378. M. D. BECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:850–851. A. LEGNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1328.

[B. VAWTER]

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF

Old Testament book containing the message of exilic Prophet EZEKIEL. This article treats of the book's authenticity, structure and contents, literary character, and theology.

Authenticity. From time immemorial the Book of Ezekiel was listed, practically without opposition, in the Jewish canon as one of the Major Prophets; as a matter of course it passed into the canon of the Church. Criticism, too, initially dealt very kindly with the book. Its rigid and straightforward chronology, its logical development from first to last, its distinctive and consistent style, were all taken at face value as proclaiming it throughout the literary work of the exilic Prophet whose life was so thoroughly implicated in the communication of its message.

At the beginning of the 20th century, however, critical opinion began to change. Literary criticism established the redactional character of the book, and on this followed the attempt to determine the quantity of authentic Ezekielian material. Gustav Hölscher (1924) set this material at somewhat less than half the book and assigned its substance to a redactor of the fifth century B.C. The most radical solution was probably that of Charles C. Torrey (1930), for whom the Prophet Ezekiel never existed as a historical personage, and for whom the book was a pseudepigraphon of the Hellenistic age. William A. Irwin (1943) also considered the substance of the book to be Hellenistic; however, he salvaged a Prophet Ezekiel from it by fragmenting the text verse by verse and sometimes word by word, leaving the prophet about one quarter of the work. At least one Catholic author, A. van den Born (1953, 1954), followed the tendency to make the book pseudepigraphical.

Opposing such critics were always others who adhered in varying degrees to the traditional acceptance of the book and its author, and it is this conservative view that has prevailed. Though they may differ on many details, especially concerning the chronology of the Prophministry, most contemporary critics and et's commentators would probably agree that the substance of Ezekiel goes back to an authentic Prophet of the Exile and portrays with essential accuracy the significance of his prophecy. The redactional character of Ezekiel no longer stands in isolation; this was the rule rather than the exception in the composition of the works of the "literary" Prophets, which have reached us through the collections and redactions made by their disciples. By the same token, supplementation and expansion of the prophetic material was the rule rather than the exception in the schools that transmitted it. Thanks to archeology, the exilic experience with which Ezekiel deals is now much better known and understood, and there is less temptation to dismiss or reconstruct the Biblical records. Finally, even though Ezekiel stands out among the preexilic Prophets in his concern for ritual matters, modern-day study of prophetism no longer finds the joining of prophetic and priestly religions the anomaly it was once thought; moreover, this association is typical of the postexilic Prophets, among whom Ezekiel ought perhaps better to be classified.

Structure and Contents. To set the nature of the Book of Ezekiel in clearer light, a detailed analysis of its structure and contents is given here. By its very structure the book falls into three main sections: (1) oracles for Israel before the destruction of Jerusalem: ch. 1–24; (2) oracles against the foreign nations: ch. 25–32; (3) oracles for Israel after the destruction of Jerusalem: ch. 33–48.

Oracles for Israel before the Destruction of Jerusalem: ch. 1–24. Apart from certain redactional insertions from a later period, all the oracles in ch. 1–24 antedate the capture and destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 B.C. In this part of the book the following 20 sections (of unequal length) may be distinguished:

(1) 1.1–3.15 (dated July 31, 593): Ezekiel's vision of the glory of God and his call to prophecy; the account is redactional, and doublets of the same or of similar visions have been combined to form it.

Ezekiel's vision of God, illustration from Ezekiel Chapters 1 and 2. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

(2) 3.16a: an introduction that probably went originally with the symbolic actions described in ch. 4-5.

(3) 3.16b–21: an account from a later part of Ezekiel's ministry that has been set at the beginning of the book by the redactor in view of the Prophet's over-all significance for Israel; historically, it belongs with 33.1–20.

(4) 3.22–27: another redactional anticipation; this is the first part of the symbolic dumbness of Ezekiel (when his prophecy consisted in deeds rather than words) before the final fall of Jerusalem; historically it goes with 24.25–27 and 33.21–22.

(5) 4.1–5.15: symbolic actions signifying the coming siege and destruction of Jerusalem.

(6) 6.1–7.27: prophecies in word signifying the same destruction to come; as is true of the preceding, this is a collection of similar prophecies from various occasions.

(7) 8.1–11.21 (dated Sept. 17, 592): Ezekiel's vision of Jerusalem and the Temple; this is a redactional account, composed from multiple visions, which can be separated with some certainty.

(8) 12.1–20: acts symbolic of the Exile from Jerusalem.

(9) 12.21–14.11: a collection of oracles concerning prophecy, true and false, in Judah and Chaldea.

(10) 14.12–23: discourse on personal responsibility.

(11) 15.1–16.52: allegories concerning Jerusalem; to these have been added two passages symbolizing Jerusalem as a vine and as a faithless spouse.

(12) 16.53–63: two prophecies concerning the doom and the future salvation of Israel.

(13) 17.1–19.14: allegories on the kings of Judah; these involve Zedekiah's rebellion against Chaldea (allegory in 17.1–10, explained in 17.11–21), a passage to which a messianic prophecy has been appended

(17.22–24, postexilic, probably not by Ezekiel), and two "dirges" over Zedekiah (19.1–9 and 19.10–14); before the dirges a prophetic-priestly discourse or a series of discourses on personal responsibility has been inserted (ch. 18).

(14) 20.1–44 (dated Aug. 14, 591): a discourse or series of discourses on Israel's religious infidelity, concluded with a prophecy of restoration.

(15) 21.1–37: prophecies connected by the catchword "sword"; these are of mixed character: the sword of Yahweh against Judah (21.1–10; complemented by a symbolic act, 21.11–12), the song of the sword of the Lord (21.13–22), the sword of the Chaldeans against Jerusalem (21.23–28; complemented by an "antimessianic" prophecy in 21.29–32), and the sword of the Lord against the Ammonites (21.33–37; topically connected with the preceding, but probably not Ezekiel's).

(16) 22.1–31: a series of prophetic-priestly discourses on the sins of Jerusalem and Israel.

(17) 23.1–49: the allegory of the two sisters, Oholah and Oholibah, representing Samaria and Jerusalem.

(18) 24.1–14 (dated Jan. 15, 588): symbolic action and prophecy announcing the investing of Jerusalem.

(19) 24.15–24: symbolic action prophesying the destruction of the city.

(20) 24.25–27: announcing the end of Ezekiel's dumbness; cf. 3.22–27 above.

Oracles against the Foreign Nations: ch. 25–32. As is usually the case in the postexilic editions of the prophetic works, the prophet's words against foreign nations have been gathered here and used to separate his prophecies against Israel from those that speak of its salvation. Successively they deal with Ammon, Moab, Edom, Philistia, Phoenicia, and Egypt. It is evident that they have been arranged topically rather than chronologically; however, seven of them are dated, including (in 29.17–21, against Egypt) one that bears the latest date of any Ezekielian prophecy (April 26, 571).

Oracles for Israel after the Destruction of Jerusalem: ch. 33–48. In this part of the book the following 12 sections may be distinguished:

(1) 33.1–9: the prophet as watchman; cf. 3.16b–21.

(2) 33.10-20: on individual responsibility.

(3) 33.21–22 (dated Jan. 8, 585): the end of Ezekiel's dumbness; cf. 3.22–27; 24.25–27.

(4) 33.23–29: prophecy against the Judaite survivors.

(5) 33.30–33: against Ezekiel's critics in Babylon.

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

(6) 34.1–31: the false shepherds of Israel's past and present contrasted with the Lord, the Good Shepherd; the promise of restoration.

(7) 35.1–15: a series of prophecies against Edom, which had cooperated in the Chaldean devastation of Judah.

(8) 36.1–38: prophecies concerning the regeneration of Israel, the land and the people.

(9) 37.1–14: the vision of the dry bones prophesying Israel's resurrection.

(10) 37.15–28: symbolic action portraying the restoration of Israel and Judah.

(11) 38.1–39.29: prophecies against Gog, an apocalyptic and symbolic figure; the eschatological purview probably indicates that these are not Ezekiel's.

(12) 40.1–48.35 (dated April 28, 573): an extended vision of the new Temple-to-be, described in loving detail, together with a utopian view of the new Israel, its laws and institutions; while the nucleus of the material is certainly Ezekiel's, it has doubtless been much expanded and developed by later writers.

Literary Character. As the foregoing analysis indicates, the Book of Ezekiel contains a mixture of many types of prophetical literature, some of them peculiar to this prophet. It abounds in symbolic actions to a greater degree than do the other prophetic books, and the symbolisms tend to be more involved and allegorical and more systematically connected with the prophetic message than was the case with earlier prophets. The allegorical vision, too, is quite typical of Ezekiel; its involved and often bizarre symbolism becomes the model for the subsequent apocalyptic style. A strong priestly influence may be felt in some of the discourses that adopt a legal approach to morality. The same kind of influence is even more apparent in the final chapters with their concern for the Sadocite priesthood, its laws and institutions, and the ritual and practice of the new Temple.

The text of Ezekiel is often very obscure in details and is more than usually overladen with glossings and expansions. Ezekiel's own style is ponderous and baroque, more adapted to prosaic moralizing and discursive description than to the poetry of the prophetic oracle. Most of Ezekiel is, indeed, prose; the attempt to reanalyze it according to the norms of a supposed Kurzvers (e.g., by W. Rudolph) has not been entirely convincing, especially as this generally involves considerable rearrangement and deletion in order to support the hypothesis. When Ezekiel does use poetry, it is ordinarily rather rough and poorly sustained; neither his vocabulary nor his choice of images is "poetic." All this is said, however, without prejudice to the genuine prophetic eloquence of the book. Behind the redactional form in which the oracles often appear and despite the overloading of the text, we hear the authentic voice of a passionate and deeply committed man who lived intensely the word that he preached. Not in form, it is true, but in spirit certainly, Ezekiel stands in the great prophetic tradition; it is not "armchair prophecy."

Theology. Besides the profound influence that Ezekiel exercised on the development of the spirit and forms of JUDAISM, certain of its theological emphases deserve special note in relation to its place in the record of the history of salvation. Among them are: (1) The concept of the "glory of the Lord" (1.1–28; 3.12–15; 8.1–4; 10.1–20; 11.22-23; 43.1-9), represented in a series of visions having as their point of departure the doctrine of the presence of God, signified by the ark of the covenant. This concept, similar to Isaiah's vision of the Lord in the Temple (Is 6.1-13) and allied to other ancient concepts of the divine presence, in Ezekiel strikes a special note of transcendence (the glory of the Lord moves from Jerusalem to Babylonia), while at the same time there is no doubt of its identification with the Temple, which becomes a symbol of the source of all blessings (47.1–12). The combination of these ideas has much influenced later Jewish and Christian theology, including that of the Gospel according to St. JOHN. (2) The personalism involved in the repeated emphasis on individual responsibility was particularly relevant in the emergence of the Judaism of which Ezekiel has been called the father. This doctrine brought to a culmination the prophetic teaching on the remnant of Israel and made possible the Jewish "church" that came out of the Exile (see ISRAEL). (3) The willingness of Ezekiel to rethink SALVATION HISTORY (Heilsgeschichte) in a manner sharply contrasting with that of earlier prophecy (e.g., in ch. 16; 20) indicates both a new attitude to history and an openness to the changes that would be introduced through the development of doctrine leading down to Christianity. As part of this can be included Ezekiel's teaching on the Davidic Messiah, which can in one sense be termed an antimessianism [e.g., Ez 21.23–28 (alluding to Gn 49.10); 46.16–18]. In the concept of Ezekiel there would be a new and spiritual covenant with Israel (Ez 11.19; 36.26) in which, as a matter of course, there would be a Davidic prince (34.23–24; 37.24–25). This prince, however, has been deprived of every trace of the mystique of royalty: he is a lay figure, a servant of the Lord who alone is the Savior of Israel. Ezekiel's doctrine represents a culmination of a prophetic tradition that, as subsequently developed by other Prophets, would be reflected in the antitriumphalist spirit in which Jesus proclaimed the messianic fulfillment.

Bibliography: H. H. ROWLEY, "The Book of Ezekiel in Modern Study," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 36 (Manchester 1953-54) 146-190, a discussion of the history of criticism of Ezekiel. The most recent critical commentaries are those of G. FOHRER, Handbuch zum Alten Testament 13, ed. O. EISSFELDT (Tübingen 1934-) and W. ZIMMERLI, Ezechiel, in Biblischer Kommentar, ed. M. NOTH (Neukirchen 1955-) v.13. In Eng., G. A. COOKE, The Book of Ezechiel, 2 v. (International Critical Commentary, ed. S. R. DRIVER et al.; New York 1937), retains its usefulness. Briefer but still serviceable commentaries. H. G. MAY and E. L. ALLEN, G. A. BUTTRICK, et al., eds., The Interpreters' Bible (New York 1951–57) 6:40-338. J. MUILENBURG, in Peake's Commentary on the Bible, ed. M. BLACK and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1962) 568-590. E. F. SIEGMAN, The Book of Ezechiel (30-31; New York 1961). J. STEIN-MANN, Le Prophète Ézéchiel et les débuts de l'exil (Paris 1953), excellent study of the prophet, his message and meaning, with commentary. H. GESE, Der Verfassungsentwurf des Ezechiel (Tübingen 1957), discusses the manifold problems of the final ch. General. W. ZIMMERLI, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65)2:847-850. J. ZIEGLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanishe Konsil: Dokumente und Kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al. (1966) 3:1327-28. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 739-742

[B. VAWTER]

EZRA

One of the leading figures in the restoration of the Jewish community in Palestine after the Babylonian Exile. Ezra, whose late-Hebrew or Aramaic name $ezr\bar{a}$ (rendered in Greek as $E\zeta[\delta]p\alpha\zeta$ or $E\sigma[\delta]p\alpha[\zeta]$) means "help," traced his descent from the priestly line of Aaron through Seraiah (Ezr 7.1–5), the high priest who was executed by the Babylonians when they captured Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (2 Kgs 25.18–21).

Priest (Ezr 7.11; 10.10) and "scribe of the Law of the God of heaven" (Ezr 7.12, 21), Ezra returned to Jerusalem from Babylon, leading a group composed of over 1,250 Jews from Babylon and Chasphia—laymen, priests, Levites, singers, gatekeepers, and Temple servants (Ezr 7.7; 8.1–20). Disdaining protection from the Persian king Artaxerxes, whose decree authorized Ezra's mission (Ezr 7.1–26), the caravan encamped at the river Ahava, fasted for a time to beg divine protection for the journey, and then proceeded safely to Jerusalem, where the travelers deposited the rich offerings that they had brought for the Temple (Ezr 8.21–36).

According to Ezr 7.7–9, the journey started "on the first day of the first month" and ended in Jerusalem "on the first day of the fifth month" in the "seventh year" of King Artaxerxes. Despite this clear notation, the time of Ezra's arrival and activity in Jerusalem is very much in dispute. If the king mentioned in Ezr 7.7 is Artaxerxes I Longimanus (465–424 B.C.), a ministry in the king's seventh year (458 B.C.) would place Ezra in Palestine before the first mission of NEHEMIAH (definitely dated as 445–433 B.C.). But this seemingly makes a failure of Ezra's mission—contrary to the constant Jewish view of him—since Nehemiah would then have to correct again the abuse of mixed marriages (Nehemiah ch. 13). Several other reasons—e.g., Ezra's reforms seem to have been carried out in an abundant population and a rebuilt city (Ezra ch. 9–10), whereas Nehemiah both rebuilt the city and repopulated it—argue rather for a Nehemiah-Ezra sequence of activity.

To avoid the chronological difficulty, some authors suggest that the king of Ezr 7.7 is Artaxerxes II Mnemon (404-358 B.C.), whose seventh year was 397 B.C. Such a late dating of Ezra's mission, however, makes impossible the coordinated ministries of Ezra and Nehemiah, forcing proponents of this hypothesis to consider Nehemiah's name in Neh 8.9 as a later scribal insertion and to separate in time the material in Nehemiah ch. 10 from what precedes it in ch. 9. Another solution to the problem reads the "thirty-seventh year" (428 B.C.) in Ezr 7.7 instead of "the seventh year," the error in number being attributed to faulty textual transmission. This would make Ezra's mission contemporaneous with the second mission of Nehemiah (which began sometime between 433 and 424 B.C.) and would allow time for the rebuilding of the walls and population of Jerusalem.

Part of Ezra's commission from Artaxerxes (Ezr7.11–26) was to regulate religious matters. Accordingly, Ezra, who was shocked to learn how much intermarriage with the peoples of the land had weakened the postexilic principle of Jewish exclusiveness (Ezra ch. 9), called an assembly of the people to tell them that they would have to put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10.1–11; see also Neh 13.23–29). This they did, according to a prearranged system (Ezr 10.12–44).

In another convocation (see Lv 23.24), Ezra read the Law to the people, who celebrated that day as one of joy (Neh 8.1–12). They observed the restored feast of Booths (Neh 8.13–18; cf. Lv 23.33–43). In Neh 9.1–10.40 an account is given of the great covenant with the God of Israel concluded under Ezra's direction. By this covenant the Jews pledged themselves to avoid intermarriage with foreign peoples, to observe the Sabbath and the Sabbatical year, not to exact debts, to pay the Temple tax, and to provide wood, sacrifices, and offerings for the Temple.

Not much else is known about Ezra. He is not mentioned with Nehemiah in the praises of Sir 49.13, but two apocryphal books bear his name. Rabbinic literature hails him as second to Moses in his role of giving the Law. The Talmud even says of him that had not the Law been given through Moses, Ezra would have been worthy to be its vehicle (Sanhedrin 21b), for he restored its legislation when it was forgotten (Sukkah 20a). On the Book of Ezra, see CHRONICLER, BIBLICAL.

Bibliography: H. SCHNEIDER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1101–03. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 687–688.

[N. J. MCELENEY]

EZRA, BOOK OF

Biblical book that relates the first return of the Jewish exiles from their Babylonian captivity after the edict of Cyrus the Great in 538 B.C.; the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem, a labor completed in 515 B.C.; and the work of the priest-scribe Ezra, who led another group of exiles back to Palestine in the reign of the Persian king Artaxerxes (which Artaxerxes is uncertain). Particular mention is made of Ezra's efforts to preserve the racial purity of the restored Jewish community. (For a more complete treatment of this book, see CHRONICLER, BIBLI-CAL.)

[N. J. MCELENEY]

F

FAÀ DI BRUNO, FRANCESCO, BL.

Mathematician, scientist, inventor, composer, founder of the Sisters of Our Lady of Suffrage, and the Pious Works of Saint Zita, priest; b. March 29, 1825, Alessandria, Piedmont, northern Italy; d. March 27, 1888, Turin, Italy.

Francesco Faà di Bruno, the youngest of the 12 children of Marquis Louis Faà di Bruno, was a remarkable man of great talent and deep faith imbued from his infancy in the ancestral castle at Bruno. Following the death of his mother (1834), Carolina Sappa, Francesco studied at the Collegio San Giorgio di Novi Ligure until his entrance into the Royal Military Academy at Turin (1840). He completed his training, proved his valor in the War of Independence (1848), and rose to the rank of captain–of–staff in the Sardinian Army (1849).

Faà di Bruno was assigned to Paris (1849), but resigned his commission (1853) to study at the Sorbonne under Augustin Louis Cauchy and Urbain Leverrier. There he also became aquainted with Abbé Moigno and Charles Hermite. Upon his return to Turin, he was a professor of mathematics at the university for the rest of his life. In recognition of his achievements as a mathematician, the degree of doctor of science was conferred on him by the Universities of Paris and Turin. In addition to some ascetical writings, the composition of some sacred melodies, and the invention of some scientific apparatuses, Faà di Bruno made numerous and important contributions to mathematics. In 1858, he published a series of seven articles on the religious and pedagogical function of music, as well as a small volume on the topic.

He joined the Saint Vincent de Paul Society (1850) with Cauchy and Adolphe Baudon, and later established a chapter in Turin (1853). Faà di Bruno founded the charitable Opera Pia Santa Zita in the San Donato district of Turin (Feb. 2, 1859) to aid house servants and ensure their right to participate in festival liturgies. The society was placed under the patronage of Saint Zita and had Saint John Bosco as its vice president. In addition to this major accomplishment, Faà di Bruno established Saint Joseph's Hospital for the sick and convalescent (1860), a home for aged priests (1862), classes for the vocational education of poor youth (1864), a women's branch of the Opera known as the Congregazione delle Suore Minime di Nostra Signora del Suffragio (1868), as well as other foundations.

He accomplished all the above as a dedicated layman. On Oct. 22, 1876, at age 51, he was ordained priest. The following month he opened the church he founded (Chiesa del Suffragio) to the public (October 30) and celebrated his first Mass as Father Francesco (November 1). Not only was Blessed Francesco a prolific author in both science and music, but his life and works have generated a formidable number of scholarly studies.

Pope John Paul II praised Faà di Bruno on Sept. 25, 1988, for his ability "to find positive responses to the needs of his time" (beatification homily).

Bibliography: L. CONDIO, Francesco Faà di Bruno (Turin 1932). Facoltà di Teologia dell'Ateneo Romano della Santa Croce, Il Beato Francesco Faà di Bruno e la donna (Rome 1991). Istituto Superiore di Scienze Religiose di Torino, Francesco Faà di Bruno e l'Eucaristia (Turin 1996). R. LANZAVECCHIA, Francesco Faà di Bruno (Alessandria, Italy 1980). V. DEL MAZZA, Il Coraggio della Carità (Turin 1988). V. MESSORI, Un italiano serio: il beato Francesco Faà di Bruno (Milan 1990); Ser Cristiano en un mundo hostil, tr. J. ROUCO and A. MONTERO (Madrid 1997); Il beato Faà di Bruno-Un cristiano in un mondo ostile (Milan 1998). P. PALAZ-ZINI, Francesco Faà di Bruno scienziato e prete (Rome 1980). Pontificia Università Lateranense, La Spiritualità di Francesco Faà di Bruno nell'esperienza francese (Rome 1983). P. RISSO, Un genio per Cristo: profilo biografico del beato Francesco Faà di Bruno (Padua 1992). C. TRABUCCO, Francesco Faà di Bruno, pioniere dell'assistenza sociale (Rome 1957). Università degli Studi di Torino-Facoltà di Lettere e Filosofia, Francesco Faà di Bruno e la musica (Turin 1992). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1988): 1092.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FABER, FREDERICK WILLIAM

Oratorian and popular spiritual writer; b. Calverley, Yorkshire, England, June 28, 1814; d. London, Sept. 26, Frederick William Faber.

1863. After Harrow, he matriculated at Balliol in 1832, and became a scholar at University College in 1834, and a fellow there in 1837. At his entrance into Oxford he was a Calvinist, but by the end of his 2d year there, he professed Evangelism. By 1837 he had become an Anglican full of hope in the OXFORD MOVEMENT. In 1839 he assisted NEWMAN in translating seven books of St. Optatus for the Library of the Fathers, and on May 26 he received Anglican orders. As pastor of a parish in Elton, he formed the Society of St. Joseph and wrote that he seemed "to grow more Roman daily."

In the autumn of 1845, many of his friends, including Newman, were received into the Church, and in November, at Northampton, Bishop Wareing accepted Faber's abjuration of Anglicanism. He founded the Wilfridians in 1846, and was ordained in 1847. When Newman brought the Oratory of St. Philip Neri to Birmingham in 1848, Faber and many of the Wilfridians placed themselves under Newman as novices (see ORATORIAN). In 1849 Faber was sent as founder to the oratory on King William Street, London. The two oratories then developed along divergent lines, and Newman and Faber quarreled over Oratorians' hearing nuns' confessions.

The Latin element in Faber's nature was especially revealed in his sermons, which most critics would place in the "Sweet Flowers of Devotion" school (the phrase is Cardinal Wiseman's). During a mission in a poor section of Dublin, Faber thus ended an impassioned sermon: "My dear Irish children, have mercy on your own souls!" He knelt, the congregation knelt, and a thousand people sobbed.

As a preacher Faber was highly appreciated; Manning compared him with St. Bernard and St. Bernardine of Siena. The skill he demonstrated in adapting spiritual principles to different types of listeners, he also utilized in spiritual direction. He displayed a delicate psychology in shining the light of truth into the darkest recesses of self-love, whether the directed was priest, religious, or lay. He wrote eight volumes in eight years, all composed rapidly with few corrections.

All for Jesus (1853) attained a phenomenal circulation and had "the goal of making piety bright and happy, especially to laymen." While this work gave preliminary techniques for initiating the spiritual life, Growth in Holiness (1854) described "the middle wilderness of long, patient perseverance." The third volume in the trilogy, which was to treat of souls within sight of the land of promise, was never written. The Blessed Sacrament (1855), The Creator and the Creature (1858), The Foot of the Cross (1858), Spiritual Conferences (1859), The Precious Blood (1860), and Bethlehem (1860) were all completed and translated rapidly into many European languages. The last book is exceptional in that Faber wrote it to please himself; a study of the Incarnation, it is the most Berullian of his books.

Faber's style is a mixture of erudition, devotional feeling, and poetic fancies. By modern standards, his paragraphs are long and his style florid. His penchant for poetic and archaic words results in a charge of occasional obscurity. The exclamation point is his standby in punctuation. He relies heavily on the emotive and the affective approach. Yet, when allowances are made for external differences, Faber's thought is seen to be relevant to today's spiritual problems, especially in his emphasis on the soul's individuality, man's psychosomatic nature, the indispensability of taking pains with purity of intention, the necessity of spiritual reading (it is a sign of predestination), frequent use of the Sacraments, and friendliness to all men, especially to those not of the faith.

In 1854 the Oratory moved to South Kensington, and there Faber spent the remaining nine years of his life. In July, 1860, the pope conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity.

Bibliography: F. W. FABER, A Father Faber Heritage, ed. M. MERCEDES (Westminister, Md. 1958). R. CHAPMAN, Father Faber (Westminster, Md. 1961). J. VERBILLION, "A New Look at Father Faber," Cross and Crown 12 (1960) 164–187.

FABER, JOHANN AUGUSTANUS

Dominican humanist and theologian; b. Augsburg (not Fribourg, Switzerland), 1475; d. 1530. He made his profession at the Dominican priory at Augsburg, and undertook theological studies in Italy, principally at Venice. In 1507 he was promoted to master of theology in a general chapter at Padua, and in that year returned to Augsburg as prior. In 1511 he was vicar-general of the Dominican Congregation of upper Germany, with the priories of Augsburg, Würzburg, Speyer, Constance, Fribourg, Strassburg, Haguenau, and Zurich under his jurisdiction. From 1512 to 1515 he began the reconstruction of the convent church at Augsburg with funds that accrued from the preaching of a jubilee indulgence conceded by a bull of Leo X. Emperor Maximilian decreed against the bull on March 7, 1515, but reversed his judgment on April 13. In this year Faber disputed with Johann Eck at Bologna on usury and interest, and on his return to Germany was made imperial councilor. Long convinced that thorough classical training was a necessary preparation for a critical study of the Scriptures, the Fathers, and theology, he interested Maximilian in the erection of an Athenaeum at Augsburg, but the Emperor's death on Jan. 12, 1519, brought the project to a standstill. He traveled to the Netherlands with Cardinal Matthäus Lang at the end of 1520 to win the support of the new Emperor Charles V. There he discussed his views with Erasmus. In 1521 he wrote anonymously the Consilium cuiusdam ex animo cupientis esse consultum et R. pontificis dignitati et christianae religionis tranquillitati, in which he sympathized with the Lutheran revival of classics. As Luther's theology developed, however, Faber became his firm opponent. This new stand antagonized the humanists and earned him hostility at Augsburg, which he left in 1525, seeking refuge with Cardinal Lang in Salzburg. He returned briefly the next year but again fled.

Bibliography: K. SCHOTTENLOHER, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung 1:239. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:80. R. COULON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:2046–50, where the errors in Quétif-Échard are corrected. A. DUVAL, Catholicisme 4:1032–33. W. ECKERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1330–31. N. PAU-LUS, Die deutschen Dominikaner im Kampfe gegen Luther, 1518–63 (St. Louis, Mo. 1903) 292–313.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

FABER, JOHANNES

Theologian, bishop, opponent of Luther and Zwingli; b. Leutkirch (Swabia),1478; d. Vienna, May 21, 1541. He is sometimes confused with others of the same name. Faber (Heigerlin) studied Canon Law at Tübingen and received a doctorate in theology at Freiburg. Thereafter he was rector at Lindau and Leutkirch, canon at Basel, and vicar-general for Constance (1518). After 1524 he became chaplain and confessor to Archduke Ferdinand and then bishop of Vienna in 1530. At Basel he had been friendly with Erasmus, favored reform of abuses (especially indulgences), and until 1519, sympathized with Zwingli, Oecolampadius, and Melanchthon. From 1522 he opposed Luther with writings such as Malleus in haeresim Lutheranam (1524). Representing the bishop of Constance, he debated unsuccessfully against Zwingli at Zurich (1523), and, as an imperial councilor, helped organize a Swiss Catholic party (1526). He attended several imperial diets, including Augsburg (1530), where he examined the AUGSBURG CONFESSION. As bishop of Vienna he preached, worked, and wrote zealously against Protestantism; held regular conferences with his clergy; and provided scholarships for students for the priesthood. He wrote much on doctrinal questions, such as faith and good works, the Mass, and the Eucharist, and also polemics on Hus, Luther, Zwingli, and the Anabaptists.

Bibliography: L. HELBLING Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart³ 2:856. Allgemeine deutsche Biographie 14:435–441.

[J. T. GRAHAM]

FABER (FAVRE, LEFÈVRE), PETER, BL.

The first companion of St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA; b. Villaret, Savoy, April 13, 1506; d. Rome, Aug. 1, 1546. After early study at Thônes and La Roche he enrolled at St. Barbara's College in the University of Paris in 1525. Here he met and lodged with Francis XAVIER. In 1528 Ignatius of Loyola arrived in Paris and joined Faber and Xavier in firm, deep friendship. On May 30, 1534, Faber was ordained and on Aug. 15, 1534, he said the Mass at which Ignatius and his small band of friends vowed poverty, chastity, and a journey to the Holy Land to work among the Muslims. He then shared the experiences of Ignatius's group in northern Italy and Rome that led to the foundation of the Society of Jesus (see JESUITS). When their plans for missionary work among the Muslims were blocked in 1537 by the Turkish war, Faber went with Ignatius to Rome where he was appointed professor of Scripture at the Sapienza.

In 1540 Faber was sent by PAUL III to attend the Diet at Worms and that at Regensburg the following year. At these conferences Faber saw the futility of the hopes of CHARLES V to solve differences between Catholics and Protestants in Germany by discussion and negotiation. He was among the first to respond to the challenge of Lutheranism by promoting a genuine reform in the life and discipline of Catholics, both clerical and lay. By preaching and direction, especially by the use of the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius, he brought about many conversions and instilled a new spirit in the Church in the Rhineland, thereby enabling that area to resist the further spread of Protestantism. He founded the first Jesuit residence in Cologne, and received Peter CANISIUS into the Society of Jesus. His labors also took him to Belgium, France, Portugal, and Spain. After being called by Paul III to attend the Council of Trent, he died in Rome.

Bl. Peter Faber.

Because of his profound knowledge and gentle sanctity, Faber was sought out for his counsel, and highly esteemed by Xavier and the early Jesuits. His spiritual diary, the Memoriale, is a daily account over a long period of the action of God in his soul. It reveals a deep spiritual refinement, and also the strength and charm of his character that were so important in the success of his work. He was beatified Sept. 5, 1872.

Feast: Aug. 2 (Jesuits).

Bibliography: PETRUS FABER, Spiritual Writings of Pierre Favre, "The Memoriale," tr. E. C. MURPHY, "Selected Letters and Instructions," tr. M. E. PALMER (Saint Louis, MO 1996). W. V. BAN-GERT, To the Other Towns (Westminster, Md. 1959), with bibliography. P. FABER, Mémorial, tr. M. DE CERTEAU (Collection Christus 4; Paris 1960). C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliotèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 4:1657–58; 9:583. Fabri monumenta: Beati P. F. epistolae, memoriale et processus (Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu 15; 1914). J. B. KETTENMEYER, "Aufzeichnungen des Kölner Kartäuserpriors Kalckbrenner über den sel. Peter Faber," Archivum historicum Societatis Jesu 8 (1939) 86–102. J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (2d ed. Chicago 1998) 241–45.

[W. V. BANGERT]

FABIAN, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 236 to Jan. 20, 250. The Liber pontificalis describes Fabian as a Roman and credits him with dividing the city into seven ecclesiastical districts with seven deacons and seven subdeacons. The latter were associated with seven notaries to compile the ACTS OF THE MARTYRS. The LIBERIAN CATALOGUE noted his building activities in the Roman cemeteries: multas fabricas per cimiteria fieri iussit. These fabricas must have included the completion of the bishops' grotto in the cemetery of Calixtus. CYPRIAN OF CARTHAGE describes Fabian as honorable, and praises the integrity of his administration. Fabian approved the condemnation of the African Bishop Privatus of Lambaesis, and apparently did not respond to Origen's letters seeking some measure of reconciliation after his earlier condemnation by Bishop Pontianus.

Getting permission to transfer the bodies of the martyrs PONTIANUS and HIPPOLYTUS from Sardinia and to bury them with honors in Rome, implies that the Roman church had friends in authority, not surprising during the reign of the pro-Christian emperor Philip the Arab (244–249). Ironically, it was Fabian who ordained the future schismatic NOVATIAN. The church historian Eusebius records that when the community sought a successor to ANTERUS, a dove settled on Fabian's head, which the community took to be a sign from God. He died during the persecution of DECIUS, was buried in the cemetery of Callistus, and later translated to the Basilica of St. Sebastian.

Feast: Jan. 20.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History. 6:29, 34, 36, 39. CYPRIAN, Correspondance, ed. and tr. L. BAYARD, (Paris 1925) 1:9, 30. P. GODET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VA-CANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 5:2050–51. E. FERGUSON, Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 1.415. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 16–17. G. SCH-WAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. 3 (Freiburg 1995), s.v. "Fabianus, heilig, Papst."

FABIOLA, ST.

Early Christian benefactress and friend of St. JE-ROME; d. Rome, 399. She came to the wealthy Roman nobility descended from Julius Maximus and had an extremely passionate nature. Fabiola divorced her first husband because of his vices. To protect herself, she took a second husband, separating herself from Church communion until, as Jerome asserted, the death of her second husband and her public penitence at the church of the Lateran on Easter eve in the presence of the bishop and clergy. She sold her possessions, gave to the poor, and supported monasteries in Italy. In 395 she journeyed to Bethlehem with her relative Oceanus, staying there with SS. PAULA and EUSTOCHIUM.

When the controversy over ORIGENISM divided Jerome and his friends from RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA and Melania, efforts were made to draw Fabiola to the cause of Bp. JOHN OF JERUSALEM, who supported Rufinus (Jerome, Cont. Ruf. 3.14); but they proved unsuccessful. Fabiola eagerly attached herself to the teachings of Jerome (Epist. 77), who wrote two dissertations for her: one, on the mystical meaning of the dress of the high priest (Epist. 64); and another, on the 42 stations (mansiones) of the Israelites in the desert (Epist. 78). At the rumor of an invasion of the Huns she returned to Rome in 396. A letter from the Roman priest Amandus to Jerome in which he asks Jerome's views on a woman taking a husband while another, although dissolute, husband lives indicates that she may have contemplated a third marriage; but she was discouraged from it by Jerome in his answer to Amandus (Epist. 55).

The last three years of her life were spent in charitable activity. She joined PAMMACHIUS in the institution of a hospital at Porto, where she herself cared for the poor and sick. As her restless disposition had found Rome and Italy too small for her charities, she was considering a long journey when she died. The whole of Rome attended the funeral of Fabiola, their great benefactress.

Feast: Dec. 27.

Bibliography: W. H. FREMANTLE, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–87) 2:442–443. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienneet de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 7.2:2274–75. Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 22:690–698. A. S. D. THIERRY, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Paris 1867). F. CAVALLERA, Saint Jérôme, 2 v. (Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense 1, 2; 1922).

[E. D. CARTER]

FABRI, FILIPPO (FABER)

Theologian, commentator on DUNS SCOTUS; b. Spinata di Brisighella, Italy, 1564; d. Padua, Aug. 27, 1630. He joined the Friars Minor Conventual in 1583. After ordination he studied at the friaries of Ferrara, Padua, and Rome. His fame spread and he became professor of philosophy (1603) and theology (1613) at the University of Padua. Although elected provincial of Bologna (1625-30), he continued to lecture on the teachings of Duns Scotus, becoming renowned for his clear explanations of Scotistic doctrine. Among his writings are: Philosophia naturalis Duns Scoti (1601), Disputationes theologicae (1620), Theologicae disputationes de predestinatione (1623). The Commen. in XII libros metaphysicorum Aristotelis ad mentem Scoti and De primatu Petri, et Pontificis Romani were published posthumously (Venice 1637). Many of his works are in manuscripts in the Paduan Library. He collaborated in the writing of the Urban Constitutions for the Order of Minor Conventuals.

Bibliography: P. É. D'ALEÇON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 5.2:2060–61. U. SMEETS, Lineamenta bibliographiae Scotisticae (Rome 1942). É. LONGPRÉ, Catholicisme 4:1033–34. A. EMMEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1334. G. FRANCHINI, Bibliosofia, e memorie letterarie di scrittori francescani conventuali (Modena 1693). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 5 v. in 6 (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–1913) v.3. J. H. SBARALEA, Supplementum et castigatio ad scriptores trium ordinum S. Francisci a Waddingo (Rome 1936) v.2. L. WADDING, Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (3d ed. Rome 1906) v.5.

[R. BARTMAN]

FACULTIES OF THE SOUL

The faculties of the soul are often called its potencies. POTENCY, generally speaking, is basically of two sorts, each understood in relation to its corresponding actuality. There is a potency for the actuality that is being, and a potency for the actuality that is making or doing. For example, marble is said to have a potency for being a statue; water in its liquid state has not. Marble has a certain consistency-found also in materials like bronze, wood, and clay-by which it can acquire and maintain the shape of statue. But marble does not make itself into a statue. It is the sculptor who does this. Now, if the sculptor "does" this, he "can do" it; that is, the sculptor has a potency for making the statue. Thus, just as "is" entails "can be," so too "does" entails "can do." "Can be" is said to be a passive potency; "can do," an active potency, and hence, also a power. The potencies of the soul, like the potency of the sculptor, are active potencies, or powers for doing; they are potencies for the performance of life activities. Because of this they are often called powers of the soul.

How Defined. The powers of the soul are closely related to the soul's definition. The common definition of soul states nothing distinctive of the existent types of soul. To define each type, one must become acquainted with the activities attributed to each; for one comes to know what a thing is by observing what it does. And if it "does," it "can do." One can thus describe the types of soul in terms of their potencies. For example, the vegetative soul is the soul with potencies for nourishing, growing, and reproducing. Yet this has little meaning unless one knows what the activities of nourishing, etc., are. One can get at the nature of these activities by considering the objects on which they bear; for all activities bear on some object. Thus, one can move from object to activity to faculty to type of soul. This does not mean that there are four separate analyses, one each for object, activity, faculty, and type of soul. There is actually only one analysis, that of the object (and of what is implied by it; e.g., an analysis of the sort of natural organized body that this requires); for the activity is defined in terms of the object, the faculty in terms of the activity, and the type of soul in terms of its faculties. To have analyzed the object is to have analyzed the activity and the faculty, hence to have said something about the type of soul and natural organized body.

Vegetative Faculty. The generic object of the vegetative faculty is said to be two different things: (1) food (see Aristotle, Anim. 415a 23-416b 30), and (2) the body of which the soul is the first actuality (see St. THOMAS AQUINAS, ST 1a, 78.1). One might wonder about the fact that two different objects are assigned; but the wonder is dispelled if one considers that vegetative activities terminate in this body, but only after having acted upon and affected food. Now, food can be considered in three ways: (1) as nutriment, and so considered it conserves the living body in existence; this is the specific object that defines the activity of nourishing; (2) as augment, and so considered it brings the living body to its quantitative maturity; this is the specific object that defines the activity of growing; and (3) as overflow, and so considered it prepares the living body for producing another like itself; this is the specific object that defines the activity of reproducing.

Although the vegetative faculties use food, they also use the vegetative bodily organs, such as stomach and liver; they also use the natural activities of certain elements and compounds, such as HCl. In spite of such a thorough dependence, there is a degree of transcendence of vegetative activities over the activities of matter in its nonliving states. By its vegetative activities, in which it employs activities that are found also in matter in its nonliving states, a living thing destroys another (food), and by this destruction maintains itself in existence.

Sensitive and Intellectual Faculties. The generic object of the sensitive faculty is whatever is sensible. For sight, it is the visible; for hearing, the audible, etc. The object of the intellectual faculty is whatever is intelligible. This is to say that things in the real world are the objects of sense and intellect; as sensible, they are the objects of senses; as intelligible, the objects of intellect. The sense and the thing as sensible cooperate, as agent and instrument, respectively, in the production within the sense of a form, called the sensible species, by means of which the sense functions, e.g., by means of which sight sees. The intellect and the thing as intelligible (things in the physical world are only potentially intelligible, whereas they are actually sensible) cooperatively produce, as agent and instrument respectively, a form within the intellect, called the intelligible species, by means of which the intellect understands what these things are. This form, unlike the sensible species that is individualized by the bodily matter of the organ of sense, is an absolute form (see SPECIES, INTENTIONAL; SOUL, HUMAN, 4).

Although the activities of the sense faculties depend on certain bodily organs (e.g., eye, ear, and nose) and on certain natural activities of elements and compounds (e.g., the photochemical changes in the retina of the eye), these activities nonetheless transcend the activities of matter in its nonliving states. Unlike what happens in the case of changes in the realm of the nonliving and in that of the vegetative, in the case of the change that occurs in a sense when it is actually sensing, a sensible form is produced by, and is present in, a substance that is not the ordinary physical subject of that sensible form. Thus, when the eye sees a tree, there is present in the substance that is the eye a visual form whose ordinary physical subject is the substance that is a tree.

The transcendence of the intellectual faculty is complete, because the form produced by it, and present in it, is an absolute form.

Faculty in General. In addition to questions—What is the faculty of sight, and how does it differ from the faculty of understanding?—raised with a view to making more complete one's account of what soul is, philosophers ask more general questions about the soul's faculties—What is a faculty? And how are the faculties related to the soul? Is the soul constituted out of its faculties as a whole out of parts? Are the faculties substances or accidents?

The faculties of the soul are power parts, as opposed to quantitative parts (see SOUL). They are accidents, for the actualities to which they are related, namely, life activities, are accidents, and things related as potency to actuality must be in the same genus. The soul cannot be composed of its faculties as a whole out of parts; for the soul is in the genus of substance, and nothing substantial can be intrinsically constituted of accidents. Although the soul has a plurality of faculties distinct from itself as accidents from something substantial, these are nonetheless united in the soul itself, for in each one living thing there can be but one soul, since the soul is a substantial form. The soul is the one source of all its diverse activities and faculties. Most properly speaking, the living thing, the total living thing, performs life activities; and this it does primarily by means of the soul and its power parts, and secondarily by means of the natural organized body and its bodily parts. The faculties of a living thing are the many accidents of one living substance.

Because of the undesirable connotations of the term faculty, some prefer to use in its stead words like power, potency, capacity, or ability. For in the last two centuries faculty has come, unfortunately and quite in distortion of the Aristotelian-Thomistic notion, to designate tiny independent entities, substancelike, as sources of diverse life activities. More recent PSYCHOLOGY, rightly rejecting the faculties of the faculty psychologists, has at the same time returned to a recognition of the fundamental idea of active potencies or powers. Psychological testing has revealed that human activities are of essentially diverse sorts, and that each sort derives from some tendency or inclination to act in that sort of way. These inclinations appear to be innate, but open to development and differentiation in the individual by means of his experience with the world. It is clear not only that the Aristotelian-Thomistic concept of active potencies is compatible with the concept of innate tendencies or inclinations or capacities, but also that the two concepts are in fact the same, though differently verbalized. Another difference lies in the methodology employed. The Aristotelian-Thomistic concept was arrived at by means at the disposal of the ordinary man, viz, ordinary sense observation and introspection. The contemporary concept, on the other hand, was arrived at by scientific means, through the factor analysis of investigators like C. Spearman (1863-1945), J. McK. Cattell (1860-1944), and L. Thurstone (1887-1955)—an interesting and important scientific confirmation of an age-old philosophical concept.

See Also: INTELLECT; WILL; SENSES; APPETITE.

Bibliography: J. E. ROYCE, Man and His Nature (New York 1961), extensive bibliog. F. GAETANI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:250–52. R. ALLERS, "Functions, Factors and Faculties," The Thomist 7 (1944) 323–62.

[J. BOBIK]

FACUNDUS OF HERMIANE

Sixth-century African bishop and theologian. Although nothing is known of the origins or early career of Facundus, he belonged to a group of African theologians whose knowledge of the history of the Church and whose theological method, based on the Scriptures and doctrines of the Church Fathers, enabled them to give a clear and logical explanation of the truths of the faith, characteristic of the finest patristic tradition. He likewise stood forth as a champion of the liberty of the Church, asserting its independence of the civil power: "Since civil affairs are not subject to the church, how can the affairs of the church be subject to the palace?" (Pro def. Trium Cap. 12.4).

Facundus was present in Constantinople when the acephali, or semi-Eutychians, as he called the party of THEODORE ASCIDAS, persuaded JUSTINIAN I that by condemning the THREE CHAPTERS he could regain the Monophysites to union with the Catholics; and Facundus maintained that this stratagem was a means of seeking vengeance for the condemnation of ORIGENISM by the Emperor's Edict of 543, brought about by the Roman deacon, later Pope, PELAGIUS I (ibid. 1.2; 4.4). Facundus appears to have been present at a synod under Mennas in 546 that discussed the results of the Edict of 544 against the Three Chapters and to have begun writing his 12 books In Defense of the Three Chapters. He was one of the 70 bishops who participated in a synod with Pope VIGILIUS I in Constantinople (autumn 547) to discuss the Three Chapters; and in the third session, by his offer to prove that the Council of Chalcedon had accepted the Letter of Ibas of Edessa, caused the Pope to prorogue discussion and ask for the opinions of the bishops in writing. Not yielding to the pressure of the imperial agents, Facundus obtained a seven-day delay in submitting his vote, contrary to the desire of the Emperor.

On later completing his Defense, which was addressed and submitted to Justinian, Facundus had to leave the capital. He took part in the general council of Africa (550) that condemned Pope Vigilius until he should rescind the Judicatum I. From hiding in exile, he followed the events leading to the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553) and the Pope's submission to the Emperor's pressure (Feb. 23, 554). He directed his Liber contra Mocianum against the Pope's turnabout and the intrigue of the government represented by the civil official Mocianus (553 or 558). In 568 he wrote an Epistola fidei catholicae summing up his defense of the Three Chapters and attacking Popes Vigilius and Pelagius and the Council of Constantinople II.

The theological argumentation of Facundus's *De*fense of the Three Chapters had been taken into consideration by Justinian in preparing his Rectae fidei confessio (July 551), and it was used as the basis for Pope Vigilius's Constitutum of May 14, 553, as well as for the In de- fensione Trium Capitulorum of Pelagius. The historical information he supplied for the events leading to the Council of Constantinople and its aftermath is invaluable.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 67:527–878. G. BARDEN-HEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur 5:320–324. E. CA-SPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von der Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:259–261. H. GELZER, Ausgewählte Kleine Schriften, ed. H. GELZER, JR. (Leipzig 1907) 73–76. Histoire du Bas-Empire, ed. J. R. PALANQUE 2:643–645, 670, 679, 691–692, 824–826, date of Contra Mocianum. R. DEVREESSE, Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste (Studi e Testi 141; 1948) 210, 221–222. F. TOLLU, Catholicisme 4:1053. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925).

[F. X. MURPHY]

FADICA

Established in 1976, Foundations and Donors Interested in Catholic Activities (FADICA) represents 47 private foundations with shared interests in the church's mission and work. The organization was formed through the leadership of a dozen family foundations convened by the Raskob Foundation of Wilmington Delaware. Three important influences led to FADICA's creation: the Second Vatican Council's vision of the laity with its emphasis on community and service, a trend within American philanthropy favoring collaboration, and growing wealth and influence among American Catholics.

The association, headquartered in Washington, D.C., regularly convenes its members for their continuing education on trends of importance to the church's ministry and internal life. Biannual symposia, research studies, and jointly funded initiatives, enable FADICA's philanthropists to play an active part in Catholic life.

Collective giving on average has exceeded two hundred million dollars. Among FADICA's achievements are its role in launching multi-million dollar programs to address the retirement crisis of American religious; engineering the creation of a U.S. church initiative to aid in the rebuilding of the church in Russia and Central and Eastern Europe; facilitating financial management reforms in the Holy See; persuading the U.S. hierarchy to address the subject of stewardship through a pastoral letter to American Catholics; developing better homiletic curricula in U.S. seminaries; and instituting the first national training course for vocations directors.

On the threshold of a new century, FADICA's shared concerns revolve around questions of how church institutions will maintain their Catholic culture and character as they transition from clergy and religious leader-ship to lay supervision and governance. There is also the change of attitudes and priorities among the trustees. A new generation of trustees, largely formed in the years after the Second Vatican Council, bring to the foundation an entirely different experience of the church. They have no first-hand memory of the dense Catholic subculture of the twentieth century which gave rise to FADICA. Intentional efforts to reach and mentor a new generation of foundation trustees in Catholic philanthropy are priorities with the FADICA organization.

Bibliography: J. T. ELLIS, Of Faith and Giving, An Historical Narrative of Catholic Philanthropy (Washington, D.C. 1981). M. J. OATES, The Catholic Philanthropic Tradition in America (Bloomington, Ind. 1995).

[F. J. BUTLER]

FAGNANI, PROSPERO

Italian canonist and theologian, b. S. Angelo, in Vado, Pesaro, Italy, July 2, 1588; d. Rome, Aug. 17, 1678. Of an old and distinguished noble family, he studied at Pavia, where he became doctor of civil and canon law at the age of 20. His brilliance won him the position of professor of law at the Sapienza in Rome, where his teaching enhanced his reputation. When he was 22, he was appointed secretary of the Congregation of the Council by Paul V, thus beginning a long career in which he held the esteem of eight popes and served on 11 congregations. Gregory XV commissioned him to prepare the important bull Aeterni Patris (Nov. 15, 1621), which reaffirmed and enlarged the regulations governing the conclave and papal elections. At the age of 44 he became blind but continued his active work with unabated energy. At the order of Alexander VII he undertook his greatest work, Commentaria absolutissima in quinque libros Decretalium (8 v. Rome 1661). Written after he had been blind for 28 years, the work reveals tremendous erudition and prodigious memory. The clarity of expression, the moderation and certainty of doctrine, and the exact citations were all the more enhanced by his many practical examples drawn from long experience with the Roman congregations. The index of the Commentaria was particularly excellent and has been considered a classic of its type. The work was highly important in the development of Canon Law in the post-Tridentine Church.

Inserted in the Commentaria was a treatise, De opinione probabili, attacking PROBABILISM, which led St. Alphonsus to call Fagnani the greatest of rigorists.

Bibliography: A. BERTOLA, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 5:807–809. T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:2067–69. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des Kanonischen Rechts

(Stuttgart 1875–80) 3.1:485. H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 4:253–254.

[J. C. WILLKE]

FAGNANO, JOSÉ

Salesian missionary in Argentina and Chile; b. Rochetta, Italy, March 9, 1844; d. Santiago de Chile, Sept. 18, 1916. As a youth he entered the seminary but soon left to enlist as a soldier in Garibaldi's army, then fighting for Italian unification. Disappointed in the military life, he returned to his classical studies. After becoming a friend of Don Juan BOSCO, founder of the Salesians, he reentered the seminary; he was ordained on Sept. 11, 1868. He received the degree of doctor in fine arts in Turin, and in 1875 went to America with the first Salesian expedition to Argentina. A year later he was director of the first Salesian school in America, established in San Nicolás de los Arroyos, Buenos Aires. Persuaded by Don Bosco, he went to Patagonia in 1880 and started his evangelistic work. He enlisted in General Villega's army, while it was fighting the natives, toward whose pacification and conversion he worked. He was a parish priest in Patagonia in 1860 and in the course of his apostolic work built two schools, the first hospital, and a metereological observatory; he also established a school and a church in Viedma. In 1883 the Holy See named him apostolic delegate to southern Patagonia. He played an important role in the pacification of the natives and built a school and an oratory in Punta Arenas, Tierra del Fuego. He accompanied Ramón Lista's expedition of 1886 and inspected the lake that today bears his name; he carried livestock to Willes Bay and on horseback explored Dawson's Island, supporting in his correspondence the Argentine's right to rule the Falkland Islands. Fagnano died loved and understood by the natives.

Bibliography: R. A. ENTRAIGAS, Monseñor Fagnano (Buenos Aires 1945).

[V. O. CUTOLO]

FAITH

As understood in this article, faith means belief in God and acceptance of His revelation as true. The concept of faith will be treated as it is seen in the Bible, in patristic tradition and the teaching of the Church, and in dogmatic theology.

IN THE BIBLE

For the inspired authors of the Sacred Scriptures, faith is indeed an act of the intellect assenting to revealed truth; but since God's revelation in the Bible is often concerned with the future, that is, since the object of divine revelation is frequently God's promises to Israel, biblical faith is often a belief in God's fidelity to His promises and therefore confidentia (confidence, trust) as well as fides (faith, belief). This can be seen by examining the writings of the older books of the OT, the writings of Judaism, i.e., of the Jews in the last few centuries B.C. and the first Christian century, and finally the writings of the NT.

In the older books of the Old Testament. In these inspired writings, faith plays a very important preparatory role in the SALVATION HISTORY of mankind. At sundry times, God spoke to His chosen people of the OT and demanded of them faith in His word. God thus surpassed the barriers of the natural order and drew aside the veil disclosing the supernatural order of life and truth in Him. Various divinely revealed truths formed a part of Israelite faith and were considered as guiding principles for religious and spiritual conduct. Such truths were, e.g., the existence of one God, the election of Israel as God's chosen people, God's special covenant with Israel, and Israel's ultimate messianic salvation.

Terminology. The most common Hebrew root employed to express Israel's faith in God is 'mn, of which the basic meaning is firmness, certainty, reliability, and trustworthiness. From this root are derived the adjective 'ēmûn (faithful: 2 Sm 20.19; trustworthy: Prv 13.17), the nouns 'ĕmûnâ [steadiness: Ex 17.12; security: Ps 36(37).3; fidelity, faithfulness: 1 Sm 26.23; Hb 2.4, and often predicated of God, as in Dt 32.4; Ps 35(36).6; etc.] and 'ĕmet, for original 'ement [trustworthiness: Ex 18.21; Jos 2.12; constancy, fidelity, faithfulness: Gn 24.27, 49; Is 38.18-19; Ps 24(25).10; 39(40).11-12; etc.; truth, reality: Dt 22.20; Jer 9.4; Is 59.14-15], and the adverb 'āmēn (AMEN or surely, in an assent to something said: Nm 5.22; Dt 27.15–26; Jer. 11.5). As a verb this root is used only in the reflexive (niphal) form ne'man (to prove faithful, reliable, true, etc.: Gn 42.20; Dt 7.9; 1 Sm 25.28; etc.) and in the causative (hiphil) form he'ĕmîn (to hold as trustworthy, to trust, to believe: Gn 15.6; 45.26; Dt 9.23; etc.).

Since Israel's faith was closely connected with the idea of trust in Yahweh, another verb, when used with God as the object, that implicitly connotes faith is bāțah (to feel secure, to rely, to trust: Dt 28.52; Is 31.1; etc.), with its corresponding noun bețah (security, trust: Is 32.17; Jgs 8.11), which is used mostly as an adverb (securely, confidently: Dt 33.28; Prv 10.9; etc.). A similar verb that may connote the idea of faith is hāsâ (to seek refuge, to trust: Dt 32.37; Jgs 9.15). Furthermore, since the Israelite's attitude of faith often looked to the future, Hebrew verbs meaning to hope were used (especially in the later OT writings) with a connotation of faith, such as $q\bar{a}w\hat{a}$ or $qiww\bar{e}h$ (e.g., Gn 49.18; Is 40.31; 49.23), $yih\bar{e}l$ [e.g., Ps 30(31).25; 32(33).22], $hikk\bar{e}h$ (e.g., Is 8.17; 30.18), all of which, with God as the object, signify to wait for Him with confidence, to hope in Him, and therefore, implicitly, to believe in His promises.

Characteristics of Old Testament Faith. The Israelite concept of faith came to denote the peculiar relationship existing between God and Israel, especially the bond of the covenant between them. The faith of Israel was a particular form of life of a people chosen by Him and standing in an active relationship with Him. The Israelite's relationship to God that is designated by the verb he'ĕmîn (to believe) often implied an assent of the mind, confidence in the heart, and obedience in the will. Abraham, for instance, who was still childless in his old age, believed without wavering in the Lord's promise that He would give him numerous descendants, and this faith of his was accredited to him as a meritorious deed (Gn 15.6—a passage that is often quoted, to show what true faith is, in Rom 4.3; Gal 3.6; Jas 2.23). Isaiah warned the Israelites that without faith in Yahweh they would not survive (Is 7.9; 28.16). According to Habakkuk, "the just man, because of his faith, shall live'' (ab 2.4)-another favorite quotation on faith in the NT (Rom 1.17; Gal 3.11; Heb 10.38). The necessity of faith is seen also in those OT passages that tell of how God's people at times rebelled and refused to believe in Him, so that God had to chastise them for their lack of faith (Nm 14.1-12; Dt 1.26-46; 9.22-24).

Israel's ideal attitude toward God is often described by the term yir'at yhwh (Is 11.2–3; Prv 1.7, 29; etc.), traditionally rendered as "the fear of the Lord," although it means rather reverence for Yahweh, the standing in awe of Him, and therefore obeying His word on faith (e.g., Gn 22.12; Dt 6.2; Jos 22.25; etc.), as is clear, e.g., from Ex 14.31: "They feared the Lord and believed in Him." It is a faith that inspires confidence, which forms the theme of many of the Psalms [e.g., Ps 33(34).5–11; 39(40).2–6; 55(56).4–5, 12].

In the OT, to believe in God means to recognize and acknowledge the relationship that God has entered into with Israel. This reciprocal relationship that comes from Israel's encounter with God is of the essence of Israelite faith. God is the originator of the covenant relationship, and the stipulations of the covenant are His commandments (Dt 5.1–4). Faith, then, means the acknowledgment of God's commands and implies obedience on the part of man. Faith, too, expresses the acknowledgment of God's promises and His power to fulfill them [Ex 4.1, 5, 8–9, 30; Ps 105(106).12, 24].

In the OT, therefore, faith in God includes the whole relationship that exists between God and man. It has for its object God's omnipotence, His purpose in choosing His people, His love for them, His constancy and fidelity, and the fulfillment of His promises. Not to believe in God means to become an apostate [Ex 14.31; 19.9; Nm 14.11; Dt 1.32; 32.20; Ps 77(78).22]. Faith thus sums up all the ways by which men express in their lives their relationship to God. According to Isaiah, faith denotes a special form of existence for those who depend on God alone (Is 7.9). The chosen people of God have their particular manner of life and are established through their faith (Is 28.14–16; 30.15). For Israel, faith is the only possible mode of existence; all other attitudes in independence of God or all obligations toward anyone else than God are excluded; God alone, His plan and His will, together with the proper attitude of man, are the only important factors.

In Judaism. In the last few centuries B.C. and in the first Christian century, the ancient OT heritage of faith was taken over, with its leading ideas retained, by both the Palestinian and the Hellenistic Jews. The faith of the Jews was closely related to their past history and thus included the idea of loyalty or fidelity. It was related also to the future in the sense that God would certainly fulfill His promises, which now took on strongly messianic and eschatological overtones. But their faith in God was concerned especially with the present, inasmuch as Israel was called upon to obey God's commandments and remain faithful to His covenant. Faith in God tended, therefore, to determine every aspect of their lives.

The writings of this period show the stress that the Jews put on faith in God. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses were signaled out as models and exemplars of faith and obedience (Sir 44.19-23; 1 Mc 5.52; Jdt 8.22-29; Jubilees 6.19; 18.1-19; 21.2; Psalms of Solomon 16.14). Abraham's descendants were distinguished from the godless and impious by reason of their fidelity (Wis 3.9; Sibylline Oracles 5.158, 426; Enoch 46.8; 4 Ezr 7.131). It was stated that to know God is complete justice, and to know His power is the root of immortality (Wis 15.3; see also Enoch 46.8; 4 Ezr 7.131; Apocalypse of Baruch 54.21). In the rabbinical writings, faith was often characterized as obedience to the Law rather than as loyalty to God whose saving acts were experienced in the past or as confidence in Him whom they were called upon to trust in the future. The individual was conscious of the fact that he belonged to God's chosen people and that salvation would be bestowed on the faithful and pious (Syriac Baruch 54.5; 57.22; 2 Ezr 7.24). Other characteristics of faith that were expressed were its simplicity (Wis 1.1), its ultimate victory (2 Ezr 7.34), and its ability to preserve the faithful amid adversity (2 Mc 15.24; 16.22; 17.2).

According to Flavius JOSEPHUS, faith in divine providence meant trust in God (Ant. 4.60; Ap. 2.170). For PHILO JUDAEUS, faith was understood within the framework of Hellenistic Judaism; faith meant belief in one God and trust in His providence (Op. Mund. 170-172; Virt. 216). Philo viewed it as both confidence in God's help and belief in His promises (Sacr. Ac. 70; Vit. Mos. 1.225; 2.259; Leg. All. 3.308; Mut. Nom. 166; Abr. 275). He understood faith also as a turning away from the world of birth and death and a turning toward God who is eternal, whereby man finds that security which he is seeking. "To trust God is a true teaching, but to trust our vain reasonings is a lie" (Leg. All. 229). "He who has sincerely believed in God has learned to disbelieve in all else, all that is created only to perish" (Praem. Poen. 28.30). "Turning to God is an attitude of the mind" (Conf. Ling. 31) and "the most perfect of virtues" (Rer. Div. Her. 96; Virt. 216; Abr. 270). It is no small task to attain this (Rer. Div. Her. 93); it is a prize that Abraham acquired (Migr. Abr. 44); it is associated with the virtue of piety (Migr. Abr. 44); and it is the best sacrifice to be offered to God (Cher. 85), who is the best possible truth and the most certain good.

In the New Testament. Here faith is intimately connected with salvation history. To believe in Christ means to accept and have faith in the events of His life, death, Resurrection, and Ascension. It is to believe, not only that these events really took place, but, what is more important, to believe in the significance of these events for man's salvation. These truths were preached by the Apostles and disciples of Christ to men and women of all nations, who were called upon to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. As a result, in the design of God, a personal relationship came to exist between Christ and His followers. This relationship or attitude of mind is analogous to that which God unfolded in the OT with respect to His chosen people, where faith in God was often expressed in terms of loyalty, trust, and obedience. In the NT, faith means the acceptance and acknowledgment of Christ's existence here and now, as well as the submission of man's mind and will to Him as the cause of Redemption and eternal beatitude.

The LXX had already used the noun $\pi i\sigma \tau \iota \varsigma$ (faith) and the verb $\pi \iota \sigma \tau \epsilon \circ \epsilon \iota v$ (to believe) to translate the corresponding Hebrew words; the NT continued to use these words in the same way, but here they occur more frequently than they do in the OT. Classical Greek seldom employed these terms in a religious sense, except to indicate a belief in the existence of the gods. In the NT, to believe means to rely on, to trust, or simply to have faith (Mk 13.21; Jn 4.21; Acts 27.25; Rom 4.17). The noun faith can mean loyalty or trust as well as belief (1 Thes 1.8; PhIm 6; Heb 6.1), just as the adjective $\pi \iota \sigma \tau \circ \varsigma$ (faithful) can mean loyal or trustworthy as well as believing (Mt 25.21, 23; Lk 16.10–11; 1 Tm 3.2; 3 Jn 5; Rv 2.10, 13).

In the Synoptic Gospels and Acts. In the first three Gospels faith often signifies confidence rather than intellectual assent. The faith, for instance, that Christ demanded before performing a miracle was belief in His power and confidence in His goodness (Mk 5.24, 26; 9.23–24). Such is the faith that He rebuked His disciple for lacking (Mt 6.30; 8.26; Mk 4.40; Lk 8.25) the faith that He praised in the centurion of Capharnaum (Mt 8.1). This kind of faith is able to work miracles (Mt 17.20; 21.21; Mk 9.23; Lk 17.6), and the lack of it prevents their performance (Mt 13.58; 17.20; Mk 6.5).

God is the primary object of faith (Mk 11.22–23; Mt 1.22); but faith in Him is intimately related to the mission of His Son in whom God is revealed (Mt 12.28). Thus, faith also in Jesus as the MESSIAH and SON OF GOD is necessary. Belief in Jesus as the Christ and Son of God became the outstanding characteristic of the early Christians, who were called simply "the believers" (Acts 2.44; 4.32). Those who hoped to be cured by Jesus acknowledged His power and special relationship to God; they proclaimed Him the Son of God, at least in a broad sense (Mt 8.29; 14.33; Mk 1.24; 3.11; 5.7). Even demoniacs and unclean spirits called Him the Son of God or Messiah (Lk 4.41).

Faith is a free act on the part of man; i.e., it is within man's power to believe and be saved or not to believe and be judged and condemned (Mk 16.15–16). On the first Christian Pentecost, many people believed the gospel and "accepted the faith" (Acts 2.41, 44; 6.7). Peter reminded the Jews that they must firmly believe in the divinity of Christ and His mission on God's word, which is more certain than human eyewitness, for God's testimony is greater than that of man (see also 2 Pt 1.16–18).

On occasion, Jesus asked His disciples to acknowledge Him, i.e., to express their belief in His messiahship (Mt 10.32-33; Mk 8.38). Faith in Christ means the remission of sins (Mk 2.5; Lk 7.48-50; Acts 10.43; 26.18); it is a necessary condition for salvation (Acts 4.12; 16.31; 11.17; 15.7–11). Faith in God or in the words of God was sometimes demanded because of His written testimony in the Law and the Prophets (Lk 1.20, 45; Acts 24.14; 26.27; 27.25). Jesus insisted that the testimony of John the Baptist must be accepted and believed as well (Mk 11.31; Mt 21.32). As in the OT, faith in God meant an encounter with God, so also in the NT, to believe in Christ or "have faith" in Him means for the Christian to encounter God through Jesus Christ His Son. Even the enemies of Jesus who stood by His cross understood this truth, though they would not accept it (Mt 27.42). Christian converts believed the same (Acts 9.42; 16.31, 34; 18.8), and above all others, St. Paul himself (Acts 22.19).

In the Pauline Epistles. One of the most strongly stressed teachings in the Epistles of St. Paul is the necessity of faith in Christ for salvation-a firm, personal faith that leads a man to receive Baptism and thereby become incorporated into Christ. For Paul, the process of the faith consists in preaching, hearing, accepting, and understanding the gospel, which is the word of God. The faith preached by Paul was proclaimed all over the world (Rom 1.8; 10.17; 1 Cor 2.5; 15.1; 2 Thes 1.3, 5). In the language of Paul, to believe means to become a Christian (1 Cor 1.21; 3.5; 14.22; 15.2-3). While preaching is the contributing cause, faith is really effected by the Spirit of God (1 Cor 2.4–5; 1 Thes 1.4–5). Faith is a free gift of God, and man therefore needs the grace of God if he is to be saved (Eph 2.8). To believe in Christ is to suffer with Him (Phil 1.29); it is the breastplate of the soldier of Christ (1 Thes 5.8) and a shield against all evil (Eph 6.16).

The one true God is the object of faith (1 Thes 1.8–9). Christ as man leads man to the knowledge of God, but Christ as God is the goal of the Christian's life (Rom 10.8–9; Gal 2.16; 1 Cor 3.22–23; 15.24, 28; Phlm 5). The motive for believing God is the testimony of God Himself (Rom 4.3, 23–24; 1 Thes 2.13). There is only one true faith (Eph 4.5), to be defended against false teachers (1 Tm 6.12; 2 Tm 4.7), and one must be ready and willing to die for it (Phil 1.27–30).

Faith in God means the Christian's conviction that God has been and always will be faithful to His promises, which He is all-powerful to fulfill. Therefore, the Christian believes that, since God has loved man and sent His Son into the world to redeem man by His sacrifice on the cross, God will raise the Christian from the dead as He has raised Christ from the dead (Rom 3.25; 4.3–25; 2 Cor 1.9; Gal 3.6; 1 Thes 1.8–9) and that Christ will return at the end of the world to judge the living and the dead (Rom 10.9; 1 Cor 15.1–14; 1 Thes 1.10; 4.14; 5.9–10). Faith is, therefore, first of all an act of man's intellect whereby he freely submits to the authority of God and confesses, at least implicitly, the truth of His divine testimonies (Rom 1.17; Gal 3.11; 1 Thes 2.13).

As an act of the will, faith demands that the Christian make his conduct conform with the teachings of the gospel; in this sense St. Paul often speaks of "obedience to the gospel" (Rom 1.5; 10.16; 2 Cor 10.5; 2 Thes 1.8). Christians are called upon to remain firmly grounded in the faith and to persevere in it (Rom 11.20; 1 Cor 15.2; 16.13; 2 Cor 1.23–24; 13.5; Col 1.23; 2.7; 1 Tm 2.15). Their faith must be a living one, of which Paul himself was a model (Gal 2.20; Ti 3.8; 1 Tm 5.8). It must be guarded and protected (Rom 12.3; 11.20–22; 1 Cor 2.14; 2 Cor 6.14–15; 1 Tm 1.19; 6.10). Faith can also be developed and perfected (Rom 10.10; 11.20–22; 2 Cor 10.15; Eph 4.13; Phil 1.25; 2 Thes 1.3).

Faith is closely related to hope and confidence: "For we in the Spirit wait for the hope of justice in virtue of faith" (Gal 5.5; see also Rom 4.20; 5.1–2; 1 Thes 1.3; 5.8; 1 Cor 13.13); and as one of the charismatic gifts (1 Cor 12.9; 2 Cor 8.7; see CHARISM), faith inspires such confidence as to move mountains and perform miracles (1 Cor 13.2; cf. Mk 11.23). But faith also operates through charity and love (Gal 5.6, 22–23; 6.8–10). Together with hope and charity, faith is one of the triad of virtues that have lasting value on earth and are the means whereby eternal happiness is attained (Rom 10.13–15). However, along with hope, it will give way to the direct vision of God in the future life, where charity alone endures forever (1 Cor 13.13; 2 Cor 5.7).

Since Christ by His death and Resurrection reconciled man with God and effected man's REDEMPTION, faith in Christ and His redemptive work continues to reconcile sinners with God and obtain the forgiveness of their sins (Rom 3.25; 1 Cor 15.17). It is by faith, and not by the works of the Law, that man becomes just and holy in the sight of God (Rom 1.17; 3.28; 4.3; Gal 3.5–6; See JUSTIFICATION). Faith, therefore, is the determining element of the Christian life and the characteristic mark of Christian unity (Rom 3.22; Gal 3.7).

In the Epistle to the Hebrews. Faith is defined in Heb 11.1 as "the substance of things to be hoped for, the evidence of things that are not seen." These words are commonly understood in the sense that faith gives the Christian the assurance ($\vartheta \pi \delta \sigma \tau \alpha \sigma \iota \varsigma$) that his spiritual hopes will find fulfillment and the conviction ($\xi_{\gamma} \varepsilon_{\gamma} \chi_{0} \zeta_{\gamma}$) that the divine revelations that surpass knowledge derived from the senses are true. Faith, therefore, is the acceptance of God's word concerning both His promises and the truths He has revealed. The patriarchs and heroes of the OT, by their sufferings and even martyrdom, were exemplars of this faith that rests on God's word (Heb ch. 11). Faith gave them the power and strength to bear adversity patiently. Faith enabled them, as it enables Christians, to grasp the fact that heavenly realities were created by God (Heb 11.3); without faith it is impossible to please God, and he who desires to come to Him must believe that He exists and is the rewarder of the just (11.6).

Faith is also an act of the will, as manifested by the exemplary obedience of those who were renowned for their good deeds and virtuous conduct (11.4–39). "Fullness of faith" provides the Christian with assurance of obtaining divine mercy and grace and to believe with unshaken confidence and perfect tranquility that heaven itself will ultimately be possessed (4.16; 10.22–23). Confidence ($\pi\alpha\rho\rho\eta\sigma(\alpha)$, which has a great reward, must not be lost; it is the source of supernatural life in God (10.35–38). Faith, therefore, inspires and stimulates Christians to orient their whole lives toward Jesus Christ, who is "the author and finisher of faith" (12.2).

In the Johannine Writings. Faith is a central theme in the writings of St. John. Although the noun "faith" occurs only a few times (1 Jn 5.4; Rv 2.13), the verb "to believe" is found frequently. According to St. John, believing is not only an act of the mind, assenting to revealed truths; it is also an act of man's free will. Yet, while man's moral disposition plays a role here, faith is a gift of God (Jn 6.37, 39, 64; 8.47; 1 Jn 4.6; 5.1), for no one can come to the Son unless the Father draws him (Jn 6.44).

In a few instances, according to John, the object of faith is God (Jn 5.24; 12.44; 1 Jn 5.10), but more often it is Christ. To believe in Jesus means to accept Him as the Messiah (1 Jn 5.1); He was sent by the Father (Jn 8.28-29; 11.42; 16.27-30; 17.20-21), and He is the Son of God (3.16, 36; 6.40; 17.27; 20.31). Jesus said to Philip, "Do you not believe that I am in the Father and the Father in me?" (14.10–11). For John, Christ is the one mediator between God and man; He is the "light that has come into the world" (12.46), "the life" whereby everyone lives (11.25-26), and the Savior of the world (4.42; 1 Jn 4.14). Through and by faith the whole man is united to Christ; "to believe in Christ" (Jn 3.21; 6.35, 37, 44–45) means to live His life (1 Jn 5.10-12) and to partake of Him as food and drink (Jn 6.35, 50). Faith motivated by charity consists in observing Christ's commandments (1 Jn 2.3–5; 5.3; Jn 8.31, 51; 14.21–23); to believe in Him means to acknowledge and obey Him (Jn 6.69; 10.38; 16.30; 17, 7–8; 1 Jn 4.16). On the other hand, lack of faith in Him is sinful (Jn 16.9; 8.21, 24; 9.41; 15.22-24) and leads to death and eternal damnation (3.18, 36; 5.24, 29). Through faith we become sons of God (1.12; 1 Jn 3.1-2)and heirs of the kingdom of heaven (Jn 3.15–16, 36; 5.24; 6.40, 50; 8.51; 11.25-26). He who believes enjoys a foretaste of everlasting life even here on earth (3.18, 36; 5.24), and Christ, who is the resurrection and the life, will raise up on the last day (5.26; 6.39-40; 11.25).

The faith demanded of a Christian is inspired by the many miracles wrought by Christ in confirmation of His divine origin and mission (2.11; 4.53; 5.36; 9.33; 10.25–38; 11.42; 14.11; 15.24). Faith in Him springs also from His preaching, His predictions, and their fulfillment (2.22; 13.19; 14.29). Moreover, the justification of Christ's claims is attested by God the Father, John the Baptist, and the Scriptures (4.41–42; 5.24; 6.68–69; 17.8, 20; 1 Jn 5.10). Yet Christ Himself says that faith based on His word as preached by His Apostles is better than that inspired by the sight of His miracles (20.29; see also

2.23–24; 4.48). On the part of the believer, good works favor the acceptance of faith (3.21), whereas evil deeds, such as spring from pride and hypocrisy, hinder its reception and operation (3.19–20; 8.44; 5.44; 9.41; 12.42–43).

Finally, in the Revelation to St. John, Christ appears as the faithful witness of God's revelations (Rv 1.5: 19.11); He is the "Amen" (3.14; 19.4), i.e., the affirmation that God's words are trustworthy (21.5). Christians who do not "disown the faith" (2.13) are united faithfully with Christ, the Lamb of God. If they have "the patience of the saints," keep God's commandments, "have the faith of Jesus," and "suffer and accept suffering as Christ did" (2.10–13; 13.10; 14.12), Christ Himself will be their eternal reward (22.20).

Bibliography: P. ANTOINE, Dictionnaire de la Bible suppl. ed. L. PIROT (Paris 1928-) 3:276-310. R. SCHNACKENBURG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 4:913-917. F. BAUMGÄRTEL and H. BRAUN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 2:1588-97. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adapt. L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 744-750. A. GELIN, "La Foi dans l'A.T.," Lumen Vitae 22 (1955) 432-442. J. DUPLACY, "La Foi dans le Judaisme," ibid. 443-468. P. BENOIT, "La Foi dans les évangiles synoptiques," ibid. 469-488. M. BOISMARD, "La Foi selon Saint Paul," ibid. 489-514. P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56) 2:101–103. R. BULTMANN and A. WEISER, Faith, tr. D. M. BARTON, in G. KITTEL, Bible Key Words, v. 10 (London 1961) 1-33. P. HEINISCH, Theology of the O.T., tr. W. G. HEIDT (Collegeville, Minn. 1955) 43-48. P. MICHALON, "La Foi, rencontre de Dieu et engagement envers Dieu, selon l'A.T.," Nouvelle revue théologique 75 (1953) 587-600. J. LEBRETON, La Vie et l'enseignement de Jésus Christ, 2 v. (16th ed. Paris 1947) 2:471-490. J. BONSIRVEN, L'Évangile de saint Paul (Paris 1948) 177-185, 198-212; The Theology of the N.T., tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963). J. HUBY, "De la connaissance de foi dans St. Jean," Recherches de science religieuse 21 (1931) 385-421.

[C. H. PICKAR]

PATRISTIC TRADITION AND TEACHING OF THE CHURCH

Faith in the writings of the Fathers of the Church and in the official magisterium of the Church is treated next, and it is followed by the theological analysis of faith.

Patristic tradition. The Fathers of the Church were more concerned with the content of faith, the gospel of salvation, than with reflective analysis of the act itself. But this very concern with the content of the gospel determined their view of faith: the unwavering assent to the full, correct message of salvation as delivered by the Apostles and their authentic successors (cf. Irenaeus, Proof of the Apostolic Preaching 3, ed. S. Weber, Freiburg 1917; Basil, Moralia 80.22, Patrologia Graeca 31:867–868). However, two parallel ideas contributed to a deepening theology of faith. In one, the apologete, explaining Christianity to an unbelieving world, insists that the gospel is accepted not out of credulity, but out of a reasonable and free commitment. Thus St. Justin (d. 165) devotes lengthy treatises to exposing the reasonableness of such commitment, especially in view of the patent fulfillment of prophecies [see PROPHECY (THEOLOGY OF)]. Clement of Alexandria (c. 150-215), living in the intellectual capital of the world, head of the first Christian school, advocates philosophy as a useful preparation for faith and proposes Christ as the "Teacher." At the same time, he inaugurates a thesis that becomes a commonplace with the Fathers, especially Augustine. He quotes the Septuagint version of Is 7.9, "unless you believe you will not understand," and notes that since belief precedes understanding even in natural education, it is fitting that knowledge of God should begin with humble acceptance of His revelation [Stromata 2.1-6, ed. T. Camelot and C. Mondésert, Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. de Lubac (Paris 1941—) 38]. Thus Christian faith is considered a reasonable, free act of commitment and acknowledgment. A second strain in patristic writing refers to faith as a gift of divine illumination. This stems from the sacramental liturgy, which even in its inception seems to have called Baptism "illumination" (e.g., Eph 5.14; Heb 6.4) and is often found in sermons explaining the baptismal creed (e.g., Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechesis 5, Patrologia Graeca 33:505–524). Faith is not merely a natural prudential assent to the highly probable but a special gift of God whereby men are enlightened and share in the divine knowledge [cf. Justin, Dialogue with Trypho 7, ed. G. Archambault (Paris 1909); Clement of Alexandria, Stromata 2.4]. Expressions like "eye of faith" or "light of God penetrating our soul" are common. Faith is not a leap in the dark, but a leap through the dark into light. It is, in fact, a refashioning of human intelligence to the Divine Wisdom and Word, Jesus Christ (Cyril of Alexandria, Commentary on Isaia 5.1, Patrologia Graeca 70:1188).

Both currents flow into the theology of Augustine. Deceived by the "presumptuous promises of reason" offered by the Manicheans, he learns that humble belief must precede knowledge. Yet, belief is reasonable and appropriate, for it is the intelligent acceptance of the report of a reliable witness, Christ, perfect Wisdom. His treatises in defense of the reasonableness and necessity of belief [e.g., On Faith in Things Unseen, ed. F. McDonald (Washington 1950); On the Utility of Believing, ed. J. Zycha, Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 25:1] are complemented by the profound appreciation of the gift of divine illumination and inspiration expressed in the homilies on the writings of St. John [Tractate on Gospel of St. John 26.2-7, ed. R. Willems; Corpus Christianorum 36; On the First Epistle of St. John 3.13, ed. P. Agaësse, Sources Chrétiennes, ed. H. de Lubac (Paris 1941—) 75]. Faith or belief, made perfect by love, grows into "luminous understanding" of divine truth.

Augustine bequeathed to subsequent theologians a terse definition of faith: "To believe is to think with assent" (On the Predestination of Saints 2.5, Patrologia latina 44: 962). Medieval theologians utilized this definition within the framework of Aristotelian psychology. These efforts were summed up and perfected by St. Thomas Aquinas, whose theology of faith will be incorporated in a subsequent portion of this essay (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 1–4; De ver. 14).

Teaching of the Church. The first official teaching on faith was issued by the Second Council of Orange in 529, and defined against the Semi-Pelagians that faith, although a free act, resulted, even in its beginnings, from the GRACE of God, illumining man's mind (cc. 5-7, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 375-377) (see SEMI-PELAGIANISM). The teaching of Trent is better dealt with elsewhere (see JUSTIFICATION). It is sufficient to note that this council makes it clear that the reformers' interpretation of faith primarily as trust in God's mercy and forgiveness departs from the traditional emphasis. Rather believers, "awakened and assisted by divine grace, conceive faith from hearing, and they are freely led to God. They believe that the divine revelation and promises are true, especially that the unjustified man is justified by God's grace" (Session VI, ch. 6; H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1512).

Vatican I. The most important and complete doctrinal statement on faith was issued by the Vatican Council I. This constitution De Fide Catholica was proposed as a remedy for two serious errors that had infected theology during the first half of the 19th century (see SEMIRATION-ALISM; FIDEISM). The constitution must be read with these errors in mind. It was intended to correct the perspective that they had distorted; it was not an attempt to gather all the elements involved in faith into a perfectly balanced, complete synthesis. The first two chapters of this constitution affirm the existence of God and His selfrevelation to men: first in His creation, then in the word that He spoke "in former days by the prophets, and in these days by his Son'' (Heb 1.1). The fathers then state that created reason owes to this revelation of Uncreated Truth the complete homage of intellect and will by faith, (see REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF). Faith is then defined: "faith, which is 'the beginning of salvation,' the Catholic Church holds to be a supernatural virtue. By it, with the inspiration and help of God's grace, we believe that what He has revealed is true, not because of its intrinsic truth seen by the natural light of reason, but because of the authority of God revealing it, who can neither deceive nor be deceived" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3008).

Reason and Faith. The intention of the council was to distinguish clearly two orders of knowledge: natural knowledge called ratio, and supernatural knowledge called fides. This distinction is made first in terms of the source of knowledge or object of the mind: natural reason grasps truth by seeing the intrinsic evidence of things; faith does so in virtue of the authority of God revealing. This is the first definitive statement: faith is an act of real knowledge, but of an order essentially distinct from reason. The phrase "authority of God revealing" is expanded only by the words "who can neither deceive nor be deceived." This addition makes explicit the point that "authority" does not simply involve the submission of will to power in obedience, but more fully a submission of intellect to an infallible and omniscient witness. Thus the authority of God revealing is in some way a manifestation of His knowledge and veracity.

Second, the council distinguishes the two orders of knowledge by clearly indicating that faith is supernatural, that is, the virtue of faith and its acts are possible for man only by the grace of God. No one, it states forcibly (quoting the Second Council of Orange), "can consent to the gospel preaching, in the way he must to be saved, without the illumination of the Holy Spirit" (ibid. 3010). Clearly this faith is in the fullest sense a gift of God, not possessed unless given.

This insistence on the essential element of divine grace has three important consequences: (1) The acceptance of the authority of God revealing takes place only by illumination of the intellect by the Holy Spirit. This acceptance is not essentially the work of reason preceding the act of faith, but the work of grace within the very act itself. (2) The faith here spoken of is not only that faith which is informed with charity but "faith in itself," that is, the act of assent that can exist without sanctifying grace. Thus, even if faith is "dead," it is the result of actual grace. (3) The effect of grace is proportioned to the powers informed: intellect is illumined and will is attracted to the good. It seems then that one can say that grace is so necessary to this act that no miracle alone, not even a resurrection from the dead, can convince and complete belief [see MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF)]. If grace is lacking, the act of faith is not simply less certain or less easy; it is simply impossible. Divine grace does not merely make salutary a natural act of belief; it provides the very intrinsic possibility for faith.

Role of Reason. After such a drastic distinction between faith and reason in terms of object and ability, the fathers of the council might seem to be hard pressed to find any place for reason at all. But they do not hesitate to affirm that this faith, although distinct from reason, is still an intellectual act and that reason has a most important role in the preparation of our minds for faith. They are very realistic in saying this, for God has in fact willed to join to the internal aid of the Holy Spirit certain arguments and signs. These signs—the events of sacred history, miracle, prophecy, the marvelous figure of the living Church—all exist in the natural, visible order. They are open to the scrutiny of man's mind, and study of them will reveal the manifest work of God (ibid. 3010).

But even granting that God has provided such external signs of His revelation, what role can they possibly play in an act so utterly under the causality of God's action? The council does not dwell on this problem. It merely states that reason can render revelation credible (see FAITH AND REASON).

Summary. The principal elements of this dogmatic statement are (1) faith is an act of knowledge of an essentially different order from natural knowledge; (2) the distinction is one of nature and supernature; faith has as its formal object the authority of God revealing and can be made only with the aid of grace; (3) despite this distinction, faith and reason are in accord and, in fact, cooperate in the human act of response to revelation; (4) since faith is not the inevitable and mathematically unavoidable result of arguments, but due to concurrence and cooperation with grace, faith is a free act; (5) since reasons do not induce supernatural faith as its essential cause, a fortiori no reason is sufficient to induce infidelity; (6) faith is necessary for all men to be saved.

See Also: ANALOGY OF FAITH; APOLOGETICS; CERTITUDE OF FAITH; FAITH AND REASON; GÜNTHER, ANTON; HERMES, GEORG; HERMESIANISM; MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY); PREAMBLES OF FAITH.

Bibliography: R. AUBERT, Le Problème de l'acte de foi (3d ed. Louvain 1958). H. BARS, The Assent of Faith, tr. R. HALSTEAD (Baltimore, Md. 1960). G. BRUNHES, Faith and Its Rational Justification, tr. W. A. SPENCE (St. Louis, Mo. 1931). G. DE BROGLIE, "The Preambles of Faith," Theologie und Glaube 7 (1959) 47–52. H. F. DAVIS, "The Act of Faith: A Comparative View of Catholic and Protestant Theology," ibid. 1 (1953) 119–122. J. MOUROUX, I Believe, tr. M. TURNER (London 1959). P. A. LIÉGÉ, Catholicisme 4: 1370–97. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50), Tables générales (1951) 1537–71. R. SCHNACK-ENBURG et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:913–931. C. H. RATSCHOW, et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1586–1611.

[A. R. JONSEN]

THEOLOGY OF FAITH

The 20th century witnessed a move away from what some theologians regarded as an overly intellectual view of faith, according to which faith tended to be regarded as simply identical to the propositional content of the Church's dogmas. Theologians using the tools of personalist philosophy objected to a primarily intellectual description of faith. The Second Vatican Council, reiterating the doctrine of Vatican I, emphasized that faith is a response of the whole person to God's free revelation (Dei Verbum 5). It also suggested that the lack of such a full response was one of the causes of the birth of modern atheism (Gaudium et spes 19). After the council, the theologies of liberation made a more direct challenge to the classical account of faith, objecting that it did not take account of the social aspect of faith. For a description of these developments in the late 20th century, see BELIEFS. The present article describes the form and act of faith.

From a semantic analysis of the Greek noun $\pi i \sigma \tau \iota \varsigma$ and the Latin equivalent fides, faith in general is to be described as a firm persuasion whereby a person assents to truths that are not seen and cannot be proved but are taken on trust in the reliability of another. This descriptive definition contains two elements: one intellectual, namely, the firm persuasion, and the other affective or fiducial, which is the commitment of oneself to the truthfulness and trustworthiness of a witness. Though the affective element in faith is often stressed more than the cognitive, it is the latter that really takes priority. $\pi\epsilon\iota\theta\omega$, in the passive voice, from which $\pi i \sigma \tau \iota \zeta$ is derived, primarily means, as does the Latin credere, "to be persuaded," which points to an act of the intellect assenting at the command of the will for moral rather than severely intellectual reasons. Furthermore, any act of believing implies the acceptance of something as the truth, and truth is the proper object of the intellect, even though the intellect may assent to it under the influence of the will.

This general notion applies by analogy to believing what men say and believing what God says. In human dealings, one often takes ordinary truths and facts on trust in the reliability of the testimony of another human being. Such faith is a dependable source of much human knowledge as well as a necessary foundation for human relationships, although the noetic value of scientific knowledge strictly so called, is admittedly greater. Divine faith is the fiducial assent to revealed truth given because of the authority of God, who can neither deceive nor be deceived. It is always an infused, supernatural, and essentially mysterious gift, and consequently it cannot be fully comprehended, although it is capable of analogical explanation, and indeed an explanation involving strict analogy and not merely literary metaphor. The psychological elements present in human faith can be applied proportionately to divine faith. Divine faith cannot exist as reserved to the strictly natural order, although it is possible to assent to divine and revealed truth for merely natural and human reasons, but acquired and natural faith of this kind is not formally, but only materially, divine, as would be the faith professed by a rationalist or a formal heretic.

Specific concept of faith. A purely subjective explanation of the nature of faith based on a psychological analysis and phenomenological description of the act of believing is likely to lead, if the method is exclusive, to antidogmatic positions such as are implied by one or another of the following: (1) the purely affective commitment proposed since the time of Martin Luther by many Protestant writers who wished to dissociate themselves from the concept of faith-assent of Catholic theology; (2) a philosophical, rationalist concept of faith based on the criticism of I. Kant; (3) the semirationalist theory of faith proposed by G. HERMES and A. GÜNTHER and condemned by Vatican Council I; (4) the fideist concept of faith proposed by L. E. BAUTAIN, or the traditionalist concept of A. BONNETTY, both of which were also condemned by Vatican Council I; (5) the Modernist and immanentist concepts of faith; (6) the existentialist faith affirmed by S. KIERKEGAARD and Karl Barth.

Catholic tradition recognizes these subjective aspects of the theology of faith and of the act of believing. However, its concept of faith is primarily objective, looking more to who and what is believed.

Formal object of faith. Since faith as such is an assent to truth, divine faith is an assent to First Truth (Veritas Prima). This is its proper object. But three phases of truth can be distinguished: ontological truth, or veritas in essendo, which is identical with reality; logical truth, or veritas in cognoscendo, which is identical with intellectual knowledge; and moral truth, or veritas in dicendo, which is the conformity of the external locution to the known truth.

The formal object of Christian faith is God Himself, or First Truth in essendo, i.e., taken in the ontological sense. The formal object of any habit of knowledge is the particular aspect of the object that it primarily grasps and is the reason for all that it knows of the object. In the actual economy of salvation in which man is elevated to the supernatural order, the first thing that he knows supernaturally is God Himself, the First Truth in essendo, that is, God as He is in Himself, in His essence, His divinity, His innermost life, or briefly, to use the scholastic formula, Deus sub ratione deitatis. Although First Truth and the Deity as It is in Itself are abstract theological expressions of a kind that theologians often prefer to concrete ones because of their exactitude, they nevertheless mean God in the concrete, subsisting in three Divine Persons, as these, together with the sum of all divine perfections, have been revealed to man. Consequently God, the First Truth ontologically, is not only the First Truth believed (the primum credibile) but also the formal object of faith in all the truths and mysteries that have been revealed. For, as St. Thomas Aquinas pointed out, "nothing comes under faith except in relation to God'' (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 1.1). This is the common and constant doctrine of the Church. The first article of faith, with which in one form or another all the symbols begin and on which all the other articles are based, is: "I believe in God, One and Triune."

Formal motive of faith. The formal motive of faith is God Himself speaking, or First Truth in dicendo, as this connotes and implies First Truth in cognoscendo, or God's own knowing. Like faith itself, the motive of faith is complex and mysterious. Yet in its normal development two preparatory stages can be distinguished, each involving a cumulus of outer motives, before reaching the definite motive for the final assent of the act of believing. The initial dispositive motives, and these are normally indispensable, are to be found in the knowledge of divine revelation, both active and passive, acquired through the consideration of the preambles of faith and the evidences of credibility. This process is known as the resolutio apologetica of the motive of faith. In the second stage, also dispositive and normally necessary as preliminary to faith, one learns of the proposition of the revealed truths by the ordinary and solemn magisterium of the Church, which is the infallible rule of faith. This is known as the resolutio catholica of the motive. The magisterium, though an integral part of the situation for a Catholic, does not, according to a classical view from which St. Robert Bellarmine and others differ, form an essential component of the motive of faith; it does not decide why one believes, but rather why one's belief is committed to this credal statement rather than that: there is not, then, a specific virtue called "Catholic faith" distinct from "divine faith."

However, the ultimate and inner motive of faith is the authority of God Himself speaking, who can neither deceive nor be deceived, as was defined dogmatically by Vatican Council I (H. Denzinger, Enchridion symbolorum 3008, 3032). This is to be understood as distinct from the objective evidence on which natural, and even religious, knowledge of truth may be based. The dogmatic formula stating the proper and ultimate motive of divine faith agrees with the scholastic formula above, namely, that it is First Truth in dicendo, implying First Truth in cognoscendo. Thus faith is the firm assent at the command of the will and under the inward motion of God's grace to the saving truths and supernatural mysteries God has revealed, based on the infallible veracity of God's testimony, who cannot deceive (because He is infallibly true) nor be deceived (because He is omniscient). The teachings of the Scriptures are clear and emphatic on this matter. The revelation contained in the Bible carries with it the infallible guarantee of the veracity of the divine communication made to mankind through the patriarchs and Prophets of the Old Law and through Christ and His Apostles in the New. The infallible authority of this revelation is both preceptive, and consequently demands humble obedience, and also magisterial, and therefore demands a firm assent to all its teachings.

Integral object of faith. This includes all that God has revealed. Everything to which the formal motive of faith extends must be embraced by the integral object. The formal reason for believing is the authority of God, and this exists equally with respect to anything and everything that God has in fact revealed. "By divine and catholic faith, all those things must be believed which are contained in the written word of God and in tradition, and those which are proposed by the Church, either by way of solemn pronouncement or through the exercise of her ordinary and universal teaching power, to be believed as divinely revealed" (ibid. 3011).

[T. URDANOZ/EDS.]

Act of faith and its attributes. The theological treatment of the act of faith goes into the subjective and psychological aspects of faith to which reference was made above. St. Thomas analyzed the psychology of the act of faith with the help of St. Augustine's statement that to believe is to think (cogitare) with assent (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 2.1; In 3 Sent. 23.2.1; De ver. 14.1). St. Thomas's analysis must be seen against the background of opinion on the subject among his immediate predecessors, none of whom had dealt with the problem with a comparable precision.

Peter ABELARD (d. 1142) contented himself with contrasting faith with scientific knowledge: one has knowledge with respect to things he sees, but faith is an intellectual act concerned with things not seen. Other theologians understood Abelard to mean that faith was to be classified with mere opinion. Hugh of Saint-Victor (d. 1142) sought to supply the deficiency and defined faith as a kind of certitude of mind about absent things, stronger than opinion, but weaker than scientific knowledge. For him, the knowledge involved in faith constituted only its material element, the substance of faith consisting in the affective element of the firmness of belief (Patrologia Latina 176:35, 531). In this Hugh related faith to the other acts of the mind more broadly, and he made an effort to account for its certitude; but he made the mistake of identifying the act of faith with one of its properties. Alexander of Hales (d. 1245) used the definition of St. Augustine, but he isolated the term "assent" and understood the thought (cogitare) to apply to the judgment prior to belief. St. Albert the Great also used Augustine's definition, but he did not try to unite the thought and the assent into a single act. The consideration or thought, he held, was not essential to the act of faith itself. It consisted in the search for motives of credibility or in the mind's reflection upon the truth already assented to (St. Albert the Great, In 3 Sent 23.3). Like Hugh, Albert saw faith as an affective act because of the lack of evidence for the assent. Faith has knowledge as the material element and the affective act as the formal part.

St. Thomas's Analysis. Faced with this confusion of opinion, Thomas had these things to attempt: the clarification of the relation between faith and the other acts of the mind; a satisfactory explanation of the certitude of faith; a more precise definition of the interrelated roles of intellect and will in the act of faith; and a clear-cut distinction between the intellectual activity preceding the act of faith, that involved in the act itself, and that following upon the act. Substantially he proceeds as follows:

The object of faith is truth. From this it follows that the act of faith belongs to the intellect, and in order to understand its proper nature, one must see it as an intellectual operation. But an act of intellect will either be an act of simple apprehension or an act of composition or division, i.e., an act apprehending the agreement or disagreement between concepts. By simple apprehension, concepts are formed of the natures of things, e.g., man, animal. In this act there is per se neither truth nor falsity, just as there is neither truth nor falsity in simple, incomplex terms. But, as has been shown, the object of faith, per se and formally, is truth; and consequently faith cannot consist in simple apprehension, but must be an act of composition or division, or, in other words, an act of judgment.

Now with respect to a judgment, the intellect may be either determined or undetermined. If undetermined, the indetermination may be negative, in which case there is nescience, and there is neither assent nor thought. Or the indetermination may be positive, as in the case of doubt, in which there is thought without assent and the mind fluctuates between contradictory alternatives.

The intellect determined in its judgment is determined either objectively or subjectively. If it is objectively determined, the determination will be either absolute and total or partial and dependent on some sign or indication of truth. The determination is absolute and total in the case of immediate or intuitive knowledge, in which case there is assent without need of consideration or thought. But the determination is also absolute and total when the knowledge is mediate, as in a conclusion arrived at by demonstration, and in this case there is assent following upon thought. But the determination is partial and incomplete, on the other hand, when the evidence is partial and incomplete. If the evidence is but slight, there is suspicion; if it is weighty but inconclusive, there is opinion, and the mind is inclined to accept one rather than another of contradictory propositions. In these cases, there is at most a limited assent coupled with continued consideration, because the mind is not at rest.

But the intellect may also be determined subjectively, by the choice of the will. Generally in this case the assent is a partial one, accompanied by a recognition of the possibility that one may be wrong. If this possibility is seen as considerable, the limited assent amounts to suspicion. If the possibility is seen as slight, there will be opinion.

So far could St. Thomas go with Aristotle's account of the psychology of judgment. He argued that in the act of divine faith there is a case of the will moving the mind to assent, but to a perfect and complete assent and one that excludes all deliberate fear of being in error. But how account for the perfection of the assent when the intellect is not determined by its proper object? St. Thomas admitted that the intellect cannot be intrinsically satisfied, except when determined by evidence it sees and that in the act of faith it is not so determined. Consequently, the mind's natural inquisitiveness is not set at rest. It remains unsatisfied because it does not see the evidence. Hence, faith essentially allows for reflective consideration, for search, for thought. The believer assents with full certitude, but his intellect is uneasy in the absence of its proper object. Even while it assents, its determination is from without. It is under constraint and continues to look for that which will set it at rest. This search does not result in assent, for the mind already has assented, with an assent caused by the will. The movement of the will is accounted for by the fact that assent appeals to the will as a good. St. Thomas explains the process thus: "Sometimes the intellect cannot be determined to either of the parts of a contradiction, either immediately by understanding the terms (as happens in the case of first principles), or mediately in virtue of the principles (as in the case of conclusions reached by demonstration). It is determined by the will, which chooses to assent to one of the parts because of a consideration sufficient to move it, but not sufficient to move the intellect, namely, that assent seems a good and fitting thing. And such is the disposition of the believer" (De ver. 14.1). This is true even of human faith, in which so often it is apparent that a man believes what he wants to believe, i.e., what seems good to him to believe. In the case of divine faith, the good that appeals to the will is the promise of eternal life.

Certitude and Inquietude of Mind. Does the intellect achieve its own good when it is determined thus by the movement of the will? Not immediately in the way most congenial to its nature, for it does not see. But this is more than compensated for by its elevation to an act far beyond the capacity of nature. An object is attained by the intellect through the assent, and in this object and in the certitude of this knowledge the believer's intellect is infinitely elevated above any other human knowledge.

The movement of the will, however, would be unreasonable and imprudent if the intellect were not moved to assent to something true. The will moves reasonably to assent only when a truth not evident is attested by competent witness. There must be evidence of credibility, reasonably satisfying in the circumstances to the mind; otherwise the will, moving the intellect to assent, would be misguided by an imprudent judgment of the mind.

From this one can see the meaning St. Thomas attaches to the thought (cogitatio) in his interpretation of Augustine's credere est cum assensione cogitare. The thought is a sort of movement of the soul in search of truth it does not fully possess, a straining toward clarity of vision. This is to be carefully distinguished from the thought that precedes the act of faith, i.e., the search and inquiry of the mind into the motives of credibility. The cogitatio that belongs to the act of faith itself is the striving for understanding of the things believed and exists simultaneously with the assent.

The utter certitude of faith derives from the fact that the intellect in its assent surrenders itself to God, the First Truth, Subsistent Truth, the source and cause of all created truth. It would be contradictory for the mind to accept God in this light and at the same time to retain fear of error.

Therefore, faith is different from the understanding of first principles or the knowledge derived from demonstration in that, unlike these, its assent is not objectively determined; it is unlike subjectively determined opinion, or human faith, because its assent is not partial or hesitant, but is firm and certain. Hence, the act of faith is an act sui generis and, though analogous in some respects to other acts of the mind, is nevertheless reducible to no other act of mind or will.

Involved in this act, on the one hand, is the firmest adherence of the mind and, on the other, searching thought, because the mind's desire is not set at rest. Because there is assent, there ought to be truth for its object, and even truth that is in some sense evident. But because this truth is First Truth, inevident in itself, the mind still strains to see and know. And although it does not see, it nevertheless holds firmly to the truth and has no fear of error. Its perfect determination comes not from an object seen, but from the will. But because the intellectual appetite is not satisfied, the mind in itself is not at rest. In it at the same time are absolute determination and a certain stirring or ferment that comes of its want of satisfaction. There is an assent together with a restlessness of the mind, the assent implying the calm of something settled and fixed, the stirring of mind an inquietude. This antithesis is forced on faith by the character of its object: as true it is deserving of assent; as First Truth, supernatural and inaccessible in itself, it is altogether beyond the grasp of the human mind and hence remains obscure and unseen, and this explains the inquietude.

Supernaturality. Among the ancients, the Pelagians denied the essentially supernatural character of the act of faith and held that no internal grace was necessary either for belief or for progress in faith. The Semi-Pelagians taught that no grace was needed for the beginning of faith or the devout will to believe (pius credulitatis affectus), although they did admit that grace was necessary for the complete act. A more modern variant of this error was introduced by G. Hermes and his disciples during the 19th century. They distinguished two kinds of faith: the faith of knowledge and the faith of the heart. The first they understood to be speculative in character, and to coincide more or less with what theologians commonly call fides informis, or dead faith, i.e., faith not informed by charity. It was their contention that such faith could be the effect of natural demonstration. But for faith of the heart, which was living, practical faith (fides formata), or faith informed by charity, they acknowledged grace to be necessary. Among the Modernists there were those, on the other hand, who tended to deny the need of grace even for faith of the heart, for they looked upon faith as a sense activated by a need for the divine hidden in the subconscious, without the intervention of any judgment of the mind.

According to Catholic teaching, grace is necessary: for the act of faith and its increase (against the Pelagians); for the beginning of faith and the devout will to believe (against the Semi-Pelagians); for fides informis, inasmuch as this is supernatural and the gift of God and not the fruit of demonstration (against Hermes). The theological explanation is based on the supernatural character of the mysteries, which are altogether beyond the grasp of natural reason, to which faith assents; reason must be elevated to be capable of grasping them, and this supposes grace. Moreover, the proper effect of faith, which is to initiate supernatural justification and the life of sanctifying grace, is essentially supernatural and demands therefore a supernatural cause.

Reasonableness. Faith is acceptable to reason in the sense that reason perceives the mysteries to which it assents to be worthy of belief. Some have exaggerated the function of reason in faith to the point of identifying faith with knowledge. Such was the mistake of Hermes, Gunther, and J. FROHSCHAMMER during the 19th century. Others have fallen into the opposite error of minimizing the role of reason, to the extent even of claiming that faith is a blind action or movement of the mind. Fideists, traditionalists, Modernists, and others adopted this view in different ways. For fideists, speculative reason can know nothing with certainty. Everything must be held on divine faith, which thus becomes the supreme criterion of truth, even in philosophy. Traditionalists held that reason is impotent so far as the knowledge of religious truth is concerned. Others have maintained that such is the debility of the mind in its apprehension of religious truth that one must look to practical reason and feeling as a basis for faith, thus emphasizing the volitional character of faith at the expense of the intellectual. Some have gone to the length of attributing credibility as well as faith to grace alone, and have conceived rational credibility of a purely natural kind as impossible.

On the other hand, a contrary extreme of opinion is represented in post-Reformation apologetics, which came, particularly in the 19th and early 20th century, to place a great (and some think an undue) emphasis on the function of reason in the steps preparatory to the act of faith [see G. De Broglie, "La vraie notion thomiste des praeambula fidei," Gregorianum 34 (1953) 341–389]. The motives of credibility tend to become arguments concluding with certainty to the truth of revealed doctrine. One "proves" the fact of revelation, and with this established it is difficult to see how the act of faith that follows remains a free or necessarily supernatural act.

All Catholic theologians agree that the truths of faith are worthy and deserving of belief and that this credibility is objectively apparent simply in the natural light of reason, though sometimes it may happen that special grace and the interior assistance of the Holy Spirit may help an individual to come to a sound judgment of credibility on grounds that seem objectively insufficient to justify it. Not only can rational evidence precede the act of faith, but it should. To believe without adequate evidence would be rash. The judgment of credibility is required by man's rational nature, and to believe without it could not be accounted virtuous. There is evidence available to provide grounds for a morally certain judgment of credibility, and in the normal approach to the act of faith there should be as much consideration of that evidence as is necessary to reach such a judgment.

But there is a noteworthy difference among Catholic theologians in their understanding of the nature and object of the judgment of credibility. The earlier theologians, and particularly the Thomists, did not understand the investigation preceding the act of faith as aimed at a certain judgment with regard to the fact of revelation, but at demonstrating the moral fitness and necessity of accepting that fact by faith. It was considered as essentially a prudential judgment, and not one in which the assent of the mind is compelled by the evidence. If this view makes it possible to lay less stress on the demonstrative value of one's thought on the preambles of faith, it does not on that account make the foundation of faith less secure. The certainty and security of faith does not come from the certainty of the reasoning that precedes the act of faith. The act of faith, as St. Thomas saw it, remedies any weakness in one's grasp of the truth of God's existence, and it will also compensate for any insufficiency there may have been in one's perception of the evidences of credibility. "Faith, considered in itself, sufficiently embraces all things that accompany, follow, or precede it" (In 3 Sent. 24.1.2.2). There is an incomparably clearer perception of credibility that is the effect of faith, than any that could be had by natural argument. "The faithful see them (the things that are of faith), not as by demonstration, but by the light of faith that makes them see that they ought to believe them" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 1.5 ad 1).

Liberty. When Christ preached the gospel, not all believed who saw the miracles and signs. Some of those who heard Paul preach became believers, and some did not (Acts 17.32-34). In fact, faith is invariably represented in the Scriptures as a free, meritorious commitment made to God. That it is essentially a free act was defined by Vatican Council I (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1814). The assent of faith, to be prudent, must be justified by evidence. But the evidence of the motives is not what causes the will to move the intellect to its assent. The act of faith is not in any sense the conclusion to an apodictic syllogism. It is essentially a supernatural thing. The evidence of credibility may indeed be established with moral certainty. But the assent of faith must rest upon a supernatural motive, and to see this motive as supernatural the mind must be enlightened and given a power of perception that it does not have by nature, and the will must be made capable of responding to the attraction of supernatural good. This is effected by grace. But the enlightenment of mind is not such as to compel assent, and grace leaves it within the power of the will to submit itself freely to God's authority.

Certitude. The assent of faith follows upon what is recognized as the divine certification of a truth, and it is, moreover, vivified by a divine grace. From this it follows that the adhesion of the mind to the truth accepted in this way has a firmness greater than can be achieved through the operation of the ordinary laws of thought. There is, consequently, a strength in divine faith, when this is compared with natural opinion, belief, and knowledge, that is altogether unique. Its certitude rests upon a supernatural motive, and as such it is of its nature greater than any natural certitude, even that which is called metaphysical (see CERTITUDE). Scientific certitude may indeed have a greater element of indubitability about it; it is possible to doubt a truth of faith, since faith is a free act, while it is impossible to doubt that which is scientifically evident. But as long as one adheres to the proper motive of faith, he has stronger and more trustworthy reason for believing the scientifically evident.

Necessity of faith. The act of faith is a contingent fact and does not of its nature require existence. Inquiry here is therefore concerned with hypothetical necessity, or the kind of necessity that arises in consequence of a desire to achieve some end, the end in question being the attainment of salvation. Hypothetical necessity in the strict sense is the necessity of something needed to make the attainment of an end possible, but in a looser sense a thing is sometimes called necessary that merely facilitates the attainment of an end that could, absolutely speaking, be attained without it. In this context, one is concerned with hypothetical necessity in the strict sense, and asks therefore whether the act of faith is strictly necessary to salvation.

than he has for assenting to the truth of what he sees or has apodictically demonstrated.

In discussing the necessity of anything to salvation, theologians distinguish between a NECESSITY OF MEANS and one of precept. There is a necessity of means when the end cannot be obtained without it. The nexus between means and end may be founded on the very nature of the two, as when sanctifying grace is said to be necessary for salvation; or it may be founded on the fact that God has so ordained it, as when Baptism is said to be necessary for salvation. When there is NECESSITY OF PRECEPT, the means are, by divine prescription, indispensable to the attainment of the end, but provided one is aware of the obligation of employing the means in question and provided also that it is not physically or morally impossible to employ them.

A few theologians, seeing an analogy between the necessity of faith and that of Baptism and pointing to the sufficiency, acknowledged by the Council of Trent, of Baptism of desire when Baptism of water is impossible, have argued that the desire of faith will suffice for salvation. A few others, among whom was Juan de RIPALDA, though he advanced the opinion more for the sake of discussion than for the purpose of defending it as true (De fide 17.10.145), have taught that faith in the broad sense (fides late dicta) in some circumstances can be sufficient for salvation. By faith in the broad sense they understood natural knowledge of divine and moral truth, acquired from natural sources, but supernaturalized, so to speak, by the help of grace given by God to evoke and to assist the natural processes of reason.

The question is concerned with the necessity of the act of faith. There is no need to inquire about the necessity of the habit, the infused virtue itself, because this must always exist when there is sanctifying grace (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1528, 1561). The act is evidently not necessary to baptized infants who die before reaching the use of reason, for these are saved through no act of their own. The question therefore concerns adults, i.e., those who have reached the use of reason and are morally responsible for their actions.

The Scriptures declare faith as an act to be necessary, and the necessity is clearly one of means. "My just one lives by faith. . . . Faith is the substance of things to be hoped for, the evidence of things that are not seen. . . . By faith we understand that the world was fashioned by the word of God . . . without faith it is impossible to please God. For he who comes to God must believe that God exists and is the rewarder of those who seek him" (Heb 10.38–11.6). The faith in question is actual faith: "By faith we understand." That it is a necessity of means appears in the words "without faith it is impossible to please God'' (cf. also Mk 16.15-16; Gal 2.16). This doctrine has been repeated by the councils. Trent declared faith to be "the beginning of human salvation, the foundation and root of all justification, without which it is impossible to please God" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1532). Vatican I repeated this in the following words: "And since without faith it is impossible to please God, and to attain to the fellowship of His children, therefore without faith no one has ever attained justification; nor will anyone obtain eternal life, unless he shall have persevered in faith unto the end. And that we may be able to satisfy the obligation of embracing the true faith, and of constantly persevering in it, God has instituted the Church'' (ibid. 3012; this passage is also quoted in the Catechism of the Catholic Church 161). In these last words at least there is reference to actual faith, but this faith in the context is so closely associated with the faith without which it is impossible to please Godthe faith, in other words, that is necessary by a necessity of means-that it is impossible not to identify the two. Furthermore, the necessity of the act of faith for adults not yet justified is declared by the Council of Trent by its inclusion of this act among the steps necessary to justification (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1525, 1532). It is de fide that actual faith is necessary, by a necessity of means, to the salvation of adults not yet justified.

It cannot be said that the declarations of the councils refer only to the need of faith, without specifying its object as natural or supernatural, and that therefore the assent with the grace of God to religious truths known through natural reason might satisfy the necessity for those to whom revealed truth has not reached. In 1679 Innocent XI condemned a proposition stating the sufficiency of faith in a broad sense (ibid. 2123), and Vatican Council I expressly declared that the faith that is the beginning of man's salvation is a supernatural virtue, whereby inspired and assisted by the grace of God, man believes that the things He has revealed are true because of the authority of Him who reveals them. Therefore the council spoke only of the faith that falls under faith's proper motive, and its object therefore must be revealed truth qua revealed.

Similarly, the desire or intention of faith is not sufficient to satisfy the necessity affirmed by the councils. The parallel between the desire of Baptism and the desire of faith will not permit the conclusion that faith in desire can be enough. The desire of Baptism is already an act of supernatural charity, and as such it produces its effect. But the desire of faith is not an act of supernatural charity. Moreover, a person with faith can wish, explicitly or implicitly, to be baptized, and yet be prevented by circumstances from having what he wants. Faith, however, is an internal act, and its desire cannot be frustrated in the same way. If a person seriously wants to believe, he can believe.

Necessity of explicit belief. The necessity of believing something explicitly follows as a corollary from the necessity of the act of faith. In any act of faith, something must be believed explicitly, because one cannot believe anything implicitly without some explicit belief in which the implicit belief is contained. Post-Tridentine theologians not only regard it as de fide that there must be some explicit belief, but also that two truths, namely, that God is and that He is the rewarder of those who seek Him (Heb 11.6), must be explicitly believed. It is important that the two truths mentioned be understood in a supernatural sense, that is, as referring to God the author of grace, and to God who holds out a supernatural reward to those who seek him. This is clear from the context in the Epistle to the Hebrews. St. Paul said that one coming to God must believe these truths, and to believe in this immediate context has a precise meaning, for just a few verses before faith is defined as the substance of things hoped for, etc. The things hoped for, the things not seen, are supernatural. They constitute eternal life, which is supernatural beatitude of a kind that no eye has seen, no ear has heard, and no human heart has conceived (1 Cor 2.9).

At all times belief, at least implicit, in the mysteries of the Incarnation and Trinity, is necessary for salvation; and since the Council of Trent, theologians generally add that this is necessary by a necessity of means. "He is that stone, rejected by you, the builders, that has become the chief stone at the corner. Salvation is not found elsewhere; this alone of all the names under heaven has been appointed to men as the one by which we must needs be saved" (Acts 4.11-12; cf. Gal 2.16). Before the coming of Christ, implicit faith in these mysteries sufficed for ordinary men at least, but with the full revelation of grace, explicit faith became necessary. It has been debated among theologians whether explicit belief in the mysteries of the Incarnation, the Trinity, the Redemption is necessary by a necessity of means or of precept. Before the great voyages of discovery in the 15th and 16th centuries, the orbis terrarum in the popular consciousness of Europeans was the circle of lands about the Mediterranean. It was possible for men to think that the gospel precept "Going, teach ye all nations" had been more or less adequately fulfilled and that people everywhere had been given a satisfactory opportunity to consider the claims of Christianity. Hence, earlier theologians found no difficulty in reconciling the need of explicit faith with God's mercy and His will respecting the salvation of all men.

But when the geographical discoveries of the 15th and 16th centuries had made Europeans aware of the existence of vast numbers of human beings to whom no word of Christ could possibly have reached through the agency of natural causes, there was a renewed interest in the question of the possibility of salvation for those who had never heard of Christ. There arose, in particular, a controversy concerning the necessity of explicit belief in the mysteries of the Incarnation and the Trinity, and this point has continued to be debated down to the present time. The argument concerns a point of considerable subtlety on which the scriptural evidence is not conclusive, and the whole issue has been more than a little beclouded by ambiguities caused by different senses given by different authors to terms used in the discussion. It is generally admitted by theologians that any view taken on this question is a matter of opinion, and views are advanced by their proponents not as certain, but only as probable, or at most as more probable.

Explicit belief necessary by precept. All theologians agree as to the existence of a divine precept obliging men to believe the truths of the Christian religion. As affirmative, this precept obliges people to learn explicitly and to accept the principal truths of the faith; as negative, it forbids disbelief in any revealed truth. The existence of this precept is evident from the fact of revelation itself. If God communicates truth, it is that men might believe, and to refuse belief is to withhold the honor due to divine wisdom and truth. It is stated explicitly in the Gospel: "Go into the whole world and preach the gospel to every creature. He who believes and is baptized shall be saved, but he who does not believe, shall be condemned" (Mk 16.15–16).

Nevertheless, it is admitted that every man is not obliged to know and believe all revealed truth explicitly.

This would not be possible. It is enough that some revealed truth be believed explicitly, and the rest be accepted implicitly in some general proposition such as "I believe all the truths which God has revealed and which the Holy Catholic Church believes and teaches." To some extent the obligation of explicit belief is a relative one. Those responsible for the instruction of others in the faith-priests, parents, teachers of religion-are obliged ex officio to have a more extensive knowledge of the faith. The well-educated and those who enjoy positions of prominence or leadership in their communities are also expected to have a more thorough instruction in religious truth, partly as a precaution against the dangers to which their faith will be exposed if their religious education does not keep pace with their culture in other matters, and partly because to them is directed more particularly the injunction of St. Peter to be ready at all times with an answer to those who may ask an account of the hope that they cherish (1 Pt 3.15).

The obligation of explicit belief is not altogether relative and variable. There is an absolute minimum to which any normal adult is obligated. In the common opinion of theologians, this minimum includes: (1) Truths necessary to right thinking about Christ and the work of Redemption, or in other words, the truths contained in the Apostles' Creed. That this is obligatory is evident from the constant practice of the Church in requiring an explicit profession of belief in these as a preliminary to Baptism. (2) Truths necessary for right living: the Ten Commandments, the special duties of one's state in life, the laws of the Church that everyone is required to observe. (3) Knowledge of the means of sanctification: the Our Father, the Sacraments that are received by everyone, i.e., Baptism, Reconciliation, the Eucharist, and the other Sacraments when there is occasion to receive them.

The obligation to have explicit knowledge of the above is considered to be grave. There is also an obligation of precept arising from the common custom and practice of the faithful to know the sign of the cross, the Hail Mary, the Our Father, the Creed, and the Commandments by heart, but this is not generally held to bind gravely. Parents and those responsible for the instruction of others are gravely obligated to teach their charges those things necessary for them to know, either by a necessity of means or of precept.

Bibliography: C. MAZZELLA, De virtutibus infusis (Rome 1884). C. PESCH, Praelectiones dogmaticae, 9 v. (4th ed. Freiburg 1910–22), v. 8. L. BILLOT, De virtutibus infusis (Rome 1905). P. LUMBRERAS, De fide (Rome 1937). A. LIÉGÉ, "Faith" in The Virtues and States of Life, ed. A. M. HENRY (Theology Library 4, Chicago, Ill. 1957) 1–59. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ: Moral Theology for Priests and Laity, tr. E. G. KAISER (Westminster, Md. 1961). S.

HARENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 6.1:55-514; 7.2:1726-1930. J. B. BAINVEL, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, v. 5 (Paris 1911-22) s.v. "Fidéisme," "Foi." J. A. DE ALDAMA, "De virtutibus infusis," Sacrae theologiae summa, 4 v. (Madrid 1958-1962) 3:46-219. M. SCHEEBEN, in Wetzer und Welte's Kirchenlexikon, 12 v. (2d ed. Freiburg 1882–1901) 5:616–674. R. AUBERT, Le Problème de l'acte de foi (3d ed. Louvain 1958). A. STOLZ, Glaubensgnade und Glaubenslicht nach Thomas von Aquin (Rome 1933). M. D. CHENU, "La Psychologie de la foi dans la théologie du XIII^e siècle," Études d'histoire littéraire et doctrinale du XIII e siècle 2 (1932) 163-191. B. DUROUX, La Psychologie de la foi chez s. Thomas d'Aquin (Tournai 1963). G. DE BROGLIE, Pour une théorie rationelle de l'acte de foi (Paris 1955). K. RAHNER, Schriften zur Theologie, v. 2 (Einsiedeln 1957) 9-94, 115-141. J. MARITAIN, La Signification de l'athéisme contemporain (Paris 1949); Approaches to God, tr. P. O'REILLY (New York 1954). J. MOUROUX, I Believe: The Personal Structure of Faith, tr. M. TURNER (New York 1959). M. L. GUÉRARD DES LAURIERS, Dimensions de la foi (Paris 1952). M. C. D'ARCY, The Nature of Belief (New York 1931, new ed. St. Louis 1958); Belief and Reason (London 1944). J. H. NEWMAN, An Essay in Aid of a Grammar of Assent (New York 1870; pa. 1955). I. FOREST, "The Meaning of Faith," Thomist 6 (1943) 230-250. J. C. MURRAY, "The Root of Faith: The Doctrine of M. J. Scheeben," Theological Studies 9 (1948) 20-46. J. PIEPER, Belief and Faith (New York 1963). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, Love Alone: The Way of Revelation (London 1968). JOHN PAUL II, Fides et ratio (Vatican City 1998). A. R. DULLES, Assurance of Things Hoped For: A Theology of Christian Faith (New York 1994).

[P. K. MEAGHER/EDS.]

FAITH, ACT OF

Faith, the name for the response to revelation, is never faith in the abstract but a human act in a special situation, social condition, and historical period. What characterizes faith at the present time is the forms it takes in the context of contemporary atheism, secularism, and religious pluralism, which, as Vatican Council II's Constitution on the Church in the Modern World notes, put belief to a test and refine it (Gaudium et spes 19-21). The confrontation is partially due not only to the intrinsic difficulty of faith but also to the neglect or failure of Christians to live up to the Gospel ideal of witnessing to Christ. At the same time present-day problems challenge believers to lead a stronger and purer life of faith. The varieties of contemporary ATHEISM grew out of the 18th-century Enlightenment and the declaration of the "death of God," with human reason and freedom declaimed in God's stead. Man is tempted to believe in his own inevitable progress and perfectibility to the point of an assurance that he can create the world and take destiny into his own hands. To this secular "faith" the universe no longer reflects God; he is increasingly irrelevant to and absent from it. Man has passed from a divinized into a hominized world, into a post-Christian or dechristianized age.

Is real faith, then, possible in a secularized age? The secularism begotten of scientific and technological progress and a sense of human mastery of the world can be beneficial to the Christian faith. It no longer identifies God with the once humanly uncontrollable forces of nature. An earlier and less enlightened faith may have hidden rather than revealed the true face of God. The chief object of the Christian faith remains the same-but through secularization God has been made to recede from the world and to appear more transcendent than ever. The act of faith puts a positive construction upon the rise of secular society and seeks the meaning of the Gospel within it. It looks less to the signs of space than to the signs of the times, where God proves himself to be the Lord of history. The Christian draws on the heritage of faith to find the answers to the existential questions of the order, meaning, and goal of life.

While there is the shift away from a medieval Christian view, away from a spatial to a temporal view of reality, the act of faith today is no less intellectual than formerly. Even when it does not grapple with questions of the truth and verifiability of how God rules all things "from above," or with a set of propositions for belief, it still has to perceive and acknowledge the mysterious presence of the living God within the events of time. Man is made more responsible to God for the world and society. He is to trust that the unseen is more real than the seen.

In accordance with the New Testament term for faith, π í σ τεύειη, which can mean "to rely on, to trust" as well as "to believe," the element of trust looms larger in the life of faith today. Faith involves risk, insecurity, uncertainty, doubt, a Kierkegaardian "leap" into a future that rests with God. It dictates a reliance on the will of the God who knows what is best for human fulfillment. Faith is not only an act of obedience, made once-for-all, but a lifetime commitment to the divine summons. Convinced that the Word of God is trustworthy, the believer faces the unpredictable and incalculable future with courage. He cannot weather the present-day crisis of culture without "a more personal and explicit adherence to faith," which will instill him with "a more vivid sense of God" (Gaudium et spes 7).

The fact that a child is born into a Christian family, baptized, educated in his environment, does not dispense him from making a free, personal, adult life-decision for or against Christ; he will act upon that decision seriously, superficially, or not at all. The ratification is not so much a matter of a single act or acts as of a basic, life-long orientation to the whole of reality with its values, including God, Christ, his Church.

The total and unconditional surrender to God in the act of faith precludes an exclusively intellectualist view but does not exempt the Catholic from orthodoxy (see Vatican II, Dei Verbum 5). It is inaccurate to say that belief stems merely from the will to believe, without consideration of the truths normative for faith. So-called ortho-praxis without orthodoxy will not check the decline or forestall the loss of religious faith. The Catholic ideal is to fuse the two, doctrine and practice: faith ought to be a visible quality of human life, a character development. Genuine faith should affect the whole man and the totality of human living, even if it would be foolish to expect the perfect correlation of belief with life and action.

If faith and secular life are not to be left polarized, then Christians must take the fact of a pluralist world into account. The Christian faith brings home a transcendent way of life rather than a source of theoretical doctrine. A way of life is familial, social, historical, ecclesial. So it is possible for Christians to live together and witness to Christ on the basis of a love-inspired faith. Without disregarding the ecclesial framework of their faith, they must realize they have major interfaith areas where they can live and work for unity of faith. Faith, living and active, leads to the religious experience of love, and love will attract believers spontaneously to the same values, to a sense of what is morally good in interpersonal relationships, to a share in that connatural knowledge which faith and love-the resonance of love in faith's actmake of transcendence, unity, and fidelity.

Bibliography: L. DEWART, The Future of Belief: Theism in a World Come of Age (New York 1966). R. PANIKKAR, ''Faith—A Constitutive Dimension of Man,'' Journal of Ecumenical Studies 8 (1971) 223–254. K. RAHNER, Do You believe in God? (New York 1969). B. SIZEMORE, JR., ''Christian Faith in a Pluralistic World,'' Journal of Ecumenical Studies 13 (1976) 405–419. P. SURLIS, ed., Faith: Its Nature and Meaning (Dublin 1972). C. WILLIAMS, Faith in a Secular Age (New York 1966).

[J. FICHTNER]

FAITH, BEGINNING OF

"Beginning of faith" is a technical term that had its beginning as a result of the Semi-Pelagian heresy. Although conceding the necessity of God's GRACE for justification, the Semi-Pelagians taught that man could at least desire FAITH and wish to believe without divine help. In other words, these heretics held that "the beginning of faith" was natural, not SUPERNATURAL. At issue, of course, was the acquisition of faith in adults, not children.

In opposition to this heresy, the Second Council of Orange (529) defined the Church's official position: the increase of faith, the beginning of faith, and even the very desire or wish to believe, is a gift of God (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 375). Thus the council recalled the teaching of St. Paul that faith is a purely gratuitous gift. No one can strictly merit it, i.e., no amount of effort by a human being can force God to give him faith. "For by grace you have been saved . . . for it is a gift of God" (Eph 2.8).

The Council of Trent reaffirmed the teaching of Orange and called attention to man's freedom at the beginning of faith. Though always an unmerited gift of God, faith requires man's free and personal assent. The council stated: the Scripture text "be converted to me . . . and I will turn to you" (Zec 1.3) shows men that they are free in the act of faith; and when they answer "Turn to us, O Lord, and we shall be converted to You" (Lam 5.21), they witness to the fact that the grace of God has first to come to them (ibid. 1525).

See Also: SEMI-PELAGIANISM.

Bibliography: É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 14.2:1796–1850. S. HARENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 6.1:55–514. J. AUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:676–677. J. GUILLET, Themes of the Bible, tr. A. J. LA-MOTHE (South Bend, Ind. 1960). H. LENNERZ, De gratia Redemptoris (3d ed. Rome 1949). L. LERCHER, Institutiones theologiae dogmaticae 4.1 (5th ed. Barcelona 1951) 253–359. L. CERFAUX, "La Théologie de la grâce selon saint Paul," La Vie Spirituelle 83 (1950) 5–19.

[G. N. BUESCHER]

FAITH AND MORALS

The term signifies the object of Catholic FAITH in its entirety. Primarily it includes all the truths revealed by God and proposed by the Church as necessary for men to believe and to act upon if they are to attain eternal salvation, e.g., articles of the Apostles Creed, the commandments of love of God and neighbor. Such truths that are included in the object of Catholic faith are contained in the fonts of Scripture and tradition. Formally revealed truths may be contained in these fonts either explicitly, i.e., according to the manifest meaning of the words, or implicitly, i.e., as known from an analysis or a deeper understanding of the terms themselves.

Secondarily it includes other truths, which are proposed by the Church as necessary to enable men to believe in divine revelation or follow its moral precepts, although these truths have not been divinely revealed, e.g., determination of the canon of Sacred Scripture, canonization of saints, determination of the matter and form of the Sacrament of Holy Orders, some explicitations of the natural law. The Church does not propose these truths as formally revealed but as intimately connected with revealed truths and hence to be accepted on faith.

Historical and Theological Considerations. Many times St. Paul wrote that man is saved by faith rather than by works, i.e., that the supernatural gift of faith unites a man to Christ, and the "works" of the religious ceremonies and precepts demanded by the Mosaic Law are useless in effecting this union (Rom ch 3; 9.32; 11.6; Gal 2.16; Eph 2.9). However, the faith in Christ demanded by Paul included avoidance of sin, i.e., GOOD WORKS (Rom ch. 6; 1 Cor ch. 5-8). The Gospels and Epistles demand not only faith but also good works (Mt ch. 5-7; Jn ch. 14-17; Ja ch. 2). St. Clement of Rome (A.D. 95) spoke of sanctification by faith (1 Clem. 32, 33) but included good works as the outcome of faith. In the early Christian teaching, faith in Christ was distinguished from "works," i.e., the religious ceremonies of the Mosaic Law. Yet good works, meaning right moral conduct, were always connected with true faith.

After the condemnation in 1520 of Luther's proposition that the Church or pope can determine neither the articles of faith nor the laws of morality or good works (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer 1477), the term faith and morals began to appear in Church definitions more regularly. Trent used the term in reference to interpreting Scripture (ibid. 1507), while, Vatican I used it in defining the universal jurisdiction of the pope (ibid. 3060).

Object of Infallibility. The infallible teaching authority of the Church determines these "matters of faith and morals" and proposes them for acceptance by the FAITHFUL of the universal Church, on occasion through the pope speaking as the universal shepherd. This teaching authority preserves, guards, and interprets these truths of the DEPOSIT OF FAITH according to the following categories: (1) The truths revealed directly by God and by Christ, or through His Apostles, and that ordain men to eternal life are preserved, guarded, and transmitted throughout the world, e.g., the Trinity, Christ's birth and Resurrection, the Church as a visible, hierarchical society. Moral matters such as the beatitudes, commands to love God and neighbor, indissolubility of marriagetruths that are principles to guide men's actions toward God-are also defined. These truths are formally and explicitly revealed, that is, they are those that God manifestly intended by the words themselves, considering the nature of human speech and signification of the terms used. (2) Other truths that are formally revealed, but implicitly so, are also transmitted. These truths may be seen from an analysis of the terms of an explicit revelation without bringing in a third term as in a syllogistic form of reasoning. Correlative statements exemplify this: if Jesus Christ, the Word of God, is born of Mary, then Mary is the mother of God; the Council of Ephesus (431) defined this against the heretic Nestorius. Without necessarily declaring exactly how these truths of faith and morals are contained in revelation and without any formally declared logical process, the Church infallibly defines them as part of the deposit of revelation to be accepted on divine faith, and it does this in fulfilling its task of preserving, guarding, and explaining the revealed truths of Scripture and tradition. (3) Truths may be per se revealed, i.e., principally intended by God such as articles of the Creed, or per accidens revealed (Mt 13.1–2; 2 Tm 4.9–16). (4) Faith and morals also includes truths that the Church defines infallibly, though not as part of the revealed deposit, e.g., canon of Sacred Scripture.

Conclusion. Faith and morals primarily includes all divinely revealed truths that God gave to the Church, either directly or through the Apostles, and that are contained in the Scriptures or tradition and that are to be accepted on divine faith as necessary for salvation. Secondarily it includes truths defined by the Church as necessary to preserve and explain the truths formally and directly revealed. The teaching authority of the Church alone determines these truths.

See Also: DOCTRINE; DOGMA; REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF; REVELATION, VIRTUAL; RULE OF FAITH.

Bibliography: E. DUBLANCHY, "Dépôt de la foi," Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 4.1: 526–531; "Dogme," ibid. 4.2:1576–77; "Église," ibid. 2184–85; "Infaillibilité du Pape," ibid. 7.2:1699. N. IUNG, "Révélation," ibid. 13.2:2616. L. CIAPPI, "Freedom of the Faith and Papal Infallibility," in Thomist Reader (Washington 1957) 1–17. C. JOURNET, The Church of the Word Incarnate, v.1 tr. A. H. C. DOWNES (New York 1955) 338–342.

[A. E. GREEN]

FAITH AND ORDER COMMISSION

This entry examines the history and accomplishments of the Faith and Order Commission of the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), established in 1927 as the Faith and Order Movement and integrated into the WCC in 1948.

Impetus for the Faith and Order Movement came from the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh (1910). After the conference, one of its delegates, Bishop Charles H. BRENT of the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, U.S. proposed a conference on matters of faith and order, with a view to working for the unity of all Christians. The General Convention of the Episcopal Church approved his proposal in October 1910. During the next few years, Brent and Robert H. Gardiner, an Episcopal layman, met with the leaders of other churches to lay the foundation for this movement. In 1927 Protestant, Anglican, Old Catholic, and Orthodox delegates met in Lausanne, Switzerland, for the First World Conference on Faith and Order. The Roman Catholic Church was invited but did not participate. The aim of the conference was to "draw churches out of isolation into conference" to remove misunderstandings, discuss obstacles to reunion, and issue reports for consideration by the churches. The basis for dialogue was explained as follows: "We . . . are assembled to consider the things wherein we agree and the things wherein we differ."

The second World Conference on Faith and Order was held in Edinburgh in 1937 to explore further the possibilities for realizing the unity of Christian churches. Its report distinguished between cooperative action, intercommunion, and organic union, but delegates were unable to agree upon the exact form unity should take. At the Edinburgh conference, concurrently with the Oxford Conference on Life and Work, a proposal for the formation of the WCC was approved. When the WCC was established in 1948, the Faith and Order Movement became a part of this new organization.

The Third World Conference was held in Lund, Sweden, in 1952, followed by the Fourth World Conference in Montreal in 1963. The Montreal conference was a watershed in many respects. For the first time, observers from the Roman Catholic Church and Pentecostal delegates were present, Orthodoxy was widely represented, and Third World representatives were welcomed. The fruitful interaction of the member delegates and external observers at this conference became the basis for the decision made at the commission's 1967 plenary session in Bristol, England, where it revised its rules so that 40 of its 150 members might be invited from churches not currently members of the WCC. This resolution, confirmed at the 1968 meeting of the WCC in Uppsala, Sweden, made it possible for nine Roman Catholic observers to become members of the Faith and Order Commission and to participate at its 1971 meeting in Louvain, Belgium. Additionally, Cardinal Leon-Josef Suenens of Malines-Brussels gave one of the two opening addresses on the theme of this meeting: "Unity of the Church-Unity of Mankind."

The theme emerged out of the concerns of earlier conferences. The Bristol meeting posed the question, "What is the function of the Church in relation to the unifying purpose of God for the world?" Later the Uppsala assembly noted that the world may hear with skepticism the claim of the Church to be a sign of the coming unity of mankind. Rather, "to the outsider, the churches often seem remote and irrelevant, busy to the point of tediousness with their own concerns."

At a 1970 working committee meeting in preparation for Louvain, John Deschner of the United Methodist Church saw the theme as evidence that Faith and Order was entering into a new stage in its history. It demanded new consideration of the secular import of church unity (its impact on racial, economic, social, generational, and sexist divisions) and of the significance of corporate Christian responses to secular issues.

Upon its introduction at Louvain, the theme was quickly challenged by John Meyendorff of the Orthodox Church in America, chairman of the commission. Highly critical of the more humanistic approach favored at the Uppsala assembly, Meyendorff regarded secular categories of thought as decisive in the "iconoclastic years" from the Montreal conference on, during which time "what F & O represents was largely overshadowed by noisy talk about various social causes." Reproving those who reject "the idea that the Church has a God-given structure [and] think that it must learn from the world how to make the world better," he called for a "Eucharist-centered eschatology" to regain a place over against false social utopianism.

Rejoinders to this criticism were strongly argued. Thus, José Miguez-Bonino, an Argentinean Methodist, argued that "the prophetic message [is] that there is no 'Eucharist' outside the conditions of justice and faithfulness . . . which God has covenanted with his People."

Within the limits of the Louvain meeting it was not possible to reconcile these two perspectives; one more typical of Orthodox spokesmen, the other of Protestants. Neither did it become clear which, if either, perspective held greater favor among the Catholic members present for the first time. Yet the underlying question was urgent and difficult. In response, the commission concluded recommending that further studies be carried out on the main theme and in three other areas: (1) the development of a common expression of the Christian faith ("Giving an Account of the Hope That Is in Us"—1 Pt 3:15), (2) the conceptualization of church unity and models of church union, and (3) the understanding of ministry and sacraments in the local and universal church.

Since then, two general foci of theological research and publication emerged within the commission: working out the details of a visible unity, i.e., the internal ecclesiological life of a united Church; and contextual studies relating the unity of the Church to its role in the mission to the human community. The work on contextual biblical hermeneutics at Louvain contributed to both of these, by amplifying the classical work on doctrine to include contextual as well as biblical and historical methodologies in the pursuit of unity.

Visible Unity. The vision of "a Conciliar Fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united," articulated at the Nairobi Assembly of the WCC (1975), pictures local unity combined with a worldwide unity focused on a truly ecumenical council recognized as such by Orthodox, Anglican, Protestant, and Roman Catholic Christians. These studies entailed extensive ecumenical research on the early councils, the understanding of "local church" among the communions, and the limits of diversity and unity required by the theologies of participating churches in their understanding of the biblical mandate for unity. This vision was the product of studies and consultations of the commission over the previous 50 years.

Three elements are identified as necessary before such unity can be achieved: a common understanding of the APOSTOLIC FAITH as it is to be confessed today; full mutual recognition of one another's baptism, Eucharist, and ordained ministry; and common ways of decision making and teaching authoritatively. At the Accra, Ghana, meeting (1974) work was done on the second of these items and circulated to the churches for their study, feedback, evaluation and revision. This work had been prepared for by detailed work on baptism, Eucharist, and the understanding of ordination throughout the churches and in the biblical and historical sources. The results of this wide theological consultation process produced the statement that was approved for distribution at the Lima meeting of the commission (1982) and the World Council Assembly at Vancouver, British Columbia (1983), called Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry and also known as the LIMA TEXT.

In the years following the Stavanger meeting (1985) of the commission, the responses of the churches were published and evaluated in preparation for a World Conference on Faith and Order to take place after the next WCC assembly, in Canberra, Australia (1991). In addition to the wide participation of the churches in the official response process, many popular studies of this document and unofficial reactions from individual scholars and groups have enhanced the material available for digestion and review. During this period extensive research is in progress on the apostolic faith and on the process of reception of the Lima Text in preparation for the third study necessary in the Conciliar Fellowship process, "Common Ways of Deciding and Acting Together."

The flowering of the bilateral dialogues between churches and the church union negotiations, such as the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION in the United States, have both contributed to and benefited from the similar themes on which ecumenical research has been carried out in Faith and Order. The rich harvest of bilateral results in the 1970s prepared the ground work for the Lima Text studies of the 1980s. The latter, in turn, has made clear the connection between bilateral, multilateral, and church union dialogues all contributing to the common reconciling purpose and producing a coherent convergence theology for church union. During these same decades the model of visible unity was much debated between the Conciliar Fellowship vision of Nairobi and a Reconciled Diversity vision proposed by the Lutheran World Federation. Subseqent dialogues, including the Lutheran-Roman Catholic Facing Unity have pointed the way to reconciling these two visions. Proposals before the churches of the Consultation on Church Union call for giving concrete expression, among these nine U.S. churches, to the Conciliar Fellowship vision realized in concrete stages of covenanting.

As the Third World churches, and voices of women and minority churches in the First World have begun to be heard, along with Orthodox voices from the Second World and the European and American theological efforts, more participatory and contextual styles have been added to the researches of Faith and Order. At the Accra meeting (1974) a study, "Giving Account of the Hope" was featured, and brought to fruition at the Bangalore meeting (1978). Likewise, at that meeting a study, "The Community of Women and Men in the Church," was featured, which continued through Lima and Vancouver. This study complemented an ongoing study that was formalized at Lima under the title "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community." Major reports on this study were presented at Stavanger and consultations and research continue.

Furthermore, the study process on the Lima Text and the means churches took to make their official responses, as well as the contextual processes used within the apostolic faith study as it moves forward, all relate the work on the internal life of the Church to its mission in the world. Recognizing that the elements of mission and social ministry in the ecumenical movement are contributing in their own way to Christian unity, while the theological research continues, is all part of the one ecumenical vision. The Commission on Faith and Order of the National Council of Churches in the U.S. has assisted the WCC studies for the American churches. Programs have been done on the Lima Text, Apostolic Faith, Conciliar Fellowship, the Community of Women and Men in the Church, and the Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community. In addition, studies on the bilaterals, on spirituality, interreligious dialogue, on such controversial issues as homosexuality, abortion, and the UNIFICATION CHURCH have been undertaken and published.

Bibliography: J. E. SKOGLUND and J. R. NELSON, Fifty Years of Faith and Order (New York 1963). L. VISCHER, ed., A Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement (St. Louis 1963). A.

DULLES, SJ, "Faith and Order at Louvain," Theological Studies 33, 1, 35-67. Meetings of the Faith & Order Commission. 50th Anniversary Celebration, Lausanne, Switzerland (1977); Bangalore, India (Aug. 15-30, 1978); Lima, Peru (Jan. 2-16, 1982); Stavanger, Norway (Aug. 13-26, 1985). Consultations and meetings for ongoing studies have taken place each year, and are reflected in the titles of WCC papers. The following Faith and Order (WCC) Papers are of particular importance: #59 Faith and Order Louvain 1971 (reports and documents); #60 Faith and Order Louvain 1971 (minutes of commission and working committee); #69 What Kind of Unity? (1974); #72 Uniting in Hope (reports and documents) (Accra 1974); #73 One Baptism, One Eucharist and a Mutually Recognized Ministry: Three Agreed Statements (1975); #74 Confessions in Dialogue; Survey of Bilateral Conversations among World Confessional Families, 1959-74, eds. N. EHRENSTROM and G. GASS-MANN (1974); #77 What Unity Requires (papers and reports on the unity of the Church) (1976); #81 Giving Account of the Hope Today, intro. C. S. SONG (1976); #82 Lausanne '77: Fifty Years of Faith and Order (1977); #86 Giving Account of the Hope Together (1978); #92 Sharing in One Hope (reports and documents) (Bangalore 1978); #93 Faith and Order, Bangalore 1978 (minutes); #97 Louisville Consultation on Baptism, Rev&Exp (Winter 1980); #102 Episkope and Episcopate in Ecumenical Perspective (1980); #103 Spirit of God, Spirit of Christ: Ecumenical Reflections on the Filioque Controversy, ed. L. VISCHER (1980); #105 Ordination of Women in Ecumenical Perspective, ed. C. PARVEY (1980); #111 Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (1982); #112 Towards Visible Unity: Commission on Faith and Order, Lima, 1982, v. 1 Minutes and Addresses; #113, ibid., v. 2 Study Papers and Reports; #114 Growing Together in Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry. A Study Guide (1985); #116 Ecumenical Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, ed. M. THURIAN (theological essays) (1985); #117 Baptism and Eucharist, eds. M. THURIAN and G. WAINWRIGHT (ecumenical convergence in celebration) (1984); #121 Minutes of the Standing Commission, Crete, 1984; #125 Fourth Forum on Bilateral Conversations Report (1985); #127 Called to Be One in Christ, eds. T. BEST and M. KINNAMON; #129 Churches Respond to BEM, v. 1., ed. M. THURIAN (official responses to the Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry text) (1986); #130 Church, Kingdom, World, ed. M. THURIAN (The Church as mystery and prophetic sign) (1986); #131 Faith and Renewal (Faith and Order Commission meeting held in Stavanger, Norway, Aug. 13-26, 1985); #132 Churches Respond to BEM, v. 2 (1986); #135 ibid., v. 3 (1987). Does Chalcedon Divide or Unite? Towards Convergence in Orthodox Christology, ed. P. GREGORIOS et al. (1981).

[M. B. HANDSPICKER/J. HOTCHKIN/J. GROS/EDS.]

FAITH, HOPE, AND CHARITY, SS.

A legend states that three sisters, Faith, Hope, and Charity (Latin: Fides, Spes, and Caritas; Greek: Pistis, Elpis, and Agape), at the tender ages of 12, 10, and 9, were boiled in pitch and then beheaded for the faith under the second-century Emperor Hadrian. Their mother, Wisdom (Sapientia or Sophia), was cut down while praying over their bodies. This legendary story was probably inspired by one of two family groups that suffered martyrdom and were buried near Rome: either a family, whose members had the Greek names and were martyred under Hadrian and buried on the Aurelian Way, or a second group with the Latin names, buried in the cemetery of St. Callistus on the Appian Way. The cult of SS. Faith, Hope, and Charity did not exist before the sixth century. The church of St. Sophia in Constantinople was named in honor of the Holy Wisdom of God, Christ the Word, not the Sophia of the legend.

Feast: Aug. 1 (Roman Martyrology).

Bibliography: A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:238–239.

[E. DAY]

FAITHFUL

As opposed to INFIDEL, faithful is one who believes in God and His revelation in Christ, one who has divine, or Christian, FAITH. Normally this faith is had in the fold of the Catholic Church; but all the baptized who believe in Christ and in good conscience are "outside the Church'' (separated brethren) also have the faith. [This is the basis of Catholic participation in ecumenism; cf. Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenism, Unitatis redintegratio 1; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1964) 90-91.] Nor is it excluded that non-Christians who, without any fault of their own, are ignorant of Christ and His Church should have implicit faith, viz, faith implied in the GRACE they are given when they follow their conscience in doing all that they know God wants of them (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 2866). They may be anonymous Christians, or infidels in appearance only, without having received any private revelation, but not without the grace of faith transforming their "natural belief" in God into divine faith.

In any of these three classes of faithful (Catholics, non-Catholics, and non-Christian believers) faith normally goes together with hope and charity, or the state of grace. The faithful not only believe in Christ; they are also expected to live according to the gospel. Yet faith can exist without the state of grace. It is defined doctrine that when sanctifying grace is lost by grave sin, faith as an infused virtue is not necessarily lost (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum 1578); it is lost only by grave sin against faith. Catholic sinners are still faithful and members of the Church, but members that are critically ill. Although theirs is not a living faith, yet it is a gift of God's grace (cf. Enchiridion symbolorum 3010, 3035). Theology endeavors to show how it is possible for the infused habit of faith to remain without sanctifying grace and charity; a man can freely assent to God revealing without yet living in accordance with this belief (Virtue is not mere knowledge; it requires, besides, good will and effort), but this "dead faith" entails a division of the will, the sinner partly obeying God by believing and partly disobeying God by not doing what He demands. This places his faith in an abnormal and possibly precarious condition.

Because faith is a SUPERNATURAL gift of God that requires one's free cooperation, the faithful who have received the gift of faith must cooperate with that grace. They need not be making acts of faith all the time—this is not possible—but they ought to make such acts whenever required by their Christian duty. Besides, they must take care to have an enlightened faith and to acquire the knowledge of their religion that befits their state in life. Their cooperation with the grace of faith will be wholehearted only when they live in accordance with their belief, i.e., in a state of grace, so that their faith is living, not dead, faith. Nor should they omit to pray for the grace of perseverance, that will help them to make their minds and wills ever more steadfast in the free assent to divine revelation.

See Also: VIRTUE.

Bibliography: S. HARENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 6.1:357–393, J. TRÜTSCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:920–925. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 4:1262. J. DUPLACY, ibid. 1269–75.

[P. DE LETTER]

FALASHAS

Also known as 'Kayla,' or Beta Israel, a native Jewish sect of ETHIOPIA. Various theories have been proposed about the origin of the Falashas, who are physically and linguistically related to the tribe of the Agaw. According to one tradition, its ancestry traces to Menelik I, son of King Solomon of Israel, and the Queen of Sheba. Some scholars place the date of the sect's origin before the second century B.C., largely because the Ethiopian Jews are unfamiliar with either the Babylonian or Palestinian Talmud. Their Bible is written in an archaic Semitic language known as Ge'ez (the liturgical language of the Ethiopian Coptic Church), and of the Hebrew Scriptures they are most familiar with the Pentateuch. Ethiopian Jews refer to their sect as "Beta Israel" (House of Israel) and consider the name "Falasha," which is Amharic for "exiles" or "landless ones," a derogatory term.

The religion of the Ethiopian Jews is a modified form of Mosaic Judaism generally unaffected by postbiblical developments. They retain animal sacrifice. They celebrate scriptural and nonscriptural feast days, although the latter are not the same as those celebrated by Jews elsewhere. Their calendar contains the principal Jewish holidays beside several feasts and fast days of their own. One of the sect's nonscriptural feast days, for example, is the Commemoration of Abraham. The Sabbath regulations of Beta Israel are stringent. Members of the sect observe biblical dietary laws, but not the postbiblical rabbinic regulations concerning distinctions between meat and dairy foods. Monogamy is practiced, marriage at a very early age is rare, and marriage outside the religious community is forbidden.

Their religious life, centered in synagogue worship, consists in the recitation of prayers and the reading of the Torah. The chief functionary in each village is the high priest, who is assisted by priests of lower rank. The community appoints their priests, who are not regarded as descended from AARON. There are also monks who live alone or in monasteries, isolated from the other people (Falashas). RABBIS do not exist in the sect.

Until the mid-1980s Ethiopian Jews segregated themselves either in separate villages or in separate quarters in Christian or Islamic towns, in the mountain region of Semen, north of Lake Tana (the source of Blue Nile). They were skilled in agriculture, masonry, pottery, ironworking and weaving. Under the Emperor Haile Selassie I, a few rose to positions of prominence in education and government, but reports of persecution followed the emperor's ouster in 1974. More than 12,000 Ethiopian Jews were airlifted to Israel from late 1984 to early 1985, when the Ethiopian government halted the program. The airlift resumed in 1989, and about 3,500 Falashas immigrated to Israel in 1990. In May 1991, the Israeli government evacuated nearly all of the more than 14,000 Ethiopian Jews remaining in Ethiopia.

Bibliography: S. KAPLAN, Fils d'Abraham: Les Falashas (Belgium 1990). S. KAPLAN, "'Falasha' Religion: Ancient Judaism or Evolving Ethiopian Tradition?" Jewish Quarterly Review 79 (1988) 49–65. D. KESSLER, The Falashas: A Short History of the Ethiopian Jews (London 1996). S. D. MESSING, The Story of the Falashas: "Black Jews" of Ethiopia (Yale 1982). T. PARFITT and E. TREVISAN SEMI, eds., The Beta Israel in Ethiopia and Israel: Studies on Ethiopian Jews (London 1993). S. SANDMEL, "Jews, Christians and the Future: What May We Hope For," in D. J. FASCHING, ed., The Jewish People in Christian Preaching (Lewiston, NY 1984) 89–104.

[K. HRUBY/T. W. FESUH]

FALCONIERI

Noble family of FLORENCE that included two saints and two able cardinals.

Alexius, St., b. 1200, d. c. 1310, was one of seven Florentine nobles who met together for devotions. According to legend, the Virgin appeared to them in 1233 telling them to leave Florence. They returned in 1240 and built a church on the present site of SS. Annunziata. Although their followers increased rapidly in the 13th century, recognition of them as an order was delayed. In 1304, when Pope Benedict XI finally approved the SER-VITES, Alexius was the only one of the original seven still living. He was beatified in 1717, the others in 1725; all were canonized in 1888.

Feast: Feb. 12 (Seven Holy Founders of the Servites).

Juliana, St., b. 1270, d. 1341, the niece of St. Alexius, founded the Third Order of the Servites of Mary (see MANTELLATE SISTERS) when she was 14 years old. Because of her mother's advanced age, she did not immediately establish a community. Her followers practiced their devotions in their homes. When her mother died in 1302, they began their community life. She was canonized in 1737.

Feast: June 19.

Lelio, cardinal, d. 1648, studied law at the University of Perugia and obtained a degree from the University of Pisa. He became an advocate in Rome, and Popes Paul V, Gregory XV, and URBAN VIII sent him to govern cities and provinces. Urban preferred his counsel in important questions. When he was appointed nuncio to Brussels in 1635, the government considered him pro-French and refused to receive him. In 1643 he was created a cardinal and sent as legate to Bologna. He was an excellent administrator, lessening dissension among the nobles and assisting the poor. He was one of three cardinals who heard the appeal of the delegates from the University of Louvain concerning the Augustinus of Cornelius JANSEN.

Alessandro, cardinal, b. 1657, d. 1734, was grandnephew of Lelio. He received his first appointments from Pope INNOCENT XII (1691–1700). In 1702 Pope CLEMENT XI asked him to clear the Roman countryside of persons who made the region unsafe for the inhabitants; in a short time he had restored order. A competent governor of Rome under Clement, he continued in that office during the pontificates of Innocent XIII and Benedict XIII. In 1724 Benedict created him a cardinal and also consecrated his new chapel at the Falconieri villa in Frascati. Both the villa and the palace in Rome are still called by the family name even though they have other owners.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938–61) 29:128, 188; 34:98, 179–180. Acta Sanctorum June 4:766–773. L. CÀLLARI, I palazzi di Roma (3d ed. Rome 1944). A. M. ROSSI, ibid. 11:444–445. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATT-WATER (New York 1956) 1:311–313; 2:581–583.

[M. L. SHAY]

FALKNER, TOMÁS

Jesuit missionary; b. Manchester, England, Oct. 17, 1707; d. Plowden Hall, England, Jan. 30, 1784. Falkner studied physical and mathematical sciences with Newton, who was said by a contemporary to have considered him his favorite pupil, and medicine with Richard Mead. As physician for a cargo of slaves, Falkner came to Buenos Aires in 1730 and was converted to Catholicism. He entered the Society of Jesus on May 14, 1732, and was ordained in 1739. Between 1743 and 1751 he worked, with some interruptions, in the Reductions in the pampas and highlands of what is now the province of Buenos Aires. From 1752 to 1756 he was in Santa Fé, and from 1756 to 1767, in Córdoba. During all those years in addition to his priestly labors, he continued to practice medicine, so necessary in those regions where there was a scarcity of medical care. After the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767) he returned to England where he resided until his death. Only two of his writings, both fragmentary and abridged, are extant, but the first is so valuable that it is now considered a classic of its type: A Description of Patagonia (London 1774; reprinted by A. Neumann, Chicago 1935), which, according to present-day usage, would now be titled "A Description of the Province of Buenos Aires." The second work is Of the Patagonians (Darlington 1788; reedited by G. Furlong, Buenos Aires 1929).

Bibliography: G. FURLONG, Tomás Falkner y su ''Acerca de los patagones,'' 1788 (Buenos Aires 1954). R. F. DOUBLET, ''An Englishman in Rio de la Plata,'' Month 23 (1960) 216–226.

[H. STORNI]

FALL RIVER, DIOCESE OF

The Diocese of Fall River (Riverormensis) is the suffragan of the metropolitan See of Boston, with jurisdiction over most of southeastern Massachusetts. Fall River, subject to the bishop of the PROVIDENCE, R.I., diocese from 1872 to 1904, was established as a separate see on March 12, 1904.

The Pilgrims were the first settlers in the area, landing at Provincetown on Cape Cod in November 1620. Very few Catholics settled there until the 19th century, when the rise of industry, particularly textiles, created such a demand for labor that hundreds and later thousands of English–Irish immigrants were welcomed. Portuguese, recruited from the Azores for the whaling industry that flourished in Nantucket and New Bedford before the Civil War, later entered the textile industry, and French–Canadians arrived in great numbers at the invitation of mill owners. Between 1820 and 1904, there were 44 parishes established in the area, 18 of them for non–English–language groups. Successive waves of Italians, Poles, Germans, and Lebanese followed, so that of the 13 parishes founded by Fall River's first bishop, nine were national. Catholics soon constituted more than 50 percent of the total population. Under the direction of successive bishops, a well–knit, integrated series of services and institutions provided for every level of need.

Sala di Primavera at the Villa Faconieri, Frascati, Italy. (©Cuchi White/CORBIS)

William Stang (1854–1907), scholar, theologian, and pulpit orator, was consecrated in Providence, May 1, 1904, as Fall River's first ordinary. During his brief career, he wrote pastoral letters entitled "The Christian Family" (1905), "Christian Marriage" (1906), and "Christian Education" (1907); summoned the first diocesan synod in June 1905; and enforced the Acerbo nimis on catechetical instruction, two months after its publication by Pius X. His successor, Daniel F. Feehan, (1855–1934), consecrated Sept. 19, 1907, in Fall River, was particularly concerned with the need for expansion. He established 36 new parishes, 23 of them national, and provided orphanages, day nurseries, camps, and welfare agencies. Catholic Youth Organization (CYO) activities in Fall River stem from his encouragement of them in the late 1920s. In 1930 he was granted an auxiliary, James E. Cassidy (1869–1951), who succeeded as ordinary on July 29, 1934. Cassidy, the workingman's advocate, a stern upholder of temperance and an apostle of charity, founded homes for the aged, CYO centers, and a home for the cancerous poor. In his last years, he presided at the founding of Stonehill College (1948), a four–year coeducational institution conducted by the Holy Cross Fathers.

James L. Connolly (1894–1986), a native of Fall River, was consecrated in 1945, as coadjutor with right of succession; he succeeded to the see on May 17, 1951. It was during his tenure in office that the Anchor, a diocesan weekly, was inaugurated in 1957. His successors, Bishop Daniel A. Cronin (1970–1991) and Bishop Sean O'Malley (1992–) witnessed a dramatic increase in the Catholic population, as well as in the number of parishes. The Fall River diocese includes the largest Portuguese community in the United States.

Bibliography: Archives, Diocese of Fall River. F. J. BRADLEY, Brief History of the Diocese of Fall River (New York 1931).

[J. L. CONNOLLY/EDS.]

FALLA, MANUEL DE

Foremost 20th-century Andalusian composer; b. Cádiz, Nov. 23, 1876; d. Alta Gracia (Córdoba province), Argentina, Nov. 14, 1946. He studied piano first with his mother, then in 1897 began his training with José Tragó (piano) and Felipe Pedrell (composition)-the leaders of the Spanish national music renewal. His opera La Vida Breve won first prize in a national competition in 1905. From 1907 to the outbreak of World War I he lived in Paris, accompanying, teaching piano, and learning from his Impressionist friends, DEBUSSY, Ravel, and Dukas. Once more in Spain, Falla found his stride, turning out a succession of masterful works, such as the ballets El Amor Brujo (containing the popular "Ritual Fire Dance") and El Sombrero de Tres Picos ("The Three-Cornered Hat''); the symphonic "impressions" Noches en los jardines de España ("Nights in the Gardens of Spain''); a puppet opera based on Cervantes, El Retablo de Maese Pedro; a concerto for harpsichord and chamber orchestra; and a suite, Pedrelliana, in tribute to his old master. After joining his sister in Argentina in 1939, he concentrated on his miracle-play setting of Jacinto Verdaguer's mystical epic of the birth of America, L'Atlántida, unfinished at his death. After services in Córdoba cathedral, his body was interred in the Cádiz cathedral crypt by permission of Pius XII. He was a man of self-effacing austerity and a deep spirituality that issued not so much in church music as in the evocation of the Spanish mystique by means of a pure, abstract, lucidly structured style.

Bibliography: M. DE FALLA, Escritos sobre música y músicos, ed. F. SOPEÑA (Buenos Aires 1950). J. B. TREND, Manuel de Falla and the Spanish Music (New York 1934). J. PAHISSA, Manuel de Falla (London 1954). R. ARÍZAGA, Manuel de Falla (Buenos Aires 1961). H. WIRTH, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 3:1747-57. V. SALAS VIU, "The Mystery of Manuel de Falla's La Atlántida," Inter-American Music Bulletin 33 (Jan. 1963) 1-6. S. DEMARQUEZ, Manuel de Falla (Paris 1963). A. BUDWIG, "The Evolution of Manuel de Falla's The Three-Cornered Hat, (1916-20)," Journal of Musicological Research 5 (1984) 191-212. M. CHRISTOFORIDIS, "El peso de la vanguardia en el proceso creativo del Concerto de Manuel de Falla," Revista de Musicología 20 (1997) 669–682. N. H. LEE, Manuel de Falla: A Bio-Bibliography (Westport, Conn. 1998). C. A. HESS, "Manuel de Falla's The Three-Cornered Hat and the Right-Wing Press in Pre-Civil War Spain," Journal of Musicological Research 15 (1995) 55-84. G. MOSHELL, "El Retablo de Maese Pedro [Master Peter's Puppet Show]," in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 1099-1100. Y. NOMMICK, "Un ejemplo de ambigüedad formal: El Allegro del Concerto de Manuel de Falla," Revista de Musicología 21 (1998) 11-35; "Forma y transformación de las ideas temáticas en las obras instrumentales de Manuel de Falla: Elementos de apreciación," Revista de Musicología 21 (1998) 573-591. C. URCHEUGUÍA SCHÖLZEL, "Aspectos compositivos en las Siete Canciones populares Españolas de Manuel de Falla (1914/15)," Anuario Musical 51 (1996) 177-201.

[R. STEVENSON]

FALLACY

A fallacy (Lat. fallacia, from fallax, meaning deceitful, or fallere, to deceive) may be defined as a statement or argument that leads one to a false conclusion because of a misconception of the meaning of the words used or a flaw in the reasoning involved. Some terms often used as synonyms of fallacy have different shades of meaning. Thus, a sophism (Gr. $\sigma \circ \phi \circ \zeta$, wise) is a false argument offered with deliberate intent to deceive, a sophist being one who would rather appear to be wise than be wise, i.e., be a trickster (see SOPHISTS). A paralogism (Gr. $\pi \alpha \rho \dot{\alpha}$, contrary to, and $\lambda \circ \gamma \circ \zeta$, reason) is an unintentional violation of the rules of logic. A PARADOX (Gr. $\pi \alpha \rho \dot{\alpha}$, contrary to, and $\delta \delta \xi \alpha$, opinion) is a statement that sounds absurd or contradictory, but yet may be true in fact, i.e., "I die to live."

Classification. There is no strict agreement among logicians on the classification of fallacies. Some distinguish only two basic types, namely, those "in diction" and those "extra diction." Modern writers usually amplify the list with new titles that expand or, in some instances, merely duplicate, the basic concepts. The following outline reflects the more recent methods of classifying fallacies:

- I. Fallacies of INDUCTION
 - A. Insufficient observation
 - B. Unwarranted generalization
 - C. False analogy
- II. Fallacies of DEDUCTION
 - A. Formal
 - 1. In the proposition
 - 2. In the syllogism
 - a. Illicit premises
 - b. Undistributed middle
 - c. Extended conclusion
 - B. Material
 - 1. In diction
 - 2. Extra diction

Regarding inductive fallacies, it is obvious that inadequate observation of particulars cannot lead to a valid generalization. Only after a sufficient number of cases have been carefully checked and rechecked can a safe conclusion be drawn. Again, analogy is good for comparison, but becomes illicit when used to imply identity in nature or characteristics. Children, for example, are as frisky as lambs, but to conclude to an identification of all other characteristics would be unwarranted.

Among deductive fallacies, formal fallacies (paralogisms) arise from violations of the rules of logic regulating the drawing of inferences from propositions and of conclusions from premises in syllogisms. In the case of the PROPOSITION, fallacies may result from improper obversion, conversion, or OPPOSITION, for example, converting "All men are mortal" to "All mortals are men." These are called fallacies of simple inspection. In the case of the SYLLOGISM, formal fallacy may result from violation of any of the rules of syllogistic reasoning. Thus, the syllogism "Man is rational; a woman is not a man; therefore, a woman is not rational," violates the rule that demands only three terms. Some violations-such as having two negative premises, or having two particular premises, or concluding universally from a particular premise or affirmatively from a negative one, or introducing the middle term into the conclusion-are obvious. Others require an expert knowledge of formal logic to detect them.

Fallacies are divided materially into those "in diction" (fallacies of language that arise from an abuse of words) and those "extra diction" (fallacies apart from language that arise from an abuse of reasoning about things). These can be further divided and subdivided in various ways, of which the following are representative.

- I. Fallacies in diction.
 - A. Equivocation—one word mistaken for another. "He turned the page." (Boy or book?)
 - B. Amphibology—double-meaning sentence. "He shot the man with his gun." (Whose?)

Manuel de Falla. (©Bettman/CORBIS)

- C. Composition—attributing to the whole what is true only of the part. "A is a fine ballplayer; B is a fine ballplayer; C is a fine ballplayer. . . . Ergo, this is a fine team."
- D. Division—attributing to the part what is true only of the whole. "The straw that broke the camel's back."
- E. Metaphor—taking a figure of speech literally or stretching it unduly. "He was as hungry as a horse, so he ate a bucket of oats."
- F. Accent—different stress, tone, or gesture giving a different meaning to a word. "Minute or minute steak?" "Was the priest incensed, or incensed?"
- II. Fallacies extra diction.
 - A. Accident—presenting as true in the definite particular what is only generally true. "Americans are a generous people; I am an American; therefore, I am generous."
 - B. False absolute—assuming as always true what is true only in its proper field or circumstance.
 "Thou shalt not kill." Therefore, wars are forbidden."
 - C. Pretended cause—post hoc, ergo propter hoc; a prior event is cited as cause of a subsequent one. "After the U.S. adopted prohibition, the nation prospered."

- D. Evading the issue—ignoratio elenchi. "Have you ever been arrested?" "Sir, how dare you ask me that?" This fallacy has many forms, the principal ones of which are:
 - 1. Argumentum ad hominem—argument against the person, not the issue.
 - 2. Argumentum ad populum—plea based on the arousal of passion and prejudice in a crowd.
 - 3. Argumentum ad verecundiam (sense of shame)—embarrassing a speaker by quoting a great name against him. "Einstein would not agree."
 - 4. Argumentum ad misericordiam (mercyplea)—"But, Judge, he is of your faith (race)."
 - 5. Argumentum ad ignorantiam—taking advantage of one's ignorance. "It won't hurt, child."
 - 6. Argumentum ad baculum (the big stick) threatening an opponent, making him concede through fear. "This, or else!"
- E. Begging the question (petitio principii)—more than a mere evasion, actually negation or contradiction of the issue. "A monarchy is the best form of government, because it gives everyone a voice." This fallacy is said to have four forms:
 - 1. Flat contradiction—"I do not exist."
 - 2. Hysteron-proteron—a purely empty, negative response taking for granted what needs to be proved. "Women are incomprehensible—no man can say he understands them."
 - 3. Tautology—a mere repetition. "A circle is a line that circles around."
 - 4. Vicious circle—trying to prove statement A by reason of B, whose validity depends on A.
 "A soul is simple because it is nondimensional, and it is nondimensional because it is simple."
- F. The complex question—a "loaded" query that cannot be answered by a simple yes or no. "Have you stopped taking graft?"

Evaluation. These are the most commonly cited fallacies. Their true number, however, is incalculable because some obscurity is to be found in every action and utterance of man, the fallible creature. LOGIC tries to discover the true intent and to detect misconceptions, but only He who is "the searcher of heart and soul" (Ps 7.10) can avoid all fallacies.

TRUTH itself is the primary objective of the INTEL-LECT, just as the good is the goal of the will. Man strives for the truth in many ways—by listening, reading, observing, meditating, and praying. He attains some truths, yet always imperfectly by reason of his first fallacy, the Fall. When he tries to enunciate the truth to others, he encounters the difficulty of choosing the proper, unequivocal word. The hearer, handicapped by his own imperfections, which are sometimes accentuated by prejudice or ill-will, does not always receive the exact meaning intended.

But this fecundity of fallacies, so evident in human affairs, should not make one cynical. In substance, if not in all its details and if not immediately, truth is possible of attainment. Civil courts, historical research, scientific experiments, scriptural exegesis, and philosophical and theological investigation—even such things as panel discussions and public debates—all seek to ferret out the truth. Thus avoidance of fallacy becomes the grand adventure of man's rationality. Truth presents a difficult challenge when compared to the ease of error, but it also offers an exceedingly great reward.

See Also: FALSITY; ANTINOMY; ARGUMENTATION.

Bibliography: S. J. HARTMAN, Fundamentals of Logic (St. Louis 1949). R. HOUDE and J. J. FISCHER, Handbook of Logic (Dubuque 1954). J. A. OESTERLE, Logic: The Art of Defining and Reasoning (2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963).

[P. C. PERROTTA]

FALLON, MICHAEL FRANCIS

Bishop, educator; b. Kingston, Ontario, Canada, May 17, 1867; d. London, Ontario, Feb. 22, 1931. Fallon was the son of Dominick Fallon, an Irish immigrant. He was educated by the Brothers of Christian Schools and later at Ottawa College where he received his B.A. (1889). He then studied theology at the Gregorian University, Rome, obtaining a doctorate in philosophy and theology. While there, he sought admission to the Oblates of Mary Immaculate; he entered their novitiate in Holland, pronounced his vows June 29, 1894, and was ordained July 29, 1894. On his return to Canada his first assignment was at the University of Ottawa where he was the first to hold the chair of English literature. During this time he served seven years as editor of the Owl, a monthly, then one year as editor of the Union.

Fallon was renowned for his lectures on Daniel O'Connell, Edmund Burke, and other Irish patriots. He served as vice rector of the University for three years, after which he resigned to become pastor of St. Joseph's, an Irish parish attached to the University (1898–1901). From 1901 to 1904 he was pastor of Holy Angels parish, Buffalo, N.Y. Elected provincial of the American province of Oblates in 1904, he served in that capacity until 1909. He was named bishop of London, Ontario, Dec. 14, 1909, and consecrated there on April 25, 1910, by Abp. F. P. McEvay of Toronto. During his episcopate, Fallon took an active part in the discussions of public questions; championed the Irish element in the controversy between French and Irish Catholics; and staunchly advocated home rule for Ireland, although he was a strong imperialist on other questions of secular politics. St. Peter's Seminary and Brescia Hall, both affiliated with the University of Western Ontario, were established during his tenure. He edited Shorter Poems by Catholics (London 1930).

[J. T. FLYNN]

FALLON, VALÈRE

Economist, moralist, and pioneer of the family movement in Belgium; b. Namur, Belgium, May 24, 1875; d. Louvain, Belgium, Jan. 21, 1955. Fallon entered the Society of Jesus in 1892 and was ordained in 1907. He studied political and social sciences at the Universities of Louvain, Berlin, and Munich from 1909 to 1914 and received a doctorate in political and social sciences in 1913. His thesis, "La Plus-value et l'impôt," received a special award from the Belgian government and the University of Louvain. He taught moral philosophy and economics (1909–43) at the Jesuit college, Louvain, and social economics (1922–49) at the Institut Technique Supérieur Zénobe Gramme, Liège. His Principes d' économie sociale ran to seven editions and was translated into Dutch, Spanish, Italian, and English.

Fallon served as chaplain to Belgian forces, from 1914 to 1918 and from 1939 to 1940. With Colonel Lemercier and a few others, he founded (1921) Ligue des Familles Nombreuses and remained its effectual leader until his death. He promoted demographic studies in Belgium and participated in founding the International Population Union in 1928. Among his works are: Les Allocations familiales en Belgique (Louvain 1926, translated into Dutch), La Population belge et son avenir (Bruxelles 1934), La Sécurité sociale et les allocations familiales (Bruxelles 1945), Les Deux régimes d'allocations familiales (Bruxelles 1952).

[C. R. MERTENS]

FALSE DECRETALS (PSEUDO-ISIDORIAN FORGERIES)

The False, or Pseudo-Isidorian, Decretals form the principal work among the so-called Pseudo-Isidorian Forgeries, namely, a group of canonical collections that are intimately connected in origin and tendency and that appeared about mid-9th century. The name Pseudo-

1500-000 san - Salappero malienti h er rantendere Frashud arenerenua cocletiafi ire Talebut stag fit line queur rori edeft of, hit autofrace meacement mentiolitai . Induidant æ «finasfiert - Undestille unfaf g ner cambut reuternflount dons able www.cowww.sn.pop INSECUMAL Dell ocimous ist populus - Monsigvinious Notig fineferante - Corquedheere quidaqui reae commonest - Honber confestion plage debenut ' Quitaurfuero constat fuera ce plubra Seneracconturam tedutapottolacae mini medefucuram Quaecournitola ammonique miluanunar poncorrigimut paceffee perteuenenen congruenenregulitum ur percout beergo quiepropriitree tur protectus interpretation of the protectus of the tur fibripedique forstean blandeur mladar -Dara en blanic-florence occomine confiit - utchui DECRETARAMA LIOHISADVIRSVSEVTICEH CONSTAN AVSUSTST PROHUNTILATHATURALA DOCONSTAT ABUS HATVAIS DISOLICITATO HOMINIS SCALTO ILICTIS SI MOTILIOIVTICITI PRBRO lever Adnostamentan curedileca met lecerte salifit - généficiuna ber or quorundam par for Audor pullulars Sollie culmectum extrac pafte paobr placut tereterils mit quomde commune formo que fupfing mune fermo que fupfing number more acholice fider . De commbar udfacurum Hora siple quosumbor mpbicarefiar porue nuflagnot erre pacer feelt auxiliantechio proundere opia anut sefandum anut dudum opie donnatam radiatut pettre exempti. Dreceutechia pias Binem diecert interfui - NAN XIII Optist to LALCONTS PAPARO platta NAUGA OPIE - UDI (LALCONTS) polata NAUGA OPIE - UDI (LALCONT) polata NAUGA OPIE -

ILICTIS SIMOFRATRIFLAVIANO Depo Leoepr Cum spiant finnt er dementer finat mpenaer fais Lundabili fide procedefiae carbolice paetolico ur adnor temperatur mitera - dehir quae apudnor per cur bationir Aropicum com nouer une, Mutamut frater meatern nam quicquid illud fuit feandali pae bit filere pourt fe - Cenon pour pro te ut primeut suot infinazio magnituse re-lacont infirueres suedererum gefter un fide pot temut ambigere A coepinut chu Ubellum eurocsit prin - quitopueriur acou fance eutebio epo Immerico communiónepi uación 'Maximecum ciocación fe adfinitered rur - suectia pretenciam denegat tixadeo rudnio libellarin appellanonit featte te - sueceamorfuntte sutceprium "Qua mt featten obenly pulsin ne unconseffacouor libellor moonfla nopolarana urbeproponers Quibutre but meer cedenabut precdum agnetamat qua utbaa acommunione eceletare fuerar te paracut " Sedref presencet adoustan facences por fewolument recovern . Kutop adminim nciam cuncerdeferri Quo por quitecerdoni di .maeura uclumut este nucea - patril posti mut moognoof robut nacunit quam pareit pr decime definire prost quamuniter paquae fune unsetter audiantif " feideo frater mea The quies peridoneamma come ap Manuscript folio from "Hispana Gallica Augustodunensis," false decretals, 10th century (Cod. Vat, Lat. 1341, fol. 160v).

Isidore (hereinafter Ps.) can be traced back to the 17th century; in the late 19th century B. Simson extended it to the entire group of writings. It is taken from the supposed author of the False Decretals, Isidore Mercator (according to later tradition, Mercatus, Peccator), the name of the collator of generally spurious papal briefs from Clement I until Gregory II. The Middle Ages often took him for St. Isidore of Seville. Among the Ps. Forgeries are numbered: the Hispana Gallica Augustodunensis (hereinafter HGA), the Capitula Angilramni (hereinafter Cap. Angilr.), the collection of capitularies of BENEDICT THE LEVITE (hereinafter Ben. Lev.), and the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals (hereinafter Ps. Decretals). But the group of forgeries cannot yet be limited merely to these.

Circumstances and Character of the Forgeries. The four above-named works can be understood in part as representing a reaction to the state of the Church under Louis the Pious (814–840) and his successors: the harmony between Church and State that had existed under Charlemagne had been disturbed by rivalries and attacks by secular leaders on the ecclesiastical establishment and church holdings. Between 818 and 845, several bishops had been deposed or exiled from their sees; reform synods had tried in vain to better the situation (such as Paris, 829; Aachen, 836; Meaux-Paris, 845–846); and there had been all the less reason to hope for any improvement after the definitive fragmentation of the Carolingian Empire in 843.

Tendencies. It would not suffice to consider the Ps. Forgeries simply from the point of view of ecclesiastical politics and jurisprudence: they are more than fabricated legal sources. Attention has been drawn to the plethora of their regulations on the liturgy, doctrine of the Sacraments, the Vita apostolica (Möhler), marriage law (Von Scherer), and the hagiographical character of the False Decretals (Davenport); the picture of the Church sketched in the Forgeries has been called "a vision of a Church in the Golden Age" (Williams). Judging by the relative amount of time and energy devoted to the various points, the conclusion could be drawn that the principal aim of the Forgeries was to protect the suffragan bishops from the clutches of the metropolitans, provincial synods, and the secular power. The Forgeries complicate immeasurably the procedural rules and the possibility of depositions of bishops who are described panegyrically as oculi, columnae, throni dei, dii, etc. To strengthen the position of the bishops, the chorepiscopi, considered as rivals, are relegated to the status of the simple priesthood; and the metropolitans, who are to make decisions only in collaboration with their coprovincials, are jurisdictionally constricted by a newly invented office, that of the primas, or patriarcha. Accusations against bishops are subtracted from the jurisdiction of the provincial and national synods by being declared causae maiores, reserved to the pope, to whom alone belongs likewise the right to ratify the councils. Papal rights are stressed to the extent to which they favor the suffragan bishops.

Unity of the Forgeries. The Ps. Forgeries show evidences, both in tendency and in composition, of a common literary origin, no matter how divergent they may be in their use of sources and in the treatment of specific points. The scope of the sources, the interconnections, and the basic attitude are so uniform that there can be no doubt that the whole group of writings came from the same sort of mind, all the more since the differences between the individual forgeries are partly conditioned by the degree of proficiency of the individual composer and the species of source used in each case. The sequence of the forgeries and the degree of mutual influence have not yet been entirely clarified, but it is probable that the HGA was the earliest product, and that it was used in the Ps. Decretals and the False Capitularies; the Decretals presuppose also the Cap. Angilr. and some at least of the perhaps still unfinished capitularies of Ben. Lev., although Additio IV of the capitularies presupposes the False Decretals.

Individual Forgeries. The HGA, still unedited, is named after the place of origin of the only complete manuscript (Cod. vat. lat. 1341, 10th century; cf. G. Le-Bras, "Autumn dans l'histoire du droit canonique" in Mémoires de la Société Éduenne 48, autumn 1939). This manuscript is to be treated in the new Hispana edition of G. Martinez Diez (cf. Miscelánea Comillas 41 [1964]). The same version is contained in a Carolingian addition to Cod. Hamilton 132 (10th century) of the former Prussian State Library (cf. E. A. Lowe, Codices Latini antiquiores 8, no. 1047 [1959] 8, 61). It represents a reworking of the Hispana Gallica, i.e., the Spanish collection of canons (Patrologia Latina v. 84) current in Gaul (of which the only other surviving text is in Cod. Vindobonensis 411). The HGA corrects many meaningless passages in the Hispana Gallica; the revision is based in part on genuine sources (Dionysio-Hadriana, Irish collection of canons), but there are also typically Ps. additions. The HGA is today generally accepted as a Ps. preliminary work; this contention was initiated by F. Maassen (Pseudoisidor-Studien I-II, Sitzungsberichte [Vienna 1884-85] 108-109), after earlier research had taken the HGA to be a Hispana with subsequent Ps. interpolations. The period from 845 to 847 is thought to have been the date of composition, 847 being the more probable of the two, although the possibility cannot be excluded of a stratified composition extending beyond even 847.

Capitula Angilramni. The Cap. Angilr. contained 71 (another tradition says 72) brief and relatively moderately falsified laws, almost all dealing with prosecution of clerics, especially bishops (cf. G. May, "Zu den Anklagebeschränkungen . . . in den capitula Angilramni" in Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte 72 [1961]). They have come down in manuscript for the most part together with the A-1 version of the Ps. Decretals and have been edited together with these latter by Hinschius. They claim to have been sent by Pope Adrian I (772-795) to Bp. Angilram of Metz (768-791), hence on occasion the title Capitula Hadriani or in Cap. Angilr. 4: synodus Romana; in many manuscripts, Pope Adrian is the addressee, but the capitularies have nothing to do with either man. The forger drew heavily upon Roman Law, and used extensively the Dionysio-Hadriana. The Cap. Angilr. have been compiled from the sources without any mediation via the Ps. Decretals and at times yield a text that is meaningless for the practice of the Western Church. There are crossreferences between the Cap. Angilr. and the capitularies of Ben. Lev., but the priority has not been clarified in all cases. In the Ps. Decretals of Popes Julius and Felix II, the Cap. Angilr. are to a large extent presented as canons of the Council of Nicaea (325).

Capitularies of Benedict the Levite. The Ben. Lev. consists of three books and four additions and claims to be a supplementation of the Capitularium collectio of Abbot ANSEGIS of Fontanelle (Monumenta Germaniae)

Historica: Capitularia 1:394-450), together with which it has often been transmitted and whose numbering of books (1-4, Ansegis; 5-8, Ben. Lev.) it continues (cf. E. Seckel, "Ben. Lev. decurtatus et excerptus" in Festschrift H. Brunner [Munich-Leipzig 1914]; K. Christ, "Die Schlossbibliothek von Nikolsburg und die Überlieferung der Kapitularien-Sammlung des Ansegis'' in Deutsches Archiv 1 [1937]; W. A. Eckhardt, "Die von Baluze benutzten Handschriften der Kapitularien-Sammlungen'' in Mélanges Charles Braibant [Brussels 1959]). The author claims to have initiated the collection at the order of Abp. Otgar of Mainz (826-847; cf. A. Gerlich, Rheinische Viertel-jahresblätter 19 [1954]) and to have found the material mainly in the archives of the Mainz church. The forger clearly wants to insinuate a Mainz origin to the reader: at the beginning of the first book are three genuine fragments from the correspondence of Boniface; and he tries to picture himself to the reader as writing from the right bank of the Rhine (cf. J. Haller, Nikolaus I. und Pseudoisidor [Stuttgart 1936] 170). Some authors have given credence to the prologue, and the possibility has been weighed of a Mainz author for the entire forgery as well as for a part of it. But the many cross-references within the forgeries indicate an origin in a single locality and with a single group of persons; and here the West Frankish Kingdom and the opponents of Hincmar of Reims, the partisans of Ebbo of Reims, would be a more reasonable supposition.

The terminus post quem that must be accepted is April 21, 847, date of the death of Otgar of Mainz, who is mentioned in the perfect tense in the introductory poem (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Poetae 2:672.2.5-6); the terminus ante quem is determined by the date of the capitulary of Quierzy (Feb. 14, 857), which cites false capitularies in its "capitula domni Karoli et domni Hludowici imperatorum'' (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Capitularia 2:289–291). Although Ben. Lev. calls his product capitularies, he had recourse to a set of sources similar to those used by Ps.; his set of original sources is smaller, but he often goes beyond those of the Ps. Decretals. In the combination of his originals, Ben. Lev. has been diffident; he does not fuse the excerpts as drastically as does Ps. and so is more brittle and less prolix, doing a reasonably good job at imitating the sober style of the Frankish royal chancery.

Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals. The Ps. Decretals include papal briefs and councils from Clement I, who died c. 90 (or from Anacletus I, who died c. 79 and is here listed as following Clement I) to Gregory II (716–731). The manuscripts, of which almost 100 are known today, have been divided into five classes by Hinschius, the last editor. Class A–1 comprises three parts: (1) after a few introductory fragments, 60 false decretals from Clement to Melchiades (d. 314); (2) councils, beginning with Nicaea I (325) and ending with the Second Council of Seville (619), although Toletanum XIII (683) is latest in point of time; (3) decretals and councils from Sylvester (d. 335) to Gregory II (d. 731)-the second part includes the first part of the Hispana Gallica, and the third part includes its second part. Class A-2 contains no portion on the councils and only those decretals from Clement to Damasus (d. 384). Class A/B, wrongly assessed by Hinschius because of the mistake in dating Codex Vat. lat. 630, is close to the genuine Hispana and is probably one of the first of the series of forgeries. The later classes, B and C, are derived from A/B. A class C manuscript was the original for J. Merlin's first edition (1524); it is No. 27 of the Bibliothèque de l'Assemblée Nationale and is late 12th century. Ps. avoided any free rendition over large portions of his forgery; rather he put it together in mosaic form out of various, often drastically edited, excerpts (about 10,000). His original sources are: the Bible (in a version diverging from the Vulgate, often not noted by Hinschius); conciliar decisions; decretals; Roman legal sources; common law; capitularies; penitentials; HIB-ERNENSIS COLLECTIO; writings of the Church Fathers, bishops, and private individuals; the Creed of Emperor Justinian I; the Constitutum Constantini; the Liber pontificalis; and rules of religious orders. Most of the fragments he took from the HGA or its preliminary forms. Among the general collections, most use is made of the Quesnelliana (Patrologia Latina 56:359-747) and the Dionysio-Hadriana, which was the most widespread collection of canon law in Carolingian days and seems to have been imitated in the invocation and the conclusion of the Ps. Decretals.

Location and Identity of the Forger. The question of the identity and location of the forger centers around the authorship of the False Decretals. The period of composition of the False Decretals has been presumed to lie between 847 and 852, since they included the capitularies of Ben. Lev. finished after April 847 and are cited in writings of Hincmar of Reims, perhaps in 852 and certainly in 857; a material influence of Ps. can be felt in the primacy claim of Thietgaud of Trier, about 852. Of the many, often fantastic, suggestions as to location and identity of the author (e.g., the papal chancery, Pope Joan, someone in Mainz), only the latest will be mentioned. (1) The Diocese of Le Mans in the ecclesiastical province of Tours (first Simson, recently especially Fournier, LeBras, Grand). The forgeries would have provided the bishop of Le Mans with a shield against the attacks of the Breton Duke Nominoe. A main argument is the linguistic similarity of the Ps. Decretals and the contemporary Gesta Domni Aldrici and the Actus pontificum Cenomannis in urbe degentium, a similarity that Lot (1940-41) chooses to explain in terms of a common schooling. (2) The royal chapel of Charles the Bald, more exactly Hilduin the Younger, Lupus of Ferrières, Wenilo of Sens, and Wulfhad of Bourges. This suggestion, however, offered by Buchner (1937) and approved by Oesterle (1938) has found no partisans. (3) The opponents of Hincmar of Reims and partisans of Ebbo of Reims. Abstracting from the fate of Ebbo, the description of the province fits just as well the ecclesiastical province of Reims, as does the campaign against the chorepiscopi and the solid front of the suffragans against their metropolitans. The question of place and author has stalled on a Non liquet, and there is scant hope of giving a conclusive solution simply by suggesting an author or team of authors who were of the same mind as evidenced in the Ps. forgeries. Greater hope of success would attend to a search for the Ps. library, the actual originals used.

Influence and Exposure of the Forgeries. Of all the Ps. Forgeries, the False Decretals gained greatest influence, as can be seen from the manuscript tradition. In the West Frankish Kingdom, Hincmar of Reims was the first to cite them in his writings (852?, 857, 859); in 858, Abbot Lupus of Ferrières inquired in Rome, on the part of several bishops, concerning a Ps. Decretal (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolae 6:114), but a forceful advocate of Ps. Law appeared only in the late 860s in the person of Bp. Hincmar of Laon, nephew and suffragan of Hincmar of Reims (845–882). The battle ended in 871 with the deposition of the bishop of Laon; his defeat was also that of the Ps. party, and the acceptance of the Ps. Decretals made only halting progress in the immediately subsequent decades.

In the kingdom of Lothair II, Thietgaud of Trier (847-863), a bitter opponent of Hincmar of Reims, was the first known to have taken cognizance of them; in the East Frankish Kingdom, the Acts of the Synods of Worms (868), Cologne (887), Metz (893), and Tribur (895) contained Ps. material. Although there was a widespread early tradition of the Ps. Decretals in Italy, signs of cognizance of Ps. appeared only slowly in papal briefs. Perhaps Rothard of Soissons brought Ps. Decretals to Rome in 864; in January 865 Pope Nicholas I presented the decretals of the martyr popes (i.e., the Ps. Decretals) as Roman archive material (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum, ed. P. Ewald, v. 2; 2785), without, however, quoting them verbatim. Explicit references to the Ps. Laws are found in the works of his successors Adrian II (867-872), John VIII (872-882), Stephen V (885-891), and John IX (898-900) and in writings connected with the Formosus dispute.

The reform popes made more intensive use of the Ps. Decretals; but it is a mistaken assumption that Leo IX

(1049–54) brought the Ps. Forgeries with him from Lorraine, for even his predecessors John XIX (1024–32) and Benedict IX (1032–44) had appealed to Ps. The letters of the early reform popes cited the Ps. Decretals only sparingly, and it was only with Urban II (1088–99) that more intensive use of them began. It is an error to suppose (e.g., Haller) that Gregory VII (1073–86) eagerly sought after Ps. writings. The chief channel of influence was not the papacy but rather the collections of canons.

The broadest stream stemmed from the Collectio ANSELMO DEDICATA (c. 890); of 1,980 capitula, 507 are Ps. Dissemination proceeded via the Decretum of BUR-CHARD OF WORMS (1,785 capitula, of which 141 are Ps.), and the Decretum and the Panormia of IVO OF CHARTRES to the Decretum of GRATIAN (having 3,500 capitula, of which 375 are Ps.). Of the more important collections of canons of the Gregorian reform, the Diversorum patrum sententiae have the largest percentage of Ps. (124 out of 315), but Ps. is represented to no inconsiderable extent in the canon law collection of Bp. ANSELM OF LUCCA (264 out of 1150) and the Collection of DEUSDEDIT (143 out of 1173). The Ps. Laws that found their way into all these documents cover many fields: they deal predominantly with questions of trial procedure and accusations, hierarchy and councils. The Ps. Decretals brought no advantages to the suffragan bishops; on the contrary, the reformers included laws that corresponded with their own ideas of the rank and dignity of the papacy and did not always agree with the aspirations of the bishops.

History of Criticism. Already Hincmar of Reims rejected and rebutted some of the Ps. Decretals material (pseudo-Nicene canons); and the spuriousness of certain fragments was wholeheartedly admitted, apart from anonymous writers, by BERNOLD OF CONSTANCE (d. 1100), Peter Comestor (d. c. 1179), MARSILIUS OF PADUA (d. 1342 or 1343), Gobelinus Persona (d. 1421), NICHOLAS OF CUSA (d. 1464), and Heinrich Kalteisen (d. 1465). But the discovery of the forgery did not affect their being used. The Magdeburg centuriatores under Flacius Illyricus (1559) devoted themselves to proving that the entire body of the pre-Siricius decretals were forgeries; complete success in this endeavor was attained only by the reformed theologian Blondel, who made a meticulous analysis of sources (1628). But the genuinity was still often seriously considered as a possibility, most recently by Dumont (1866-67).

Editions. There is no edition of the HGA. The Ben. Lev. has been edited by G. H. Pertz and F. H. Knust (Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Leges 2.2:39–158); a new edition prepared by E. Seckel (d. 1924) for the Monumenta Germaniae did not appear, but the question of sources (with the exception of the four additions) has been collated with superlative thoroughness in Seckel's "Studien zu Benedictus Levita I–VIII," Neues Archiv 26 (1900); 29 (1904); 31 (1905); 34 (1908); 35 (1909); 39 (1914); 40 (1915); 41 (1917–19) and in his posthumous works published by J. Juncker in Zeitschrift für Rechtsgeschichte 23 (1934) and 24 (1935).

FALSITY

The Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianae et capitula Angilramni have been edited by Hinschius (Leipzig 1863). This edition is unsatisfactory; its chief shortcoming is that in the council portions it reprints to a large extent the Madrid Hispana edition of F. A. Gonzáles. Although Merlin reproduces a later manuscript, his edition is truer to the tradition. And Hinschius's paleographic dating is so faulty that to correct it might involve a shift in the relationship of the classes.

Bibliography: J. MERLIN, ed., Tomus I quatuor conciliorum generalium, 2 v. (Paris 1524) v. 1, repr. Cologne 1530 was model for Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 271 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) v. 130. Ecclesiastica historia . . . congesta . . . per aliquot studiosos et pios viros in urbe Magdeburgica, centuria II und cent. III (Basel 1559). D. BLONDEL, Pseudo-Isidorus et Turrianus vapulantes . . . (Geneva 1628). J. A. MÖHLER, Gesammelte Schriften, ed. J. J. I. DÖLLINGER, 2 v. (Regensburg 1839-40) v. 1. H. WASSERSCHLEBEN, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Falschen Dekretalen (Breslau 1844); "Über das Vaterland der Falschen Dekretalen," Historische Zeitschrift 64 (1890) 234-250. J. WEIZSÄCKER, "Hincmar und Ps.-Is.," Zeitschrift für historische Theologie 28 (1858) 327-430; Der Kampf gegen den Chorepiskopat des fränkischen Reichs im 9. Jh. (Tübingen 1859). P. HINSCHIUS, "Der Beiname 'Mercator' in der Vorrede Ps.-Isidors," Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht 6 (1866) 148-152. É. DUMONT, "Les Fausses décrétales," Revue des questions historiques 1 (1866) 392-426; 2 (1867) 97-154. A. LAPÔTRE, "Hadrien II et les fausses Décrétales," ibid. 27 (1880) 377-431. H. SCHROERS, Hinkmar, Erzbischof von Reims (Freiburg 1884). R. VON SCHERER, Handbuch des Kirchenrechts, v. 1 (Graz 1885). B. VON SIMSON, Die Entstehung der pseudoisidorischen Fälschungen in Le Mans (Leipzig 1886). P. FOURNIER, "Étude sur les Fausses Décrétales," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 7 (1906) 33-51, 301-316, 543-564, 761-784; 8 (1907) 19-56. H. JÄGER, Das Kirchenrechtssystem Pseudoisidors (Doctoral diss. Munich 1908). E. H. DAVENPORT, The False Decretals (Oxford 1916). G. HARTMANN, Der Primat des römischen Bischofs bei Pseudo-Isidor (Stuttgart 1930). A. DOLD, "Ein altes Konstanzer Handschriftenblatt des 9. Jahrhunderts mit Auszügen aus Pseudoisidor über das Verhalten der Bischöfe in Anklagefällen," Archiv für katholisches Kirchenrecht 111 (1931) 17-30. P. FOURNIER and G. LEBRAS, Histoire des collections canoniques en occident depuis les fausses décrétales jusqu'au Décret de Gratien, 2 v. (Paris 1931-32) v. 1. C. SILVA-TAROUCA, "Un codice di Pseudo-Isidoro coevo del falso?" Miscellanea Isidoriana (Rome 1936) 357-363. J. HALLER, Nikolaus I. und Pseudoisidor (Stuttgart 1936). M. BUCH-NER, "Pseudoisidor und die Hofkapelle Karls des Kahlen," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 57 (1937) 180-208. G. OESTERLE, "De Pseudo-Isidoro et capella aulica Caroli Calvi," Jus Pontificium 18 (1938) 142-150, 219-221. F. LOT, "Textes manceaux et Fausses Décrétales," Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes (Paris 1839-) 101 (1940) 5-48; 102 (1941) 5-34. A. VAN HOVE, Commentarium Lovaniense in Codicem iuris canonici 1, v. 1-5 (Mechlin 1928-); v. 1, Prolegomena (2d ed. 1945). A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini, v. 1: Historia fontium

(Turin 1950). R. BUCHNER, Die Rechtsquellen (W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, Hefte 1-4, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE [Weimar 1952-63] suppl. 1953). S. WILLIAMS, "The Pseudo-Isidorian Problem Today," Speculum 29 (1954) 702-707. R. GRAND, "Nouvelles remarques sur l'origine du Pseudo-Isidore, source du Décret de Gratien," Studia Gratiana 3 (1955) 1-16. H. FUHRMANN, "Die pseudoisidorischen Fälschungen und die Synode von Hohenaltheim," Zeitschrift für bayerische Landesgeschichte 20 (1957) 136-151; "Die Fälschungen im Mittelalter," Historische Zeitschrift 197 (1963) 529-554. S. WILLIAMS, "The Oldest Text of the Constitutum Constantini," Traditio 20 (1964) 448-461. E. SECKEL, J. J. HERZOG, and A. HAUCK, eds., Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie, 24 v. (3d ed. Leipzig 1896-1913) 16:265-307, the most thorough introd.; "Die erste Zeile Pseudoisidors . . . ," ed. H. FUHRMANN, Sitzungsberichte der Deutschen (Preussischen to 1948) Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin no. 4 (1959).

[H. FUHRMANN]

FALSITY

Falsity (from Lat. falsum, supine of fallere, to deceive) is defined by its opposition to TRUTH. Since truth is the conformity or adequation of intellection and being, falsity is their deformity or inadequation. Falsity then is not the same as IGNORANCE, which is the mere absence of KNOWLEDGE conformed to being, as in the newly born child. Nor is it the same as partial or obscure or incomprehensive knowledge, which does not exhaust the knowability of being. In this sense all created knowledge is imperfect or negatively inadequate to being. But falsity is positive inadequation, namely, that between being and knowledge asserting that being is other than it is. Hence falsity is the evil of the intellect, depriving it of the good for which it is made, frustrating its inborn longing for truth. By reason of the duality of terms (intellection and being) in the relation of inadequation that falsity denotes, falsity can be considered either from the point of view of intellection (logical falsity), or from the point of view of being (ontological falsity).

Logical Falsity. Logical falsity, or ERROR, is the deformity of human intellection from being. Since truth is properly and formally in the JUDGMENT, falsity, which is a deprivation of truth, is properly in the judgment only. Logical falsity is therefore a judgment asserting that what is, is not, or that what is not, is. How is it possible for a judgment to be false? St. THOMAS AQUINAS teaches that truth is consciously in the judgment, because the INTEL-LECT judging knows itself as conformity insofar as in judging it exercises complete reflection on itself (De ver. 1.9). Must it not follow then that falsity is properly in the judgment, insofar as the intellect knows itself as deformed from being (see ST 1a, 17.3), and this by reason of its exercised complete reflection? How, then, can the intellect know its falsity without correcting it?

Conformity and Deformity. To state that truth is consciously possessed in the judgment means that the judgment by its very nature presents itself as conformed to being. When, for example, a person says that the paper on which he is writing is white, he knowingly intends to assert that the thing across which his pen moves justifies or verifies what he asserts about it, that it is as he judges it to be. The judgment presents itself as conformed to being, because it involves complete reflection on the intellect's conformity to reality. If the same person inadvertently keeps on his green-tinted sun glasses as he begins to write, he might assert with surprise that the paper on which he is writing is green. In such a case, he knowingly intends to assert that the paper is actually green. He consciously presents his judgment as conformed to being, whereas it is not conformed to, but rather deformed from, being. Thus his erroneous judgment is a conscious deformity from being.

This particular deformity from being is known, but it is known not as deformity (which would equivalently remove the error), but rather as if it were conformity. The core of falsity lies here. The intellect does not avert to its deformity, but confuses this with conformity, and hence takes its partial ignorance for knowledge. In other words it thinks it knows itself to be conformed when actually it does not.

Reflective Awareness. How is this confusion possible if the judgment involves complete reflection and selfknowledge? Firstly, the complete reflection of the human intellect is not the translucent vision of the ANGEL. In knowing, angels are entirely transparent to themselves, because the content of their natural knowledge is entirely from within themselves and so excludes the possibility of error. Man's complete reflection, on the other hand, belongs inseparably to the exercise of his intellection, but it is an exercise whose content is inescapably implicated in a multiplicity of images and sense data that remain necessarily extrinsic to intellection. Hence human intellection must progressively clarify its content by a succession of acts and inferences. The complete reflection objectivizes in general the content of this knowing, and so refers it in general to being and knows itself in general as conformed to being.

But such complete reflection and such general reference to the intellect's conformity to being do not of themselves justify the intellect's particular interpretation of this content (i.e., the objectivizing connection of its elements), on which the truth of the particular judgment depends. Nor do they guarantee the rectitude of the intellect's inferences, nor the logical connection of the various acts by which it concludes to a judgment. The particular interpretation of this content demands reflection on, and sifting of, the sense data (external manifestations of reality) that the content generalizes. It also involves attention to the images (figurative and emotional) evoked by this content, by reason of its similarity to other situations, and a careful weighing of the memory elements involved in the content. The rectitude of its inferences demands that the intellect examine with care each step of its reasoning, and reflect on its connection with, and the validity of, the principles applied.

False Judgment. When the intellect judges falsely, this critical attention to, and discerning reflection on, the data of sense, the association of images, the reliability of memory, the connecting reasoning, and the validity of principles, either is lacking or is insufficient. The intellect judges precipitately without fully reflecting on these sources of its judgment, and so not withholding its assertion until sure it has sufficient EVIDENCE for it. By reason of this insufficient reflection, the intellect asserts as true what only seems to it to be true, and hence it asserts beyond what it knows. It makes such an assertion under the influence of the will. The will, either by reason of its attachment to prejudices, or by its impatience or disinclination to effort, or by not applying its attention, moves the intellect to judge what only seems to be. All falsity lies in this chasm between seeming and being. If something did not seem true, man could not assent to it, since his intellect is a faculty of truth. Yet his intellect can take the seeming true for being true because its judgment is under the influence of the will. From the point of view of the intellect, no error is inevitable.

Ontological Falsity. Ontological falsity is false BEING. Since being is true insofar as it is in conformity to intellection, it is false insofar as it is in deformity to intellection. If being, as being, is true or conformed to intellect, every being is true insofar as it is. How then and in what sense can one speak of false being? Is not false being the same as NONBEING or nothingness? If so, there is no such thing as ontological falsity. Yet one speaks of such things as false prophets, counterfeit coins, sham jewels, artificial silk, synthetic rubber, and false teeth, and these things exist. What is the meaning of their falsity and wherein does it reside?

Being is true as conformed to intellect. If there were no intellect to which being is conformed, being would not be true and so would not be. But if there were no human intellect, being would still be true. Conformity to man's intellect is not essential—it is only accidental to being. If, on the other hand, God's intellect did not exist, being and its truth would cease. Conformity to God's intellect makes being to be. Hence no being can be under any aspect to which God's intellect is not conformed. But a being can be even though man's intellect is deformed from it. As regards God's intellect, therefore, no being is or can be false. Hence no being, as it is in itself, can be false.

The only way, then, that a being can be false is not as it is in itself, but as it is outside itself, i.e., as it appears externally. A thing cannot be false simply, but only under a certain aspect, i.e., under the aspect of its external manifestation. Hence being can be false only in relation to a faculty (intellect) that reaches to what is through appearances, or to an intellect depending on senses, i.e., to a human intellect. Falsity, then, is attributed to a being only as it appears to the human intellect-and that within definite limits. One does not call a tomato a false being because it leads the inexperienced child to mistake it for a rosy apple. A thing is called false only when it would deceive the normal, developed human being, or men in general. The falsity of such things lies in their appearances' being so similar to something else that the average man would not detect the difference. Hence falsity is not in the being of things, but only in their appearances. Moreover, it is in these appearances not formally but only dispositively, in the sense that these appearances tend to provoke men to a false judgment about the reality whose appearances they are. Since the being of what appears is true, and falsity lies only in the appearances of certain beings, ontological falsity is founded in ontological truth.

See Also: TRUTH; ABSURDITY; FALLACY.

Bibliography: L. W. KEELER, The Problem of Error from Plato to Kant (Analecta Gregoriana 6; 1934). J. H. NICOLAS, "Le Problème de l'erreur," Revue thomiste 52 (1952) 328–57, 528–66. M. D. ROLAND-GOSSELIN, "La Théorie thomiste de l'erreur," Mé langes Thomistes (Bibliothèque Thomiste 3; 1923) 253–74. A. MARC, Psychologie réflexive (Brussels 1948) 1:366–75. S. CARMEL-LA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:30–38, 257–58. E. VALTON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50) 5.1:435–47.

[F. P. O'FARRELL]

FALZON, IGNATIUS, BL.

Catechist; b. July 1, 1813, Valetta, Malta; d., July 1, 1865, Valetta. Ignatius (Nazju in Maltese) was born at the time when Malta was in the process of becoming a British colony and naval base. His father was a lawyer and later a judge; his mother was the daughter of a judge. Two of his brothers became priests. Ignatius received degrees in both civil and canon law at the Athenaeum of Malta (1833) and began theological studies, receiving the four minor orders in vogue at the time, but decided against ordination to the priesthood. Ignatius became a member of the Franciscan Third Order.

Ignatius read the signs of the times and studied English. When he realized that the British military personnel stationed in Malta—like the Maltese themselves lacked a sound formation in the Gospel, he decided to devote his life to catechesis. Ignatius started first by teaching catechism to children and later on to British servicemen. He organized prayer meetings and catechism instruction for the British Catholics and then non–Catholic servicemen as well. Ignatius invited other laymen to help in the catechetical ministry. Some who became priests served as military chaplains in the British army and navy. It is estimated that Ignatius personally prepared at least 650 individuals for reception in the Roman Catholic Church.

Ignatius died on his fifty-second birthday and was buried in the family tomb in the Franciscan church of St. Mary of Jesus in Valetta. Pope John Paul II beatified him when he visited Malta on May 9, 2001. Ignatius' feast is celebrated in Malta on July 1, the day of both his birth and death.

Feast: July 1.

[E. MAGRO]

FAMIAN, ST.

Cistercian priest; b. Cologne, Germany, c. 1090; d. Gallese, near Rome, Aug. 8, 1150. As a young man, Famian (Gebhard, Wardo, Quardus) left his wealthy parents for the life of a poor pilgrim. He visited several holy places in Italy and Spain, including Rome and SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA. He then lived as a hermit for about 25 years before entering a Cistercian monastery in Osera in northwestern Spain. With his superior's permission, he left for the Holy Land about 1146, returning to Italy in 1150. The first Cistercian to be canonized (1154), he was called "Famianus" because of the fame of the miracles reputedly worked at his tomb in Gallese.

Feast: Aug. 8

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:389–395. Literature. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 8:137. B. BEDINI, S. Famiano, patrono di Gallese (Rome 1958). A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:547–548.

[J. C. MOORE]

FANON

A liturgical garment, in the form of a double humeral cape, oval in shape, the lower part being slightly wider than the upper. It is made of white silk, with red and gold stripes running across it; there is a cross in front and an opening at the top for the head. Historically, it was a secondary papal insignia that was reserved exclusively to the pope, and worn when he was vested in pontificals. The fanon became one of the papal insignia when priests and bishops began to wear the amice under the chasuble. Innocent III called the fanon orale (amice) and in his days it seems that it was already a papal vestment, or, more precisely, the papal amice. Later (c. 1500), popes began to wear both amice and fanon. During the reign of Pius X, the fanon was separated into two parts, though supposedly forming one vestment. The lower part was put over the alb and the back part of the upper fanon was pulled over the head after the pope received the chasuble; it was then laid on his shoulders and on his breast. Although the separation into two parts simplified the pope's vesting, it also did away with all the remaining traces of the old papal amice.

Fanon worn by Pope Paul VI as he blesses the crowd from the Sedia Gestatoria.

Bibliography: J. NABUCO, Ius pontificalium: Introductio in caeremoniale episcoporum (Tournai 1956) 187–188.

[J. NABUCO/EDS.]

FARA, ST.

Foundress and abbess; b. near Meaux, France, 595; d. 657. Fara (Burgundofara) was the daughter of Count Agneric and sister of SS. Cagnoald of Laon and FARO OF MEAUX. When Fara was a child, St. COLUMBAN—on his way into exile from LUXEUIL—passed her villa and blessed her, whereupon she vowed herself to religious life. Her father later refused to countenance her vow and only after she had persevered through considerable opposition and even persecution did he permit her to found the convent of Evoriacum, later known as FAREMOUTIERS, which he richly endowed. Fara's exemplary life is said to have been responsible for the vocation of her brother Faro.

Feast: April 3; Dec. 7, at Faremoutiers.

Bibliography: J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 2:420–430. H. M. DELSART, Sainte Fare (Paris 1911). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 4:69–72. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 4:1094–95.

[B. F. SCHERER]

FAREL, GUILLAUME

Early French Protestant reformer; b. Gap, Dauphiné, 1489; d. Neuchâtel, Switzerland, Sept. 13, 1565. Farel's father was a notary and his background is similar to that of CALVIN, with whom his career as a reformer is later linked. Farel lived and studied in Paris from 1509 to 152l, and there became an ardent disciple of the famous humanist, LEFÈVRE D'ÉTAPLES. With Lefèvre he was a member of the reform circle at Meaux from 1521 to 1523. It was during these years that he adopted Luther's views on grace and justification. To avoid arrest as a heretic Farel left France in 1523 and went to Basel.

His aggressive zeal as a reformer and the complaint of Erasmus caused his expulsion from Basel in 1524. He then preached at Montbéliard where he wrote his most important work, the Sommaire, a brief declaration of faith. He went to Strasbourg in 1525, to Berne in late 1526, and on to Aigle, a Bernese dependency that became his center for the next few years. In 1530 he established Protestant reform in Neuchâtel. An initial visit to Geneva in 1532 was unsuccessful, but he returned there in December 1533, with Berne's support, to lay the foundations of Genevan Protestantism. It was Farel who, in July 1536, induced the young Calvin to remain in Geneva and help in the task. Both Farel and Calvin were expelled in 1538. Calvin later returned, but Farel, who had gone back to Neuchâtel, remained there as pastor till the end of his life.

Bibliography: COMITÉ FAREL, ed., Guillaume Farel, 1489–1565 (Paris 1930), the most exhaustive study. J. DUTILLEUL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:2081–90. Y. CONGAR, Catholicisme 4:1095–96.

[J. C. OLIN]

FAREMOUTIERS, ABBEY OF

Monastery of Benedictine nuns, located in the center of Brie, to the east of Paris, five and a half miles west of Coulommiers, France, in the Diocese of Meaux (patrons, Our Lady; St. Peter). It was founded (c. 627) by Agneric, steward of the King of Austrasia and an old friend of St. COLUMBAN, for his daughter FARA, who was made the first abbess under the direction of monks from LUXEUIL. The abbey enjoyed two periods of prosperity. The first, during the early Middle Ages, was marked by many saints: Fara herself, who trained Telchide, Abbess of JO-UARRE-EN-BRIE; Fara's successor, Sedride, her halfsister; and ETHELBURGA, as well as the latter's niece, Ercongote. The abbess exercised seigneurial rights over the town formed around the abbey. In 1099 the community, which had grown lax, was reformed by the abbot of MAR-MOUTIER at the request of the king and IVO OF CHARTRES. During the 12th century the abbey counted 110 nuns. The buildings, destroyed by a fire in 1140, were rebuilt, and the new church was consecrated in 1145. At that time, seven priories were dependent upon Faremoutiers. Toward the end of the 15th century much-needed reform of the abbey by the bishop of Meaux was thwarted by the abbess, on grounds of the abbey's episcopal exemption. Later the reform of FONTEVRAULT was introduced (1518) by Marie Cornu, who arrived from CHELLES with 11 nuns. During the abbey's second period of prosperity, the abbesses, appointed by the king, were remarkable women: Françoise de la Châtre (d. 1643); her niece, Jeanne de Plas (d. 1677), a relative of Fénelon; Madame du Blé d'Uxelles (d. 1685), a friend of Bossuet, who delivered her funeral oration (now lost) and who corresponded with the nuns (150 letters are extant). During the French Revolution the monastery was abolished, the church and convent buildings destroyed. The property, however, was not parceled out. Bishop Gaillard of Meaux recovered possession of this property and on Nov. 5, 1931, restored Faremoutiers, with Benedictine nuns from the priory of Amillis, one of his earlier foundations (September 1924). Today Faremoutiers's community of 40 nuns under a prioress is a minor pontifical cloister. Besides the Divine Office and manual labor, the nuns do catechetical work, visit the poor and sick, and hold closed retreats.

Bibliography: T. DU PLESSIS, Histoire de l'église de Meaux, 2 v. (Paris 1731) v.1, passim. H. M. DELSART, Ames saintes du grand

Umbrian fresco on exterior wall of Santa Maria di Farfa, Farfa Abbey, Lazio, Italy. (©Sandro Vannini/CORBIS)

siècle (Maredsous 1931). Sainte Fare et Faremoutiers: Treize siècles de vie monastique (Faremoutiers 1957). Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–), s.v. "Faremoutiers."

[P. COUSIN]

FARFA, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey about 25 miles north of Rome in central Italy. Since 1919 it has been united to ST. PAUL-OUTSIDE-THE-WALLS, which has a group of monks in Farfa to care for the parish and a nearby college. Restoration of the abbey, a national monument since 1929, has brought to light Roman and medieval sections (frescoes of c. 700).

Founded on pagan buildings and dedicated to the Blessed Virgin by a bishop of Spoleto, Gregory the Syrian (4th or 6th century) or Lawrence (552–563), Farfa was destroyed by barbarians and restored (690) by St. THOMAS OF FARFA (of Maurienne). Under Frankish abbots it was fortified; and, endowed by popes, dukes, kings, and emperors, its domain extended from Latium to the Marches. Charlemagne made it an imperial abbey, and its abbots frequented papal and royal courts. After NONANTOLA it was the richest abbey in Italy, with 683 churches and cloisters, 132 castles, two cities, 16 fortified towns, seven ports, and 315 villages. Saracens occupied it (891) and raided Sabina. Abbot Ratfred, who restored the community to the ruined abbey from their refuge in the Marches (940), was poisoned by monks impatient to enjoy the great riches. Hugh (997-1038) introduced the Cluniac reform and made the abbey a spiritual, intellectual, and economic center; his valuable writings generally illustrate a beneficial understanding between Church and State. Berard I completed the basilica, consecrated by Nicholas II (1060). The historian Gregory of Catina revived studies and developed the scriptorium.

Farfa lost importance with the decline of the Empire, with which it had sided in the investiture struggle. Eugene III was consecrated there (1145), Abbot Adinulfus somewhat restored its fortunes and Urban IV made it a diocesis nullius (1264); but the abbey's day had passed, and COMMENDATION (1400–1841) only hastened its ruin. Union with the Congregation of MONTE CASSINO (1567) revived it to a degree until it was suppressed by France (1798) and Italy (1862). Bl. Placido RICCARDI was rector of the basilica (1895–1912).

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1107–09. I. SCHUSTER, L'imperiale abbazia di Farfa (Rome 1921). P. MARKTHALER, "Sulle recenti scoperte nell'abbazia imperiale di Farfa," Revista di archeologia cristiana 5 (1928) 37–88. G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia (Rome 1961). J. ROUX, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 4:1098–1100. P. VOLK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:25–26.

[S. BAIOCCHI]

FARGES, ALBERT

Sulpician philosopher and theologian; b. Beaulieu, department of Corrèze, France, 1848; d. Beaulieu, June 9, 1926. Farges entered the Sulpician seminary in Paris and was ordained in 1872. After teaching in the seminaries of Bruges and Nantes, he filled the position of director of a seminary in Paris for 14 years. In 1896 he became professor of philosophy at the Institut Catholique in Paris and at the Sulpician seminary at Issy. He then became superior of the seminary in Angers.

Two of his works are an outgrowth of lectures in ascetical and mystical theology given at Angers between 1899 and 1905: Les Phénomènes mystiques, distingués de leurs contrefaçons humaines et diaboliques (Paris 1920) and Les Voies ordinaires de la vie spirituelle (Paris 1925). For both treatises his declared authorities are SS. Teresa and Thomas Aquinas. Farges' greatest contribution was in furthering the revival of Thomistic studies at the end of the 19th century. Under the general title Études philosophiques pour vulgariser les théories d'Aristote et de S. Thomas et leur accord avec les sciences (9 v. Paris 1885–1907) he produced a series of individual works devoted to the restoration of Thomism, for which he was highly praised by the French Academy and by Leo XIII. With a fellow Sulpician, Désiré Barbedette, Farges published a compendium of scholastic philosophy in French and Latin that had many editions.

Bibliography: P. POURRAT, Catholicisme 4:1100-01.

[M. S. CONLAN]

FARGO, DIOCESE OF

Suffragan of the Metropolitan See of Minneapolis-St. Paul, Minnesota, embracing the eastern part of North Dakota, an area of 35,786 square miles. The Diocese of Fargo (Fargensis) was established on Nov. 12, 1889, as the Diocese of Jamestown, but the see city was changed to Fargo, April 6, 1897. When the diocese was established, it embraced all of North Dakota, with about 19,000 Catholics, many of them Native American; 30 priests; 40 churches; one hospital; three parochial schools; and an academy for girls.

The first bishop, John Shanley, was consecrated on Dec. 27, 1889, and governed the new diocese under extreme missionary conditions. His episcopacy was characterized by efforts on behalf of the Native Americans, social reforms, and the movement for temperance. He founded and edited the Bulletin of the Diocese of Fargo and contributed an article of historical significance to the Collections of the State Historical Society of North Dakota. When he died on July 16, 1909, there were in the diocese 110 priests, 215 churches, 15 parochial schools, four Native American schools, six academies for girls, five hospitals, and an orphanage.

Prior to the appointment of James O'Reilly as second bishop of Fargo (1910–34), the western part of North Dakota was detached and established in 1910 as the Diocese of Bismarck. O'Reilly, consecrated on May 19, 1910, consolidated the work of his predecessor. Despite the years of drought and depression, which, toward the end of his life, brought many parishes to the brink of bankruptcy, O'Reilly established 34 new parishes and supervised the erection of 56 churches, 54 rectories, 24 schools, and seven hospitals.

On Aug. 10, 1935, Aloisius J. MUENCH was appointed bishop of Fargo and assumed charge of the diocese in the depths of the Depression. He organized the Catholic Church Expansion Fund to refinance mortgaged parishes and to provide credit for future parish development. Muench established the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine and founded Catholic Action News, a monthly diocesan newspaper. In 1941 he convened the first diocesan synod and published a Synodal Book of diocesan legislation. He established diocesan scholarships for needy seminarians and the Priests Mutual Aid Fund for sick, disabled, and retired priests. On the national scene he was active in the Catholic Rural Life Movement and the Catholic Central Union (Verein). In 1946 Muench was appointed apostolic visitator to Germany; he was granted the personal title of archbishop in 1950, appointed papal nuncio to Germany in 1951, and created cardinal priest and elevated to the Roman Curia on Dec. 14, 1959. With his appointment to the College of Cardinals, Muench resigned as bishop of Fargo.

During the absence of Muench in Germany, Leo F. Dworschak administered the affairs of the diocese as auxiliary bishop from 1947 to 1959 and succeeded to the see in 1960. During the early years of his episcopacy, ongoing construction of new churches, hospitals, and other Catholic institutions kept pace with the other dioceses in the U.S. Dworschak inaugurated a Diocesan Development Program (DDP) to support diocesan needs and ensure capital expansion. He was present at Vatican II and began the implementation of conciliar reforms in the diocese. Following the council, he established a Diocesan Pastoral Council. In 1969, he oversaw the construction of a high school and college seminary for the Diocese of Fargo that was dedicated in memory of his predecessor. Cardinal Muench Seminary was an ambitious project for a diocese of Fargo's size. In 1969, Dworschak and Bishop Hilary B. Hacker of Bismarck created the North Dakota Catholic Conference, which continues to serve as the liaison of the Catholic community to the political community of the North Dakota.

Upon the retirement of Bishop Dworschak in 1970, his successor, Justin A. Driscoll, was consecrated at Saint Mary's Cathedral, Fargo, on Oct. 28, 1970. Bishop Driscoll's initial responsibilities included the continuing implementation of the various initiatives of the Second Vatican Council. To improve the administration of the diocese, he expanded the number of deaneries from seven to nine. In accord with postconciliar decrees of Pope Paul VI, Driscoll created the first Priest Senate, later known as the Priest Council, in 1972. He instituted the Permanent Diaconate program in 1977 and took an interest in the Catholic press of the diocese, changing the title of the Catholic Action News to the New Earth. Bishop Driscoll's episcopal ministry came to an unexpected conclusion with his sudden death at an ecumenical conference on Nov. 19, 1984; he was 64.

During Holy Week of 1985, Bishop James S. Sullivan, auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Lansing, was appointed the sixth bishop of Fargo. One of Sullivan's first duties as bishop was the implementation of the Code of Canon Law of 1983. Following the guidelines of the new Code, Bishop Sullivan commissioned the creation of an all-encompassing diocesan Policy Manual. Sullivan placed great emphasis on priestly vocations. At the peak of his vocational effort, nearly 50 men were studying for the priesthood. He was also responsible for organizing and presiding over the centennial celebrations for the Diocese of Fargo in 1989. Sullivan successfully completed an ambitious capital campaign to provide for the support of retired priests. In the early 1990s, he established the nationally recognized "Opening Doors, Opening Hearts" program in which every one of the diocese's 30,000 homes was visited by parish leaders.

Anticipating Sullivan's retirement, the Holy See announced the appointment of Samuel J. Aquila as coadjutor bishop of the Diocese of Fargo on June 17, 2001. Aquila, rector of Saint Vianney Seminary in Denver, Colorado, was consecrated at Saint Mary's Cathedral on August 24 and given charge of the administration of the diocese, thereby allowing Sullivan to assume a more spiritual and pastoral ministry to the people of the diocese. As Aquila began his episcopacy, 25 percent of the total population within the diocesan boundaries were Catholics, organized in 160 parishes administered by 120 priests. Aquila inherited the urgent need to address parish and priestly ministry in light of the rapid demographic shift from rural to urban areas prompted by significant changes in the agricultural economy.

Bibliography: L. PFALLER, The Catholic Church in Western North Dakota, 1738–1960 (Mandan, ND 1960).

[G. M. WEBER/S. R. W. REISKE]

FARIBAULT PLAN

A compromise school agreement between the local clergy and the public school board in Faribault and Stillwater, Minn., involving the use of tax funds for churchrelated schools, long a crucial issue in American society. In 1890, to ease the financial burden of Catholics and with the approval of John IRELAND, Archbishop of St. Paul, the pastors of parishes in Faribault and Stillwater leased Catholic schools staffed by sisters to public authorities on an annual basis with renewal optional on the agreement of both parties. Each day the pupils assembled in the parish church for Mass and then proceeded to school to receive secular instruction. Religious instruction was given either before or after the legal public school day. The board of education controlled the secular schooling with the sole proviso that no text be used to which the local ordinary objected (Civiltá Cattolica, 1892).

While the Faribault Plan was not the first such experiment in the U.S. (see POUGHKEEPSIE PLAN), it stirred up considerable controversy and opposition from both Catholic and Protestant elements and attracted great attention throughout the nation for two reasons: (1) the Faribault and Stillwater communities were within the jurisdiction of the outspoken Archbishop Ireland, sponsor of the project; and (2) it inspired a pamphlet published in 1891 by Rev. Thomas Bouquillon, which aroused strong feelings in the Catholic communities because of its apparent departure from traditional Catholic philosophy (see BOUQUILLON CONTROVERSY).

Shortly before the publication of the Bouquillon pamphlet, Ireland had addressed a meeting of the National Education Association (NEA) at St. Paul in the summer of 1890. In his speech, while conceding to the state a right and duty to instruct, Ireland had argued that the exclusion of religion from the classroom would be destructive of religion itself and inimical to the interests of the nation. He then suggested a compromise plan similar to those in effect in England and Prussia or, if this proved to be impossible, an arrangement such as that of Poughkeepsie (NEA Report, 1890). It was the latter suggestion that received the greatest attention and resulted in the experiment being made in Faribault and Stillwater.

The publicity given to the Faribault Plan, however, raised the debate to new vehemence, and the matter was carried to Rome. On April 21, 1892, the Congregation for the Propragation of the Faith issued a decision expressed in words so susceptible to varying interpretations that it provided no solution (American Ecclesiastical Review, Suppl. 1892).

Two years later, the division of opinion among Catholics and the strong feelings aroused by the Bouquillon proposition prompted both Catholic and state authorities to terminate the Faribault experiment. Its discontinuance and, later, that of the Poughkeepsie Plan marked the cessation of efforts on the part of Catholic leadership to find a compromise solution to the church-related school financing problem.

While it would be interesting to speculate on what effect an adoption of the compromise at Faribault might have had on the history of American education and of the Church in America, the fact remains that Catholics became committed to the establishment and maintenance of a Catholic school system. Neverthless, although many elements characterizing the American scene at the time of Faribault and Poughkeepsie no longer endure, the controversy surrounding those plans are of import as Catholics debate the adoption of shared-time plans and augmented released-time programs.

Bibliography: J. A. BURNS, The Growth and Development of the Catholic School System in the United States (New York 1912). T. J. BOUQUILLON, Education: To Whom Does It Belong? (Baltimore 1892). J. H. MOYNIHAN, The Life of Archhishop John Ireland (New York 1953).

[O. C. D'AMOUR]

FARINA, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, BL.

Bishop of Vicenza and founder of the Institute of the Sisters Teachers of St. Dorothy, Daughters of the Sacred Heart; b. Gambellara, Vicenza, Italy, Jan.11, 1803; d. Vicenza, March 4, 1888.

Giovanni Antonio was the son of Pietro Farina and Francisca Bellame who entrusted his growth in the faith and education to his uncle, a priest. Farina entered the diocescan seminary at age 15. In 1827 he earned his teaching certificate and was ordained priest. Early in his career he taught in the diocesan seminary for 18 years, ministered in St. Peter's Parish for ten years, and directed the public schools. He founded the first school for the education of girls (1831) and the teaching Sisters of St. Dorothy (1836), who were dedicated to teaching them. The mission of the sisters was later expanded to include the education of the deaf and the blind, and care of the sick elderly. The Rule he wrote for the sisters, approved by Gregory XVI in 1839, remained in effect until 1905.

On January 19, 1851 Fr. Farina was consecrated bishop of Treviso and took as his motto: "True science consists of the education of the heart, the fear of God." During his ten–year episcopacy he made regular pastoral visits, initiated associations in each parish for the care of the needy, propagated the practice of spiritual exercises, and himself participated in the formation of priests and laity. He himself ministered to the physical and spiritual needs of the sick, often taking his priests with him.

On June 18, 1860, he was transferred to the Diocese of Vicenza, where he initiated a renewal of the local Church that included the convocation of the first diocesan synod since 1689. In his efforts to shepherd his flock, he visited villages so remote that they were accessible only by foot or mule. His care for the poor is evidenced by the numerous confraternities he founded. Also notable are his participation in Vatican Council I, his conferral of ordination (1890) on Giuseppe Sarto (the future Pius X), and the patience with which he endured unjust accusations.

The bishop fell gravely ill in 1886 and never fully recovered prior to his death from a stroke. Farina was declared venerable on April 23, 2001. On July 7, 2001, Pope John Paul II approved the miracle necessary for beatification, which occurred on Nov. 4, 2001.

Bibliography: A. I. BASSANI, ed., Il Vescovo Giovanni Antonio Farina e il suo Istituto nell'Ottocento veneto (Rome 1988). G. A. CISOTTO, ed., La visita pastorale di Giovanni Antonio Farina nella Diocesi di Vicenza (Rome 1977).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FARINGDON, HUGH, BL.

Benedictine priest, abbot of Reading, martyr; vere Cook; b. Faringdon (?), Berkshire, England; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Reading, Nov. 15, 1539. Hugh, who bore the arms of Cook of Kent, was elected abbot of Reading Abbey in July 1520. He was well-known to Henry VIII as demonstrated by his hosting of the king in January 1521, appointment as a royal chaplain, and receipt of a valuable white leather purse as a New Year's gift from the king in 1532. Faringdon was a member of Parliament (1523–39) when he signed the articles of faith (1536), which virtually acknowledge the royal supremacy. He even sang the Requiem Mass for Queen Jane Seymour (Nov. 4, 1537) and was present for her burial (November 12). Despite these and other signs of a close relationship with the king, he was charged with high treason upon refusing to surrender Reading to the king (1539). Despite his position as a mitred abbot, Chancellor Thomas Cromwell passed Faringdon's death sentence before his trial began. He was executed with BB. John Eynon and John RUGG. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII on May 13, 1895.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); Dec. 1 (Dioceses of Portsmouth and Westminster; English Benedictines).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1904), I, 338–87. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

John Cardinal Farley. (©Corbis)

admitted into the Society of Jesus at Bologna in 1707. After teaching humanities at the Jesuit college in Padua, he was sent to Rome to complete his theological studies and was ordained there in 1722. He returned to Padua and collaborated with Filippo Riceputi, SJ, on the history of the Church in Illyria. After 20 years of research and with 300 volumes of collected manuscript material, they began their writing. At Riceputi's death in 1742, Farlati was assisted by Giacomo Coleti, SJ. The first volume of the Illyricum sacrum was printed at Venice in 1751; while the fifth volume was in press, Farlati died. Coleti completed the work with the eighth volume. In 1910 F. Bulĭc published the Accessiones et collectiones all' Illyricum sacrum del P. G. Coleti.

Bibliography: A life of Farlati appears in Illyricum sacrum by G. COLETI, v.5 (Venice 1775) vii–xi. C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothéque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels–Paris 1890–1932) 13:546–547. M. MORSELLETO, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico (Turin 1954–58) 1:1068.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

FARLATI, DANIELE

Jesuit church historian; b. San Daniele del Friuli, Italy, Feb. 22, 1690; d. Padua, April 25, 1773. Farlati was

FARLEY, JOHN MURPHY

Cardinal, fourth archbishop of New York; b. County Armagh, Ireland, Apr. 20, 1842; d. New York, NY, Sept. 17, 1918. John was the fourth and youngest child of Philip and Catherine (Murphy) Farrelly, who died when he was very young. His maternal uncle, Patrick Murphy, had immigrated to New York in 1830 and, prospering in the furniture business, had become interested in educating a nephew for the priesthood. John wrote asking for the opportunity and was trained in the local schools and at St. Macartan's College, Monaghan, the preparatory seminary of the Diocese of Clogher. In 1864 he went to New York and entered Fordham College (University) as a junior. In 1865 he entered St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, NY, and was sent to the North American College, Rome, in 1866. He was ordained in Rome for the Archdiocese of New York on June 11, 1870, by Cardinal Constantine Patrizi.

On his return to New York he was appointed curate at St. Peter's parish, Staten Island, and remained there until July 1872 when he became secretary to Cardinal John MCCLOSKEY, whom he had met during VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869-70). At this time he changed the spelling of his name from Farrelly to Farley. During the next 30 years, Farley played an important part in the affairs of the archdiocese and moved steadily up the administrative ladder. He was secretary from 1872 until 1884 and vicar general of the archdiocese from 1891 to 1902. In the latter period he was also pastor of St. Gabriel's parish. He became a papal chamberlain in 1884, a domestic prelate in 1892, prothonotary apostolic and titular bishop of Zeugma, successively, in 1895; he was consecrated on Dec. 21, 1895, by Abp. Michael A. CORRIGAN. Finally, on Sept. 25, 1902, he became the fourth archbishop of New York and, on Nov. 27, 1911, cardinal priest with the title church of Santa Maria sopra Minerva.

Two-thirds of Farley's priestly life was spent in close association with McCloskey and Corrigan, whose personalities and careers greatly influenced his own. He admired both, but modeled himself on McCloskey. His dominant traits were caution and the love of peace. The wounds left by the MCGLYNN affair were healed as far as possible.

Farley was the first American ordinary to distribute papal honors widely among those of his clergy who did not hold high administrative posts. He was a pleasing speaker with a wide range of interests, was fluent in French and Italian, and read Spanish. During his administration the number of parochial schools in the archdiocese doubled. He was a friend of The Catholic University of America and a supporter of higher education for women. He was also a patron of the old Catholic Encyclopedia. He continued his predecessor's interest in St. Joseph's Seminary, the major seminary of the archdiocese, and carried out his plans for the minor seminary, Cathedral College, which he opened in 1903. He supported the Propagation of the Faith with enthusiasm and welcomed the founders of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (Maryknoll) to New York in 1911. He wrote two books, The History of St. Patrick's Cathedral (1908), and The Life of John Cardinal McCloskey (1918). He died of pneumonia in 1918 and was buried in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Bibliography: M. J. LAVELLE, "John Cardinal Farley, Archbishop of New York," American Ecclesiastical Review 60 (1919) 113–125. A. J. SHIPMAN, His Eminence, John, Cardinal Farley (New York 1912).

[F. D. COHALAN]

FARMER, FERDINAND

Missionary; b. Weissenstein, Württemberg, Germany, Oct. 13, 1720; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 17, 1786. As Ferdinand Steinmeyer, he abandoned the study of medicine to enter the Society of Jesus at Landsberg in 1743. Ordained about 1750, he was first assigned to China. When the Jesuits in the British colonies in America appealed to the German Jesuit Province for priests to serve the numerous German immigrants in Pennsylvania, Steinmeyer was reassigned to America. He landed in the New World in 1752 and established himself in Lancaster, Pa., as Father Ferdinand Farmer. Using Lancaster as his headquarters, he traveled constantly through eastern Pennsylvania and ministered to all Catholics, serving existing congregations and forming new ones.

In 1758 he transferred his headquarters permanently to old St. Joseph's Church in Philadelphia, continuing his constant missionary journeys, not only in Pennsylvania and Delaware, but also in New Jersey. By the time of the Revolutionary War, he had reached the borders of New York and may have entered New York City. When the British army occupied Philadelphia in 1777, he extended his spiritual ministrations to the Hessian regiments. However, when British headquarters endeavored to raise a regiment of Catholic volunteers and sought to enlist Farmer as their chaplain, he refused.

After the British evacuation in 1778, Farmer extended his missionary expeditions across the Hudson River and gathered the first Catholic congregation in New York City. He had a lifelong interest in natural science, and as an early member of the American Philosophical Society, he corresponded with scholars in Europe. In 1779 he was elected a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania. He is sometimes called the father of the Church in New Jersey and in New York.

Bibliography: J. M. DALEY, "Pioneer Missionary," Woodstock Letters, 75 (1946) 103–115, 207–231, 311–321. J. F. QUIRK, "Father Ferdinand Farmer," Historical Records and Studies of the U. S. Catholic Historical Society of New York 6.2 (1912) 235–248.

[F. X. CURRAN]

FARNBOROUGH PRIORY

Benedictine priory under PRINKNASH, 37 miles southwest of London, in Hampshire, England; dedicated to St. Michael; it was formerly an abbey in the SOLESMES congregation (1903-47). Empress Eugénie, in residence at Farnborough Hill from 1881, built the neo-Gothic St. Michael Church (1886–87) as a mausoleum for Napoleon III (d. 1873) and their son Prince Louis (slain in the Zulu War 1879). Eugénie was buried there in 1920. French Premonstratensians were replaced as custodians of the shrine by Benedictines of Solesmes (1895). The conventual buildings were completed by 1911. Fernand CABROL, Henri LECLERCQ, Marius FÉROTIN, and André WILMART were among the scholars of Farnborough who produced the Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie and other works. After World War I the abbey declined because of the lack of English and French novices. In 1947 the French monks withdrew and were replaced by monks from Prinknash.

Bibliography: R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 4:1103–04. A. SCH-MITT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:27.

[J. STÉPHAN]

FARNE

Also called Farneland or The Inner Farne, it is the largest of a group of 15 islands near Bamburgh (Northumberland). Its poverty and bleak solitude made it a suitable home of hermit saints. St. AIDAN (d. 651) was its first recorded inhabitant. St. CUTHBERT of Lindisfarne, northern England's most popular saint, lived on Farne (676–684) and died there (687). Parts of the island bear his name as do the island's eider ducks. Farne was deserted during the Danish invasions, but was restored by Edulf of Lindisfarne and occupied by monks of Durham, notably St. Bartholomew of Farne (1151–93). It was made a cell of Durham (1255) and was occupied until the Reformation. It is now a bird and seal sanctuary.

Bibliography: BEDE, Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum, ed. C. PLUMMER (1955) 3:16; 4:27–30. GEOFFREY, "Vita Bartholomaei Farnensis," Symeonis Monachi Opera Omnia, ed. T. ARNOLD, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores (New York 1964—) 75.1:295–325. A. WATKIN, "Farne Island and St. Cuthbert," Downside Review 70 (1952) 292–307.

[H. FARMER]

Benedictine Monks sing during Blessing of the Silkworm service, Farnborough, Hampshire, England. (©Hulton-Deutsch Collection/CORBIS)

FARNESE

Important Italian family, which, from the late 12th century until 1731 when it became extinct, included Pope Paul III, five cardinals, and the dukes of Parma and Piacenza, notably Alessandro. This family, which became the ducal family of Parma, was neither rich nor important until the early 15th century. Before that the Farnese served Viterbo, Orvieto, and other towns as generals and were always loyal to the papacy. Pietro II fought for the GUELFS against Emperor Henry VI, Pietro III against Henry VII. Guido was bishop of Orvieto from 1302 to 1328.

Ranuccio (d. 1460?) moved to Rome and became senator in 1417 and later general of Pope Eugene IV. The family gained prestige through the fiefs he acquired and through the marriages of his children into the oldest families of Rome. His eldest son, Pierluigi, married into the GAETANI family, and his son Alessandro was the first cardinal in the family (1493), later becoming Pope PAUL III (1534–49). Paul gave his natural but legitimatized son Pierluigi (d. 1547) and his family properties and offices. Pierluigi became duke of Castro and flagbearer of the Church. Two of Pierluigi's sons were created cardinals; Ottavio, another son, received Camerino, and his brother

The main portal of the Farnese palace in Rome, designed and built by Antonio da Sangallo the Younger, 1534. Above the balcony is the coat of arms of Pope Paul III. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Orazio was prefect of Rome. Ottavio's marriage with Margaret, the natural daughter of Emperor CHARLES V, was the first international marriage of the Farnese. The family's greatest honor came in 1545 when the pope, after the approval of a consistory, bestowed Parma and Piacenza on Pierluigi with the rank of duke and with right of succession. This marked the end of the old Farnese loyalty to the papacy; Farnese dynastic considerations henceforth came first. From 1545 to 1547, when Duke Pierluigi restricted his nobles, Don Ferrante Gonzaga, Charles V's governor in Milan, encouraged them to rebel. The nobles assassinated Pierluigi, and Don Ferrante occupied Piacenza. Hence Pierluigi's son Ottavio (d. 1586) did not succeed immediately when the duke died in 1547. Instead, the pope, his grandfather, sent Camillo Orsini to govern Parma; Piacenza stayed in the imperialists' hands. In 1550 the new pope JULIUS III restored Parma to Ottavio, but when Ottavio joined with King Henry II of France against the emperor (and the pope), the pope once more deprived him of the duchy. However, French military successes forced Julius to recognize Ottavio as ruler of Parma in 1552. Piacenza was restored to him in 1557; the influence of his wife, Margaret of Parma, and that of her half-brother, King PHILIP II of Spain, was of assistance. Ottavio began the building of the huge Farnese palaces in Piacenza and in Parma. Ottavio's son and successor, Alessandro (d. 1592), was the most able member of the ducal family. He had already won a name for himself as a general and governor of the Netherlands for his uncle, Philip II, when he became duke of Parma and Piacenza. He remained in the Spanish Netherlands and never ruled personally in Parma.

His son, Duke Ranuccio I (d. 1622), contracted such large debts that his duchy began to decline. Odoardo (d. 1646) was ten when his father died, and so his uncle, Cardinal Odoardo, served as regent. In time Duke Odoardo proved ambitious. He wished to add Lombardy to his possessions but failed in the attempt. As proud as he was ambitious, he treated the BARBERINI, the nephews of Pope URBAN VIII, with disdain when he visited Rome, and the war for Castro followed. Although he won the war and kept Castro, his debts added a burden to his duchy. Ranuccio II (d. 1694) was 16 when he succeeded his father. His uncle, Cardinal Francesco Maria, and his mother were regents. In Mazarin's quarrel with Pope INNOCENT x the duke supported France and lost Castro, which became a part of the States of the Church. Duke Francesco Maria (d. 1727) succeeded Ranuccio. His brother Antonio (d. 1731) was the last duke.

There were five Farnese cardinals (the first date given being that of their cardinalate): Alessandro (1534-89), the son of Duke Pierluigi, held several offices; he was vice chancellor in 1535, legate to both Emperor Charles V and King Francis I (1539-41), and to Charles V (1543). He resembled his grandfather, Paul III, in being a great builder. The cardinal completed the Farnese palace, built the Gesù, purchased and completed the Chigi villa, which was renamed the Farnesina, and built the palace at Caprarola. He made the Farnese palace a meeting place in Rome for persons interested in art and literature. Ranuccio (1545-65), another son of Duke Pierluigi, was noted for his interest in learning and served as legate in the Marches. Odoardo (1591-1626), the son of Duke Alessandro, served as legate in Parma for 20 years and as a member of the first Congregation for the PROPA-GATION OF THE FAITH (1622). He built the sacristy of the Gesù. Ludwig von PASTOR described him as one of the outstanding cardinals in 1622 (see GREGORY XV). Francesco Maria was cardinal from 1645 to 1647. Girolamo (1657-68) was nuncio in Switzerland, governor of Rome, and majordomo of Pope ALEXANDER VII before he became a cardinal.

Bibliography: G. MORONI, *Dizionario de erudizione storico*ecclesastica, 103 v. in 53 (Venice 1840–61) 23:193–215. P. LITTA et al., Famiglie celebri italiane, 14 v. (Milan 1819–1923), v.5. L. CALLARI, I palazzi di Roma (3d ed. Rome 1944) 212–229. J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:27–28.

[M. L. SHAY]

FARO OF MEAUX, ST.

Bishop; d. c. 672. He was of Burgundian origin, hence his name Burgundofaro. His sister, St. FARA, founded the double abbey of FAREMOUTIERS. Faro himself had married, but when about 35 years old he determined to embrace the Benedictine life, probably persuaded by his sister. His wife pursued a similar course. Shortly after receiving Holy Orders, he was chosen bishop of Meaux, where he labored many years for the conversion and salvation of souls. The Vita s. Fari, written 200 years after his death by Bishop Hildegar of Meaux, is of no great historical value. Likewise, a ballad Cantilène de Saint Faron, which has given rise to considerable literature, is without historical foundation. But there are sufficient reliable sources attesting to Faro's existence and work.

Feast: Oct. 28.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Oct. 12:593–623. J. MABIL-LON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–40) 2:580–598. Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 171–203. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2825–31. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:941–945. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956–) 4:216–217.

[O. L. KAPSNER]

FARRELL, WALTER

Theologian, lecturer, writer; b. Chicago, Ill., July 21, 1902; d. River Forest, Ill., Nov. 23, 1951. Following his education in Chicago at parochial schools and at Quigley Preparatory Seminary, he entered the Dominican Order at Saint Joseph's Priory, Somerset, Ohio, on Sept. 14, 1920. He studied philosophy at St. Rose Priory, Springfield, Ky., and theology at the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D.C., where he was ordained on June 9, 1927. After obtaining the S.T.Lr. degree in 1928, he pursued graduate studies at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, from which he received his S.T.D. in 1930. After returning to the U.S., he was professor of dogmatic theology at Somerset until 1933, when he was transferred to the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D.C. He was appointed regent of studies of the Province of St. Joseph in 1939; the following year he went to Rome and, after a lengthy examination in theology, won the degree of master in sacred theology, the highest honor granted by the Dominican Order. That same year, he was named president of the pontifical faculty of theology at the Dominican House of Studies, Washington, D.C. During World War II, Farrell was a chaplain in the U.S. Navy, serving over a year on the carrier U.S.S. Yorktown. Upon leaving the service in 1945, he was assigned to the Dominican House of Studies, River Forest, in the Province of St. Albert the Great. Farrell, an active retreat-master and preacher, was also one of the first lecturers in the Thomist Association, which provided courses in theology for the laity. He helped to launch the Thomist, a quarterly speculative review, in April 1939, and contributed frequently to it and to other leading Catholic journals. His best known work was A Companion to the Summa, the four volumes of which were published from 1938 to 1942. After his death, his nearly completed life of Christ, together with selections from his earlier writings, was published under the title of Only Son (1953).

Bibliography: R. E. BRENNAN, "Walter Farrell, O.P., Apud Posteros Sacer," The Thomist (1952) 199–208. R. M. COFFEY, "The Very Reverend Walter Farrell, O.P., S.T.M.," American Ecclesiastical Review 126 (1952) 271–278.

[T. C. DONLAN]

FASANI, FRANCESCO ANTONIO, ST.

Baptized Donato Antonio Giovanni Nicolò, known in religion as Francis Antony of Lucera, also called "Padre Maestro," Franciscan priest; b. Aug. 6, 1681, Lucera, Apulia, Italy; d. there Nov. 29, 1742. He was the son of Giuseppe Fasani, a farmer, and Isabella della Monica. After Giuseppe's death (c. 1691), Isabella married a man who provided for 'Giovanniello's education. He entered the Conventual Franciscan novitiate at Monte Sant'Angelo Gargano (Foggia) on Aug. 23, 1695, and made his solemn profession one year later. Thereafter he studied literature and philosophy at Venafro (Isernia), Alvito (Frosinone), Montella (Avellino), and Aversa (Caserta), and theology at Agnone (Isernia). Following his ordination at the tomb of St. Francis of Assisi in 1705, he earned a doctorate in theology in Rome (1709), taught theology at the College of St. Bonaventure, then philosophy at St. Francis Convent, Lucera. In addition to his renown as a teacher, Fasani gained a reputation as a lucid preacher, spiritual director, and minister, especially among prisoners and the poor. He served in many offices: guardian at S. Rocco ad Alberona (Foggia, 1709-12) and Lucera (1712-15; 1739-42), and master of novices (Lucera, 1723-29), as well as provincial of Sant'Angelo Province (1720–23). He was known for his simplicity, humility, charity, fidelity to the Franciscan Rule and the spirit of its founder, and devotion to the Immaculate Conception. He composed novenas, including some of the first to the Immaculate Conception, meditations, sermons, Marian hymns, and a pamphlet on the attributes of God. The body of the saint is enshrined under the altar of Lucera's church dedicated to St. Francis. Fasani was beatified in 1951, and canonized by Pope John Paul II on April 13, 1986.

Feast: Nov. 27 (Franciscans).

Bibliography: Works by St Francesco Fasani: Le 7 Novene Mariane, ed. F. COSTA (Padua 1986). Mariale, interpretazione allegorico-spirituale del Cantico dei Cantici, ed. F. COSTA (Padua 1986). Il Padre Nostro (Expositio brevis), ed. E. GALIGNANO, tr. A. TOLVE and V. PERGOLA (Italian tr. of Fasani's commentary on the Our Father) (Lucera 1996). Literature about St. Francesco Fasani: Compendium vitae virtum et miraculorum necnon actorum in causa canonizationis beati Francisci A. Fasani, sacerdotis ordinis fratrum minorum conventualium (Rome 1985). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 16 (1986): 3. A. ANGELINI, Predestinata! (Terni, Italy 1968). G. DE ANGELIS, Prodigio di un sorriso (Lucera 1991). L. M. BERARDINI, Il Beato Francesco Antonio Fasani (Rome 1951). R. COLAPIETRA, Da Masaniello a Carlo di Borbone, I Convegno Nazionale di Studi su San Francesco A. Fasani (Lucera 1989). L. DI FONZO, L'immagine di S. Francesco nei Sermoni e nella vita del Fasani (Bari 1986); Santo di Lucera, Profilo cronologico di S. Francesco A. Fasani (Bari 1986). I. DI GIOVINE, San Francesco A. Fasani (Lucera 1989). G. GUASTAMACCHIA, Il bel San Francesco. La Chiesa del Padre Maestro, ed. G. PREZIUSO (Lucera 1973). M. MARSICO, Profilo storico e spirituale di San Francesco A. Fasani (Rome 1986). B. NONNI, Francesco Antonio Fasani dei Frati Minori Conventuali (Lucera 1985). A. ORSITTO, Il Santo dei poveri (Lucera 1986). G. STANO, La stella di Lucera (Frigento, Italy 1986). T. TOLVE, Padre Maestro: il cammino dell'amore (Lucera 1987). G. TRINCUCCI, Un Santo e la sua città (Foggia 1988). R. ZAVALLONI, "San Francesco educatore," in Pedagogia e vita (Rome 1980). P. ZOLLA, San Francesco A. Fasani (Lucera 1986).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FASCE, MARIA TERESA, BL.

Abbess of the Order of Saint Augustine; baptized Marietta; b. Dec. 27, 1881, Torriglia (near Genoa), Italy; d. Jan. 18, 1947, Cascia (near Perugia), Italy. Born into a wealthy family, Teresa served as a catechist in the Augustinian parish of Our Lady of Consolation, Genoa, where she became acquainted with the order's spirituality and captivated by the life of St. RITA OF CASCIA (canonized 1900 when Teresa was 19) Fasce joined the community in June 1906 and professed her vows the following year. She received permission for exclaustration (right to live outside the community) to reflect on her vocation. After ten months with her family, she returned (1911) with a determination to renew the community. Thereafter she professed her solemn vows (1912) and served St. Rita's as novice mistress (1914-17), vicar (1917-20), and abbess (1920-47). She took in orphaned girls whom she called her little bees, which thus gave rise to the name of the orphanage, St. Rita's Hive, which is located next to the church. Fasce worked to relieve suffering in the area. Additionally, she helped to build a new church and nearby an Augustinian seminary, a hospital, and a retreat house. During World War II she courageously and repeatedly opposed the Nazis by denying them access to the convent and those under her protection. Her activity obscures her deeply contemplative vocation, which she encouraged within the community. She wrote the bulletin Dalle api alle rose (From Bees to Roses) from 1923 in order to spread devotion to St. Rita. Thereafter many pilgrims visited St. Rita's tomb. Mother Maria Teresa died peacefully after suffering for years from a breast tumor, diabetes, and various cardiac and circulatory problems, and was buried in the crypt of St. Rita's Basilica next to her patroness. She was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 12, 1997.

Feast: Jan. 18.

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis, no. 20 (1997): 999. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 29 (1995): 5; no. 42 (1997): 1, 2, 11. A. ANGELINI, Predestinata! (Terni, Italy 1968).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FAST AND ABSTINENCE

Fasting is here understood as the complete or partial abstention from food, abstinence as the abstention from the eating of meat of certain meat products, when the restraint is undertaken as a religious practice or in accordance with ecclesiastical custom or law. Neither fast nor abstinence is to be confused with the virtue of abstinence, which is a subjective part of temperance that controls the desire and the use of food, although both can be acts of that virtue.

In The Bible. The Biblical concept of fasting embraced both partial and total abstinence from food and drink. The abstention from certain classes of foods that was regulated by dietary law did not fall within the ambit of fasting. The noun used for the term "fast" in the OT was \hat{som} , a derivative of the verb \hat{sum} , to fast. Such phrases as "not to eat bread" (2 Sm 12.17) and "to mortify oneself" (literally: "to bow down one's soul," Lv 16.29) came into common usage with the Priestly Code and were widely used in post-Biblical Hebrew. Both the Septuagint and the NT employed the verb vnoteve to designate fasting as a religious or pious practice. The cognate noun vnoteía was used almost exclusively to denote religious fasting.

Little is known regarding the origin of fasting in Israel. The custom was ancient before it entered legislation. It appears to have been practiced for a variety of religious motives, especially in times of calamity (in order to give force to prayers for deliverance) and of mourning (1 Sm 7.6; J1 1.14; Jgs 20.26; 2 Chr 20.3; 1 Kgs 21.9). The Mosaic Law established only one day of fasting, the great Day of ATONEMENT (Lv 16.29–34; Nm 29.7). After the Exile four special days of fasting were added (Zec 8.19).

Christian Practice. Following the examples of Christ (Mt 6.16; Mk 2.20; 9.29) and the Apostles (Acts 13.2; 14.23; 2 Cor 2.27), the earliest Christians practiced both fast and abstinence. In early centuries regular weekly fasts were practiced on Wednesday and Friday (DID-ACHE), and abstinence from certain foods, especially flesh meats, was established. The observance of the Friday abstinence in commemoration of the Passion and death of Our Lord was common in both the Eastern and Western Church (Clement of Alexandria, Stromata, 6.75; Tertullian, De jejunio, 14). Throughout the history of the Church, law and custom regarding fast and abstinence were subject to local variations, both as to the times observed and as to the quantity and quality of food permitted.

In the Western Church. About 400 the Wednesday fast was replaced by that of Saturday, which had come to be regarded also as a day of abstinence, The observance of Lent was of early origin, and the vigil fasts before great feasts, the Ember days, and rogation days eventually came to be observed.

Following the custom of the Jews under the old law, Christians first practiced fasting by abstaining from all food until after sunset or after the recitation of Vespers, when the day's meal would be taken. About the 9th century it began to be customary in some places to take the day's meal after the recitation of None, or about 3 P.M. It had been the custom on days of fasting to say Mass only after the hour of None. This order of the Office was retained, but to make allowance for new customs of fasting the hours of Vespers and None were anticipated, and this led to the celebration of Mass earlier in the day. In the 12th century the custom of breaking one's fast at the hour of None everywhere prevailed, and by the 13th century the practice of taking the meal as early as noon was common.

As the time of the day's meal became earlier and earlier, the exhaustion at the end of the day's labor, unrelieved by the refreshment of food, became more burdensome. In the monasteries, where the days of fasting were much more numerous and where the practice of mid-day meal had also been established, the monks had much earlier distinguished between days of fast prescribed by monastic rule and those observed by the Church. On days of monastic but not Church fast the monks were allowed a slight repast or "collation" to be taken during the evening conference (in Latin called collatio because the readings were frequently taken from the Collationes of Cassian). At first the monastic collation was only a small measure of wine, but later a morsel of bread was added. Monastic practice thus provided the example for general custom. By the 13th century taking something to drink apart from the day's meal was a generally accepted practice, and by the end of the 14th century it was common custom to take a collation of bread, vegetables, or fruit at the end of the day. This collation, however, was never understood to be of sufficient quantity to constitute a normal meal. About the 16th century a very light breakfast was approved. It was understood that at the collation not more than eight ounces of solid food were to be eaten, and at breakfast not more than about two ounces.

Fasting meant not only the observance of the requirements of custom with regard to the quantity of food and the time when it could be eaten, but also abstinence from certain types of food, particularly flesh meat and meat products. Days of fasting were thus days of abstinence although other days might be marked for the observance of abstinence alone. The laws regarding abstinence, like those of fasting, were of unwritten origin and were always subject to variations in custom in time and place. In the early Church abstinence meant refraining from flesh meat and all meat products, including milk, eggs, butter, and cheese. Fish or mollusks, however, were not generally considered to be a form of meat or to fall under the prohibition of abstinence. As early as the 9th century milk, eggs, and milk products began to be exempted either by the force of local custom or by repeated dispensation.

In the Eastern Church. From the earliest times, Wednesday and Friday of each week were observed as days of abstinence in the Greek Church. Other days and seasons were added in the course of time. The major Lent goes back to the 2nd century. In the 4th century it was spoken of as the "holy forty" (days), but at some times and in certain places it was a much more extended period. In addition to the great, or major, Lent, three other "Lents" have been observed in the Eastern Church: the Lent of the holy Apostles (June 16-28); Mary's Lent (August 1-14); and the Lent preceding Christmas (November 15-December 24). These three minor Lents did not become obligatory before the 8th century; thence to the faithful. Days observed by fasting and abstinence have been numerous in the East; in the Greek Church the total has been as high as 180 in the course of a year.

The practice of abstinence was especially prevalent among the early hermits of the East. St. Anthony and his followers abstained from all food except bread, salt, and water—a practice continued by Pachomius and the Egyptian monks. Monastic fasting and abstinence tended to be extremely rigorous in the East, and this severity had its influence on observance that came to be expected of the faithful. The law of abstinence is referred to as xerophagy, the eating of dry food. In older times on days of abstinence meat and meat products (milk, butter, cheese, eggs), fish, oil, and wine were forbidden. This traditional custom of severe abstinence is still observed by some of the faithful. Rigorous periods of abstinence were often preceded by a week of mitigated abstinence.

In more modern times fast and abstinence in the Eastern Church is often found to be the same both for Churches in union with Rome and for separated Churches.

General Law and U.S. Practice. Until 1917 the general law of the Western Church required the faithful to fast on all the days of Lent except Sunday; on Wednesday, Fridays, and Saturdays of the Ember weeks; and on the vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, Assumption, and All Saints. By custom in many places the Wednesdays and Fridays of Advent were also fast days. By fasting was understood the taking of only one meal a day with abstinence from meat, eggs, and milk products. Moreover, fish was not to be taken along with meat at a meal allowing meat, that is, on the Sundays of Lent, or on normal fast days by those who were otherwise dispensed from meat abstinence. Abstinence without fast was observed on all Fridays and Saturdays throughout the year.

Local dispensations often mitigated these general prohibition. In the U.S. the bishops obtained a number of dispensations. The fathers of the Third Provincial Council of Baltimore in 1837 obtained a dispensation from the custom of fasting on the Wednesdays and Fridays of Advent; and in 1840 the Fourth Provincial Council of Baltimore asked that an indult dispensing from the Saturday abstinence that had been granted for 10 years be made perpetual. Gregory XVI renewed the dispensation for 20 years.

The fathers of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1866 asked that all dispensations that had been granted to the Province of Baltimore be extended to all other dioceses. However, Pius IX preferred to have the individual bishops seek the indults they needed and give their reasons. Since the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1884 decided that it would be very difficult to pass any uniform legislation on the subject of fast and abstinence, it was left to the individual bishops to determine in provincial councils what seemed best for their territories.

In 1886 Leo XIII granted to all the bishops of the U.S. for 10 years the faculty to dispense each year from the Saturdays abstinence. He also approved a Lenten indult for the U.S. that permitted the taking of meat, eggs, and milk products at all meals on the Sundays of Lent and at the principal meal on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. Holy Saturday and the Saturdays of Ember weeks were excepted. Fish and meat were never allowed at the same meal, even on Sundays. The use of eggs and milk products at the evening collation and at the principal meal on days when meat was not allowed was permitted. A small piece of bread in the morning could be taken with coffee, tea, chocolate, or any similar beverage. It was permissible to invert the order of the principal meal when this could not be taken at noon. Lard and meat drippings could be used in the preparation of foods. Finally, the faithful who were exempt from the law of fasting could, when the use of meat, eggs, and milk products was permitted, eat such foods more than once a day just as all were permitted to do on the Sundays of Lent when the obligation of fasting did not bind.

In constant use until 1951 was the workingmen's privilege. This was originally granted for 10 years in 1895 and empowered the bishops in the U.S. to permit the use of flesh meat in those circumstances if place and person in which they judged that the common law of abstinence could not be observed without real difficulty. This concession benefited not only the individual workingman but applied also to his family.

In 1917 Benedict XV granted the privilege of transferring abstinence from the Saturdays of Lent to any other day of the week except Ash Wednesday and the Fridays of Lent. In 1941 Pius XII granted to all the bishops of the world the power to dispense entirely from fast and abstinence except on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. Some restrictions on this faculty were imposed by the Holy See in 1949—namely, that abstinence must be observed on all Fridays of the year; fast and abstinence, on Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and the vigils of Assumption and Christmas. On days of fast the vigils and abstinence, eggs and milk products could be taken at breakfast and at the collation.

In 1951 a bishops' committee drew up a formula of uniform norms that became the basis for diocesan regulations in the U.S. Regarding abstinence the formula stated: (1) everyone over seven years of age was bound to observe the law of abstinence; (2) complete abstinence was to be observed on Fridays, Ash Wednesday, the vigils of Assumption and Christmas, and Holy Saturday morning. On these days meat and soup or gravy made from meat were not to be taken; (3) partial abstinence was to be observed on Ember Wednesdays and Saturdays, and on the vigils of Pentecost and All Saints. On days of partial abstinence meat and soup or gravy made from meat could be taken only once a day at the principal meal.

In regard to fasting the formula stated: (1) everyone over 21 and under 59 years of age was bound to observe the law of fast; (2) the days of fast were the weekdays of Lent, Ember days, the vigils of Pentecost, Assumption, All Saints, and Christmas; (3) on days of fast only one full meal was allowed. Two other meatless meals, sufficient to maintain strength, were permitted according to each one's needs; but together they should not equal another full meal; (4) meat was permitted at the principal meal on a day of fast except on Fridays, Ash Wednesday, and the vigils of Assumption and Christmas; (5) eating between meals was not permitted; but liquids, including milk and fruit juices, were allowed; (6) when health or ability to work would be seriously affected, the law did not oblige.

In 1956 the bishops of the U.S. slightly modified these norms. Holy Saturdays was excluded as a day of abstinence; the entire day became one only of fast. The vigil of All Saints was no longer listed as a day of fast or of partial abstinence. By decree of the Congregation of the Council in 1957, the law of fast and abstinence that had long been established for the vigil of the Assumption was transferred to the vigil of the Immaculate Conception.

On Dec. 3, 1959, John XXIII granted to all the faithful the faculty of anticipating the obligation of the Christmas Eve fast and abstinence form the 24th to the 23d of December.

Paul VI's Apostolic Constitution and the 1983 Code. Numerous indults obtained for various countries of the world led to widely different ways of observing the law of fast and abstinence until Pope Paul VI reorganized the ecclesiastical discipline. By the apostolic constitution Poenitemini, promulgated Feb. 17, 1966, Paul VI sought to renew "penitential discipline with practices more suited to our times." Insisting upon the preeminently interior and religious character of penitence, the pope warns that true penance cannot ever "prescind from physical asceticism as well." The traditional and fundamental means of fulfilling the divine precepts of penance are prayer, fasting, and charity, but the form of penance will vary according to the economic well-being of the locality.

Poenitemini provides the historical, doctrinal, and disciplinary background for canons governing penitential observance in the 1983 Code. The first of the five canons emphasizes the importance for all the faithful to be united by some common observance (c. 1249). Canon 1250 prescribes the penitential days and times observed in the universal church as Fridays throughout the year and the season of Lent. Canon 1251 explains that "abstinence from eating meat or some other food" as well as fasting are to be observed without exception on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. The law of abstinence binds everyone who is 14 and older, and everyone between 18 and 60 must fast (c. 1252). The Code leaves it to the conference of bishops to "determine more precisely" particulars regarding the observance of fast and abstinence as well as "other forms of penance, especially works of charity and exercises of piety" that might be substituted for abstinence and fast.

In November, 1966 the National Conference of Catholic Bishops issued a statement on regulating penitential discipline in the United States. The obligation to fast and abstain "from which no Catholic Christian will lightly excuse himself" binds on Ash Wednesday and Good Friday. "We preserve for our dioceses the tradition of abstinence from meat on each of the Fridays of Lent, confident that no Catholic Christian will lightly hold himself excused from this penitential practice." The bishops strongly recommend participation in daily Mass and a self-imposed program of fasting during Lent.

A few weeks later (Dec. 1, 1966), the bishops' committee on doctrine in answer to two questions responded, that neither the fast-abstinence of Ash Wednesday and Good Friday nor the abstinence of the Fridays of Lent binds gravely as an ecclesiastical law. The divine precept of penitence, however, binds all Catholics in a serious manner. Anyone who claims to be a follower of Christ should approach Him in a spirit of repentance. "It is obvious that if his disposition is such that he is unwilling to do anything to answer the Lord's call to do penance and follow the pastoral injunctions of his shepherds, he would reveal a mortally serious state of soul, and further specifications would seem to be purely academic."

Bibliography: T. L. BOUSCAREN and J. I. O'CONNOR, comps., Canon Law Digest (Milwaukee 1934-). P. MICHEL et al., Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 1.1: 262-277. National Catholic Welfare Conference, Our Bishops Speak, ed. R. M. HUBER (Milwaukee 1952). "Paenitemini," Acta Apostolicae Sedis 58 (Rome 1966) 177-198; Eng. tr. Jurist 26 (1966) 246-258. "Pastoral Statement of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on Penitential Observance for the Liturgical Year," Jurist 27 (1967) 95-100. Congregation of the Council. "Dubium" Acta Apostolicae Sedis 59 (Rome 1967) 229. A. CARR, "How Serious the Lenten Fast and Abstinence?" Homiletic and Pastoral Review 67 (New York 1967) 613-615. L. MCREAVY, "Fasting and Abstinence: How Far Binding?" Clergy Review 52 (London 1967) 642-643. J. O'HARA, "Christian Fasting," Scripture 19 (1967) 3-18, 82-95. M-T. MA-THIEU, "Réflection sur le jeune," Vie Consacrée 58 (1986) 113-122. J. P. BEAL, J. A. CORIDEN, and T. H. GREEN, eds. New Commentary on the Code of Canon Law (New York 2000).

[P. M. J. CLANCY/G. T. KENNEDY/ J. E. LYNCH/EDS.]

FASTRED, BL.

Abbot of Cîteaux; b. Cambron (Belgium); d. Paris, April 21, 1163. A member of the noble Gaviaumer family, he joined the CISTERCIANS at CLAIRVAUX under St. BERNARD. He founded a new monastery in his native Cambron in the diocese of Cambrai in 1148, was elected abbot at Clairvaux in 1157, and in 1161 was promoted to the abbacy of CÎTEAUX. A devoted disciple of St. Bernard, he was a courageous supporter of ALEXANDER III in his fight against FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA. Fastred died in Paris, where Pope Alexander administered the Last Sacraments in the presence of King LOUIS VII, and was buried in Cîteaux. Two of his letters survived and are edited in Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v. (Paris 1878-90) 185:704-706; 200:1363-65. Fastred, although never formally canonized, is venerated as blessed among the Cistercians.

Feast: April 21.

Bibliography: J. M. CANIVEZ, L'Ordre de Cîteaux en Belgique (Forges lez-Chimay, Belg. 1926) 109–110. S. LENSSEN, Hagiologium cisterciense, 2 v. (Tilburg 1948–49; suppl. 1951) 1: 232–234. A. A. KING, Cîteaux and Her Elder Daughters (London 1954).

[L. J. LEKAI]

FATE AND FATALISM

According to an ancient concept, all natural events and human actions occur as they do and things are as they are, by the dominance of an absolute principle or cause, more or less conscious, known as fate. While determinism interprets a single fact by linking it necessarily with other single facts, both antecedent and subsequent, fate refers the totality of events to a necessary unique cause. This can even be a free will, therefore an idea of fate is the conclusion of all monistic metaphysics.

Fate, fortune, chance and destiny. Fate is to be distinguished from fortune ($\tau \upsilon \chi \dot{\eta}$), which ''is not present except in those things which act voluntarily'' (St. Thomas In 2 phys. 10); from chance, which may be defined as ''absence of laws,'' [cf., J. Sageret, Le Hasard et la destinée (Paris 1927) 142] and which is found only ''in those things which happen from nature''; and finally from destiny, which includes, at least in part, the intervention of even the individual will. In fate, the future is independent of what the individual can will or not will. In the concept of destiny the future is a resultant of that of which human action is also a component. Accordingly, one may say: ''Follow your destiny, fulfill your destiny,'' but not ''Follow your fate.''

The term fate comes from the Latin fatum, derived from fari (to say). Isidore defines it thus: "They call fate whatever the gods say, whatever Jupiter says; therefore they say fatum is from the verb fari, i.e., from a verb meaning to speak" (Etymol. 8.11.90; confer, St. Augustine, Civ. 5.9). The Latin fatum was employed to translate the Greek terms είμαρμένη, αἶσα, and μοῖρα. Cicero defined it as follows: "I call fate [fatum] what the Greeks call είμαρμένη, i.e., an orderly series of causes, since cause is connected with cause and each of itself produces an effect. This is an eternal truth coming down from all eternity. . . . Therefore it is understood that fate is that which is called, not through ignorant superstition, but scientifically, 'the eternal cause of things, explaining why more things which have gone before happened, why those which now occur happen, and why those which follow will happen" (Divin. 1.55. 125-126). The Greeks derive είμαρμένη either from είρμός (series, chain; so Aetius, 1.28.4, ed., H. Diels), or from eroual (align; confer, Diogenes Laertius 7.149), or from είρω (say).

In the history of religious beliefs and of philosophical thought, fatalism has assumed various aspects and meanings. In its early immature and anthropomorphic form, it was mythological fatalism. It became philosophical in its more perfect speculative expression, as in Stoic doctrine. Astrological fatalism may be considered a variant of this form. Finally, one may speak of theological fatalism, as in the case of the various theories involving predestination.

Mythological fatalism. Mythological fatalism, at least as it took shape in Greek thought, is the first form of the doctrine. Above the numerous divinities, whose purposes were often opposed and in conflict, was είμαρμένη, a power that dominated even Zeus himself (in Ovid, Metam. 9.435, Jupiter says: "The fates rule me also"). It represented a monistic exigency which was as yet hardly outlined, but which already revealed the need of preserving the cosmic unity which polytheism could not guarantee (confer, Homer, Iliad 21.82; 19.186; Odyssey 3.226; 11.558). Moreover, this elementary form of fatalism came probably from an early reflection on the ordered and irrevocable movements of the heavenly bodies, a reflection superimposed on simple popular faith. If such was the case, fatalism did not have a religious origin, but was rather the primitive expression of a vague speculative interest, and therefore the most remote antecedent of cosmological mechanism.

Astrological fatalism. The Quadripartitum of Claudius Ptolemaeus (2d century A.D.) may be considered the classic text of astrological fatalism, which makes explicit the acceptable astronomical inspirations of mythological fatalism, and thus connects the destiny of the individual with the position of the stars that preside at his birth. Seneca said: "Our fates lead us, and the hour of birth has determined how much time remains for each" (De prov. 5.7). St. Augustine attacked such ideas in ironic vein: "You will be an adulterer, because you have Venus; you will be a murderer, because you have Mars" (In psalm. 140, Patrologia Latina, 37:1821; confer, Civ. 5.9).

"The Fates Gathering in the Stars," painting by Elihu Vedder, ca. 1850-1923. (©Christine's Images/CORBIS)

Astrological fatalism presumes not only to catch the somatic characteristics and physical vicissitudes of the individual in the net of astral events, but also to predetermine his talent, moral character and feelings. If a sympathetic force (conspiratio omnium) connects heaven and earth in a cosmic unity, as astrologers claim their fatalism does, human actions brought under the rigorous law of nature are divested of all moral value. As Gellius says: "Therefore penalties for the guilty have been wrongfully established by laws, if men do not commit crimes voluntarily, but are led to do so by fate" (Noct. Att. 7.2.5). Astrologers who do not wish to abandon the indisputable doctrine of cosmic conspiratio, but who, at the same time, recognize the moral appeals of freedom and responsibility, claim that the power of fate is exercised exclusively on bodies, leaving the will of the ego to function freely (confer, the extracts from BARDESANES, "Book of the Laws of the Countries," or "Concerning Fate," cited by Eusebius, Praep. Evang. 6.10). This was a significant question in the consciences of thinkers of the Renaissance, who accepted astrological teachings (see PONTANUS, De rebus coelestibus, and the attack on astrology made by Pico della Mirandola in his Disputationes adversus astrologiam). The same Gnostics who willingly accepted astrological ideas admitted that sages devoted to higher knowledge escape fate (see CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, Exc. Theod. 78, ed., F. Sagnard, pp. 201-202).

Philosophical fatalism. Philosophical fatalism does not differ substantially from mythological fatalism, of which it may be considered to be the rational and systematic expression, or from astrological fatalism, which is a specific aspect of it and with which it is identified. Among the pre-Socratics, είμαρμένη is the necessary bond that connects the parts of the All and guarantees its order and unity. It is the "cause of things" (according to Pythagoras, as reported in Diogenes Laertius, 8.27), or it is "justice, forethought and creator" (according to Parmenides and Democritus, as cited by Aetius, 1.25.3, ed., H. Diels), or it is "reason creating from the running of opposite ways of things" (according to Heraclitus, as quoted by Aetius, 1.7.22). For Anaxagoras, who probably considered είμαρμένη an "empty name" (cf., Alexander of Aphrodisias, De fato, 2), fate shares with other determining causes the government of the world (Aetius, 1.29.7).

After Plato (cf., Theaet. 169C; Tim. 89C; Rep. 619C) and Aristotle (cf., Eth. Nic. 7.32 ff.; Phys. 2.196a), in whom the concept of fate vanished in the elaboration of a body of thought that was preoccupied with preserving, on the one hand, the freedom and autonomy of the person, and on the other, the teleological ordering of the universe, philosophical fatalism appeared in its most rigorous and systematic form in Stoicism. Works of Zeno, Chrysippus and later of Posidonus and Boethius (fl. 2d century B.C.), were expressly devoted to fate. Zeno defined fate as "a force which moves matter in a uniform and constant manner," whether it be called providence or nature (cf., Theodoret, Graec. aff. cur. 6.14). For Chrysippus, it was "pneumatic power, and the reason of the cosmos . . . according to which what has happened has happened, what happens happens, and what will happen will happen" (Stobaeus, Ecl. 1.5, p. 59, ed., K. Wachsmuth; confer, the definition cited from Cicero Divin. above); and also: "an eternal and unchangeable series of circumstances and a chain rolling and entangling itself through unending and consequential successions from which it is made and with which it is connected" (Gellius, Noct. Att. 7.2.1).

Stoicism, which did not admit any substantial distinction between spirit and matter, explained each and every event by the inexorable rhythm of cyclic time (ɛiμαρμένη-κύκλος; see Pseudo-Plutarch, De fato 3-4), and it sacrificed all pluralistic and personal demands to its naturalistic monism. Wisdom was found entirely in amor fati: "What then is the duty of the good man? It is to offer himself to fate. It is a great consolation to be swept along with the universe. Whatever it is that has ordered us so to live, so to die, by the same necessity it binds the gods as well. . . . The great creator and ruler of all, it is true, wrote the laws of fate, but he follows them. He obeys forever, he ordered but once" (Seneca, De prov. 5.8). This was the triumph of "inactive reason" (ignava ratio, ἀργὸς λόγος), which refuses to act and to change the world.

Divination also reveals the future as possible, not for the sake of opening before man the possibility of endless moral activity, but for the sake of rendering him "as one under compulsion" (ἀναγκαζόμενος), of binding the chains of his metaphysical subjection more tightly, and of inspiring in him an attitude of apathetic resignation (ἀνάγκη στῆναι). Chrysippus endeavored to distinguish different orders of causes: "some complete and principal, other auxiliary and proximate" (cf., Cicero, Top. 15.58–59; id., De fato, 17.40) through which all that happens, happens "either through necessity, or through destiny, or through free choice, or through fortune, or through spontaneity" (Aetius, 1.29.7). But he did not succeed in breaking the iron chain of causes and in preserving the effective freedom of the individual.

Pagan and Christian opposition to fatalism. Fatalism was opposed, especially in its astrological and philosophical forms, by Alexander of Aphrodisias (De fato), Plotinus (Ennead. 2.3, 3.1), Ammonius (De fato) and Proclus [De providentia et fato et eo quod in nobis;; see J. C. Orelli, Alexandri Aphr., Ammonii Hermiae f., Plotini, Bardesanis Syri et G. Gemisti Plethonis de fato (Turin, 1864)] in defence of the rights of the soul. Plotinus in particular was strong in his opposition. While admitting that the positions of the stars "announce" $(\sigma\eta\mu\alpha i\nu \sigma \nu\sigma \iota)$ events, he strove to reconcile cosmic order and the moral autonomy of the individual. In like manner he attacked Epicurean philosophy. The "swerve" (clinamen), introduced to also make possible the freedom of the will, was considered at best merely an irregular phenomenon that was added to the other elements in the Epicurean system and from which it was impossible to expect a purpose or choice that could really belong to the conscious Ego (Ennead 3.1.1). The various treatises on fate by Christian writers (Origen, Minucius Felix, Tertullian, Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom, among others) all exhibited the same hostile attitude. They attacked fatalism to defend not only the rights of man but, above all, the Christian concept of a personal God.

Theological fatalism. Within the ambit of Christian thought, predestination took on the aspect of a theological fatalism in which theistic voluntarism took the place of the impersonal Cosmic Order of the Greeks. The antecedent and positive will of God annulled, not less than the Greek είμαρμένη, the freedom of the individual and his moral responsibility. The elect, under the irresistible action of grace, was considered deprived of his freedom: he could do nothing except what was good; the wicked man, on the other hand, deprived of grace, could not help sinning (non potest non peccare). Theological fatalism, which had its most common form in Islam, made its first appearances in the Christian world in the Patristic period and the early Middle Ages, but it attained its clearest systematic form in the ideas of Calvin (Instit. 3.25.5: non enim pari conditione creantur omnes, sed aliis vita aeterna, aliis damnatio aeterna preordinatur) and, by way of BAIUS, in the Jansenists (cf., P. Quesnel, as cited in the bull Unigenitus 32: Jesus Christus se morti tradidit ad liberandum pro semper suo sanguine primogenitos, id est, electos, de manu angeli exterminatoris).

Quietism and occasionalism, can also be brought into close relation with theological fatalism. The first, revived in a Christian setting, the Stoic attitude of inactive resignation (cf., Molinos, Guía espiritual); the second introduced into Protestant predestination, motives derived from the mechanism of Descartes (cf., Geulincx, Ethica: "Sum igitur nudus spectator huius machinae. Ita est, ergo ita sit."). The modern theology of Karl Barth may likewise be considered a true and characteristic form of "theological occasionalism" [cf., J. Hamer, K. Barth (Paris 1949)]. God's word (Gottes Wort) is omnipotent, free and creative, and like the classical fate, it commands man of itself.

Bibliography: R. OTTO, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al., 6.2 (1909) 2047-51. W. GUNDEL, ibid., 7.2 (1912) 2622-45. S. EITREM, ibid., 15.2 (1932) 2449-97. G. FAGGIN, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:273-276. H. RINGGREN et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart³, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 3:1404-11. A. DORNER et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908-27) 5:771-795, comprehensive series of articles. H. VON ARNIM, Die stoische Lehre von Fatum und Willensfreiheit (Vienna 1905). W. C. GREENE, Moira: Fate, Good and Evil in Greek Thought (Cambridge, Mass. 1944). A. FESTUGIÈRE, L'Idéal religieux des Grecs et l'Évangile (Paris 1932). D. AMAND DE MENDIETA, Fatalisme et liberté dans l'antiquité grecque (Louvain 1945). V. CIOFFARI, Fortune and Fate from Democritus to St. Thomas Aquinas (New York 1949). M. ELIADE, The Myth of the Eternal Return, tr., W. R. TRASK (Bollingen Ser. 46; New York 1954). R. GUÉNON, La Grande Triade (Paris 1957). G. PFLIGERSDORFFER, "Fatum und Fortuna," Literaturwissenschaftliches Jahrbuch, NF 2 (1961) 1-30. M. SPANNEUT, Le Stoicisme des Pères de l'Église de Clément de Rome à Clément d'Alexandrie (Paris 1957). Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 V., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878-90). J. SAGERET, Le Hasard et la destinée (Paris 1927) 142. J. HAMER, K. Barth (Paris 1949).

[G. FAGGIN]

FATHER (RELIGIOUS TITLE)

The title was in early times given to bishops as teachers possessing authority over the faithful; also, as an early Benedictine rule indicates, to priests as sacramental confessors; finally, to the head of a monastery, the word abbot being derived from abba, father. In modern times it has become the normal mode of address of all priests, whether regular or secular, although previously it had been the exclusive title of mendicant friars. This custom originated in Ireland, whence, as a consequence of Irish immigration, it spread to the English-speaking countries. It was established in England, largely due to Cardinal H. Manning's encouragement, about 1880. This custom is still largely confined to English-speaking countries, in which since 1900 some Anglican clergy also have adopted it. Additional uses today of this title are the continuing ones for a sacramental confessor (compare its liturgical use in the Confiteor) and for religious superiors; it is furthermore used in the form "council father" for all bishops and other ecclesiastics who fully participate in an ecumenical council.

Bibliography: New English Dictionary (Oxford 1888–1928) 5.2:97, s.v. father, ecclesiastical uses. W. E. ADDIS and T. ARNOLD, The Catholic Dictionary (London 1884).

[B. FORSHAW]

FATHERS OF SION

Popular name for the Religious of Our Lady of Sion, a congregation of priests and brothers founded at Paris in 1852 by two brothers, Marie Théodore RATISBONNE and Marie Alphonse RATISBONNE, but not formally organized as a congregation until 1893. The founders sought to promote understanding between Christians and Jews.

The history of the congregation represents the slow but true and progressive evolution of Judeo-Christian relationship in the Church. The earlier activities of the Fathers of Sion included an instruction center for converts in Paris and an orphanage for Jewish children, founded in Jerusalem in 1870. Their work at that time was directed principally toward conversion of religion. But the difficulties arising from such proselytical intent caused the fathers to attempt a new approach in a more ecumenical way by means of studies on Judaism, and collaboration and dialogue with the Jews. Centers of study and dialogue were organized, the best known of which was the Institute Saint Pierre de Sion in Jerusalem. In the ensuing years after the Second Vatican Council, the institute, popularly known as the Ratisbonne Institute, became an important ecumenical center for Jewish-Christian relations. In 1985, the congregation transferred the institute to the Holy See, which elevated it to the status of a "Pontifical Institute" in 1998.

[M. R. NÔTRE/EDS.]

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH

A technical title applied to certain ecclesiastical writers of Christian antiquity.

Concept. The historical evolution of the term father is not altogether clear. In ancient times the title was given to teachers; the underlying idea is that a teacher is the procreator of a student's spiritual personality (cf. 1 Kgs 20.35; 1 Pt 5.13). The New Testament father is a teacher of spiritual realities, by whose means the soul of man is reborn into the likeness of Christ (1 Cor 4. 14-15). In the first Christian centuries a bishop was emphatically a father in Christ, not primarily because of the parallel between the leader of a community and the head of a family, but because he baptized his flock and was chief teacher of his church. From the late 4th century the term was applied with special pertinence to those bishops of the past who were cited as authoritative witnesses to the Church's tradition. In the 5th-century Christological controversies the "proof from the fathers" was for the first time fully exploited, particularly in FLORILEGIA; all contending parties, e.g., CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. [Florence-Venice 1757–98]) and THEODORET OF CYR (Monumenta Germaniae 76:400), appealed to the authority of "the fathers."

In a move at once revolutionary and felicitous, AU-GUSTINE (C. Julian. 1.7.34) included among "the fathers" a writer who was not a bishop, JEROME, citing him, by reason of his erudition, as a witness to orthodoxy in the matter of original sin. Recognizing that not all ecclesiastical writers were unexceptionable witnesses, VIN-CENT OF LÉRINS, the first to develop a theory of patristic proof, applied Augustine's insight more rigidly to "those approved teachers who, in their respective times and places, abided in the communion and faith of the one catholic Church" (Commonit. 1.3).

A partial list of "holy fathers," including the layman PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, is found in the so-called Gelasian Decree (not a product of Pope Gelasius, but perhaps a faithful reflection of the 6th-century Roman Church), where the accent is on communion: "those who have not swerved at any point from society with the holy Roman Church, and have not been severed from the faith and preaching that are hers, but by God's grace have shared her fellowship to the last day of their lives" (4.3).

It is in harmony with this early evolution that the distinctively Catholic conception of the Fathers of the Church has emerged: those ecclesiastical writers of Christian antiquity who are distinguished for orthodoxy of doctrine and holiness of life and have therefore been approved by the Church as witnesses to its faith. In this conception four qualifications are regarded as essential.

Antiquity. The patristic era, as a literary period, opens with the first extant piece of extracanonical literature: in the present state of the evidence, Clement of Rome's Letter to the Corinthians (c. 96; see CLEMENT I, POPE, ST.), unless one persists in assigning an earlier date to the DIDACHE. More difficult is the problem of when the age of the Fathers closes. Since the end of the 18th century, Christian antiquity has generally been distinguished from the Middle Ages. Most commonly, Catholic scholars have tended to regard JOHN DAMASCENE (d. c. 750) as the last of the Eastern Fathers and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (d. c. 636) as the last of the Western, though some terminate the era as early as the advent of Emperor JUSTINIAN I (527) or the death of Pope GREGORY I (604), or extend it to 850.

The problem is insoluble, for a solution presupposes answers to questions intimately linked with the periodization of history: which factor—the doctrinal or the literary or the cultural or the historical—ought to predominate in delimiting the age of the Fathers? When do the Middle Ages begin? Is the patristic era conterminous with GrecoRoman culture? How are individual countries and different areas affected in this matter by, for example, Byzantinism, the iconoclast controversy, the Arab conquest, the entrance of Boniface and Columban on the cultural scene?

Orthodoxy. This qualification actually has three facets: excellence of orthodox doctrine. Doctrine in this instance is theological thought externalized in writing: the Fathers are authors. Orthodox doctrine does not imply utter freedom from error, for the Fathers are not simply witnesses to the faith, but in large part are theologians attempting a more or less profound penetration of revelation; rather it demands loyal doctrinal communion with the orthodox Church. The excellence desirable is an elusive quality: it may be originality or profundity or fullness, vigor or clarity or brilliance. It does not necessarily stand comparison with a later age; it does suppose a title to deathlessness on the strength of the author's relative place within the theology of his time.

Holiness. Incontestably, this does not involve formal canonization. Perhaps it does not demand even the spontaneous veneration shown to saints in the early Church. The minimum requisite is ordinary Christian virtue, consistent union with God, revealed concretely in harmony between doctrine and life, between faith and morals. The underlying presupposition is that holiness makes possible, without inescapably guaranteeing, a more exact or a more profound comprehension of divine revelation and Christian tradition.

Ecclesiastical Approval. The Church's approbation may be formal, as when a council or pope or even the martyrology declares an early writer's doctrinal and moral merits; or implicit, as when a council or pope or even the liturgy quotes or cites him approvingly; or virtual, in the presence of a general Christian consensus.

Although this conception of the Fathers is confessedly theological, dogmatic, and to some extent polemic, the scholarly disciplines of patrology and PATRISTIC THEOL-OGY have come to cover the same material, from different viewpoints, as the history of ancient Christian literature. Their sphere of interest includes Christian writers whose orthodoxy has been questioned (e.g., Origen) or who abandoned the Church (e.g., Tertullian), pagan authors who attacked the faith (e.g., Celsus and Porphyry), literary genres such as the New Testament apocrypha and the martyr acts. This broader conception of PATRISTIC STUDY stems from a recognition that research into the Fathers will not yield its full theological harvest if it is limited to a compilation of proof texts or seeks only the consensus in doctrine and exegesis that is a privileged sign of authoritative Church teaching; it should reveal significant stages in the development of doctrine, in the Church's understanding and presentation of God's selfcommunication.

The primitive language of patristic literature was Greek (not classical, but Koine). However, it should be noted that the Greek Fathers and ecclesiastical writers of the 4th and 5th centuries were outstanding representatives of Atticism, so that men such as BASIL and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM were admired by the great Sophist Libanius for their style. In Rome, North Africa, and Gaul the use of Greek was prevalent as late as the 3d century. It was gradually supplanted in the East, outside the Greek area proper, by the national languages, especially Syriac, Coptic, and Armenian, and was displaced in the West by Latin, which apparently had its Christian origins in 2dcentury Rome in translations of the Bible—though North Africa's claim to be the cradle of ecclesiastical Latin cannot be rejected out of hand.

Survey of the Literature. Patristic literature may be conveniently divided into three broad periods: its beginnings, to the Rescript of Toleration in 313 or the Council of Nicaea I in 325; its full flowering, to the Council of Chalcedon in 451; and its decline, to the 7th or 8th century.

Antenicene Fathers. Before Nicaea, three sets of writers have been isolated. There is, first, the group styled APOSTOLIC FATHERS because actually or supposedly they had personal contact with the Apostles or were instructed by their disciples. The quantitatively modest legacy of these men—Antioch's impassioned IGNATIUS, Smyrna's more prosaic POLYCARP, Rome's diplomatic Clement, and several others less distinguished—with its pastoral tone, its eschatological emphasis, and its vivid remembrance of Christ, is a genuine reflection and resounding echo of the primitive Christian witness.

Overlapping this intra-Church literature is the apologetical and antiheretical legacy of the 2d century. The Greek APOLOGISTS were born of the Church's reaction to paganism and Judaism. It was Christianity's first literary contact with the outside world, when a remarkable group of cultivated clerics and laymen-notably JUS-TIN MARTYR, ATHENAGORAS OF ATHENS, and THEOPHILUS OF ANTIOCH-protested with the pen against imperial sword and mob rumor, presented the New Testament as the fulfillment of the Old, contrasted Christian truth with pagan myth, and pioneered in constructing a bridge between the new revelation and the old philosophy. The antiheretical literature, now in large part lost, was the Church's response to MONTANISM and GNOSTICISM; here the outstanding figure is IRENAEUS, widely regarded as the founder of Christian theology.

Toward A.D. 200 ecclesiastical literature took a new turn: after Irenaeus, the ''man of tradition,'' the dominant characteristic is an impressive effort at comprehensive theological construction, stimulated in part by controversy, but more imperatively by the demands made on Christian intelligence by faith itself. The main centers of theological activity were ALEXANDRIA in the East and CARTHAGE in the West, with Rome playing a secondary but important role. The most striking representatives of this new ferment were CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, pioneer of Christian scholarship; ORIGEN, encyclopedic and insightful; the incisive, passionate, paradoxical TERTUL-LIAN; CYPRIAN, with his refined ecclesial sense; and to a lesser extent METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS, HIPPOLYTUS OF ROME, and NOVATIAN.

The Golden Age. Licinius's Rescript of Toleration from Nicomedia (more commonly but less accurately termed the Edict of Milan), which officially recognized Christianity's right to exist and conceded to Christians complete freedom of worship, paved the way for the golden age of patristic literature. It is the period of the first four general councils (NICAEA I, CONSTANTINOPLE I, EPH-ESUS, and CHALCEDON), a constructive, creative period for Christian theology through penetration and elaboration of basic truths with the Trinity and Christology stressed in the East; soteriology and ecclesiology in the West; and a distressing period by reason of the dissensions that rent the Church in ARIANISM, DONATISM, MANICHAEISM, PELAGIANISM, APOLLINARIANISM, NESTO-RIANISM, and MONOPHYSITISM.

It was also a period of Christian humanism, in that the better authors combined theological competence with broad secular learning and a mastery of literary style. Christian literature flowered on many levels: apologies and dogmatic-polemic treatises, biography and Church history, letters and poetry and sermons, and the Biblical science of the Schools of ALEXANDRIA, ANTIOCH, EDES-SA, and NISIBIS.

A select catalogue of first-rate writers is itself an index of this bright hour in the story of literature and theology. In Egypt were the anti-Arian ATHANASIUS and the anti-Nestorian Cyril of Alexandria; the erudite theologian of the Trinity, DIDYMUS THE BLIND; the founder of monastic mysticism, EVAGRIUS PONTICUS; and the "Platonist in a miter," SYNESIUS OF CYRENE. Asia Minor touched new theological heights in the three Cappadocians: the practical BASIL OF CAESAREA, the eloquent GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, and the speculative GREGORY OF NYSSA. In Antioch and Syria the writers of distinction were EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, father of Church history; CYRIL OF JERUSALEM, master of catechetical instruction; EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS, insatiable recorder of heresies; and the School of Antioch's most remarkable representatives, DIODORE OF TARSUS, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, THEO- DORE OF MOPSUESTIA, and THEODORET OF CYR. In the West the dominant figures were HILARY OF POITIERS, highly effective adversary of Arianism; AMBROSE of Milan, in pulpit and politics one of the most powerful personalities of the 4th century; the learned Biblical scholar and humanist JEROME; LEO I, superb rhetorician and defender of Western civilization; and above all, AU-GUSTINE, who "combined the creative power of Tertullian and the intellectual breadth of Origen with the ecclesiastical sense of Cyprian, the dialectical acumen of Aristotle with the idealistic verve and profound speculation of Plato, the practical sense of the Latin with the intellectual mobility of the Greek" (Altaner).

Period of Patristic Decline. After Chalcedon a certain decline in constructive theology set in. In part, the cause lay within Christianity itself; for, in the wake of the councils and great Fathers, the central problems of the faith seemed settled, theology appeared to have reached its peak, and so exegesis and speculation grew weak while spirituality and worship came to the fore. In this context, originality and creativity inevitably ebbed; traditionalism, intellectual subservience to the past, was in possession; catenae and florilegia or collections of texts and citations, multiplied. In part, the explanation is to be sought in the circumstances of the time: the onslaught of barbarians in the West; Caesaropapism in the East; the regrettable rifting of East and West; the culture of Islam laid on Christian ruins. And still the literature is not negligible.

Aristotelian philosophy was put at the service of theological thought, and so the ground was prepared for the flowering of medieval scholasticism. Even the names are not without distinction: BOETHIUS, with his translations of Aristotle; GREGORY THE GREAT, influential interpreter of Scripture and master of sacerdotal spirituality; ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, historian, ascetical writer, and encyclopedist; PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS the Areopagite, profound theologian of the mystical life; MAXIMUS THE CONFES-SOR, scholarly adversary of MONOTHELETISM; and JOHN DAMASCENE, synthesizer of Greek patristic wisdom.

This outline, valid enough for the mainstream of patrology, has the disadvantage of disregarding the Oriental area, the literature in languages other than Latin and Greek. Syriac literature, in the Eastern Aramaic dialect of Edessa that became the literary language of Christian writers in northern Syria and western Mesopotamia, found its high point in EPHREM THE SYRIAN, controversialist, dogmatic and ascetical theologian, exegete, and poet; besides the orthodox authors, a number of Nestorian (e.g., NARSES, founder of the School of Nisibis) and Monophysite (e.g., PHILOXENUS OF MABBUGH) theologians are important for the history of theology. Coptic literature has bequeathed precious Gnostic and Manichaean texts, the genuine and apocryphal Scriptures, the lives of martyrs and monks (e.g., PACHOMIUS and SHENOUTE, the most significant representatives of Egyptian cenobitism), anecdotal accounts such as the APOPHTHEGMATA PATRUM, Church orders, and homiletic and liturgical documents. Georgian literature in its oldest period (4th century to c. 700) is strong in translations from the Greek and Armenian, not only the Bible and apocrypha but lives of saints and versions of Fathers (e.g., HIPPOLYTUS); native literature is richest in hagiography.

In Armenian, historians have perhaps the greatest importance (e.g., Agathangelus), though theology is far from negligible (e.g., Eznik of Kolb's Confutation of the Sects). The first period of Ethiopic literature (Axumite Empire, 4th to 7th centuries) discloses translations of the Bible, of scriptural apocrypha (e.g., Enoch) and Greek patristic works (e.g., Shepherd of HERMAS), and of monastic rules; whether there was also an indigenous literature is not clear. The oldest extant writings of Arabic Christianity stem from the 8th century, when the language of the Muslim conquerors became the literary and everyday language of the Christians in Palestine, Egypt, and Syria.

Bibliography: Editions and translations. J. P. MIGNE, Patrologiae cursus completus, 382 v. (Paris 1844-66). Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866-). Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten Jahrhunderte (Leipzig 1897-). Corpus christianorum. Series latina (Turnhout, Belgium 1953-). Patrologia orientalis (Paris 1903-). Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientalium (Paris-Louvain 1903-). Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur (Leipzig 1882-). Sources chrétiennes (Paris 1942-). Ancient Christian Writers (Westminster, Md. 1946-). The Fathers of the Church (Washington 1947–). A Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, 45 v. (Oxford 1838-88). The Ante-Nicene Fathers, 10 v. (American repr. of Edinburgh ed., Buffalo 1884-97). A Selected Library of Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church, 2 ser., 28 v. (Buffalo-New York 1886-1900; repr. Grand Rapids, Mich. 1952-56). Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, 2 ser., 83 v. (Kempten 1911–39). Literature. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF from the 5th German ed. (New York 1960). J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 3 v. (Westminster, MD 1950-) v.1-3, with French (Paris 1955-) and Spanish (Madrid 1961-) versions that update bibliographies. É. AMANN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 12:1192-1215. A. STUI-BER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 6:272-274. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur, 5 v. (Freiburg 1913-1932) v.1-5. A. VON HARNACK, Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, 2 v. in 4 (Leipzig 1893–1904). H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959). Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 1:142-144, Ethiopic; 280-288, Greek and Latin; 529-531, Arabic; 611-612, Armenian; 2:1399-1400, Georgian; 4:8-11, Coptic; 6:581-583, Syriac. J. De Ghellinck, Patristique et moyenâge: Etudes d'histoire littéraire et doctrinale v.1 (2d ed. Paris 1949) 3:103–244, 339–484. J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Doctrines (2d ed. New York 1960). F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (Berlin 1923–28) v.2.

Fatima, Portugal. (©Tony Arruza/CORBIS)

[W. J. BURGHARDT]

FÁTIMA

Parish in the Diocese of Leiria, central Portugal, near the famous cloister Batalha; the name Fátima is Arabic in origin. Since 1917 it has been one of the most famous Marian SHRINES in the world and the destination of numerous pilgrimages. The parish includes the hamlets Aljustrel and Valinhos and the natural depression Cova da Iria (St. IRENE), where the apparition of the Blessed Virgin occurred six times from May 13 to Oct. 13, 1917.

Three shepherd children, Lucia dos Santos (b. 1907) and her cousins Francisco (1908–19) and Jacinta (1910–20), said they saw the figure of a Lady brighter than the sun, standing on a cloud in an evergreen tree. In a conversation that Francisco alone did not hear, though he said he saw the figure, the Lady asked the children to return to the place on the 13th of each month until October, when she would disclose her identity and reveal what she desired. In spite of local incredulity, the children returned as promised, joined by a crowd of spectators that increased from 50 in June, to 1,000 in July, to 18,000 in August, to 30,000 in September, and to 50,000 in October. Only the children saw the Lady, but others reported that they noted movements of the tree and the arrival and departure of the cloud.

Radicals and anticlericals, who were then strong in Portugal, assailed the events. On August 13 the civil prefect of Outrem kidnapped the children and held them for two days, submitting them to interrogation and threats; but the Lady appeared to them on the 19th of the month at nearby Valinhos, promising that in October a great miracle would occur. On that date, in wet and dismal weather, she announced to them that she was Our Lady of the Rosary, and called for amendment in men's lives. Then the sun appeared and seemed to tremble, rotate violently, and finally fall, dancing over the heads of the throng before it returned to normal. Many of the crowd reported having seen this "Miracle of the Sun" that was repeated twice more. A journalist who had mocked the events of Fátima in the Lisbon daily O Seculo that morning reflected a changed attitude in his report of October 15.

The patriarch of Lisbon had the events watched by Canon Manoel Formigão, who interviewed the children frequently. In 1922 a canonical process of enquiry was opened and lasted seven years. The bishop of Leiria (Oct. 13, 1930) pronounced the 1917 visions at Cova da Iria worthy of credence and authorized the cult of Our Lady of Fátima. Thereafter, Lucia, as a Dorothean lay sister at Túy (Spain), on episcopal command wrote her remembrances in documents dated 1936, 1937, 1941, and 1942, giving further details about the apparitions and the first public information about apparitions of an angel in 1915.

Francisco and Jacinta died of influenza, and in 1948 Lucia entered the Carmelites at Coimbra. The Basilica of Our Lady of Fátima with its lofty tower (1928–53) dominates Cova da Iria. Nearby on the site of the tree is the chapel of the Apparitions, with a statue carved according to Lucia's description. On May 12, 1946, the statue was crowned by the legate of Pope Pius XII, who had been consecrated bishop on May 13, 1917, and who in 1951 chose Fátima for the solemn closing of the Holy Year, attended by more than one million people.

The Third Secret. According to the memoirs written by Sister Lucia in August and December 1941, the first part of the "secret" revealed to the three pastorinhos of Fatima told of a vision of hell that was interpreted to refer to the two World Wars. The second part of the "secret' predicted that Russia would one day return to Christianity, but details of the third part of the secret, recorded by Sister Lucia in January 1944, were not made public until May 12, 2000. The memoir describing the socalled "third secret" had been taken to Rome in April 1957 where it was kept in a sealed envelope in the Secret Archives of the Holy Office. Pope John XXIII read the memoir in 1959, Pope Paul VI read it in 1965, and Pope John Paul II read it in July 1981, following the attempt on his life in May of that year. Finally, in May 2000, at Pope John Paul's instructions, a photostat of Sister Lucia's 1944 memoir was made public. It described martyrdom and suffering, including a man "clothed in white" who "falls to the ground apparently dead, under a burst of gunfire." At the time Cardinal Angelo Sodano, the Vatican Secretary of State issued a statement to pilgrims who had gathered for the beatification of the two deceased shepherd children that said, after the 1981 assassination attempt by a Turkish gunman in St Peter's Square, "it appeared evident to his Holiness that it was a motherly hand which guided the bullets past, enabling the Pope to halt at the threshold of death."

The failed attempt on Pope John Paul's life occurred in 1981 on May 13, the anniversary of the first apparition. After recovering from the gunshot wounds, John Paul had one of the bullets put into the crown of Our Lady's statue. The beatification of Jacinta and Francisco Marto, May 13, 2000 was the occasion for Pope John Paul's third visit to the Fatima shrine.

Bibliography: C. C. MARTINDALE, The Message of Fatima (London 1950). J. DE MARCHI, Era uma Senhora mais brilhante que o sol (3rd ed. Cova da Iria 1947), Eng. Fatima, the Facts, tr. I. M. KINGSBURY (Cork 1950). J. A. PELLETIER, The Sun Danced at Fatima (Worcester, Mass. 1951). VISCONDE DE MONTELO (M. N. Formigão), Os episodios maravilhosos de Fatima (Lisbon 1921); As grandes maravilhas de Fatima (Lisbon 1927). C. RENGERS, The Youngest Prophet : The Life of Jacinta Marto, Fatima Visionary (New York 1986). T. TINDAL-ROBERTSON, Fatima, Russia and Pope John Paul II (Chulmleigh, England 1992). J. M. ALONSO, ''Histoire ancienne et histoire nouvelle de Fatima,'' in Vraies et fausses apparitions dans l'église, ed. B. BILLET (Paris 1973) 55–95.

[H. M. GILLETT/EDS.]

FAUBEL CANO, JUAN BAUTISTA, BL.

Lay martyr, pyrotechnician; b. Jan. 3, 1889, Llíria, Valencia, Spain; d. Aug. 28, 1936, Paterna, Valencia.

Juan Bautista (John Baptist) attended public school, but learned his profession from his parents and completed his formation through private study. He married Patrocinio Beatriz Olba Martínez with whom he had three children: Patrocinio, Josefina, and Juan Bautista. Not only was he considered one of the best pyrotechnicians of the region, but he was known also for his piety, goodness, kindness, and faithfulness in carrying out the work entrusted to him.

From his youth he was an active member of various Catholic groups, including the Third Order of St. Francis, Catholic Action, the Nocturnal Adoration Society, and many others. While he was president of La Derecha Regional Valenciana (the Right of the Region of Valencia) he created a section to help the poor.

At the beginning of the Spanish Civil War in 1936, churches, convents, religious objects, and parish records were destroyed. In Liria, the churches left were converted to secular use because the public celebration of the Mass was prohibited. Six priests and 31 lay people of Liria, including Faubel, were assassinated. Although friends advised him to go into hiding at the beginning of the persecution, Faubel declined and continued his daily activities serenely. He was known to say, "If Our Lord needs my blood, I have no reason to deny Him."

Aware of the risk he was taking, Juan Bautista, in close collaboration with Fr. Miguel Aliaga Turó, founded la Derecha Regional Valenciana at the beginning of the Republican persecution. La Derecha's purpose was to form youth into authentic Christians by establishing Catholic primary schools. When the sisters of San Miguel Convent were evicted, Faubel provided them refuge in his home. The day they left, Aug. 6, 1936, the militia appeared at his door with pistols to arrest him.

He calmed his wife, took a crucifix in hand, and went with them to an area of Liria called Els Olivarets. There his captors tormented him by discharging their guns into the air and sticking him with needles. For several days he was held in the municipal jail, then transferred to the prison of San Miguel de los Reyes, where he was maltreated but strengthened by covertly receiving the Eucharist on several occasions. He was calm on the evening before his death and arranged for an employee to withdraw his money from his bank account before the authorities took over the account, to provide for his family.

Before dawn on August 28, he was taken with twelve others to a gorge along the highway between Valencia and Ademuz near Paterna, where he was shot with his crucifix in his hand. One of those to be executed, Luis Soler Pérez, managed to escape into the darkness and relate the story of Faubel's martyrdom. Faubel's body was found in the cemetery of Paterna and interred at Liria. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II with José APARICIO SANZ and 232 companions on March 11, 2001.

Feast: Sept. 22.

See Also: SPANISH CIVIL WAR, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Klosterheidenfeld, Lower Franconia, Bavaria, March 5, 1869; d. Munich, June 12, 1952. After studying at Schweinfurt and Wurzburg, Faulhaber was ordained in 1892. He was chaplain at Kitzingen for a year before taking his doctorate in theology at the University of Wurzburg, where he remained as a lecturer (1899-1903). He was professor of Old Testament at the University of Strasbourg until 1911, when he was named bishop of Speyer. During World War I he ministered to the Bavarian armies in the field. In 1917 he was transferred to the archdiocese of Munich, and in 1921, made cardinal.

FAULHABER, MICHAEL VON

Faulhaber, a monarchist devoted to the Wittelsbach kings of Bavaria, led his people throughout the Nazi era.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCEL ORTÍ, Martires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). W. H. CARROLL, The Last Crusade (Front Royal, Va. 1996). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993). R. ROYAL, The Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York 2000). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. no. 11 (March 14, 2001) 1-4, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FAULHABER, ANDREAS

Martyred for the seal of confession; b. Glatz, Silesia, May 21, 1713; d. Glatz, Dec. 30, 1757. Faulhaber became a priest in 1750. In the fortress town of Glatz, Prussian steps to stamp out Catholic loyalties to the Hapsburgs had led to mutual distrust. A Prussian deserter in the Seven Years' War declared under questioning that Faulhaber had heard his confession and by implication had condoned desertion. This testimony was retracted repeatedly, but it led to the arrest and imprisonment of Faulhaber. While the trial was still pending, Frederick II instructed the commander to execute Faulhaber and not to allow him a confessor. Faulhaber refused to save himself by revealing the deserter's confession. His body, miraculously preserved, was left hanging for 31 months until Austrian troops took it down from the gallows on July 26, 1760, and entombed it in the church in Glatz. In 1930, steps were taken to promote his beatification, but since the ordered expulsion of German clergy from Glatz (now Kłodzko in Southwest Poland), after World War II, efforts seem to be blocked.

Bibliography: L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages (London-St. Louis 1938-61) 36:89. E. HENSELER, P. Faulhaber der Glatzer Kaplan (Heidelberg 1956). K. ENGELBERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957-65) 4:41.

Cardinal, archbishop of Munich, Germany; b.

[H. W. L. FREUDENTHAL]

His sermons frequently condemned the racism, totalitarianism, and paganism that he described as the basis of the new order. In 1951 the Jewish community formally expressed its appreciation for his attack on anti-Semitism and emphasis on the Jewish background of Christianity during his Advent sermons of 1933. After World War II Faulhaber worked closely with the American occupation forces in the reconstruction of his archdiocese. The highest award of the West German Republic, the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit, was conferred on him by Pres. Theodor Heuss. Faulhaber also published several books.

Bibliography: J. WEISSTHANNER, Michael Kardinal Faulhaber, 80 Jahre (2d ed. Munich 1949). M. A. GALLIN, German Resistance to Hitler (Washington 1961). M. SCHMAUS, Staatslexikon, ed. GÖRRES-GESELLSCHAFT (Freiburg 1957–63) 3:231–233.

[M. A. GALLIN]

FAULT

In popular religious usage, fault is often taken to be synonymous with the various meanings of IMPERFEC-TION, that is, an act less perfect than it might be, either because it is less good than its alternative, but not against God's law, or against God's law but in a slight matter or is done with little or no deliberation.

In stricter theological usage, fault denotes the objective state of being responsible for a sinful act. The term is then synonymous with culpability or blameworthiness. Theological fault implies at least some realization of wrongdoing and some free choice of the will. In its essence it is a deformity of the agent's will as compared with that of God. It is Catholic teaching that theological fault is removed by perfect contrition or by imperfect contrition with the Sacraments of baptism, penance, or the anointing of the sick. The remission of theological fault does not necessarily imply the remission of all reparation or punishment due to the fault. These and other effects of sin may be removed by good works, especially by reception of the Sacraments and by indulgences. Some Protestant reformers held that fault was never truly removed but only covered over, as it were, by application of the merits of Christ.

As distinct from theological fault, juridical fault is said to be present whenever one performs an act against the law, either knowingly and willingly, or at least in circumstances in which one objectively should have been aware of what he was doing. For a court award for damages to be just, there must be at least some juridical fault. To incur an obligation in justice to pay for damages apart from a court order, there must be theological fault. There can, in certain circumstances, be an obligation in charity to pay for damages of which one is the physical cause even without any fault. Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa contra Gentiles 3.10.

[J. J. FARRAHER]

FAURÉ, GABRIEL URBAIN

Precursor of 20th-century music; b. Pamiers (Ariège), France, May 12, 1845; d. Paris, Nov. 4, 1924. Fauré, sixth child of a nonmusical family, was educated at École Niedermeyer, Paris, an institute dedicated to the betterment of church music. He was both maître de chapelle and organist at the Madeleine, as well as professor of composition at the Paris Conservatory, and from 1905, its director. Among his students were Nadia Boulanger, Ravel, and Florent Schmitt. His dramatic compositions are unremarkable, and his work for organ and orchestra is negligible; but his songs, piano works, and chamber music innovated a daring individuality of style whose elements, such as the modality, inventive extensions of harmonic relations, independence in use of dissonance, and preoccupation with rhythm and texture, grew more austere and inventive with his creative maturity. The Requiem (1887-88), the climax of some uninspired sacred writings comprising a Messe Basse and a few short works, embodied his religious faith and hope for eternal rest. Thus he omitted the Sequence (Dies Irae) except for the last line, "Pie Jesu Domine, dona eis requiem," which replaced the Benedictus. The work, supported by organ, incorporates his somewhat romanticist early style. It reflects little of the Gregorian tradition, though there is some modal coloring and occasional polyphony. This Mass is a gentle prayer that foretells in its simplicity Fauré's later style and the emotional restraint of the next generation.

Bibliography: Lettres intimes, ed. P. FAURÉ-FRÉMIET (Paris 1951). P. FAURÉ-FRÉMIET, Gabriel Fauré (new ed. Paris 1957); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 3:1867-80. C. L. E. KOECHLIN, Gabriel Fauré, 1845-1924, tr. L. ORRY (London 1945). N. SUCKLING, Fauré (London 1951). M. COOPER, French Music (London 1951). C. CABALLERO, "Fauré and French Musical Aesthetics'' (Ph.D. diss. University of Pennsylvania 1996). R. H. CROUCH, "The Nocturnes and Barcarolles for Solo Piano of Gabriel Fauré'' (Ph.D. diss. Catholic University 1980). K. JOHANSEN, "Gabriel Fauré, un art de l'équivoque," Revue de Musicologie, 85 (1999) 63-96. A. LABUSSIÈRE, "Gabriel Fauré: 2nd Sonate pour violoncelle et piano op. 117," Analyse Musicale, 25 (1991) 19-35. M. MACDONALD, "Pénélope," in International Dictionary of Opera, ed. C. S. LARUE, 2 v. (Detroit 1993) 1002-1003. J.-M. NECTOUX, "Gabriel (Urbain) Fauré," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. S. SADIE, v. 6 (New York 1980) 417-428. E. R. PHILLIPS, "Smoke, Mirrors, and Prisms: Tonal Contradiction in Fauré," Music Analysis, 12 (1993) 3-24. A. PIOVANO, "Aspetti della produzione vocale di Gabriel Fauré: il Requiem e le Mélodies," Rassegna Musicale Curci, 50 (1997) 44-50. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 261–262.

[V. RAAD]

FAURE, GIOVANNI BATTISTA

Theologian; b. Rome, Oct. 25, 1702; d. Viterbo, April 5, 1779. Faure entered the Society of Jesus in 1728 and spent most of his life teaching philosophy and theology. It is the opinion of some historians that had he not had a penchant for acrimonious polemic, he would have been regarded as the foremost theologian of his era. A work, Avviso salutevole (Naples 1744), in defense of B. Benzi against D. CONCINA, attributed to Faure but never acknowledged as his, was put on the Index in 1744. An acknowledged work, also published anonymously, was his notorious Commentarium in Bullam Pauli III "Licet ab initio" (n.p. 1750), which was also put on the Index in 1757.

Under the pretext of tracing the history of the Inquisition set up by Paul III in 1512, this work bitterly attacks the methods of a number of the inquisitors, most of whom were Dominicans, for their favoritism and arbitrariness in condemning books. It complains also about the censure in 1725 of the faculty of theology at Douai, which was known, the author contends, "for its devotion to the Holy See."

Faure's commentary on the Enchiridion de fide, spe et caritate of St. Augustine, entitled Dissertatio dogmatica de praxi quesnelliana, was stopped in press by order of the Inquisition. Edited and completed by an associate of Faure, this work appeared after his death under the title In Arnaldi librum de frequenti communione (Rome 1791). Faure's Apparatus brevis ad theologiam et jus canonicum (Rome 1751) underwent many editions. A major work against Jansenism, Dubitationes theologicae de judicio practico quod super paenitentis . . . dispositione formare sibi potest et debet confessarius (Lugano 1840), was criticized by some as going too far in permitting the absolution of recidivists (see RECIDIVISM). An excellent defense of devotion to the Sacred Heart was offered in Faure's Bigletti confidenziali critici (Venice 1772) and Saggi teologici (Lugano 1773). His other works include treatises on dogmatic theology, Scripture, Canon Law and Church history.

Faure was imprisoned in the Castel Sant'Angelo near the papal palace in the Vatican after the suppression of the Society of Jesus by Clement XIV in 1773. It was feared his inflammatory writings might foment a rebellion against the papal action. He was liberated by Pius VI in 1775 and spent the rest of his days at Viterbo in peace and quiet.

Gabriel Urbain Fauré.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (Innsbruck 1926) 5.1:76–80. J. BRUCKER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:2100–01. P. BAILLY, Catholicisme 4:1117.

[C. R. MEYER]

FAUST, MATHÍAS

Franciscan administrator; b. Oberbimbach, Germany, Dec. 30, 1879; d. New York City, July 27, 1956. Faust's parents, Joseph and Clara (Voelinger) Faust, had him baptized Constantine. He studied at Fulda and Hereveld, Holland, before immigrating to the U.S. in 1896, where he entered the novitiate of the Friars Minor at Paterson, N.J., and was ordained in 1906. Thereafter he served his order, first as novice master, then 12 years as provincial minister, and eight years as assistant provincial. During this time he sent missionaries to China and to the southern part of the U.S., encouraged higher education in the schools of his province, and secured many rare books and manuscripts for his friaries. He was frequently appointed visitator general for other provinces in the U.S., Europe, and Mexico, to which he assigned his own priests to help minister to the people there. He showed a vital interest in the secular Third Order of St. Francis and strongly supported the foundation of St. Anthony Guild in Paterson, N.J., for the publication of religious works. In 1945 he founded the Academy of American Franciscan History, Washington, D.C., and formed a Commissariate for the Byzantine-Slavonic rite in Connecticut. During World War II, he was delegate general for all Franciscan houses in North and Central America and for four years thereafter was procurator general in Rome. He spent the last four years of his career in New York directing the commissariates of his order in North America.

Bibliography: Acta Ordinis Fratrum Minorum 75 (1956) 247–248. A. J. CALLAHAN, Medieval Francis in Modern America (New York 1936).

[E. KLAUS]

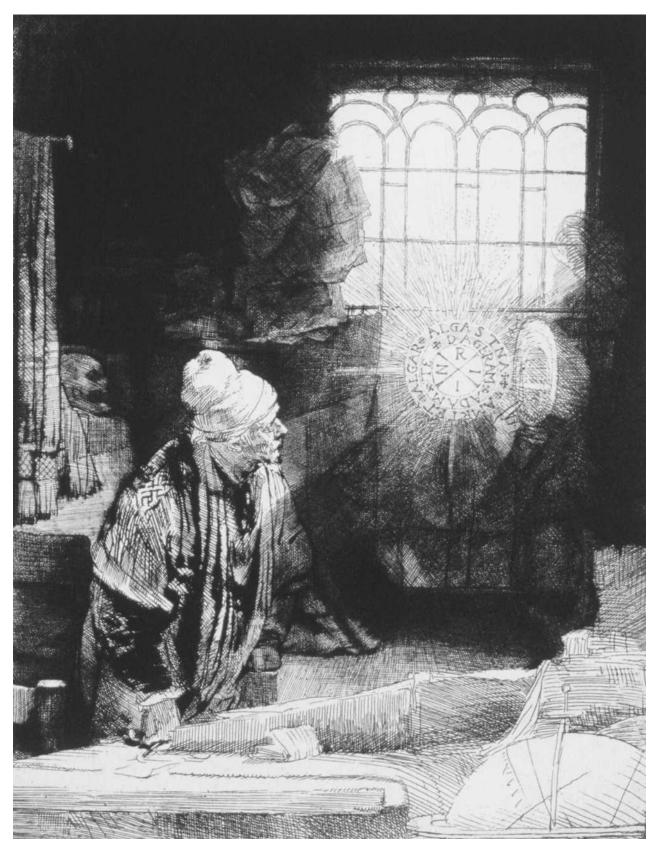

FAUST LEGEND

The legendary tales that accumulated round the historical figure of George, later Johann, Faust (c. 1480–1540) embody one of man's oldest dreams, that of acquiring boundless knowledge and happiness through a spiritual alliance with superhuman forces. This motif appeared in early Christian tradition, e.g., in the story of Simon Magus (Acts ch. 8) and in accounts by Cyprian of Antioch, Theophilius of Adana, Pope Sylvester II, and others that exemplified this kind of temptation. Sorcerers such as Merlin and Klingsor played their sinister roles in medieval courtly literature. The development of the Faust legend, uniquely reflecting the intellectual climate of 16th-century Germany, adds a new dimension to the ageold plot: the total destruction of man's soul brought about by demonic forces.

Religious Climate. The time of the Renaissance and Reformation filled man's mind with the realization of profound changes and revolutions. The theological schism was only one symptom of a general cultural and historical metamorphosis introduced by new scientific discoveries, the humanistic revival of antiquity, and the new spiritual and mystical impulses in religious life. Established systems of values were threatened by new, more dynamic concepts of life that laid the ground for imagining unlimited possibilities of knowledge and power; they also brought about a feeling of unrest and instability. Numerous paintings of this age (e.g., those of Dürer, Grien, and Brueghel) reflect traumatic visions of apocalyptic events and grotesque invasions of demonic forces. The widening horizons in scientific and philosophical knowledge in the thought and discoveries of men such as Nicolaus COPERNICUS, Giordano Bruno, and Johann Kepler grew in their contemporaries' imaginations to titanic notions of human insight into cosmic forces. A significant stimulant for the development of such exalted ideas radiated from the well known but controversial Swiss physician P. A. Paracelsus, whose pansophic system of philosophy attempted to bridge the apparent gap between the natural sciences (which, for him included alchemy and astrology) and Christian theology. He visualized a secret identity of the spiritual and phenomenological world, recognizing two basic forms of human perception: the "light of grace" in Christian doctrine and God's second revelation in the "light of nature" based on the totality of earthly existence (Philosophia sagax, 1537). Such "advanced" ideas, reflecting the dynamic, antihierarchical drives of this time, were opposed and passionately condemned as black magic by reactionary and orthodox theologians of both confessions.

Development of the Legend. The remarkable career of Johann Faust, born presumably at Helmstedt, near Heidelberg, coincided with the most crucial years of the reformatory age. He exploited the clandestine fears and superstitions of the people by applying his pretended magical skills to all fields of human knowledge. Since many courts and influential personages employed astrologers, Faust played this role for the lower strata of society by practicing his dubious art in inns and at fairs. He is first mentioned by the Benedictine scholar-abbot Johannes TRITHEMIUS in a letter to the mathematician and Heidelberg court astrologer J. Virdung in 1507. The abbot told his friend that he had met Faust a year before at Gelnhausen and now found this "vagabond, babbler, and rogue, who deserves to be thrashed," at Würzburg, confusing the people by many boastful promises and false divinations. Faust called himself "the chief of necromancers, astrologer, the second magus, palm-reader, diviner with earth and fire, second in the art of divination with water." He appeared shortly afterward in Kreuznach, where he obtained the position of schoolmaster through the influence of Franz von Sickingen, "a man very fond of mystical lore." Discovered to be a sodomite, Faust fled to avoid persecution. Trithemius's characterization of Faust is repeated in a series of subsequent accounts wherein he is reported to cast horoscopes, to make false soothsayings, and fraudulently to practice medicine. But his reputation must have improved toward the end of his life. He was well known, if despised, by leaders of the Reformation, including Luther and Melanchthon. Precisely because he was a resourceful and ambiguous impersonator of many masks, he immensely stimulated the imagination of the people.

Shortly after his death, Faust's image was inflated among the people by being connected with exuberant accounts of all sorts of obscure practices and mysterious dealings with infernal powers that people in that troubled age were able to fancy. The important point for the subsequent development of the legend lies in the fact that these mysterious tales were carefully preserved, amended, and used by Protestant theologians. As early as 1548 a Basel minister, Johann Gast, included in his popular Sermones Convivales two episodes from Faust's life that expressly illustrate the power of the devil over man. What had not occurred to any of his learned critics during Faust's lifetime now became an unquestionable certainty: Faust had made a compact with the devil and had frivolously bartered away his immortal soul for spiritual power and sensual pleasure. In the fervent explications of preachers Faust obtained the singular honor of being elevated to the ranks of great wizards and magicians of ancient and medieval tradition. He became the embodiment of spiritual pride and of that particular temptation so characteristic of the age: the attributing of greater value to man's own will and intellectual achievement than to the "pure Word of God." It is not accidental that several beginnings of the legend lead to Wittenberg, the spiritual center of the Reformation. Even Luther is said to have felt a threat from Satan and his servant Faust, but "God's word alone overcomes the fiery arrows of the devil and all his temptation." In view of the widespread and fatalistic belief in astrology, the superstitious credulity among the uneducated people, and the increasing uncertainty among learned and responsible persons, it is not surprising that some theologians took seriously the common belief in black magic and used fear and gloomy forebodings to combat spiritual pride, licentiousness, and arrogance. The newly established Protestant church needed the example of the frightful damnation of a human soul to combat what it considered an assembly-line salvation offered by a stagnant institutionalism.

"Faust in His Study," engraving by Rembrandt, 1652. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

Literary Sources and Treatment. Both the moral implications of the Faust legend and its strange mystical obscurantism account for the immense popularity of the first printed edition of the Historia von D. Johann Fausten, by J. Spies (Frankfurt 1587). This collection of episodes was well developed and had circulated widely before its printing; part of it presumably had been recorded and distributed in Latin. Faust's scholarly pursuits are mentioned in the beginning: his "contemplation of the natural elements" and his vain attempt to explore restlessly all the foundations of heaven and earth. The majority of the episodes, however, depicted either low sensual enjoyments or incredible magic feats, recounted in popular balladesque style to serve "all haughty, overcurious and ungodly men as a frightful example, abhorrent illustration, and frank warning." Several new editions followed during the same year, chiefly because the book contained a representative collection of all mystery fables available at that time. A new compilation of Faust stories, greatly expanded by pedantic moral annotations, was edited by G. R. Widemann in 1599. The latest edition appeared in 1674 in Nuremberg, revised by J. H. Pfitzer, and was again published, anonymously, in 1712 by a Christian Believer (Christlich Meynenden).

Marlowe's Handling. One of the first English translations of the Faust book was the source of The Tragical History of the Life and Death of Doctor Faustus (c. 1588) by playwright Christopher Marlowe. His hero is not the boastful rogue and licentious fool of the chapbooks but appears in the more appealing guise of a daring titan rebelling against narrow moral dogmatism. Torn by a furious tension between man and devil, temptation and repentance, revolt and despair, he is overcome by the powers of evil, partly against his will. Marlowe counted on deeper understanding and pity for his hero's grandiose error and thus gave him a more human dimension. Marlowe's dramatization of the Faust legend was brought to the Continent by strolling English players in the early 17th century. But just as the poetically stimulating legend had gradually deteriorated into moralistic chapbooks hawked at fairs, so the tragedy soon changed to a freely improvised comedy and into various puppet plays for the amusement of half-wits and children. The literary critic Johann Gottsched (1700-66) vigorously condemned the harlequinades and fairy tales of Dr. Faustus, which the masses had so long enjoyed. Later the German dramatist G. E. LESSING recognized the truly "national" nature of the Faust plot and tried his own dramatization, of which only a few scenes are preserved. Lessing's treatment favored a rather unorthodox, final salvation of Faust.

Goethe's Version. Only J. von GOETHE, however, succeeded in opening a new dimension in Faust's inner quest for deeper and more meaningful understanding of life. His Faust is tragically driven by an ever unsatisfied yearning for "more than earthly meat and drink." The power of love as well as his continuous search for knowledge gradually develops the potentials of his soul so that Mephistopheles, the chaotic Spirit of Denial, always fails to procure that moment of supreme satisfaction for which Faust would trade his salvation. The devil is "poor" in the face of such a great aspiration for inner fulfillment, and though "man errs as long as he strives," Faust's soul finally ascends into heaven with the help of the "almighty love which forms all things and bears all things." Faust gains in each phase of his existence a new approach toward perfection despite the impossibility of ever achieving such a state in this world.

More recent attempts to revive the Faust legend in poetic form, notably Thomas Mann's novel Doktor Faustus (1950), may come closer to the original collection of 16th-century tales in their elevation of a vagrant charlatan to the ranks of powerful rebels of the intellect; Goethe's Faust, however, remains the highest expression of the legend, which contained, from the very beginning, the metaphysical question of man's ultimate destiny.

Bibliography: K. ENGEL, Zusammenstellung der Faust-Schriften vom 16. Jahrhundert bis Mitte 1884 (Oldenburg 1865), 2d ed. of Bibliotheca Faustiana (1874). C. KIESEWETTER, Faust in der Geschichte und Tradition (Leipzig 1893). H. W. GEISSLER, ed., Gestaltungen des Faust, 3 v. (Munich 1927). P. M. PALMER and R. P. MORE, eds. and trs., The Sources of the Faust Tradition from Simon Magus to Lessing (New York 1936). E. M. BUTLER, The Fortunes of Faust (Cambridge, Eng. 1952).

[K. SCHAUM]

FAUSTUS OF RIEZ

Fifth-century monk, bishop, and theological writer; b. Britain, c. 410; d. between 490 and 500. Faustus was a monk at Lérins and became abbot c. 433; he took part in the Synod of Arles (455) and was selected as bishop of Riez in Provence c. 458. A renowned preacher and opponent of ARIANISM among the Goths, and of Macedonianism, Faustus is considered, with John CASSIAN, a chief proponent of SEMI-PELAGIANISM. He was wrongly accused of favoring a strict predestinationism dependent upon AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO, and, in Synods at Arles (473) and Lyons (474), he successfully opposed the Gallic priest Lucidus, who was condemned for teaching that God withheld grace from those destined for damnation.

Faustus wrote two books De Spiritu Sancto against the Macedonians; and two books De gratia Dei against Lucidus. Ten of his letters have been preserved, five of them in the correspondence of Bp. Ruricius of Limoges (d. c. 508). He is the author of numerous sermons; A. Engelbrecht credits him with 31 (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 21), while G. Morin maintains that 75 other sermons attributed to Eusebius of Emesa should be recognized as belonging to Faustus (Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche 1935:92–115).

Faustus interpreted the grace by which the Father draws souls to salvation (Jn 6.44) more as an attraction given through revelation, sermons, and the Scriptures (De grat. 1.16); but he combatted Augustine's doctrine of predestination by insisting on God's salvific will for all (ibid. 2.4, 10). He saw predestination as based on God's foreknowledge alone (ibid. 2.2–3). In the matter of original sin, failing to achieve a notion of total spirituality of the soul, he followed JUSTIN MARTYR, TERTULLIAN, and John CASSIAN and accepted TRADUCIANISM (Epist. 3). He was opposed by CLAUDIANUS MAMERTUS (d. 474), whose De statu animae reflected Neoplatonist and Augustinian thought on the nature of spiritual reality.

In 477 Faustus was expelled from Gaul by the Arian Visigoth King Euric and lived in exile until 485. He is venerated as a saint in southern France, but his questionable doctrine on grace prevented his cult spreading to the universal Church.

Bibliography: Patrologia Latina 58:775–890. A. ENGEL-BRECHT, ed., Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 21 (1891). J. HUHN, Theologische Quartalschrift 130 (1950) 176–183; 133 (1953) 408–426, de fide. B. ALTANER, Patrology 566–567. P. GODET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:2101–05. G. WEI-GEL, Faustus of Riez (Philadelphia 1938). A. G. ELG, In Faustum Riensen studia (Upsala 1937); In epistolam Fausti Riensis tertiam adnotationes (Lund 1945). H. HAGENDAHL, La Correspondance de Ruricius (Göteborg 1952). F. BÖMER, Der lateinische Neuplatonismus und Neupythagorismus (Leipzig 1936).

[A. NEUWIRTH]

FAVIER, ALPHONSE

Missionary bishop in China; b. Marsonnay-la-Cote, near Dijon, France, Sept. 22, 1837; d. Beijing, China, April 3, 1905. After joining the VINCENTIANS (1858) Favier went to the Province of Chihli (now Hebei) in northern China (1862), where he remained until 1870 when he was sent to Beijing. In 1897 he became auxiliary bishop of Beijing, and in 1899 vicar apostolic of North Chihli. Favier, who was a good diplomat and linguist, was active in defense of the French protectorate of Chinese Catholic missions. He was largely responsible for the imperial decree (1899) that gave bishops equal rank with mandarins. During the Boxer Rebellion (1900) he inspired 3,500 Christians to withstand a two-month siege in Beijing's Northern Church (Beitang). Afterward he played an important role as mediator between China and the Western powers. Favier's most important writing was Pékin, Histoire et Déscription (Lille 1900).

Bibliography: G. GOYAU, La France missionnaire dans les cinq parties du monde, v.2 (Paris 1948) 120–124.

[J. KRAHL]

FAY, CYRIL SIGOURNEY WEBSTER

Diplomat; b. Philadelphia, Pa., June 16, 1875; d. New York City, Jan. 10, 1919. Fay was the son of Alfred Forbes and Susan (Hutchinson) Fay. After attending the University of Pennsylvania and the Episcopal Divinity School in Philadelphia, he was ordained in 1903. He became professor of dogmatic and moral theology at Nashotah House, an Episcopal seminary in the Diocese of Fond du Lac, Wis. There Fay joined a group of Anglican clergymen, the "Companions of the Holy Savior," who were led by the Rev. William McGarvey of Philadelphia. In 1907, when the Episcopal convention at Richmond, Va., approved the "open pulpit" clause allowing clergy of other denominations to preach in Episcopal churches, McGarvey, Fay, and others in the "American Oxford Movement" joined the Catholic Church.

Fay was ordained for the Baltimore Archdiocese by Cardinal James Gibbons, June 21, 1910. He was much in demand as a retreatmaster and preacher; he served as headmaster of the Newman School for Boys, Hackensack, N.J., and in 1917 joined the Red Cross. His work took him to Italy, where he became involved in negotiations to expunge a clause from a secret treaty that excluded the Holy See from participation in the World War I peace conference. Since Fay was a friend of Arthur James Balfour, the British Foreign Minister, and of Sir Eric Drummond and Cecil Dormer, members of the British Commission in Washington, it was decided to undertake further diplomacy in England, rather than approach Pres. Woodrow Wilson. Created a domestic prelate by Benedict XV, Fay returned to the U.S. to prepare for his mission. On the eve of his sailing for London, however, he was stricken with influenza and died.

Bibliography: M. CHANLER, Autumn in the Valley (Boston 1936).

[W. K. DUNN]

FAYRFAX, ROBERT

Noted Renaissance composer of liturgical music; b. Deeping Gate, Lincolnshire, England, c. 1464; d. probably St. Albans, Oct. 24, 1521. By 1496, if not earlier, he was a gentleman of the chapel royal, and from 1502 was possibly choirmaster at St. Albans, although he retained connections with the chapel royal until his death. He took the degrees Mus.B. (1501) and Mus.D. (1504) at Cambridge and the earliest recorded Mus.D. (1511) at Oxford. He was first singer of the chapel at the Field of Cloth of Gold, June 1520. His works comprise six Masses (of which one is incomplete), two Magnificats, 13 motets, and a few secular songs, lute arrangements, and instrumental pieces. He was highly esteemed by his contemporaries and his music was recopied for a century after his death. His style represents a trend away from the florid manner to a simpler homophonic technique, and is distinguished for great variety in grouping of voices. An edition of his Collected Works has been prepared by E. B. Warren for the American Institute of Musicology [(Corpus mensurablis musicae, v.17 (Rome 1947-)].

Bibliography: F. L. HARRISON, Music in Medieval Britain (New York 1958). "English Polyphony c. 1470–1540," New Oxford History of Music, ed. J. A. WESTRUP 11 v. (New York 1957–) 3:303–348. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959) 774–777. A. HUGHES, "An Introduction to Fayrfax," Musica Disciplina, 6 (Rome 1952) 83–104. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 3:50–54. D. MATEER and E. NEW, "In nomine Jesu: Robert Fayrfax and the Guild of the Holy Name in St. Paul's Cathedral," Music and Letters 81 (2000) 507–519. T. MESSENGER, "Texture and Proportion in the Masses of Robert Fayrfax: Medieval Formal Procedures in the Early Tudor Mass Cycle" (Ph.D. diss. University of Wales at Bangor, 1979). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music 262 (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1996). N. SAN-DON, "Robert Fayrfax" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 6, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 443–445. N. SLO-NIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 523.

[S. W. KENNEY]

FEAR

An emotion arising from awareness of something seen as an imminent danger affecting oneself. It has interested philosophers at least from the time of PLATO (Leges 644D; 646E) and Aristotle (Rhetorica 1382a19–1383b11), and has been the subject of intense study by modern psychologists. Definiteness of an object in fear and the occurrence of this emotion in adequately functioning persons have usually been bases for distinguishing fear from anxiety. Since fears of definite things, however, also appear as signs of mental disturbance (e.g., a phobia for closed places or moving vehicles), presence of an "attitude of fear" or a tendency to see danger everywhere better serves to distinguish anxiety from fear.

Moral Aspects. Since responsibility in a moral sense implies the voluntariness of a human act, the question arises as to the influence of fear on the voluntary character of an action. Voluntariness implies some movement on the part of the will, which, in turn, presupposes knowledge, for only a known good moves an appetitive power. A person is morally responsible, then, when he knows what he is doing and retains freedom of action, at least in the sense of having it in his power to do or not to do a given act. Voluntariness implies some movement on the part of the will, which, in turn, presupposes knowledge, for only a known good moves an appetitive power. A person is morally responsible, then, when he knows what he is doing and retains freedom of action, at least in the sense of having it in his power to do or not to do a given act.

In an action done because of fear, there is at least some consent on the part of the will, for we are led to do what we do, not because of the fear itself, but in order to avoid the evil that is feared. Therefore, in an action done out of fear, the voluntary character of the action remains, for it is enough to make an act voluntary that the will contribute something to the action that is done, and this condition is realized in an action done because of fear. It is also clear that fear exerts an influence on the degree of voluntariness of the action, and to the extent that it does, fear diminishes the voluntariness and therefore the responsibility of the action.

To put the matter generally, actions done because of fear remain voluntary and responsible although they become involuntary in a certain respect, and thus lessen responsibility to that extent. What is done out of fear is involuntary in the sense that it is contrary to what would be the will's inclination apart from the circumstances that evoke the fear. A man at gunpoint hands over his wallet to a robber; he would not presumably be willing to dispossess himself in this way except to avoid the evil that threatens him. But the action is, in an absolute sense of the term, voluntary, for the will, in the actual circumstances, prefers to sustain the loss rather than to endure the consequences of resistance. There is thus a mixture of voluntariness and involuntariness in what is done. The action is said to be voluntary simply or absolutely speaking, but involuntary in a certain respect (secundum quid). The element of involuntariness shows some goodness in the will, even if the action is an evil one, and to that extent diminishes culpability.

This analysis of fear does not include, however, a situation in which a person is so overcome by an impending evil that fear causes him to lose rational control completely. An action performed by a person in such a condition would not be voluntary at all. Voluntary action is always in some way subject to reason. No degree of fear that falls short of depriving a person of the use of reason renders him incapable of controlling his action. Both civil and ecclesiastical laws expressly recognize the influence of fear where contractual obligations are concerned, and in certain cases declare obligations undertaken under the influence of fear to be either void or voidable.

See Also: APPETITE.

Bibliography: M. B. ARNOLD, Emotion and Personality, 2 v. (New York 1960), an extensive and profound analysis of fear and the other emotions. D. B. LINDSLEY, "Emotion" in S. S. STEVENS, ed., Handbook of Experimental Psychology (New York 1951). M. L. REYMERT, ed., Feelings and Emotions: The Mooseheart Symposium in Cooperation with the University of Chicago (New York 1950). R. W. LEEPER, "A Motivational Theory of Emotion to Replace 'Emotion as Disorganized Response," Psychological Review 55 (1948) 5–21. A. T. JERSILD, "Emotional Development" in L. CARMICHAEL, ed., Manual of Child Psychology (2d ed. New York 1954) 833–917. H. SELYE, The Stress of Life (New York 1956). THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 6.6. H. DAVIS, Moral and Pastoral Theology, 4 v. (5th ed. New York 1946). J. A. OESTERLE, Ethics (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1957) 67–69.

[H. GAVIN/J. A. OESTERLE]

FEAR OF THE LORD

An expression of frequent occurrence indicating the attitude that man should assume toward God.

In the Bible. In the Old Testament the wonderful WORKS OF GOD, "fearful and terrible deeds" (Ex 34.10; 2 Sm 7.23), produced a sense of awe and fear in the Israelites who came into contact with Him (Ex 3.6). This was not merely a negative emotion of blind terror, for God's self-revelation is also a disclosure of His salvific purpose. Hence, in Deuteronomy fear of the Lord (Heb. yir'at yhwh) is equated with reverence and piety that includes love for God and hatred of sin (Dt 6.1–5)—a synthesis of Old Testament religion. In this sense, the sapiential literature speaks of the fear of the Lord as the "beginning of wisdom" [Jb 28.28; Prv 1.7; Ps 110(111).10; Sir 1.16]. In postexilic Judaism to fear God meant in practice to observe the Law (Tb 1.10; Sir 23.27).

In the New Testament the Disciples were filled with awe by the wonderful works of Jesus (Mk 4.39–41; 16.8; Lk 5.26). The early Church lived with a sense of awe (Acts 2.43) not incompatible with joy. Though fear is less emphasized in the New Testament, it remains a necessary quality of the Christian attitude (Acts 9.31; 2 Cor 5.11). Love overcomes worldly fear (1 Jn 4.18), but the Christian must live constantly in reverent fear of God (Rom 11.20; Phil 2.12).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 766-767. S. TERRIEN, G. A. BUTTRICK, ed., The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible (Nashville 1962) 2:256–260. É. BOULARAND, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932-) 2.2:2463-75. L. NIEDER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957-65) 4:1107-08. G. BER-TRAM and G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935-) 3:124-128. J. FICHTNER and C. MAURER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 2:1793-95. H. A. BRONGERS, "La Crainte du Seigneur," Oudtestamentische Studiën 5 (1948) 151-173. R. H. PFEIFFER, "The Fear of God," Israel Exploration Journal 5 (1955) 41-48. B. OLIVER, La Crainte de Dieu comme valeur religieuse dans l'A.T. (Brussels 1960). S. PLATH, Furcht Gottes: Der Begriff Jir'a im A.T. (Stuttgart 1963).

[C. J. PEIFER]

As a Gift of the Holy Spirit. Fear of the Lord strengthens the acts of the virtue of hope. A soul moved by the gift is overwhelmed at the greatness of God and adheres ever more firmly to the divine goodness. A reverence follows that moves the person to fear anything that threatens its union with the Father. This fear is filial, not the servile fear whose concern is punishment; it causes the soul to turn not only from sin, but also from every tendency to refuse God anything. Appreciation of God's goodness increases, and with it grows contempt for self and all created goods. Thus, as the gift adds to hope's certitude, it also perfects humility and temperance. The beatitude corresponding to fear is 'Blessed are the poor in spirit,'' for whoever is moved by fear is blessed in seeking nothing of this world. The fruits of fear are modesty, continence, and chastity, all acts of temperance but as fruits that are perfected by the gift.

Bibliography: B. FROGET, The Indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the Souls of the Just, tr. S. A. RAEMERS (Westminister, Md. 1950). A. ROYO, The Theology of Christian Perfection, ed. and tr. J. AU-MANN (Dubuque 1962) 392–400, 496. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 19.

[P. F. MULHERN]

FEAST OF ASSES

The name sometimes given in medieval France to the FEAST OF FOOLS, celebrated on or about the Feast of the Circumcision (January 1), and sometimes to the Festival of the Flight into Egypt, held within the octave of the Epiphany (January 6). Both feasts, however innocent in origin, were by the 13th century characterized by burlesqued services, in some of which—as at Beauvais, Sens, and Autun—the ass played a part. At Beauvais, two 13th-century MSS, one for the Feast of the Circumcision, the other for the Flight into Egypt, show the normal form of the Mass and the Canonical Office retained, but the text extended by interpolations, or tropes, and the ceremonial including a considerable amount of buffoonery.

The ceremonial for the feast of the Flight into Egypt called for braying by the participants at Mass and, it would appear, the bringing of an ass into church. Both included the Prose of the Ass, Orientis partibus, each stanza of which had as refrain some variant of "Hez, Sire Asne, hez!" A "reformed" version for the feast on January 1, at Sens, although called asinaria festa and retaining the Prose of the Ass, omits the coarser elements of revelry and seems to have been entirely serious in its intentions. The ass itself was not necessarily a comic figure; it had served for the flight into Egypt, for Christ's entry into Jerusalem, and was, moreover, associated with the ox in praesepe observances.

The relation between the Feast of Asses and plays of the prophets such as that of Balaam and his ass is not altogether clear. Karl Young, while noting that the dramatic Ordo Prophetarum came first, denies that the riotous asinaria festa was derived from it. It would appear that in the course of time the ass was introduced from the Feast of Fools into the plays of the prophets, and that sometimes, as at Rouen, the asina forced upon the pious performance the name Festum Asinorum. The Feast of Asses was, of course, included in the ecclesiastical strictures against the Feast of Fools.

See Also: DRAMA, MEDIEVAL.

Bibliography: E. K. CHAMBERS, The Medieval Stage, 2 v. (Oxford 1903; reprint 1948) 1:274–335. K. YOUNG, The Drama of the Medieval Church, 2 v. (Oxford 1933) 1:104–105, 551; 2:154–170.

[M. N. MALTMAN]

FEAST OF FOOLS

A widely celebrated mock-religious festival of the Middle Ages. It was originally celebrated by the subdeacons of cathedrals, and was held on or about the Feast of the Circumcision (January 1). The name is sometimes applied collectively to the several liturgical revels of the Christmas season, particularly as celebrated by the deacons on the Feast of St. Stephen (December 26), the priests on St. John's Day (December 27), the choirboys on Holy Innocents' (December 28), and by the subdeacons on or about the Circumcision (January 1). Such revels, disputedly claimed to have been a Christian adaptation of the pagan festivities of the Kalends when great license was permitted the lower classes, were widespread in Europe during the Christmas season, and especially at the festivities of the subdeacons, whose feast came to be known specifically as the Feast of Fools. Though observances varied locally, they usually included burlesqued services, censing with unseemly objects, and more or less riotous behavior.

The essence of the feast was inversion of status, the control of the services of the day being given over wholly to the subdeacons. At First Vespers their representative (variously styled Lord, Abbot, Bishop, or Pope of Fools) received the staff of office from the master of ceremonies, assumed his authority, and retained it throughout the feast. Though the feast had its vogue in the French cathedrals, there are records of it in England, notably at Lincoln, Salisbury, and Beverley.

The feast seems to have originated about the 12th century; although official opposition was manifested as early as 1207, it continued in popularity through the 14th century. In 1435 very severe penalties were imposed by the Council of Basle for its observance; it was eventually suppressed, but remnants lingered on well into the 16th century.

See Also: FEAST OF ASSES; BOY BISHOP.

Bibliography: E. K. CHAMBERS, The Medieval Stage, 2 v. (Oxford 1903) 1:274–335, 336–389. K. YOUNG, The Drama of the Medieval Church, 2 v. (Oxford 1933) 1:104–111. E. WELSFORD, The Fool: His Social and Literary History (London 1935) 197–217.

[M. N. MALTMAN]

FEASTS, RELIGIOUS

Feasts or festivals are periodically recurring occasions for the expression of religious joy. Generally they occur annually, but weekly, monthly, and other celebrations are also common.

Pagan Feasts. In remotest antiquity and in primitive societies in general, virtually all feasts are religious in character. They express, on the one hand, a natural desire to rejoice in the blessings of life and nature and to escape briefly the arduous tasks of daily life, and, on the other hand, a striving toward the gods, who have given the gifts of life and nature, and an effort to unite with the world of the divine. The widespread custom of feasting in honor of the dead clearly reflects the role of the feast as a link with another world. Likewise the ritual, symbolism, and mythology of feasts enable the celebrants to participate in the world of mythical origins conceived of as an eternal present. The stories of the creation of the world or the epics of gods and heroes, for example, are ritually recited or reenacted at feasts, which thus serve, not only as bonds of society, but as instruments for handing on religious traditions. Feasts are the external manifestation of religion itself in every culture, and they very often include sacrifice as a prominent part of their ritual.

Feasts may be classified according to their object. Those originating in individual or family life include the celebrations of birth or name-giving, initiation, marriage, and death or burial. Others center about cosmic events: the change of seasons, the appearance of the moon, the sun, and the stars, and especially the new year, which is almost universally observed, though not at a fixed time in all cultures. Closely connected with this category are feasts allied with phases of agricultural life, especially harvest festivals, and those that depend on hunting and fishing seasons and the like. Finally, there are feasts honoring various gods; some of these result from former cosmic or agricultural associations, and others commemorate historical events in the life of a god or prophet or religious founder.

In the developed cultures of antiquity one finds highly complex calendars of feasts that often clearly reveal the connection between agriculture and religious life. This is especially true of Mesopotamia, where numerous monthly and yearly feasts were observed through the centuries. The principal one was the new year festival, in later times the 12-day Babylonian $Ak\hat{i}tu$, with its elaborate ritual of recitation of the creation epic, sacred marriage and fertility drama, public penitence for the past, and divination of the future. The ancient Egyptian feasts were characterized by the cult of the dead and by processions bearing statues of the god being honored, often majestic processions on the Nile River. The festivals of

"Family at the Table for the Passover Meal," manuscript illumination, 15th century. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./ CORBIS)

Greece were originally agricultural in character and purely local; in classical times they honored various gods, and eventually some of the Athenian festivals, such as the Dionysiac, spread throughout the country. Especially significant features were the drama and the athletic games. As the traditional Roman religion acquired an increasingly formalized character, its feasts tended to become secular observances, while foreign religions, such as the Syrian, Greek, or Egyptian mysteries, and eventually Christianity, expressed the religious sentiments of the people.

Feasts in Israel. For the principal Hebrew feasts in Old Testament times there are several festival calendars in the Pentateuch and scattered allusions elsewhere in the Bible. The calendars, from the Yahwist, Elohist, Deuteronomic, and Priestly traditions, are found respectively in Ex 34.18–23; Ex 23.14–17; Dt 16.1–17; Lv 23 and the sacrificial legislation based on this in Num 28.9–29.39. Certain important additional Jewish feasts are of later origin.

The weekly and monthly feasts are the SABBATH and the New-Moon Day (see NEW-MOON FEAST, HEBREW). Although of uncertain origin, the weekly day of rest was as old as the worship of Yahweh and occupied a very important place in Israelite life because it commemorated the Covenant with Yahweh. The first day of each lunar month was also celebrated with rest from work and special sacrifices. Only the New-Moon Day of the 7th (formerly the 1st) month retained special solemnity in later times, and some of its features were incorporated into the late Jewish New Year's Day, Rosh ha-Shanah, celebrated on the same date but not mentioned in the Old Testaments.

The oldest annual Israelite feasts are the three great pilgrimages (haggîm) to the central religious sanctuary-Unleavened Bread, Weeks or Pentecost, and Tabernacles or Booths (see PILGRIMAGES, 1). All three are of agricultural origin and were probably adopted from the Canaanites after the Israelite conquest. All three were later historicized, i.e., were associated with events in Israel's history that were then commemorated annually: the deliverance from Egyptian bondage, the giving of the Law, and the wilderness journey, respectively. In the Deuteronomic reform the three pilgrimages were centralized at the Jerusalem Temple and some time later were given definite dates. The Feast of Unleavened Bread, observed for seven days at the beginning of the barley harvest in spring, from the 15th to the 21st of Nisan, was, around the time of the Exile, combined with the Feast of PASS-OVER, which took place on the night of the 14th of Nisan. Passover may be even older than Unleavened Bread in Israel's history; it was a nomadic sacrifice that had probably been celebrated privately at home in the time when the earliest festival calendars were drawn up, for they do not mention it. The Feast of Weeks, or of the wheat harvest, was celebrated for one day only, seven weeks after Unleavened Bread. (See PENTECOST.) The Feast of Booths, at first the most prominent of the three, was the autumnal harvest festival, originally called the Ingathering. It was observed for seven (later eight) days beginning with the 15th of Tishri. It takes its name from the huts erected in the vineyards and orchards in the harvest season; these were ultimately identified with the tents used as dwelling places in the Exodus sojourn in the desert. See BOOTHS (TABERNACLES), FEAST OF.

The solemn Day of Atonement, Yom Kippur, was observed with sacrifices, penance, and fasting five days before Booths and is better classified as a fast day than as a feast. It originated very late in Old Testament times but embodied some ancient rites. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF (YOM KIPPUR).

Of the later feasts, two deserve mention because they have survived till the 20th century. The Feast of the Dedication, or Hanukkah, was instituted on the 25th of Kislev, 164 B.C., when Judas Maccabee reconsecrated the altar of the Temple that had been profaned three years before (see DEDICATION OF THE TEMPLE, FEAST OF). The story is told in 1 Maccabees 4.36–59 and 2 Maccabees 10.1–8. The origin of the Feast of PURIM, or Lots, celebrated on the 14th and 15th of Adar, is attributed by the Book of Esther to the escape of the Persian Jews from the plot of the wicked Haman. This is not a historical account, however, although the feast, very likely of pagan or at least secular origin in the East, cannot be linked with certainty to specific Persian or Babylonian practice.

Early Christian Feasts. The earliest Christians did not immediately dissociate themselves from the observance of the Jewish feasts. Many references in the New Testament indicate that Jesus and His disciples, as well as the early Palestinian Christian communities, observed the Sabbath and the major annual festivals. This observance had been invested by Christ with a new dimension, however, since He proclaimed His own superiority to the Law and oriented it to the eschatological events. It remained for Saint Paul to proclaim the Christian's independence from the Jewish festival calendar (Colossians 2.16), and with the fall of Jerusalem and the growth of the Church outside Palestine, the Judeo-Christian festival observance ceased except among sectarian groups.

The earliest feast in the Christian calendar was the LORD'S DAY, SUNDAY, which is well attested in the New Testament and the Apostolic Fathers (e.g., Acts of the Apostles 20.7; Revelation 1.10; Didache 14; Ignatius, Magn. 9.1). It commemorated the Resurrection and was observed with the celebration of the Eucharist; it was not connected in its origins with the Jewish Sabbath. The first annual feast to be observed was Easter, which initially coincided with the Jewish Passover festival but did not retain any of the Jewish meaning except symbolically (see EASTER AND ITS CYCLE). The great EASTER CONTROVERsy about the exact date of Easter and the manner of calculating it lasted from the 2d to the 4th century, and in some parts of the world until much later. The Council of Nicaea (325) decided in favor of the Sunday after the vernal equinox, and this date was gradually adopted throughout the Western Church.

The Feast of Pentecost also persisted in the Christian calendar, but again totally dissociated from its Jewish connotations. It commemorated the events of Acts of the Apostles ch. 2; by the 3d century it was a well established observance. The Feast of the ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST, 40 days after Easter, is well attested in writings of the 4th century.

The LITURGICAL YEAR IN THE ROMAN RITE, as known today, came into existence only gradually once the Easter and Christmas feasts had been established. There is 3d-century evidence that the Epiphany (January 6) was celebrated in Alexandria as the feast of Christ's baptism (see EPIPHANY, FEAST OF). The commemoration of the birthday of the Lord on December 25 spread from Rome throughout the Western Church from the 4th century, and Epiphany remained as the commemoration of the Magi incident recounted in Matthew 2.1–12. (See CHRISTMAS AND ITS CYCLE.)

Feasts honoring the saints, including MARIAN FEASTS, came into general use still later. Some of the oldest Marian feasts originated in the Eastern Church and spread to the West in the 6th and 7th centuries. Saints' feasts are rooted in the very early cult of the martyrs and are attested from the 3d and 4th centuries. (See SAINTS, DE-VOTION TO THE.) Until the end of the Middle Ages the number of Christian feasts grew to considerable proportions; the tendency of modern times has been to reduce the number, both of feasts involving the obligations of Mass and abstinence from work and of other feasts often of only local importance.

Bibliography: J. H. BATESON et al., J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908-27) 5:835-94. J. K. FOTHERINGHAM et al., ibid. 3:61–141, C. M. EDSMAN et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 2:906-21. O. SCHROEDER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 4:99-100. H. EISING, and W. LURZ, ibid. 95-99. J. H. MIL-LER, Fundamentals of the Liturgy (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 345-424. M. ELIADE, Cosmos and History (New York 1954). K. KERÉNYT, "Vom Wesen des Festes," Paideuma 1 (1938) 59-74. R. DE VAUX, Ancient Israel, Its Life and Institutions, tr. J. MCHUGH (New York 1961) 468-517. G. B. GRAY, Sacrifice in the Old Testament (Oxford 1925). T. H. GASTER, Festivals of the Jewish Year (New York 1953). T. MAERTENS, C'est fête en l'honneur de Yahvé (Paris 1961). A. A. MCARTHUR, The Evolution of the Christian Year (London 1953). B. STEWART, The Development of Christian Worship (New York 1953) 214-51.

[G. W. MACRAE]

FEBRES CORDERO MUÑOZ, MIGUEL FRANCISCO, ST.

Baptized Francisco, also known as Miguel of Ecuador, scholar, author, philologist, poet, member of the Lasallian Institute of the Brothers of Christian Instruction, first Ecuadorian saint; b. Nov. 7, 1854, Cuenca, Ecuador; d. Feb. 9, 1910, Premia del Mar (near Barcelona), Spain. The scion of a politically prominent family of Cuenca headed by Francisco Febres Cordero Montoya and Ana Muñoz, Francisco was among the first students of the Lasallian Brothers at Cuenca (1863). Francisco joined the Lasallian Brothers, in spite of the initial resistance of his family and a physical deformity that made walking difficult. He took the habit at Cuenca, March 24, 1868 at age 13, and took the name Brother Miguel, the first native Ecuadorian in the Institute. Following his formation, he became a beloved teacher of languages (Spanish, French, and English) at the order's schools at Cuenca, then Quito. His pedagogical skills led to his appointment as public examiner and inspector of Quito's schools. His passion, however, was teaching the catechism to boys preparing for the sacraments. Miguel published the first of his many textbooks, a Spanish grammar, when he was 17. His work in the fields of linguistics and literature won him acclaim as a scholar and membership in the National Academies of Ecuador (1892) (which included membership in the Royal Academy of Spain), France (1900), and Venezuela (1906). He also authored a catechism and other pious works, including hymns. At a time boding civil unrest and religious persecution in France, he was assigned first to Paris (March 1907), then to the motherhouse at Lembecq-lez-Hal (near Brussels), Belgium (July 1907) to translate the Institute's documents into Spanish from French. Because the less temperate climate affected his health, he was transferred (1908) to the juniorate at Premia de Mar near Barcelona, where he was noted for his heroic efforts on behalf of his charges and the church during the July 1909 anarchist riots. Shortly thereafter, he contracted pneumonia and died. His body was returned to Quito at the start of the Spanish Civil War. The Ecuadorean government dedicated a monument to his honor in 1955. Miguel of Ecuador, patron of crippled children, was beatified by Pope Paul VI, Oct. 30, 1977, and canonized by Pope John Paul II on Oct. 21, 1984.

Feast: Feb. 9 (Lasallian Brothers).

Bibliography: Un religieux équatorien, frère Miguel de l'Institut des Frères des écoles chrétiennes, 1854-1910 (Lembecq-lez-Hal, Belgium 1913). G. CEVALLOS GARCÍA, Salí tras tí, clamando, y eras ido (Cuenca, Ecuador 1962). R. CRESPO TORAL, El hermano Miguel de las escuelas cristiana (Cuenca, Ecuador 1937). R. L. GUIDI, Un cuore per la scuola: vita di fratel Miguel delle Scuole cristiane (Vicenza 1977). I. MOSCOSO DÁVILA and M. MALO GONZÁLEZ, Ramas y floracion de una estirpe gloriosa, 2 v. (Cuenca, Ecuador 1985-1986). E. MUÑOZ BORRERO, Antología acerca del Hermano Miguel (Cuenca, Ecuador 1967); Un académico en los altares: el beato hermano Miguel de las Escuelas Cristianas (Quito 1977). M. OLIVÉ, San Miguel Febres Cordero-ese hermano: 21 de octubre de 1984, fiestas de la canonización (Caracas, Venezuela 1984). L. PÁEZ FUENTES, El hermano Miguel, maestro ejemplar (Quito 1977); Labor pedagógica, científíca y literaria del hermano Miguel (Quito 1991). L. SALM, Brother Miguel Febres Cordero, F.S.C.: Teacher, Scholar, Saint (Romeoville, Ill. 1984). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 78 (1986): 5-12. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 45 (1977): 3-9; no. 46 (1984): 6-7.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FEBRONIANISM

A theory of the constitution of the Church and of Church-State relations developed by Johann Nikolaus von HONTHEIM (1701–90), Auxiliary Bishop of Trier, under the pseudonym Justinus Febronius, in The State of the Church and the Legitimate Authority of the Roman Pontiff, a Book Composed for the Purpose of Uniting in Religion Dissident Christians (Frankfurt 1763). Professing to be based on accepted teaching, De statu ecclesiae (its Latin title) is censorious and bitter in tone, with many quotations from sources condemned as heretical.

Principles. Its thesis is that the PAPACY claims many powers not given by Christ or exercised in the Church of the first eight centuries. The Church is not monarchical. The PRIMACY OF THE POPE is to effect unity, to assure vigilance, and to promulgate laws enacted by a general council. It would be well if each general council would set the date for the next general council to convene. Failing this, a general council may be called by the pope, the emperor, or bishops [see BISHOP (IN THE CHURCH)]. As all bishops are equal, the pope has no jurisdiction outside his own see, which need not be Rome. Infallibility resides in the whole Church. Only the consent of the bishops makes papal pronouncements binding. The false decretals of Pseudo-Isidore account for the changed role of the papacy. The Roman Curia is the special object of vituperation. Instruction of the people, national synods, appeal to the royal power, reform in the Church, can bring about conditions necessary for Christian reunion. The effect of Febronianism would be the creation of a national German church, a collegium, or body, subject to the prince, a department of government.

Roots. Febronianism grew out of the ENLIGHTEN-MENT, GALLICANISM, conciliarism [see CONCILIARISM (HISTORY OF)], JANSENISM, regalism, ABSOLUTISM. Hontheim studied at Louvain under the canonist Z. B. van ESPEN, whose On the Promulgation of Laws, though it had been placed on the Index, he frequently quotes. He studied too in Leiden, where national and natural law intermingled. He was influenced by J. von Spangenberg, whom he assisted when the Councilor represented Trier at the electoral Diet of Frankfurt in 1742. Spangenberg thought a scholarly work on the GRAVAMINA and the German Church necessary. Hontheim's association with G. C. Neller, who came from Würzburg to teach in the seminars of Trier, brought greater familiarity with Gallican literature. Neller's Principia juris publici ecclesiastici, placed on the Index in 1750, was a much-used source for Febronius.

The concept of sovereignty that developed during the Enlightenment caused princes to treat papal envoys as diplomats of a foreign power, without status regarding the affairs of the Church in their countries. The rights of papal nuncios in the Rhenish electoral bishoprics and a Roman court's acceptance of a cause not yet judged in the Metz episcopal court of the first instance were under discussion at the time De statu ecclesiae appeared.

Response to Book. The book was translated into German, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese. Supplements came out as volumes two to four, 1770 to 1774, and an abridgment by the author in 1777. The first edition was placed on the Index in 1764, and Clement XIII requested German bishops to outlaw it in their dioceses. The response was delayed and fainthearted; the Elector of Trier was among those who complied. After its condemnation, Maria Theresa ordered the suppression of the first Latin and German editions. Through G. van Swieten this was reduced to a simple prohibition, withdrawn in 1769. Even earlier a new canon law based on Febronian principles had developed. JOSEPHINISM antedates, embraces, and extends Febronianism. Congenial to Kaunitz, it was taught in Austrian universities. The dislike of Roman centralism and ultramontane Jesuits increased the popularity of Febronianism in Portugal, Spain, the Austrian Netherlands, Venice, Tuscany, and Naples. The bishop of Coimbra was imprisoned in 1770 for denouncing Febronianism. In 1786 Pius VI's brief Super soliditate petrae condemned Febronianism as it appeared in Was ist der Papst? (1782) by the Viennese canonist, J. V. Eybel.

Febronius was answered by more than 20 Catholic theologians. Clement XIII sent encouraging briefs to several such defenders. P. BALLERINI, the Dominican T. Mamachi, and the Jesuit F. A. ZACCARIA were among the most prolific. Zaccaria was exiled from Naples for his Anti-Febronius.

Klemens Wenzeslaus of Saxony and Poland, grandson of Emperor Joseph I, became bishop of Trier in February 1768. He continued to protect Hontheim as had J. P. von Walendorf, his predecessor, though his auxiliary's identity with Febronius was known to the papal nuncio N. Oddi. In 1775 Klemens Wenzeslaus asked the French clergy's opinion of De statu ecclesiae. In their assembly that year, the French clergy repudiated Febronianism; it went far beyond Gallicanism in their opinion.

Protestants also wrote against Febronius. More than the primacy of the pope was at issue between Catholics and "dissident Christians." G. E. LESSING thought the book mere flattery of princes; every argument used against the pope could be used more tellingly against secular rulers.

At the Coblenz Conference of 1769, the electorbishops of Mainz, Trier, and Cologne, with Hontheim's aid, listed 30 grievances against the Holy See. The importance of Febronianism can be seen in Pius VI's choice of the Christmas consistory of 1778 to announce the longawaited recantation of Hontheim. Even after this the rumor that the recantation had been forced, denied by Hontheim in the press but supported by his commentary on his recantation, kept the issue alive.

Further Influence. The Congress of EMS, 1786, saw the elector-bishops and the Prince-Bishop of Salzburg draw up the Punctation of Ems along the lines of the Coblenz Gravamina to win a greater measure of independence. In the same year the Synod of Pistoia, called by Duke Leopold of Tuscany, brother of Joseph II, drew up resolutions inspired by Bishop Scipione de' RICCI. Based on Febronian-Jansenist principles, they were repudiated by the majority of the Tuscan bishops and condemned in Pius VI's constitution AUCTOREM FIDEI, Aug. 28, 1794.

The wars of the French Revolution and Napoleon ended the Rhenish electorates, but the influence of Febronianism continued into the 19th century. After the Congress of Vienna, Metternich hoped for the creation of a German national church, to be constituted at the Frankfurt Bundestag. He used his cousin, Ignaz Heinrich von WESSENBERG, Vicar-General of the Prince-Primate Dalberg for the Diocese of Constance. The effort was revived by Bismarck in the second half of the 19th century. Some even consider that the refusal of a German primate, requested by the 1848 Bishops' Conference at Würzburg, to head a Reich Church was due to Rome's memory of Febronianism and the perfidy of the last primate, Dalberg.

See Also: CHURCH AND STATE.

Bibliography: T. ORTOLAN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903-50) 5.2:2115-24. L. JUST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 4:4647. H. RAAB, ibid. 5:479-80. E. WOLF, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 2:890-91. L. PASTOR, The History of the Popes From the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 v. (London-St. Louis 1938-61): v.13-40, from 1st German ed. Geschichte und Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters, 16 v. in 21 (Freiburg 1885-1933; repr. 1955-) 36:191, 202, 248, 250-78, 287-88; 39:127-56; 40:2-28. H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖNMETZER (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 2592-97, 2600-2700. E. ALEXANDER, "Church and Society in Germany . . . 1789-1950," tr. T. STOLPER, Church and Society, ed. J. N. MOODY (New York 1953). C. J. BLENNERHASSETT, "The Papacy and the Catholic Church," Cambridge Modern History (London-New York 1902-12) 10:131-68. R. A. GRAHAM, Vatican Diplomacy (Princeton 1959). R. W. GREAVES, "Religion," New Cambridge Modern History (2d ed. London-New York 1957-) 7:113-26. L. STURZO, Church and State, tr. B. B. CARTER (New York 1939) 325-26, passim. R. DUCHON, "De Bossuet à Febronius," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 65 (1970) 375-422.

FÉCAMP, ABBEY OF

Originally a monastery for nuns, then a Benedictine abbey, on the English Channel, 24 miles northeast of Le Havre, France, Diocese of Rouen (Lat. Fiscamnum). In 664 Count WANINGUS founded the abbey for nuns. This monastery was destroyed by the Normans in 841, and the nuns who were not massacred fled to Picardy. Richard II, Duke of Normandy (996-1026), replaced the lax canons whom his father had established in Trinity Church there with Benedictine monks (1001) under WILLIAM OF SAINT-BÉNIGNE OF DIJON. John of Fécamp (1028-78), William's disciple, succeeded him in 1028 and gave a strong impetus to the abbey school (noted for its work in ecclesiastical chant). Generously endowed by Richard II, the abbey was prosperous during the 12th and 13th centuries; an abbey nullius, it possessed the three abbeys of BERNAY, ÉVREUX in Normandy, and Blangy in Artois, as well as 30 parish churches and vast material domains in France, England, and Spain. Fécamp, itself, with its reputed relic of the Precious Blood was a pilgrimage center. The 12thcentury Romanesque church was burned in 1168, and the present church was erected under Abbots Henry of Sully (1139-87) and Raoul of Argences (1187-1219), the lantern tower over the transept being built under Abbot William of Vaspail (1229-59). The abbey suffered great destruction during the Hundred Years' War. The abbots of the period included Peter Roger (1326-29), who became Pope CLEMENT VI; D'Estouteville (1390-1423), founder of the abbey's celebrated choir of chanters, which survived until 1791; and Gilles de Duremont (1423-44), a creature of the Duke of Bedford and one of the judges who condemned JOAN OF ARC. In the 16th century the Abbot Cardinals Jean Balue and Antoine Bohier, the three cardinals of LORRAINE, and François de Joyeuse continued to attract kings and royalty to Fécamp as before, but the abbey suffered much during the Wars of Religion. The 17th and 18th centuries were again prosperous times for Fécamp; the Maurist reform, desired by the monks as early as 1620, was introduced in 1650 despite the opposition of the grand prior. The church façade was redone in classical style in 1748. In 1768 the abbey numbered 27 MAURISTS; it was suppressed in the French Revolution, and the abbey church became a parish church.

Bibliography: J. VALLERY-RADOT, "La Trinité de Fécamp," Congrès archéologique de France, 1900–1925 (Paris 1927) 405–458. J. LECLERCQ and J. P. BONNES, Jean de Fécamp (Paris 1946). L'Abbaye bénédictine de Fécamp: Ouvrage scientifique du XIIIème centenaire, 658–1958, 4 v. (Fécamp 1959–63).

[M. O'CALLAGHAN]

[P. COUSIN]

FEDERATED COLORED CATHOLICS

A militant national organization of black Catholics that sought to eliminate discriminatory practices against African Americans especially in Catholic institutions. The key figure in its foundation was Dr. Thomas W. Turner, a black Catholic educator associated with Hampton Institute, Hampton, Virginia. Early in 1917, he and a small group of black friends organized the Committee against the Extension of Race Prejudice in the Church. To achieve their objectives, these pioneers used written personal appeals to members of the hierarchy to correct discriminatory practices in Catholic churches, societies, schools, and seminaries. In 1919 the committee was enlarged to 25 members, and its name changed to the Committee for the Advancement of Colored Catholics. Since written appeals had borne little fruit, committees were formed to approach key Church leaders personally to plead the cause of black Catholics. The need for expanded membership soon became apparent, and in 1925 the national organization called the Federated Colored Catholics of the United States came into existence. Group membership, by Catholic parishes and parochial organizations, was emphasized in an effort to educate black Catholics regarding their rights and also to increase the effectiveness of the organization as a bargaining influence.

The objectives of the organization were most clearly stated in a resolution adopted at its annual convention in Detroit in 1930. Briefly, these included equal employment opportunities for all regardless of race; elimination of segregation in housing, recreation, and public utilities; Catholic education on all levels for black Catholic children; the breakdown of discriminatory policies in the admission of blacks to all Catholic institutions; admission of black boys and girls to convents and seminaries; the outlawing of discriminatory practices at Catholic church services and social functions; and a plea for the support of all Catholics in obtaining recognition of the dignity of black people as human beings, with constitutional rights to full citizenship.

Until 1930 the leadership in the federation was exclusively black. A membership of more than 100,000 was claimed. Interested whites, clerics, and laymen became increasingly involved, especially in participation at annual conventions. By 1932, when its convention was held in New York, the federation had become much more interracial in membership and leadership; and a new name, the National Catholic Federation for the Promotion of Better Race Relations, was adopted. One year later it was changed to the National Catholic Interracial Federation. By this time the older black leaders, with their emphasis on a direct, militant approach to the solution of racial problems, had lost influence, and new leadership was channeled into the Catholic Interracial Council movement, founded in New York in 1934.

Bibliography: H. M. SMITH, "Federated Colored Catholics of the U.S.: A Historical Sketch," The Chronicle 4 (1931) 543–547. H. M. TEABEAU, "Federated Colored Catholics Make History in New York City Convention," Interracial Review 5 (1932) 195, 198–200. T. J. HARTE, Catholic Organizations Promoting Negro-White Race Relations in the United States (Catholic University of America, Studies in Sociology; Washington 1947) 1–9.

[T. J. HARTE]

FEDERATION OF ASIAN BISHOPS' CONFERENCES

The Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences (FABC) is a transnational episcopal structure that brings together 14 bishops' conferences from the following regions as full members: Bangladesh, India, Indonesia, Japan, Korea, Laos-Cambodia, Malaysia-Singapore-Brunei, Myanmar (Burma), Pakistan, Philippines, Sri Lanka, Taiwan, Thailand, and Vietnam, as well as ten associate members: Hong Kong, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Macau, Mongolia, Nepal, Siberia, Tadjikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. It has ten associate members, drawn from the ecclesiastical jurisdictions of Hong Kong, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Macau, Mongolia, Nepal, Siberia, Tadjikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. By virtue of their membership in the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India (CBCI), both the Syro-Malabar and Syro-Malankara Eastern Catholic Churches are also members of, and participate in the leadership and activities of the FABC. West Asia (the Middle East) has its own transnational structure, the Council of Catholic Patriarchs of the Orient (Conseil des Patriarches Catholiques d'Orient or CPCO), and does not form part of FABC. The foundation for the FABC was laid at the historic gathering of 180 Asian Catholic Bishops at the Asian Catholic Bishops' Meeting in Manila during the visit of Pope Paul VI to East Asia and Southeast Asia in November of 1970.

Structures and Statements. The supreme body of the federation is the Plenary Assembly, which convenes once in four years with the presidents and official delegates from each member conference. The Plenary Assembly makes major decisions and sets policy. The normal work of FABC is directed through three bodies: the Central Committee, composed of the presidents of the conferences represented, puts into effect the decisions and directives of the Plenary Assembly; the Central Secretariat, located in Hong Kong, coordinates the activities of the Federation and assists the functioning of all its levels; and the Standing Committee, composed of five members elected from various parts of FABC region, executes the directives of the central committee and directs the work of the Central Secretariat. The FABC has no president; rather, there is a "convenor" from the Standing Committee, a general secretary, and an assistant general secretary who coordinates the work from the Hong Kong office.

Every four years the official delegates to the Plenary Assembly take up pastorally relevant questions for study and deliberation. It is customary that two Asian theologians each present a major paper addressing the theme of the assembly. Most of the work is done in sectional workshops for which guideline papers are prepared in advance. Themes of the Plenary Assembly have included the following: "Evangelization in Modern Asia" (Taipei 1974); "Prayer-the Life of the Church in Asia" (Calcutta 1978); "The Church-Community of Faith in Asia'' (Bangkok 1982); "The Vocation and Mission of the Laity in the Church and in the World of Asia'' (Tokyo 1986); "Journeying Together Toward The Third Millennium" (Bandung 1990); "Christian Discipleship in Asia Today: Service to Life'' (Manila 1995); and "A Renewed Church in Asia on a Mission of Love and Service" (Sampran 2000).

Much of the work between the assemblies is done by the various offices of the FABC. In addition to the Office of Theological Concerns (formerly, the Theological Advisory Commission), there are offices for the laity, mission, human development, ecumenical and interreligious affairs, education and student chaplaincy, and social communications. A joint planning meeting that is generally held biennially or more frequently, if needed, encourages fruitful exchange among the offices, and each has taken initiatives to organize a series of workshops for the bishops in its respective field.

Published statements based on the conclusions of these workshops have found echo beyond the FABC and contributed to the Church in other continents. The office for ecumenical and interreligious affairs, for example, conducted a series of institutes called "Bishops' Institute for Religious Affairs" (BIRA). The workshops organized by the office for human development since 1974 are known as the Bishops' Institute for Social Action (BISA). The same office is engaged in a new series of workshops entitled, "Faith Encounter in Social Action" (FEISA), through which bishops are exposed to the faith of peoples of other religious traditions and are led to discover how the Church could collaborate together with them in the transformation of society.

The Office of Theological Concerns responds to the pastoral situation of the region by making up deeper study of certain crucial themes. Composed of theologians nominated by each bishops' conference, the commission has issued many important documents, including theses on interreligious dialogue [FABC Papers 48]; theses on the local church [FABC Papers 60]; Asian perspectives on Church and politics [FABC Papers 63]; Asian Christian perspectives on harmony [FABC Papers 65]; the spirit at work in Asia today [FABC Papers 81]; and methodology for Asian Christian theology [FABC Papers 96]. In April of 1994, the commission brought together some of the distinguished theologians of Asia and representatives from other continents for a colloquium in Pattaya, Thailand, "Being Church in Asia in the Twenty-first Century."

Influence. The FABC has played a significant role among the churches of Asia. It strengthened the bonds of communion among the bishops in the region and contributed to the development of a shared vision about the Church and its mission in Asia. Its influence on the Church throughout the world is witnessed to by the evergrowing interest in the documents it has published. The deliberations of the bishops at the plenary assemblies, shaped by their experience in the various countries and sustained by the work of the offices, have led to the emergence of a certain theological orientation. Major theological contributions of the FABC have been to develop a theology of religions from an Asian perspective; to explore the relationship of Church and reign of God in a multi-religious context; to understand the local Church with particular emphasis on cultural and socio-political aspects; to explore the meaning and significance of dialogue; and to offer new perspectives on mission and evangelization.

Initial impetus for this theological orientation was given by the first plenary assembly (Taipei 1974), which spoke of the need for a threefold dialogue: with the religions of Asia, with the cultures of Asia, and with the poor of Asia. Following developments in the Church and in the region during the 1970s and 1980s, new avenues were explored in the spirit of dialogue. One such initiative was to forge closer understanding and cooperation with the ecumenical organization Christian Conference of Asia (CCA), representing most of the Protestant and Orthodox Churches in Asia. A step in this direction was the conference held in Singapore in July of 1987, where participants from FABC and CCA came together to reflect on "Living and Working Together with Sisters and Brothers of Other Faiths." At a colloquium in Hua Hin, Thailand, in 1993, both organizations agreed to undertake a single and unified structure of collaboration. The 1996 colloquium in Cheung Chau, Hong Kong explored further avenues for collaboration under the theme "Asian Movement for Christian Unity."

Since its inception, the FABC has fostered episcopal collegiality, consultation, and collaboration among the many Catholic bishops' conferences from disparate and diverse regions throughout the vast Asian continent. The FABC has consistently committed itself in service to the daily life experiences of the Asian peoples by recognizing their rich cultural heritage, affirming their intense religiosity, and empowering them in their struggle to attain a better quality of life in the midst of crushing poverty and socio-political marginalization. Nevertheless, much work remains to be done: the relationship between church and state in several countries, especially in countries such as mainland China, Myanmar, Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, and North Korea; the struggling churches of East Timor, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Mongolia, Siberia, Tadjikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan; growing ethnic strife and religious conflicts in many parts of Asia; and the pervasive problem of economic exploitation with its disruptive implications in all areas of people's lives. To compound matters, most countries lack funds and resources for training personnel to implement the inspiring vision of the FABC.

Bibliography: The series, FABC Papers, published by the Central Secretariat of the Federation in Hong Kong, offers a wealth of wide-ranging materials that help one to understand the spirit and orientation of FABC. Most of the official documents of the FABC have been collected and published in a convenient two-volume collection: G. B. ROSALES and C. G. ARÉVALO, eds., For All The Peoples of Asia: Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences Documents, 1970-1991 (Maryknoll, NY 1992) and F.-J. EILERS, ed., For All The Peoples of Asia Volume 2: Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences Documents from 1992 to 1996 (Quezon City 1997). See also: S. BEVANS, "Inculturation of Theology in Asia (The Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences, 1970-1995)," Studia Missionalia 45 (1996) 1-23. J. DUPUIS, "FABC Focus on the Church's Evangelizing Mission in Asia Today," Vidyajyoti 56 (1992) 449-468. J. KAVUNKAL, "Local Church in the FABC Statements," Jeevadhara 27 (1997) 260-271. S. PAINADATH, "Theological Perspectives of FABC on Interreligious Dialogue," Jeevadhara 27 (1997) 272-288. P. C. PHAN, "Human Development and Evangelization (The first to the sixth plenary assembly of the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences)," Studia Missionalia 47 (1998) 205-227. J. Y. TAN, "Theologizing at the Service of Life: The Contextual Theological Methodology of the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences (FABC)" Gregorianum 83 no. 3 (2000) 541-575. F. WILFRED, et al., "What the Spirit Says to the Churches. A Vademecum on the Pastoral and Theological Orientations of the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences (FABC)," Vidyajyoti 62 (1998) 124–133.

[F. WILFRED/J. TAN]

FEDERATION OF DIOCESAN LITURGICAL COMMISSIONS

The Federation of Diocesan Liturgical Commissions (FDLC) is a national association encompassing all diocesan liturgical commissions, offices of worship (or comparable diocesan structures) established by the local bishops in the United States. Since September 1980, the national office has been located in Washington, DC.

The bishops' committee on the liturgy and its secretariat gave a strong impetus to the foundation of the FDLC. They hosted a meeting of the heads of diocesan liturgical commissions at the Liturgical Week in Houston in 1966 and Kansas City in 1967. In a similar meeting in Chicago, November 1968, a motion was made that a federation of liturgical commissions be organized. In the Feb. 9, 1969 meeting, the bishops' committee on the liturgy implemented the Chicago motion by directing that two representatives from each of 12 regions be elected from among the chairs and secretaries of all the diocesan commissions in the United States. These elected representatives formed the charter 24.

The charter 24 were convened at the 1969 meeting of the diocesan commissions in Pittsburgh. Temporary officers were elected, and organizing committees were appointed. The first constitutional meeting of the FDLC took place in El Paso, Texas, in conjunction with the 1970 meeting of the Southwest Liturgical Conference. At this time the FDLC was formally established, a constitution was adopted, and permanent officers were elected.

The FDLC views itself as a professional organization seeking to promote the liturgy as the heart of Christian life in the parish and to assist the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops (USCCB), as well as individual bishops in their discharging their responsibilities for fostering liturgical catechesis in their dioceses. Concentrating on the pastoral aspects of liturgical celebration, it places a high priority on gathering, dispensing, and commissioning liturgical materials to aid liturgical renewal and catechetical programs in each diocese. An annual meeting, regional meetings, the FDLC Newsletters, and other specially commissioned publications serve as focus points for this effort. To foster closer cooperation between the FDLC and the USCCB, the FDLC Chair and Executive Director attend all plenary meetings of the USCCB.

[J. D. SHAUGHNESSY/J. L. CUNNINGHAM/EDS.]

FEEHAN, PATRICK AUGUSTINE

Archbishop; b. County Tipperary, Ireland, Aug. 29, 1829; d. Chicago, IL, July 12, 1902. He was the son of Patrick and Judith (Cooney) Feehan. Entering Maynooth College, County Kildare, Ireland, in January 1847, he studied philosophy and theology and was appointed to the Dunboyne Establishment, Maynooth, for higher studies. In 1850 his family emigrated to the U.S. When Abp. Peter Kenrick of St. Louis, MO, appealed for candidates for his archdiocese, Feehan volunteered and Kenrick ordained him in St. Louis on Nov. 1, 1852. Feehan's first assignment was to teach moral theology and Sacred Scripture in the Carondelet Seminary, Missouri. In 1854, when Anthony O'Regan was chosen bishop of Chicago, Feehan succeeded him as seminary president. Four years later he was named to the pastorate of St. Michael's Church and then to the Immaculate Conception parish.

During the Civil War, a hospital for the wounded was established in the vicinity, and Feehan's solicitude for the war victims spread his reputation beyond the diocese. Some of the most destructive Civil War battles were fought in Tennessee, and many Catholic churches were ruined. The devastation so overwhelmed Bp. James Whelan of Nashville that he resigned in 1863. Feehan declined the nomination to Nashville in 1864 because he feared the change would prove fatal to his invalid mother who was living near him. However, when she died in July 1865, he accepted the appointment and was consecrated by Archbishop Kenrick in St. Louis on Nov. 1, 1865.

Feehan arrived in Nashville for his installation on November 11 to find that there were only three diocesan priests in Tennessee. During his 15-year administration, he directed the rebuilding of churches and was successful in recruiting clerics from Ireland. He attended Vatican Council I (1869–70). On Sept. 10, 1880, he was appointed the first archbishop of CHICAGO and was installed at Holy Name Cathedral on November 25. During his 22year episcopate, churches increased from 194 to 298, priests from 205 to 538, and schools from 88 with 25,000 pupils to 166, with a total of 62,723 pupils.

Feehan convened the first archdiocesan synod on Dec. 13, 1887, at which the decrees of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore were promulgated. In 1892 the New World, official Catholic newspaper of the Chicago archdiocese, began publication. Feehan helped to organize the second Catholic Congress held in Chicago from Sept. 4 to 8, 1893, in conjunction with the Columbian Exposition and World's Fair. With the growth of the archdiocese, Feehan saw the need for an auxiliary bishop. Rome first designated Alexander J. McGavick, pastor of St. John's Church, Chicago, to be titular bishop of Narcopolis and auxiliary bishop of Chicago. But soon after his consecration on May 1, 1899, illness incapacitated him, and Peter J. Muldoon, pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church, Chicago, was made titular bishop of Tamassus and consecrated in Holy Name Cathedral on July 25, 1901. A few of the Irish-born local clergy objected to the selection of a native-born American. Their leader, Jeremiah Crowley, pastor of St. Mary's Church in Oregon, IL, was excommunicated. This friction saddened the last days of the archbishop. When Feehan's death occurred suddenly as the result of an apoplectic stroke, Catholics in the archdiocese numbered 800,000 and, despite the extensive building program, the archdiocese was financially sound.

Bibliography: C. J. KIRKFLEET, The Life of Patrick Augustine Feehan (Chicago 1922). J. J. THOMPSON, The Archdiocese of Chicago (Des Plaines, IL 1920).

[H. C. KOENIG]

FEENEY, LEONARD

Poet, essayist, founder and superior of a religious congregation of men and women, b. Lynn, Mass., Feb. 15, 1897, and d. Still River, Mass., Jan. 30, 1978. Trained in Jesuit schools, he entered the Society in 1914 and, after completing seminary studies, did graduate work at Oxford. He was ordained at Weston College in 1928.

Feeney quickly attracted attention in the Catholic literary world with his first book of poetry, In Towns and Little Towns (1927). This was followed over the next 20 years by a great variety of writings: essays, short stories, sketches, biography, dramatizations, and more poetry. Educated "in the hard school of wonder," as he put it, he was entranced with "the earthliness of heavenly things and the heavenliness of earthly things." With his buoyant, paradoxical style he was called by many the "American G. K. Chesterton." Among Feeney's popular books were: In Towns and Little Towns (1927); Fish on Friday (1934); Boundaries (1936); Riddle and Reverie (1936); Song for a Listener (1936); You'd Better Come Quietly (1939); Survival Till Seventeen (1941); The Leonard Feeney Omnibus (1943); and Your Second Childhood (1945).

Feeney insisted on the primacy of doctrine as the source of theology and devotion. "And by the way/ Speaking of how to pray,/Dogmas come first, not liturgies." Frank Sheed, a long-time friend and one of his publishers, said of his writings, "For Father Feeney, dogma is not only true; it is breathlessly exciting. That is his special vocation-to make his readers feel the thrill." Besides contributing to Catholic periodicals and broadcasting on "The Catholic Hour," Feeney was also literary editor of America and president of the Catholic Poetry Society of America. In 1943, at the height of his literary and lecturing career, he was assigned as permanent chaplain to St. Benedict Center, an intellectual and spiritual forum for Harvard and Radcliffe students, founded in 1940 by Catherine Goddard Clarke. His love of dogma made Feeney insist that the doctrine, extra ecclesiam nulla salus, must be held and professed without compromise. This stand bred a reaction which led to ecclesiastical censures on him and his followers.

Diogo Antônio Feijó.

On Jan. 17, 1949, with Catherine Goddard Clarke, he founded a religious community of men and women. In 1958, the community moved from Cambridge, Mass., to a farm in Still River, Mass., where they were better able to follow a monastic life of prayer, study, and manual labor according to the Benedictine spirit. In 1972, through the efforts of Bishop Bernard J. Flanagan of Worcester, Cardinal Humberto Medeiros of Boston, and Cardinal John Wright of the Congregation for the Clergy, all ecclesiastical censures against Father Feeney were removed. Subsequently the majority of the members of the community were reconciled with the church.

[S. M. CLARE]

FELJÓ, DIOGO ANTÔNIO

Priest and regent of Brazil; b. São Paulo, August 1784; d. São Paulo, Nov. 10, 1843. Ordained at São Paulo on Feb. 25, 1809, Feijó was a pious priest and diligent in his duties, always saying Mass and teaching catechism in his three benefices of Campinas, Itú, and São Paulo until 1821, and later, in the intervals in his political and administrative activity. In Itú he taught philosophy, out of which developed a study that was published posthumously by Eugênio Egas. There he also joined with some secular priests who were living a life of study and asceticism, including corporal penances. This association was dissolved under suspicion of Jansenism, although this was never proved.

Studies have been made of the composition of his library, of his two projects for the reform of the clergy, his polemic in favor of a married clergy, and, of his correspondence with the Holy See on the confirmation of a bishop whom he, as regent of the empire, had nominated. The studies demonstrate that, as a result of being chiefly self-taught and influenced by teachers who had been trained in the Luso-Brazilian studies reformed by the enlightened Marquis of Pombal, Feijó held some erroneous beliefs. His pragmatic tendencies as a liberal political reformer furthered such beliefs. He retracted them twice and died with the Last Sacraments.

He was buried in the crypt of the cathedral of São Paulo, where a monument was erected in his honor in 1913. Brazil venerates him as a Cincinnatus in a cassock because, as minister of justice (1831–32), after the tumult over the abdication of Pedro I, he saved Rio de Janeiro and the nation from anarchy without veering from a rule of law; and as regent of the empire (1835–37) he carried on a good administration. He was forced to resign as regent by a revolt in Rio Grande do Sul and by the opposition of the parliament, that, according to the constitution, he might have dissolved. Although already a paralytic, he fought in the unsuccessful liberal revolt of 1842. He served as a deputy to the Cortes of Lisbon in 1821, and to the general assembly from 1826 on; he was a senator at the time of his death.

Bibliography: E. EGAS, Diogo Antônio Feijó, 2 v. (São Paulo 1912). O. T. DE SOUSA, Diogo Antônio Feijó (Rio de Janeiro 1942). L. CASTANHO DE ALMEIDA, O sacerdote Diogo Antônio Feijó (Petropolis n.d.). L. G. NOVELLI, Feijó, un velho paulista (Rio de Janeiro 1963).

[L. CASTANHO]

FELBIGER, JOHANN IGNAZ VON

Augustinian canon regular and reformer in the fields of education and religious instruction; b. Gross-Glogau, Nov. 6, 1724; d. Pressburg, May 17, 1788. Felbiger became a Canon Regular of St. Augustine in 1746 and was engaged for a time in the reform of educational methods in the Catholic school system in Silesia and Austria. Becoming an abbot in Sagan, Silesia, in 1758, he undertook the reform of the schools attached to the chapters of collegiate churches in that district and in Prussia. In 1774 he was called by Maria Theresa to Vienna to introduce some needed improvements into the Austrian school system. In 1778, he was named chief director of the Austrian educational system, a position he held until after the death of Maria Theresa. He then was dismissed by Joseph II (1782), who was dissatisfied with Felbiger's adherence to strictly religious principles in education.

Felbiger's chief contributions to education were in the areas of organization and methodization. As an organizer, he is credited with the formation of a new educational system, the establishment of colleges for the training of teachers (a much needed contribution), the substitution of classroom education for the then customary tutorial system, and the establishment of religious instruction as a systematic subject for the schools. As a methodizer, he is noted for his introduction of the Sagan method of teaching, and for substituting the catechizing method for pure memorization. In collaboration with his prior, B. Strauch, he published three graded catechisms under the title Silesian Catechism (1766) that enjoyed wide popularity. The most important of his many publications was Methodenbuch für Lehrer der deutschen Schulen (1775).

Bibliography: N. A. WEBER, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., (New York 1907–14) 6:27–28. L. BOPP, Lexikon der Pädagogik, ed. H. ROMBACH (Freiburg 1962) 1179–80.

[E. LEWIS]

FELICI, PERICLE

Canonist, cardinal, and leading figure at the Second Vatican Council; b. Segni, Italy, Aug. 1, 1911; d. Foggia, Italy, Mar. 22, 1982. Felici studied philosophy and theology in Rome and was ordained to the priesthood on Oct. 28, 1933. His doctoral thesis, Summa psychanalyseos liniamenta eiusque compendiosa refutatio, was published in 1937. In 1938 Felici was awarded the doctorate utroque iure by the Pontifical University of the Lateran, after defending a brilliant dissertation De iure poenali interpretando.

Named rector of the Pontifical Institute of Jurisprudence at St. Apollinaris, for 10 years Felici served as spiritual director for the Pontifical Roman Seminary. In 1943 he began teaching fundamental moral theology at the Lateran University. His treatises on the virtues of justice and religion were greatly admired both for their content and elegant style. Felici was said to be one of the most gifted Latinists in modern times.

In 1947 Pope Pius XII named him an auditor on the Sacred Roman Rota. Pope John XXIII ordained Felici as Titular Archbishop of Samosata (1960), and appointed him to be Secretary General of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council (1962–65). The post required him not only to prepare extensive preliminary studies, but also to In 1967, after the Council, Felici presided over the commission for the restoration of the permanent diaconate. In that same year, Pope Paul VI named Felici pro-President of the Pontifical Commission for the revision of the Code of Canon Law. He became its president when raised to the rank of cardinal in June. The cardinal served on various Sacred Commission and Congregations: for the Doctrine of the Faith, for Bishops, for the Sacraments and Divine Worship, for the Causes of Saints, and as head of the Archives of the Vatican. He also served as President of the Court of Appeal at the Vatican, and President of the Commission for the interpretation of the decrees of Vatican Council II. Together with Cardinals VILLOT and Conway he presided over the First Synod of Bishops in 1967.

coordinate each meeting and present a synthesis of the

Between 1967 and 1969 Cardinal Felici published Freud e il peccato; Concilio vitam alere; Continuità, coerenze, fermezza di dottrina; and Il Vaticano II e il celibato sacerdotale. He likewise contributed articles to various reviews and to the Dizionario di Teologial Morale Casus Conscientiae by Palazzini-De Jorio. He was the founder of the review Communicationes and contributed frequently to L'Osservatore Romano.

On Oct. 21, 1981, Felici presented the integral text of the revised Code of Canon Law to the plenary session of the Cardinals. The following month Pope John Paul II entrusted him with the task of making some final alterations. Unfortunately Cardinal Felici's sudden and unexpected death prevented him from witnessing the Code's promulgation on Jan. 25, 1983.

[J. AUMANN]

FELICISSIMUS AND AGAPITUS, SS.

Deacon martyrs, d. Rome, 258. Nothing is known of their life and death except for that material contained in the poem composed in their honor by Pope DAMASUS I. They were deacons of the Roman Church martyred with Pope SIXTUS II, during the Valerian persecution, and buried in the cemetery of Praetextatus. GREGORY IV gave their bones to the Abbot Gozbald of Niederaltaich for his church at Isarhofen.

Feast: Aug. 7.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:124–142. H. LECLER-CQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CA-BROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–53) 5:1249–59. A. FERRUA, ed., Epigrammata Damasiana (Vatican City 1942) 152–156.

[R. K. POETZEL]

FELIX, MARCUS ANTONIUS

Roman procurator of Palestine (c. A.D. 53–60) who held St. Paul a prisoner at Caesarea. Felix was a freedman of Antonia, Emperor Claudius's mother, and a brother of Pallas, Claudius's favorite. He was first married to Drusilla, the granddaughter of Anthony and Cleopatra, and later to the daughter of Herod AGRIPPA I, also named Drusilla. She had been married for two months to Aziz, King of Emesa (ancient Hamath), before leaving him to marry Felix. Felix was made procurator (governor) of Palestine by Claudius in 52 or 53. His brother's favored position emboldened him to cruelty, lust, greed, and assassination, and saved him from punishment when Nero recalled him to Rome on a charge of maladministration (c. A.D. 60).

His misconduct fanned Jewish discontent and eventually led to the Jewish revolt of 66–70. Paul, after his arrest at Jerusalem, was taken to Caesarea in order to be protected against the fanatical Jews in Jerusalem and to stand trial before Felix, who already had "some accurate knowledge of the Way" (Acts 23.22–24.23). Some days later Paul terrified Felix and Drusilla by speaking to them on chastity and the judgment to come, but in hope of a bribe, Felix kept him in prison for two years, speaking to him often (23.24–26). When Felix was recalled to Rome, he left Paul in prison for the sake of currying favor with the Jews, although he admitted that he did not find him guilty of any crime. He was succeeded by Porcius FES-TUS.

Bibliography: R. VON ROHDEN, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 1.2 (1894) 2616–18. F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la Conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion Arabe, 2 v. (Études bibliques 1952) 1:463–468. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 769–770. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:70. E. HAENCHEN, Die Apostelgeschichte (12th ed. rev. 1959).

[F. J. BUCKLEY]

FELIX I, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: Jan. 5, 269 to Dec. 30, 274. The Liber pontificalis states that Felix was a Roman, son of Constantius, but this report is unreliable, as is the assertion that he instituted the celebration of Mass over the sepulchers and memorials of martyrs. This custom had been observed before Felix's time, and he continued the practice.

Early in Felix's reign a letter addressed to his predecessor, Pope DIONYSIUS, arrived in Rome from the synod of Antioch, which had deposed Bishop PAUL OF SAMOSATA for his heretical teachings on the Trinity. Felix probably sent a reply to this report. There is an important sidelight to this event. In 272 Paul appealed his case to the emperor Valerian (270-275) who referred the matter to the bishops in Italy, and particularly Rome. Apparently the matter did not reach Italy, but the emperor's attitude suggests that he was familiar with the Italian churches and was not hostile to them, although he later turned against the Christians. Scholars agree that the epistolary treatise on Christ addressed to Maximus of Alexandria and cited by St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (Apol. 6), the Council of EPHESUS (431), and St. VINCENT OF LÉRINS (Commonit. 2.30) is not Felix's letter, but a forgery perpetrated by the followers of APOLLINARIS OF LAODICEA.

The fourth-century Roman calendar of feasts maintained that Felix was buried in the bishops crypt in the catacomb of St. Callixtus. The Liber pontificalis erroneously calls him a martyr and claims that he was buried on the Via Aurelia, confusing him with a Roman martyr of the same name.

Feast: May 30.

Bibliography: EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 7.30, 32. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Aufängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 1:43, 84, 468. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, Md. 1950–) 2:242. E. FERGUSON, Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:426. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 23. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1995).

[E. G. WELTIN]

FELIX II, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: 355 to Nov. 22, 366. When the emperor Constantius II (337–361) exiled Pope Liberius (352–366) for opposing his Arianizing policies, the archdeacon Felix led the Roman clergy in proclaiming allegiance to their exiled bishop. The emperor pressured the clergy, who eventually gave way and elected Felix to be pope, probably in the imperial palace at Ravenna. The Romans resisted Felix, and during a visit to Rome in 357, Constantius found the people imploring him to reinstate Liberius. The emperor held on for another year but then decided that he could only maintain peace in the city by allowing Liberius to return-but not as the one pope; only as co-bishop with Felix. The Romans rejected this and drove Felix from the city. He attempted a return, only to be driven away again. He refused to resign and took up residence in the suburbs with a dwindling number of followers. The city prefect made no effort to depose him, preferring instead to keep the two claimants and their followers at a distance so that no trouble would break out. Felix died in 365, a year before Liberius, who avoided trouble by reconciling himself with Felix's clergy, one of whom may have been the future pope Damasus I (366–384).

This antipope had a posthumous influence on papal history, however. The Liber pontificalis gives him a favorable entry, and his name is entered in the list of popes, so that the next pope named Felix is styled Felix III or Felix II (III) (483–492), and the third of that name is Felix IV or Felix III (IV) (526–530). No legitimate pope subsequently took that name, although an antipope of the conciliar period styled himself Felix V (1439–1449).

Bibliography: H. JEDIN, ed., History of the Church (New York 1980) 2:249–250. J. N. D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 31–32. C. PIETRI, Roma Christiana (Rome 1976) 237–268. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1995).

[J. F. KELLY]

FELIX III (II), POPE, ST.

Pontificate: March 13, 483, to Feb. 25, or March 1, 492. Felix, successor to Simplicius and a member of the higher clergy closely allied with the senatorial class, was the son of the titular priest of Fasciola (SS. Nereo e Achilleo). The Praetorian Prefect Basil, acting in the name of King Odoacer, seems to have exerted an influence on his election; and Felix seems to be the first pope who officially announced his election to the emperor (Zeno). Seconded by the archdeacon Gelasius, he adopted a firm stand toward the peril of MONOPHYSITISM in the East. John Talaia, the orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria who fled when Acacius of Constantinople supported Peter Mongus, informed Felix of events in the East. Felix sent to Constantinople legates who demanded the ouster of the Monophysite patriarch. Acacius was summoned to Rome to explain his behavior, but instead of ceding he seems to have perjured himself, and the impression was given that Rome had approved the HENOTIKON. In a Roman council (July 28, 484) Felix excommunicated and deposed Acacius and suspended the legates. The sentence was published in Constantinople through a daring move on the part of the orthodox Akoimetoi monks, and Acacius ordered the pope's name removed from the diptychs.

The ACACIAN SCHISM, thus inaugurated, lasted for 35 years and was the first serious break between East and West. After the death of Acacius (489) and the accession of the Byzantine Emperor ANASTASIUS I (491) efforts were made to resolve the quarrel, but without success. While he did not excommunicate the emperor, who was responsible for imposing the Henotikon, Felix addressed him in a letter that was quite different in tone from the usual court communications and warned him "to learn divine things from those who are in charge of them, and not to desire to teach them." He asserted roundly the superiority of the Church in spiritual matters. This letter was in a sense "the opening gun fired in the long struggle between papacy and empire."

Felix also convoked a Lateran council (March 13, 487) that discussed the matter of the reconciliation of laymen, priests, and even bishops who had consented to be rebaptized by the Arians in the face of the fierce persecution of the African church by the VANDALS. Pope Felix was buried in the basilica of St. Paul, in the family crypt, the exact location of which is unknown.

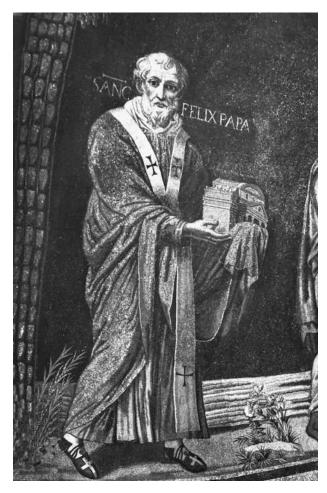

Feast: March 1.

Bibliography: Patrolgiae cursus completus, series latina, ed. A. HAMMAN 3:719–722, letters. A. THIEL, ed., Epistolae romanorum pontificum (Braunsberg 1868) 1:222–279. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–1958) 1:252–254; 3:87. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Anfängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 2:22–44, 749–752. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 13.1:1211. E. SCHWARTZ, Publizistische Sammlungen zum acacianischen Schisma (1934). O. BERTOLINI, Roma di fronte a Bisanzio e ai Longobardi (Bologna 1941) 31–39. T. G. JALLAND, The Church and the Papacy (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge 1944) 315–321. W. ULLMANN, The Growth of Papal Government in the Middle Ages (2d ed. New York 1962). R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei Papi (Rome 1957) 104. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 3d. ed. (Freiburg 1995).

[J. CHAPIN]

FELIX IV (III), POPE, ST.

Pontificate: July 12, 526 to Sept. 20 or 22, 530. The harshly treated JOHN I was succeeded as pope by the Roman priest Felix, who was imposed upon the Romans by the Arian Gothic King Theodoric. Shortly after the new pope's consecration, the king died and was succeeded by his grandson Athalaric, whose mother, Queen Amalasuntha, acted as regent during her son's minority. Since the queen was well disposed toward Catholics and Byzantium, the late king's policy of persecution was abandoned, and the Church once again enjoyed good relations with the Arian rulers of Italy. When the Roman clergy complained that the civil authorities had usurped their privileges, a royal edict confirmed the custom requiring that civil or criminal charges brought against the clergy be heard by the pope or by a court appointed by him. He appointed more than fifty priests in fifty months, apparently hoping to populate the Roman clergy with men sympathetic to his views.

Felix IV, detail of the much-restored 6th-century mosaic in the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian in Rome. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Felix sent St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES, at the latter's request, a series of chapters (capitula) culled from the Bible and the writings of the Fathers, particularly St. Augustine, defining the teaching of the Church on the subject of grace and free will. These canons, adopted by the Second Council of ORANGE (529) and subsequently approved by Pope BONIFACE II, acquired great dogmatic authority in the Church, and effectively put an end to the controversy over grace, and enshrined Augustine's views.

The adaptation for Christian worship of various buildings of the Roman Forum began under Felix. He received permission from Queen Amalasuntha to convert the Templum Sacrae Urbis and the adjoining small round temple, the so-called "Heroon Romuli," on the Via Sacra into the nave and atrium, respectively, of a church dedicated to the martyrs SS. COSMAS AND DAMIAN, who were associated with healing. Afraid that disorders might break out among factions in the Roman Church after his death, Felix resorted to the unusual procedure of designating his own successor by handing his pallium to the archdeacon Boniface. Word of the pope's choice was then sent to the court at Ravenna, but the Roman senate forbade any discussion of a successor to a living pope. Felix was buried in the portico of St. Peter's. A mosaic portrait in the apse of SS. Cosmas and Damian is the first contemporary papal likeness to have survived, but it has been so much altered by later hands that it does not have much historical value.

Feast: Jan. 30.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (2d ed. Streenbrugge 1961) 1686–90. Patrologia latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v., indexes 4 v. (Paris 1878–90) 65:11–23. Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE, v. 1–2 (Paris 1886–92), v. 3 (Paris 1958) 1:279–280; 3:91. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 13.1:1216. G. SCHWAIGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:68–69. R. U. MONTINI, Le tombe dei papi (Rome 1957). G. B. LADNER, Die Papstbildnisse (Vatican City 1941–). E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997) 1:426. H. JEDIN, History of the Church (New York, 1980) 2:626. J.N.D. KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 55–56. J. RICHARDS, Popes and Papacy the Early Middle Ages (London 1979) 120–125.

[J. CHAPIN]

FELIX V, ANTIPOPE

Pontificate: (sometimes referred to as the pope of Basel) Nov. 5, 1439–April 7, 1449. Duke Amadeus VIII of Savoy was born in Chambéry on Dec. 4, 1383, and died in Geneva on Jan. 7, 1451. After he took over the family's estates in 1391, he expanded them to include the Piedmont and the Ligurian coast. His success brought him more wealth and influence. In 1416 the German king Sigismund (1410–37, emp. 1433) raised Savoy's status to a duchy, and in 1422 the same king granted Amadeus the county of Geneva. Amadeus was an extremely devout layman, and in October 1434, after the deaths of his wife, Maria of Burgundy (1422), and eldest son (1431) he appointed his second son, Ludovico, as regent. He then retired to Ripaille on Lake Geneva. Here, he and five other knights formed the Order of St. Maurice, leading a semieremitical life according to a rule written by Amadeus.

Amadeus lived peacefully at Ripaille until a small group of dissenters from the Council of BASEL began negotiating with him to be their pope. The majority of Basel's representatives recognized Pope EUGENE IV (1431–47) and had moved with him to Ferrara/Florence. The group that approached Amadeus had deposed Eugene and now sought a replacement. After much hesitation Amadeus accepted, and was elected on Nov. 5, 1439. He abdicated as Duke of Savoy on Jan. 6, 1440, was ordained priest, and consecrated Felix V (July 24, 1440) by Cardinal d'Allamand of Aries, the only cardinal remaining in Basel. This immediately created a new schism because Eugene had already excommunicated Amadeus on March 23, 1440 at the Council of FLORENCE. Felix's reign was only supported by a scattered group of secondary powers: Savoy, Switzerland, the Dukes of Austria, Tyrol, and Bayern-München, along with the Count of Simmern, various smaller orders (e.g., the Teutonic Knights and the Carthusians), and a few universities with allegiance to the Council of Basel (Cracow, Erfurt, Leipzig, Vienna). The antipope was also not successful in naming cardinals; most of those he nominated turned him down. However, some agreed, including Aeneas Sylvinus Piccolomini, later PIUS II (1458-64), who was Felix's secretary for the first two years of his reign. Felix also had monetary problems. He argued with the Council of Basil over his right to claim various revenues and benefices as pope. In November 1442, Felix left Basel for Lausanne and then Geneva, where he could secure an income.

As the situation became more difficult for him and increasingly dangerous for the long-term security of his family's holdings, Felix looked for an amicable way to resign. Finally, through the mediation of Charles VII of France (1422–61), an arrangement was reached with Eugene's successor, NICHOLAS V (1447–55), whereby Felix rescinded all actions and pronouncements he had made as pope. In exchange, Nicholas named Amadeus cardinal bishop of St. Sabina and papal vicar-general (and legate) for Savoy and several surrounding dioceses (Basel, Strasburg, et al.). The last of the antipopes, Felix abdicated on April 7, 1449. He lived in Geneva for another three years. He died there on Jan. 7, 1451, and was buried at Ripaille, where he had founded the Order of St. Maurice.

Bibliography: Bollario de Felice V, 8 v. manuscript in the Archivio di Stato in Turin. R. DE MAULDE-LA-CLAVIÈRE, Concordat ou Transaction passée entre le duc Amédée VIII et le clergé de Savoie, 1433 (Paris 1881). A. ECKSTEIN, Zur Finanzlage Felix' V. und des Basler Konzils (Berlin 1912; Aalen 1973). G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1914) 2.1166-74. F. COGNASSO, Amadeo VIII (Turin 1930; Milan 1990). F. X. SEP-PELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts (Munich 1956) 4.295-305. F. COGNASso, Dizionario biografico degli Italiani (Rome 1960) 2.749-53. MARIE-JOSÉ, La Maison de Savoie: Amédée VIII. le duc qui devient pape (Paris 1962). S. EDMUNDS, "The Missals of Felix V and Early Savoyard Illumination," Art Bulletin 46 (1964) 127-41. M. CREIGHTON, A History of the Papacy from the Great Schism to the Sack of Rome, v. 1 (London 1897; New York 1969). E. MONGIANO, "Privilegi concessi all' antipapa Felix V," Rivista de storia del diritto italiano 52 (1979) 174-87. H. SCHNEIDER, "Die Halbbulle Felix' V: Zur Imitation kurialen Kanzleibrauchs in der Basler Konzilskanzlei," Annuarium historiae conciliorum 17 (1985) 457-63. J. N. D. KELLY, The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986) 243-44. J. HELMRATH, Das Basler Konzil, 1431-1449: Forschungsstand und Probleme (Cologne 1987) 153–57. E. MONGIANO, La cancelleria di un antipapa: il bollario de Felice V (Torino 1988). B. ANDENMATTEN, et al. Amédée VIII-Felix V, premier duc de Savoie et pape, 1383–1451: colloque international, Ripaille-Lausanne, 23–26 octobre 1990: études (Lausanne 1992).

[P. M. SAVAGE]

FELIX OF CANTALICE, ST.

Capuchin lay brother; b. Cantalice (Diocese of Cittaducale), Italy, May 18, 1515; d. Rome, May 18, 1587. Felix was the third of four sons born to devout peasant parents, Santi and Santa Porri. Until his 28th year he labored as a farmhand and shepherd. Felix led a remarkably innocent life, and spent much time in prayer, especially during his long vigils with the flocks. Finally, desirous of imitating the Desert Fathers, he sought admission to the newly formed branch of Friars Minor known as Capuchins.

In the novitiate of the order's Roman province at Anticoli, Felix (who retained his baptismal name) manifested the heroic spirit of charity, prayer, and penance that characterized his entire life despite temptations and a malignant fever that tried his vocation. He pronounced his solemn vows in the friary of Monte San Giovanni, May 18, 1544, and spent three more years in spiritual formation at Tivoli and Viterbo. In 1547 he was sent to the Convent of St. Bonaventure, Rome, where for the next 40 years he served his brethren as questor. This meant that every day Felix had to trudge the streets of Rome, stopping at homes and shops to collect in a sack the food offered by benefactors for St. Bonaventure's large community. The barefoot friar with the huge sack over his shoulder became a celebrity. Children flocked to him, hailed him with his own constant greeting, "Deo gratias." Along the way he converted hardened sinners, consoled sufferers, and fed the poor. The Romans were edified and amused by his accustomed outcry: "Make way for the Capuchins' ass!" One day (St.) Philip NERI deposited his great clerical hat on the brother's cowled head, and obliged him, as a test of humility, to go thus on his rounds. But Felix in return insisted that Philip drink publicly from a huge flagon of wine, to the great glee and merriment of the onlookers.

Felix enjoyed the friendship of other saints and eminent persons. (St.) Charles BORROMEO consulted him, unlettered though he was, on the rule of life to be given his Oblates. Another personal friend was SIXTUS V, who, on the day of Felix's death, urged the process of his beatification. Sixtus declared that he had witnessed 18 miracles wrought by the holy questor, and that he would testify to them personally. Consoled by heavenly visions, Felix died on the feast of his patron, which was also the anniversary of his own birth and religious profession. His body lies in the Capuchin Church of the Immaculate Conception, Rome, on the present Via Veneto. URBAN VIII beatified Felix on Oct. 1, 1625. With his canonization by CLEMENT XI, May 22, 1712, Felix of Cantalice became the first Capuchin saint. He is often depicted according to one of his visions, holding the Infant Jesus, whom the Blessed Virgin has placed in his arms.

Feast: May 18.

Bibliography: B. GITZEN, "St. Felix of Cantalice," Round Table of Franciscan Research, 10 (reprint 1949) 99–116. A. KERR, A Son of St. Francis (London 1900). Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 574–575. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURS-TON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:344–345. Acta Sanctorum May 4:202–292. W. DE PARIS, Catholicisme 4:1153–54. Analecta Ordinis Fratrum Minorum Cappuchinorum 29 (1913) 283–288.

[T. MACVICAR]

FELIX OF NICOSIA, BL.

Lay brother; b. Nicosia, Sicily, Nov. 5, 1715; d. there, May 31, 1787. His father, Philip Amoroso, a poor shoemaker, and his devout mother, Carmela, had him baptized Giacomo. He followed his father's trade until at 27 he entered the Capuchin Order at Mistretta, Oct. 1, 1743. He received the name Felix after St. Felix of Cantalice, the first Capuchin saint. During the 44 years of his religious life, Felix served his brethren in the duties of a lay brother, especially as a seeker of alms. He was renowned for his charity, especially toward the sick and prisoners, and for his austere penances, constant prayer, and his power of miracles, which earned him the title thaumaturgus. For 33 years he lived under a superior who considered it his role to sanctify Felix by subjecting him to relentless severity and fantastic humiliations, all of which he heroically endured. Felix was beatified by Leo XIII, Feb. 12, 1888; three years later his remains were transferred to the Cathedral of Nicosia.

Feast: June 1.

Bibliography: Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 578.

[T. MACVICAR]

FELIX OF NOLA, ST.

Third-century confessor; b. Nola, near Naples, Italy. Felix, born of a Syrian father, became a priest; he was imprisoned during a persecution, and later released. His reputation for holiness, working miracles, and attracting pilgrims is perpetuated by St. PAULINUS OF NOLA who chose Felix as his patron, erected a basilica in his honor, and wrote many poems (natalicia) eulogizing Felix on his feast day. Paulinus consulted St. AUGUSTINE on requests from people desiring to be buried near the tomb of Felix and received Augustine's De cura gerenda pro mortuis (c. 424) in response. Felix is invoked in finding lost articles, also as the avenger of perjury.

670

Feast: Jan. 14.

Bibliography: G. LUONGO, Lo specchio dell'agiografo: S. Felice. . . (Naples 1992). B. KÖTTING, Peregrinatio religiosa (Münster 1950). R. C. GOLDSCHMIDT, ed., Paulinus' Churches at Nola (Amsterdam 1940). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:80–81.

[A. C. RUSH]

FELIX OF VALOIS, ST.

Cofounder of the Trinitarians; b. 1127; d. 1212. Although with St. JOHN OF MATHA, he is claimed as cofounder of the TRINITARIANS, his very existence is doubtful. The earliest Trinitarians kept no archives, but in the 15th and 16th centuries certain writers of the order compiled fictitious records, which they claimed were based on documents. This earliest "history" was further elaborated. According to the account, Felix belonged to the House of Valois. He retired into the forest of Galeresse to live as a hermit and in 1197 he and John of Matha established the Trinitarian Order. He was never officially canonized, though his cult was confirmed in 1666.

Feast: Nov. 20.

Bibliography: J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 11:669–671. B. DE GAIFFIER, Analecta Bollandiana 73 (1955) 261. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:392–393. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme 4:1156–57.

[A. G. BIGGS]

FELTON, JOHN, BL.

Martyr; b. Surrey?, date unknown; d. London, Aug. 8, 1570. He was from an ancient and wealthy Norfolk family, and related by marriage to the Boleyn family. His wife had been lady in waiting to Mary Tudor and was a personal friend of Elizabeth I. The Feltons enjoyed the unusual privilege of keeping a private chaplain under license.

It was John Felton who affixed the declaratory act Regnans in Excelsis (by which St. Pius V excommunicated Elizabeth) to the gate of the Bishop of London's palace in May 1570. An immediate search was ordered and a copy of the bull was found in the rooms of a student at Lincoln's Inn. Under torture the young man confessed that he had received the copy from Felton and the latter was arrested. Well aware of what was happening, he made no attempt to escape, to resist, or to deny the charges but, rather, behaved as one looking forward to martyrdom. Despite torture, he admitted nothing other than the publishing of the bull, which, he maintained, was solely his responsibility. He was tried at the Guildhall in August 1570 and executed at St. Paul's Church Yard Aug. 8, 1570. Felton was beatified by Leo XIII in 1886.

Bibliography: S. LEE, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, 63 v. (London 1908) 6:1170–72. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891); English Catholics in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth (New York 1920).

[B. C. FISHER]

FELTON, THOMAS, BL.

Minim friar, martyr; b. 1567, Bermondsey Abbey, England; hanged at Isleworth, Aug. 28, 1588. Thomas, son of the martyr Bl. John FELTON, left his father's faith for a time to conform to the new religion. Repenting of his sin, he joined the Minims and was tonsured in 1583. He was arrested before being professed, but was tortured horribly and executed for being reconciled to the Church. Thomas was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FEMINISM

A global movement that draws attention to the many ways in which the full human dignity of women is diminished by patriarchy and its pervasive androcentricism, feminism advocates change on behalf of women's personal and corporate well-being. This general characterization of feminism is overly simplistic unless the history of the development of feminism is taken into account. This history is usually divided into three stages or "waves" that rose from changing perceptions of the root causes for women's diminishment and of the best strategies for remedying them. In the nineteenth century, when feminism emerged as a distinct movement, the major goal of feminists was to advocate recognition of women's intrinsic worth and to improve the position of women in the public sphere. This goal was revisited and broadened in the 1960s by feminists who promoted an equal-rights agenda. In both of these eras, the primary spokespersons and beneficiaries were white women. In the last quarter of the twentieth century, however, feminists broadened their goals and became more attuned to the distinctive effects of patriarchy and the complexity of women's experience, shaped by race, ethnicity, and class. During this same period feminists began to recognize that patriarchy not only affects women in destructive ways, it also dehumanizes men and exploits nonhuman nature. Therefore, feminists went beyond an exclusive focus on women's struggles for justice to include ending (a) the oppression of men who suffer under the burden of racism, ethnic prejudice, classism, and colonialism, and (b) the needless destruction by humans of Earth's many life forms.

Women's Rights demonstration, Cuzco, Paucartambo, Peru. (©Jeremy Horner/CORBIS)

The First Wave. Late-nineteenth-century movements for women's rights in the United States and Western Europe mark the historical beginnings of feminism. However, long before Hubertine Auclert coined the term in 1882, precursors such as Christine de Pizan (1405) and Mary Wollstonescraft (1792) drew attention to the secondary status of women in society, attributing it not to women's inferior nature, but to their lack of education. In the nineteenth century, educated women in the west began to organize movements to gain an expansion of rights, especially the right of married women to own property and the right of women to vote. Undertaken with religious fervor and commitment to moral reform, the specifics of the first wave of feminism varied from country to country. In many countries, however, the goal of women's suffrage was achieved: in New Zealand (1893), Finland (1906), Britain, Canada and Russia (1917) and the United States (1920). Once this very public goal of liberal democracy was attained, the first wave of feminism waned in the midst of the emergence of pressing world-wide political and economic concerns of the 1930s.

Believing that the secondary status of women would be remedied when women were given the same political rights as men, many women active in nineteenth and early-twentieth-century suffrage movements retained the belief that the proper place for a woman, especially for the married woman with children, was the home. This belief, basic to the "cult of true womanhood," enabled the early promoters of the first wave of feminism to attribute special status to women. It was women who ably cared for children and were the natural guardians of Christian moral values in the home. These same moral values would have a positive effect on the nation when women participated in political decision-making. Some women of this era challenged the "cult of true womanhood" point of view, arguing that it failed to take into account the ways in which women are treated as inferiors in their own homes. Among them was Elizabeth Cady Stanton who counted among her many accomplishments The Woman's Bible (1895).

The Second Wave. In the 1960s a second wave of feminism began with earnest in the United States in the context of the Civil Rights movement which championed the equality of blacks with whites. The second wave revived and broadened not only women's political struggle for equality of the first wave but also led to the development of feminist studies as a new academic discipline, impacting virtually every area of research, including Christian theology, spirituality, and ethics. During this period there were many forms of grass roots protests of women's oppression with organizations formed to orchestrate them (e.g., the National Organization of Women). Stressing that the oppression of women consists in their lack of political and economic equality with men, the women's liberation movement spread to western Europe and beyond in the 1970s. Women in the academy also became involved in the nascent women's liberation movement with many taking up the task of Simone de Beauvoir, author of The Second Sex (1949), to search for a suitable theory to explain women's subordination to men and women's own complicity in their own domination. Kate Millett (Sexual Politics, 1969, 1977) and Shulamith Firestone (The Dialectic of Sex, 1970, 1979) argued that the economic and political forms of domination given the most attention by women in the movement were relatively superficial when compared to patriarchy and its pervasive effects on all aspects of society.

Feminist theory of the 1970s focused its attention on the distinction between biologically determined sexual traits and culturally defined gender roles. Analysis of gender oppression of women paved the way for feminist scholars to recognize the wide ranging effects of patriarchy: the multifaceted social systems that legitimate and enforce the dominance of white, educated males in a society, giving the men in power responsibility for defining what is masculine and feminine. Although women, particularly well educated Euro-American and European women, at times display patterns of patriarchal domination, especially over children and persons of color, feminist theory attributes the organization of patriarchal societies to men who are its principal beneficiaries.

In second wave secular feminism it is possible to discern at least four major types of responses to patriarchy: liberal feminism, cultural feminism, radical feminism, and socialist feminism.

Liberal feminism has its roots in Enlightenment political theory and is more common in democratic countries. The defining characteristic of liberal feminism is the claim that social inequality in patriarchal societies, especially the lack of equal economic and political rights for women, subverts liberal democracy. True to its nineteenth-century roots, liberal feminism seeks to remove the barriers that deny women full legal, political, economic and civil rights as autonomous adults and to attain equal access for women to all facets of society: political, economic, social, and cultural. Since the 1960s, the liberal feminist struggle for the full equality of women with men has expressed itself in a variety of ways: advocating legislation that insures equity in pay for women; gaining equal access for women to leadership roles that have been traditionally closed to them, such as women holding political offices and being CEOs of major corporations; insuring the right to individual privacy, especially in regard to decisions about a woman's body, including the right of a woman to make choices in matters related to childbearing.

Cultural feminism, sometimes called "romantic feminism" or "reform feminism," focuses on the contributions and values traditionally associated with women, like nurturing and compassion, and the contribution women can make to the betterment of all realms of society. Cultural feminism is rooted in two premises that can be traced to the nineteenth-century "cult of true womanhood": the presumption of the moral superiority of women, associated with their maternal role, and the need for that moral superiority to make societal life more humane. Cultural feminists envision women as less ambitious and competitive, and more likely to be egalitarian, nurturing, and peacemaking than men. It manifests itself wherever complementarity in masculine and feminine roles rooted in sexual difference is emphasized.

At the opposite end of the spectrum from cultural feminism is radical or separatist feminism which rejects complementarity because it exalts the ideal of woman at the expense of real women and often means that women are expected to carry out male-defined roles. Further, for the radical feminist liberal feminism does not go far enough in its reforms. Liberal feminism accommodates itself to a male-defined liberal state which conceives of rights in terms of individual subjectivity. For the radical feminist, however, "the personal" is also always "the political." What makes this type of feminism radical is the belief that male domination of women is the root of all societal problems and the paradigm for all power relationships. Radical feminists actively seek to raise awareness of the pervasiveness of patriarchy in every facet of societal life and to transform that life through extensive reorganization. Radical feminist analysis is particularly critical of male violence toward women tolerated in patriarchal societies. In this analysis attention is focused on overtly violent acts such as rape, pornography, woman battering, war, and ecological destruction and overt violence in support of economic women's dependency and psychological inferiority. To counter these forms of patriarchal violence, some radical feminists advocate creating separatist "women-centered societies" which are, as far as possible, exclusively female. Only in such societies can women celebrate their womanhood free from male control. When women absent themselves from patriarchal society, then the power of patriarchy would be overthrown.

The final form of second wave feminism that traces its beginnings to the 1970s is socialist feminism which, in agreement with radical feminism, holds that patriarchy is a pervasive problem affecting all realms of human life. However, socialist feminists regard the movement among some radical feminists to create separate womencentered societies as unrealistic. Influenced by Marxist principles, socialist feminists locate women's oppression within the context of economic class struggle. They emphasize that one cannot ignore the impact of economic class divisions on women's oppression and perceived inferiority. Socialist feminists stress that in capitalist societies those who control the means of production also define the division of labor according to sex, race, and ethnicity. The patriarchy of capitalism manifests itself in the undervaluing of the work of women in child bearing and child rearing, because it is not considered economically productive. Socialist feminists strive to make women's unpaid labor politically and economically relevant. Although socialist feminists embrace Marxist economic analysis, they also fault it for failing to focus sufficiently on the pervasive effects of patriarchy. Socialism does not automatically liberate women. Although in socialist societies women are as free as men to work at any job outside the home and in this regard are man's equal, the vast majority of working women continue to do most of the domestic work in their homes.

The Third Wave. Most of the people who exemplify the characteristics associated with the four types of second-wave feminism are white women of European origin. Although analyzed as distinct types, traits associated with liberal, cultural, radical, and socialist feminisms are often combined by individual feminists. In the late 1970s and early 1980s the concerns of many feminists turned to issues related to female embodiment and the difference that social location makes in the struggles of women. Heretofore white feminists uncritically presumed to speak for all women. However, their universalizing positions failed to take into account the different experiences of women of color and how race, ethnicity and social class affected the conceptions of femininity and masculinity. In the United States the essentialism of European American women was critiqued by African American women. Among them was Audre Lorde, an author and poet, who in 1979 challenged white feminist scholars about their position of privilege and the accompanying neglect of the differences between themselves and black women and other women of color. She questioned how white women proposed to deal with the fact that women who clean their houses and tend their children while they attend conferences on feminist theory were, for the most part, poor women of color.

To distinguish themselves from white women's feminist agenda, African American women chose to name themselves "womanist," a word play on "womanish" (meaning a self-assertive African American girl) coined by Alice Walker (In Search of Our Mother's Garden, 1983). Other women of color are also naming themselves in ways that draw attention to the difference that their social location makes in their struggle to attain full human dignity. Some women of Latin American origins, for example, have adopted terms such as Latina or mujerista to name their distinct realities and struggles. Since 1975 a series of United Nations conferences on women have revealed as many differences as similarities among women of the First and Third Worlds, West and East, North and South. Therefore, "difference" has become a major analytical category in feminist thought to account for the stratifications of societies along class, race, ethnic group, and gender lines. Therefore, a logical step in the struggle against patriarchy was to incorporate concern for the men whose race and class locates them with women in the underclass of society. In addition to attention to these people-centered concerns, among third wave feminists are those who seek to end the exploitation of the earth and its living species. Ecofeminism draws attention to the connection between the domination of women and other forms of social domination, and the exploitation of nonhuman nature, arguing that human and nonhuman forms of domination are intimately connected and mutually reinforcing.

In sum, third wave feminism challenges the secondary status of women and of subjugated men on the grounds of their supposed "natural inferiority," while attending to the different culture specific ways in which this supposed inferiority is promoted. It is also reconstructive: (1) in the many ways it supports the full personhood and dignity of women and men by both respecting and bridging difference through solidarity, and (2) in its reenvisioning of the whole of reality in post-patriarchal ways, including human relationship with nonhuman nature.

Christianity and Feminism. In the assessment of some, including Christian religious leaders, feminism is incompatible with the Christian tradition. This judgment is often made in reaction to specific positions held by one or other of the feminist groups, such as the liberal feminists who champion reproductive rights of women and the radical feminists who advocate anti-male separatism. Although not necessarily explicitly religious in nature, the many feminisms that have emerged over the years have often been intertwined not only with religious and moral debates, but also with religious and moral commitments. Many Catholics (women and men) identify themselves as feminists today because they find themselves compelled to live their baptismal vocation by affirming their church's teachings on reverence for life and the inherent dignity of the human person, and to apply the prophetic message of Jesus Christ to all forms of patriarchal injustice, including gender discrimination, racial prejudice, colonial oppression and ecological destruction. A Christian feminist, in company with other feminists, advocates major structural change in all realms of society but does so guided by the Spirit who is the source of authentic wisdom and freeing truth.

See Also: ECOFEMINIST THEOLOGY; LATINA THEOLOGY; WOMANIST THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: S. DE BEAUVOIR, The Second Sex (1949; E.T. New York 1974). C. DE PIZAN, The Book of Ladies (1405; E.T. New York 1982). G. LERNER, The Creation of Patriarchy (New York 1986); The Creation of Feminist Consciousness (New York 1993). A. LORDE, Sister Outsider (Trumansburg, N.Y. 1984). M. RILEY, Transforming Feminism (Kansas City 1989). S. M. SCHNEIDERS, With Oil in Their Lamps: Faith, Feminism and the Future (New York 2000). A. WALKER, In Our Mother's Garden: Womanist Prose (New York 1983). M. WOLLSTONECRAFT, A Vindication of the Rights of Women (1792; London and Rutland, Vt., 1995).

[A. CLIFFORD]

FEMINIST HERMENEUTICS

Broadly speaking, feminist hermeneutics is the theory, art and practice of interpretation in the interest of women. It addresses a broad realm of things, ranging from the Bible and other theological texts to human acts and products, endeavoring to challenge and correct the effects of patriarchy on them. Feminist hermeneutics makes women's many varied experiences the major resource for the hermeneutic process, no matter what expression of human life is the focus. From a theological standpoint, feminist hermeneutics enables women to engage in the critical construction of religious meaning in ways that attend to the complex whole of women's experiences, especially experiences of struggle against dehumanization due to patriarchy. Where texts are concerned, feminist hermeneutics, like most forms of contemporary hermeneutics, holds that the meaning perceived in a text depends on the social setting in which it was produced as well as the social setting in which it is received and handed on. This "double hermeneutic" is evident in the strategies of interpretation employed by feminist theologians. Among the most common strategies used in the construction of religious meaning by feminist scholars are hermeneutics of suspicion, of remembrance and of proclamation.

A feminist hermeneutics of suspicion is first and foremost a consciousness-raising activity that requires one to take into account the influence of culturally determined gender roles and attitudes on whatever is being examined. It is concerned with bringing to consciousness the effects of male bias and ideology on understandings of the wider whole of meaning. A feminist hermeneutics of suspicion is concerned not only with critical engagement about what is said about women that may diminish their full human dignity, but also with the silences that presume women's secondary status by ignoring their experiences of the divine.

In the case of Christian feminist theology, the primary application of a feminist hermeneutics of suspicion has been focused on the Bible. The strategy is to interpret a biblical text and its Christian receptions, mindful that both have been largely shaped by male perspectives without attention to those of women. For example, when a biblical text is interpreted one begins by assuming that the text was affected by how the community for whom it was written was structured. Attention to the effects of patriarchal structures on biblical texts does not rule out God's self-communication through the biblical word and its interpretation, but it does explicitly recognize that God speaks to human beings in human fashion. It is reasonable to assume, therefore, that in patriarchal societies androcentricism which neglects women's perspectives affects not only how texts are written but also what is both emphasized and neglected in them. For example, texts like Paul's letters to the Corinthians cannot be understood merely from the dictionary definitions of the ancient Greek words and the mastery of the rules of grammar that he used. Statements such as "women should keep silent in the churches" (1 Cor 14:34) must be understood in relationship to the lives and cultural situation of the author and his audience. In the process the interpreter must also attend to the unique "givenenss" of her (his) hermeneutical situation that is affected by a tradition of reception that may transmit patriarchal presuppositions that are both overt and subtle.

On the positive side, a feminist hermeneutics of suspicion prepares the way for a feminist hermeneutics of remembrance that reconstructs historical texts from women's perspectives, restoring women to Christian history and women's religious history to Christianity. In some cases a hermeneutics of remembrance takes the form of the woman who diligently searched for the "sacred coin," which in this case is a "lost" tradition whose liberating potential for women has never been realized. In such cases not only biblical but also extra-biblical ancient texts are used. In other cases a hermeneutics of remembrance reclaims the suffering of women of the past and of all persons subjugated through enslavement, exile, and persecution, and recognizes them to be "dangerous memories" subversive to the status quo. Such memories are subversive because even in the midst of crises, women found in their relationship with God and/or Jesus Christ reasons for hope and motivation to be agents for liberation from oppressive sociopolitical establishments and religious institutions. These memories invite corrections to sexist perspectives while preserving the freeing truth of the "Good-news." They also challenge to solidarity with all persons past and present who struggle for human dignity. In short, a hermeneutics of remembrance neither negates the dehumanizing effects of patriarchy on biblical and Christian history nor does it give them the final word. The Bible and many extra-biblical sources, both ancient and modern, provide rich resources for constructing feminist theologies for our time that heal suffering, liberate from struggle and end economic exploitation.

By the end of the 20th century, feminist hermeneutical scholarship of suspicion and remembrance gained acceptance in the academy and in some grassroots Christian groups. Many Christian feminists recognize that the rich insights resulting from the application of a feminist hermeneutics of remembrance can easily be regarded to be mere theory unless a feminist hermeneutics of proclamation is used to enact these insights in the Christian community. A performative language, feminist hermeneutics of proclamation gives expression to religious meaning in ways oriented to praxis. Christian feminists recognize that liturgy (conceived here as any form of communal worship) is important to the faith life of Christians. Grounded in the conviction that the interaction and integration of the Bible and worship is the backbone of Christian experience and formation, a hermeneutics of proclamation promotes personal and communal participation, biblical imagination and emancipatory action. Integrating interpretations made possible by the application of feminist hermeneutics of suspicion and remembrance, a feminist hermeneutics of proclamation seeks to give the reconstructed divine Word flesh in liturgical ritual, storytelling, Bible-centered drama, dance, song, preaching and action in ways that are genuinely inclusive of the experiences of women. Whatever the form of the proclamation, the goal is to keep alive the freeing truth of the "Goodnews" of the full human dignity of all persons, especially women, and of the intrinsic value of all of creation.

Bibliography: C. CAMP, "Feminist Theological Hermeneutics," in Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Introduction, ed., E. SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA (New York 1993) 154–171. A. M. CLIFFORD, Introducing Feminist Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 2001). E. SCHÜSS-LER FIORENZA, Bread Not Stone: The Challenge of Feminist Biblical Scholarship (Boston 1984); But She Said: Feminist Practices of Biblical Interpretation (Boston 1992).

[A. CLIFFORD]

FEMINIST THEOLOGY

Feminist theology examines the meaning and implications of Christian faith from the perspective of a commitment to justice for females. An intellectual development with profound spiritual, psychological, and political implications, it shares with Christian theology in general the classic aim of "faith seeking understanding," but is distinguished by two additional features. The first is the assumption that standard theology has been skewed by longstanding sexism in the tradition. According to this analysis, both social arrangements (patriarchy) and ideological biases (androcentrism) have privileged males and failed to do justice to females; thus an intellectually and morally adequate theology requires significant correction of previous work in all theological disciplines. The second distinguishing feature of feminist theology is a methodological commitment to emphasizing women's experience, in all its complexity and diversity, while conducting the tasks of theological reflection. These tasks generally involve three things: critique of sexist interpretations and practices; retrieval of women's past contributions to ecclesial life and theological reflection; and, construction of more just and accurate interpretations and practices.

There are many definitions and types of feminism, and much controversy about the meanings and implications of the various types (see FEMINISM). Some definitions emphasize the participation of women as subjects of their own liberative process against the injustice of sexism, while others emphasize that human beings of both sexes are capable of recognizing and opposing this evil. These two types may be designated respectively as "woman-centered feminism" and "inclusive feminism." They are different, but each captures true aspects of the movement and has useful practical applications. Feminism is understood here inclusively as a position that involves a solid conviction of the equality of women and men, and a commitment to reform society and to reform the thought systems that legitimate the present social order. Those who espouse feminism, however, differ widely in their analyses of injustice, levels of commitment to liberating action, degrees of explicitness of commitment, and opinions regarding specific problems and their solutions.

This presentation first sketches the main lines of the historical development of feminist theology, and then describes some of its substantive contributions to various fields and topics traditionally explored by theologians. Although the emphasis is on U.S. Roman Catholicism, it is important to recognize that feminist theology has an inherently ecumenical dimension and has engaged the energies of many Catholic and Protestant (and some Orthodox) scholars throughout the world. It has an interfaith dimension as well, sharing concerns with analogous movements among feminist thinkers from Buddhist, Jewish, Muslim, and other traditions. From the beginning, Catholic women in the United States have played a leading role in the development of feminist theology, thanks to the insight and dedication of pioneering laywomen and vowed women religious, and to the intellectual heritage of Catholic women's colleges. These colleges prepared a climate for the practice and reception of feminist theology by establishing a tradition of women's higher learning and leadership unparalleled elsewhere. The exclusion of women from the sacrament of orders has also influenced some women to pursue academic theology, since female leadership has been possible in academic settings, whereas it has been limited in institutional and pastoral settings.

Launching a Movement: 1960-75. Prior to the Second Vatican Council, theology had functioned mainly to educate future priests, who studied Latin texts in classes that were often isolated from wider social and intellectual currents. Some lay persons took courses in neoscholastic philosophy and theology in Catholic colleges and universities, and religious sisters and brothers read some works related to their vocation, but only the clergy had access to doctoral programs that would prepare them for research and teaching at advanced levels in the field. An early exception to this rule was the graduate program inaugurated at St. Mary's College in Indiana by Sister Mary Madeleva Wolff, CSC, in 1944. Only in the 1960s did wider access to theological studies become available to women in the United States. At that time a "second wave" of feminism was underway, and papal and conciliar documents were beginning to affirm women's basic equality and political rights in ways that would have astonished those who decades earlier had campaigned for women's suffrage in the face of opposition from the hierarchy.

Several provisions of Vatican II's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et spes, or GS) were particularly influential in inspiring Catholic women to look critically at their own tradition and undertake theological studies in view of advancing the reforms initiated by the council. The first was the recognition that because of the essential equality of all persons (homines in the original Latin, a term that includes females in a manner that "men" does not), "any kind of social or cultural discrimination in basic personal rights on the grounds of sex . . . must be curbed and eradicated as incompatible with God's design'' (#29). Furthermore, the council also affirmed a more dynamic, historically conscious understanding of God's will for humanity than had previously held sway, with all that this implies in terms of openness to the genuinely new: "In each nation and social group there is a growing number of men and women who are conscious that they themselves are the architects and molders of their community's culture. All over the world the sense of autonomy and responsibility increases with effects of the greatest importance for the spiritual and moral maturity of humankind" (#55). Although GS itself retains much of the androcentrism of its time, and hardly anticipates the effects its ideas would have on feminist readers, passages such as the above marked a significant change and opened new vistas for progressive women and men.

Women were not specified in the crucial paragraph (#62), which voices the hope that "more of the laity will receive adequate theological formation and that some among them will dedicate themselves professionally to these studies and contribute to their advancement." The language does not rule out women's participation, and it was soon interpreted inclusively by various Catholic universities and seminaries. Moreover, by affirming intellectual freedom in theology, the final sentence of this paragraph states a principle that contributed both to male support of women's involvement in the discipline and also to the development of feminist positions by theologians: "But for the proper exercise of this role [of theologian], the faithful, both clerical and lay, should be accorded a lawful freedom of inquiry, of thought, and of expression, tempered by humility and courage in whatever branch of study they have specialized."

A number of Catholic women had anticipated this conciliar invitation and begun theological studies earlier in the United States or Europe, among whom Mary Daly, Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, and Rosemary Radford Ruether have been particularly influential. Schüssler Fiorenza's Der vergessene Partner, a pioneering study of possibilities for women in ministry, was published in 1964. Daly's highly influential The Church and the Second Sex appeared in 1968. Drawing on insights of feminist philosopher Simone de Beauvoir, Daly raised critical questions regarding Catholic doctrine and practice and offered some "modest proposals" for reform. Within several years Daly moved to a "postchristian" religious stance, and in 1973 she leveled a sustained critique of classical theology in Beyond God the Father. Meanwhile, many other Catholic women were moving through doctoral studies in various theological disciplines and beginning to publish early examples of feminist theology. These thinkers were influenced by biblical themes and traditional theology as well as by secular feminism and the works of "critical" and liberation theologians such as Jürgen Habermas, Gustavo Gutiérrez, and James Cone. By 1975, which had been declared International Women's Year by the United Nations, Ruether and Schüssler Fiorenza had published works that began to enlarge the feminist theological agenda by making connections with concerns about racism, anti-Semitism, colonialism, economic injustice, and ecological wellbeing; all of which they argued were the effects of patriarchy. The early phase in the U.S. feminist theological movement culminated in two historic events that took place in 1975. First, in late November more than 1,200 persons gathered in Detroit for the first national meeting of the Women's Ordination Conference (WOC), where for the first time a significant number of female theologians joined with male colleagues to probe a question of vital importance to the Church. After this historic meeting WOC sponsored a series of national events, including one to mark its twenty-fifth anniversary in Milwaukee in 2000, and helped to plan an international conference on women's ordination, Women's Ordination Worldwide, held in Dublin, Ireland, in 2001. Second, in December 1975, the Jesuit journal, Theological Studies, published a special issue on "Women: New Dimensions," which carried articles by women who would later contribute major works of feminist theology (reprinted in Burghardt 1977).

Gaining Ground: 1975-90. Organizational activities and feminist theological scholarship intensified in the second stage of the movement. North American and European women gained institutional power in colleges, universities, and seminaries, as well as in professional organizations and academic societies. Meanwhile women elsewhere began to claim a voice within the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians (EATWOT), which had been founded in 1976. During an EATWOT meeting in Geneva in 1983, attended also by some theologians from Europe and the United States, feminists established a Women's Commission to address the issues of sexism in male liberation theology and racism in the white women's movement. In 1986 the European Society of Women in Theological Research (ESWTR) was established; it meets biennially. Since 1993 ESWTR has published a yearbook of research and reviews; its first issue provided historical information on European feminist theology, including attention to the contributions of such leading scholars as Kari Børresen (Norway), Catharina Halkes (Netherlands), and Mary Grey (Britain).

Increasingly, feminist theologians were contributing full-length books. In 1983 Ruether published the first 'systematic' work of feminist theology, Sexism and God-Talk, which probed topics ranging from method to eschatology, and Schüssler Fiorenza published a feminist theological reconstruction of early Christianity, In Memory of Her. Both authors were among a number of feminist theologians who spoke at the first of three national "women-church" gatherings organized by Catholic groups that took place first in Chicago (1983), to be followed by assemblies in Cincinnati (1987) and Albuquerque (1993). These gatherings were notable for efforts to provide program information in Spanish as well as English. The first bilingual work of feminist theology appeared in 1988, Ada María Isasi-Díaz and Yolanda Tarango's Hispanic Women: Prophetic Voice in the Church.

Meanwhile, feminist theologians were being tenured in colleges and universities and elected to leadership in professional societies. Courses in women's history and feminist theology entered the curriculum, and in 1985 the Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion was launched, coedited by Schüssler Fiorenza and Jewish scholar Judith Plaskow. That year Schüssler Fiorenza also coedited, with Mary Collins, the first issue of what became a regular series of the international journal Concilium devoted to feminist theology. Subsequent volumes have been coedited by Anne E. Carr, M. Shawn Copeland, and Mary John Mananzan, with articles from these journals collected in The Power of Naming (Schüssler Fiorenza 1996). Carr's volume, Transforming Grace: Christian Tradition and Women's Experience, probed doctrines of God and Christ as well as questions of theological method, women's ordination, and spirituality. In 1990 the establishment of a women's seminar in constructive theology as a regular part of the annual meeting of the Catholic Theological Society of America marked the solid gains achieved by feminist theologians in North America. Although still overwhelmingly a movement of white women, feminist theology had deepened its recognition of the interstructured nature of oppression, acknowledged the problem of false generalizations about women's experience, and enlarged the critique of patriarchy to include heterosexism as well as sexism, racism, classism, and mistreatment of the environment.

Development and Diversification: Feminist Theologies since 1990. The last decade of the 20th century saw the publication of many influential books and articles in feminist theology, often focused and constructive efforts to advance discussion in particular fields of theological inquiry. In a number of instances white women exhibited a more intense self-critique and greater attention to diversity within the movement, while theology published by women of color voiced concerns of cultural, racial, economic, and gender injustice with a new urgency and power.

Copeland, the first African American woman to give a plenary paper at a national meeting of theologians, set a new agenda in her address to the College Theology Society in 1994. "Mere rhetoric" of solidarity is insufficient, she argued; effective solidarity requires a deepseated conversion, which involves different things for women from different social locations. Although white feminist theologians had acknowledged the links between racism, classism, and sexism for years, they had often written of "women" at a level of generality that glossed over significant differences, and had failed to attend to the voices of black, red, yellow, and brown women. By the 1990s some theologians of color had developed particular designations for their writings in order to distinguish them from white feminist theology: womanist (African American), Latina/mujerista, and minjung (Korean). Other theologians of color retained the designation "feminist" and at the same time drew explicitly on their own heritages. The influence of the writings of both groups of women of color on the works of white feminists gives promise of a future when preoccupation with discussions of diversity will give way to sustained and effective collaboration on matters of concern to all (see LATINA THEOLOGY; WOMANIST THEOLOGY).

Contributions of Feminist Theologies to Theological Disciplines. By definition feminist theologies seek to overcome injustice, and thus there is an ethical dimension prominent in all of this work. Women theologians with specialized training in other traditional fields of theological studies have made notable contributions to the following areas.

Theological Method. Ruether (1983), Carr (1988), Isasi-Díaz (1988, 1992), and Copeland (1996, 1998) are among those who deal extensively with questions of theological method, and they all regard attention to women's diverse experiences and the employment of sources beyond classical Christian texts as important for progress in the discipline. Isasi-Díaz is distinctive in her efforts to bring the voices of U.S. Latinas from various cultural background directly into theological discussions, employing substantial quotations from these "grass roots" Christians in her writings. Concerning the norm for judging the adequacy of theological work, there has been some movement beyond a general insistence that good theology must promote women's human dignity to a more precise claim that good theology leads to the "flourishing of poor women of color in violent situations" (Johnson 1993). The overall task of Christian feminist theologies has been aptly described as that of correlating "the central and liberating themes of biblical and Christian tradition with the experience of women in the contemporary situation" (Carr 1988).

Biblical Studies, Hermeneutics, and History. Classical Christian texts are of crucial importance to scholars seeking justice for women in the tradition, and considerable work has been done to bring out the liberating potential buried beneath patriarchal records and interpretations of revelation. Whether this involves retrieving lost images and stories, probing possibilities of women's authorship and leadership, criticizing oppressive material, or reading between the lines to discover glimpses of equality in earlier societies, the project of feminist biblical criticism is both technically specialized and wide-ranging in its implications. Likewise, important historical work has been done to correct the record of women's activities, ideas, and influence in the centuries since biblical times, which casts new light on the development of doctrine as well as that of church law and practices. Scholars have made available newly interpreted writings of women from "patristic" and medieval times, and have invited reconsideration of the significance of female mystics and monastic movements such as the Beguines, and various other expressions of female creativity and leadership (Schmitt and Kulzer 1006, Kirk 1008, Madigen 1008) other expressions of female creativity and leadership (Schmitt and Kulzer 1996, Kirk 1998, Madigan 1998). They have likewise documented and probed the causes of misogyny and patriarchal efforts to control women whether by doctrine, law, or violence—and challenged contemporary Christians to overcome these longstanding tendencies to sin. This critical revisionist history carries implications for all areas of Church doctrine and practice, and is particularly powerful when conducted by scholars who attend to the combined effects of racism, colonialism, and sexism. (See FEMINIST HERMENEUTICS; WOMEN IN THE BIBLE.)

Doctrine of God. At the heart of theology is the mystery of God, which transcends the human capacity for symbolizing and yet requires symbolic expression. Because the symbol of God functions either to oppress or to liberate, feminist theologians have done extensive work to critique the unjust and idolatrous tendency to think that God is male. Strategies for calling attention to the problem, which is so ingrained that most Christians require some reminder that all speech about God is analogous and incapable of conveying the Mystery, have included referring to the Deity as "God/ess" (Ruether 1983), "G*d," (Schüssler Fiorenza 1994), and "God . . . She'' (Johnson 1993). Strategies for expanding the metaphors beyond the overused "Father" have involved personal images (for example, "Mother," "Lover," "Friend"), the biblical "Sophia" (Divine Wisdom), and other terms such as "Matrix," "Creator," "Liberator," and "Source of All Being," as well as such biblical images as "rock," "fountain," "midwife," and "coin seeker." Johnson's comprehensive study, She Who Is (1983) considers each person of the Trinity in light of the female-associated term "Sophia," and probes how these "dense symbols" convey Her relational, living, and compassionate nature.

Doctrine of Creation and Eschatology. Feminist theologies have stressed the goodness of creation and sought to overcome false dualisms that would value spirit at the expense of matter. They have also placed great emphasis on ecology (see ECOFEMINISM AND ECOFEMINIST THEOLO-GY). The central theme of Jesus' teaching, the Reign of God, has been understood as a reality affecting the present world, summoning and empowering human efforts to bring about a future of right relationships among all creatures of Earth. Various ways of overcoming patriarchal associations with traditional imagery of "Kingdom" have been suggested, including the mujerista neologism "Kin-dom" (Isasi-Díaz 1996). While characterized by a strong ecological and political emphasis, feminist eschatology also recognizes a transcendent, mysterious dimension to the ultimate future (Ruether 1992). Hope for divine healing of the broken bones of history's victims, especially poor women of color, should impel Christians to the praxis of solidarity in the here-and-now (Copeland 1998).

Theological Anthropology. A faulty understanding of human nature is basic to the racism and sexism that feminist theologies seek to overcome. Although mainstream modern theology has rejected classical notions that males from dominant groups enjoy a higher degree of rationality, and are thus created more closely in the "image of God" than females and subordinated males, vestiges of racism and misogyny continue to cause great harm. White feminists initially laid most stress on overcoming stereotypes responsible for sexist attitudes and practices, such as the notions that women are "property," "temptresses," "irrational," of a different and lesser nature thanmen. Instead of blaming Eve for "original sin," they named patriarchy as a primordial sinful system, and argued about how best to articulate an anthropology that did justice to the equality of females and males while also respecting human embodiment and diversity of experience. There has been widespread agreement that notions of "gender complementarity," which tend to idealize females while assigning them "special" roles, actually function to limit women to men's ideas of their worth and purpose and fail to respect their essential autonomy and dignity. Contributions by theologians of color have sharpened the critique in recent years, and led to further theorizing on the theological significance of difference and the complexity of women's experience (Graff 1996). "La vida cotidiana" ("everyday life") is a newly recognized resource for understanding and praxis (Isasi-Díaz 1996, Aquino 1998), and countering systemic violence against women and children must become the focal purpose of anthropological reflection (Copeland 1998).

Christology. The significance of Christ and the meaning of salvation have been addressed in various ways by feminist scholars. Recognizing that much previous Christology has contributed to injustice to women, and yet disagreeing with Daly's view that male dominance and "Christolatry" are essential to the tradition, white theologians have emphasized the prophetic role taken by Jesus in his day (Schüssler Fiorenza 1994) and investigated the ways that gender and redemption have been related in Christian history (Ruether 1998). They have insisted that although the maleness of Jesus is a historical fact, this particularity is transcended in the identity of the Christ and has neither theological nor normative status (Schneiders 1986, Johnson 1992). Christologies by feminists of color have sought to liberate Jesus from the racism and imperialism of dominant theologies and stressed the identification of the historical Jesus with the poor and marginalized (Copeland 1996).

Ecclesiology, Mariology, and Sacraments. While criticizing the oppressive ways in which church structures have functioned, feminist theologians have maintained that Christianity began as a "discipleship of equals" (Schüssler Fiorenza 1983); since a "spirit-filled community" has long existed in tension with the patriarchal historical institution, the contemporary "womenchurch" movement should seek its ideals without being ultimately separatist (Ruether 1985). Emphasis on an inclusive solidarity that affirms difference within the community as it struggles for justice (Isasi-Díaz 1993) is widely shared in feminist ecclesiologies. Work on embodiment and sacraments has deepened thought on marriage, ministry, Eucharist, and worship, and kept the issue of women's ordination under discussion (Hilkert 1997, Byrne 1998, Ross 1998, Walton 2000). Feminist scholars have also developed new interpretations of Mary (Gebara and Bingemer 1989, Rodriguez 1994, Cunneen 1996) and the saints (Johnson 1998).

Ethics and Moral Theology. The implications of feminist theologies for the way Christians should live have been pondered in many works of feminist ethics, which are now influencing discussions of moral theology more generally (Curran et al. 1996). Among topics of particular concern have been agency (Isasi-Díaz 1993), commitment (Farley 1986), conscience and authority (Patrick 1996), ecology (Ruether 1992, Gebara 1999), economics and work (Andolsen 1989, 1998, Guider 1995), family (Cahill 2000), friendship (Hunt 1991), natural law (Traina 1999), power (Hinze 1995), sexuality and gender (Gudorf 1994, Cahill 1996, Jung 2001), and struggle and violence (Isasi-Díaz 1993, Mananzan 1996). Feminist theologians have brought their commitment to justice for females to many other topics in biomedical and social ethics, ranging from concerns about reproductive issues (Ryan 2001) to matters of war and peace (Cahill 1994).

Spirituality. Because all feminist theologies invite believers to a deep process of conversion, there has been considerable attention to topics in spirituality, which is a concept of wide appeal both within and beyond the churches today. Joann Wolski Conn has dealt with psychological aspects of spiritual growth (1989) and Shawn Madigan (1998) has gathered historically important spiritual writings by women. The lecture series sponsored by St. Mary's College in honor of Sister Madeleva Wolff has resulted in the publication of a new title in women's spirituality annually since 1985; recent overviews from African American, U.S. Latina, and European American perspectives have been contributed by Hayes (1995), Rodriguez (1996), and Schneiders (2000).

That feminist theology as a discipline has come of age is now evident. There is a substantial number of scholarly books by recognized theologians, as well as many introductory texts designed for classroom use. The Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion has been published in the United States since 1985, and Feminist Theology in Great Britain since 1992. That a dictionary conveying the complexity of feminist theologies (Russell and Clarkson 1996) contains extensive entries under headings that include African, Asian, European, Latin American, North American, Pacific Island, and South Asian, testifies to the global extent of this movement. The challenge now is for theologians from diverse backgrounds to carry forward their critical and constructive work, gain a wider hearing beyond the academic community, and develop an effective solidarity among themselves and among believers more generally, for the sake of building a just and ecologically responsible society.

Bibliography: B. ANDOLSEN, Daughters of Jefferson, Daughters of Bookblacks: Racism and American Feminism (Macon, Ga. 1986). M. P. AQUINO, Our Cry for Life: Feminist Theology from Latin America (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1993); "Latin American Feminist Theology," Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion 14 (1998) 89-107. W. BURGHARDT, ed., Woman: New Dimensions (New York 1977). L. BYRNE, Woman at the Altar (New York 1998). L. S. CAHILL, Sex, Gender and Christian Ethics (Cambridge 1996); Family: A Christian Social Perspective (Minneapolis 2000). D. L. CAR-MODY, Christian Feminist Theology (Oxford 1995). A. E. CARR, Transforming Grace: Christian Tradition and Women's Experience (San Francisco 1988). A. CLIFFORD, Introducing Feminist Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 2001). R. COLL, Christianity and Feminism in Conversation (Mystic, Conn. 1994). J. W. CONN, Spirituality and Personal Maturity (New York 1989). M. S. COPELAND, "The New Anthropological Subject at the Heart of the Mystical Body of Christ," Catholic Theological Society of America. Proceedings 53 (1998) 25-47; "Theologies, Contemporary," in Dictionary of Feminist Theologies, ed. L. RUSSELL and J. S. CLARKSON (Louisville 1996) 283-287. S. CUNNEEN, In Search of Mary: The Woman and the Symbol (New York 1996). M. DALY, Beyond God the Father (Boston 1973), V. FABELLA and M. A. ODUYOYE, eds., With Passion and Compassion: Third World Women Doing Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1988). V. FABELLA and S. PARK, eds., We Dare to Dream: Doing Theology as Asian Women (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1990). V. FABELLA and R. S. SUGIRTHARAJAH, eds., Dictionary of Third World Theologies (Maryknoll, N.Y. 2000). A. M. GARDINER, ed., Women and Catholic Priesthood (New York 1976). I. GEBARA and M. C. BINGEMER, Mary: Mother of God, Mother of the Poor (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1989). A. GRAFF, ed., In the Embrace of God: Feminist Approaches to Theological Anthropology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1995). C. GUDORF, Body, Sex, and Pleasure: Reconstructing Christian Sexual Ethics (Cleveland 1994). M. GUIDER, Daughters of Rahab (Minneapolis 1995). D. HAYES, Hagar's Daughters: Womanist Ways of Being in the World (New York 1995). M. A. HINSDALE and P. KAMINISKI, eds., Women and Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1995). C. F. HINZE, Comprehending Power in Christian Social Ethics (New York 1995). M. HUNT, Fierce Tenderness: A Feminist Theology of Friendship (New York 1991). A. M. ISASI-DÍAZ, En la Lucha: A Hispanic Women's Liberation Theology (Minneapolis 1993); Mujerista Theology: A Theology for the Twenty-First Century (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1996). A. M. ISASI-DÍAZ and Y. TARANGO, Hispanic Women: Prophetic Voice in the Church (San Francisco 1988). U. KING, ed., Feminist Theology from the Third World (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1994). P. KIRK, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz (New York 1998). E. JOHNSON, She Who Is: The Mystery of God in Feminist Theological Discourse (New York 1992). P. B. JUNG, with J. A. CORAY, eds., Sexual Diversity and Catholicism (Collegeville, Minn. 2001). C. LACUGNA, ed., Freeing Theology: The Essentials of Theology in Feminist Perspective (San Francisco 1993). S. MADIGAN, ed., Mystics, Visionaries, and Prophets: A Historical Anthology of Women's Spiritual Writings (Minneapolis 1998). M. J. MANANZAN et al., eds., Women Struggling against Violence: A Spirituality for Life (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1996). A. E. PATRICK, Liberating Conscience: Feminist Explorations in Catholic Moral Theology (New York 1996); "Feminist Ethics in the New Millennium," in Ethical Dilemmas in the New Millennium, ed. F. EIGO, v. 1 (Villanova, Pa. 2000). S. ROSS, Extravagant Affections: A Feminist Sacramental Theology (New York 1998). L. RUSSELL and J. S. CLARKSON, eds., Dictionary of Feminist Theologies (Louisville 1996). R. R. RUETHER, Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology (Boston 1983); Women-Church (San Francisco 1985); Gaia and God: An Ecofeminist Theology of Earth Healing (San Francisco 1992); Women and Redemption: A Theological History (Minneapolis 1998). S. SCHNEIDERS, Women and the Word (New York 1986); Beyond Patching: Faith and Feminism in the Catholic Church (New York 1991); With Oil in Their Lamps: Faith, Feminism, and the Future (New York 2000). E. SCHÜSSLER FIORENZA, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York 1983); Discipleship of Equals: A Critical Feminist Ekklesia-Logy of Liberation (New York 1993); Jesus: Miriam's Child, Sophia's Prophet (New York 1994). C. L. H. TRAINA, Feminist Ethics and Natural Law (Washington, D.C. 1999). J. WALTON, Feminist Liturgy: A Matter of Justice (Collegeville, Minn. 2000).

[A. E. PATRICK]

FENEBERG, JOHANN MICHAEL

Priest and mystic; b. Marktoberdorf (Allgäu), Bavaria, Feb. 9, 1751; d. Vöhringen, Bavaria, Oct. 12, 1812. After studying at Kaufbeuren and the Jesuit Gymnasium at Augsburg, Feneberg was admitted into the Jesuit novitiate at Landsberg a Lech, Bavaria. After the suppression of the Society of Jesus in 1773, he continued his studies toward the priesthood and was ordained in 1775. He taught humanities at the Gymnasium of St. Paul in Regensburg, and at Dillingen, at which time he wrote a plan for studies that caused controversy (Lehrplan, Dillingen 1789). In 1793 he, along with some other professors, was removed from teaching on suspicion of Illuminist tendencies. He was given the parish of Seeg (Allgäu), which he administered with great success. His association with the Pietist Martin Boos, who stayed with Feneberg at Seeg for a year, revived suspicions of unorthodox mysticism. Boos tried to convert Feneberg and his assistants, Christof Schmid and Xaver Bayer, to his doctrine of love of God without works. After an ecclesiastical interrogation at Augsburg in August 1797, Feneberg and his assistants were allowed to return to Seeg. In 1805 he exchanged Seeg for the parish of Vöhringen where he translated the New Testament later edited by M. Wittmann (Regensburg 1808).

François de Salignac de la Mothe Fénelon. (©Leonard de Selva/ CORBIS)

Bibliography: F. W. BODEMANN, Leben J.M. Fenebergs (Bielefeld 1856). J. M. SAILER, Aus Fenebergs Leben (Munich 1814). J. A. FISCHER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:75, bibliog.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

FÉNELON, FRANÇOIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTHE

Educator, theologian, archbishop; b. in the château de Fénelon, near Sarlat in the region of Périgord, Gascony, Aug. 6, 1651; d. Cambrai, Jan. 7, 1715. Fénelon was the thirteenth child of a father whose noble ancestry went back to the tenth century. Because of poor health, he received his early education at home, then at the Jesuit college in Cahors (1663–65); he left his native province in 1666 to study in Paris at the College of Le Plessis. In 1672 or 1673 he entered the Paris Seminary of Saint-Sulpice. Ordained at about 24, he served in the parish of Saint-Sulpice (1675–78), laying aside his dream of missionary work in Greece. In 1678 Fénelon was appointed superior of the Convent of New Catholics in Paris, a post he occupied (with some interruptions) until 1689. The purpose of the institution was to convert and strengthen in their new faith young girls from Protestant families. Fénelon headed two preaching missions (December 1685 to July 1686, and May to July 1687) in Saintonge and Aunis. These represented efforts to convert the Protestants disturbed by the recent revocation of the Edict of NANTES. Fénelon could not tolerate heterodox religious beliefs, but he preferred gentle persuasion to persecution.

Early Writings. In 1687 Fénelon published his first important work, Traité de l'Education des filles, composed at the request of his friends, the Duc and Duchesse de Beauvilliers, for the benefit of their daughters, and partially embodying the results of his pedagogical experiences at the Convent of New Catholics. Although on the whole conservative, the book was a pioneering work. The dignity of women and the necessity of molding young girls for adulthood are the underlying principles. He criticized the harsh methods of his day, preferring a subtly persuasive and engaging technique proportioned to the mentality of the learner. The pupil should not be too conscious of being taught, and reason should as much as possible supplant mere discipline.

By 1687 Fénelon had powerful friends: BOSSUET, the Beauvilliers (the Duc was soon to be made guardian of the Duc de Bourgogne, grandson of the King and second in line to the succession), and the Duc and Duchesse de Chevreuse. He was introduced to Mme. de Maintenon and on Oct. 4, 1688, met Mme. GUYON.

In August 1689, at the suggestion of Mme. de Maintenon and of Beauvilliers, the King chose Fénelon as tutor of his grandson. To this period (1689-99) we owe the Fables, the Dialogues des morts, and the novel Télémaque, most of which was not published until later. Fénelon created these as a series of texts to meet the different stages in the intellectual and moral development of his royal charge: the first book for the child, the second for the adolescent, the third for the boy on the threshold of manhood. The two latter works are courses in the art of ruling well; the central theme is that one must first be a good man in order to be a great king; concrete examples point up lessons in statesmanship and moral idealism. In the novel the examples are adapted from the legends of antiquity, whereas in the dialogues historical figures are the types. Fénelon's method-the inculcation of truth through enjoyment-proved itself in this instance: the spoiled child, subject to tantrums, became a serious, pious boy with admirable self-control. In 1693 Fénelon was elected to the French Academy; in 1695 he was named to the archbishopric of Cambrai and consecrated by Bossuet at Versailles.

The Semiguietism Affair. Ever eager to enrich his spiritual life, Fénelon had been attracted to the teaching of Mme. Guyon. Although not approving the more extreme forms of her thought and charitably discounting her eccentricities and often exaggerated expressions, he thought that she had discovered a method of prayer well suited to bring the individual near to God, and that indeed her doctrine was not too far removed from that of the mystical saints and doctors accepted by the Church. It soon began to be bruited about that the doctrine skirted the line between orthodoxy and heresy, and was close to the QUIETISM recently condemned by Rome. Mme. Guyon's writings were examined by Church authorities (1694–95), but Fénelon could not agree with Bossuet's reaction. The appearance, at the beginning of 1697, of Fénelon's L'Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la vie intérieure and, a month later, of Bossuet's interpretation of the doctrine launched the unfortunate polemic between the two.

As a result, Fénelon's favor at court began to decline: Mme. de Maintenon turned against him and the King banished him to Cambrai (1697). He was officially deprived of the title of tutor in January 1699. On March 12 of that fatal year, the papal brief Cum alias condemned 23 propositions found in Fénelon's work, as seeming to favor quietism. Fénelon himself had insisted that Rome scrutinize his book, and after months of study the consultors had been equally divided; a majority was secured later. In April the first volume of Télémaque appeared in an unauthorized edition, and readers saw in it a veiled criticism of the King and his government. Although Fénelon denied this, the event put the seal on his official disgrace at court, and he spent the remaining years of his life in his diocese.

Despite the loss of royal favor, Fénelon remained greatly influential. At Cambrai he maintained the dignity of his office while he himself lived very simply. He was accessible to all, heard the confessions of the most humble parishoners, and frequently made inspection tours of his large diocese. He corresponded with the Duc de Bourgogne and met him on different occasions. When war swept over his diocese, he succored the enemy wounded as well as the French. Finally, he used the rich revenues of his diocese so well that upon his death he left neither debts nor notable assets. A fever, following a carriage accident in November 1714, brought his noble life to an end two months later.

Social Thought. For an understanding of Fénelon's political thinking, the chief documents are, in addition to his dialogues and novel, the bold Lettre à Louis XIV

(from internal evidence, written c. 1693 or 1694, but very likely never read by the King), Examen de conscience sur les devoirs de la royauté (1697 or after), Discours pour le sacre de l'Electeur de Cologne (1707), and Tables de Chaulnes (1711). The last work was the result of discussions with the Duc de Chevreuse, in which the two men formulated plans for the possible administration of the Duc de Bourgogne, who had just become the heir presumptive. Fénelon knew that a reform of the French monarchy was necessary-to that end he had prepared the young Duke, but his protégé died in 1712. Fénelon detested absolutism, and called for a constitutional monarch restrained by law. He further advocated a number of specific reforms: economic, e.g., the reduction of expenses and a balanced budget; political, e.g., the reestablishment of the Estates General and decentralization; and social, e.g., freedom for the nobility to enter commerce or the magistracy. Industry was to be encouraged, and manufactured goods were to be allowed to compete freely on the world market. Fénelon insisted that the Church be independent of the State, which should protect the Church without being its master. He was not, like Bossuet, a partisan of the Gallican freedom of the Church of France. (See GALLICANISM).

It was during the Cambrai period that Fénelon summed up his religious thinking. In the Traité de l'Existence de Dieu (Pt. 1, 1712; Pt. 2, 1718 and 1731) he is both an intellectual and a mystic. For him the arguments of the heart were more telling than those of the intellect; he seemed to be erecting a dike against the rationalistic flood that was to come. Fénelon yearned for the vision of God to whom he wished to be united and in whom he would lose himself. Ever a man of apostolic zeal, he strove to improve the faithful, bring back the heretic, and convince the unbeliever. He fought to establish at Cambrai a seminary that would compete with the Jansenist centers at Douai and Louvain (see JANSENISM), and, from 1704, wrote much to defend the Augustinian conception of grace against Jansenist misinterpretation. His final polemic in this controversy was the Instruction pastorale en forme de dialogues contre le système de Jansénius (1714). Inflexible in controversy, he was charitable in his relations with the Jansenists of his diocese. One of his last writings was the Lettre sur les occupations de l'Académie française (1714).

Seminal Influence. Fénelon was not a professional man of letters, but he was a born artist. His style is generally characterized by the qualities of ease, fluidity and grace, harmony, and equilibrium. More important, his ideas were seminal. His educational philosophy foreshadowed that of ROUSSEAU's Emile. His desire to break the aesthetic fetters imposed upon writers hastened the literary upheaval then gathering momentum. His thinking on the writing of history anticipated VOLTAIRE. Above all, his criticism of royal absolutism and his ideas on political, economic, and social reforms were to make an impression upon the revolutionary minds that were to follow. Philosophers of the 18th century, unfortunately, interpreted Fénelon to suit themselves. Thus Fénelon's Catholic mysticism was equated with sentimental deism. He would have been surprised at Rousseau's application of his educational theories. Fénelon remains the most likable personality of the closing years of the reign of Louis XIV. It has been asserted that if his constructive reform program had been realized, the French Revolution might have been prevented.

Bibliography: Oeuvres, 35 v. (Versailles 1820–30); Oeuvres complètes, 10 v. (Paris 1848–52). D. C. CABEEN, ed., A. Critical Bibliography of French Literature (Syracuse 1961), contains the most up-to-date annotated bibliography, M. DE LA BEDOYÈRE, The Archbishop and the Lady: The Story of Fénelon and Madame Guyon (New York 1956). E. CARCASSONNE, Fénelon (Paris 1946), the best biography and general treatment. P. JANET, Fénelon (Paris 1892), old, but still good.

[J. W. COSENTINI]

FENG DE, MATTHEW, ST.

Martyr, lay Franciscan; b. 1855, Xiao Bashi, Shuo Xian, Shanxi Province, China; d. July 9, 1900, Taiyüan, Shanxi Province, China. Matthew Feng De (also given as Matthias Fun–Te) was a fervent neophyte. Following his baptism and confirmation, he moved to Taiyüan to aid famine victims (1893). When his failing eyesight made it impossible to support his family, his bishop gave him a job as night watchman for the Taiyüan cathedral. He was among the several dozen trapped inside the cathedral by the Boxers on July 5, 1900, and decapitated four days later. Matthew was beatified by Pope Pius XII (Nov. 24, 1946) and canonized (Oct. 1, 2000) by Pope John Paul II with Augustine Zhao Rong and companions.

Feast: July 4.

Bibliography: L. M. BALCONI, Le Martiri di Taiyuen (Milan 1945). Acta Apostolicae Sedis 47 (1955) 381–388; Vita del b. A. Crescitelli (Milan 1950). M. T. DE BLARER, Les Bse Marie Hermine de Jésus et ses compagnes, franciscaines missionnaires de Marie, massacrées le 9 juillet 1900 à Tai–Yuan–Fou, Chine (Paris 1947). Les Vingt–neuf martyrs de Chine, massacrés en 1900, béatifiés par Sa Sainteté Pie XII, le 24 novembre, 1946 (Rome 1946). L. MINER, China's Book of Martyrs: A Record of Heroic Martyrdoms and Marvelous Deliverances of Chinese Christians during the Summer of 1900 (Ann Arbor 1994). J. SIMON, Sous le sabre des Boxers (Lille 1955). C. TESTORE, Sangue e palme sul fiume giallo. I beati martiri cinesi nella persecuzione della Boxe Celi Sud–Est, 1900 (Rome 1955). L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. Ed. 40 (2000): 1–2, 10.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FENLON, JOHN F.

Sulpician, seminary president; b. Chicago, Ill., June 23, 1873; d. Holland, Mich., July 31, 1943. He was the son of Thomas and Mary (O'Keefe) Fenlon. After early education in a parochial school, he attended St. Ignatius, a Jesuit high school, and at 18 entered St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md. There he was greatly influenced by Revs. Edward R. Dyer and Alphonse L. Magnien, who guided him through philosophy and theology and, even while he was still a seminarian, sent him for advanced studies in Hebrew to Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. Ordained in Chicago on June 19, 1896, Fenlon spent two years there as assistant at Holy Name Cathedral and then joined the Sulpicians. He was sent at once to the Minerva (Angelica) University, Rome, where he received a doctorate in theology (1900) and did further study in oriental languages at the Sapienzia under Guidi.

On his return to the U.S. in 1901, Fenlon was assigned to teach dogmatic theology and scripture at St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, Yonkers, N.Y. He was appointed to the provincial council of his society (1903) and served as superior of the Sulpician house of studies (1904-11) and as president of Divinity College at the Catholic University of America (1911-24), both in Washington, D.C. While there he acted as secretary at the annual bishops' meeting and helped to establish the National Catholic Welfare Conference. In 1924 he became the president of Theological College at Catholic University and in December 1925 succeeded Dyer as president of St. Mary's Seminary and University and provincial superior of the Sulpicians in the U.S. Under his administration, the new St. Mary's Seminary of Theology was opened in suburban Roland Park, Baltimore, in 1929, and St. Edward's Seminary in Seattle, Wash., was begun in 1932. Fenlon wrote articles for the old Catholic Encyclopedia, contributed to many Catholic magazines, and traveled widely in the interest of his society and the institution over which he presided. He was the recipient of honorary degrees from Loyola College, Baltimore (1938), and the University of Montreal, Canada (1943).

Bibliography: P. BOISARD, Lettre circulaire à l'occasion de la mort de M. Fenlon (Seminaire Saint Sulpice, Issy, Mar. 18, 1946). The Voice (St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore) 21.1–2 (Oct.-Nov. 1943). J. T. ELLIS, The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1952).

[C. M. CUYLER]

FENN, JAMES, BL.

Widower, priest martyr; b. 1540, Montacute, near Yeovil, Somerset, England; d. Feb. 12, 1584. After completing his education at Corpus Christi and Gloucester Hall, Oxford, Fenn was a schoolmaster in Somerset. He married and fathered two children. On the death of his wife, he studied for the priesthood at Rheims, where he was ordained in 1580. He was indicted, Feb. 5, 1584, with Bl. George HAYDOCK, Bl. William DEAN, and six other priests for conspiring against the queen at Rheims. All were adjudged guilty two days later and sentenced to execution. Thereafter he was shackled in "the pit" in the Tower of London. Jesuit Fr. Pollen records an eyewitness account of the execution: "before the cart was driven away, he was stripped of all his apparell saving his shirt only, and presently after the cart was driven away his shirt was pulled of his back, so that he hung stark naked, whereat the people muttered greatly." Fenn's daughter Frances was present at the execution of her father. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877–82) 74, 103. GILLOW, Biblical Dictictionary of English Catholicism, (London and New York 1885–1902) III, 202; cf. III, 265; V, 142, 201. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891) 252, 253, 304.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FENTON, JOSEPH CLIFFORD

Priest, theologian, editor; b. Springfield, MA, Jan. 16, 1906; d. Chicopee Falls, MA, July 7, 1969. He was the elder son of Michael Francis and Elizabeth (Clifford) Fenton. He received an A.B. from Holy Cross College (1926), an S.T.L. and J.C.B. from the University of Montreal (1930); and an S.T.D. from the Angelicum in Rome (1931). After his ordination as a priest for the diocese of Springfield, MA in 1930, he was a curate at Immaculate Conception Church, Easthampton, MA (1931-33) and St. Joseph's Church, Leicester, MA (1933-34). He taught philosophy at St. Ambrose College, Davenport, IA (1934-35) and theology at St. Bernard's Seminary, Rochester, NY (1936-38). In 1938, Msgr. James Moran Corrigan, the sixth rector of The Catholic University of America, appointed Fenton to the Department of Religious Education. A year later, he transferred to the School of Sacred Theology where he served as dean from 1943 to 1945. He taught fundamental and dogmatic theology at the University until his retirement in 1963 owing to poor health. That same year he was named pastor of St. Patrick's Church in Chicopee Falls, MA. Three years later he died.

Msgr. Fenton—a very large man well over six feet tall—was a familiar figure with his cassock and biretta on the campus of Catholic University for 25 years. His students remember him as an imposing person who lectured dramatically and often intimidated them with unexpected questions. Fenton's colorful expressions and trenchant observations became legendary.

In the 1940s and 1950s Fenton was very active in the American Church. As a charter member of the CATHOLIC THEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF AMERICA, he became its first secretary (1946–47) and the recipient of the Society's Cardinal Spellman Award for Theology (1958). He published six books: The Theology of Prayer (1939), The Concept of Sacred Theology (1941), We Stand with Christ (1943), The Calling of a Diocesan Priest (1944), The Concept of the Diocesan Priesthood (1951), and The Catholic Church and Salvation (1958).

Serving as editor of The American Ecclesiastical Review (1944–63), he wrote over 150 articles on a variety of topics: the nature of theology, biblical scholarship, membership in the Church, the teaching authority of the Church, and the necessity of the Church for salvation. His writing was clear, often polemical, and, at times, intemperate. He wrote with conviction and, on occasion, with humor. A committed traditionalist and passionate defender of magisterial teaching, he vigorously opposed any idea that even suggested liberalism or Modernism. As a controversialist, he is best remembered for his aggressive opposition to John Courtney Murray, S.J., on religious freedom and on the relationship between Church and state.

During his career, Fenton received many ecclesiastical honors from Rome. The Holy See named him a papal chamberlain (1951), a domestic prelate (1954), and a protonotary apostolic (1963). Recipient of the papal medal, Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice (1954), he belonged to the Pontifical Roman Theological Academy and served as a counselor to the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities (1950–67). During the first years of the Second Vatican Council he was a member of the preparatory Theological Commission, the Doctrinal Commission, the Commission on Faith and Morals, and also a peritus.

[P. GRANFIELD]

FENWICK, BENEDICT JOSEPH

Educator, second bishop of Boston; b. near Leonardtown, Md., Sept. 3, 1782; d. Boston, Mass., Aug. 11, 1846. Fenwick was the son of Richard and Dorothy (Plowden) Fenwick. He attended Georgetown College (now University), a school newly established by Bp. John Carroll, and in 1806 he was admitted to the Georgetown novitiate of the reestablished Society of Jesus. (See JESU-ITS.) His Jesuit novitiate and studies in theology at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md., prepared him for ordination on March 12, 1808. He was assigned to St. Peter's Church, New York City, where, with Anthony Kohlmann, SJ, he was copastor and cofounder of the New York Literary Institution. In 1817 Fenwick was called to Washington, D.C., to serve as president of Georgetown College. There were, however, warring factions in the Church in Charleston, S.C., and Fenwick was sent there in 1818 as peacemaker. He remained after the arrival of Bp. John England, whom he served as vicar-general. His next appointment, in May 1822, was as minister of Georgetown College and procurator general of the Society. From 1822 to 1825 he again served as president of Georgetown.

Having been proposed for the episcopacy several times since 1814, he was named bishop of Boston and consecrated in Baltimore on Nov. 1, 1825. His diocese, which covered all of New England, had three priests, eight churches (some in bad repair), and the cathedral in Boston, with a Catholic population of 9,000. He arranged for a new location for the Ursuline Nuns in Charlestown, Mass., began a small seminary in his own residence, and started a school for boys and girls at the cathedral. The Ursuline convent was destroyed by a Nativist mob in 1834, but Fenwick generally dealt successfully with anti-Catholic forces. He established (1829) a newspaper, the Jesuit (later the Boston Pilot) to defend Catholic views, and strengthened his diocese by founding (1834) the Catholic Irish colony of Benedicta in Maine.

Fenwick's major contribution to education was the founding in 1843 of the College of Holy Cross, Worcester, Mass., the first Catholic college in New England. Using land and a building given by Rev. James Fitton, Fenwick turned the new college over to the Jesuits. Aided by funds from the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and from the Leopoldine Association of Vienna, he also sent priests throughout New England to build churches and establish parishes. He held the first clerical retreat and the first diocesan synod, both in 1842. During his administration the diocese was transformed from one of the weakest to one of the strongest in the U.S.

Bibliography: R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston . . . 1604 to 1943, 3 v. (Boston 1945).

[T. F. CASEY]

FENWICK, EDWARD DOMINIC

Missionary, first bishop of Cincinnati, OH; b. St. Mary's County, MD, Aug. 19, 1768; d. Wooster, OH, Sept. 26, 1832. His father was Ignatius Fenwick, descendant of Cuthbert Fenwick of Maryland; his mother was Sarah Taney, the daughter of Michael and Sarah (Brooke) Taney. Edward received his early education privately on the Fenwick manor and entered Holy Cross College, conducted by English Dominicans at Bornheim, Belgium, where he completed the humanities course in 1788. He entered the Dominican Order and was professed on March 26, 1790. He next studied theology and was ordained probably on Feb. 23, 1793. When he had been teaching at Holy Cross College for a year, the English Dominicans fled to England because of the French Revolution, leaving Fenwick in charge. His American citizenship did not prevent his imprisonment and probably did not influence his later release. On regaining his freedom he joined the English Dominicans at Carshalton, near London, and soon received permission to establish a house of English Dominicans in the U.S. He returned to the U.S. in November 1804.

On the advice of Bp. John Carroll, Fenwick visited Kentucky in early 1805 to investigate the possibilities of a Dominican foundation there. He gave a favorable report and was appointed superior of the incipient Dominican province of St. Joseph in July 1806. Near Springfield, KY, he purchased the John Waller plantation where he began a building program which, on its completion in 1812, included St. Rose's Church and Priory and the College of St. Thomas of Aquin. In 1807, however, he was replaced as superior at his own request; thereafter he devoted himself to missionary work. He traveled throughout Kentucky and in 1808 began his apostolate in Ohio, where he concentrated his efforts after 1816. In 1818, he and Father Nicholas D. Young blessed the first church in Ohio, near Somerset, and from there he served Catholics throughout the state. His missionary wanderings on horseback earned him the titles of "itinerant preacher" and "Apostle of Ohio" and eventually led to his appointment as the first bishop of Cincinnati.

He was consecrated at St. Rose Church, Springfield, KY, on Jan. 13, 1822, by Bp. Benedict Flaget, and, with other Dominican priests, reached Cincinnati in March. In May 1823, feeling the need of clergy and deprived of the Dominicans in Kentucky, Fenwick left for Rome to seek the establishment of a Dominican province in Ohio. Final arrangements concerning the new province were not made until 1828, when the Dominicans of Ohio and Kentucky were united under Fenwick. After his return from Europe in March 1825, Fenwick had sufficient resources to build St. Peter in Chains Cathedral in Cincinnati. In 1829, St. Francis Xavier Seminary was organized and became part of the Athenaeum (a corporation having direction of the seminaries of the archdiocese), which opened in 1831. The same year the first issue of his diocesan paper, the Catholic Telegraph–Register, appeared. By this time Fenwick had 24 priests and 22 churches in his diocese. The next year, while returning from his annual visitation through Ohio and Michigan, he died of cholera at Wooster, Ohio. He was buried there, but his remains were later transferred to the Cincinnati cathedral and finally to St. Joseph's Cemetery.

Bibliography: V. F. O'DANIEL, The Right Rev. Edward Dominic Fenwick, OP (2d ed. Washington 1921). J. H. LAMOTT, History of the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, 1821–1921 (New York 1921). M. J. HYNES, History of the Diocese of Cleveland 1847–1952 (Cleveland 1953).

[J. SAUTER]

FENWICK, JOHN, BL.

Jesuit priest and martyr; vere Caldwell; b. Durham, England, 1628; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), June 20, 1679. When John embraced the Catholic faith, his Protestant family disowned him. He made his way to the Jesuit college at St-Omer in about 1654, then entered the Jesuit novitiate at Watten two years later. After completing his theology studies at Liège, he was ordained (1664) then served as procurator of St-Omer. About 1674 he returned to England. While serving in London as procurator, he was arrested (Sept. 28, 1678) with Bl. William IRELAND. He was bound so tightly in irons at Newgate Prison that one of his legs became gangrenous. He was tried at the Old Bailey (Dec. 17, 1678) together with Frs. WHITBREAD and Ireland on the fallacious charge of complicity in the Oates Plot to assassinate the king. The trial was suspended when it appeared the jury would render a verdict in favor of the priests. These Jesuits were joined by others who had been apprehended on the same charge and tried again on June 13, 1679. Upon the instruction of the judge, all were found guilty on perjurous testimony and condemned. After pardoning those who persecuted him, Fenwick said: "I am very willing to and ready to suffer death. I pray God pardon me my sins and save my soul." He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); Dec. 1 (Jesuits).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 175–78.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FEODOROV, LEONID

Exarch; b. St. Petersburg, Russia, Nov. 4, 1879; d. Vyatka (or Kirov), Russia, March 7, 1935. Feodorov studied for the priesthood in St. Petersburg at the Orthodox Ecclesiastical Academy, then under the influence of SOLOV'EV, but in 1902 he journeyed to Italy to enter the Catholic Church. On his way, he visited in Lvov Metropolitan Andrĭi SHEPTYTS'KYĬ, under whose guidance he remained all his life. While studying in Rome, he defended the rights of the Ukrainian Rite Catholics in the U.S. In 1911 he was ordained in Constantinople by the Bulgarian Archbishop Mirov, and then entered the Studite monastery of Kamenitza in Bosnia. He took an active part in the conferences in Velegrad concerning reunion. In 1914 he returned to St. Petersburg, but was deported to Tobolsk by the Russian police.

In 1917 he was named exarch of the Russian Catholics of the Russian Rite by Metropolitan Sheptyts'kyĭ. Benedict XV confirmed his nomination and created him prothonotary apostolic (1921). Feodorov then organized the first Russian Catholic communities of this rite. In 1923 he was tried in Moscow with 15 other Catholics for defending the Church's rights and was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment, but he was released in April of 1926. Two months later he was rearrested and sent to the Solovki Islands where he organized a secret liturgical life for the prisoners. He was transferred to Pinega (1929), to Kotlas (1931), and finally to Vyatka (1934).

Unlike the Latin rite clergy in Russia, Feodorov maintained that Russian converts to Catholicism should embrace the Russian rite. He also advocated that this rite be preserved in its purity, unaffected by Latin influence. Before his arrest and while in prison, Feodorov established fraternal contacts with the Orthodox clergy and with Patriarch TIKHON. He used to call his communities of Russian Catholics prototypes of the corporate reunion that would take place some day.

Bibliography: P. A. MAILLEUX, Exarch Leonid Feodorov, Bridgebuilder between Rome and Moscow (New York 1964).

[P. A. MAILLEUX]

FERDINAND, BL.

Infante of Portugal; b. Santarém, Portugal, Sept. 29, 1402; d. Fez, Morocco, June 5, 1443. He lived as a monk at the court of his father, John I, and, at 20, became grand master of the Order of AVIZ. He was a model of virtue and chivalry—averse to argumentation, criticism, and swearing—chaste of body and soul. In command of the disastrous Portuguese expedition to capture Tangiers in

Ferdinand II. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

September 1437, he surrendered himself, his secretary, his confessor, and several pages as hostages to the Moroccans to save his troops. The Portuguese refused to deliver Ceuta as Ferdinand's ransom, and he died after a harsh captivity, which he endured with great patience. In 1451, João Alvarez, his secretary, brought Ferdinand's heart to Lisbon and wrote an account of his captivity (Acta Sanctorum June 1:552–581, and Coimbra 1911). The rest of his relics were translated from Morocco to Batalha in 1463. Calderón's El príncipe constante dramatizes Ferdinand's career.

Feast: June 5.

Bibliography: A. DE HOLANDA and S. BENING, A genealogia do Infante Dom Fernando de Portugal (Porto, Portugal 1984). J. ALVARES, Obras, critical edition ed. A. DE ALMEIDA CALADO, 2 v. (Coimbra 1960); Trautado da vida e feitos do muito vertuoso Sor. ifante D. Fernando, critical edition ed. A. DE ALMEIDA CALADO, (Coimbra 1960). G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 4:1187.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

FERDINAND II, HOLY ROMAN EMPEROR

Reigned from 1619 to 1637; b. Graz, Styria, July 9, 1578; d. Vienna, Feb. 15, 1637. He was the oldest son of Archduke Charles of the Inner Austrian line of the Hapsburgs (ruling in Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, etc., since 1576) and Maria, the daughter of Duke Albert V of Bavaria. As a youth he was much influenced by his Bavarian relatives and their policy of aggressive Catholic restoration combined with a weakening of the power (often exerted in the Protestant cause) of the estates. His studies with the Jesuits at Ingolstadt only strengthened his resolve to undo his father's concessions to the Protestants-in the course of a pilgrimage to Rome and to Loreto he took a vow to give up his life and his lands before sacrificing his religious principles. In 1598 he began to carry this program into practice in Styria: Protestants were faced with a choice between conversion and exile; their schools were closed and their churches confiscated for Catholic use. His desire to see such a policy extend to the remaining Hapsburg lands in the area made it difficult for him to find his way through the complexities of the "Brother's Quarrel," when Emperor Rudolf II was faced with a virtual family insurrection against his feeble leadership at a critical time.

When the childless Matthias became emperor (1612), Ferdinand was recognized as his heir (the claims of Philip III of Spain were settled amicably) and was duly elected king of Bohemia (1617) and king of Hungary (1618). It was only a matter of time before his known sympathies and policies led to conflict with the Protestants. The defenestration of Prague (May 23, 1618) was an attack on his program and his representatives in Bohemia; in August 1619 the Bohemians elected Frederick V, elector palatine, as their king in Ferdinand's place. The death of Matthias (1619) helped to make the conflict a general one in the Hapsburg lands: Bohemia, Hungary, Upper Austria, and the Protestants in Lower Austria began to plan for a general confederation of estates and an aristocratic commonwealth favorable to the Protestant cause. Ferdinand's election as emperor (1619) and his agreement with Maximilian I of Bavaria and the Catholic League strengthened his position. On Nov. 8, 1620, the battle of the White Mountain (near Prague) was a triumph for his cause and for the Counter Reformation Catholicism and moderate absolutism he represented. The victory made it possible for him to declare Bohemia a hereditary monarchy, to weaken the power of its estates, and to give vast holdings there to his Catholic supporters.

As the conflict moved into Germany itself, there were signs that Ferdinand would apply to the empire the same policies that had been successful in the Austrian lands and Bohemia. In the first years of the THIRTY YEARS' WAR his armies were victorious over a number of German Protestant princes and their Danish allies; by 1628 his gifted military leader, Count Albrecht von Wallenstein, had reached the shores of the Baltic. In the German courts, Catholic as well as Protestant, there was apprehension now that Ferdinand's victories would establish an absolute monarchy in Germany. His Edict of RESTITU-TION (1629) revealed Ferdinand in a most uncompromising mood: the effort to recapture ground lost by the Catholic Church since the Religious Peace of AUGSBURG (1555) could not fail to strengthen the hand of the opposition. At the Diet of Regensburg (1630) it was clear that the high point of his predominance in German affairs had been passed; the princes (Maximilian of Bavaria among them) forced him to dispense with Wallenstein's services.

The entry of Sweden into the war forced him to recall Wallenstein, but he could no longer depend on his loyalty; there was soon plentiful evidence of his treachery, and Ferdinand gave the order to execute him without a formal trial (1634). He was able to conclude the favorable Treaty of Prague (1635) and to ensure that the imperial crown would remain in the possession of his family, when his son Ferdinand was elected king of the Romans (1636) shortly before his death.

Ferdinand, for all his attractive human traits, did not possess the elements of royal greatness. Reluctant to make decisions and much influenced by his advisers, especially his Jesuit confessors, he sought to pursue a policy largely dominated by religious considerations at a time when a more secular approach to politics (raison d'état) was making itself felt. Yet with all these limitations, Ferdinand had a large measure of success: he made certain that the great majority of the inhabitants of the Hapsburg dominions would be Catholic in their religious belief and that the future of the Austrian monarchy, thanks to his system of moderate absolutism, would be assured for generations to come.

Bibliography: K. EDER, Neue Deutsche Biographie (Berlin 1953–) 5:83–85. H. STURMBERGER, Kaiser Ferdinand II und das Problem des Absolutismus (Munich 1957). C. V. WEDGWOOD, The Thirty Years War (New Haven 1939). A. DUCH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:80–81. B. CHUDOBA, Spain and the Empire, 1519–1643 (Chicago 1952).

[W. B. SLOTTMAN]

FERDINAND III, KING OF CASTILE, ST.

Reigned in Castile from 1217 and León from 1230 to May 30, 1252; b. Valparaiso, June 24, 1198; d. Seville. He definitively united Castile and León and reduced Muslim power in Andalusia to the kingdom of Granada. Ferdinand was born of the second invalid marriage of Alfonso IX of León (1188–1230), that to Berengaria, daughter of Alfonso VIII of Castile (1170–1214). He succeeded to Castile after his mother, inheriting it upon the premature death of her brother Henry I (1214–17), had abdicated. Alfonso IX opposed his son's accession to León. However, by the Concord of Benavente (Dec. 11, 1230) Ferdinand actually succeeded his father. On Nov. 30, 1219, he married Beatrice, daughter of Philip of Swabia.

Ferdinand's measures to quell civil disturbances arising at his accessions interrupted his conquest of Muslim Andalusia. From the expeditions undertaken in 1224 until he received the surrender of Córdoba in 1236 and of Seville on Nov. 23, 1248, his reign constituted a permanent and efficacious crusade. His invasion of Murcia necessitated the Agreement of Almizra with James I of Aragon (1213–76), in which the southern and western boundaries of James's kingdom of Valencia were fixed and Castile was left free to subdue Murcia and ultimately Granada.

Tolerant toward the Jews and Muslims who submitted to his authority, Ferdinand strove to re-Christianize the conquered peoples through the ministry of the new MENDICANT ORDERS. He especially advanced legal studies by his promotion of the University of Salamanca. Having centralized the administration of his two kingdoms, he initiated the production of a uniform code of laws, a project completed by his successor, Alfonso the Wise. He was canonized by CLEMENT X on Feb. 4, 1671.

Feast: May 30.

Bibliography: L. FERNÁNDEZ DE RETANA, San Fernando III y su época (Madrid 1941). D. MANSILLA REOYO, Iglesia castellanoleonesa y Curia romana en los tiempos del rey san Fernando (Madrid 1945). A. M. BURRIEL, Memorias para la vida del santo rey Don Fernando III, ed. M. DE MANUEL RODRÍGUEZ (Barcelona 1974). J. GONZÁLEZ, Reinado y diplomas de Fernando III, 3 v. (Córdoba 1980-1986). M. DEL C. FERNÁNDEZ DE CASTRO CABEZA, The Life of the Very Noble King of Castile and León, Saint Ferdinand III (Mount Kisco, NY 1987). J. M. DE MENA, Entre la cruz y la espada: San Fernando (Sevilla 1990). A. CINTAS DEL BOT, Iconografia del Rey San Fernando en la pintura de Sevilla (Sevilla 1991). G. MARTÍ-NEZ DÍEZ, Fernando III (Palencia 1993). F. ANSÓN, Fernando III, rey de Castilla y León (Madrid 1998). F. GIL DELGADO, Andalucía, designio de Fernando III el santo: pregón de San Fernando (Sevilla 1998). A. DUMAS, Catholicisme 4:1186–87.

[R. H. TRAME]

FERMENTUM

The particle of the Eucharistic bread sent by the bishop of Rome to the bishops of other churches as a symbol of unity and intercommunion. According to Eusebius this custom was already known to Irenaeus as a longstanding tradition (Hist. eccl. 5.24.16; Die griechischen christlic- hen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, 9.1:497). In the 4th century the Council of Laodicea forbade sending the Eucharist abroad. In Rome, however, at the time of Innocent I (402–417), acolytes brought the fermentum to the priests of the titular churches every Sunday. This too was a symbol of the unity between the bishop and his priests. For the same reason, the officiating priest, who represented the pope at the stational Mass, also received the fermentum. When this custom finally fell into disuse, every priest nonetheless continued to drop a particle of consecrated Host into the chalice at the COMMINGLING, but the Host was the one consecrated in the same Mass.

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 2:312–313; "Fermentum . . . ," Colligere fragmenta: Festschrift Alban Dold, ed. B. FI-SCHER and V. FIALA (Beuron 1952) 185–190.

[J. P. DE JONG]

FERNÁNDEZ DE PIEDRAHITA, LUCAS

Bishop and historian; b. Bogotá, Colombia, 1624; d. Panama, 1688. He studied at the Seminary of St. Bartolomé and upon his ordination became curate of the native towns of Fuzagasugá and Paipa. He was named canon of the cathedral. In 1654 when the archbishopric of Santa Fe de Bogotá was vacant, the canons elected him as capitular vicar. He ruled this vast see with great zeal until he turned it over to the new archbishop. Because of the difficulties he had as capitular vicar with the civil authority (especially the incident with the visitor Juan Cornejo), he was accused of malfeasance and sent to Spain to justify his conduct. There everything went very slowly, and Piedrahita took advantage of the time to write Historia general de las conquistas del Nuevo Reino de Granada. The first part was published in 1688 in Amberes; the second part was lost. Once the author had died, no one was interested enough to preserve it. The published section (12 volumes divided into chapters) goes up to 1553 and is indispensable to any study of the period. The style is clear and pure. The Spanish court found the conduct of Piedrahita to be proper, and to show its confidence in him, named him bishop of Santa Marta. There he suffered a great deal when the pirates attacked the city. He was later transferred to Panama, where he continued to work with apostolic zeal until his death.

[J. RESTREPO POSADA]

FERNÁNDEZ SOLAR, TERESA DE LOS ANDES, ST.

Baptized Juana Enriquita Josefina de la Corazón Sagrada, known in religion as Teresa of Jesus, Discalced Carmelite mystic, victim soul; b. July 13, 1900, Santiago, Chile; d. April 12, 1920, Los Andes Carmel, Chile. Juana was one of seven children of Miguel Fernández Jaraquemada and Lucía Solar Armstrong. She vowed perpetual virginity at age 15 (1915). Although she was often sick, upon completing her education at the finest schools in Santiago, Juana entered the Carmel of Los Andes and received the name Teresa of Jesus (May 7, 1919) and began her novitiate five months later. At the beginning of March 1920, she predicted her impending death. After she fell gravely ill with typhus on Good Friday, April 2, 1920, arrangements were made for her to make her profession in articulo mortis on April 6. She died six days later. She left behind numerous letters and a diary (Historia de la vida de una de sus hijas, 1917-20) filled with spiritual wisdom, the fruit of her intense prayer life and mystical gifts. Miracles began to occur at her tomb in Los Andes soon after her death. Teresa, Chile's first saint, was both beatified (April 3, 1987, Santiago) and canonized (March 21, 1993, Rome) by Pope John Paul II. She is a patroness of the sick.

Feast: July 13.

Bibliography: L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 18 (1987): 8–9. E. T. GIL DE MURO, Cada vez que mire el mar (Burgos 1992). M. D. GRIFFIN, ed., Testimonies to Blessed Teresa of the Andes (Washington, D.C. 1991); God, the Joy of My Life (Hubertus, Wisc. 1994), includes the saint's spiritual diary. M. ORTEGA RI-QUELME, Teresa de los Andes: testimonio y desafío (Santiago, Chile 1993). A. M. RISOPATRÓN L., Teresa de los Andes, Teresa de Chile (Santiago 1988).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FERNÁNDEZ TRUYOLS, ANDRÉS

Scripture scholar; b. Manacor, Majorca, Dec. 15, 1870; d. Barcelona, Nov. 3, 1961. After his ordination in 1894, Fernández entered the Society of Jesus and continued his studies in Spain and England. He taught Sacred Scripture and Hebrew in St. Beuno's College, North Wales (1905–06), and in Tortosa, Spain, until 1909, when he was summoned to the Pontifical Biblical Institute, then just established in Rome by Pius X. As vice rector (1914–18) and rector (1918–24) of the Roman institute, he laid the groundwork for founding a filial house in Jerusalem where he lived from 1929 to 1947, traveling throughout the Holy Land and conducting Biblical study tours. He pursued his writing career in Rome until 1953, then in Barcelona until his death. His works include 11 books and 120 articles, among which are commentaries on Job, Ezra, and Nehemia, a life of Christ in two editions with translations in English and Italian, and studies on Palestinian topography and geography. He founded the periodicals Biblica (1920–) and Verbum Domini (1921–), and he was the first (1927) to propound the theory of the sensus plenior in Biblical hermeneutics.

Bibliography: A. ARCE, Vida y escritos del P. Andrés Fernández (Jerusalem 1944). Miscelánea Biblica Andrés Fernandez, v.34 (1960) 133–134 of Estudios Ecclesiasticos; F. DE P. SOLÁ, ibid. 311–325, contains a list of all his works to 1960.

[P. J. CALDERONE]

FÉROTIN, MARIUS

Benedictine, historian of the liturgy; b. Chateauneufdu-Rhône, France, Nov. 18, 1855; d. Farnborough, Sept. 15, 1914. Having studied under the monks of Hautecombe, he entered SOLESMES in 1876 and was a monk at SILOS, Spain (1881-92), and FARNBOROUGH, England (1895–1914). An eminent liturgist, he was a specialist in the MOZARABIC RITE and an outstanding historian of Spain. His publications include Catalogo de los manuscriptos del Padre Sarmiento existentes in Silos [Indice . . . del Padre Sarmiento (Madrid 1888)]; Histoire de l'abbaye de Silos (Paris 1897); Le Liber Ordinum en usage dans l'église wisigothique et mozarabe (Paris 1904); Monumenta ecclesiae liturgica, v.5; Le Liber Mozarabicus sacramentorum et les manuscrits mozarabes (Paris 1912), v.6 of Mon. eccles. lit. He collaborated on the Dictionnaire de la Bible, on the Mois bibliographique (1893–97) v. 1–5; the Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes (1900-02) v. 61-63, a letter of HUGH OF CLUNY to Bernard of Agen; two Visigothic manuscripts in the library of Ferdinand I, in the Revue des questions historiques [v. 74 (October 1903)], an important article identifying the real author of the Peregrinatio Aetheriae (Silviae).

Bibliography: F. CABROL, Journal of Theological Studies 16 (1914–15) 305–313; Bulletin de S. Martin et S. Benoît (Ligugé 1915) 19–24. F. CABROL and H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienneet de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53) 5.1:1382–98.

[J. DAOUST]

FERRAGUD GIRBÉS, JOSÉ RAMÓN, BL.

Lay martyr, farm worker; b. Oct. 10, 1887, Algemesí, Valencia, Spain; d. Sept. 24, 1936, Alzira.

As in other parts of Spain during the civil war of 1936–39, the churches and convents of José Ramón Ferragud's hometown of Algemesí were sacked and burned, and religious objects stolen or destroyed. After July 18 the persecution became more virulent, leading to the execution of many priests and faithful lay people, including Fr. José Pascual Ferrer Botella and the laborers Ferragud and Bl. José Medes Ferrís, and Bl. María Teresa Ferragud Roig, the ancient mother of four religious who were also martyrs: Felicidad, Joaquina, Vicenta, and Agustina.

José Ramón (Joseph Raymond) was baptized two days after his birth in the church of San Jaime, Algemesí, and was confirmed in the same church on May 19, 1889. His parents taught him the faith, while he learned secular subjects in the local public school. On Jan. 21, 1914, he married Josefa Ramona Borrás, who bore him eight children.

With the great simplicity of a saint, José Ramón assisted all in need without hesitation. He cofounded the Union of Catholic Workers (1,800 members in 1936) of which he was secretary in 1931. His faith grew because of his daily period of meditation, participation in the Mass, reception of Holy Communion, recitation of the rosary with his family, and devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Blessed Virgin. He belonged to the Nocturnal Adoration Society, Catholic Action, and other groups at San Luis Parish. José Ramón's primary apostolates were the Buena Prensa (Good Press) and as a catechist. Personally he was known for his humility, friendliness, prudence, energy, and valor.

In the days just before the July revolution, José Ramón was aware that religious persecution and probable martyrdom lay ahead. As a union leader he was particularly vulnerable. He was threatened with murder in 1934 because of his defense of sound religious doctrine during the union elections. By February 1936, he believed his fate was sealed. Two months later, Ferragud directly contributed to the failure of a local revolutionary strike directed against the catholic union. Thereafter he learned of the decision to kill him because he would not give up Church rights in favor of workers' rights. Despite the danger surrounding him, he continued his daily activities serenely, trusting that his fate was in the hands of God.

José Ramón was arrested by the militia after midnight on July 28, interrogated at the town hall, then taken to the convent of Fons Salutis, which had been converted into a prison. There he was maltreated physically and psychologically for about a week before being released. When they arrived at his home the second time, the revolutionaries shot the door opened and rushed inside. José Ramón remained incarcerated for 53 days at Fons Salutis during his second stay. At dawn on September 24 about 20 inmates, including Ferragud, were taken by truck to an isolated spot near Alcira called Barraca and executed. The bodies were dumped in Alcira's cemetery, where they were interred. Later Ferragud's remains were transferred to Christ of Calvary crypt in Algemesí.

Three days after his martyrdom, one of his executioners regretted having killed a good worker, and committed to compensating the widow. From that day she was given ten pesetas daily. That same man reported that the martyr exclaimed, "Long live Christ the King!", before covering his face with the black shirt he was wearing. José Ramón was beatified by Pope John Paul II with José Aparicio Sanz and 232 companions on March 11, 2001.

Feast: Sept. 22.

See Also: SPANISH CIVIL WAR, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Bibliography: V. CÁRCEL ORTÍ, Martires españoles del siglo XX (Madrid 1995). W. H. CARROLL, The Last Crusade (Front Royal, Va. 1996). J. PÉREZ DE URBEL, Catholic Martyrs of the Spanish Civil War, tr. M. F. INGRAMS (Kansas City, Mo. 1993). R. ROYAL, The Catholic Martyrs of the Twentieth Century (New York 2000). "Hombres de Acción Católica de Valencia," Possumus, no. 103 (1960), 8. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. no. 11 (March 14, 2001) 1–4, 12.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FERRANDUS OF CARTHAGE

Deacon and ecclesiastical writer; d. Carthage, A. D. 546 or 547. His close association with Fulgentius of Ruspe, of whom he was a pupil, was probably responsible for the unjustified addition of Fulgentius to his own name. In 508 he accompanied Fulgentius into exile in Sardinia, from which a return to Carthage became possible only in 523. Ferrandus is mentioned in laudatory terms as a deacon of Carthage by FACUNDUS OF HERM-IANE, VICTOR OF TUNNUNA, and later writers.

He is most probably the author of the excellent Vita Fulgentii, which furnishes so much precious information on the man and his age. His Breviatio canonum is a systematic and comprehensive exposition of the Canon Law in force in North Africa as based on the decrees of numerous Greek and African councils. Each of the 232 prescriptions is stated and defined, then supported by a number of pertinent canons. The Breviatio is an important source for the early history of Canon Law. Of his 12 extant letters, five are short personal notes, but the rest are theological treatises or discussions in epistolary form. Two of these have a special interest. Letter 6 is an answer to the request of the Roman deacons Pelagius and Anatolius for a statement on Justinian's condemnation of the Three Chapters. Ferrandus criticized the emperor's action in strong terms. Letter 7, a reply to Count Reginus, who had asked how a pious soldier should conduct himself in military life, lays down seven rules, regulae innocentiae, for his guidance.

Bibliography: Clavis Patrum latinorum, ed. E. DEKKERS (Steenbrugge 1961) Nos. 847–848, 1768. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 4:87, with valuable bibliog. A. JÜLICHER, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 6.2 (1909) 2219–21. H. R. REYNOLDS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE (London 1877–87) 2:583–584, old but still useful. A. VETULANI, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ (Paris 1935–65) 2:1111–13. M. SCHANZ, C. HOSIUS, and G KRÜGER, Geschichte der römischen Literatur (Munich 1914–35) 4.2:572–575. O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatura (Freiburg 1913–32) 5:316–320. U. MORICCA, Storia della letteratura latina cristiana, 3 v. in 5 (Turin 1923–1935) 3.2:1395–1407. G. F. LAPEYRE, Vie de Saint Fulgence de Ruspe, par Ferrand, diacre de Carthage (Paris 1929).

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

FERRARI, ANDREA CARLO, BL.

Cardinal; archbishop of Milan; founder of the Company of Saint Paul (Compagnia di San Paolo); b. Aug. 13, 1850, Lalatta di Protopiano (diocese of Parma), Emilia-Romagna, Italy; d. Feb. 2, 1921, Milan, Lombardy, Italy. Son of Giuseppe Ferrari and Maddalena Langarine, Andrea received both his early education and seminary training at Parma, where he was ordained to the priesthood on Dec. 20, 1873. Thereafter he was appointed vice-rector of Parma's seminary (1873), rector (1876), and cathedral canon (1878). He was named bishop of Guastalla (1890), then transferred to the diocese of Como, Lombardy (1891), where he proved himself a true "Father of Souls." Three years later he was made archbishop of Milan (1894) and created a cardinal. He founded the Company of Saint Paul for pastoral work, many churches, the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart, and charitable institutions. During World War I, Ferrari organized a group to care for soldiers and prisoners, for which he received the Grand Cross of Saints Maurizio and Lazarro (1919). He continued his pastoral work until death, even when bedridden. At his beatification (May 10, 1987) Pope John Paul II likened Ferrari's pastoral heart to that of the Good Shepherd and praised his fervent charity.

Feast: Feb. 1 (Archdiocese of Milan).

Bibliography: G. CARACCIOLO, La fede e le opere: la figura del cristiano nella pastorale del cardinal Ferrari e nella Compagnia di San Paolo (Milan 1994). A. MAJO, A. C. Ferrari: uomo di Dio, uomo di tutti (Milan 1994); Il Card. Ferrari, i cattolici e il catechismo nella scuola (Milan 1995). L. MONTAGNA, Il cardinale Andrea Carlo Ferrari e l'ora presente (Milan 1969). G. PON-ZINI, Il cardinale A. C. Ferrari a Milano, 1894–1921: fondamenti e linee del suo ministero episcopale (Milan 1981). G. ROSSI, Il cardinal Ferrari (Assisi 1956). C. SNIDER, L'episcopato del cardinale Andrea C. Ferrari (Vicenza 1982). Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1987): 690. L'Osservatore Romano, Eng. ed., no. 21 (1987): 18–19.

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FERRARI, BARTOLOMEO, VEN.

Cofounder of the BARNABITES; b. Milan, 1499; d. there, Nov. 25, 1544. He was born of a noble family, but was orphaned as a young child. He studied law at Pavia, and in 1524 he showed much charity and courage in aiding the plague-stricken in Milan. Dedication to works of mercy led him and his friend Antonio Morigia to join the Confraternity of Eternal Wisdom. There with Anthony ZACCARIA they united in the foundation of a congregation of clerks regular to work for moral reform and the defense of the faith against heresy. The strong support of Bartolomeo's brother, Basilio Ferrari, employed in the papal court, helped their project, and the new order was approved by the bull Vota per quae vos of Clement VII (Feb. 18, 1533). Ferrari was ordained c. 1532 and elected general in 1542. He consolidated the new order, formed new recruits and obtained privileges from Paul III and Emperor Charles V. He was venerated by the people after the declaration of his virtues by Urban VIII in 1634.

Bibliography: I. GOBIO, Vita del ven. PP. B. Ferrari e G. A. Morigia (Milan 1858). O. M. PREMOLI, Storia dei Barnabiti nel cinquencento (Rome 1913).

[U. M. FASOLA]

FERRARIENSIS (FRANCESCO SILVESTRI)

Theologian; b. Ferrara, c. 1474, d. Rennes, France, Sept. 19, 1528. He joined the Dominican order at the age of 14 in the priory of St. Mary of the Angels, Ferrara. He was outstanding in studies. Besides being famous for learning in theology and philosophy, he was also well versed in literature and music. Ferrariensis taught philosophy and theology in various Dominican houses of study and from 1507 to 1508 was master of students at Bologna. He became a master of sacred theology in 1515. He held priorships at Ferrara and Bologna. From 1518 to 1520 Ferrariensis was the vicar-general of the congregation of Lombardy. In 1520 he was appointed regent of the Dominican studium at Bologna. Clement VII appointed him vicar-general of the entire order in 1524, and in June 1525 he was elected master general. As general, he visited the order's provinces in Italy, France, and the Low Countries, zealously seeking to restore primitive fervor and discipline. It is thought that these travels hastened his premature death.

The principal work of Ferrariensis is his monumental commentary on the Summa contra gentiles of St. THOMAS AQUINAS. This was written before 1516 and first published at Paris in 1552. Leo XIII, in the preface of the Leonine edition of the Summa contra gentiles, describes this commentary as a "rich and illustrious stream through which the doctrine of Saint Thomas flows." Ferrariensis illustrates, defends, and approves the Thomistic doctrine, following the form and substance of Aquinas admirably. Like the Summa contra gentiles itself, the commentary is brief in the treatment of each question. Ferrariensis is the great commentator on the Summa contra gentiles as Cajetan is on the Summa Theologiae of Aquinas. So true is this that in the official Leonine editions of St. Thomas Aquinas, the commentaries of Ferrariensis are annexed to each chapter of the Summa contra gentiles, as are Cajetan's to the Summa Theologiae.

Among the other works of Ferrariensis are his Annotations on the eight Books of the Physics of Aristotle and Saint Thomas, and the Commentary on the three Books De Anima of Aristotle and Saint Thomas. His Annotations on the Posterior Analytics of Aristotle and Saint Thomas are also noteworthy. He also wrote an apologetical work Apologia de convenientia institutorum Romanae ecclesiae cum evangelica libertate, in which he defended the liberty guiding and guarding the Church against the attacks of Luther. Other writings included works on Blessed Hosanna of Mantua, OP, a Dominican mystic for whom he was the spiritual director; encyclical letters to his order while he was master general; and a collection of prayers.

Ferrariensis arrived on the scholarly scene at the end of the first antischolastic period. He is most important for making the thought of Aquinas available at a critical moment in the European history of thought. HUMANISM was current at the time, and the understanding of St. Thomas helped the Church immeasurably. He was also present for the great arguments with Luther.

In his own right, Ferrariensis was also a remarkable metaphysician. He was an admirer of CAJETAN and emulated him as a philosopher and theologian. Yet he did not hesitate to disagree with Cajetan on important points, such as original justice, the immortality of the soul, fideism, abstraction, analogy, and the principle of individuation, among many things. He wrote a commentary on the Prima Pars of the Summa Theologiae but destroyed it upon seeing the superior work of Cajetan. Curiously, Cajetan, upon seeing the work of Ferrariensis on the Summa contra gentiles, destroyed a commentary he was preparing upon the same work and insisted that the work of Ferrariensis be published.

Bibliography: M. M. GORCE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 14.2:2085–87. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1959) 2.1:59–60. C. GIACON, La seconda scolastica, 2 v. (Milan 1944–46) 1:37–162.

[E. M. ROGERS]

FERRARIS, LUCIO

Canonist; b. Solero, near Alexandria; d. 1763. He entered the Order of the Friars Minor of the strict observance. He became provincial and then lecturer in theology, synodal examiner, and consultor of the Holy Office. He is renowned for his Prompa bibliotheca canonica, juridica, moralis, theologica necnon ascetica, polemica, rubristica historica, prepared at Bologna (1746) in three folio volumes. The principal editions that followed were: Rome 1760-66, 10 v.; 1767, eight v.; Bologna 1763, 1766, nine v.; Venice 1782, with a supplement; Rome 1784-90, nine v. The Benedictines of Monte Cassino put out an edition in 1844, and included the published decrees of the Roman Congregations, which were lacking in the earlier editions. The Congregation of Propaganda with painstaking care published (1885-98) a later edition in nine volumes. The Bibliotheca of Ferraris is in alphabetical dictionary form. Schulte, having recognized the value and practical utility of this format, criticized his having spread out under different words, studies referring to the same subject. He also questioned its historical value, but the arrangement in alphabetical order and the citations of jurisprudence made the work useful and easy to consult. Ferraris endeavored to resolve controverted questions with equity, using the principles of probabilism.

Bibliography: J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts 3.1:531. E. H. VOLLET, Grande encyclopédie, ed. A. BERTHELOT, 31 v. (Paris 1886–1902) 17:317. G. LE POINTE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique 5:831. A. M. STICKLER, Historia iuris canonici latini 320, 349.

[T. D. DOUGHERTY]

FERRATA, DOMENICO

Cardinal, secretary of state of Benedict XV; b. Gradoli (Viterbo), March 4, 1847; d. Rome, Oct. 10, 1914. After receiving in Rome doctorates in Canon Law, theology, and philosophy, he taught Canon Law there at St. Apollinaris (1876) and at the College of Propaganda (1877). He entered the papal diplomatic service at the urging of Pius IX and became auditor in the nunciature in Paris (1879–83). In 1883 he was named director of the Accademia dei nobili ecclesiastici. In the Congregation of Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, he was undersecretary (1883), and secretary (1889). Leo XIII sent him four times on delicate missions to Switzerland to settle difficulties between dioceses and cantons (1883–88). He was designated titular archbishop of Thessalonica and nuncio to Brussels (1885). When sent as nuncio to Paris (1891), he was the principal architect, as well as executor, of Leo XIII's policy regarding the RALLIEMENT. He became a cardinal in 1896. After returning to Rome (1899), he was named successively prefect of four congregations: Indulgences (1899); Rites (1900); Religious (1902); and Discipline of the Sacraments (1908); and then secretary of the Holy Office (1913). Benedict XV appointed him secretary of state a few weeks before his death. Of his Mémoires (3 v., 1920–21) Benedict XV said, "They should serve as a guide and example for ecclesiastics called to the Church's diplomatic corps."

Bibliography: U. STUTZ, Die päpstliche Diplomatie unter Leo XIII nach den Denkwürdigkeiten des Kardinals Domenico Ferrata (Berlin 1926). G. JACQUEMET, Catholiscisme 4:1198–99.

[W. H. PETERS]

FERREOLUS OF UZÈS, ST.

Bishop; b. the first half of the sixth century; d. Jan. 4, 581. GREGORY OF TOURS referred to him as the bishop of Uzès, a man of great sanctity, full of wisdom and intelligence, who wrote several books of letters after the example of SIDONIUS. These letters have not survived. Extant under his name, however, is a monastic rule, which, according to its preface, Ferreolus wrote for a monastery founded by him at Uzès; it shows dependence upon the BENEDICTINE RULE. Fragments of a vita of uncertain date and historical worth ascribe to him remarkable zeal in clerical reform. His activity in converting the Jews of his diocese gave rise to charges of political conspiracy and to a three-year exile, followed by exoneration and restoration to his see.

Feast: Jan. 4.

Bibliography: Rule, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1878–90) 66:959–976. GREGORY OF TOURS, Historia Francorum, 6:7, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–)1.1:276–277; Eng. tr. O. M. DALTON, 2 v. (Oxford 1927). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2901–02. L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 1:304. J. CHAPMAN, St. Benedict and the Sixth Century (New York 1929). J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 1:79.

[G. M. COOK]

FERRER ESTEVE, JOSÉ, BL.

Martyr, priest of the Order of Poor Clerics Regular of the Mother of God of the Pious Schools (Piarists); b. Feb. 17, 1904, in Algemesí, Valencia, Spain; d. Dec. 9, 1936. The novice master in Albarracín for the province of Valencia, José was a joyful, jovial man by nature, and his humor cheered his confreres daily. He also served as organist in Albarracín's cathedral. On July 10 he went to Algeneri for a rest with his parents. He remained there until Dec. 9, when he was arrested. During the night he was taken to a roadside location and shot. He was beatified on Oct. 1, 1995 by Pope John Paul II together with 12 other Piarists (see PAMPLONA, DIONISIO AND COMPANIONS, BB.).

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: "Decreto Super Martyrio," Acta Apostolicae Sedis (1995): 651–656. La Documentation Catholique 2125 (Nov. 5, 1995): 924.

[L. GENDERNALIK/EDS.]

FERRERI, ZACCARIA

Reform-minded Italian bishop and author; b. Vincenza, c. 1479; d. Rome, 1524. His writings indicate a thorough humanistic and theological training. Around 1494 he joined the Benedictines, becoming abbot c. 1504, but transferring to the Carthusians in 1508. Dissatisfied with the conditions in the Church, he left the contemplative life and entered politics. Espousing conciliar theory, he became the guiding spirit of a small group of cardinals who, supported by Maximilian I and Louis XII, called a general council (Conciliabulum) to meet at Pisa (1511). As secretary of the sparsely attended council, he published the Apologia sacri Pisani concilii moderni, drawing on Jean Gerson's theory of devolution and the decrees Sacrosancta and Frequens. Pope Julius II deflated the conciliar movement by issuing Sacrosancta Romanae ecclesiae (July 1511), convening the Lateran Council (1512), and excommunicating the participants in the Conciliabulum. Ferreri took refuge in France. Upon Leo X's accession (1513), he dedicated a poem to him in which he urged Church reform. He was absolved by Leo and appointed referendary. In 1519 he was named bishop of Guardalfiera, then nuncio to Russia and Poland (1519–21). In Thorn (Torun, 1520) he convened a synod to counter the spread of Lutheranism and published his Oratorio habita Thuronii and Vita Casimiri ex Poloniae (both Cracow 1521). To Adrian VI he addressed De reformatione ecclesiae suasoria . . . ad Hadrianum VI (Venice 1523), impassionately urging Church reform. His Hymni novi ecclesiastici (Rome 1525), revisions of hymns, were published as part of a general reform of the Roman Breviary initiated by Leo X. Contemporaries hailed Ferreri's pure Latin style. In humanistic exuberance, he referred to the Holy Trinity as triforme numen Olympi, to the Mother of God as nympha candidissima, and to God as deorum maximus rector.

Bibliography: B. MORSOLIN, Zaccaria Ferreri (Vicenza 1877) J. KLOTZNER, Kardinal D. Jacobazzi und sein Konzilswerk (Rome 1948) 227–236. W. MÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:91–92.

[F. F. STRAUSS]

FERRETTI, GABRIELE

Cardinal, papal secretary of state; b. Ancona, Italy, Jan. 31, 1795; d. Rome, Sept. 13, 1860. He came from a family of the lower nobility related to the family of Pius IX. After becoming bishop of Rieti (1827), he served as nuncio to Naples (1833-37) and archbishop of Fermo (1837-42) and became a cardinal (1839) and legate to Pesaro (December 1846). His liberal sympathies led Pius IX to name him secretary of state (July 5, to Dec. 31, 1847), succeeding Gizzi. An adherent of NEO-GUELFISM, Ferretti favored the Italian national cause, notably by seeking a tariff union with Piedmont; but he refused to go so far as to declare war on Austria. In the STATES OF THE CHURCH he sought to give some satisfaction to moderate liberal opinion, but contented himself with half-measures. His popularity was very high at the start, but declined rapidly, partly because of his very explosive disposition. After resigning the secretariate of state he was legate to Ravenna for some months before becoming grand penitentiary (1852), and then cardinal bishop of Sabina (1853). His generosity and integrity were widely esteemed.

Bibliography: D. SPADONI, Dizionario del risorgimento nazionale, ed. M. ROSI et al., 4 v. (Milan 1930–37) 3:80. A. M. GHISAL-BERTI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienzi, littere ed arti (Rome 1929–39) 15:63. L. FARINI, Lo stato romano dal 1815 al 1850, v.1 (Florence 1854). R. QUAZZA, Pio IX e Massimo d'Azeglio nelle vicende romane del 1847, 2 v. (Modena 1954–55).

[R. AUBERT]

FERRIÈRES-EN-GÂTINAIS, ABBEY OF

Former royal Benedictine monastery, in Ferrières, canton Gâtinais, about 40 miles northeast of Orléans, France, in the Diocese of Orléans, ancient Diocese of Sens (patrons, SS. Peter and Paul). About 630 Duke Vandalbert of Étampes installed monks there in a preexisting chapel. But nothing else is known of this monastery before ALCUIN is noted as its abbot during the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE. The abbey is known to have been rebuilt between 814 and 845. The exact affiliation of the original monks is not known, but the BENEDICTINE RULE was introduced there in 817, and Ferrières entered its period of splendor, producing men such as ALDRIC OF SENS, Lupus of Ferrières, and ADO OF VIENNE. After a period of decline it was restored both spiritually and temporally by King Louis VII of France in the 12th century. The calamities of the Hundred Years' War almost ruined the monastic life at the abbey. In 1521, despite the opposition of the monks, the contemporary CLUNIAC REFORM was introduced there, and a certain renewal of religious life resulted. The abbey was sacked by the Calvinists in 1568 to 1569 and had to be restored. It subsequently belonged in some manner to the Reform Congregation of Saint-Vanne (see VERDUN-SUR-MEUSE) and the so-called "Congregation of Saint Benedict'' before passing to the MAUR-ISTS in the mid-17th century (see BENEDICTINES). When the monastery was suppressed in 1790 during the French Revolution, only nine monks were in residence. The abbey church (12th century, partially restored after 1864) is preserved as an ancient monument and used as a parish church. The famed chapel of Notre-Dame-de-Bethléem has been restored and still attracts pilgrims. The claustral buildings were demolished.

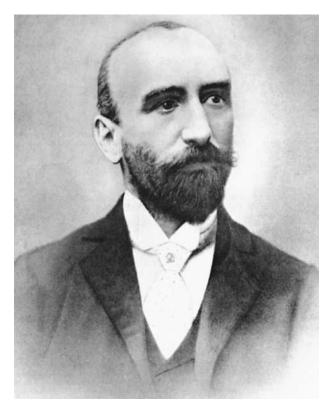

Bibliography: Gallia Christiana, v.1–13 (Paris 1715–85) 4:370–372. E. MARTÈNE and F. FORTET, Histoire de la congrégation de Saint-Maur, ed. G. CHARVIN, 9 v. in 5 (Archives de la France monastique 31–35, 42–43, 46–47; Ligugé 1928–43) 2:286, 3:235. M. AUBERT, Congrès archéologique de France 93 (1930) 219–232, with bibliog. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 4:1204–05.

[L. GAILLARD]

FERRINI, CONTARDO, BL.

University professor, jurist; b. Milan, April 4, 1859; d. Suna (Novara), Oct. 17, 1902. After receiving a degree in jurisprudence from the University of Pavia (1880), he spent two years at the University of Berlin pursuing graduate studies in ancient classics and ancient law. He was appointed (1887) professor of Roman law at the University of Messina, transferring to the University of Modena (1890) and to the University of Pavia (1894). Ferrini, reared and educated in a devout Catholic family, led a most exemplary life as a layman. He took a vow of celibacy in 1881 and became a Franciscan tertiary. Soon after his death, his reputation of sanctity led to the introduction of his cause before the Congregation of Rites (July 4, 1924). He was beatified April 13, 1947.

As one of the earliest serious Italian students of Byzantine law, he published a critical edition of the Greek Parafrasi: Institutionum graeca paraphrasis Theophilo antecessori vulgo tributa (1884–97). His profound knowledge of Oriental languages enabled him to complete the Latin translation of the Libro siro-romano. He collaborated in the edition of books 1–28 of the Digesta Iustiniani Augusti (1908). His Manuale di Pandette (1900) represents his research on several minor Roman jurists and on aspects of Roman and modern private law. His interest in Roman penal law resulted in the Esposizione storica e dottrinale del diritto penale romano (1899). Ferrini reconstructed the personality and doctrines of several Roman jurists in his Sulle fonti delle istituzioni di Giustiniano. His legal studies, save for his major works, have been collected in five volumes (Milan 1929–30).

Bl. Contardo Ferrini. (The Catholic University of America)

Feast: Oct. 17.

Bibliography: C. PELLEGRINI, La vita del professor Contardo Ferrini (2d ed. Turin 1928). B. JARRETT, Contardo Ferrini (London 1933). R. DANIELI. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURS-TON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 4: 210–213.

[H. R. MARRARO]

FERTILITY AND VEGETATION CULTS

The descriptive formulation of the subject makes a definition rather superfluous: vegetation and fertility cults are simply the rites concerned with the origin, growth, decay, death, and regeneration of created life. There is no essential difference between vegetation cults and fertility cults; the former are the specific form of the latter in the cultural (and agricultural) environment of planters and peasants.

Universality and Importance. In the history of religions these cults have an enormous importance because of their geographic universality, as well as because of their impact on the totality of religious life within the individual cultures. Although they are eminently typical of the cultures of early planters and later agricultural civilizations, they are not absent from other economic systems. The ceremonies by which hunters try to secure an abundant supply of game belong to a realm of religious experience identical with that of the sowing ceremonies in agriculture. Through their impact on the totality of religious life, for the fecundity of nature (plants, animals) is but an epiphany of the sacred power of life present in everything existing, they constitute a microcosmic participation in the life of the cosmos, ceaselessly regenerating itself.

Since religion is intimately connected with the existential situation of man in the cosmos, the central place of fertility and vegetation cults ought not to cause surprise, for they deal with the mystery of life itself: mortality and regeneration, the solidarity between all levels of existence, the necessity to kill in order to live or preserve life, etc. The cultures and civilizations of agrarian societies are really permeated with this sort of Weltanschauung that has been called "cosmobiology": the same divine rhythm that governs the universe governs and determines also human life, thus bringing it into harmony with reality through integrating it into the unity of existence. This rhythm, forcefully present to man in the constant renewal of vegetation, the process of birth and rebirth in nature, the cycle of human fertility, is connected spontaneously with the great cosmic hierophanies, each one of them commanding its own rites.

The Role of the Sky and Sky Gods. There is evidence that in most archaic cultures the sky was the great hierophany of fertility as well as of creation. This is still clear in the mythology of the Indo-Mediterranean religions, where the sky gods are somehow identified with bulls (with the earth as a cow) or with other animals that personify the male power of fecundation, such as the stallion, the ram, or the boar. Dyaus was known as suretah (good seed), and Zeus was the one who sent rain and assured the fertility of the fields. From the hierogamic union of the couple Sky-Earth, Dhyāvaprthivi, all life came forth. The earth, of course, is the Great Mother, the foundation of the universe. All things come from and return to the Tellus Mater. One of the most striking fertility cults will, therefore, be the ritual reenactment of this hierogamy, which may be consummated in the temple by the king or the priest acting as representatives of the god, and by the queen, the priest's wife, or a maiden who then sometimes remains in the enclosure of the sanctuary to continue her fertility function in sacred prostitution.

It is well known that sky gods, even when they remain as supreme beings in the religious consciousness of believers, have a tendency to become remote gods, dei otiosi. They are replaced in cult by more dynamic religious forces that represent or dispense fertility, exuberance of life, and vitality. The most important of such forces is the storm god. He is not "supreme," he does not represent the creation of the cosmos, he may even be second to the Great Goddess, being merely her spouse; but he is the Great Male, the Fecundator, the Bull, characterized by an often orgiastic and bloody cult. The rain is his sowing, and his hierophany is the ceaseless energy of biological renewal. Such are, e.g., Indra (the Sahasramuska, "the one with a thousand testicles"), Teshup and his Hittite counterpart, Enlil, Bel, and others. Similarly, the hierophany of the earth, originally cosmic, became chthonian with the appearance of agriculture. And just as the Sky God was replaced in the cult by the Fecundator-Storm God, so the Earth Mother was replaced by the Great Goddess of vegetation and harvesting (Corn Mother, etc.). Often the Storm God, the Goddess of Fertility, and their son, the God of Vegetation (the famous dying and rising, or vanishing and reappearing god), form a sort of triad in the fertility cults of agricultural societies.

These gods and goddesses of fertility are typically ambivalent, especially the Storm God: their power can be destroying as well as fecundating. Kālī, "the gentle and benevolent one," is represented as covered with blood and wearing a necklace of human skulls. This ambivalent character may to some extent explain also the ambivalent character of their cults, in which cruelty and serenity are frequently found together, although other factors-to be noted below-were more decisive. The Earth has the capacity of giving birth unceasingly to whatever is entrusted to her, however lifeless and sterile it may be. This concept has given origin to such rites as the humi positio in childbirth, burial in the position of an embryo, burying alive as a sacrifice, etc. There is, in agricultural societies, an obvious solidarity between the fertility of the land and the fertility of woman that commands a striking homology between woman and plowland, as between phallus and plow, and between semen and rain (or seed).

The Role of the Moon, Water, and Stones. Another important hierophany in the realm of vegetation and fertility cults is the moon. Subject to the universal law of becoming, birth, growth, decline, and death, the moon governs the rhythm of life, the cycles of fertility. She is a symbol of immortality, because her death is never final. The moon gives fertility, also, because she governs the fertilizing powers of the seas and the rains. A large number of fertility gods and goddesses have a lunar character. The moon and her animal epiphanies (snake, snail, bear, dog, frog) play an important role in fertility cults. The phallic cult, e.g., is frequently connected with the moon or the snake, or with both.

Water is the great symbol of potentiality, the universal Mother, the source of everything existing, of all life and growth. Immersion rites effect a return to this state of potentiality, a reintegration into preexistence, in order to increase the potential of life that brings about a total regeneration in a new birth.

Stones, such as cromlechs and menhirs, may have the power to fertilize a sterile woman. Hence the practice of sexual intercourse in front of stones.

The Role of Plants and Trees. Plant hierophanies are very often connected with the idea of a mystical relationship between mankind and vegetation: dead heroes are changed into plants, the human race originates from a vegetable species, there is a hidden herb of immortality, etc. The tree is a most important hierophany of the living cosmos in its endless process of renewal and regeneration. The ritual importance of the cosmic tree, the axis mundi, the tree of life, is well known. Vegetation gods are frequently represented as trees. In India and Africa sap-filled trees are theophanies of divine motherhood. They are sought by women who want to become fertile and by the spirits of the dead who want to be reborn. Other rites commanded by this hierophany are: birth at the foot of a tree, placing in or going through the hollow of a tree as a cure for illness, the "marriage of trees" in order to procure fertility for a sterile woman, the ceremonial planting or burning of trees, the Maypole ceremonies, etc.

The root crop cultivators developed the central mythic theme of what has been called, since Jensen, the dema, a mythical divine or semidivine being, ritually slain, from whose dismembered body the first plants originated. Human, and—sometimes by way of substitution—animal sacrifices, in which the victim may be cut to pieces, reenact this primeval mythical event. Head hunting, cannibalism, and other bloody rites are based in this general ideology.

Ancestors and Fertility Cults. The homology between the seeds and the dead, both buried in the womb of Mother Earth, is basic for the connection of ancestors with vegetation and fertility. Chthonian fertility divinities easily absorb fertility rites, even to the point of turning them into sacrifices to ancestors. The mystery religions are based on this homology and solidarity between the dead and vegetation: redemption through rebirth follows death and disintegration in a larval mode of existence. But all vegetation cults are based on a conscious or unconscious idea that man is regenerated by sharing in the resurrection of vegetal forms of life or, at least, attains a "created" immortality, which is not an individual one but rather the endless continuance of his species.

Major Role of Fertility Cults in Agricultural Civilizations. Fertility and vegetation cults found their highest development in the religions of agricultural civilizations. One would be justified in saying that agriculture, farm labor itself, is the fertility cult par excellence. It deals with the holiness of life and actively intervenes in its process, unleashing the holy power of vegetation hidden in the womb of Mother Earth. Sowing, tilling the soil, harvesting, reaping the first or the last sheaf are therefore surrounded with rites. Some of them have a marked propitiatory nature, connected with the anxiety not to exhaust the life of nature by taking its fruits, or with the idea that the sacred forces dwelling in the vegetable world must be reconciled with the destructive human interference by the offering of the first fruits, etc. Some are intended to assist the growth of the plants and hallow the work of the farmer, such as ceremonial nakedness, seminal or phallic symbolism, and similar phenomena.

The application of human sexuality to vegetation is typical: the ritual mating of a couple, reenacting the cosmic hierogamy on plowed land, usually in the spring, in order to stimulate the creative forces of nature. Vice versa, human fertility may also be stimulated by the biocosmic energy present in plant life. The ritual of the hierogamy may be followed by a collective orgy that seems to have a double function: to reenact the creative union of the divine couple but also to reenter the primal, pregerminative state of chaos and dissolution from which new life will originate. Many rites are connected with the reappearance of vegetative life in the spring: the battle between winter and summer, the driving out or killing of winter, the bringing in of spring, surviving in carnival and May celebrations. They all somehow make the primeval act of generation present as the active force of periodical renewal. The basic conviction behind all these cults is that vegetation shares eminently in the creative force of life, ceaselessly manifesting itself in the regeneration of an endless variety of forms.

Bibliography: M. ELIADE, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1958); Images and Symbols, tr. P. MAIRET (New York 1961). J. G. FRAZER, The Golden Bough, 12 v. (3d ed. London 1911–15). W. LIUNGMAN, Traditionswanderungen: Eu- phrat-Rhein, 2 v. (Helsinki 1937–38). A. E. JENSEN, Myth and Cult among Primitive Peoples, tr. M. T. CHOLDIN and W. WEISSLEDER (Chicago 1963). F. M. BERGOUNIOUX and J. GOETZ, Les Religions des préhistoriques et des Primitifs (Paris 1958). J. J. MEYER, Trilogie altindischer Mächte und Feste der Vegetation (Zurich 1937). A. DIETERICH, Mutter Erde (3d ed. Berlin 1925). W. SCHMIDT, Das Mutterrecht (Fribourg 1955). C. HENTZE, Mythes et symboles lunaires (Antwerp 1932). La Lune, mythes et rites (Sources Orientales 5; Paris 1962).

[F. DE GRAEVE]

FERTILITY AND VEGETATION CULTS (IN THE BIBLE)

After Israel's conquest of Canaan one of the greatest dangers to the covenant made with YAHWEH at Mount SINAI was the widespread practice of vegetation and fertility cults by the Canaanites who had not been entirely eliminated by the invading Israelites (Jgs 2.20–23). The Canaanite farmer had been accustomed for ages to attribute a fruitful harvest to the mythical powers of his gods. The sexual activity of the male and female gods, BAAL and Anath (Baalath), were considered by him to be the source of the land's fertility.

The texts discovered at UGARIT from 1929 on give extensive information about this cult (Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament 129-155). Baal, the god of rain and vegetation, was killed each summer and carried off to the underworld by Mot, the god of death (no rain falls in Palestine from late April to late October). Anath went searching for her brother (and consort), and when she found him, she killed Mot and brought Baal back to life. Because of the reunion of the lovers, the rains returned, mingled with the earth, and stirred up again the powers of fertility. Man was not merely a spectator of this mythical union. By ritually enacting the drama of Baal and Anath through sexual union with a temple prostitute, as it was believed, man aided in bringing the divine pair together again in a fertilizing union, thus assuring a bountiful harvest.

Many of the Israelites in their transition from a nomadic to a sedentary existence were attracted to this cult and turned away from the God of the Sinai covenant to Baal, the lord of the farm lands that they had conquered. The syncretistic adoption of Canaanite fertility superstitions is attested by the numerous mother-goddess figurines uncovered in Israelite archeological sites, although the figurines may not have been used as idols, but merely as amulets assuring successful childbirth. It is attested also by the constant polemic carried on by the Prophets against the worship of Baal, ASTARTE, and Asherah (identified in Israel with Anath).

FESTA, COSTANZO

The struggle against the fertility cults was obviously the source of the characterization of unfaithfulness to Israel's God as adultery and fornication (Hos 2.4–15). In Dt 23.18–19 cultic prostitution is expressly forbidden, undoubtedly as a reaction to the practice of fertility rites in the Temple itself during the reigns of Manasseh and Amon (2 Kgs 23.7). Evidence of the continued popularity of fertility rites, even after the fall of Jerusalem, is found in Jer 44.15–30, where the cult of Ishtar, the queen of heaven (Astarte), is condemned. The main argument against these cults was that Yahweh is the Lord of all in fruitfulness (Gn 27.28; Dt 7.13); He is not part of the process of fertility, has no female consort, but loves Israel as a husband loves his wife (Hos 2.16–3.5; 2.1–3).

Bibliography: C. M. EDSMAN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:1166–68. A. CLOSS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:410. W. F. ALBRIGHT, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (Baltimore 1946; 4th ed. 1956). J. L. MCKENZIE, Myths and Realities: Studies in Biblical Theology (Milwaukee 1963) 85–132. H. G. MAY, "The Fertility Cult in Hosea," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures 48 (1931–32) 73–98.

[H. MUELLER]

FESCH, JOSEPH

Cardinal; b. Ajaccio, Corsica, Jan. 3, 1763; d. Rome, May 13, 1839. His father, François, a native of Basel, was a military officer in the service of Geneva. Through his mother, Angela Pietrasanta, he was the half brother of Letizia Ramolino, and uncle of her children NAPOLEON and Joseph BONAPARTE, who were his companions in youth. A priest in 1785, he was archdeacon of Ajaccio at the outbreak of the FRENCH REVOLUTION, and took the oath of obedience to the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY (1791). Expelled by his fellow countrymen, he took refuge in France (1793), renounced the ecclesiastical state, and devoted himself for eight years to profitable business enterprises. Napoleon, general of the French army in Italy, helped promote his fortune. When the first consul reestablished Catholicism in France by the CONCORDAT OF 1801, Fesch obtained absolution (April 1802) and reentered the Church. His nephew had him named archbishop of Lyons (July 1802), and then ambassador to the Holy See (1803). Pius VII created him cardinal (1803). He resided in Rome from May 1803 until April 1806. He was the one who induced Pius VII to come to Paris for the imperial consecration and coronation of Napoleon I (Dec. 2, 1804). On the eve of the consecration, he officiated at the marriage of Napoleon and Josephine, but later he pronounced the union null when the emperor decided (1809) to marry Marie Louise of Austria. When he failed to convince the Holy See that it should be part of the Great Empire of the West, he was recalled as ambassador.

He then dwelt at the French court (1806-12) as Grand Almoner and counselor in ecclesiastical affairs. The role of mediator was forced on him during the differences between the emperor and the pope, causing him to be accused in Paris of being complaisant to the Vatican, and at the Vatican, of GALLICANISM. Napoleon confided to Fesch the presidency of the National Council convened in Paris (1811) by the emperor. But, discontent with the weakness of Fesch, and with the resistance of the majority of the bishops, Napoleon brutally dismissed him. Fesch had to return to his diocese, where he had scarcely ever resided, although he had confided it to the care of excellent vicars-general. Thereupon a veritable religious renaissance followed, with six seminaries erected, numerous vocations, and even new congregations. But Napoleon became irritated at the ultramontane and royalist opposition to him among Catholics, and raged against ecclesiastics who were partisans of Pius VII. A persecution seemed imminent when Napoleon's military defeats led to the invasion of French soil. Before the allies reached Lyons, Fesch had fled to seek refuge with the pope himself.

The cardinal had to pass his last 25 years in Rome, leading a pious and retired existence. Pius VII and Leo XII took away his jurisdiction over his diocese, but he persisted in retaining the title archbishop of Lyons. His last will disposed of important legacies to his diocese, where he was generally forgotten by the time of his death.

Bibliography: F. MASSON, Napoleon et sa famille, 13 v. (Paris 1897–1919), hostile. A. LATREILLE, Napoléon et le Saint-Siège: l'ambassade du Cardinal Fesch à Rome (Paris 1935).

[A. LATREILLE]

FESTA, COSTANZO

Important composer of the first Italian madrigals; b. Rome, c. 1490; d. Rome, April 10, 1545. From c. 1517 until his death he was a member of the papal chapel choir. The inclusion of four of his works in the French Codex Medici (c. 1517–19) and his mention in Rabelais's Quart Livre indicate that he was in France as composer to Louis XII (1462–1515) prior to his engagement in Rome. His sacred compositions include most of the Renaissance forms—Masses, motets, hymns, Magnificats, and a fourvoice Te Deum that is still performed at the Vatican. His style, which had a marked influence on that of PALESTRI-NA, derives from the Flemish technique, but he introduced homophonic chordal passages and nonimitative counterpoint. His renown as a madrigalist is attested to by the many publications of his works both during and after his lifetime, and he has been called Italy's chief musician in the age of Ariosto and Michelangelo.

Bibliography: Opera omnia, ed. A. MAIN, Corpus Mensurablis musicae, ed. American Institute of Musicology, v. 25; (Rome 1962–). E. E. LOWINSKY, "The Medici Codex," Annales Musicologiques 5 (1957) 61–178. K. JEPPESEN, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949–) 4:90–102. G. REESE, Music in the Renaissance (rev. ed. New York 1959). A. MAIN, "Costanzo Festa" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 6, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 501–504. H. MUSCH, Costanzo Festa als Madrigalkomponist (Baden-Baden 1977). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music 265 (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1996). N. SLONIMSKY, ed. Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 534.

[F. J. GUENTNER]

FESTIVIS RESONENT COMPITA VOCIBUS

Office hymn that was formerly prescribed for the Feast of the Precious Blood in the Tridentine liturgical calendar. It is a composition of an unknown author of the 17th century, written in honor of the Precious Blood shed for man's salvation. Its seven strophes employ the asclepiadic meter, with minor asclepiadic in the first three lines of each strophe and glyconic in the fourth.

Bibliography: M. BRITT, ed., The Hymns of the Breviary and Missal (new ed. New York 1948) 251–254. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 204–205.

[J. P. MCCORMICK]

FESTUS, PORCIUS

Roman procurator of Palestine (c. 60-62) who sent St. Paul to Rome for trial at the Emperor's tribunal. He was an honest and capable administrator, but he did not live long enough to lessen the Jewish hostility toward Rome that had grown to dangerous proportions during the preceding decades. During his administration a case of mob violence in Caesarea and a rebellion in the desert was suppressed. The Jews urged Festus to bring Paul, whom his predecessor Marcus Antonius FELIX had left in prison for two years at Caesarea, to Jerusalem for trial before the Sanhedrin (Acts 24.27-25.9); but Paul, knowing that this was merely a ruse for killing him on the way, claimed his right as a Roman citizen to be tried before the Emperor's tribunal in Rome (25.10-12). In order to have a fuller report on the case, Festus had Paul plead his case before Herod AGRIPPA II and Berenice (25.13-26.31). Agrippa's opinion was that "this man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Caesar'' (25.32). Bibliography: M. LAMBERTZ, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft 22.1 (1953) 220–227. F. M. ABEL, Histoire de la Palestine depuis la Conquête d'Alexandre jusqu'à l'invasion Arabe, 2 v. (Études bibliques 1952) 1:468–470. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible 770. S. SANDMEL, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible 2:265–266. J. SCHMID, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:101.

[F. J. BUCKLEY]

FETHERSTON, RICHARD, BL.

Priest, martyr; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Smithfield (London), July 30, 1540. Fr. Fetherston, archdeacon of Brecknock, earned his doctorate in theology at Cambridge. He served as chaplain to Queen Catherine of Aragon and as Latin tutor to Princess Mary, who succeeded her brother Edward to the throne. He spoke in favor of the validity of the marriage of Catherine and Henry VIII during the divorce proceedings and again during a Convocation that began in April 1529. Friction with the king began when he was one of the few members of the Convocation who refused to sign the act declaring the marriage illegal from the beginning. In 1534, upon refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy, he was imprisoned in the Tower of London for six years (Dec. 13, 1534 to July 30, 1540). He was attainted for high treason and executed, together with BB. Thomas ABELL and Edward POW-ELL, who had also been councillors to Queen Catharine in the divorce proceedings. They were beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); July 30 (Wales).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FÉTIS, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH

Composer, critic, and musicographer whose writings exerted a great influence on music in France and Belgium; b. Mons, Belgium, March 25, 1784; d. Brussels, March 26, 1871. Fétis began his music studies with his father, an organist, and continued them at the Paris Conservatory, where he took the Prix de Rome in 1807. He was librarian of the conservatory from 1826 to 1833, and almost single-handedly edited the Revue Musicale from 1827 to 1835. When the Brussels Conservatory was founded in 1833, he was appointed director and at the same time chapel master to Leopold I of the Belgians. About 1807 the music of the past had begun to command his attention, probably through the researches of Choron, who had published his first editions of DESPREZ and PA-LESTRINA in 1805. Fétis himself spent many years preparing a critical edition of GREGORIAN CHANT, which was never brought to completion. His important publications are the eight-volume Biographie universelle des musiciens et bibliographie générale de la musique (1835) and five-volume Histoire générale de la musique depuis les temps les plus anciens (1869-75). These works, which are still consulted profitably despite their errors and assumptions, bespeak his informed and broad view of music history. Far from regarding the harmonic system of his own time as the only one possible, Fétis recognized the value of non-Western systems and in that respect is one of the great precursors of ethnomusicology. He also foresaw the development of atonality and even of serial (tone-row) technique. Among his own compositions are pianoforte, chamber, and symphonic works; operas and comic operas; and, in the sacred category, a five-voice Mass, several "easy" Masses, a Requiem, Te Deum, and Vesper Psalm settings.

Bibliography: R. WANGERMÉE, François Joseph Fétis (Brussels 1951); Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 4:129-136. C. R. HALSKI, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 3:75-77. Histoire de la musique, ed. ROLAND-MANUEL, 2 v. (Paris 1960-63); v. 9, 16 of Encyclopédie de la Pléiade v. 2. M. I. ARLIN, ed. Esquisse de l'histoire de l'harmonie: An English-Language Translation of the François-Joseph Fétis "History of Harmony" (Hillsboro, N.Y. 1994). D. LEWIN, "Concerning the Inspired Revelation of F.-J. Fétis," Theoria: Historical Aspects of Music Theory, 2 (1987) 1-12. D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Mass. 1996) 265. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (8th ed. New York 1992) 534. R. WANGERMÉE, "François-Joseph Fétis," in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians ed. S. SADIE, v. 6 (New York 1980) 511-514.

[S. CORBIN]

FEUDALISM

A much-debated historians' construct, derived etymologically from the term "fief" (Latin, feodum), used variously to describe legal, political, military, social, and economic features of western European society between the eighth and the fifteenth centuries. Its focus has conventionally been the fief (land as well as the rights and obligations attached to its possession), given conditionally by a lay or clerical lord to a lay or clerical vassal in return for the vassal's oath of homage and fidelity and the ensuing reciprocal obligations on the part of both. The military aristocracy (clerical vassals might provide military service or acts of piety that benefited the lord) thus created expressed its identity by rituals of homage and oaths (and by rituals that dissolved the relationship or accomodated loyalty to more than one lord) and by adopting a particular style of life and behavior. It lived from the labor of peasant cultivators whom it reduced from free status to serfdom. The implication of the suffix "-ism" is that these institutions were far more coherent and systematic than historians have found them to have been. In casual use the term is sometimes used adjectivally (as feudal) and usually pejoratively to characterize medieval European society as a whole. In a specialized sense derived partly from anthropology it is sometimes used comparatively for the study of features believed to be common to western Europe and other Eurasian civilizations. In a distinctive Marxist sense the term designates a stage of socio-economic history between the slave mode of production of antiquity and the capitalist mode, characterized by the extraction of material resources from an obligated class of inferior agricultural laborers by a class of lords which had appropriated to itself key elements of public authority and lived off tributary labor. The Maxist thesis is now sometimes termed the tributary mode of production.

Peasant paying feudal dues to the clergy of Tournai, 15th Century. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Different and often conflicting definitions of feudalism appeared very early, in the debates over noble and clerical privilege and royal government in France, as well as their origin and constitutional meaning, between the sixteenth and the late eighteenth centuries. Because different meanings of the term are historically derived, this article will begin with an account of the changing history of the term and its meanings, then isolate the elements that have been thought constitutive of it, outline a typology of definitions, and conclude with a survey of current research.

THE DEBATES OVER FEUDAL LAW AND THE ORIGINS OF FRANCE IN EARLY MODERN EUROPE (1539-1789).

The Libri Feudorum, or Books concerning Fiefs, was a compilation of twelfth- and thirteenth-century legal texts and opinions from northern Italy concerning property, security of tenure, and heritability. It was often taught and commented on as an appendage to learned Roman Law in European universities after the twelfth century. The fifteenth-century jurist Giacomo Alvarotto (1385–1453) claimed that the Libri Feudorum represented universal property law, was a feudalis scientia, and that different customs concerning landholding and noble status in different parts of Europe could be reconciled to the principles of that "feudal science."

Legal scholars long debated whether this law and the institutions it described and dealt with were originally Roman or an independent post-Roman creation of the Lombards or Franks, and hence Germanic in origin; it therefore became an essential problem for determining the origins of France. The first modern commentary on the work was written by the French jurist Charles Dumoulin in 1539, as part of the debate as to whether French law was independent of Roman law, and therefore autonomous, or indebted to Roman or Lombard law. Dumoulin denied the authority of the Libri Feudorum, arguing that it had no standing in France, but he also asserted that the Frankish invention of the fief antedated the Libri Feudorum and that the nobility of France was directly descended from ancient Frankish war leaders, while the peasantry was descended from the subjugated Gauls. The problem of the origin of the fief and therefore of the French nobility became a question for both historians and jurists. This argument was taken up vigorously by the jurist-publicist François Hotman, who argued for the validity of the living force of customary law as an expression of national identity and the rejection of Roman law. The jurist Jacques Cujas published his edition of the Libri Feudorum in 1566 (reissued and revised in 1567 and reprinted in 1773), and Hotman expressed his theory in the Tripartite Commentary on Fiefs and the Francogallia in 1573.

The views and authority of Dumoulin, Cujas, and Hotman were acknowledged by later French jurists, particularly those specialists known as feudistes, in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The feudistes specialized in the highly technical law concerning the property and privileges of the nobility and supported the efforts of the nobility to maximize its income by expanding and strictly enforcing ancient claims of privilege. Their work also contributed to the association of the technical legal term féodalité with the increasing general hostility to noble and clerical privilege.

At the same time, a number of historians dealt with the origin of the fief from the political perspectives of both nobility and royalty. Particularly influential was the book, État de la France, published in 1727 by H. de Boulainvilliers, that claimed for the nobility certain sovereign rights independent of those of the king. According to Boulainvilliers, the nobility was descended from the free and equal Franks who had conquered the enslaved Gauls and elected one of their own, CLOVIS, as king. Boulainvilliers' chief critic, the Abbé Dubos, countered in 1742 with a royalist version of Frankish history according to which the king, not the nobles, originally controlled and distributed lands and rights of justice. Dubos' royalist arguments in turn attracted the criticism of Montesquieu, who, in 1748 in Books XXX and XXXI of The Spirit of the Laws, replaced Dubos' strongly royalist interpretation with a mediated history that saw considerable historical cooperation between king and nobles. On the very eve of the French Revolution of 1789, therefore, the questions of the ancient constitution of France and the place of fiefs and the rights of the nobility which held them and the rights pertaining to them were still being vigorously debated.

The debates in sixteenth- and seventeenth-century France were echoed in Scotland and England where Thomas Craig (1538–1608) in his Jus Feudale of 1603 and Henry Spelman applied the systematic teaching terminology of French jurists concerning the rules of land tenure, the forfeiture of tenure, and the hereditability of tenure to the property laws of Scotland and England. In England, too, legal arguments of this kind were used in the service of both sides in the debates over the limitedroyalist idea of the ancient constitution and the strongly royalist idea of a king-imposed feudal law in the late seventeenth century. From the very outset of discussions of feudal law in France and England in the seventeenth century there was a political dimension to the legal and historical debates.

In a series of decrees issued between Aug. 4 and 11, 1789, the National Constituent Assembly of France claimed that it had "completely abolished the feudal regime," which it considered a particularly dangerous component of the ancien régime. The elements of the "feudal regime" that it demolished were personal servitude (mainmorte), such aristocratic and lordly rights as pertained to restricted areas for hunting, all judicial courts held by aristocrats and their agents, tithes to churches and monasteries as well as perquisites of local priests and financial contributions to Rome, the purchase of public office, unequal payment of taxes because of social or legal status, all guilds, corporations, and universities, and all inequality of birth and access to employment. Other critics even included the survival of numerous regional and local dialects of French and various patois as vestiges of a feudal society. As diverse in origin and character as these elements were, the assembly saw in their combination, nevertheless, a feudal world that had to go. Its most abhorrent features were, according to the Preamble to the Constitution of 1791, "the institutions that offended against liberty and equal rights." According to Alexis de Tocqueville, they "were commonly referred to under the heading of feudal institutions." In early French revolutionary thought it was feudalism that separated the nobles and clergy from the essential French nation-the Third Estate and the king.

The assembly's use of the term "feudal" in this context was broad enough to include ecclesiastical property and privilege as well, and it signalled the massive assault on the Roman Catholic church in France (including its Gallican version) that continued under the successive regimes of the revolution and had already appeared among ENLIGHTENMENT thinkers, especially VOLTAIRE. Clerical privilege also became one of the themes in the criticism of reactionary regimes after 1815, especially during the revolutions of 1830 and 1848. Such thought also crossed the Atlantic; from his reading of English and French literature on the subject, for example, the American John Adams wrote his treatise On the Canon and Feudal Laws.

HISTORIANS AND FEUDALISM IN THE NINETEENTH AND TWENTIETH CENTURIES.

In the early nineteenth century the adjective feudal (French, féodal) was gradually applied by historians to other areas of medieval society, expanding the original seventeenth-century meaning of the French term féodalité, originally translated as feudality, but by 1817 converted to feudalism. Already in the late eighteenth century Scots economic theorists—Adam Smith in 1763 and John Millar in the 1790s—had begun to characterize the earlier European economy as based on a system of property and government which conflicted with commerce and a market society, the third of four historical kinds of economy that they recognized: hunting, pastoral, agricultural, and commercial. In his Wealth of Nations of 1776, Smith appears to have been the first writer in English to use the phrase "the feudal system" as a social and economic category. By 1800 *féodalité/*feudality had come to mean a form of government characterized by the fragmentation of central authority, a socio-economic order, and a general term of contemporary abuse of practices that resembled those of the past. Anti-nobility also became the theme of a number of works by economists in the early nineteenth century, those of Claude-Henri de Saint-Simon (1760-1825) and the historian Augustin Thierry (1795-1856), and their views were broadened by the philosopher G. W. F. HEGEL.

The influence of this approach on Karl MARX produced Marx's savage characterization of feudalism as the seedbed of capitalism, in which the capitalist exploiter of the proletariat replaced the aristocratic exploiter of the peasant and merchant. Beginning with the German Ideology of 1845, and continuing with The Communist Manifesto of 1848, Marx and Friedrich Engels constructed their sequence of stages in the oppressive modes of production that preceded Socialism, in which feudalism found its Marxist place: Primitive Communist, Asiatic, Slave, Slavonic, Germanic, Feudal, and Capitalist.

But most nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century historians considered feudalism either as a legal, political, or military phenomenon from the perspective of legal or political history, as a socio-economic phenomenon, or as an economic system possessing a particular social structure. The sociologist Max Weber, who posited three forms of legitimate government in human history—the rational, the traditional, and the charismatic—located feudal government in the traditional category, lacking rationality and bureaucracy. It became one of Weber's Ideal Types and is still sometimes used in Weber's sense.

With the growth of academic, professional history in the later nineteenth century, scholars adopted a narrower and less pejorative view of feudalism, one characterized in 1875 by the French scholar Numa Fustel de Coulanges as a conditional possession of land which has been substituted for property in land, the existence of lordships that divided up the land and were ruled by men who had ceased to obey the king, and the dependence of these lordships on each other. The critical elements of the system were the benefice, the request for it and the precarious character of its tenure, patronage, the immunity, and fidelity between man and lord. Both academic historians and legal historians regarded feudalism as a slowly changing set of relations between superiors and inferiors in matters of landholding. Empirical academic historians rejected general theory and ideology, edited and published enormous numbers of texts, chiefly chronicles and private charters conveying land, and they withdrew from the older, broader characterizations of feudalism as a blanket term for the entire middle ages, narrowing to the general period from 800 to 1300 and focusing primarily on western Europe, particularly France. They also greatly expanded the study of the history of the nobility, rulership, and statebuilding. But they remained divided as to whether the phenomena they studied were purely legal and political, on the one hand, or social and economic, on the other.

The legal and political aspect of the problem was reflected in the work of the German constitutional historian, Heinrich Mitteis, and his followers. Mitteis considered the consolidation and ordering of the feudal system the basis for the modern constitutional state. Other historians, like the French scholar Henri Sée, insisted on the primarily economic and social character of feudalism. These two views were most strongly expressed in two works published within five years of each other, Marc Bloch's ambitious and immensely wide-ranging Feudal Society, published in two volumes in 1939 and 1940, and François Louis Ganshof's Feudalism of 1944. Bloch attempted to combine both the legal/political and social/economic views, including discussions even of the psychology and emotional life of the period, in a vast panorama of European social life between the ninth and the thirteenth centuries. Some of his views were published in an American encyclopedia as early as 1931. Ganshof offered the most concise and abstract institutional-legal account ever written.

Bloch posited two feudal ages, the first extending from the eighth century until around 1050 and the second from 1050 to the early thirteenth century. Bloch hinged the division between the two ages on the devastation caused by the invasions of the ninth and tenth centuries and their impact on the European economy, creating regimes of arbitrary lordship over an oppressed peasantry, the desertion of settlements, the displacement of agricultural populations, and general impoverishment. These in turn led to a privatizing of public authority, the collapse of public justice, the multiplication of knights and castles, the need of powerful men to recruit military servants, and the creative force of what Bloch termed "the bonds of dependence" between fighting men and their lords: homage, fief-giving, security of tenure, and the increasing heritability of the fief as an expression of dynastic consciousness. All of these became systematized during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, giving kings the opportunity to resume a process of statebuilding from the systematized base of the preceding centuries. Bloch included in his idea of feudal society the following elements:

> A subject peasantry; widespread use of the service tenement instead of a salary, which was out of the question; the supremacy of a class of specialized warriors; ties of obedience and protection which bind man to man and, within the warrior class, assume the distinctive form called vassalage; fragmentation of authority leading inevitably to disorder; and, in the midst of all this, the survival of other forms of association, family and State, of which the latter, during the second feudal age, was to acquire renewed strength. (Feudal Society, 443–445)

TYPOLOGY OF ELEMENTS ASSOCIATED WITH FEUDALISM.

Since the work of Bloch and Ganshof, the following elements have been used, either alone or in various or total combination, to identify feudalism. Some or all of them are spoken of as expanding between the tenth and the twelfth centuries from a core area between the Loire and Rhine rivers north into the Low Countries, west to England (especially after the Norman Conquest of 1066), south to Norman Sicily, east to Germany and then to the Latin Christian kingdom of Jerusalem during the twelfth century, and southwest into Catalonia.

Chronology and social conditions: The arguments for both the continuity from the CAROLINGIAN period to the twelfth century and for dramatic change around the year 1000 depend upon the analysis of political, economic, and social conditions during the ninth and tenth centuries.

Castellans and warlords. Specialized warriors who assume control over a small or large territory by building private castles and dominating the countryside, assembling a group of warriors around themselves, and depressing the status of the local free peasantry by brute coercion.

Ties of dependence. The establishment of a relationship by an oath-taking and giving ritual between two free men, acknowledging one of them to be superior and the other to be inferior (homage, from Latin, homagium [from homo, man], French hommage) and owing loyalty (fidelity) to the superior, may be understood to indicate the disintegration of a previously stable large-scale society or simply a changing relationship among members of the ruling orders of society.

The provision of military service. As weapons and the expense of acquiring them and training with them increased the need for specialized warriors, lords (from Latin, dominus; Old English hlaford [the giver of the loaf]; French seigneur) who could command and reward specialized warriors could use them to expand their own bases of power and territory.

The fief (from Old High German fihu, Latin feodum, French fief, German Lehen, Old English læn). Landed property with its attached rights, obligations, and revenues. Although neither fief nor benefice (Latin beneficium, French benefice) was a necessary part of the establishment of ties of dependence, it was one way of providing the necessary support for fighting men in service to another. The term feudalism itself derives from the fief. Sufficiently large fiefs could be in turn beneficed to vassals of the vassal (from Celtic qwas, Latin vassus, French vassal), a process known as subinfeudation. A vassal might also hold fiefs from more than one lord, leading to the distinction between liege homage and simple hommage, the former taking precedence over the latter.

The joining of fief and vassalage. Reinforces the superior-inferior relationship by the conditional transfer of property from lord to vassal in return for specified services from the vassal, often military.

Aids, Obligations, and Services. Besides military service, vassals were often obligated to pay a relief when the son of a vassal succeeded his father. If the vassal left a minor son or daughter the lord retained the right of wardship, which enabled him to collect the income from the fief and award such children in marriage to a favorite or a wealthy suitor. If the vassal left no heir, the fief was said to have reverted (escheated) to the lord. Other services and obligations included castle-guard, payments to the lord upon the knighting of his eldest son and marriage of his eldest daughter, the responsibility of contributing to the lord's ransom if he were captured, hospitality to the lord and his entourage when they were itinerary, and to offer the lord advice on matters of common interest to lords and vassals.

The segmentation of public authority. The assumption that something resembling a centralized monarchical government existed in the late eighth and ninth centuries and that this government disintegrated, opening the way for the appropriation of formerly public powers by individual, self-interested lords. In the thirteenth century the existence of the elements listed so far enabled rulers to re-establish stronger monarchies using the relationships among lords, between lords and vassals, and between lords and rulers as the basis for a new kind of centralizing state.

Rights of justice. Attached to fiefs, they parallel political decentralization by decentralizing the law, since formerly public rights of justice (the ban, those of the king or his agents, the counts) are now attached to fiefs and administered largely for purposes of personal profit by those who hold them.

Nobility. By linking lords and vassals in relationships based on the military culture of both, the warrior, or knight (Latin, miles; French, chevalier, German, Rit-ter; Old English, cniht) is slowly assimilated to the ranks of the nobility, which include even the highest-ranking dukes and counts, and in some cases the king.

Mentality. The expression of the values and temperament of noble warriors. At the upper levels of this society it is reflected in marriage patterns and dynastic consciousness and the growth of courtly values and a distinctive courtly literature. At the lower levels it characterizes the deliberate distancing on the part of knights from the peasantry. The oppression of disarmed peasants is one sign of the knightly status of the individual.

Seigneurialism. The rule of a local lord over the peasant population from whose compulsory, tributary labor he sustains himself. Lord and peasants together constitute the manorial system, in which the manor court and the power of the lord dominate the agricultural economy. Some historians argue that seigneurialism and manorialism constitute an area of social and economic life distinct from feudalism.

Feudal anarchy or alternate kinds of order? The elements described above have led to very different interpretations of their character. Earlier historians consistently characterized their various combinations as reflections of feudal anarchy, the nearly complete privatization of formerly public, governmental institutions for purely personal benefit. Other historians regard them rather as the imposition of an alternative form of order, one with its own rules and its own forms of stability.

FEUDALISM AFTER BLOCH AND GANSHOF

During the second half of the twentieth century, most historians concentrated more on Bloch's second feudal age as the only age of feudal society, generally discounting Bloch's earlier period as an archaic society with some of whose surviving institutions the lords of the eleventh and twelfth century worked differently. Other historians criticized Bloch's assumptions about the extent of the tenth-century crisis and argued for a much greater degree of continuity between Late Antiquity and the twelfth century, thereby posing the problem as one debated between scholars who argue for a gradual evolution of practices and institutions and those who see a "feudal revolution" or "feudal mutation" occurring around the turn of the second millennium.

Under the influence of anthropology, a number of scholars have also attempted to consider feudalism as a comparative subject that had European parallels elsewhere in Eurasia, particularly Japan. The new dynamics of the study of Late Antiquity and early medieval Europe made earlier discussions of Roman or Germanic origins of feudal institutions virtually a dead letter and encouraged the new focus on the study of the nobility, lesser military ranks, the peasantry, studies of particular regions, and a reassessment of the tenth- or eleventhcentury origins of the new forms of lordship and community.

The influential work of Georges Duby and his students, associates, and successors after 1953 represents the current state of research on the new chronology, based on detailed regional studies, studies of family structures, the study of ecclesiastical grants of land by great monasteries and powerful bishops, not only in northern France and the Rhineland, but in the French Midi, Catalonia, central and southern Italy, and the Low Countries, with England now considered less an exceptional case than it traditionally had been, chiefly because of the strong central rule imposed by WILLIAM I (the Conqueror) and his immediate successors. Most scholars are also more reluctant to assume the existence of all of the elements discussed above as essential to a feudal system. Seigneurialism and manorialism, which focus on the estate or village community and its internal rule, especially tend to be considered independently of those elements that characterize the life of nobles or those rising into the nobility. Instead of feudal anarchy, historians are beginning to find both a cultural and political order in the world of eleventh- and twelfth-century nobles and rulers.

In spite of the complete transformation of both the sources and the methodology of Bloch and Ganshof in the second half of the twentieth century, a number of articulate scholars have continued to urge that the term feudalism be dropped from the historian's vocabulary and mind. Since a famous and widely debated essay published by Elizabeth A. R. Brown in 1974, and especially since the highly critical book by Susan Reynolds, Fiefs and Vassals, in 1994, a line has been drawn between historians who accept the idea of a feudal revolution or mutation around the turn of the second millennium and are willing to use the adjective feudal to describe the society that emerged from it, and those who find the abstract term feudalism too imprecise and overloaded with implications of homogeneity and consistency in a period and place that had neither, or else possessed some features that may be properly termed feudal but lacked others. Like most complex scholarly questions, the history ends in a lively and continuing debate.

Bibliography: On the origins of the debate. E. CARCASONNE, Montesquieu et le problème de la constitution française au XVIII siècle (Paris 1927). J. G. A. POCOCK, The Ancient Constitution and the Feudal Law (Cambridge 1957; repr. New York 1967), esp. chs. 1 and 4. D. KELLEY, The Foundations of Modern Historical Scholarship (New York 1970), esp. chs. 6 and 7. J.Q.C. MACKRELL, The Attack on Feudalism in Eighteenth-Century France (London-Toronto 1973). P. GOUBERT, The Ancien Régime: French Society 1600–1750, tr. S. COX (New York-Evanston 1973). T. CRAIG, Jus Feudale, tr. J. A. CLYDE (Edinburgh 1934), with an appended translation of the Libri Feudorum. On nineteenth-century development. O. BRUNNER and O. HINTZE in Lordship and Community in Medieval Europe, ed. F. L. CHEYETTE (New York 1968). R. BOUTRUCHE, Seigneurie et féodalité: le premier âge des liens d'homme à homme (Paris 1968) 1: 11-25. P. OURLIAC, "La féodalité et son histoire," Revue historique du droit français et étranger 73 (1995) 1-21. D. HERLIHY, ed., The History of Feudalism (New York-London 1970). B. DISTELKAMP, "Heinrich Mitteis Lehnrecht und Staatsgewalt im Lichte moderner Forschung," in Heinrich Mitteis nach hundert Jahren (1889-1989), P. LANDAU, H. NEHLSEN, and D. WILLOWEIT, eds. (Munich 1991) 11-22, as well as other essays in the same volume. On the modern divided approach. M. BLOCH, Feudal Society, tr. L. A. MANYON (Chicago 1961). F. L. GANSHOF, Feudalism, tr. P. GRIERSON (London 1952). G. DUBY, La société aux XIe et XIIe siècles dans la région mâconnaise (Paris 1953); The Three Orders: Feudal Society Examined, tr. A. GOLDHAMMER (Chicago 1978). J. R. STRAYER, Feudalism (Princeton 1965), considers feudalism chiefly in political terms. T. EVERGATES, Feudal Society in Medieval France: Documents from the County of Champagne (Philadelphia 1993), the most important collection of documents in English. Recent studies in the tradition of Bloch. J.-P. POLY and E. BOURNA-ZEL, The Feudal Transformation, 900–1200, tr. C. HIGGITT (New York-London 1991). Past & Present, 142 (1994), 152 (1996), and 155 (1997), an important series of exchanges among Thomas Bisson, Dominique Barthélemy, Stephen D. White, Timothy Reuter, and Chris Wickham. T. M. BISSON, "Medieval Lordship," Speculum 70 (1995). E. BOURNAZEL and J.-P. POLY, eds., Les féodalités (Paris 1998). D. BARTHÉLEMY, La mutation de l'an mil a-t-elle eu lieu? (Paris 1998). E. MAGNOU-NORTIER, "The Enemies of the Peace: Reflections on a Vocabulary, 500-1100," in The Peace of God, T. HEAD and R. LANDES, eds. (Ithaca-London 1992) 58-79. H.-W. GOETZ, "Serfdom and the Beginnings of a 'Seigneurial System' in the Carolingian Period: A Survey of the Evidence," Early Medieval Europe 2 (1993) 29-51. P. FOURACRE, The Age of Charles Martel (London-New York 2000) 121-154. E. A. R. BROWN, "The Tyranny of a Construct: Feudalism and Historians of Medieval Europe," American Historical Review 79 (1974) 1063-1088. S. REY-NOLDS, Fiefs and Vassals (Oxford 1994); "Afterthoughts on Fiefs and Vassals," The Haskins Society Journal 9 (1997, published 2001) 1-15. P. ANDERSON, Passages from Antiquity to Feudalism (London 1974). C. WICKHAM, "The Other Transition: From the Ancient World to Feudalism," Past & Present 103 (1984) 3-36. R. COULBORN, ed., Feudalism in History (Princeton 1956). E. LEACH, S. N. MUKHERJEE, and J. WARD, eds., Feudalism: Comparative Studies (Sydney 1985), valuable especially for Ward's detailed typological analysis. H. MUKHIA, The Feudalism Debate (Manohar 1999).

[E. PETERS]

FEUERBACH, LUDWIG ANDREAS

German philosopher; b. Landshut, July 28, 1804; d. Rechenberg, near Nürnberg, Sept. 13, 1872; a proponent of atheistic humanism, he prepared the way for Karl Marx's dialectical and historical materialism with his criticisms of Hegelian philosophy.

Feuerbach originally embarked upon a theological course of studies, but abandoned this to study philosophy under HEGEL in Berlin. For a short time he taught at the University of Erlangen, then withdrew from the faculty after he was discovered and criticized as author of an anonymous work, Gedanken eines Denkers über Tod und Unsterblichkeit (1830), which denied the immortality of the soul. He then retired to an estate in the country, where his wife's affluence allowed him to lead a life of private study.

Initially a fervent Hegelian, Feuerbach soon became convinced that Hegel's philosophy is too idealistic and does not pay sufficient attention to man in his physical environment. In an article in the Hallische Jahrbücher (1839) that was to determine the further development of left-wing Hegelianism, he attacked Hegel's IDEALISM for spiritualizing nature and taking away its proper reality. According to Hegel, nature has no concrete reality in itself: it is a mere estrangement of the Absolute Spirit. For Feuerbach, the relation between idea and concrete reality is to be reversed; rather than seek the explanation of man in a superhuman, immaterial "Idea," as Hegel did, philosophy should look for the origin of all ideology in man's concrete, material reality.

In his major work, Das Wesen des Christentums (1841), Feuerbach applied this principle to the special case of religion. Man in his relation to nature is the first and ultimate reality. But in religion man projects his own nature into an imaginary world above him. To an illusionary Being he ascribes qualities that rightly belong to the human species as a whole; all the attributes predicated of God are therefore derived from man's own nature. The cause of this self-estrangement Feuerbach finds in man's consciousness of his individual limitation. Unable to face limitations that humiliate him personally, man blames the entire human nature for them and attributes the perfections of the species to a Supreme Being. The task of Feuerbach's anthropology is to restore to man all the qualities he has estranged from himself in religion, and to make him aware of the fact that he is his own God.

In an article published in 1842, Vorläufige Thesen zur Reform der Philosophie, Feuerbach extended his critique of religion to all speculative philosophy, particularly Hegelianism. Philosophy is in fact a pseudotheology, and Hegel's Idea fulfills the same function as God in religion: it places the essence of man outside man. This article, as well as Das Wesen des Christentums, profoundly influenced Marx in his interpretation and use of the Hegelian dialectic. In his later work Feuerbach gradually evolved toward MATERIALISM; more and more he came to see man as a physical being whose thoughts and feelings are determined by his material living conditions. Later, Marx would criticize this materialism in the Theses on Feuerbach and distinguish his own, more dialectical position from Feuerbach's. Historically Feuerbach remains an important figure because he was the first philosopher in the Christian world openly to defend humanistic ATHEISM, and also because his work has influenced the development of Marxism more than that of any other thinker except Hegel. His theory on the origin of religion is simplistic and has been abandoned today. His criticism of Hegel is based on a misunderstanding of Hegel's Idea, which is not solely logical or spiritual, as Feuerbach assumes, but the selfdevelopment of reality as well as thought.

See Also: HEGELIANISM AND NEO-HEGELIANISM; MATERIALISM, DIALECTICAL AND HISTORICAL.

Bibliography: L. A. FEUERBACH, Sämtliche werke, ed. W. BOLIN and F. JODL, 10 v. (Stuttgart 1959–60); The Essence of Christianity, tr. G. ELIOT (New York 1957). W. B. CHAMBERLAIN, Heaven Wasn't His Destination: The Philosophy of Ludwig Feuerbach (London 1941).

[L. DUPRÉ]

FEUILLANTS

The Feuillants were founded by Jean de la BARRIÈRE as the reformed branch of the Cistercians in 1577, suppressed in 1791. As regular abbot in 1577, Jean undertook the reform of the Cistercian Monastery of Les Feuillants near Toulouse, and within a decade had transformed it into a flourishing monastery. Sixtus V gave preliminary approval of the reform in 1586 and the movement spread in France and Italy. In 1592 Clement VIII approved the Feuillants (Fulienses) as an autonomous order, exempt from Cîteaux, but on his insistence the severe regulations, which exceeded the strictness of Cistercian life, were relaxed somewhat. In 1630, two separate congregations were required, one in France that retained the name Feuillants and one in Italy known as the Reformed Bernardines. Eventually the Feuillants possessed 31 houses and the Bernardines 43. During the 18th century, vocations declined, but the monks remained faithful to their original spirit. The French Revolution suppressed all religious houses in 1791, and the vacant monastery in Paris became the headquarters of a famous revolutionary club. The Bernardines came to an end in 1802. The Feuillantines, a community for women, founded in 1587 by Barrière with the cooperation of Anne and Marguerite de Polastron, were suppressed in 1791.

Feuillant houses were governed by abbots elected for three years. Central control was in a general chapter, held every third year under the presidency of an elected abbot general. Each community consisted of choir monks, lay brothers, and oblates. Their discipline was one of the strictest in monastic history. They retained the Cistercian habit, but went about barefooted and bareheaded; their diet was restricted to bread, water, and vegetables seasoned only with salt; they slept on planks, and having neither chairs nor tables, knelt on the floor to eat. They spent their time in prayer and hard manual labor in strict silence; in time they assumed intellectual work and pastoral duties.

Bibliography: H. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 2 v. (3d ed. Paderborn 1932–34) 1:374–376. B. GRIESSER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:113. J. M. CANIVEZ, Dictionnaire de droit canonique, ed. R. NAZ, 7 v. (Paris 1935–65) 5:835–836. M. B. BRARD, Catholicisme 4:1235–39. M. STANDAERT, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 5:274–287.

[L. J. LEKAI]

FEY, CLARA

Foundress of the Sisters of the POOR CHILD JESUS; b. Aachen, Germany, April 11, 1815; d. Simpelveld, Netherlands, May 8, 1894. In 1837 she and some other zealous women opened a school for poor children in Aachen. To perpetuate and extend the apostolic work, she founded her religious congregation (1844) and until her death served as its superior general, despite frail health and frequent illness. During the KULTURKAMPF she and her community were obliged to flee to the Netherlands. She was noted for her industriousness combined with a deep interior life. The decree introducing her cause for beatification was issued in 1958.

Bibliography: O. PFÜLF, Mutter Clara Fey und ihre Stiftung (2d ed. Freiburg 1913). J. SOLZBACHER, ed., Immer beim Herrn: Wandel in der Gegenwart Gottes nach Mutter Clara Fey (2d ed. Mödling 1958), tr. M. COLMAN, Heaven on Earth (Westminster, Md. 1958).

[J. SOLZBACHER]

FICHTE, JOHANN GOTTLIEB

Founder of absolute transcendental IDEALISM and father of the philosopher Immanuel Hermann Fichte (1796–1879); b. Rammenau in Saxony, May 19, 1762; d. Berlin, Jan. 27, 1814. The elder Fichte received his early education under the patronage of Baron von Miltitz. Agitated and rebellious, he studied theology at Göttingen, Jena, and Leipzig from 1780 to 1784, then devoted nine years to private instruction. Asked to explain Kant's philosophy, he so thoroughly penetrated it that his anonymously published Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung (Königsberg 1792) was thought to be Kant's own work. Fichte decided to supply a philosophy of religion for Kant's system. Reducing religion to Kant's "moral law," he held that sensible representations in various religions are an illusion of practical reason. In 1794 he started to teach at the University of Jena, but he was accused of atheism in 1798 and had to cede his position to F. W. J. SCHELLING the following year. Going to Berlin, he began to give courses in philosophy there and at Erlangen (1805). Inciting German nationalism by his Reden an die deutschen Nation (1807–08), he eventually became the second rector of the newly established University of Berlin. He died of typhus, which he contracted from his wife.

Teaching. According to Fichte, DOGMATISM abstracts from understanding and proposes the thing in itself as a reality that is the cause of thought, whereas idealism abstracts from the thing and substitutes intelligence in itself for the reality. Thus idealism holds that thoughts are representations accompanied by an awareness of necessity, produced by the intelligence. At the end of a lengthy transcendental deduction, Fichte proposes the Ego, itself transcending objectification, as the condition of all objectifiability and the necessary condition of self-consciousness. The transcendental Ego is attainable only by intellectual intuition, in which it is recognized by its activity within consciousness. Life arises in intellectual intuition, and, without it, there is death.

Fichte's absolute idealism claims a "victory over the opposition between thought and being," as well as between being and action. This victory establishes absolute activism and pure freedom, and morality is absolute and unconditioned. Reason determines its own activity by itself and, from this fact of self-determination, it must recognize that others, too, have freedom. The concept of law, then, is a condition of one's own consciousness. The essential condition for a juridical situation (Rechtszustand) is the state, and the law of the state is the principal scope of the philosophy of law. The basis for all life in the state is the "pact of the citizens" (Staatsbürgervertrag), which embraces a defense pact (Schutzvertrag) and a property pact (Eigentumsvertrag). The ultimate complement of this concession is the "closed commercial state," in which work and merit should be divided by the state as such according to a type of socialism. Whoever violates the pact of the state by an infraction of the law will be excluded from the pact of the state.

In accord with DEISM and ILLUMINISM, Fichte makes religion identical with morality and duty. He adopts the formula "faith in the moral order of the world" as the expression of the very essence of religion. Like Kant, he attributes to faith the capacity of attaining the supersensible. Faith is the actuation of freedom from all influence of the sensible world, this freedom having the scope of positing oneself through oneself. The self-certitude provided by faith does not require any further explanation, justification, or authorization. It is not based upon or determined by any other truth; rather every other truth is based upon it. This is the world of morality, the content and scope of freedom to which the transcendental viewpoint leads.

Instead of speaking of the divinity (Gottheit), Fichte speaks of the divine (das Göttliche), which, from the semantic viewpoint, is an even vaguer term. According to him, the divine becomes living and real in man. Like authentic incredulity and impiety, true atheism consists in rationalizing the consequences of one's own actions, in not obeying the voice of one's own conscience, in placing one's own judgment before God's judgment, and in making oneself God. Denying the fact of original sin, Fichte reduces all revealed religion to natural religion, wherein there is no dogma, all Biblical statements having value only in reference to moral action.

Critique. In general, Fichte starts with the illuministic positions of Spinoza, Rousseau, and Lessing and ends up in dissolving thought into action and destroying the very possibility of truth. Pursuing the logic of his predecessors, he adds only a Germanic preoccupation with deterministic morality. As his son later wrote, "in the chain of [his] thoughts, everything is predetermined . . . so that . . . in the world of conscious natures, there is no room for free initiative" (Sämmtliche Werke 5:vi).

Bibliography: Works. Nachgelassene Werke, ed. I. H. FICHTE, 3 v. (Bonn 1834–35); Sämmtliche Werke, ed. I. H. FICHTE, 8 v. (Berlin 1845–46; repr. 1964); Werke, ed. F. MEDICUS, 6 v. (Leipzig 1908–12); Fichtes Briefwechsel, ed. H. SCHULZ, 2 v. (Leipzig 1925–30). Literature. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–) v.7. J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). X. LÉON, Fichte et son temps, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1922–27). R. ADAMSON, Fichte (Edinburgh 1881). H. HEIMSOETH, Fichte (Munich 1923). M. WUNDT, Fichte (2d ed. Stuttgart 1937). R. W. STINE, The Doctrine of God in the Philosophy of Fichte (Philadelphia 1945). H. C. ENGELBRECHT, Johann Gottlieb Fichte: A Study of His Political Writings, with Special Reference to His Nationalism (New York 1933).

[C. FABRO]

FICHTER, JOSEPH H.

Sociologist; b. Union City, NJ, June 10, 1908, d. New Orleans, LA, Feb. 23, 1994. In 1930 Fichter entered the New Orleans province of the Society of Jesus and was ordained a priest in 1942. He received his B.A. (1935) and M.A. (1939) from St. Louis University and a doctorate in sociology from Harvard University in 1947. Fichter spent most of his academic career teaching sociology at Loyola University in New Orleans, and also held the following academic appointments: Fulbright Professor, Johann Gottlieb Fichte.

University of Muenster, Germany (1953–54); Visiting Professor, University of Notre Dame (1955–56); Fulbright Professor, Universidad Catolica de Chile (1960–61); Professor and Research Director, University of Chicago (1964–65); Chauncey Stillman Chair at Harvard University (1965–70); Professor, State University of New York at Albany (1971–72); and Favrot Chair of Human Relations, Tulane University (1973–74).

Joseph Fichter's research record includes 30 books and over 200 articles. The bulk of his work focused on aspects of Catholicism, including Southern Parish (1951), Social Relations in the Urban Parish (1954), Parochial School (1958), Priest and People (1965), America's Forgotten Priests (1968), Rehabilitation of Clergy Alcoholics (1982), The Pastoral Provisions: Married Catholic Priests (1989), Wives of Catholic Clergy (1992). Other books covered topics such as religion as an occupation, pain and healing, the Catholic Cult of the Paraclete, and the Unification Church. His sociological autobiography was published in two volumes: One Man Research (1973) and The Sociology of Good Works (1993).

Fichter was active in promoting social justice issues. In the 1930s he both defended organized labor and criticized corrupt union leadership, advocating the organization of white collar workers and pleading for more humane treatment of Mexican migrant laborers. In the 1940s he quietly achieved the first desegregation of Catholic colleges in the Deep South. In the early 1950s he developed a strategy to desegregate the entire New Orleans' Archdiocesan school system. In the 50s he wrote that reputed differences between the sexes was cultural in origin, and in 1966 he advocated the ordination of women in the Catholic Church.

Fichter served as president for the Society for the Scientific Study of Religion, the Southern Sociological Society, and as a member of the executive council of the American Sociological Association. In recognition of his stature in the field, the Association for the Sociology of Religion created the annual Fichter Research Award.

Bibliography: J.H. FICHTER, One Man Research: Reminiscences of a Catholic Sociologist (New York 1973); The Sociology of Good Works: Research in Catholic America (Chicago 1993). J. HADDEN and T. LONG, eds., Religion and Religiosity in America: Studies in Honor of Joseph H. Fichter (New York 1983).

[R.A. WALLACE]

FICINO, MARSILIO

Italian philosopher and leader of the Platonic Academy of Florence; b. Figline, Oct. 19, 1433; d. Florence, Oct. 1, 1499. Little is known of his youth and education, but he probably studied Latin, philosophy, medicine, and theology. His earliest writings date from about 1454 and show strong scholastic influences. He began studying Greek in 1456, and ultimately translated the complete writings of Plato (1463-73; printed Florence, 1484), Plotinus (1484-92; printed Florence, 1492), and Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (1492; printed Florence, 1496). In 1462, Cosimo de'Medici granted Ficino the use of a number of Greek manuscripts and a villa at Careggi, where he devoted himself to the study of Platonic philosophy. There he was instrumental in founding the Platonic Academy, which became one of the foremost intellectual centers of Europe. At Careggi, Ficino wrote his major philosophical work, Theologia platonica (1469-74; printed Florence, 1482), and his Commentary on Plato's Symposium or De amore (1469; printed Florence, 1484). Ficino was ordained in 1473 and a year later wrote De christiana religione (printed Florence, 1476). With the expulsion the Medici from Florence in 1494, Ficino retired to the country.

As leader of the Platonic Academy, Ficino assumed the task of reviving PLATONISM, translating many works of the tradition into Latin. He was first led to an interest in Plato through the works of Augustine, who played a major role in the formation of Ficino's religious thought. He considered Aristotelian scholasticism to have degenerated into a series of antireligious philosophies, and envisioned the revived Platonism as a safeguard against this tendency.

Ficino saw religion as the identifying mark of man, distinguishing him from the lower animals. Philosophy and religion were considered parallel paths to truth: true religion (Christianity) and true philosophy (Platonism) ultimately must agree, for they stem from the same source, the contemplation of God. As the title of one of his letters indicates, "Philosophy and Religion are Sisters."

The hierarchical structure of Ficino's universe, derived in large measure from Neoplatonic sources, shows some originality. Ficino's universe is fivefold: God, angelic mind, rational soul, quality, and body. Rational soul, or man, has a place of preeminence as the connecting link between the immortal and the mortal. Man thus has a mobility wherein he can rise to God or fall to baseness, an idea further developed by Giovanni PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA.

According to Ficino's theory of natural appetite, the world demands that all things move toward their natural end. Man's end is the contemplation of, and union with, God; since this can rarely be achieved in life, personal immortality must be postulated. Much of the Theologia platonica is devoted to rational arguments for the immortality of the soul, drawn from Plato's Phaedo, Plotinus, and other sources.

In De amore, which animates Plato's Symposium with the Christian charity of Paul and Augustine, Ficino developed his notion of "Platonic (or Socratic) love," as contrasted to "vulgar love." The former concept, original with Ficino, is essentially a communion between friends based ultimately on the soul's love for God.

Ficino's influence, direct and indirect, was enormous. His translations and commentaries on the works of Plato and Plotinus were standard throughout Europe for several centuries. Traces of his thought are discernible in thinkers as diverse, geographically and intellectually, as J. COLET, the CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS, HERBERT OF CHERBURY, and later deists in England; LEFÈVRE D'ETAPLES in France; and F. S. PATRIZI, G. BRUNO, and T. CAMPANELLA in Italy. His love theory is a basic ingredient in Renaissance literature, traces of it being found in Lorenzo de'Medici, Michelangelo, and Pietro Bembo in Italy; the Pléiade group and Scève in France; and E. Spenser in England.

Bibliography: Opera (Basel 1561; repr. 2 v. Paris 1641; rev. ed. Basel 1576; photo. repr. 2 v. in 4, Turin 1959); Supplementum Ficinianum, ed. P. O. KRISTELLER, 2 v. (Florence 1937), works not in 1576 ed.; Marsile Ficin: Commentaire sur le "Banquet" de Platon, ed. and tr. R. MARCEL (Paris 1956); "Five Questions Concerning the Mind," The Renaissance Philosophy of Man, ed. E. CASSIRER et al. (Chicago 1948) 193–212; Marsilio Ficino's Commentary on Plato's "Symposium," tr. and ed. S. R. JAYNE (University of Missouri Studies 19.1; Columbia 1944). P. O. KRISTELLER, The Philosophy of Marsilio Ficino, tr. V. CONANT (New York 1943); Studies in Renaissance Thought and Letters (Rome 1956). R. MARCEL, Marsile Ficin (1433–1499) (Paris 1958), fullest bibliog.

[C. B. SCHMITT]

FIDEISM

A philosophical and theological doctrine or attitude that minimizes the capacity of the human intellect to attain certitude and assigns faith as a criterion of the fundamental truths. Thus, God's existence, the immortality of the soul, principles of morality, the fact of divine revelation, and the credibility of Christianity cannot be proved by reason alone, but must be accepted on authority. The term fideism (from the Latin fides, faith) was used for the first time by Eugene Ménégoz, Réflexions sur l'évangile du salut (Paris 1789), and was then applied to TRADITION-ALISM and other theories of similar strain.

Forms. Fideism can be divided into two main forms: the broad sense and the strict sense. The former is any theory according to which the fundamental truths of the speculative and practical orders cannot be established by reason alone, but must be admitted on the authority of other men or because of a human, spontaneous propensity to do so. To this kind of fideism belong various theories. Some of them place a criterion of truth in common sense, be it conceived as a spontaneous impulse of instinct (Thomas Reid, d. 1796; Charles S. Peirce, d. 1914), or the common tenets of philosophical systems (Victor Cousin, d. 1867), or, again, universal reason (H. Felicité R. de Lamennais, d. 1854, in his later period); other theories connect the knowledge of truth with sentiment, as did Friedrich E. D. Schleiermacher (d. 1834), Friedrich H. Jacobi (d. 1819), Johann G. Herder (d. 1803), and William James (d. 1910); still others see an approach to the truth in ethical postulates, as I. Kant (d. 1804) and some of his followers did.

In the strict sense, fideism ascribes man's knowledge of basic truths to God's revelation. Such fideism is to be found mainly in the teaching of William of Ockham (d. 1349 or 1350), in Protestantism, in TRADITIONALISM, and in contemporary Christian EXISTENTIALISM.

From fideism in the strict sense one must distinguish semifideism, which holds that man reaches truth by reason, but with probability only and not with certitude. This form of fideism is accepted mainly by some scientists. Origin and Development. Since fideism touches on the problem of the relationship between FAITH and reason, it can be traced back in some of its features to pagan philosophy, notably to the Sophists; and, in the Christian era, to the early patristic period, particularly to Tertullian's (d. 222 or 223) "certum est quia impossibile" (De carne Christi 5; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 2:760). However, the Sophists intended to show the incapacity of man's intellect to reach the truth; the negative position of the patristic period concerning man's intellect can be explained as a reaction against pagan philosophy rather than a denial of the natural capacity of the human intellect to reach the truth.

More precise expression of fideism occurred in the medieval Arabic thought, particularly in Algazel's (al-Ghazzālī, d. 1111) Destruction of Philosophers, in which he opposes his faith in the Koran to Avicenna's (d. 1036) philosophy. Subsequently his position was rejected by Averroës' (d. 1198) Destruction of the Destruction.

Strict fideism was advanced by WILLIAM OF OCK-HAM. According to him, it is by faith alone that one attains certitude about God's existence, the immortality of the soul, and moral law. One finds a similar teaching in Nicolas of Autrecourt (d. c. 1350), and later in the teachings of Michel de Montaigne (d. 1592), Blaise Pascal (d. 1662), and Pierre D. Huet (d. 1721). Ockhamism, widely spread in Europe, influenced Protestantism. Luther rejected philosophy as an exaltation of reason and of nature. Consequently, he conceived faith as confidence able to justify. In his position, however, there are implied two aspects of faith, that Ménégoz, op. cit., discerned in the position of the orthodox and liberal Protestants of his time, namely "the gift to God of the heart" and the adherence of the spirit to the revealed truth. By fideism Ménégoz meant sola fides that consists of the movement of oneself to God, independently of the adherence to certain beliefs or to revealed truths; such faith is justifying faith. Louis A. Sabatier (d. 1901), being in agreement with Ménégoz, finds in the Bible symbolic meanings only. The Bible expresses beliefs; faith expresses the movement toward salvation. Fideism means this movement realized by faith. Such a position, however, was criticized by some Protestants, especially by E. Doumerque in his L'Autorité en matière de foi et la nouvelle école (Paris 1892) and Le Dernier mot du fidéisme (Paris 1907).

Catholic usage of the term fideism, particularly in the teaching of the traditionalists, gives the opposite meaning to this term; fideism means the acceptance of the fundamental truth on the authority of God; hence faith becomes a criterion of truth.

Doctrine. Fideism presents in its negative aspect a critique of reason, which is made to appear unable to ascertain absolute truth through human effort. In its positive aspect it combats scepticism and agnosticism by inducing a specific source of certainty. This source is faith, an extrarational factor that allows man to grasp the fundamental truths immediately, particularly those in the field of religion, such as God's existence and the authority of the Bible. Faith provides an object for reason, and not only grace, as a subjective aid that helps man to attain the truth. This role faith plays with regard to basic natural truths, as well as to strict supernatural mysteries. These are tenets accepted also by the strict traditionalists.

One of the representatives of fideism, L. E. M. BAUTAIN (1796–1867), explains in greater detail the fideistic position, although with a flavor of ontologism, notably that man's reason is a passive faculty that can know the truths of the supernatural order and more subtle truths of the natural order only after having previously received the knowledge of them in germ. This germ is communicated by faith living in the Church, the Bible, the Prophets, the Apostles, and even poets. His most relevant work is Philosophie du christianisme, 2 v. (Paris 1835).

The ontological participation in the truth imparted to men by God was taught more clearly by A. Gratry (1805–72), a disciple of Bautain. Gratry maintains that there must be something of God in man in order for him to know God's existence (La Logique, 2 v. Paris 1855). It is a divine attraction present in every soul that enables men to experience God. Thus, by a sort of "divine sense" one recognizes Him (De Le Connaissance de Dieu, 2 v. Paris 1853).

Traces of fideism are noticeable also in contemporary thought, particularly in contemporary existentialism. Søren Kierkegaard (d. 1855) emphasized, mainly in his Philosophical Fragments (Copenhagen 1844), that one knows God's existence and the truth of the divine mission of Christ by faith alone; there are no rational proofs for those facts. A similar teaching has been advanced by Karl Barth (1886–1968), Rudolf Bultmann (1884–1976), and Martin Buber (1878–1965); and some traces of such a position are to be found in the writings of Gabriel Marcel (1889–1973) and in those of Karl Jaspers (1883–1969).

Ecclesiastical Documents. The Church's warnings against fideistic tenets are already found in the condemnation of the errors of Nicolas of Autrecourt, issued by Clement VI in 1347 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [Freiburg 1963] 1028–49). In 1835 and 1840, L. E. Bautain was compelled, with the approval of Gregory XVI, to sign theses contradicting his previous teaching and affirming that God's existence, the divinity of Mosaic and Christian revelation, the historical value of Christ's miracles can be proved with certitude; and that consequently, reason leads men to embrace faith, and it is not faith that must precede reason (Denzinger, 2751–56). In 1855 A. BONNETTY also signed theses reversing his previous doctrine by admitting that God's existence, the spirituality of the human soul, and man's liberty can be proved with certainty (Denzinger, 2812, cf. 2811, 2813–14). The same capacity of man's reason was sustained by Pius IX in his encyclical Qui pluribus, 1846 (Denzinger, 2775–80); by Vatican Council I (Denzinger, 3008–09, 3026, 3033); by Leo XIII in the encyclical Aeterni Patris, 1879 (Denzinger, 3135–38); and by Pius XII in his encyclical Humani generis, 1950 (Denzinger, 3875).

The Church's rejection of semifideism can be deduced from its insistence, in the above cited decrees, on the proofs with certitude of God's existence, of the spirituality of the soul, and of the credibility of divine revelation. The particularly important decree for this certitude is that of Vatican Council I (Denzinger, 3008-09, 3026). Besides, Innocent XI in 1679 condemned, among others, the error that the supernatural assent of faith stays with only probable knowledge of revelation, and even with fear that perhaps God did not speak to us (Denzinger, 2121). oreover, Pius X in the encyclical Lamentabili (1907) rejected the opinion that the assent of faith is based on a series of probable opinions (Denzinger, 3425); and in Pascendi (1910) he called attention to the decree of Vatican Council I, that man is capable of knowing with certainty, by natural reason, God's existence and the credibility of divine revelation through external signs, and not only through a subjective experience or inspiration (Denzinger, 3026, 3034).

Critique. Fideism rightly stresses the importance of faith against all varieties of scepticism, agnosticism, liberalism, and secularism. Fideism also plausibly defends the suprarational character of the mysteries of faith against the rationalistic tendency of accepting only what can be proved by reason. Finally, fideism shows clearly a moral need of divine revelation and faith.

However, fideism goes too far in its negative attitude toward the credibility of faith. If faith had no reasonable basis, it would be faith again that would lead us to faith. This would amount to complete relativism, since the credibility of faith would rely on a merely subjective basis, varying from one individual to another. Besides, since faith is essentially mediate cognition, it must be based on an immediately evident cognition in order to be acceptable to a reasonable being; otherwise, faith would be a blind assent; but "nobody believes anything, if he previously does not think that it must be believed" ("nullus credit aliquid nisi prius cogitaverit esse credendum"—St. Augustine, Praed. sanct. 2.5; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1878–90] 44:962). Consequently, in daily life, one assents on the basis of the intrinsic evidence of the object; if this is lacking, one believes only when the credibility of the witness has been proved. Thus, in divine faith one believes when the veracity of the sources of belief is reasonably proved. Hence, even children, when they believe, rely on the authority of their parents; this authority is evident to them.

As to the certainty of the proofs, which is a concern of semifideism, one may notice that the proofs can become certain to those who understand them. Besides, the fact of revelation and its credibility can be proved historically and philosophically with certainty, just as other facts are proved. Finally, it would be imprudent for a reasonable being to accept something as true if it is not evidently true either in itself or on the authority of the relating witness.

See Also: FAITH; GOD, 7, 8.

Bibliography: General. S. HARENT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903-50) 6.1:174-236. J. HASENFUSS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957-65) 4:117-118. J. V. BAINVEL, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALÈS (Paris 1911-22) 2:17-94. G. ROTUREAU and Y. M. J. CONGAR, Catholicisme 4:1260-61. R. AUBERT, Le Problème de l'acte de Foi (3d ed. Louvain 1958). M. BRILLANT and M. NÉDONCELLE, Apologétique (Paris 1948). G. BRUNHES, La Foi et sa justification rationnelle (Paris 1928). É. DOMERGUE, Les Étapes du fidéisme (Paris 1906). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, De revelatione, 2 v. (5th ed. Rome 1950). E. MÉNÉGOZ, Publications diverses sur le fidéisme, 5 v. (Paris 1900–21). G. MONTI, Apologetica scientifica della religione cattolica (Turin 1922). L. A. SABATIER, Esquisse d'une philosophie de la religion (Paris 1897); Les Religions d'autorité el la religion de l'esprit (Paris 1903). G. DE BROGLIE, "La Vrai notion thomiste des 'praeambula fidel,''' Gregorianum 34 (1953) 341-389. Particular. L. E. M. BAUTAIN, Propositions générales sur la vie (Strasbourg 1826); La Morale de l'Évangile comparée à la morale des philosophies (Strasbourg 1827); De l'Enseignement de la philosophie en France au XIX^e siècle (Strasbourg 1833); Philosophie morale, 2 v. (Paris 1842); La Chrétienne de nos jours, 3 v. (Paris 1859-61). W. M. HORTON, The Philosophy of the Abbé Bautain (New York 1926; 2d ed. 1948). A. J. A. GRATRY, De la connaissance de l'âme, 2 v. (Paris 1857; 8th ed. 1920); La Philosophie du crédo (Paris 1861; 4th ed. 1902); La Morale et la foi de l'histoire (Paris 1868; 2d ed. 1871). J. MARIAS, La filosofía del padre Gratry (Madrid 1941). R. CRIPPA, "Di un carattere distintivo tra lo spiritualismo cristiano italiano e quello francese," in Motivi del pensiero contemporaneo (Brescia 1950). A. W. CRAWFORD, The Philosophy of F. H. Jacobi (New York 1905). J. G. HERDER, God: Some Conversations, tr. F. H. BURKHARDT (New York 1949). K. BARTH, Anselm; Fides quaerens intellectum, tr. I. W. ROBERTSON (Richmond, Va. 1960); Church Dogmatics, tr. G. T. THOMSON et al. (New York 1955-). H. BOUIL-LARD, Karl Barth, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1957). J. HAMFR, Karl Barth, tr. D. M. MARUCA (Westminster, Md. 1962). S. A. MATCZAK, Karl Barth on God: The Knowledge of the Divine Existence (New York 1962). A. C. COCHRANE, The Existentialists and God (Philadelphia 1956). D. E. ROBERTS, Existentialism and Religious Belief (New York 1957).

[S. A. MATCZAK]

FIDELIS OF SIGMARINGEN, ST.

Capuchin martyr; b. Mark Roy, Sigmaringen, Swabia, October 1578; d. Seewis, Präittigau, Switzerland, April 24, 1622. From December 1598 he studied at Freiburg-im-Breisgau, where he received doctorates in philosophy (1603) and canon and civil law (1611). Roy was tutor to noble children on a trip through France, Italy, and Spain (1604–10). He gave up the practice of law in Ensisheim, was ordained, and entered the Capuchins in Freiburg, Oct. 4, 1612, as Fidelis of Sigmaringen. In 1614 he went to Constance and Frauenfeld to study theology, and in 1617 began to preach. He was guardian at Rheinfeld (1618–19), Feldkirch (1619–20), Freiburg (1620–21), and again at Feldkirch from 1621 to his death. As a member of a Capuchin mission in Rhaetia dependent on Austria (Nov. 13, 1621) and on the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH (Jan. 1622), Fidelis preached among the Grisons, who from 1608 had turned to Protestantism and were in revolt against Austria. He converted several important leaders; but when he went to Seewis against the advice of his friends, he was assaulted and slain in the church, April 24, 1622. In November 1622, after the Austrians had conquered the area, his relics were translated to Chur, and to Feldkirch. His beatification, initiated in 1623, was proclaimed March 12, 1729, and he was canonized June 26, 1746. On Feb. 16, 1771, he was called the proto-martyr of the Propagation of the Faith, and his cult was extended to the whole Church. Some of his extant writings have been published, and a number of vitae have been written. He is the patron of lawyers, the Sigmaringen, and the Hohenzollern.

Feast: April 24.

Bibliography: B. FISCHER, Fidelis von Sigmaringen und seine Zeit (Stein am Rhein 1991). R. SCHELL, Fidelis von Sigmaringen (Sigmaringen 1976). F. TOMANN, Dreihundertfünfzig] Jahre St. Fidelis. (Feldkirch 1972.) H. KORFF, Biographica Catholica (Freiburg 1927). P. WILLIBRORD DE PARIS, Catholicisme 4:1262–64. H. R. GUGGISBERG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:935.

[F. D. S. BORAN]

FIDELITY

A virtue allied to veracity (see TRUTHFULNESS), and indeed an integral part of that virtue, whose function it is to incline a person to the fulfillment of his promises. Whereas veracity inclines one to conform his speech to the judgment of his mind, fidelity disposes him to conform his deeds to his promissory commitments. The notion of fidelity is thus intimately associated with that of a promise, and the obligations of fidelity differ according to the different senses in which the term promise can be understood. When a promise is contractual, i.e., when it has the force of a contract or a quasi-contract, it gives rise to an obligation in commutative justice. This obligation is a grave one and, where matters of importance are concerned, cannot be violated without serious sin. Thus, for example, conjugal fidelity and the promised payment of debts voluntarily contracted are grave obligations in conscience.

But when moral theologians refer to fidelity in its narrowest and most specific sense they do not have in mind the fidelity that obliges in virtue of commutative justice but are concerned rather with fidelity in the fulfillment of promises of a noncontractual kind, that is, with promises made spontaneously and out of pure liberality, and with no view to benefits received or expected. The obligations of fidelity understood in this sense bind less urgently than those arising from commutative justice, and their deliberate violation would not ordinarily involve grave sin.

However, it is not always easy to distinguish a simple promise binding only in fidelity from a gratuitous, unilateral contract that binds in commutative justice. The intention of the party making the promise is decisive in most cases, but in some circumstances the nature of what is promised, and the trouble and expense to which the promisee may be put by reason of his expectations, indicate that the promisor intends (or at least should intend) to bind himself seriously.

Bibliography: THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae, 2a2ae, 110.3 ad 5; 89.7; 98.3 ad 1 and 3. B. H. MERKELBACH, Summa theologiae moralis, 3 v. (Paris 1949) 2:497–500.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

FIDES ET RATIO

Pope JOHN PAUL II's thirteenth encyclical, Faith and Reason, issued on the feast of the Triumph of the Cross (Sept. 14, 1998). Addressed to the world's bishops, it is concerned with the relation between faith and reason, especially faith and philosophy in the contemporary world. It comprises an introduction, seven chapters, and a conclusion.

In the introduction (1–6), the pope notes that both Eastern and Western thought have asked the fundamental questions of human existence. In the West, the questions have been the special focus of philosophy, which uses reason to search for ultimate truth. Modern philosophy, however, has been so absorbed in the study of human subjectivity that it has neglected the search for transcendent truth or become skeptical of its attainability. This is a matter of concern to the Church, which as the bearer

Chapter 1 (7–15) considers revelation, basing its treatment on Dei Filius of VATICAN I and Dei verbum of VATICAN II. God's revelation, known through faith, is distinct from and surpasses what reason can know. It is "immersed in time and history" through Jesus Christ, the incarnate Word of God. Only in Christ is the ultimate truth about human existence to be found. Revelation does not disable reason but drives it to extend its knowledge as far as possible. Christian revelation "summons human beings to be open to the transcendent, while respecting both their autonomy as creatures and their freedom" (15).

Chapter 2, "Credo ut intellegam [I believe so that I might understand]" (16–23), considers biblical teaching on faith and reason. Biblical texts reflect a "conviction that there is a profound and indissoluble unity between the knowledge of reason and the knowledge of faith" (16). The Old Testament writers understood the use of applying finite reason within the context of the human relation to the mystery of God. Saint Paul holds that reason can know God, but that this capacity has been damaged by human disobedience to God. The crucifixion of Christ challenges our habitual ways of thinking and overcomes any attempt to construct an account of the meaning of existence in purely human terms.

Chapter 3, "Intellego ut credam [I understand so that I might believe]" (24–35), speaks of the human search for truth, which is based ultimately in the human heart's desire for God. "One may define the human being . . . as the one who seeks the truth" (28), in particular, the truth about the meaning of life and death. The search for truth is not solitary but immerses us in communities and traditions. Most of what we know, we do not experience directly but believe on the testimony of others. The search for truth requires "trusting dialogue and sincere friendship"; "a climate of suspicion and distrust" is destructive of it. Christian faith meets the human search, offering both "the concrete possibility of reaching the goal" and "a person to whom they might entrust themselves" (33).

Chapter 4 (36–48) surveys the history of the relationship of Christian faith with philosophy. The early apologists and church fathers used philosophy to express and defend Christian faith; at the same time they contributed to philosophy, purifying it of mythological elements. The medieval Scholastics continued this project, culminating in the work of THOMAS AQUINAS. Convinced of the harmony of faith and reason as coming from the same God, he gave reason its full scope, recognizing the autonomy of philosophy as well as its organic link to theology. But later medieval thought began an increasing separation between philosophy and faith, until in the 19th century much of Western philosophy explicitly opposed Christian revelation. Today, philosophy's search for truth and meaning has given way, even among many philosophers, to 'instrumental reason' in the service of the market, technological power, and enjoyment. As a result, a nihilistic outlook, which claims that ultimate truth is unattainable and 'everything is fleeting and provisional' (46), has gained strength. Philosophy needs faith, to recall it to its true goal, while faith needs philosophy, to temper its stress on feeling and experience and to save it from myth and superstition.

In chapter 5, "The Magisterium's Interventions in Philosophical Matters" (49–63), the pope states that the church has no official philosophy; philosophy must retain autonomy, "faithful to its own principles and methods" (49). But when philosophical opinions threaten the understanding of revealed truth, the church's magisterium must intervene. Such interventions serve right reason and are intended to stimulate philosophical inquiry. In the nineteenth century they defended reason against fideism and faith against rationalism. Today's chief problem is a "deep-seated distrust of reason" (55) and of "universal and absolute statements." Philosophers must not set "goals that are too modest"; they must not "abandon the passion for ultimate truth" (56).

Besides warning against errors, the church has also tried to promote a renewal of philosophy, as in the encyclical AETERNI PATRIS of Pope LEO XIII, which sparked a revival of THOMISTIC philosophy. Catholic philosophers who adopted more recent methods are also commended. Although the Second Vatican Council encouraged the study of philosophy, in the years since a lack of interest in philosophy has affected many Catholic faculties and even, as "I cannot fail to note with surprise and displeasure," many theologians (61).

Chapter 6 (64–79) discusses "The Interaction between Philosophy and Theology." Theology needs philosophy in order to understand the meaning of revealed truth and the way it is proclaimed. Neither the human sciences nor the traditional wisdom of non-Western cultures can take philosophy's place. The human sciences are helpful in studying human opinions but not in arriving at the objective truth in theology. The encounter with other cultures today is something like the encounter with Greek philosophy in early Christianity, but the church cannot neglect the universality of the human spirit across cultures nor "abandon what she has gained from her inculturation in the world of Greco-Latin thought" (72).

There is a circular, mutually enhancing relationship between philosophy and theology, as can be seen in the great philosopher-theologians ancient and modern, Eastern and Western Christian. Christian philosophy is "a philosophical speculation conceived in dynamic union with faith" (76), which gives philosophy material for reflection, while purifying it and keeping it humble. Faith, in turn, "grows deeper and more authentic when it is wedded to thought and does not reject it" (79).

Chapter 7 (80-99) lays out "Current Requirements and Tasks" for philosophy and theology. Scripture affirms that "the world and human life do have a meaning" (80), which is centered in Jesus Christ. But currently we are in a "crisis of meaning" (81). We are overwhelmed with data and conflicting theories, to the point where the question of meaning may itself seem to have no sense. "To be consonant with the word of God," philosophy must recover its character as a search for the ultimate meaning of life and as "the ultimate framework for the unity of human knowledge and action" (81). It must acknowledge the human capacity to know objective truth. And it must be capable of transcending sense experience and speaking metaphysically. It must avoid ECLECTICISM, HISTORICISM, SCIENTISM, and a democratic pragmatism that bases moral values on majority vote.

Theology requires the belief that it is possible to know universally valid truth. It needs philosophy in order to clarify the relation between historical fact and enduring meaning in Scripture and to deal with the relationship between the permanent truth of dogmatic statements and their historical and cultural conditioning. MORAL THEOL-OGY requires "a philosophical ethics that looks to the truth of the good" and is "neither subjectivist nor utilitarian" (98).

The "Conclusion" (100–108) reiterates that philosophy and theology need one another and stresses that training in philosophy is an important part of priestly formation. The pope addresses scientists, urging them not to lose sight of the need to join science with "philosophical and ethical values" (106). He concludes by invoking Mary, who gave herself in order that "God's Word might take flesh" (108), as an image for philosophy.

Bibliography: For the text of Fides et ratio, see: Acta Apos-tolicae Sedis 91 (1999): 5–88 (Latin); Origins 28, no. 19 (October 22, 1998): 317–347 (English).

[W. J. COLLINGE]

FIDES QUAERENS INTELLECTUM

Originally the subtitle of St. ANSELM's Proslogion (book to support the faith of the believer), this phrase became the motto of SCHOLASTICISM. For Anselm it signified the endeavor of one who has the faith to understand what he believes. One achieves this by putting his mind to the contemplation of God and by reflecting upon what he contemplates. It thus gives the basic method of Catholic theologians. Whereas, however, Anselm regards the proofs of God's existence as included in this process, St. Thomas Aquinas excludes them; furthermore, whereas Anselm regards this enquiry as being able not only to show the suitability of a doctrine but also to prove it, Aquinas allows only that it shows its suitability. Vatican I adopts this formula while giving it a more general sense: "when reason, enlightened by faith, seeks its object with diligence, reverence, and moderation, it attains by God's gift some understanding (and that very fruitful) of the mysteries of the faith" (Enchiridion symbolorum, 3016).

See Also: THEOLOGY; DOGMATIC THEOLOGY; METHODOLOGY (THEOLOGY); FAITH AND REASON; THEOLOGY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: G. SÖHNGEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:119–120. F. CAYRÉ, Patrologie et histoire de la théologie, v.2 (4th ed. Paris 1947) 395.

[B. FORSHAW]

FIESOLE, GUIDO DA (FRA ANGELICO), BL.

Baptised Guido di Pietro (his father's name was Pietro); also known as Guido da Fiesole and Giovanni da Fiesole (John Faesulanus); Dominican priest and Florentine painter; b. near Vicchio di Mugello, Tuscany, Italy, c. 1386–87; d. La Minerva Friary, Rome, Italy, Feb. 18, 1455.

Guido was already a recognized artist at age 20, when he entered the Dominican monastery at Fiesole with his brother Benedetto. He took the religious name John of the Angels. Shortly thereafter, because of the Great Western Schism, Fra Giovanni and his brother (adherents to the Avignon claimant, Gregory XII) left Fiesole for the Dominican convent in Foligno, Umbria. The brothers moved to Cortonna to escape the pestilence that ravaged Foligno, and four years later made their way back to Fiesole where Giovanni remained for the next sixteen years.

As a young friar he worked at illuminating manuscripts such as the Dominican Diurnal 3 (Laurentian Library, Florence), while his brother completed an exquisite set of choir books. From 1409, he continued his studies and was ordained priest at Fiesole in 1418. In the 1440s, he was appointed prior of San Marco (Florence), which he decorated with his paintings, and he held that office for three years. Pope Eugene IV wished to appoint him archbishop of Florence, but he declined in favor of Saint Antoninus.

Among his works are "Coronation of the Virgin" (Uffizi, Florence); "Last Judgment"; and "Deposition from the Cross" (1433, S. Marco Museum, Florence). He also painted the frescoes in the cloister and cells of the remodeled monastery of S. Marco (1437), Florence.

During the last ten years of his life, Angelico was much in demand. In 1445, Eugene IV summoned him to the Vatican to work on the frescoes in the chapel of the Sacrament. These frescoes were later destroyed. In 1447, he began the "Last Judgment" frescoes in the S. Brixio Chapel, Orvieto cathedral (finished years later by Signorelli), but was summoned again to the Vatican by Nicholas V to paint scenes from the lives of SS. Stephen and Lawrence in the Nicholas Chapel. In 1449, he returned to Fiesole to become prior of San Domenico. He returned to Rome to finish work there, and it was there he died. The body of Bl. Fra Angelico now rests in S. Maria sopra Minerva, Rome.

John Paul II issued a motu proprio, Oct. 3, 1982, granting a liturgical cultus to the Dominicans for Fra Angelico, long known as il beato Angelico because of his "angelic" moral virtues. The Holy Father wrote: "[E]ven today his art makes the way to God more accessible for us. And this is the purpose of sacred art. . . . the time has arrived to place him in his proper light in Church of God, to which he still continues to speak through his heavenly art." In 1984, he was declared patron of artists by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: Feb. 18 (Dominicans).

Bibliography: Acta Apostolicae Sedis 75 (1983) 796-99. v. ALCE, Angelicus pictor: vita, opere e teologia del Beato Angelico (Bologna 1993). U. BALDINI, Beato Angelico (Florence 1986). K. BERING, Fra Angelico: Mittelalterlicher Mystiker oder Maler der Renaissance? (Essen 1984). G. DIDI-HUBERMAN, Fra Angelico: Dissemblance & Figuration, tr. J. M. TODD (Chicago 1995). G. FAL-LANI, Vita e opere di fra Giovanni Angelico (Florence 1984). J. & M. GUILLAUD, Fra Angelico: The Light of the Soul (New York 1986). C. GILBERT, A Renaissance Image of the End of the World: Fra Angelico and Signorelli at Orvieto (University Park, Pa. 2001). A. HERTZ, Fra Angelico (Freiburg im Breisgau 1981). J. W. POPE-HENNESSY, Fra Angelico (Riverside, N.Y. 1990). M. SALMI, Il beato Angelico (Spoleto 1958). J. T. SPIKE, Fra Angelico (New York 1996). C. B. STREHLKE, Angelico (Milan 1998). G. VASARI, Lives of the Artists; Biographies of the Most Eminent Painters, Sculptors and Architects of Italy, abridged and edited by B. BURROUGHS (New York 1946). I. VENCHI, Fra Angelico and the Chapel of Nicholas V (Vatican City 1999).

[E. T. DE WALD/EDS.]

FIGLIUCCI, FELIX (FILLIUCIUS)

Humanist and theologian; b. Siena, Italy, c. 1525; d. Florence?, c. 1590. He studied philosophy at Padua and was in the service of Cardinal Del Monte, who later became Pope Julius III. Figliucci's reputation as a humanist was widespread. In 1551 he became a Dominican in Florence, taking the name Alexus. He wrote many works in Italian and translated Greek works into Italian. He attended the Council of Trent and translated its Latin Catechism into Italian.

Bibliography: Biographical and Bibliographical Dictionary of the Italian Humanists and of the World of Classical Scholarship in Italy, 1300-1800 2:1421. J. QUÉTIF and J. ÉCHARD, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum (New York 1956) 2.1:263–264.

[E. A. CARRILLO]

FIGUEIREDO, JACKSON DE

Brazilian writer and Catholic lay leader; b. Aracajú, Sergipe, Oct. 9, 1891; d. Barra la Tijuca, Rio de Janeiro, Nov. 4, 1928. Though born a Catholic, he early absorbed the materialistic ideas prevalent among the intelligentsia. He matriculated at the law school of Bahia in 1909 and soon, through the Nova Cruzada movement, became a student leader in anticlerical and antisocial activities. Shortly thereafter, influenced by the works of Pascal and supported by Farias de Brito, he returned to the Church. In 1915 at Rio de Janeiro he met Leonel FRANCA, SJ, and Alceu Amoroso Lima, and under their tutelage came to understand that life has meaning only as a labor that can be offered to God. Since he perceived that only anarchy could follow a divorce between letters and the Church, he dedicated himself fully to the reestablishment of the Christian spirit. He founded the periodical A Ordem (1921), the principal vehicle for the diffusion of his ideas, and the Centro Dom Vital (1922), a religious-cultural institution. Unfortunately, he never succeeded in fully controlling his violent character, and this intemperance affected some of his work. His Pascal e a Inquietação Moderna is a carefully considered and revised work; Cartas (1932) are also noteworthy; they constitute, perhaps, his most positive, rich, and lasting contribution.

Bibliography: A. AMOROSO LIMA, Estudos, 1st series (2d ed. Rio de Janeiro 1929), 3d and 4th series (1930–31). H. NOGUEIRA, J. de F.: O. doutrinário católico (Rio de Janeiro 1927). J. S. FONTES, J. de. F.: Sentido de sua obra (Aracajú 1952). T. DE SILVEIRA, J. de F. (Rio de Janeiro 1945).

[A. STULZER]

FILARET (VASILIČI MIKHAILOVICH DROZDOV)

Russian theologian, metropolitan of Moscow; b. Kolomna (Moscow Region), Dec. 26, 1782; d. Moscow, Nov. 19, 1867. The son of the Orthodox archpriest of the cathedral in Kolomna, he studied at the seminary there (1791-99) and at Troïtskii (1800-03), and then taught Hebrew, Greek, poetry, and rhetoric in the Troïtskii seminary. In 1808 he became a monk and took the name Filaret (Philaret), but was called to St. Petersburg the same year as inspector and professor of philosophy in the seminary there. In 1809 he was ordained. He went to the St. Petersburg Ecclesiastical Academy as professor (1810) and rector (1812). He became bishop of Reval (1812), member of the HOLY SYNOD (1817), and archbishop (1821) and metropolitan of Moscow (1826). Filaret was brilliant and zealous and exercised enormous influence on the inner life and theology of the Russian Church and on Church-State affairs, although he encountered much opposition in some of his projects, such as the translation of the Bible into Russian and a new edition of the catechism. He sought legislation to force the conversion of the RASKOLNIKS and played an important role in efforts to reunite Catholics of the UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH with the Orthodox. His hostility to the Catholic Church, especially to the pope, was constant, but he avoided the violent polemics common to Greek apologists. He favored the emancipation of the serfs. Filaret was a prolific writer, but much of his work was published only after his death. His principal theological work was his Catechism (1823), which was translated into several languages.

Bibliography: M. JUGIE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903–50) 12.1:1376–95. A. M. AMMANN, Storia della Chiesa russa e dei paesi limitrofi (Turin 1948), Ger. tr. (Vienna 1950). I. SMOLICH, Russisches Mönchtum (Würzburg 1953).

[J. PAPIN]

FILBY, WILLIAM, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. Oxfordshire, England, c. 1557–60 d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), May 30, 1582. Following his studies at Lincoln College, Oxford, Filby entered the seminary at Rheims, Oct. 12, 1579, and was ordained, March 25, 1581. He was active in the English mission for only a short time before his arrest in July and commitment to the Tower of London, Marshalsea, and back to the Tower. Following his sentencing on November 17 on the false charge of conspiring against the Government in Rome and Rheims, he was loaded with manacles for the rest of his life and deprived of his bedding for two of those months. With him suffered three others: BB. Thomas COTTAM, Luke KIRBY, and Laurence RICHARDSON. He was beatified by Pope Leo XIII.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: B. CAMM, ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, (New York 1905), II, 500–35. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969), I, nos. 12–14. J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FILCOCK, ROGER, BL.

Jesuit priest, martyr; alias Roger Nayler, Roger Arthur; b. ca. 1570 at Sandwich, Kent, England; d. Feb. 27, 1601, hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London). He studied at Rheims (1588-90) and at St. Alban's Seminary, Valladolid, where he was ordained (ca. 1597). He applied to enter the Jesuits in Spain but was sent instead to the English Mission. En route he was captured at sea by the Dutch, but escaped to Kent in early 1598. Under the alias Roger Arthur he began his two-year ministry. Shortly after being admitted to the Society of Jesus by Fr. Henry GARNET, Filcock was betrayed by someone who had known him as a student at Valladolid, arrested (summer 1600), and imprisoned at Newgate before he could undertake his novitiate in Flanders. He was charged with being a priest on Feb. 23, 1601, and indicted three days later. The judge directed the jury to find him guilty of high treason although there was no evidence against him. When he and his former classmate at Valladolid, St. Mark BARKWORTH, were taken to the gallows for execution, they found that St. Anne LINE, for whom Filcock had acted as confessor, had just been executed. At the gallows Filcock denied treason, but admitted that he was "a Catholic, a priest, and a member of the Society of Jesus." He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); Dec. 1 (Jesuits).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998) 65–66. D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FILIATION

The term filiation expresses the relation that exists by reason of the fact that the Second Person of the Holy TRINITY proceeds from the First by way of true GENERA-TION. For the procession of the LOGOS within the divine essence is generation in the strict sense, and this is clear both from revelation and from reasoning based on revelation.

In Scripture, especially in the OT, the phrase SON OF GOD is frequently employed in a figurative sense to denote a friend or a servant of God. In this sense Moses and the Prophets and, indeed, all just men are sons of God. But when Our Lord applied the term to Himself He was not using it in this qualified, figurative sense. He was not merely implying that He was a man closely united to God or officially representing God. He used the term literally; He meant that He was, in the fullest sense, the real, actual Son of the heavenly Father. In the NT, therefore, the term Son of God applied to Christ is meant to express His divinity, and it is in fact a statement of His real generation from the Father. Consequently, in the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel the Logos is called the "only-begotten" of the Father (Jn 1.14, 18). Earlier John had said, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God; and the Word was God" (Jn 1.1). The term the WORD, the LOGOS, gives one an insight into the way in which the Second Person of the Trinity proceeds from the First, namely, by generation.

Generation is described by St. Thomas as "the origin from a conjoined living principle of a living being with a like nature" (Summa theologiae 1a, 27.2). From this technical and rather succinct definition one sees that the notion of generation contains two essential marks: (1) the origin of one living being from another living being; (2) an offspring similar in nature to the parent.

Now there is a remarkable resemblance between the way in which a mental word or idea of some external object is conceived in the human mind and the ordinary biological process of generation. One often calls his ideas CONCEPTS. From the conjunction of an external object with the intellect there is produced a concept of the external object. And, hence, philosophers say that the external object plays the part of the father; the intellect, the part of the mother; and the concept resembles both its parents inasmuch as it is like the object but, at the same time, is modified somewhat by the particular understanding in which it is formed. But when one speaks of the generation of a concept in the human mind he is obviously using the term in an analogous sense. The formation of an idea of an extramental object is not, strictly speaking, generation at all. The process, however, may well be likened to the process of generation. But the procession of the Logos within the divine essence is generation in the strict sense of the word.

According to St. Thomas the Father contemplating the Divine essence generates therein the concept, or the Logos, of the divine essence, which is not merely like the divine essence but absolutely identical with it in nature. The concept that is begotten in the human mind—for instance, the concept of a pine tree—is something accidental to the mind that begets it; but whatever proceeds within the divine essence itself must be identical with the divine essence since there can be nothing accidental in God. The Logos, then, which is begotten of the Father, proceeds consubstantial with the Father, that is, having precisely the same divine nature as the Father, and yet really distinct from the Father in personality, as every son is distinct from the Father who begets him (see CONSUB-STANTIALITY).

In the divine act of cognition, therefore, every reality is present that is essential to the concept of generation. For there is the origin of one living being from another living being in such a way that this living being proceeds with the selfsame nature as its progenitor. The ordinary process of intellection requires that a concept shall be in some way similar to the object that, as has been noted, can be said to play the role of the father. The concept bears an "intentional" resemblance to the object with which it corresponds, that is to say, the object itself is not found in the human mind, but there is a representation of it or an intentional resemblance to it. But that which proceeds in the divine intelligence, namely, the Logos, is similar to the principle from which it proceeds, not merely in an intentional way, but in the most perfect possible way, namely, by substantial identity.

See Also: GENERATION OF THE WORD; PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN; RELATIONS, TRINITARIAN; TRINITY, HOLY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: P. RICHARD, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951) 5.2:2353–2476. I. M. DALMAU, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. Fathers of the Society of Jesus, Professors of the Theological Faculties in Spain, 4 v. Biblioteca de autores cristianos (Madrid 1945) 2.1:391–397.

[L. J. MCGOVERN]

FILIOQUE

A word, meaning "and from the Son," added to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed in the Latin Church after the phrase, "the Holy Spirit . . . who proceeds from the Father." The Filioque has been the center of controversy almost from the time the Western church first inserted it into the Ecumenical Creed of Nicea-Constantinople in the sixth century. First a bone of contention between Rome (which did not add it to the Creed until the 11th century) and Charlemagne, and from the eighth century onwards the occasion for often bitter controversy and misunderstanding between the churches of the Eastern Orthodoxy and the Latin West.

History of the Doctrine. The doctrine of the double Procession of the Holy Spirit came into discussion early (see PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN). THEODORE OF MOP-SUESTIA denied it and THEODORET OF CYR accused CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA of error in holding it. The controversy reflected the tendency of the school of Antioch to interpret the Scriptures literally and to stress the distinction of Persons in the Trinity, in opposition to the school of Alexandria with its more analogical approach to Scriptures and its insistence on the unicity of deity. Later the Western Church, notably Saint AUGUSTINE, developed the Alexandrine thought; the Eastern Church that of Antioch and of Theodoret. Pope MARTIN I included the phrase "and from the Son" in his synodical letter to Constantinople (649), thereby causing irritation that was allayed by an explanation of MAXIMUS THE CONFESSOR: "[The Latins wished] to show that He comes forth through Him and to expose the connection and immutability of the substance" (Patrologia Graeca 91:136). In the 7th century the doctrine and the formula became common in Spain and were discussed in the Synod of Gentilly (767). Meanwhile the confession of faith of TARASIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, recited in the second Council of NI-CAEA, spoke of Procession "from the Father through the Son." As doctrine this was attacked vehemently in the LIBRI CAROLINI, written reputedly by ALCUIN, Charlemagne's adviser, as imprecise and open to erroneous interpretation. The Synod of Frankfurt supported the condemnation, but ADRIAN I defended both the formula of Tarasius and its doctrine (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 98:1249-52). CHARLEMAGNE, who had introduced the filioque into the Creed in his chapel, was unconvinced and bade Alcuin and others write against the phrase, "through the Son." At the same time there was controversy in Palestine (807) which reached Rome and Aachen.

The filioque doctrine became a major cause of dissension between East and West when PHOTIUS, attacking the Western Church in general, made it the chief theological gravamen in his quarrel with NICHOLAS I. The controversy was revived at the Great Schism of 1054, when Constantinople employed the filioque as an argument against Rome, the Holy See having, in the meantime, inserted it into the Creed. It became the chief Greek accusation against the Latin Church and was based more and more on patristic grounds. Under the influence of Saint ANSELM, the Council of Bari (1098), where Greeks of Sicily were represented, formally affirmed both the addition and the doctrine. The Council of LYONS (1274), with the consent of the three Greek representatives of the Emperor MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS and (theoretically) of the Greek Church, defined the doctrine. The clergy and people of Constantinople, however, vehemently rejected it, in spite of the severe persecution employed by their emperor to impose acceptance. Beccus, first imprisoned for his opposition, then converted on reading the patristic evidence adduced by Nicephorus Blemmydes and made Patriarch by Michael, was later accused of heresy and exiled. Denial of the filioque in the East continued, and by the end of the 14th century its abjuration was required from converts. The Council of FLORENCE re-echoed the voice of Beccus. Its decree signed by Latins and Greeks defined that the Holy Spirit proceeds from Father and Son as from one principle and one spiration, "from" and "through" being equivalent and casual. But the union did not endure, and the old state of controversy returned.

The theological arguments for and against the filioque are well summarized in the speeches at Florence-in the sessions of March 17, 21, and 24, 1439. In John 15.26 it is stated: "The spirit of truth who proceeds from the Father," saying nothing of the Son; hence, asserted the Greeks, He proceeds from the Father only. The Latins adduced other texts: The Spirit receives from the Son (being); is sent by the Son (origin); is third in the formula of baptism (origin). The Creed teaches: "proceeds from the Father but is to be adored and glorified with Father and Son." The Greek Fathers were quoted on both sides; the Latin Fathers, however, all taught the filioque. Some of the Greeks maintained that the Father is the "sole fount of Divinity" (ATHANASIUS, PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS); JOHN DAMASCENE stated that "we do not say that the Spirit proceeds from the Son" (Patrologia Graeca 94:832). None used the phrase "proceeds from the Son." On the other hand, none ever wrote "from the Father only," but a great variety of expressions were employed: "springs from," "goes forth from," "Father and Son," "both," "Father through the Son." Analogies were used, such as that the Spirit is like the "steam" rising from the "water"; a "finger" of the "hand"; He is the Spirit of the Son, of truth, etc. The general Greek doctrine can be well summarized in Tarasius' words, "proceeds from the Father through the Son," and was the same as the Latin teaching, though less succinctly expressed. Beccus proved this assertion-the Greeks and Latins were really disputing over words rather than basic doctrineafter the Council of Lyons. In the Council of Florence, John of Montenero and BESSARION demonstrated it and the decree confirmed it.

The Filioque as an Addition to the Creed. After the doctrine had become current through the formulas approved by the synods of Toledo [16th (693), 11th (638), 4th (633), 3d (589)], and the longer formula of the first synod, written by Palentinus Pastor (c. 445), who had been inspired by LEO I's letters to Turibius, the filioque passed to nearby Gaul, where it was defended in the Synod of Gentilly (767) and in the Libri Carolini. From

Gaul it came to Italy, as witnessed by the Council of Cividale (796-97). The Creed with the addition was introduced in Spain into the Mozarabic Rite before the Pater Noster (c. 589). Some two centuries later Charlemagne imposed its use, after the gospel, in his royal chapel of Aachen. Certain monks took the usage to Jerusalem where it aroused bitter theological controversy with the Greeks (807). Pope LEO III, appealed to by the Latin monks, sent in answer the form of the Creed recited in Rome and informed Charlemagne of his reply. The emperor held a council on the question in Aachen (809) and tried to obtain Leo's approval. "So do I think and hold," Leo replied in regard to the doctrine. On the matter of the addition, Leo stated: "We do not presume either in reciting or in teaching to add by inserting anything into that Creed." And he advised the emperor by slow stages to drop the recital of the Creed in the Mass. To stress his attitude he had two silver shields made, one with the Latin, the other with the Greek text of the Creed, neither with the addition; these he placed in front of the confession in Saint Peter's. The filioque, however, was finally inserted into the Creed also in Rome, probably c. 1013, at the insistance of the Emperor HENRY II. Even so, there were places where the filioque was omitted, e.g., Paris as late as 1240, without that implying any doubt about the doctrine. The addition was the subject of all 14 sessions in Ferrara of the Council of Ferrara-Florence. The Greeks asserted that any addition of a word or syllable to the Creed had been forbidden at EPHESUS (431); the Latins maintained that only change of the faith, and not of the words in the Creed, was intended. The decree of Florence defined that "the filioque was added to the Creed licitly and reasonably to expound the truth, and under the spur of necessity."

Later History. The unionistic effects of the Council of Florence soon faded and the filioque, both as addition and as doctrine, continued to be a chief subject of controversy. Old Catholics and Anglicans, Russian, Greek, Romanian, and Serbian Orthodox at Bonn in 1874 and 1875, agreed on its illegality as an addition, and tried to find a common basis of doctrine in six propositions taken from Saint John Damascene. The result was controversy among Russian theologians, and the assertion in a Council of Saint Petersburg in 1892 that "from the Father only" is part of Orthodox doctrine. In 1956 in conversations with Anglicans (who readily admit the illegitimacy of the addition but do not deny its truth or omit it from the Creed), the Russians held firm to their old positions. The Greek Churches also, though with less inflexibility, have the same views.

While the See of Rome insists that all the Eastern Churches that are in communion with it accept the doctrine of the filioque, it nevertheless does not impose its inclusion in the Creed. This is evidenced in the second Council of LYONS (though NICHOLAS III demanded it in 1278), Florence (though CALLISTUS III imposed it in 1457), CLEMENT VIII for the union of the Ruthenians (Ukrainians, Byelorussians) at Brest-Litovsk in 1596 (though the Ruthenians at the Council of Zamosc in 1720 imposed it on themselves). BENEDICT XIV in 1742 ruled that the Greeks were under no obligation to recite it, and such has since that time been the accepted position in the Eastern Catholic Churches.

Despite Latin efforts to minimize the doctrinal differences, the controversy over the filioque continued to divide East and West. In the 19th century Old Catholics and Anglicans, Russian, Greek, Romanian, and Serbian Orthodox meeting in Bonn (1874 and 1875), agreed that the unilateral addition of the phrase on the part of the West was illegitimate. The Old Catholics deleted the filioque from the Creed, and, at the request of the Greek and Russian delegates, the Bonn group endorsed six propositions taken from the works of Saint John Damascene as expressing "the doctrine of the ancient undivided Church." Proposition three stated, "The Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son." The attempt, however, to find in the works of Saint John Damascene a formula that expressed their common belief regarding the procession of the Holy Spirit, resulted in a controversy among the Russian Orthodox. As a result the Council of Saint Petersburg (1892) declared that "from the Father only" is a tenet of Orthodox doctrine. Nonetheless, in 1931 an Anglican-Orthodox Joint Doctrinal Commission reaffirmed that "through the Son" was useful as a unifying formula.

Altering the Creed. Although Russian theologians held firm to their position as recently as 1956 in conversations with Anglicans, the climate of the discussion changed noticeably as ecumenical efforts intensified in the years after Vatican II. At a meeting of the Joint Doctrinal Commission of Anglicans and Orthodox in Moscow in 1976, the Anglican delegates repudiated the filioque because the sentence in the Ecumenical Creed about the Spirit proceeding from the Father addresses the Spirit's eternal procession, not the historical mission; the interpolation of the filioque was made without universal agreement of the churches and the Creed constitutes the public confession of faith by the people of God in the Eucharist. The 1978 Lambeth Conference endorsed the Moscow statement and asked the churches of the Anglican communion to consider returning to the original wording of the Ecumenical Creed, that is, to drop the filioque from the text. In 1981 the Anglican Consultative Commission reported the responses of the individual provinces, but recommended that no unilateral alterations be made before the 1988 Lambeth Conference. Meanwhile in 1985 the Episcopal Church in America went on record in favor of dropping the filioque from the Creed.

Many Roman Catholic theologians, notably Yves Congar, favor deleting the filioque from the Creed "as a gesture of humility and brotherhood on the part of the Roman Catholic Church which might have widereaching ecumenical implications" (I Believe, III. 206). In May of 1973, the Greek Catholic hierarchy decided to follow the precedent of other Eastern churches in communion with the Roman See in suppressing the formula in the Greek text of the Creed. Pope John Paul II in several statements commemorating the 16th centenary of the Council of Constantinople quoted the third article of the Creed without the filioque.

The Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches organized consultations in 1978 and 1979 to deal with the controversy. By way of a final report, the consultations drafted a memorandum stating, "The restoration of unity is inconceivable if agreement is not reached on the formal and substantial justification for this formula." The memorandum, "one of the most important and balanced statements ever produced on this thorny issue" (Fahey, 667), asserts:

> the Son is indeed not alien to the procession of the Spirit, nor the Spirit to the begetting of the Son something which has also been indicated in Eastern theology when it has spoken of the Spirit as 'resting upon' or 'shining out through' the Son, and insisted that the generation of the Son and the procession of the Spirit must be distinguished but not separated.

The report further noted that the Old Catholic Church had already suppressed the filioque in the liturgy and that the Anglican Communion was seriously considering a similar move. Among its recommendations was the suggestion "that the original form of the third article of the Creed, without the filioque, should everywhere be recognized as the normative one and restored." In his preface to the report, however, Lukas Visher cautioned churches against taking separate decisions for "the way to communion among the churches can be opened up only by an agreement for which they take joint responsibility."

The International Consultation on Common Texts included a translation of filioque in the English version of the Ecumenical Creed, but put it in brackets with an indication that some churches do not use it.

Bibliography: J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Creeds (2d ed. London 1960). J. GILL, The Council of Florence (Cambridge, England 1959). K. WARE and C. DAVEY eds., Anglican-Orthodox Dialogue: The Moscow Statement Agreed by the Anglican-Orthodox Joint Doctrinal Commission 1976 (London 1977). H. KÜNG and J. MOLTMANN, "Conflicts About the Holy Spirit," Concilium 128 (New York 1979). Spirit of God, Spirit of Christ. Ecumenical Reflections on the Filioque Controversy, Faith and Order Paper 103 (Geneva 1981). Y. M. J. CONGAR, I Believe in the Holy Spirit, v. 3 (New York 1983). M. A. FAHEY, "Orthodox Ecumenism and Theology: 1978–83," Theological Studies 44 (1983) 625–92.

[J. GILL/B. L. MARTHALER]

FILIPPINI, LUCY, ST.

Foundress of the Pontifical Institute of the Religious Teachers Filippini; b. Tarquinia, Italy, Jan. 13, 1672; d. Montefiascone, March 25, 1732. As a child she helped her pastor to teach catechism. When she was 16, Cardinal Marc'Antonio BARBARIGO, Bishop of Montefiascone, sent her to a monastery of nuns, where under his guidance, she prepared for her future mission. She remained there until 1692, when she joined Bl. Rose Venerini (until Lucy took over completely in 1694) in the work of educating the poorer girls of the diocese (see VENERINI SIS-TERS). On Oct. 15, 1704, the community was formally established, receiving their rule and habit from the cardinal and pronouncing their Oblation. After the death of the cardinal in 1706, the community was called to Rome by CLEMENT XI, developing into the institute of today, which is under the sponsorship of the Apostolic Almoner. From 1828 to 1896 there was an organizational division in the institute, which has some 2,000 members in about 180 houses in Italy, England, Brazil, Canada, Switzerland, and the United States. Lucy, noted for great virtue, was beatified June 13, 1926, and canonized June 22, 1930.

Feast: March 25.

Bibliography: P. P. PARENTE, Schoolteacher and Saint (St. Meinrad, Ind. 1954). J. A. ABBO, L'Istituto delle Maestre Pie Filippini e la Santa Sede (Rome 1962). G. BASILE and G. CALABRESE, Forever yes (Philadelphia 1979). P. BERGAMASCHI, From the Land of the Etruscans, tr. M. MARCHIONE (Rome 1986).

[M. MARCHIONE]

FILIPPUCCI, ALESSANDRO FRANCESCO SAVERIO

Jesuit missionary in China and Japan for 32 years; b. Macerata, Italy, Jan. 5, 1632; d. Macau, Aug. 15, 1692. He became a Jesuit in 1651, and in 1658 was cured of a serious illness through the intercession of St. Francis Xavier. In 1660 he left for China, arriving there in 1663. At Macau he held the posts of novice-master and professor of literature until 1671, when he was assigned to parish work in Guangdong (Kwantung) Province. He saw his residence destroyed during an uprising against the Emperor in 1676. After serving as provincial for Japan from 1680 to 1683, and superior in Guangzhou (Canton) from 1683 to 1688, he was named visitor of the missions in China and Japan from 1688 to 1691. He collected the letters of St. Francis Xavier that were later included in Possuine's edition. He also wrote a work in defense of the Jesuits in the controversy of the CHINESE RITES (Lyons 1700).

Bibliography: L. PFISTER, Notices biographiques et bibliographiques, 2 v. (Shanghai 1932–34). Dizionario ecclesiastico 1:1118.

[B. LAHIFF]

FILLASTRE, GUILLAUME

The name of two French ecclesiastics.

Fillastre, Guillaume, French cardinal, canonist, humanist, geographer; b. Le Maine, c. 1348; d. Rome, Nov. 6, 1428. As doctor juris utriusque Fillastre taught law at Reims and was later dean there. He lived at the time of the WESTERN SCHISM, and first distinguished himself at the Synod of Paris, 1406, where Fillastre was the handpicked defender of BENEDICT XIII the antipope. But within the next three years-possibly at the Council of PISA (1409)-both Fillastre and his friend PETER OF AILLY changed their allegiance to the antipope JOHN XXIII, who named them cardinals in 1411. At the Council of CON-STANCE (1415–17) Fillastre called for the resignation of the three papal contenders, GREGORY XII, as well as his own former benefactors, Benedict XIII and John XXIII. Fillastre entered the controversy on CONCILIARISM when he insisted on the superiority of councils over the pope. The diary he kept at Constance became a principal source for the council. It was Fillastre's vote in the French "nation" during the last session of the council (1417) that ensured the election of Martin V as pope. Martin appointed Fillastre legatus a latere to France (1418) and later, archpriest of the Latern basilica. In 1422 he gave up his See of Aix, which he had held in commendam since 1414, for the See of Saint-Pons-de-Thomières. Besides his theological and canonical writings Fillastre annotated a number of Plato's works, and was much interested in Ptolemy's geography.

Fillastre, Guillaume, French abbot, bishop, statesman; b. Le Maine c. 1400; d. Ghent, Aug. 21, 1473. He may have been a nephew of the preceding. Fillastre was a Benedictine at Châlons-sur-Marne when he became abbot of Saint-Thierry of Reims (1431). In 1436 he received a doctorate in Canon Law from Louvain. He became bishop of Verdun in 1437, commendatory abbot of SAINT-BERTIN AT ST. OMER (1447), and bishop of Toul (1449). He was already closely associated with Philip the Good of Burgundy when, in 1461, he became bishop of Tournai. Philip named him first councilor (1463) of his Council of State, and chancellor (1460) of the Order of Golden Fleece. He served on diplomatic missions to both the French king and the pope. His writings included a work entitled La Toison d'Or, the Chronique de l'histoire de France, and a French translation of Troyennes istoires. He left his wealth to the abbeys and dioceses he had governed.

Bibliography: L. SALEMBIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.2:2343–52. G. MOLLAT, Catholicisme 4:1286–89. J. WODKA, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 4:128.

[J. F. JOLLEY]

FINAL CAUSALITY

The type of CAUSALITY exercised by the END (Lat. finis). In Aristotelian philosophy and in the medieval scholastic philosophy derived from it, the term "cause" had broader signification than in modern usage; it meant "that on which something depends for its existence in any way," and not merely an extrinsic agent. According to Aristotle any corruptible substance depends for its existence on some other substance that has produced it (its efficient cause), on its intrinsic constituents (its formal and material causes), and on a goal, or telos (its final cause). This telos may be another substance for whose sake it has been produced (its extrinsic final cause); e.g., wheat is grown for the nourishment of man. Or it may simply be the full development of the substance itself (its intrinsic final cause), e.g., the maturity of the wheat plant. Thus the final cause need not preexist the process of which it is the cause, but may actually be the effect of this process. In this case it preexists only as a tendency in the efficient cause, as the tendency to mature growth preexists in the grain of wheat.

This article discusses the historical development of the concept of final causality in ancient and medieval philosophy and the value of the concept in various areas of philosophy and theology. (For the modern development of the concept and its use in the sciences, see TELEOLO-GY.)

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Primitive man tended to interpret all phenomena in human terms, and hence was inclined to attribute purpose to all natural events. At the same time he was likely to think even of human behavior as determined by powers and traditional rules whose purpose is mysterious. Thus mythology often pictures the world as governed by an inscrutable and impersonal FATE, destiny, or necessity, to which even the gods are subject.

Greek Philosophy. Pre-Socratic GREEK PHILOSO-PHY attempted to explain the world in terms of matter and forces, such as heat and cold, or in terms of quantitative proportions (Pythagoreans), and made little use of the concept of purpose. The atomistic systems, which were the most developed product of this first period of philosophic thought, positively rejected the concept. Thus EM-PEDOCLES attributed the evolution of living things to chance combination of parts. Leucippus and DEMOCRI-TUS explained all things as chance combinations of atoms that had an innate tendency to fall; but their fall was in an infinite void, hence without any telos. This radical espousal of a cosmos without inherent purpose remains the classical position in opposition to the doctrine of final causality. It was later adopted by the Epicureans and revived during the Renaissance. (See ATOMISM; MATERIAL-ISM.)

ANAXAGORAS, however, suggested that the flux of matter must originate with Mind, and Diogenes of Apollonia states explicitly:

Such a distribution would not have been possible without Intelligence, namely, that all things should have their measure: winter and summer and night and day and rains and winds and periods of fine weather; other things also, if one will study them closely, will be found to have the best possible arrangement. [Simplicius, Physics 252.11.]

SOCRATES also seems to have held this conviction. It is forcefully put by PLATO, especially in the Timaeus. where he explains the visible universe as a result of a kind of compromise between reason, which produces order and purpose in all things, and necessity, which is a kind of material principle resisting the order that reason seeks to impose. Thus the world is intelligible as an imperfect imitation of Intelligence.

Aristotelian Analysis. ARISTOTLE (rightly, it seems) claimed to be the first to give an analytic account of final causality (Meta. 988b 10). For him the final cause is the "cause of the causes," which must be known to give a complete explanation of any natural process. MATTER cannot exist without FORM, and form itself is produced in matter by some extrinsic AGENT, or efficient cause. The efficient cause does not produce an indeterminate action, however, since natural processes are observed to be regular. Hence, before the efficient cause begins to act it must be predetermined in a specific way to produce a definite effect. This predetermination, or specific tendency toward a goal, is final causality.

In intelligent beings this goal preexists in the knower as conscious purpose. In brute animals it preexists as an image of something desired. In plants and inanimate substances it preexists as NATURE, an unconscious inner tendency to specific activities or passivities.

Besides this innate purposiveness in the individual substances that make up the cosmos, there is also a general cosmic order; according to this, elements tend to form compounds; inanimate compounds are used as nourishment by plants; plants are similarly used by animals; and animals and all other things are used in the service of man. Man finds his happiness not in himself but in contemplation of the cosmic order and of the higher spiritual beings that it manifests. Not every phenomenon in the universe, however, has a purpose. The cosmos is not a single substance but many substances, each pursuing its own end-not all of them in perfect harmony. Furthermore, the material character of the visible world makes the activities of each substance liable to chance encounters and to frustration (see CHANCE). Hence it is not possible to use teleological explanation as a means of prediction. Rather it is a backward-looking analysis by which, from the observation of a goal already achieved, the steps that were necessary to its achievement are discovered.

Stoics and Neoplatonists. After Aristotle, the Stoics and Neoplatonists both defended finality without conceding it a really vital role. The Stoics held that the universe, including man, operates by an absolutely deterministic NATURAL LAW. In such a view, teleology is no longer found in individual substances but is the fixed pattern of the cosmos as a whole. The Neoplatonists tended to treat the order in the cosmos in a static, as opposed to a dynamic, sense and thus to reduce finality to exemplarity (a type of extrinsic formal causality). The universe became, for them, a hierarchy of more and more perfect imitations of the One rather than a system of diverse things, each seeking its own end and all coordinated by a First Mover.

Medieval Thought. The philosophers and theologians of the earlier Middle Ages (whether Jewish, Christian, or Islamic) remained within the Neoplatonist perspective, reinforced by the scriptural emphasis on divine providence and on the conception of God as the goal of the entire universe. The Christian apologists frequently stressed the argument for God's existence from order in the cosmos, but it is with St. JOHN DAMASCENE in the 8th century that the famous teleological proof for God's existence was first clearly formulated.

The renewal of ARISTOTELIANISM returned the concept of final causality to its central role. St. ALBERT THE GREAT and St. THOMAS AQUINAS organized both their philosophy and their theology on a teleological plan. They saw the whole universe as a plurality of beings, each endowed with a nature or principle of appropriate action; higher beings are endowed also with intelligence and free will. Under the governance of God, which is shared in a measure with created ministers, each of these beings tends toward its own goal, which is to reflect some specific aspect of God's perfection and to contribute to the universal order of the cosmos that is also His reflection. This reflection of God in nature, however, is not the best possible, since no created being or group of beings can be anything but an imperfect imitation of the infinite God. Nor is the order of nature infallible, since it is subject to chance, conflict, and sin. God's governance, however, ensures that the natural order cannot be wholly corrupted and that it will finally attain to the goal He has ordained for it.

According to St. Thomas, philosophy comes to a knowledge of the final causality of particular things by an observation of natural processes, since these for the most part (but not invariably) achieve their goal. The final causality of the universe as a whole, however, is mysterious and can only be conjectured, unless reason is aided by divine revelation.

The later scholastics turned away from this thoroughly teleological position. John DUNS SCOTUS, by his radical insistence on divine freedom, seemed to weaken the role of telos as the objective determinant of love. The dynamism of the world came to be seen more as an expression of inner indeterminacy and freedom than as goal-seeking activity. For the nominalists, led by WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, final causality is simply a name given to the efficient cause considered as producing an effect. It was this position, reinforced by the Platonic mathematicism of the Renaissance, that bore fruit in the denial of final causality by GALILEO and Francis BACON.

VALUE OF THE CONCEPT

Despite these various interpretations, the concept of final causality has great value when properly employed in philosophy and theology. This part of the article attempts to explain its value and use, treating successively of the philosophy of nature, metaphysics, and theology.

Philosophy of Nature. For Immanuel KANT the principle of finality is of heuristic value in science. Man, that he may give intelligible order to the data of experience, tends inevitably to see the world as if it were a construct designed for a purpose. The problem, however, is this: Is there in nature itself a teleological order that man must grasp in order to understand nature as it is?

Intimations of Finality. This problem is created first of all by the language used in talking about nature. It has been observed that no matter how antiteleological a scientist may be, he can only with the greatest difficulty avoid terms such as function, tendency, maturity, and growth. Sometimes he coins new words (e.g., teleonomy or directiveness) for teleology, which on examination could mean the same thing. The methods of modern analytical philosophy can be applied to scientific discourse to show that it is extremely difficult to eliminate every implication of means-goal relationships from the way one talks about the world, except by confining oneself to a purely mathematical language. The moment that a physical, dynamic interpretation is given to the mathematical formalism, this notion tends again to enter.

Psychological studies of children and of primitive peoples show that the concepts of causality and of final causality are not childish but are the product of psychological maturation. They represent the growing human being's achievement of self-conscious control over his own behavior and are his recognition of regularities in the environment that are independent of himself.

In applying the phenomenological method to experience, one again becomes aware not only that his own behavior in exploring experience is teleological, to the extent that it is a search for order and intelligibility, but also that he is confronted in his experience with objects that "go their own way," i.e., with patterns of behavior that are not his, but that he comes gradually to recognize and to understand. For example, the child playing with a dog comes to appreciate that the dog has a life of its own, analogous to that of the child, yet also very different. Certainly if experience did not manifest this teleological character of behavior to man, it would itself be of little value.

Existentialist philosophers similarly emphasize two facets of experience that give rise to teleological interpretations. One is the experience of LOVE, wherein one person feels himself drawn irresistibly to another, who becomes a goal. In this experience man discovers that, in a sense, his whole being is seeking for another person who is not possessed, and yet in being loved is somehow already his. Thus man is predetermined to union with another, and in the process of attaining the other discovers himself, since the other is almost more he than he is himself.

The other experience is that of FREEDOM. Love is not necessarily free; it may have the character of blind passion. Yet the most perfect love is one in which the self is given freely, so that in losing himself the lover finds himself, i.e., performs the most independent and deliberate of acts, a free act. Nevertheless some existentialists, such as J. P. Sartre, seem to deny the possibility of a real self-giving and self-finding, and also give to freedom an arbitrary and goalless character, as if man is free only when he acts without a motive (see EXISTENTIALISM).

Positivist and idealist philosophers are kept from any consideration of the teleological problems by their complete rejection of causal explanations. Marxists, on the other hand, return pretty much to the old Stoic position: there is no individual causality, but a universal dialectical trend inherent in the material universe as a whole. This position has much in common with that of P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, who detects in the universe a single evolutionary process moving toward a single goal.

Finality in Nature. Perhaps a more fruitful approach to the question is to consider the problem in its original terms. An examination of the world reveals certain obvious regular processes that repeat themselves again and again. These are noticed, however, in an ocean of other processes that appear random and unique. Science attempts to discover additional regularities in this sea of apparent randomness, proceeding on the conviction, based on experience, that a hidden order is often present. Science need not, however, make the dogmatic assumption of determination, viz, that all events in the world exhibit regularities, since in many well-explored situations events that are obviously casual can be found.

In discovering regular processes, which can be called natural, one also detects natural units, i.e., things that are the subjects of these processes and are relatively independent of the surrounding sea of events. If such units did not exist, it would be impossible to be sure even of regularities, since there is an unresolvable paradox in the notion of a process that has no subject and that comes to be from nothing. In the case of higher animals, such a unit is obvious in the ORGANISM. It is more difficult to identify in the case of the lower animals and plants, but this obscurity often yields to further observation. In the inanimate world, modern science has practically identified the free molecule and the free atom as such units.

Given a natural unit undergoing natural processes that can be observationally and even experimentally identified, the problem of analyzing and specifying each process remains. As Aristotle indicated, the notion of a process of natural change implies four aspects. The process goes on in a subject (material cause); it results in a modification of this subject (formal cause); it cannot in an exact sense be attributed to the subject itself, since a thing cannot produce itself or give what it does not yet have, but must be produced by another thing (efficient cause). The process, if regularly repeated, must end in a specific effect that gives it character and identity (final cause). This effect either must be destructive of the subject, or it must preserve and protect the subject, or it must contribute to the good of the system. If simply destructive, it cannot be said to be natural in a primary sense, because on the disappearance of the subject the process is no longer identifiable. Hence, in a natural process the effect is good or desirable and is sought as a preservation and development of the subject or of the system. But this specific effect must have been predetermined in the agent; otherwise it would not tend to reoccur regularly. How does it exist in the agent? It can be there only as the nature of the agent—i.e., its inner tendency to a certain sort of goal-directed behavior—or as the intelligence of an agent who is able to choose what sort of action he will perform to attain a desired goal. It is this directiveness of natural processes and of the things that produce them, which is not by chance or by strict necessity but to or for a goal, that is final causality in its primary sense. Goal-directed behavior is for the sake of the goal and depends upon the goal at least in direction or intention, without which it cannot be.

Such explanations are needed in studying the natural world because, with the element of chance in the universe, man cannot really predict the future. Any natural process may be frustrated. Hence scientific explanation is fundamentally backward-looking. It begins with some completed effect, a regularly reoccurring subject that has undergone a process by which it has come into existence and reached a stable existence in the world. Analysis, assisted by observation and experiment, can determine what factors were necessary for this process to reach its term. This is explanation in terms of final causality.

Metaphysics. Although the term metaphysical is often used to indicate any philosophical analysis and philosophy, in turn, is used to indicate any analysis of basic principles in a field of study, few philosophers have admitted the existence of METAPHYSICS, in the strict sense, as a valid discipline. Metaphysics, in the sense intended by the Aristotelian school, is a discipline based on the power of reason to prove the existence of spiritual substances-at least a spiritual part of man and a first principle that is independent of matter. It proposes that both spiritual and material substances can be studied in terms of the common notion of BEING, i.e., in terms of what is common to matter and spirit and dependent upon the same first principle. One of the problems of such a metaphysics is to determine whether the principles of causality discovered in a restricted sense, for the material realm, have universal and absolute validity, so that they apply to all being.

It is established in such a metaphysics that the First Efficient Cause, the Unmoved Mover, cannot itself have a cause, since it undergoes no process; on the other hand, it must be the ultimate final cause of all things that undergo any sort of process, whether a physical change or some sort of spiritual change analogous to physical change. Seeing that efficient and final causality are correlative, the First Efficient Cause must be also the Ultimate Final Cause; i.e., God creates and governs all things in view of His own perfection, which creatures share and imitate since there is no other ultimate perfection.

Nevertheless, it does not follow, as many philosophers have thought, that particular creatures lack a proper final causality of their own, any more than they lack a proper efficient causality. Since creatures truly participate in being by the gift of God, they also imitate Him in being true causes. Hence every created nature must either by nature or by choice seek an end that is its own perfection. Since creatures form a universe, there must also be a relation of lower to higher ends under the ultimate end. This fact of final causality does not, however, exclude the existence of chance events and of contingency. Every created good is finite and hence is the object of God's free choice. When God freely chooses to create something He does not make it to be necessary but contingent. Similarly, among material things the plurality of causes permits genuine chance, although this too falls under divine providence.

This method of establishing the universal necessity of final causality, beginning with induction from sense experience and then extending the physical principle to metaphysics by way of analogy based on a causal relation between God and the world, is not followed by all Thomists. Some Neothomists wish to establish this necessity by an analysis of the concept of being, showing that the notion of being must include the notion of ultimate determination. However, such a way seems open to accusations of verbalism. Other Neothomists wish to bypass the whole order of induction from external reality and to establish final causality in terms of necessary conditions of thought—a way open to objection as Cartesian or Kantian.

Theology. St. Thomas Aquinas uses the idea of finality to organize his entire theological scheme. Thus, in the Summa contra gentiles, bk. 3, he gives a broad panorama of the universe showing all things as going forth from God by creation and returning to God by finality. Angels and men attain to the contemplation of God and thus are intended by Him as true final causes in their own right, themselves forming a society. Thus the extrinsic final cause of the universe is God, whereas its intrinsic final cause is the contemplative society of rational creatures. The irrational universe, in turn, is ordered to the good of the rational universe. It serves man's physical needs and in this respect is not needed by the angels. But it serves both men and angels as a mirror in which they contemplate certain reflections of God that are not found in the spiritual universe. Also, through sharing in God's governance over the material universe, both men and angels participate in God's creative action. (See UNIVERSE, ORDER OF.)

In the Summa theologiae this conception is further developed, with emphasis being placed on the fact that man is a dynamic image of God, perfectly realized in Jesus Christ, in whom the whole visible cosmos is redeemed and consummated.

When discussing the finality attributed to Christ, Duns Scotus differs from Aquinas in hypothesizing (some of his disciples were less cautious) that the motive of the Incarnation was the perfecting of the universe, so that even if man had not sinned the Incarnation would have taken place. Aquinas, on the other hand, argues that the Incarnation was primarily for the sake of redeeming man from sin. Both Scotus and Aquinas agree that the universe has the Incarnation as its final cause, an elevation beyond its original goal; but for Aquinas this elevation is wholly a free act of mercy, occasioned by a tragic fall.

The argument from finality lies at the basis of the medieval scholastic "arguments from convenience," since "convenience," or "fittingness," is seen by looking backward from an end already known to be accomplished. Post-Tridentine theology has become suspicious of this type of reasoning and tends to substitute in its place the methods of positive theology. However, the argument from convenience is legitimate if understood within its proper limits. Indeed, modern exegetical scholarship shows that the revelation contained in Scripture is fundamentally eschatological. The events of salvation history all take on their meaning in terms of the ultimate goal, the kingdom of God in which the whole cosmos is subject to Christ and He to God. Hence every theological problem must involve the question of the reference to the eschaton, from which all theological meaning is ultimately derived.

In current Catholic thought this great importance of finality is emphasized in the writings of Teilhard de Chardin, who has attempted to give a Christian synthesis of modern science by seeing the entire process of creation as directed to "the Omega point." That this attempt has been illuminating and satisfying not only for Christians but for non-Christians seems to signalize the frustration modern man encounters when he looks for intelligibility in a purely mechanistic picture of the universe. The question is, however, whether this grandiose scheme does not suffer the same weaknesses that in the past have so often discredited teleology, namely, that it tries to explain the universe in a monistic manner, either ignoring sin and freedom or treating them as the product of a single law. The more modest concept of Aquinas-which sees the universe as a pluralistic structure of interrelated things and persons, each pursuing the tendency of its own nature or the choices of its free will, beset by chance and contingency but coordinated by God to a unified goal, yet to be attained only at the cost of tragedy-seems closer to reality and more compatible with the plurality of sciences and the data of revelation.

See Also: FINALITY, PRINCIPLE OF; NATURE.

Bibliography: P. A. R. JANET, Final Causes, 5th ed. tr. W. AF-FLECK (New York 1905). R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, Le Réalisme du principe de finalité (Paris 1932). A. MANSION, Introduction à la physique aristotélicienne (2d ed. Louvain 1946) 251–281. F. SOLMSEN, Aristotle's System of the Physical World (Ithaca, N.Y. 1960) 92–117. A. VAN MELSEN, The Philosophy of Nature (Duquesne Studies Philos. Ser. 2; Pittsburgh 1953) 159–161. M. A. BUNGE, Causality (Cambridge, Mass. 1959) ch. 2. A. PAP, An Introduction to the Philosophy of Science (Glencoe, Ill. 1962) 359–364. P. TEIL-HARD DE CHARDIN, The Phenomenon of Man, tr. B. WALL (New York 1959). B. M. ASHLEY, ''Research into the Intrinsic Final Causes of Physical Things,'' American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 26 (1952) 185–194.

[B. M. ASHLEY]

FINALITY, PRINCIPLE OF

A principle commonly accepted by scholastic philosophers as one of the FIRST PRINCIPLES; it is succinctly stated by St. Thomas Aquinas: "Every agent acts for an end" (C. gent. 3.2), i.e., all beings when acting tend to some definite effect.

Explanation. The principle applies only analogously to intelligent and to nonintelligent beings. An intelligent being, qua intelligent, can know and freely elect the proximate end for which he is acting; a nonintelligent being, however, does not formally know the end to which its action tends, even though it is the agent tending to that end, i.e., even though the action is its own. Regardless of the agent acting, its tending toward an end (which scholastics regard as a CONDITION sine qua non of acting) connotes intelligence, inasmuch as such action is orderly. If intelligence is not manifested on the part of the agent that acts, then it is presupposed on the part of another being who directs the agent to so act. This other being may direct the agent in a wholly extrinsic manner, as a writer moves the pen to inscribe words, or it may direct the agent by placing certain tendencies or appetites within its very nature.

Tendency or APPETITE, in this context, must also be understood analogously. It may denote an intellectual, a sensory, or a natural appetite—the last being manifested by the empirically observable fact that all things tend to preserve their being (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2). End is then related to appetite as its object; it is something suitable, and hence GOOD, for the agent. It is suitable or good because the agent has a particular nature and because its tendencies are the basis for actions that realize or perfect that nature. Thus understood in this manner, the principle of finality implies a limited kind of determinism. The principle of finality is closely related to the principle of INTELLIGIBILITY, which states that all being is intelligible. Those who deny the latter principle are led to reject the principle of finality, considering it anthropomorphist in inspiration. Francis BACON and Immanuel KANT thus attacked the validity of the principle of finality, and, more recently, so have Julian Huxley and Ernest Nagel. To obviate such criticism, one must bear in mind the following clarifications.

Clarifications. The principle does not claim, as some have misinterpreted it to, that every effect is for an end. It merely asserts that every agent acts for an end. Thus chance events do not invalidate the principle of finality (see CHANCE). Neither does the principle state that every agent actually attains the end for which it acts; even if impeded from attainment, the agent originates activity that is end-directed. In fact, at root, the denial of finality implies a denial of activity. Finality promotes activity; it moves the agent to such activity. If the agent did not act for an end, there would be no reason for it to act this way rather than that way. Being indifferent to all ends, it would be unable to act for any.

The ontological grounds for acting, and thus acting for an end, are rooted ultimately in the goodness of being. If being and the good were not convertible, there would be no activity (see TRANSCENDENTALS). Finality accounts as well for the regularity and UNIFORMITY manifested in the laws of nature. It makes nature predictable and scientific knowledge possible, thus providing the ontological basis for physical laws and for the moral NATURAL LAW.

It should further be noted that an end is sought because it is a principle of perfection; however, this does not necessarily imply that the end perfects principally the being acting for the end. In propagating its species, a plant acts for an end that is not so much its own perfection or good as it is the good of another. Then, too, not all elements within a system may act for the good of that system. Thus, in a sub-system encompassed within a larger whole, e.g., a parasite or mold within an organism, the parasite does not perfect the parent organism; rather it seeks its own good.

The fact that great caution must be exercised when identifying the particular end for which an agent acts does not nullify the general principle that agents do act for ends. Such ends are many and varied in the order of nature. While some are primary and others secondary, all are so interrelated as to manifest, to the discerning observer, the existence of God, the Author of nature (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF).

See Also: END; FINAL CAUSALITY; TELEOLOGY.

Bibliography: R. BUSA and C. NEGRO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:438–439. A. WENZL, Lexikon für Theologie [G. F. KREYCHE]

FÍNÁN CAM, ST.

Irish abbot; b. County Kerry, Ireland, sixth century. It is thought that he was educated by St. Brendan of Clonfert (d. 578), and thus would have flourished in the sixth century (see BRENDAN, SS.). Fínán (Finnian or Fionain, fair-haired) Cam (the squinting) is probably the saint of Church Island, Lough Currane, County Kerry. His principal monastic foundation was made at Kinnity, County Offaly, under the Slieve Bloom mountains. In Kerry, Fínán is the object of local devotion, but in the vitae and in the public mind he has been hopelessly confused with Finan Lobur (the infirm), who, in fact, was never in Kerry.

Feast: April 7.

Bibliography: C. PLUMMER, comp., Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae, 2 v. (Oxford 1910) 2:87–95. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 421–422. F. HENRY, "Early Monasteries . . . (Co. Kerry)," Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy 58, sec. C (1957) 45–166. D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD, The Irish Saints (Dublin 1964) 158–159.

[D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD]

FINAN OF LINDISFARNE, ST.

Monk and bishop; d. Aug. 31, 661. He is called in Irish Fínán mac Rímedo and almost certainly was a native of Ireland. He was a monk at the Abbey of IONA before he succeeded AIDAN as bishop of LINDISFARNE, probably in 651. He set about extending the faith outside Northumbria and baptized Kings Peada (d. 656) of the Middle Angles and Sigebert (fl. 616–658) of the East Saxons. Later, he appointed bishops for their kingdoms: Diuma (d. 658) to the Middle Angles and CEDD, an Anglo-Saxon, to the East Saxons. At Lindisfarne he built a church, more Scottorum, a wooden structure with a thatched roof. He was an intransigent upholder of Celtic customs until his death. Pope LEO XIII extended his feast to the Scottish Church in 1898.

Feast: Jan. 19 (formerly Feb. 17).

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiatical History: The Annals of Ulster, ed. and tr. W. M. HENNESSY and B. MACCARTHY, 4 v. (Dublin 1887–1901) v.1, under year 659. The Martyrology of Tallaght, ed. R. I. BEST and H. J. LAWLOR (H. Bradshaw Soc. 68; London 1931)

6. A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–87) 2:516. L. GOUGAUD, Christianity in Celtic Lands, tr. M. JOYNT (London 1932) 138. The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:1305–06. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:1313. J. O'HANLON, Lives of the Irish Saints, 8 v. (New York) 2:610.

[C. MCGRATH]

FINCH, JOHN, BL.

Yeoman farmer, lay martyr; b. ca. 1548, Eccleston, Lancashire, England; hanged, drawn, and quartered at Lancaster, April 20, 1584. Although he was raised in a well-established Protestant family, Finch converted to Catholicism after seeing the contrast between Catholics and Protestants while spending time with cousins at the Inner Temple in London. Following his marriage his home in Lancaster became a center for Catholic activity. He was himself a catechist and sheltered refugee priests until his arrest on Christmas Day 1581. While he and Fr. George Ostliffe were being held, interrogated, and tortured in the house of the earl of Derby, it was rumored that Finch had betrayed the priest and other Catholics. When neither bribes nor torture compelled Finch to reveal information about the mission, he was taken to Fleet Prison, Manchester, then to the House of Correction. Upon his refusal to attend a Protestant service, he was dragged there across the rough stone pavement by his feet. He endured three months' maltreatment prior to trial at Lancaster, April 18, 1584. The night before his execution, he testified to the faith and converted some condemned felons. His cause was introduced in Rome, Dec. 4, 1886, leading to his beatification by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FINGLEY (FINGLOW), JOHN, BL.

Priest, martyr; b. at Barmby-in-the-Marsh (or Barneby near Howden), Yorkshire, England; d. Aug. 8, 1586, hanged, drawn, and quartered at York. He studied at Cambridge and at Rheims, where he was ordained to the priesthood March 25, 1581. The following month he entered the mission field in northern England. He was arrested, tried, and condemned for being a Catholic priest and reconciling English subjects to the ancient Church. Fingley was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions. Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FINIS OPERANTIS

The traditional Latin expression signifying the purpose or intention of the agent in acting, prescinding from the consideration of the finis operis of the act in its substance (inner construction). In created acts, the finis operantis may or may not coincide with, though it can never alter, the finis operis of the act itself. There may be an indefinite number of interior motives on the part of the agent relative to the one act; an act of theft may be motivated by avarice, or revenge, or jealousy, etc.; the marital act may be motivated by charity, justice, or carnality. An evil motive cannot change the species of an act whose finis operis is good; nor can a good motive change the species of an act whose finis operis is evil.

The concept of finis operantis is used not only in regard to human acts but by analogy to understand more fully divine acts. In the consideration of the divine act of creation, theology distinguishes its finis operantis from its finis operis. God's end in creating (finis operantis) is His own absolute goodness, the love of which moves Him to communicate to creatures a participation in His own infinite perfection H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3002). God's necessary subsistence and His infinite beatitude, which it connotes (Ibid. 3001), preclude, in His extradivine acts, any end other than Himself. As He is the first efficient, exemplary cause, He must be the ultimate final cause of every created being.

See Also: FINIS OPERIS; END; FINAL CAUSALITY.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 1:1522–26. W. KERN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:139–140. P. J. DONNELLY, "St. Thomas and the Ultimate Purpose of Creation," Theological Studies 2 53–83; "The Vatican Council and the End of Creation," ibid. 4 (1943) 3–33.

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN]

FINIS OPERIS

Finis operis is a traditional Latin expression signifying the end, object, or good immanent in an act to which it tends by the interior dynamism of its very being (ontologically, essentially, and necessarily), prescinding from the subjective motives of the agent of the act, or of any particular circumstances under which it is performed. The end specifies the very being and substance (inner construction) of the act.

The finis operis of a human act serves as the invariable basis for the consideration of any other aspect of its morality. The act of justice is ordered to give to others that which is their due; the marital act is essentially constituted by the end to which the natural physiological act is directed [cf. Pius XII, Address to Midwives, Oct. 29, 1951, Acta Apostolicae Sedis, 43 (1951) 835–854; L. Lochet, "Les Fins du mariage," Nouvelle revue théologique 73 (1951) 449–465].

The finis operis of the divine act of creation is the communication of divine goodness to creatures, whereby each creature by reason of its nature mirrors the divine perfections according to the degree of its participation in divine goodness. Intellectual creatures by their love and praise of the divine goodness attain their own beatitude, which is the secondary end (finis operis) of their creation. In reality, however, the primary and secondary ends are identical, for the intellectual creature's own beatitude is the attainment of the intrinsic essential divine goodness known and loved in the beatific vision.

See Also: FINIS OPERANTIS; END; FINAL CAUSALITY.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 1:1522–26. W. KERN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:139–140. C. SCHAHL, La Doctrine des fins du mariage dans le théologie scolastique (Paris 1948).

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN]

FINITE BEING

Finite being, deriving from the Latin finis for end, boundary, or limit, means the same as limited being. It can be understood in either a quantitative or a qualitative sense. Examples of the former are things limited in dimensions, weight, or speed; these are known through experience and present no special difficulty. The qualitatively finite, as opposed to this, designates a limited possession of some perfection that admits of levels or degrees. As a concept it has long been present in the philosophical thought of both East and West, although it underwent a noteworthy evolution at the beginning of the Christian era.

Notion of Finite. For classical Greek thought the finite was the perfect, which meant the completed, the determinate or well-defined, or the intelligible (since definition itself is delimitation). The infinite, as opposed to this, was the imperfect, the unfinished, the indeterminate and formless (matter), or the unintelligible. "Nature," said ARISTOTLE, "flies from the infinite, for the infinite is unending or imperfect, and nature ever seeks an end" (Gen. animal., 715b 14). It was only in the early centuries of the Christian era, influenced first by PHILO JUDAEUS and the Neoplatonism of PLOTINUS, then by Christian thinkers, especially CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and GREGORY OF NYSSA, that the present notion, of qualitative infinity as the supremely perfect, begin to appear and to be applied to God. From this point on, the finite was understood to be a lower level of being, one that possessed in a limited (and therefore imperfect) way some attribute or property that Infinite Being (God) posessed in an unlimited (and therefore supremely perfect) manner. Finite thus became a primary notion for describing the status of creatures, all of which are by nature finite, as compared with their Creator, the infinite plenitude of all perfection.

Explanatory Principles. What is required to explain the existence of something finite? It is a fundamental tenet of Christian philosophers, and of almost all metaphysicians of both East and West, that no finite being can be self-sufficient or self-existent, but must depend on Infinite Being as its ultimate source. Limitation in a being's nature always requires some higher cause outside of that being, since no thing can determine its own nature to possess this or that degree of perfection and no other. If it did, it would then be at once cause and effect of its own self. By the same token, if the cause is itself finite, it requires still another cause. Since a causal chain where all the members are only finite in nature can never contain an adequate cause for any of the members, ultimately there must be an infinite source that possesses the perfection in question, not from another, or by PARTICIPATION, but of its own nature and in unlimited fullness. From this infinite source all the finite possessors of an attribute receive it or participate in it, each according to its own finite capacity.

Thus the first requisite for something to be finite is an external cause, ultimately an infinite cause. The second requisite is a composition of elements within the being itself that results from and reflects the limiting action of its external cause. According to St. THOMAS AQUI-NAS (De pot. 1.2; ST 1a, 50.2 ad 3–4; 75.5 ad 1, 4) and the Thomistic school, possession of some perfection, a participated perfection, requires a duality or composition of two correlative, but nonidentical, elements within the finite being: one to explain the participated perfection, which of itself has no particular limit since it is found in different beings in different degrees; the other to explain the limited capacity of this particular participant. St. Thomas utilized the terms POTENCY and ACT, found already in Aristotle with a somewhat different connotation, to describe this internal composition of a limiting principle with the perfection that it limits.

How the Finite Is Known. Since finite is essentially a relative or comparative term, a being cannot be known as finite except by comparison with something more perfect. Opinions differ as to whether the ultimate term of comparison can be merely another finite being or whether it must be some kind of infinity. Claiming that it is unnecessary to have explicit knowledge of God as infinite being before recognizing that creatures are finite, theistic philosophers have commonly argued from the finitude of creatures to the infinity of God. In recent times, however, some Christian philosophers, e.g., Maurice BLONDEL, Joseph MARÉCHAL, Karl Rahner, and Johannes Lotz, hold that to know a being explicitly as finite, one must refer simultaneously, if only vaguely and implicitly, to something without limits, such as being and goodness. Drawing their inspiration partly from the Augustinian tradition, partly from St. Thomas, and partly from the insights of modern philosophers like HEGEL, they point out that to know a limit as a limit is at least to think of or desire the unlimited.

Despite minor differences, Catholic philosophers and theologians agree that man's knowledge of the finite, for the mind able and willing to recognize it, points towards the infinite source and final end of all being, GOD.

See Also: INFINITY OF GOD; LIMITATION; POTENCY; GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF.

Bibliography: F. SUÁREZ, Disputationes Metaphysicae, Disp. 31, sect. 13 in Opera Omnia, Vivés ed. v.26. W. N. CLARKE, "The Limitation of Act by Potency," The New Scholasticism 26 (1952) 167–194. G. GIANNINI, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 3:54–58.

[W. N. CLARKE]

FINK, LOUIS MARY (MICHAEL)

Bishop; b. Triftersberg, Bavaria, July 12, 1834; d. Kansas City, Kans., March 17, 1904. He was the son of Peter and Barbara (Hecht) Fink. About 1850 he came to St. Vincent Archabbey, Westmoreland County, Pa., as one of Archabbot Boniface Wimmer's recruits. He took his vows in the Order of St. Benedict on Jan. 6, 1854, and was ordained on May 28, 1857. After serving as pastor in several parishes, he was named prior of St. Benedict's Priory, Atchison, Kans., in 1868. At the request of John B. Miège, SJ, Vicar Apostolic of Kansas and of the Indian Territory, Fink was made coadjutor bishop and consecrated on June 11, 1871. Miège resigned at the end of 1874, and on May 22, 1877, Kansas was made a diocese with its see at Leavenworth. Fink, faced with the problems of a frontier state, established "Christian Forts" (mission centers) in areas where land was available. Catholic immigrants were then directed to these districts through colonization societies, railroad brochures, and the Catholic press. This campaign successfully established Catholic settlements for which Fink provided a resident pastor and a parochial school. When grasshoppers destroyed the crops in 1874, he collected alms in the Eastern states for his needy settlers. His pastoral letters, reflecting the rural character of his diocese, linked the Biblical world of the husbandman with the lives of his people. He was a vigorous promoter of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, and he also encouraged Catholics to join the Farmers' Alliance, forerunner of the Populist Movement. As Catholic immigrants were increasingly attracted to Kansas City, Fink turned his attention to problems of urban industrialism. He recognized the necessity of unions, but opposed the closed shop and, in the interests of family, encouraged the abolition of Sunday work. Fink moved his residence to Kansas City after his diocese was divided in 1887.

[P. BECKMAN]

FINLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in northern Europe, the Republic of Finland is bordered by Sweden and the Gulf of Bothnia on the west, Norway on the north, Russia on the east, and the Gulf of Finland, which separates southern Finland from Estonia. With its heavily forested landscape of rolling plains dotted by hills and numerous lakes and streams, Finland possesses natural resources that include lumber, silver, copper, iron ore, and other minerals. Finland's economic strength depends on the export of timber products as well as electronics, chemicals, machinery, and other manufactured products.

Finland was part of Sweden from the early Middle Ages until 1809, when it became an autonomous grand duchy of the Russian Empire. On Dec. 6, 1917, Finland proclaimed its independence. During World War II, Finland ceded 17,778 square miles (Finnish Karelia and Viborg) to the USSR, and many people living in this area relocated westward to escape communist control and retain their Finnish culture. The Finns are of mixed East Baltic and Scandinavian origin. Ecclesiastically, Finland has formed the Catholic Diocese of Helsinki (Swedish Helsingfors) since 1955, which diocese is immediately subject to the Holy See. The bishop of Helsinki is a member of the Nordic Bishops' Conference. Capital: Helsinki. Size: 130,145 sq. miles. Population: 5,167,485 in 2000. Languages: Finnish, Swedish; Lapp and Russian are spoken in various regions. Religions: 6,980 Catholics (1%), 5,975 Greek Orthodox (1%), 4,599,060 Evangelical Lutherans (89%), 555,470 without religious affiliation.

Catholic Origins and Growth to 1500. Finland was settled by the 8th century, and the inhabitants lived in relative peace for 400 years until the region gave way to Swedish explorers in the 12th century. Archeological finds in ancient settlements bear witness to Christian practices-both of the Eastern and Western churchesamong these conquerers. As a result of a crusade in 1155 under the Swedish king St. ERIC IX JEDVARDSSON, and of other expeditions in 1239 and 1293, the counties of Finland proper, Häme and West Carelia were united with Sweden. St. Henrik, the patron saint of Finland, was an English-born bishop of Uppsala who accompanied St. Eric on his first crusade to Finland. While the king returned to Sweden, Henrik stayed in Finland to continue the work of the Church; he died a martyr's death in January 1156 at the hands of a peasant who had been excommunicated for manslaughter.

Finland's first bishop, Thomas (d.1248), was also English. His diocese at Turku (Swedish Åbo) was suffragan to the archbishop of Uppsala. The Dominicans founded a convent near the Diocese of Turku in 1249 and greatly influenced the region's spiritual life. Their liturgy was adopted by the Diocese of Turku.

The 14th century saw the arrival of Franciscans, while Bridgettines founded the monastery of Naantali in 1445. Close relations were maintained with both Scandinavia and the rest of Europe, and many Finnish students studied at the University of Paris. Among the most prominent bishops of the 14th and 15th centuries were HEM-MING (d. 1366), friend of St. BRIDGET OF SWEDEN, who rebuilt the cathedral, destroyed by the Russians in 1318, and who was beatified in 1514; Magnus Tavast (d. 1450), powerful organizer of ecclesiastical life; Olaus Magnus (d. 1460), sometime professor in Paris, procurator of the English nation there, and twice rector of its faculty of arts; and Magnus Säerkilax (d. 1500), who energetically promoted the religious education of the people. Evidence of the flowering of Catholic ecclesiastical culture during this period still appears in the cathedral of Turku and in some 100 medieval churches yet standing. The development of ecclesiastical culture in Finland was interrupted during the late Middle Ages by Sweden's wars with Denmark and Russia. The last Catholic bishop, Arvid Kurck (1464–1521), was drowned in the Gulf of Bothnia while fleeing the Danish invasion in 1522.

Success of Protestantism. Unlike other parts of Scandinavia, Sweden and Finland exhibited no degeneration within the Church at the close of the Middle Ages, although its position, as elsewhere in Europe, was increasingly vulnerable. Its political power and economic resources made possible magnificent cultural achievements and active social work, but also gave rise to envy and ill-will from the monarchy, nobility, and burghers alike. Except among the mendicant orders, interest in theology declined, and the philosophical training of the clergy was often rooted in NOMINALISM. Moreover, a deep cleft developed between the theologians and humanists. To the laity, whose general education stressed the usual Christian truths, the hierarchy was more impressive as an organization than as a priestly body entrusted with the administration of the Sacraments; there was little understanding for the position of Rome within the Church.

When Lutheran reformers appeared in Scandinavia, they quickly gained the support of the monarchy and a following among the nobles and burghers. In Sweden King Gustav Vasa (1523-60) succeeded in breaking down the political and economic position of the Church by giving evangelical preachers a free hand, while outwardly keeping the customary forms and services of the Church, and denying any intention of establishing LU-THERANISM or any other Protestant form. Meanwhile the Catholic clergy were gradually replaced by Lutherans. In the Swedish grand duchy of Finland the process was similar but proceeded at a slower pace. Canon Peter Särkilax, who had studied at Wittenberg, was the first Lutheran preacher. In 1528 Gustav Vasa appointed the aged Dominican Martin Skytte a bishop; while Skytte's consecration had been without doubt valid it was not confirmed by the pope. In 1538 Masses in Swedish were celebrated in the cathedral together with ceremonial alterations. In 1538 Michael Olavi Agricola (c. 1508-57), Lutheran bishop of Turku and disciple of MELANCHTHON, published the first Finnish Church handbook, which was followed by a Finnish version of the New Testament (1548) and a vernacular Massbook (1549). Agricola was a moderate who accepted among other beliefs the traditional teaching on the Sacrament of Penance. Feasts such as Corpus Christi and the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin continued to be celebrated far into Lutheran times; the elevation at Mass was retained until the end of the 16th century; pictures were tolerated in churches in both Finland and Sweden, and those with Old Testament emphasis added. Due to this moderated change, disturbances such as those that occurred among the Swedish peasantry were avoided. The AUGSBURG CONFESSION was not introduced into Finland until 1593. Two years later Catholicism was forbidden within the country.

During the reigns of John III, King of Sweden (1568–92), and his son Sigismund III (1592–1604), there were attempts at a Catholic revival. Many Finnish students attended Jesuit colleges in western Europe. But after Sigismund's uncle, the Protestant Duke of Södermanland, seized power as Charles IX (1604-11), the REF-ORMATION was victorious, and a reorganization of church life on Lutheran principles was implemented. Credit is due to the Lutheran church for furthering general education. The first Finnish translation of the entire Bible was printed in 1640. The rigorous rules of the Church led to PIETISM, a 17th-century movement of German and English inspiration. While the influence of the ENLIGHTEN-MENT on the Swedish-speaking educated classes created a chasm between ecclesiastical and cultural life, burgeoning Finnish nationalism in the 19th century caused the formation of a new Finnish-speaking educated class, recruited partly among the Swedish-speaking people and partly among the Finnish-speaking clergy and their families.

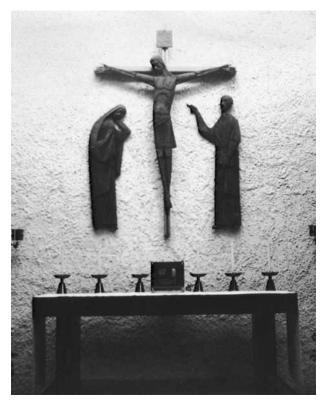

Catholicism after 1781. In 1781 Catholics in Swedish-controlled Finland were granted religious liberty, although missionary work and conversions continued to be prohibited. In Vyborg in 1799 a parish, subject to the archdiocese of Mogilev, was founded by the Polish Dominicans to care for military personnel serving in the Russian Army, and a church dedicated to Saint Hyacinth was consecrated. A similar parish was founded in Helsinki in 1860, and Holy Mass was celebrated there in a small wooden church on the island fortress of Suomenlinna. Prohibition against leaving the Lutheran Church was abolished in 1869.

In 1809 Finland became a grand duchy under the Russian crown, bequeathed by Sweden following that country's defeat in the War of the Third Coalition. As part of Russia, the Finnish Church fell under the Archdiocese of Mohilev, which had its episcopal see in St. Petersburg. Under a policy of Russification enacted during the 1890s, Finnish culture, as well as Church autonomy, survived only with great difficulty. The first Finnish priest following the Reformation, W. v. Christierson (d. 1945), was finally ordained in Paris in 1903. A year after the proclamation of Finnish independence in 1919, the vicariate apostolic of Finland was created and entrusted to the Dutch Sacred Heart Fathers. With the help of German forces Finland waged a victorious civil war against residual Russian authority, and full religious liberty was granted in 1923. During World War II Finland eventually fought with Germany, not in support of Hitler's policies but rather because siding with Germany allowed them to fight Russia. Axis defeats led to the progressive loss of Karelia to the USSR in 1940 and 1944, and two of Finland's four Catholic parishes were lost.

World War II was not the first time the Karelians had been the subject of dispute. As early as the 14th century East Karelia was united with Novgorod, thus providing Russian Orthodoxy inroads into Finland. Part of Russian Karelia was controlled by Sweden-Finland from 1580–1617; it included an Orthodox Karelian population that was subjected to harsh persecution. In 1721 East Karelia was given by Sweden to Russia. After the incorporation of all Finland into the Russian Empire in 1809 the position of Finnish Orthodox improved. An Orthodox archdiocese was founded in Viborg (moved to Kuopio in 1944), with a bishop in Helsinki. In 1921 the Orthodox Church was freed from its dependence on Russia; it was recognized as autonomous by the patriarch of Constantinople in 1923. At the time of the Soviet invasion of Finland during World War II, Orthodox Karelians living in the lands ceded to the USSR left their homes and moved westward. The Orthodox Church in Finland eventually became independent of Moscow, and many parishes converted from Old Church Slavonic to Finnish-language sermons by the late 20th century.

Sanctuary of a Catholic church, Jyuaskyla, Finland.

The Church in Cold-War Europe. As the national church of Finland, the Evangelical Lutheran Church maintained a solid economic position throughout the second half of the 20th century, and retained active contacts with other Lutheran churches in Scandinavia. It had an archbishop in Turku and seven bishops. Theological faculties were established at the state-run University of Helsinki and at the Swedish Academy of Åbo. Teaching of religion remained compulsory in all Finland's schools, although by 2000 children of minority faiths were given non-Lutheran options. Despite the lack of equivalent state funding, the Catholic Church also dedicated itself to education in Finland during this period. Studium Catholicum, an institute for mutual cultural interchange founded in 1951, was directed by the Dominicans. Dutch Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus in Moerdijk directed two orphanages, while Sisters of the Most PRECIOUS BLOOD came from the United States to run an Englishlanguage commercial school and a well-regarded secondary school in Helsinki. At Myllyjärvi, near Helsinki, two foreign secular priests of the Greek rite directed a center for ecumenical contacts. A Catholic union of students and graduates, Academicum Catholicum, a youth organization called Juventus Catholica, and two Catholic women's societies also flourished in the second half of the 20th century.

The Modern Church. Through the 20th century the Catholic Church of Finland continued to be respected as a religious community officially recognized by the state, although by rule of the law of religious liberty enacted in 1923 the foundation of monasteries remained prohibited. However, evangelical and other efforts to strengthen the Church continued. The Bridgettines arrived in 1986 from Sweden and four Carmelites came from the United States in 1989. The Missionaries of Charity established their first house in Finland in 1999. A priests' council was established in 1967 and the diocesan pastoral council followed in 1974. In 1983 the Diocesan Center North Helsinki, Stella Maris, was established. By 2000 Finland contained seven parishes administered by 5 secular and 15 religious priests, and 36 sisters. With a small and diminishing population, conversions remained few, usually coming from the country's intellectual circles. Catholic authors, such as Göran Stenius, and scholars contributed to Finland's cultural life.

While social issues would continue to spark controversy between Lutheran and Catholic interests, significant ecumenical advances included the Roman Catholic Church's membership in the Finnish Ecumenical Council after 1968. In 1985, as part of the ceremonies for the dedication of the St. Henrik altar at Santa Maria sopra Minerva in Rome, the Finnish Lutheran bishop, the Orthodox bishop, and the Roman Catholic bishop were received together by the pope. Four years later, in June of 1989, Pope John Paul II was received in Finland by both Catholics and non-Catholics, a reflection of the success of the Church's ecumenical efforts. In 1991 Lutheran Archbishop John Vikstrom participated in the celebration of the Feast of St. Bridget in St. Peter's Basilica, and in 1999 Vikstrom's successor traveled to the Vatican for a private audience with the pope. Additionally, in 1988, Uusi, Finland was the site of the fifth meeting of the international commission of Catholic and Orthodox theologians, a group working toward a greater understanding between these faiths.

Bibliography: G. SCHWAIGER, Die Reformation in den nordischen Ländern (Munich 1962). L. S. HUNTER, ed., Scandinavian Churches (London 1965). K. S. LATOURETTE, Christianity in a Revolutionary Age: A History of Christianity in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries (New York 1958–62) v.2, 4. The Church of Finland (Pieksämäki 1963). G. SENTZKE, Finland: Its Church and Its People (Helsinki 1963). U. TOIVOLA, ed., Introduction to Finland, 1960 (2d ed. Porvoo 1963). E. K. JUTIKKALA, ed., Suomen historian kortasto: Atlas of Finnish History (Porvoo 1959). E. K. JU-TIKKALA and K. PIRINEN, A History of Finland, tr. P. SJÖBLOM (New York 1962). I. RACZ, Suomen keskiajan taideaarteita (Helsinki 1960), art treasures of medieval Finland. A. SINISALO et al., Kauneimmat Kirkkomme (Jyväskylä 1962), Finland's most beautiful churches. L. PINOMAA, ed., Finnish Theology Past and Present (Helsinki 1963). Bilan du Monde 2:368–373.

[J. GALLÉN/EDS.]

FINN, FRANCIS JAMES

Jesuit, teacher; b. St. Louis, Mo., Oct. 1859; d. Cincinnati, Ohio, Nov. 2, 1928. He was the son of John and Mary (Whyte) Finn, both Irish immigrants. After several years at St. Louis University, he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Florissant, Mo., on July 10, 1877. Further studies were interrupted by teaching at St. Mary's College, Kans. (1881-83, 1884-85); St. Xavier College, Cincinnati (1885–86); and Marquette University, Milwaukee, Wis. (1888–90). He studied philosophy and theology at Woodstock College, Woodstock, Md. (1883-84, 1886-88, 1890-93), and was ordained in 1893. In 1897 he began his 31-year stay at St. Xavier's College and Church in Cincinnati. He was active in parish work and established a nationwide circulating library, but his most notable work was his fiction for young people. At St. Mary's he had observed the effect of good books on the young, and after a day in class he would reward his students by reading his plays or stories to them. When confined to bed for long periods at Woodstock, he wrote reminiscences of his teaching days. His most popular work was Tom Playfair (1891), which his publisher (Benziger) then called "the most successful book for Catholic boys and girls ever published in the English language." His 27 books were translated into many foreign languages.

[W. E. SHIELS]

FINNEY, CHARLES GRANDISON

American revival preacher; b. Warren, Conn., Aug. 29, 1792; d. Oberlin, Ohio, Aug. 16, 1875. His family migrated in 1794 to Oneida County, N.Y., where he was educated in rural schools. He taught school for several years, attended a private academy in Connecticut, studied law, and practiced as an attorney. Converted in 1821, he studied for the Presbyterian ministry under a local pastor and was ordained in 1824. Finney began preaching revivals in western New York and attracted national attention by his stress on emotional appeal and new measures, such as "the anxious seat." In 1829 he accepted a pastoral charge in New York City and in 1835 published his controversial Lectures on Revivals of Religion. His insistence on freedom of the will and the ability of sinners to repent caused his separation from the Presbyterian Church in 1836 and led to divisions in the church the following year. Finney taught theology at Oberlin College and served as pastor of the Congregational Church in Oberlin until 1872. He was president of Oberlin from 1851 to 1866.

Bibliography: C. F. FINNEY, Memoirs (New York 1876). G. F. WRIGHT, Charles Grandison Finney (New York 1891). W. R. CROSS, The Burned-Over District: The Social and Intellectual History of Enthusiastic Religion in Western New York 1800–1850 (Ithaca 1950). W. G. MCLOUGHLIN, Modern Revivalism (New York 1959).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

FINNIAN, SS.

The name of several Irish saints, of whom two are important.

Finnian of Clonard, abbot; b. Leinster, Ireland; d.549, Annals of Ulster. Finnian, or Finian, was one of the most important personalities in early Irish monastic history, he studied in Leinster before going to Wales, where he visited several important Welsh monasteries. Upon returning to Ireland, he made his principal foundation at Clonard (three miles east of Kinnegad on the Dublin-Galway road), one of the first great Irish monasteries. It combined Irish and Welsh monastic traditions and teachings. From Clonard, monastic enthusiasm spread throughout Ireland. Finnian's students included such Irish saints and monastic founders as COLUMBA OF IONA, BRENDAN, Kieran of Clonmacnois, and KENNETH OF DERRY. Finnian is the author of the oldest of the surviving Irish PENITENTIALS, compiled sometime after 525.

Feast: Dec. 12.

Finnian of Moville, abbot; b. north of Ireland; d. 579, Annals of Ulster, or 576, Annals of Inisfallen. After having studied at the famous Scottish priory of WHITHORN, founded by St. NINIAN, he made his own principal foundation at Moville, near Newtownards on Strangford Lough, Ireland. Surviving evidence presents Finnian who is sometimes known also as Findbarr, both names meaning "fair-haired"—as a notable scholar. There are chronological difficulties in the belief that he taught CO-LUMBA OF IONA, and there appears to be no real historical basis for the legend that the two saints quarreled over a stolen copy of the Psalter.

Feast: Sept. 10.

Bibliography: Finnian of Clonard. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 374-376. P. GROSJEAN, "Mention de S. Finnián de clúain Iraird . . .," Analecta Bollandiana 72 (1954) 347-352. The Irish Life of Saint Finnian of Clonard, ed. E. HICKEY (Tara 1996). K. W. HUGHES, "S. Finnian of Clonard," summary of thesis, Bulletin of the Institute of Historical Research 25 (1952) 76-78; "The Cult of St. F. of Clonard . . . ," Irish Historical Studies 9 (1954-55) 13-27; "The Historical Value of the Lives of St. F. of Clonard," English Historical Review 69 (1954) 353-372; "The Offices of St. F. of Clonard . . . ," Analecta Bollandiana 73 (1955) 342-372; "Additional Note on the Office of St. F. of Clonard," ibid. 75 (1957) 337-339. A tr. of Finnian's penitential in J. T. MC NEILL and H. M. GAMER, Medieval Handbooks of Penance (New York 1938) 86-97. Finnian of Moville. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 390-391. O. DAVIES, "Movilla Abbey," Ulster Journal of Archaeology 8 (1945) 33-38. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:531-532. For the legend of the quarrel with Columba, D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD, The Irish Saints (Dublin 1964) 95-97, 169-171.

[D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD]

FINTAN, SS.

There are several Irish saints of this name.

Fintan of Clonenagh, Irish abbot; d. 603. He founded the monastery of Clonenagh, County Laois, under the Slieve Bloom Mountains. He was closely associated with St. Columba of Terryglass, and his regime at Clonenagh was noted for extreme asceticism.

Feast: Feb. 17.

Fintan of Rheinau, Irish hermit; b. Leinster?, Ireland; d. Rheinau, 876? On his way home from a pilgrimage to Rome, he joined the hermits on the island of Rheinau in the Rhine near Schaffhausen. As a patron of the abbey of RHEINAU, he is still the object of local devotion. His Latin vita (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum 15:503–506) contains what may be the first mention of "Ceili Dé" or CULDEES, as well as the first Irish sentences recorded on the Continent. His Sacramentary is extant.

Feast: Nov. 15.

Fintan of Taghmon, Irish abbot; d. 635. He studied at Irish monasteries, then went to Scotland. But COLUMBA OF IONA, before he died, had said that Fintan must go back to Ireland to found a monastery. Fintan's principal foundation was at Taghmon, County Wexford. A number of churches in Scotland (where he was called Munnu) were dedicated to him and perhaps were personal foundations.

Feast: Oct. 21.

Bibliography: F. of Clonenagh. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 384-386. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURS-TON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:356-357. D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD, Irish Saints (Dublin 1964). F. of Rheinau. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 602-603, 704-705. L. GOUGAUD, Les Saints irlandais hors d'Irlande (Louvain 1936). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:350. J. HENNIG, "Liturgical Veneration of Irish . . . Switzerland," Iris Hibernia 3 (1957) 23-32; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 4:137-138. F. of Taghmon. J. F. KENNEY, The Sources for the Early History of Ireland: v.1, Ecclesiastical (New York 1929) 449-450. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:170. ADAMNAN, Life of Columba, ed. and tr. A. O. and M. O. ANDERSON (New York 1961). D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD, Irish Saints (Dublin 1964).

[D. D. C. POCHIN MOULD]

FIORETTI, THE

The full and original title of this 14th-century Franciscan literary classic is I Fioretti di San Francesco (The Little Flowers of St. Francis). It is an anonymous translation of the Actus Beati Francisci et Sociorum Ejus, written c. 1325 by Fra Ugolino Boniscambi of Montegiorgio in the Marches of Ancona and Fermo; for the last 100 years it has been the most popular book on St. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. Recent archival research by G. Pagnani has proved that the author did not belong to the Brunforte family of Sarnano. Though his years of birth and death are not known, he is mentioned in local documents of 1319 and 1342. In 1331 he testified in Naples against Andrea da Gagliano, a follower of the rebellious Minister General MICHAEL OF CESENA. Fra Ugolino sought to reform the Franciscan Order from within by writing and dictating about 20 previously unrecorded anecdotes about Francis and his first companions "as revealed by their successors which were omitted in his biographies but which are also very useful and edifying." His principal source was a Brother James of Massa who had known several of the saint's companions. To a score of vivid, even humorous stories about the Poverello, Fra Ugolino added a series of chapters narrating the mystical experiences of several saintly friars of his own times and province, notably, Bl. John of La Verna and Bl. Conrad of Offida.

The basic purpose of the whole work, which has an organic inner unity, was to stimulate a return to the unique contemplative-and-active spirituality of the founder, as exemplified in the lives of his early companions and later disciples in the Marches. Some of the latter had sympathized with the reform movement of the Franciscan SPIRITUALS but, unlike them, refused to leave the order to practice their ideal. The remarkable popularity of the Actus during the 14th century thus sowed the seeds of the Observant reform. Hence it must be considered a proto-Observant rather than a Spiritual manifesto. Its historicity has been questioned because passages dealing with the controversial ELIAS OF CORTONA are inaccurate and partisan, and it describes a meeting between Brother Giles and St. Louis of France that is apocryphal. (See GILES OF ASSISI, BL.; LOUIS IX, KING OF FRANCE, ST.) However, the substance of half a dozen of its original anecdotes involving St. Francis has been confirmed by independent sources. The supreme value of Fra Ugolino's contribution lies in the fundamental authenticity of his spiritual profile of the Poverello.

Several anonymous Italian translations of the Actus were made c. 1375. Pagnani has identified a version in the dialect of the Marches. But it was one of the two extant Tuscan translations that became a classic of medieval Italian literature, owing to the limpid beauty and enchanting simplicity of its style. The impressive narrative talent of the unknown friar translator made him a worthy contemporary of Petrarch and Boccaccio. Selecting a bouquet of 53 of the most appealing chapters in the Actus, he aptly titled it I Fioretti di San Francesco. To them he added an original masterpiece of his own, The Five Considerations on the Holy Stigmata, which he compiled from the Actus, the legendae by THOMAS OF CELANO and St. BONAVENTURE, and the oral traditions of the friars at Mount La Verna.

Several other indirectly related addenda have been included in 15th-century manuscripts and various modern editions of The Little Flowers of St. Francis, such as short lives of Brothers Juniper and Giles, excerpts from the latter's Golden Sayings, and a miscellany of additional chapters from the Actus or other Franciscan compilations.

First printed at Vicenza in 1476, the Fioretti became a favorite target of some Protestant reformers, e.g., Pier Paolo Vergerio. F. Buonarroti's edition of 1718 rescued it from oblivion, and that of A. Cesari in 1822 launched it on a course of ever-spreading popularity that elevated it to the status of "the breviary of the Italian people" and a classic of world literature. Paul SABATIER's preliminary edition of the Actus in 1902 and the publication of the important Little-Phillipps manuscript in 1914 stimulated further research, which has culminated in recent studies and annotated editions that have significantly clarified the historical background of this deservedly famous yet relatively unstudied early Franciscan literary gem.

Bibliography: Actus beati Francisci et sociorum ejus, ed. P. SABATIER (Paris 1902). Important recent eds. with useful introd., nn., and bibliog. Gli scritti di San Francesco e '1 Fioretti,' ed. A. VICINELLI (Milan 1955); I fioretti di San Francesco, ed. B. BUGHET- teuale. E coffi til quello memo pane cano dife il beleno dela daneo locia. End exemplo di spo cionico quara ta di e quaranta notti poi in quel luogo done fan fari hanea fatta cofi mazanoliofa ablinentia face idio mo i mizacoli pli foi meriti plaqual coffa commeraziono ti homeni a hedificazio deli cafe chabitazio e imposo rempo fi fece di caftello done o zande et fini el luogo di fatti che fi chiama il fuogo del filola. Et ancora li homeni a done di quel caffello dano grande zune zentia. e dinonone i quel linecho done fin francico fece la ditta quazefina Alande de spo Amen.

Cnendo Sna uclta fin fran d'a perogra a faneta arana dela angeli con fie loone d'impo di neuee il fiedo orandiffino forte mente il cenericia, giamo frate leone il chule andana puecho in anci colle coffi O frate leone anegna dio che frati minori in ogitia diano grande exemplo di fanetica e di buona bedificative niente dimeno fecue che finao non e pfetta letica. C andando piu olta fan francicho il chiama la feronda solta duendo ofte leone ben E il frate minore illum mi feichi diftenda l'affidrati. Care li demoni rendi ludire a fordi landare a zotori il parlare a mutti e che naror cofa e refiefan l'inora di quatro di feri ue che non e finco pfetta letica. E andando di feri mi francefelo cecha forte letica. E andando di podo fan francefelo cecha forte. O frate leone fel frate minore fapefie tute le lingue e tute le fraemicie ture

Folio from a 15th-century Italian manuscript of "The Little Flowers of St. Francis." (Cod. Vat. Lat. 10191, fol. 30r)

TI and R. PRATESI (Florence 1960), with most additional parts; I fioretti di San Francesco, ed. R. PRATESI and G. V. SABATELLI (Florence 1960), with only The Considerations; I fioretti di San Francesco, ed. G. PAGNANI (Rome 1959); The Little Flowers of St. Francis, ed. and tr. R. BROWN (Garden City, NY 1958), with added parts and extensive bibliog. S. CLASEN, ''Zur Problematik der Fioretti,'' Wissenschaft und Weisheit 25 (1962) 214–218. L. CELLUCCI, Le leggende francescane del secolo XIII nel loro aspetto artistico (2d ed. Modena 1957). G. PAGNANI, ''Il codice di Fabriano dei Fioretti di San Francesco,'' Studia Picena 25 (1957) 1–23; ''Contributi alla questione dei Fioretti di San Francesco,'' Archivum Franciscanum historicum (Quaracchi-Florence 1909–) 49 (1956) 3–16. O. ENGLEBERT, St. Francis of Assisi: A Biography, tr. E. M. COOPER, 2d ed. by I. BRADY and R. BROWN (Chicago 1966).

[R. BROWN]

FIRE, USE AND SYMBOLISM OF

From time immemorial, man has observed through experience the ambivalent character of fire. As a gift of the gods, the source of light and heat, it conditions the sphere of well-being, of life, and of the divine and celestial world. At the same time, as a destructive force, it enters organically into the chaotic and infernal aspects of this world and the next. Prometheus in stealing fire from heaven undoubtedly did not think of this destructive side of fire. However, the two forms of fire interpenetrate. The anger of the god of heaven is armed with lightning, his divine majesty is surrounded by an awe-inspiring fire. On the other hand, the violence of devouring fire is not merely negative, for fire can purify, renew, and rejuvenate.

General Use and Symbolism. The Greek and Roman—and general Indo-European—belief in the positive character of fire is revealed in the first place by the religious respect that surrounds the burning fire of the hearth. It is a begetting male power, it promotes the fecundity of women and cattle, and it guarantees the fertility of the fields. It is a magical means (pyromancy) for unveiling the future and of attaining immortality (the story of Demeter and Demophon in Greek mythology). The Spartan kings carry fire from the hearth on their campaigns. From the period of the Antonines, fire is borne before the emperor, probably to attest and honor his numinous character. The destructive force of fire is put into practice in various magical purification rites, such as the fire-walk. By submitting thus to the curative, cathartic, and apotropaic virtues of fire, man frees himself from impurities and contaminations and protects himself against the ascendency of evil powers. This destructive character of fire, moreover, does not exclude a positive result. The use of fire in certain initiations, the "baptism of fire" found among the Gnostics and the role of fire once in vogue in several Oriental Christian liturgies, all tend to bring about, in a real or symbolic fashion, the spiritual renewal of the believer. It is this aspect of fire that gives so marked a typological value to the legend of the phoenix, whose self-destruction on its pyre guarantees an eternal renewal of youth.

When a member of a family died in ancient Rome, the hearth-fire was extinguished as a sign of grief. However, the corpse was not deprived of the presence of fire, since a concentrated, symbolic, and convenient form of light was provided by candelabra, torches, and lamps. Light surrounded the bier; it was carried in the funeral procession; and it kept watch at the tomb. Originally fire performed an apotropaic role, driving away malevolent spirits, or even the practical role of lighting the way or kindling the pyre. In the Christian era, in the eyes of both pagans and Christians, it symbolized remembrance, prayer, and eternal life, or, at least, contact between the world of the living and that of the dead. Cremation, however utilitarian it became, took on, in the first centuries of the Empire, a cathartic and perhaps divinizing character. In the imaginary funeral obsequies connected with imperial apotheosis, the total cremation of the "wax double" furnished assurance that the emperor had rejoined the gods body and soul. The negative aspect of fire is maintained fully only in the mythological conception of the river of fire (Pyriphlegethon) surrounding the infernal abode.

In Religion. The positive aspect of fire is connected more strictly with the domain of the numinous in a twofold way. As the object of cult itself, fire, although not attaining among the Greeks and Romans the veneration that it inspired in India (Agni) and Iran (fire-temples), was personified to some degree in the goddess VESTA. Fire is employed as a means in honoring divinity. Divine manifestations, moreover, comprise fiery aspects that seem to be essential elements in all theophanies, as is clear from the Old Testament. Hence, Christianity has not abandoned the use of lighted lamps and candles, which, from the time of St. Jerome, was given a place in the cult of the martyrs. "Eternal fires" were found in Greek and Roman temples in honor of certain gods or, even symbolizing the numinous character of the state or the emperor-or both. "Ever-burning lamps," as that of Athena Polias in the Erechtheum and that in the Temple of Jerusalem, represented the perpetuity of worship. The sanctuary lamp, which, however, was not introduced before the middle of the 13th century, symbolizes the Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Lamps and lights were an indispensable element in pagan festivals, and the flames of candles and lamps flooded the celebrations of Christian worship with such joyous light that from the 5th century, at least, writers believed that the illuminated churches constituted a prefiguration of heaven. This joyous aspect of fire is connected also with a metaphorical meaning whereby the Bible often expresses its conception of the brightness and glory of God and His beneficent illumination of His servants. Likewise on the numinous plane, the destructive character of fire receives an incarnation, so to speak, in the figure of the god Vulcan. As an instrument of worship, the altar fire, both in Greece and Rome, as well as in Jerusalem, is the medium par excellence by which the material offerings of men may make a favorable impression on divinity. Destructive fire, especially in the form of lightning, or shooting stars, or comets, lends itself easily and universally to literal and metaphorical applications. In Israel, especially, fire of this kind is regarded as the instrument and image of God's anger. God punishes, tries, judges, and destroys by fire.

On the cosmological side, fire plays an essential role in the philosophy of HERACLITUS and in STOICISM. In Christian theology, it has a central place in the punishment of the damned and in the traditional teaching on purgatory (see FIRE OF JUDGMENT).

Bibliography: A. CLOSS et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg1957–65) 4:106–110. C. M. EDSMAN, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:927, with bibliog.; Le Baptême de feu (Leipzig 1940); Ignis divinus (Lund 1949). A. E. CRAWLEY, J. HAS-

TINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 6:26–30. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 775. J. G. FRAZER, Myths of the Origin of Fire (London 1930). F. HEILER, Erscheinungsformen und Wesen der Religion (Stuttgart 1961). R. MAYER, Die biblische Vorstellung vom Weltenbrand (Bonn 1956). L. M. R. SIMONS, Flamma aeterna (Amsterdam 1949). J. MORGENSTERN, The Fire upon the Altar (Leiden 1963).

[G. SANDERS]

FIRE OF JUDGMENT

An expression used by the majority of exegetes and theologians in connection with the second coming of Christ. The conflagration pictured as taking place on that day searches out the works of all men (even those of the just, for whom it is a cleansing from all guilt) and hence is a judgment of fire.

Just as in the Old Testament (Is 66.15–17; Jl 2.1–3; Ps 96[97].3) the judgments of God were usually accompanied by fire, so also in the New Testament (1 Cor 3.13; 2 Thes 1.8; 2 Pt 3.12) it is stated that the final judgment of the Lord will be accompanied by fire. Will this fire of judgment be a metaphorical or real fire?

Considering the fire of judgment insofar as it will try every man's works in order to determine if they were according to, or contrary to the laws of God, the more common opinion is that the fire will be a metaphorical one. Except for Origen, almost all Scripture scholars and theologians agree with St. Thomas that the judgment will take place mentally (Summa theologiae 3a Suppl., 88.2). The reason for the metaphor of fire is that fire shows forth the following qualities: (1) clarity—God's judgment will be luminously clear and according to truth; (2) ardor divine justice will meet out vengeance on works of impiety with zeal and power; (3) subtlety—divine judgment will search out even the most secret of human actions in an admirable way. The judgment, then, will be ''as of fire'' for the good as well as for the bad.

As for the conflagration that will accompany and manifest the Day of the Lord, this fire is depicted as real. The just who have not yet died before the coming of Christ pass through the fires of that dreadful time. The fire could have a twofold effect: (1) the effect of killing them and reducing their bodies to ashes; and (2) a spiritual effect, since it could be employed by divine justice to purge and purify them for venial sins and the temporal punishment that still remained. This would be an instantaneous purgatory. As for those who are in mortal sin, it would be the beginning of their eternal punishment.

The fire of that day would not harm those who have been completely free of sin (e.g., the Blessed Virgin Mary and the infants who died in their baptismal innocence), neither would it in any way harm those who have completely explated their faults in this life or in purgatory.

Concerning the last day, many things will remain obscure until they are revealed. But this much should be firmly believed: all the actions of men, even the most sacred and hidden, must be judged, rewarded or punished.

See Also: JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); PAROUSIA.

Bibliography: F. SUÁREZ, In 3^{am} Summa theologiae S. Thomae, 59 (disp. 57, sec. 1; Vivès ed. v.19). R. BELLARMINE, "De ecclesia quae est in purgatorio," Bk. 2, ch. 1 (De controversiis). A. MICHEL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 5.2:2239–46. E. LUSSIER, "The Universal Conflagration at the Parousia," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 12 (1950) 243–247. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 498–504, 1728–39.

[M. GRIFFIN]

FIRMIAN

An old South Tyrolean family that gave several bishops to the Church.

Leopold Anton Eleutherius, b. Munich, May 27, 1679; d. Salzburg, Oct. 22, 1744. He was successively dean of Salzburg in 1713, bishop of Levant in 1718, bishop of Seckau in 1724, and bishop of Laibach in 1727; he became archbishop of Salzburg in 1727. He founded houses for retreats and missions under the Jesuits. His edict of emigration against Protestants in 1731 caused about 22,000 of them to leave, most of them for Prussia.

Leopold Ernst, his nephew, count and cardinal; b. Trent, Sept. 22, 1708; d. Passau, March 13, 1783. He was bishop of Seckau in 1739 and administrator of Trent in 1748. In 1763 he became bishop of Passau and was made a cardinal in 1772. In addition to his interest in the scientific training of the clergy, he supported missions for the laity.

Leopold Max, count; b. Trent, Oct. 11, 1766; d. Vienna, Nov. 29, 1831. He was suffragan bishop of Passau in 1787, bishop of Levant in 1800, administrator of Salzburg in 1818, and archbishop of Vienna in 1822.

Bibliography: M. SCHELLHORN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:143–144.

[L. WEISENSEL]

FIRMICUS MATERNUS, JULIUS

Junior V(ir) C(larissimus), 4th-century apologist and polemicist; b. Syracuse, date unknown; d. after 350. An aristocrat of senatorial rank, he was reared in paganism and went through three successive careers: advocate, astrologer, and Christian polemicist. He wrote Matheseos libri VIII (c. 334–337), the longest systematic account of astrology in the Latin language. Converted to Christianity probably within the next decade, he decided to turn his pen to the defense of his adopted religion. The result, written c. 346, was the 80-page essay De errore profanarum religionum. The book yields valuable information on the Oriental religions, which had chiefly supplanted other pagan cults in the Roman Empire.

On Christianity and its spirit Firmicus was less well informed. He addressed his book to the Emperors Constans and Constantius and in fiery terms exhorted them to allow no religious liberty and to stamp out by drastic and violent means every vestige of pagan belief and cult, destroying the shrines and temples. This was the earliestknown instance of an appeal by a Christian to "the secular arm" to enforce Christianity and destroy other religions without mercy. The Emperors apparently elected not to adopt Firmicus's intemperate and intolerant advice.

Firmicus was a bookish man. He endeavored to write in a Ciceronian style and borrowed data freely from Cicero's De natura deorum. Like the apologists, he used euhemeristic methods to discredit the putative divinity of sundry pagan gods. Among his other unacknowledged sources were CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (Protrepticus), ARNOBIUS THE ELDER, IRENAEUS, and CYPRIAN. While he quoted the Bible (70 quotations or allusions), he did so mostly from the pages of Cyprian's Testimonia rather than directly.

Firmicus's book lay in oblivion for 1,200 years until the Reformation. It survived in a solitary minuscule codex, written in Germany in the 9th or 10th century. Matthias FLACIUS ILLYRICUS, Lutheran Church historian, found the codex in a monastery at Minden and published the first (unsatisfactory) edition at Strassburg in 1562. The codex is now in the VATICAN (Vatican Palatinus Latinus 165). The attempt by G. Morin to identify Firmicus as the author of the Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii has been rejected by most scholars.

Bibliography: Editions. Matheseos, ed. W. KROLL et al., 2 v. (Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana; 1897–1913); De errore, ed. C. HALM (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 2; 1867); ed. K. ZIEGLER, v.3 of Das Wort der Antike; ed. R. BEUTLER (Munich 1953); ed. and tr. G. HEUTEN (Brussels 1938); Works, ed. and tr. C. FORBES (Ancient Christian Writers; 1965). G. MORIN, ed., Consultationes Zacchaei et Apollonii (Florilegium Patristicum 39; 1935). Literature. G. MORIN, Revue Bénédictine 46 (1934) 456–459; Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 13 (1936) 185–188. P. COURCELLE, Revue de l'histoire des religions 146 (1954) 174–193, on the Consultationes. J. LENZENWEGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 4:144. F. BOLL, Paulys Realenzyk- lopädie der klassichen Altertumswisschenschaft 6.2 (1909) 2365–79.

[C. A. FORBES]

FIRMILIAN OF CAESAREA

Chiefly remembered for his intemperate support of St. CYPRIAN against St. STEPHEN I; bishop from c. 230; d. Tarsus, 268 (feast in the Greek Church, Oct. 28). A friend of ORIGEN, he was highly esteemed throughout the East. He took part in various synods: at Iconium (c. 230) against Montanist baptism (see MONTANISM); at Antioch where (c. 252) the bishops rallied in condemning the Novatianist schism (see NOVATIAN AND NOVATIANISM); and again (c. 264) for the protracted trial of its heretical bishop, PAUL OF SAMOSATA. His known views contributed to Paul's deposition, though Firmilian himself had died at Tarsus on his way to the synod's final session. In his sole surviving letter (preserved in translation as Ep. 75 among Cyprian's letters) he commended Cyprian for repudiating any baptism administered outside the Church, and poured fresh scorn on Pope Stephen's more favorable attitude and on his claims. Stephen threatened to excommunicate Firmilian and many other Eastern bishops, but DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA pleaded on their behalf with both Stephen and his successor Sixtus II.

Bibliography: CYPRIAN, Opera omnia, ed. G. HARTEL, 3 v. (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3.1–3.3; 1868–71). EUSEBIUS, Historia Ecclesiastica 6:27, 46.3; 7:5.1, 14, 28.1, 30.4–5. J. CHAPMAN, Catholic Encyclopedia 6:80–81. G. BARDEN-HEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur 2:312–314.

[M. BÉVENOT]

FIRMIN OF AMIENS, ST.

First Bishop of the Diocese of Amiens, France, thirdcentury martyr. He seems to have been a native of Pamplona in Navarre. He was converted to Christianity by (St.) Honestus, a disciple of (St.) Saturninus of Toulouse, and consecrated bishop by Honoratus of Toulouse. Firmin became a missionary in southern France. Later, after some years in northern France, he decided to settle at AMIENS, where, according to tradition, he was the first bishop. He was martyred there sometime during the reigns of Maximian and Diocletian (284–305). A church, at first dedicated to the Blessed Virgin and now known as Saint-Acheul's, was built over his tomb. His relics were translated to the cathedral in the seventh century. There is much that is obscure in the life of Firmin since no mention of him is found before the eighth century. In 1186 his relics were translated to Pamplona. Sources of the eighth and ninth centuries for Amiens name a second Bp. Firmin of Amiens, a confessor (feast: Sept. 1). The son of a senator converted by the first Firmin, he was renowned for his missionary work in the region of Amiens. It is often thought that Bishop Firmin the martyr and Bishop Firmin the confessor were one and the same man.

Feast: Sept. 25.

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–15) 3:122–127. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:632–633. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:1318–19. J. L. BAUDOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 9:514–516.

[J. A. CORBETT]

FIRST COMMUNION

By the fourth century infants and adults generally celebrated baptism, anointing, and Communion in the same ceremony, as is maintained today in many Eastern Rite churches. In the course of time, confirmation became an independent rite, reserved to the bishop. Infant baptism, quam primum, gradually became a universal practice. Infants continued to receive communion but the practice varied and eucharist began to be separated from baptism, severing the unity of the sacraments of initiation. The Fourth Lateran Council in 1215 (c. 21) stated that communion was not obligatory until one reached the "age of reason," (about the age of seven), the age in which children are supposed to be capable of distinguishing right from wrong and therefore responsible for their conduct. Theologians and canonists of the time differed in their interpretation of this canon but the discussion resulted in the age of reason as important criteria for determining the obligation of receiving the sacraments. The Council of Trent confirmed the Decree of the Lateran Council but did not condemn the ancient practice (Council of Trent, Sess. 21, chap. 4).

By the High Middle Ages, denying Communion to infants was no longer a question. The focus on the transcendence of the Eucharist and the fear of receiving an unworthy communion led to such strict requirements for reception of communion that adults themselves only rarely received the sacrament. The Jansenist movement in the 17th and 18th centuries demanded a rigorous preparation comprised of a precise recital of the catechism, rigorous penitential practices to insure a worthy communion and the delay of first communion until adolescence. This regimen made the Holy Eucharist a reward for virtue and not the ''remedy by which we are freed from our daily faults and preserved from serious sin'' (Council of Trent, Sess. 13, chap. 2). The decree of St. PIUS X Quam Singulari (Aug. 8, 1910), changed the age for First Communion from adolescence to about seven years of age in the Latin Rite. Pius X determined three criteria for reception of first communion: the child can distinguish between good and evil, knows the difference between ordinary bread and eucharistic bread and is able to receive communion with devotion "becoming his years." The change in age met with negative reaction in many parts of the Catholic world. Concerns were raised about the capability of younger children to understand the doctrinal concepts and whether the children would continue catechism classes once they had received their first communion.

The French clergy as well as other episcopates dealt with these issues by distinguishing between a "private communion" celebrated within the family and a "solemn Communion'' that took place during adolescence and was preceded by an extensive catechesis and thorough knowledge of the catechism as requirement for reception of communion. First Communion, since the 17th century, had already taken on a life of its own, becoming a public ritual, a solemn ceremony undertaken by all the members of a same age group at the same time, usually adolescents. In many countries, First Communion also symbolized the passage from childhood into youth. The ceremony of solemn communion included rituals such as the renewal of baptismal promises, the lighting of candles and a consecration to the Blessed Virgin Mary. The youth usually wore white clothing or armbands as a symbol of the innocence of childhood. White also symbolized that the child be as pure and sinless as possible for the reception of a worthy communion. Children were given prayer books, rosaries and holy cards as well as a certificate of First Holy Communion. Gradually, the Solemn Communion ceremony of adolescents, with almost no change, became the First Communion celebration for younger children.

The Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity, the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests of Vatican II, the Order of Christian Initiation of Adults, the Code of Canon Law (1983), and the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1994) restored the early church understanding of the unity of baptism, confirmation, and Eucharist as sacraments of initiation. The Order of Christian Initiation of Adults mandates their reception in one ceremony for unbaptized adults and children of catechetical age. There is no uniform sequence of reception of the sacraments of initiation for those baptized in infancy. The practice in the United States and many other countries admits of wide variations in age and sequence of reception. The First Communion rite, since it is not a universal ritual, has therefore never been revised and consequently never explicitly linked to baptism and confirmation. In many countries, the expectation that confession precede the first communion of children gives First Communion a closer relationship to penance than to baptism or confirmation. The Instruction on the Worship of the Eucharist (May 25, 1967) 14, encourages a liturgical catechesis based on the principal rites and prayers of the Mass (particularly the eucharistic prayer) and emphasizes the relationship of the Mass to daily life. The instruction states that these principles should be noted particularly with regard to First Communion so that it will be seen as the full incorporation into the Body of Christ. The primary focus of First Communion preparation is to enable the children, as full members of Christ's Body, to take part actively with the people of God in the eucharist, share in the Lord's table and in the community of their brothers and sisters (DMC, 12). The ecclesial significance of First Communion at the present time is that it gives the child a sense of belonging and a new relationship with the Church.

Bibliography: L. ANDRIEUX, La Premiere Communion (Paris 1911). C. CASPER, G. LUKKEN, and G. ROUWHORST, eds., Bread of Heaven: Customs and Practices Surrounding Holy Communion. Essays in the History of Liturgy and Culture (Kampen, Netherlands 1995). J. DELUMEAU, ed., La Premiere Communion: Quatre siecles d'histoire (Paris 1987). P. TURNER, Ages of Initiation: The First Two Christian Millennia (Collegeville, Minn. 2000).

[C. DOOLEY]

FIRST PRINCIPLES

In the traditional sense of the term, SCIENCE is KNOWLEDGE that is both discursive and complete in itself. It proceeds by way of DEMONSTRATION; hence, a demonstrated truth is one that impels the assent of the IN-TELLECT, presupposing a prior assent to the truths upon which it is based. If science has for its proper object demonstrated truth, that is, conclusions or mediately known propositions, it must base its demonstrations upon premises that are immediately known as indemonstrable truths, otherwise called first principles. This article explains the Aristotelian-Thomistic doctrine of first principles, with accent on their nature, origin, and habitual use.

Postulate, hypothesis, and principle. The expression "first principles" itself indicates that there are distinctions among principles. At the lowest level are propositions that are actually demonstrable, but are posited and utilized without being demonstrated. These are principles only insofar as they are accepted by one considering an argument; depending upon his position, they are regarded as postulates or hypotheses. A PROPOSITION is a POSTULATE (Lat. postulare, to ask) if the one considering it has no opinion of his own or holds a contrary one; we "ask" him, as it were, to admit it for the sake of demonstration. Should the auditor judge the proposition likely, giving some assent to it, it is called a hypothesis. In this case he does not merely agree to the use of the proposition for purposes of demonstration, but accepts it because it seems probable and he feels it can be proved.

Such is the meaning usually associated with the term "hypothesis," although this is not its original meaning. Etymologically the word has an extension similar to that of PRINCIPLE. Deriving from ὑποτίθημι, meaning "to put under," hypothesis was something posed as a foundation for reasoning. As such, it included indemonstrable truths, even the most proper and absolute. Since the term "presuppose" also has its origin in ὑποτίθημι, one can hold that a hypothesis, in its original sense, is a proposition "presupposed" to a demonstration, while in a later sense it comes to be one that is accepted as demonstrated, though it is neither indemonstrable nor actually demonstrated. Ambiguity can be avoided by using the term "hypothesis" in the more restrictive sense of proposition accepted as demonstrated, and leaving the term "principle" for the original meaning.

According to ARISTOTLE, "a principle in a demonstration is an immediate proposition," while "an immediate proposition is one which has no other proposition prior to it" (Anal. post. 72a 7). In such a proposition, the predicate is so connected with the subject that the relationship affirmed between them admits of no middle term.

Common and proper principles. The terms involved offer a further basis for distinguishing principles. "Among the principles used in the demonstrative sciences, some are proper to each science and some are common to all. . . ." (ibid. 76a 37). This equivalently distinguishes between definitions and axioms.

Definitions. While a DEFINITION as such is not yet a proposition, any proposition that directly applies a definition to the thing defined is an immediate proposition. The same applies to a proposition that is founded immediately upon a definition, in which the predicate is so directly related that it seems to need no explanation and to flow from the definition. It is enough, for example, to know that a right angle is generated by a perpendicular erected on a straight line to know that all right angles are equal. Proper principles are always immediate, with the immediacy, so to speak, of definitions. Their designation as ''proper principles'' arises from the fact that their definitions derive from the proper subject matter of a particular science.

Axioms. From this it can be gathered that common principles or axioms go beyond the limits of a particular science, that the truth they convey has a common value for all science. They are also common in the sense that they express thoughts or opinions that all accept and share. Their terms are so simple and current, their evidence so compelling, that one can apply to all of them what Aristotle said of first principles, namely, that they are the best known, so well known, in fact, that no one can be mistaken about them. It is in this very firmness, founded upon their characteristic of being most known, that their priority resides, as well as their dignity in the scale of knowledge. This is why they are called first principles or axioms (Gr. άξιος, meaning fitting), which St. THOMAS AQUINAS renders as dignitates or maximae propositiones. In modern discussions of METHODOLOGY, however, the term "axiom" takes on a different meaning (see AXIOMATIC SYSTEM).

Certitude and Truth. Aristotle affirms that all principles must be believed and understood better than conclusions (ibid. 72a 25–39). Since the knowledge contained in conclusions derives from principles, the latter cannot be logically antecedent without at the same time being more certain. One hardly admits the truth of a conclusion with conviction unless the principles upon which it is based exclude the possibility of the contradictory conclusion being true. Thus the immediate evidence of principles is always greater than the participated evidence of conclusions.

All things being equal, common principles enjoy a certain superiority over proper principles; this does not mean, however, that proper principles must be demonstrated from common principles. The terms of the former also are joined without need of a third term, and their evidence comes from proper considerations. Yet, while independent from the viewpoint of knowledge, they are not independent from the viewpoint of CERTITUDE. Actually, common principles would not be the most common if they were not included in the proper, and the proper are not such because they are totally different from the common, but rather because they imply an addition to the common. Thus the truth of a common principle is found, although only implicitly, in the truth of a proper principle, so that if the first is not true, the second cannot be true either. Again, the certitude of common principles can be greater than that of proper principles only because of the greater simplicity of the former, although they share this certitude, so to speak, with proper principles.

Knowledge of principles. Except for one who studies a science, knowledge of principles proper to that science is not indispensable. Nor is there need to know such principles before taking up the science, for it is understood that the instructor begins by laying down these principles. Thus, for Aristotle, $\theta \epsilon \sigma \iota \varsigma$ (thesis) is equivalent to proper principle. Whatever the discipline in which one engages, however, the possession of axioms or common principles is a prerequisite. Proper principles are already a part, initial though it be, of a science or particular treatise, while axioms are completely prior to any science. Thus BOETHIUS has formulated the classical distinction between immediate propositions that are such for specialists alone (quoad sapientes tantum) and immediate propositions that are such for all (quoad omnes). These are further subdivided into immediate propositions that are readily seen (quod nos), and those not recognized as such (quoad se tantum) that require a posteriori DEMONSTRA-TION, such as the existence of God (see GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF). Thus not all immediate propositions are principles, for the criterion of a principle is that it be better known to us, and even to all in the case of first principles.

Origin of first principles. Two extremes, INNATISM and EMPIRICISM, are to be avoided when accounting for first principles. According to innatism, man possesses first principles by nature. For LEIBNIZ, man has them as virtual knowledge, while for KANT he knows certain a priori propositions that have no other foundation than the condition of the knowing subject. In their different ways, each tries to explain why principles are so easily known, and yet safeguard their universality and necessity. Empiricism, on the other hand, refuses to recognize any universality or necessity in first principles; it classifies them as knowledge acquired from the senses and remaining wholly dependent upon sense, so that any assent given them is consequent on experience and knowledge of the particular. (See KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.)

Some of Aristotle's expressions, such as "prerequisite experience" and "necessary induction," might be interpreted empirically, while St. Thomas makes statements that might be taken in the sense of innatism, such as "seeds that preexist in us" (De ver. 11.1), "knowledge put into us by God as author of nature" (C. gent. 1.7). Both, however, concur in the doctrine that man possesses a potency or ability to acquire first principles, without this potency's being superior to the actual possession of such principles themselves (cf. Anal. post. 99b 33).

Role of Experience. According to Aristotle, the preliminary knowledge of principles involves the following stages: SENSATION, memory, EXPERIENCE, all of which are associated with SENSE KNOWLEDGE from the exterior SENSES all the way to the COGITATIVE POWER. Again, according to Aristotle, principles are not derived from experience without coming also from UNIVERSALS. Moreover, while aware of difficulties involved in interpreting some texts (e.g., Anal. post. 100a 6), we hold that the universal itself is not directly reducible either to experience or to principles. It is true that experience does include a certain grasp of the universal, the grasp of a universal that is confused, so to speak. But this is not actually possible unless the cogitative power compares and brings together singulars to achieve some notion of unity. If the cogitative faculty remains a ratio particularis and is always concerned with singulars, it certainly does not furnish the experience that Aristotle describes as "the universal now stabilized in its entirety within the soul, the one beside the many which is a single identity within them all'' (100a 7-8). Under the latter formality, which is its proper formality, the universal is the object of no power save the intellect. But again, even the universal is not a principle, since the principle comes from the universal (cf. 100b 1-5). To distinguish the two, one need only have recourse to the definition of principle as a proposition. It thus appears that universals are nothing more than noncomplex, simple notions that constitute the terms of the propositionprinciple.

Thus the universal stands between experience and first principles in such a way that sense knowledge is required only for the acquisition of terms, but does not enter into the formation of principles themselves. The proximate source of principles is not sense experience but intellectual comprehension, and this as formulated in the IDEA.

Role of Induction. This raises the further problem of how first principles are related to induction. "It is clear," says Aristotle, "that we must get to know the primary premises by induction, for the method by which even sense perception implants the universal is inductive" (Anal. post. 100b 3-5). The term "induction" can be correctly applied to knowledge of complex expressions or propositions, for it commonly signifies the passage from a truth established in the singular case to the same truth known in all its universality. And while the fulcrum of induction is experience, the experience from which principles proceed is that of complexes and the induction contingent upon their formation. Such experience alone can assume the role of moving and determining the intellect to effect the composition found in the proposition. In its contact with singular reality, experience sketches out, one might say, both the basic notions and their relations to one another; thus, from the point of view of the acquisition of principles, of "how" they are born in us, one must say they come from experience but that they are obtained by way of induction.

Content and Assent. Having said this, one must specify that induction accounts for the origin of principles without explaining their content in any way. Since the knowledge attained in principles is that of propositions, the ultimate explanation for assent should be in terms of the absolute adherence we give propositions. Here the knowledge of terms furnishes the basic explanation, since immediate and absolute EVIDENCE is what compels assent. To invoke experience and induction alone would be to change the proposition into an object of discourse wherein our adherence would be conditioned by some antecedent adherence to the singulars of experience. This would make the principle something "better known," without accounting for its superiority or its greater certitude with respect to previous knowledge. Aristotle located the universal between experience and principles, and St. Thomas explained knowledge of principles through knowledge of terms, because both regarded experience and induction as a necessary condition for the origin of principles; yet they also held that the knowledge of terms and their connection, as seen by the simple light of the intellect, is the unique formal reason for the assent we give them.

Grasped in its entirety, this doctrine steers a middle road between empiricism on the one hand, which finds all truth in the senses, and rationalistic innatism on the other, which assigns no role to the intellect except that of reenacting experience.

Habits and first principles. A HABIT is a stable disposition whose stability is ultimately determined by its OBJECT. The habits of the speculative intellect, namely, understanding, science, and wisdom, dispose it to attain necessary TRUTH. All three habits make use of first principles.

Understanding. The first of the intellectual habits, UNDERSTANDING, is directly concerned with principles. Scholastics call it intellectus, the name of the faculty from which it comes, a fact that is intelligible from what has already been said, since only by its own power does the intellect attain the truth of first principles. Experience supplies antecedent knowledge, but the terminal point of the induction itself specifies the habit of first principles.

Science. The second habit is that of SCIENCE. Each science has its proper subject and, if it demonstrates properties, necessarily proceeds from principles proper to that subject. Nothing prevents a science from also using common principles, provided that these be used in conjunction with proper principles and that they be applied in the context of the particular subject matter. Geometry, for instance, is not concerned with being and nonbeing in an absolute sense, but rather as applied to magnitudes. "Sciences do not use first principles in all their generality, as applicable to all being, but only as much as needed according to content of their subject matter" (Thomas Aquinas, In 4 meta, 5.591).

Wisdom. The third speculative habit is WISDOM, also known as METAPHYSICS. Its subject is BEING AS BEING in all its universality, as opposed to the beings studied in particular sciences. This immediately suggests the possibility that metaphysics has certain functions regarding principles whose terms are common. In fact, the coincidence in universality sets metaphysics apart as the only habit treating of first principles in themselves, making them the object of its consideration apart from simply using them.

Relation to metaphysics. Following Aristotle, St. Thomas assigns to metaphysics the role of establishing common notions and then defending first principles against those who deny them (In 6 eth. 5.1181–1183). In what can this role consist, if the comprehension of terms inducing assent already belongs to the habit of understanding? The answer is implicit in the question: Such a role must be granted to understanding in the exact measure required for assent itself. The point is that confused knowledge of terms suffices for making a JUDGMENT regarding their connection, that principles can be known quite certainly even though their terms be common. The habit of understanding is satisfied with grasping the universals found at the beginning of intellectual knowledge. The knowledge of communia, which is proper to wisdom, is, on the contrary, a distinct knowledge; one achieves it only by distinguishing the multiple acceptations of common terms. It is one thing to admit that it is impossible to be and not to be simultaneously; it is another to know whether the expression "to be" designates essential or accidental being, extramental or intentional being, or actual or potential being. In thus making common terms precise, the metaphysician might give the impression that he is a lexicographer or one compiling a vocabulary— Aristotle seems to do this in book five of his Metaphysics-but not everyone can control all the acceptations of these terms, and their distinction is a sign of the superiority of wisdom over understanding.

Defense of Principles. As for the defense of first principles, methods depend as much on the principles denied as on the reasons alleged in their negation. One such method could deal with the single case, in an argument ad hominem, if it happens that in confusing different senses of a term or playing on its ambiguity, someone should pretend to give examples of the falsity of the principle. Another method might utilize a demonstration to show, again ad hominem, that to deny some principle one must deny another that is even more common and more evident. This suggests that the defense of first principles is finally or radically rooted in the systematic defense of the most common principles, those so implied in all knowledge that to deny them is to deny knowledge itself. This is how Aristotle defends the principles of contradiction and of the excluded middle in book four of the Meta-physics. A number of his arguments are still useful against arguments more subtle than those of the ancient SOPHISTS.

Number of First Principles. Contemporary metaphysicians, including those in the Aristotelian and Thomistic traditions, regard it as one role of wisdom to discuss first principles, particularly to determine their names, their formulations, and their number. All agree in selecting from the following those principles they consider among the first: the principle of contradiction, of the excluded middle, of noncontradiction, of identity, of intelligibility, of sufficient reason, of causality, of finality, and even a principle of substance. St. Thomas employed the first two, usually formulating these in terms of affirmation and denial. Such apparently logical formulations displease some metaphysicians, possibly because they suspect an IDEALISM that might accept such principles as laws of thought, but of thought unrelated to extramental being. These thinkers prefer a principle stated in terms of being and nonbeing, that is, it is impossible to be and not to be, which was also formulated by St. Thomas (In 1 anal. post. 5.7). But this impossibility is hardly satisfying if the opposition of being to nonbeing be regarded as the object respectively of affirming and denying. Moved by a desire to find the foundation for this in being itself, some fasten upon the intelligibility of being, upon its transcendental truth, and therefore, upon its noncontradiction or its transcendental unity. Thus, it would seem, the principle of intelligibility as well as that of identity have become principles, one might even say "principles of being," meaning by this that their value is not limited to knowledge alone. Furthermore, the TRANSCENDENTALS are the basic foundation for all knowledge, and might on this account be called principles; we leave open the question whether or not they conform to the general conditions already set down for axioms. At any rate, the tendency for discussions of first principles to move toward the problem of being in itself shows the metaphysical character of studies concerning these principles.

See Also: CONTRADICTION, PRINCIPLE OF; EXCLUDED MIDDLE, PRINCIPLE OF; IDENTITY, PRINCIPLE OF; CAUSALITY, PRINCIPLE OF; FINALITY, PRINCIPLE OF; SUFFICIENT REASON, PRINCIPLE OF; INTELLIGIBILTY, PRINCIPLE OF.

Bibliography: L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959). D. J. B. HAWKINS, Being and Becoming (New York 1954). J. MARÉCHAL, Le Point de départ de la métaphysique, 5 v. (3d ed. Paris 1944–49), v. 5 Le Thomisme devant la philosophie critique (2d ed.). P. COFFEY, Epistemology, 2 v. (New York 1917; repr. 1958). L. FUETSCHER, Die ersten Seinsund Denkprinzipien (Philosophie und Grenzwissenschaften 3, nn. 2–4; Innsbruck 1930). J. RICKABY, The First Principles of Knowledge (London 1888).

[E. TRÉPANIER]

FISCHER, JOHANN KASPAR FERDINAND

Baroque composer and keyboard virtuoso; b. Germany, 1650?; d. Rastatt, March 27, 1746?. Reliable biographical details are unavailable, but it is known that by 1695 he was music director to Margrave Ludwig of Baden. It is also evident, from his music, that he had captured the spirit of the late baroque French instrumental style of J. B. LULLY and helped introduce it into Germany. Like much baroque music, Fischer's compositions were first published in great sets. Among them are Journal de Printemps (1695), charming orchestral or dance suites following the French order; Musikalisches Blumen-Büschlein (1696), keyboard suites; Vesperae (1701), Vesper psalms for eight voices and instrumental accompaniment; Ariadne Musica (1715), preludes and fugues in 20 keys together with ricercars for the church seasons (this became the model for J. S. BACH'S Well-Tempered Clavier); Litaniae Laurentiae (1711), eight litanies and four Marian antiphons for voices and instruments; and Blumenstrauss (1732), organ preludes and fugues in as many church modes, together with a toccata and finale for each group.

Bibliography: Sämtliche Werke für Klavier und Orgel, ed. E. VON WERRA (Leipzig 1906); Journal de Printemps, in Denkmäler Deutscher Tonkunst 10.1 (Leipzig 1902); Ariadne in Liber organi, ed. E. KALLER (Mainz-New York 1931), v.7. K. NEF, Geschichte der Sinfonie und Suite (Leipzig 1921). G. FROTSCHER, Geschichte des Orgelspiels und der Orgelkomposition, 2 v. (2d ed. Berlin 1959). K. SEITZ, Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart, ed. F. BLUME (Kassel-Basel 1949-) 4:264-269. J. R. MILNE, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 3:143-144. W. APEL, Masters of the Keyboard (Cambridge, Mass. 1947). M. F. BUKOFZER, Music in the Baroque Era (New York 1947). A. PLOTINSKY, "The Keyboard Works of Johann Kaspar Ferdinand Fischer" (Ph.D. diss. City University of New York, 1978). D. M. RANDEL, ed., The Harvard Biographical Dictionary of Music (Cambridge, Massachusetts 1996) 270. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, Eighth Edition (New York 1992) 544. S. WOLLENBERG, "Johann Caspar Ferdinand Fischer" in The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, vol. 6, ed. S. SADIE (New York 1980) 607-609.

[D. BEIKMAN]

FISH, SYMBOLISM OF

The fish as a food and as a symbol occupies an important position in the history of religions and in the cults of the gods and of the dead. In many cases the fish appeared as an article prohibited in the diet because of its sacral nature. Thus the liturgical laws of Egyptian priests demanded abstention from it. The venerators of Onuris, Hatmehit, Hathor, and Neith regarded the fish as sacred. The Syrian goddess Atargatis (identified with the Magna Mater) was honored with a fish-offering, and her priests sanctified themselves by eating it. The people, who were not permitted to eat it, offered fishes of gold and silver.

Pre-Christian Cults. In Syrian culture the fish became a symbol of happiness and life. The votaries of the Babylonian fish-god Oannes appear on monuments clad in a garment imitating a fish. Funeral repasts on Syrian monuments show the fish as an offering in the cult of the dead. Among the Carthaginians, the fish was used as a sacrifice to Tanit, Baal Hammon, and the Punic Saturnus. Punic-Roman altars have been discovered that show the fish as a votive offering. The Etruscans and Romans knew of a propitiatory offering of fish to ward off lightning. Fish was a sacrificial gift in the cult of Dea Tacita on the Roman Feast for the Dead, and fish offerings were well known in the cult of Hecate.

There was a strict prohibition against eating fish in the mystery cult of Eleusis, and the statutes of the Pythagoreans insisted on abstinence from it. Popular medicine forbade fish for the diet of those suffering from epilepsy, the "sacred sickness." Among the Greeks it was customary to honor the goddess of the dead with a fish-offering, but not the gods of heaven. The burning of a fish sacrifice constituted the usual commemoration of the dead. There are a great number of inscriptions, monuments, and literary sources to prove this for the period between 2000 B.C. and Christian times, extending from Babylon, the Hetites Asia Minor, Macedonia, and the Greek Islands, to Punic Latin Africa, Gaul, Italy, Dalmatia, and the Danube provinces. The Jews regarded fish as the preferred food for the cena pura, the supper preceding the Sabbath with which the solemnity began.

Christian Symbolism. In Christian art and literature, the fish appears as an acrostic and as a symbol (see ICHTHUS). The abbreviation IX $\Theta \Upsilon \Sigma$, for Inooûc Xpioτός, Θεοῦ Υἰός Σωτήρ (Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior), was current by the end of the 2d century. The Sibylline Oracles (8.217-280) refer to it, and Lactantius (Div. inst. 7.16-20), Eusebius (Vita Constant. 5.18), and Augustine (Civ. 18.23) also employ it. It can be seen on a great number of Christian sepulchral monuments, such as the inscription of Licinia Amias in Rome, the famous inscription of PECTORIUS in Autun, the inscription of Eutychianus at Perugia, and the silver plaque on the sarcophagus of St. PAULINUS at Trier. It was used as a phylactery at the doors of Christian houses and tombs and as an amulet on gems, medals, and rings; it is found also in the mosaics of Christian basilicas, such as the Constantinian church of the Nativity at Bethlehem and S. Apollinare in Classe at Ravenna.

Symbol of Christ. Side by side with this acrostic, the fish appears as a symbol of Christ in inscriptions, art, and literature. The East and West knew it at the end of the 2d century, as is proved by the much discussed inscription of ABERCIUS of Asia Minor and by TERTULLIAN (De baptismo 1). The fish is seen also as a food in banquet scenes on frescoes in the catacombs of Rome, including those of Peter and Marcellinus, Priscilla, and St. Callistus; it decorates Christian sarcophagi such as that of Livia Primitiva in the Louvre and that in the tomb of St. Matthias in Trier, and it appears in pictures showing Christ and the Apostles at the Last Supper, e.g., in the mosaic in S. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna, on the ivory of Count Stroganoff in the Walters Art Gallery at Baltimore, and in the Cathedral of Milan.

Symbolism of the Fish, early Christian stone epitaph.

There are Christian lamps bearing the image of the fish, and some have its form. It has its place on Christian glasses and cups, on Eucharistic spoons, on epitaphs such as those in the catacombs of St. Agnes and St. Sebastian, and in the Coemeterium Soteris in Rome, in Christian baptisteries such as that of Cuicul in Numidia, and in basilicas such as that of Parenzo. The corpus of archeological material collected and published by F. J. DÖLGER shows the far-reaching influence and extent of the acrostic and the symbol.

Acrostic and Eucharistic Symbol. Several interesting questions in this regard have still to be answered. Is the acrostic older than the symbol? Is the symbol derived from the acrostic, or vice versa? What is the origin of the symbol? How is one to explain the Eucharistic meaning that clings to the symbol from its earliest appearance to the end of its use among Christian types. Of all the symbols in which the early Christians attempted to embody, and at the same time perhaps to conceal, the concepts of their faith, the fish is the most obscure in point of origin. V. Schultze, H. Achelis, and C. R. Morey derive the fishsymbol from the acrostic. Dölger derives the acrostic from the symbol. There seems to be a twofold root beneath the theology of the fish in Christian antiquity. The acrostic most probably goes back to Gnostic circles with their fondness for alphabetic mysticism and magic formulas. The origin of the symbol should perhaps be sought in the long history of the fish as a sacral food in the cults of the ancient world. Achelis's theory, according to which the fish-symbol grew out of the recognition of Christ as the Son of God on the occasion of His Baptism, rests entirely on the phrase of Tertullian (De baptismo 1): Nos pisciculi secundum IXOYN nostrum Jesum Christum in aqua nascimur; this theory is not satisfactory.

Theory of Indian Origin. The theories of Pischel and C. Schmidt, who derived the Christian type from the savior-fish in Indian mythology, have not found the approval of scholars. A thorough review of the relations of primitive Christianity with India shows that a contact may have been established with Indian religion and symbolism in northwest India as early as the 1st century. But such a relation could not have been of sufficient intimacy or duration to justify the derivation of the Christian symbol from Indian sources. Moreover, the parallel between the Indian savior-fish and the Christian symbol is not a striking one.

F. Münter's and A. Jeremias's derivation of the fishsymbol from a putative Jewish symbolical association of the zodiacal sign of the fishes with the Messiah does not deserve confidence. Schultze's reference of the symbol to Mt 7.9–10 ("Or if he ask for a fish, will he give him a serpent?") is not convincing because the figure is so natural that a symbolical interpretation seems forced. Heuser's attempt to connect the symbol in its Eucharistic aspect with the "Multiplication of Loaves and Fishes" and the "Supper on the Sea of Tiberias" fails because the citations from the Fathers that he adduces are all after Augustine (d. 430).

A careful examination of ancient customs concerning the use of fish as a sacral food discounts the theories of S. Reinach, A. Dufourcq, and F. Cumont, according to whom the Christian symbol arose out of, or was strongly influenced by, the sacral repasts of the priests and worshipers of Atargatis and Derketo. In eating fish that was the incarnation of their divinity these cultists identified themselves with the object of their worship. The contrast between the pagan banquets and the Christian Eucharist is too strong. The eating of the sacral fish by worshipers, contrary to the assumption of the theories mentioned above, is nowhere found in pagan cults. In some cases it was practiced by priests, but for the most part the fish appeared in pagan religions as an article prohibited in the diet on account of its sacral nature.

One may contrast with this the fish offered by faith "to the friends" in the epitaph of Abercius. It is important to note that this epitaph, with the first instance of the Christian Eucharistic fish-symbol, was found in Phrygian Hieropolis in the middle of Asia Minor, where the Syrian goddess Atargatis, identified with the Magna Mater, was honored with a fish-offering. Dölger believes it natural to see the Christian fish-symbol here as an unusually apt opposition to pagan usages devised in the interest of propaganda and especially aimed at the cult of Atargatis and the cult of the Kabeiroi or Thracian Horsemen.

While there cannot be any doubt that the post-Constantinian Church employed such practices, everything known of the Church of the 2d century is sharply contradictory to the assumption that it permitted itself such devices on pivotal points of faith. Where such parallels existed, the apologists, e.g., JUSTIN MARTYR, explained them as pagan imitations of Christian usages. Though they were mistaken, one can see how they judged such matters.

Goodenough has recently expressed the opinion that the symbolism of the fish originated in pagan cults, was adopted by the Jewish religion, and passed from there to Christian usage. Though both the acrostic and the symbol appear almost at the same time in the sources, it seems that the symbol, fish=Christ, originated before the acrostic.

Bibliography: H. ACHELIS, Das Symbol des Fisches und die Fischdenkmäler der römischen Katakomben (Marburg 1888). R. PISCHEL, Der Ursprung des christlichen Fischsymbols (Berlin 1905). C. R. MOREY, "The Origin of the Fish-Symbol," Princeton Theological Review 8 (1910) 93–106, 231–246, 401–432; 9 (1911) 268–289. F. J. DÖLGER, IXØYΣ, 5 v. (Rome-Münster 1910–27; 2d ed. Münster 1928–43). I. SCHEFTELOWITZ, "Das Fischsymbol im Judentum und Christentum," Archiv für Religionswissenschaft 14 (1911) 1–53. v. SCHULTZE, IXØYΣ (Griefswald 1912). F. CUMONT, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 9.1 (1914) 844–850. E. R. GOODENOUGH, Jewish Symbols, v. 5 (Bollingen Ser. 37; New York 1956) 3–61. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950–86) 1:171–175, literature.

[J. QUASTEN]

FISHER, JOHN, ST.

Cardinal bishop of Rochester, England, humanist and martyr; b. Beverley, Yorkshire, 1469; executed, London, July 22, 1535. He was the son of a merchant, was educated at the Minster school, and, about 1482, entered Michaelhouse, which was later absorbed into Trinity College, Cambridge. He earned his B.A. degree in 1488 and his M.A. in 1491, when he became a fellow of Michaelhouse and was ordained. Three years later he was elected proctor, then master of Michaelhouse, and president of Queens College in 1505.

Episcopal Career. In 1504 he became bishop of Rochester. His official affiliation with the university brought him to the notice of Lady Margaret Beaufort, mother of Henry VII. He became her confessor and consultant in the use of her wealth. Out of this association were created the readerships of divinity at Oxford and Cambridge (1503) and the foundations of Christ's College (1505) and St. John's College (1511), Cambridge. In 1501 he earned his D.D. degree and was elected vice chancellor of the University and chancellor three years later. It was his unique distinction to receive a lifetime appointment to this office in 1514. To raise the standard of preaching, he obtained a papal bull granting the university the right to appoint 12 priests to preach anywhere in the country. At the death of Lady Margaret in 1509 he was concerned about the foundation of St. John's, since she had not completed her testamentary provisions. Fisher assigned to the College lands she had given him. It is to Lady Margaret that we owe the sermons preached at her request on the penitential Psalms; these were published in 1509 and reprinted seven times before Fisher's death. Commemorative sermons on Henry VII and on Lady Margaret were published in that year also.

In 1511 Fisher encouraged ERASMUS to come to Cambridge to teach Greek. Upon the publication of the latter's Greek New Testament, Fisher was persuaded to learn the language and received his first lessons from Erasmus in 1516. Their friendship led Erasmus to write: "He is the one man at this time who is incomparable for uprightness of life, for learning, and for greatness of soul."

The coming of Lutheranism drew Fisher into controversy. He wrote eight books against various heresies. Since these were in Latin, they are seldom considered in estimates of his fame, but in his own time they gave him a leading position among European theologians. Two anti-Lutheran sermons have survived. The first was preached at a burning of heretical books at St. Paul's Cross on May 12, 1521; the second at the abjuration of Robert Barnes on Feb. 11, 1526.

Conflict with Henry VIII. In June 1527 WOLSEY first put to Fisher the problem posed by Henry VIII's adaptable conscience. Had the pope exceeded his powers in granting a dispensation for the marriage of Henry with Catherine, his brother's widow? Fisher promised to study the question. In September he declared his judgment in favor of the marriage; and in his defense of Catherine at the Legatine Court, May 1529, he incurred the king's resentment. He increased the royal displeasure by leading the opposition in the House of Lords to bills passed by the Commons as remedies for their grievance against the clergy. Two years later, in convocation, he spoke against accepting the king as supreme head of the Church of England.

This continued opposition fixed Henry's determination to silence the aged bishop. The first move was to implicate him in the affair of Elizabeth BARTON, the nun of Kent. His name was included in a bill of attainder (January 1534) on the grounds that he had not reported her "revelations" to the king. He was fined £300. By then his feeble health confined him to his diocese of Rochester. He left it for the last time when summoned to appear at Lambeth on April 13, 1534, to take the oath to the new Act of Succession. Both he and Sir Thomas MORE spurned the oath. They were prepared to accept the line of succession as coming within the province of Parliament, but the Act, as formulated, presumed the legality of the divorce and implied a repudiation of the pope's authority.

Imprisonment and Execution. After a grant of time for reconsideration, Fisher and More again refused the oath and were sent to the Tower on April 17, 1534. There

Saint John Fisher. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

Fisher remained without trial until June of the next year. He was cared for by his brother, Robert, who had long been his steward as well as a member of parliament for Rochester, and whose death early in 1535 spared him the details of John's trial. While a prisoner, Fisher wrote for his half sister Elizabeth, a Dominican nun, his Spiritual Consolation and Ways to Perfect Religion.

At the end of 1534 a new Act of Treason was passed, condemning those who maliciously refused to the king any of his titles, including that of supreme head of the English Church. In the same Parliament, Fisher and More were both attaindered under the Act of Succession for refusing the oath and condemned to life imprisonment and loss of goods. At several interrogations in the Tower the questions regarding the acceptance of the king as supreme head were met with silence. Fisher, however, was tricked into making a denial by Richard Rich, the attorney general, who on May 7, 1535, pretended that the king wanted Fisher's opinion as a matter of conscience and that the answer would not be used in evidence against him. As a priest, Fisher could not refuse to answer and he stated that "the king was not, nor could not be, by the law of God, Supreme Head." Henry was further angered when he heard that the new pope, Paul III, created Fisher a cardinal priest of the title of St. Vitalis. Fisher was brought to trial on June 17, 1535, and charged with high treason. He admitted the words he had spoken to Rich, but claimed that it was a privileged occasion and that he had not spoken in malice. This plea was ignored and he was condemned to death, the execution to occur on June 22. His body, after lying naked on the scaffold all day, was given a rough burial in the churchyard of All Hallows near the Tower, and his head was displayed on London Bridge. As his place of burial attracted many who venerated him, his body was reburied in the Tower church of St. Peter-ad-Vincula near that of his fellow martyr, St. Thomas More. Cardinal John Fisher was beatified on Dec. 9, 1886, and canonized on May 19, 1935.

Feast: July 9.

Bibliography: English Works of John Fisher, ed. J. E. B. MAYOR (Early English Text Society, extra series 27; 1876); Sacri sacerdotii defensio contra Lutherum (1525), ed. H. K. SCHMEINK (Corpus Catholicorum 9; Münster 1925); Defense of the Priesthood, tr. P. E. HALLETT (London 1935). R. BAYNE, ed., Life of Fisher (Early English Text Society, extra series 117; 1921). P. HUGHES, Earliest English Life of Saint John Fisher (London 1935). E. P. BEL-LABRIGA, De doctrina beati Joannis Fisher in operibus adversus Lutherum conscriptis (Rome 1935). F. VAN ORTROY, ed., "Vie du bienheureux martryr Jean Fisher, cardinal, Évéque de Rochester (1535)," Analect Bollandiana 10 (1891) 121-365; 12 (1893) 97-287. T. E. BRIDGETT, Life of Blessed John Fisher (London 1902). E. E. REYNOLDS, Saint John Fisher (New York 1956). P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. (London 1950-54) v.1. A. HUMBERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 5:2555-61. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:45–49. J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time, repr. (New York 1961) 2:262-270. The Dictionary of the National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900, repr. (London 1938) 7:58-63.

[E. E. REYNOLDS]

FISHERMAN'S RING

The gold ring that holds the pope's private seal; it is so called because on it St. Peter is depicted fishing from a boat, the name of the reigning pope being around the edge. Although several of the Apostles were fishermen, Peter was the leader of those whom Christ called to be fishers of men (Lk 5.10). The earliest mention of the fisherman's ring is in a letter of Clement IV to his nephew in 1265; he says that popes sealed their private letters with the seal of the fisherman, whereas public papal documents were sealed with leaden bulls. From the 15th century the fisherman's ring has been used to seal the class of official documents called briefs. At the death of a pope the cardinal camerlengo destroys his fisherman's ring and on the election of a new pope places a new ring on his finger.

[B. FORSHAW]

FITCH, WILLIAM BENEDICT (BENEDICT OF CANFIELD)

Capuchin Friar Minor, a spiritual writer who exercised an outstanding influence, especially on 17thcentury spirituality; b. Little Canfield, Essex, England, 1563; d. Paris, Nov. 21, 1610. Fitch was the third son of William Fitch, Lord of the manor of Little Canfield by his second wife Ann, nee Wiseman. He was brought up a Protestant. He went to London to read law, being admitted to the Middle Temple in 1580. While a student he was much moved by a chance reading of The Book of Resolution by Robert PERSONS, SJ, and was received into the Church, Aug. 1, 1585. He then crossed to France and entered the Capuchins in Paris, March 23, 1587. After finishing his novitiate, he went, apparently, to Italy to study theology, and was probably ordained there.

Back in France by 1592, from which date his spiritual teaching began to circulate in manuscript form, he was appointed novice master and, later, guardian at Orleans, remaining there until 1597, when, after being elected definitor, he moved to Paris. He was highly regarded as a director of souls, and was a prominent leader in spiritual and ecclesiastical reform.

On returning to England, in 1599, as a missionary, he was taken prisoner on arrival, and spent more than two years in captivity, chiefly at Wisbech. At the request of Henry IV, he was released and resumed his former active apostolate in France, again, holding high office in his society. In 1607, his name was included on a list of candidates considered suitable for the office of bishop in England that the nuncio in Paris, Maffeo Barberini (later URBAN VIII), submitted to Rome. During these years he published his chief work, The Rule of Perfection (Paris 1609), and The Christian Knight (Paris 1609), a work written during his imprisonment in England. He died with a reputation for great holiness of life.

His spiritual teaching, contained mostly in the Rule of Perfection, a work printed in numerous editions in various languages, consists, essentially, in seeking perfection through conformity to the will of God.

He was a master of spiritual writing and his work influenced (among others) Madame Acarie (see MARIE DE L'INCARNATION, BL.), Cardinal BÉRULLE, and St. VINCENT DE PAUL. His lack of clarity and precision led to criticism of his work, and during the quietist crisis The Rule of Perfection was put on the Index (1689). Most modern authorities, however, consider his teaching to be entirely orthodox.

Bibliography: OPTATUS VAN VEGHEL, Benoît de Canfield, 1562–1610: Sa vie, sa doctrine et son influence (Rome 1949). J. BROUSSE, The Lives of Ange de Joyeuse and Benet Canfield, ed. T.

A. BIRRELL, from R. ROOKWOOD'S tr. of 1623 (New York 1959). J. DAGENS, Bérulle et les origines de la restauration catholique, 1575–1611 (Bruges 1952). Lexicon Capuccinum (Rome 1951) 192–193, gives a considerable bibliography. L. COGNET, Post-Reformation Spirituality (New York 1959).

[C. REEL]

FITERO, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian monastery, probably the first in Spain, in the Diocese of Tarazona, Navarre province, near the Ebro River. Originally founded at Yerga in 1140 by Alfonso VII of Castile with monks from Scala Dei (affiliation of MORIMOND), it was moved to Niencebas in 1146 and to Fitero in 1152 under Abbot Raymond Serrat, who founded the military order of CALATRAVA in 1158. The church has a cenotaph of Rodrigo XIMÉNEZ DE RADA, Archbishop of Toledo (1210-47), who contributed to the building of the church, hoping to be buried there. Fitero, abbey nullius and one of the most important Cistercian cloisters in Spain, flourished until its suppression in 1834. It has recently been restored and has pastoral care of the town. The abbey church (now the parish church), the cloister, and the chapter hall have excellent examples of ogival architecture. The church, built c. 1200, is typically Cistercian in its main altar, five chapels, ambulatory, and three naves. The chapter hall is Romanesque-ogival, and the early 16th-century cloister is Gothic-plateresque.

Bibliography: M. ARIGITA Y LASA, Cartulario de Fitero (Pamplona 1900). T. BIURRUN SÓTIL, El arte romanico en Navarra (Pamplona 1936). M. COCHERIL, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:944–948, 952.

[J. PÉREZ DE URBEL]

FITTON, JAMES

Missionary; b. Boston. Mass., April 10, 1805; d. Malden, Mass., Sept. 15, 1881. He was the son of Abraham Fitton, an English wheelwright, and Sarah (Williams) Fitton of Wales. He attended public schools in Boston and Virgil Barber's Academy in Claremont, N.H. Bishop Benedict FENWICK personally supervised his theological studies and ordained him on Dec. 23, 1827. Fitton's labors were divided between urban pastoral assignments and missionary posts in Connecticut, western and central Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. After ministering to the Passamaquoddy people in Maine (1828) and the scattered Catholics of Vermont (1829), he was assigned to Hartford, Conn., in July 1830. There and at Worcester, Mass. (1836–43), he organized the Catholics, opened new schools, promoted temperance societies, lectured, and compiled devotional books. A pioneer in Catholic education, he founded Mt. St. James' Seminary, Worcester, which became the College of the Holy Cross. He was editor of the Hartford Catholic Press and author of The Youth's Companion (1833), The Triumph of Religion (1833), Familiar Instructions (n.d.), and St. Joseph's Manual (1877). He wrote his best-known work, Sketches of the Establishment of the Church in New England (1872), while he was pastor (1855–81) of the Church of the Most Holy Redeemer in East Boston, where he had been transferred after having served (1844–55) at Newport, R.I.

Seal made by the Fisherman's Ring of Pope Paul IV.

Bibliography: R. H. LORD et al., History of the Archdiocese of Boston in the Various Stages of Its Development, 1604–1943, 3 v. (New York 1944). L. P. MCCARTHY, Sketch of the Life and Missionary Labors of Rev. James Fitton (Boston 1908).

[W. L. LUCEY]

FITZALAN, HENRY

Twelfth Earl of Arundel; b. c. 1511; d. Feb. 24, 1580 (O.S. 1579). HENRY VIII was his godfather and Fitzalan spent his early career in his service. He served as governor of Calais (1540–43), expending his energy and his own money in improving the town's military strength. The title came to him at the death of his father in January 1544. At the siege of Boulogne he was "marshall of the field" and led the storming of the town. On his return to England he was appointed lord chamberlain, a post he filled for the rest of Henry VIII's reign. During the reign of Edward VI, first Protector Somerset and then the earl of Warwick succeeded in destroying Fitzalan's influence in the government. When Edward VI died, he feigned cooperation with Warwick while contriving to secure the accession of MARY TUDOR. Under Queen Mary, he filled a variety of governmental and diplomatic positions. ELIZ-ABETH I retained him in all the posts he had held in the previous reign, but he was not trusted. He led the Roman Catholic party, opposed the 1559 intervention in Scotland, favored lenient treatment for MARY STUART at the time of her imprisonment, supported the plan to marry her to his widowed son-in-law, the Duke of Norfolk (father of Philip HOWARD, who inherited the earldom of Arundel in 1580), and was aware of the Ridolfi Plot. As a result of his implication in the plot, he was placed under guard and did not secure his liberty until December 1572. He passed the remainder of his life in seclusion.

Bibliography: The Boke of Henrie, Earle of Arundel (Harleian MS 4107), printed in Jeffery's Antiquarian Repertory, v.2 (London 1807). M. A. TIERNEY, The History and Antiquities of the Castle and Town of Arundel, 2 v. (London 1834). P. HUGHES The Reformation in England (New York 1963).

[V. H. PONKO]

FITZGERALD, EDWARD

Bishop; b. Limerick, Ireland, Oct. 28, 1833; d. Hot Springs, Ark., Feb. 21, 1907. Fitzgerlad came to the U.S. with his parents in 1849 and was educated for the priesthood at the Barrens, Perry County, Missouri; Mt. St. Mary Seminary of the West, Cincinnati, Ohio; and Mount St. Mary's College and Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md. He was ordained for the Diocese of Cincinnati, Aug. 22, 1857, and was assigned as pastor to St. Patrick's, Columbus, Ohio, a parish then under interdict and in a state of rebellion against Abp. John B. Purcell because of a dispute with the trustees. Fitzgerald restored peace and remained nine years as pastor.

On Feb. 3, 1867, he was consecrated bishop of Little Rock, Ark., a see that had been vacant since 1862 because of the Civil War. His diocese, comprising the state of Arkansas and the Indian Territory (now the state of Oklahoma), contained only 1,600 Catholics, five priests, four parishes, and three houses of Sisters of Mercy. Fitzgerald brought to the diocese Benedictine monks from St. Meinrad, Ind.; Holy Ghost Fathers from Pittsburgh, Pa.; two distinct communities of Benedictine nuns; the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, Ky.; and the Sisters of Mercy from St. Louis, Mo. By introducing these orders, he prepared for the influx of German, Polish, and Italian immigrants who settled in the state in the late 19th century.

In 1870 Fitzgerald attended Vatican Council I, where he was one of seven North American bishops who opposed the definition of papal infallibility, and the only one of the seven present at the final vote (July 18, 1870), when he voted non placet. After the definition, however, he was among the first to indicate his acceptance of the dogma. In 1883, Fitzgerald represented the Province of New Orleans, La., at the conference of U.S. bishops at Rome. The following year he took part in the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore. In 1906 after Fitzgerald had suffered a paralytic stroke (Jan. 21, 1900), John B. Morris, Vicar-General of the Diocese of Nashville, Tenn., was appointed coadjutor. The diocese then had 41 churches, including St. Andrew's Cathedral dedicated in 1881; 33 missions with churches; 26 secular priests and 34 religious; 272 sisters; and a Catholic population of 20,000.

See Also: LITTLE ROCK, DIOCESE OF.

[J. E. O'CONNELL]

FITZGIBBON, MARY IRENE, SISTER

Social worker; b. Kensington, England, May 11, 1823; d. New York City, Aug. 14, 1896. When Catherine Fitzgibbon was nine years old, her family went to the U.S. and settled in St. James's parish, Brooklyn, N.Y. After receiving her early education in the parish school, she entered the Sisters of Charity, Jan. 10, 1850, and took the name of Sister Mary Irene. She taught in St. Peter's Academy, Barclay Street, New York City, until 1858, when she was appointed sister servant (superior) at St. Peter's Convent. Abandoned children were frequently left on the convent doorstep, and, at the request of Abp. John MCCLOSKEY, Sister Mary Irene was chosen to care for these infants. With Sister Teresa Vincent McCrystal and three other sisters, she initiated a work that gradually expanded to the care of 100,000 children. The Foundling Asylum, later known as the New York Foundling Hospital, was opened on Oct. 11, 1869. To provide for its maintenance, Sister Irene organized (November 1869), with the aid of Mrs. Paul Thébaud, the Foundling Asylum Society, a laywomen's auxiliary. In 1873 the hospital site was moved to East 68th Street, where it remained until its building on Third Avenue was opened in 1958.

Sister Irene initiated two important phases of foundling work: the boarding department and the shelter. The first provided for the care of children by foster parents in their homes. For such foster care and also for legal adoption, she established procedures that conformed to state and city regulations. The shelter aided needy unmarried mothers, keeping mother and child together and saving babies by a wet-nurse program. The rehabilitation of unwed mothers became Sister Irene's special work, for which she established three institutions associated with the New York Foundling Hospital: St. Ann's Maternity Hospital (1880), Hospital of St. John for Children (1881), and Nazareth Hospital, Spuyten Duyvil, New York City, for convalescent children (1881). In 1894 Seton Hospital for tubercular male patients was erected next to Nazareth Hospital; she also opened a temporary day nursery for preschool children of working mothers. During her 27 years as superior of Foundling Hospital, she developed techniques for reducing the spread of disease that were imitated by hospitals throughout the U.S.

Bibliography: M. DE L. WALSH, The Sisters of Charity of New York, 1809–1959, 3 v. (New York 1960).

[M. L. FELL]

FITZPATRICK, EDWARD AUGUSTUS

Educator, author, editor; b. New York City. Aug. 29, 1884; d. Milwaukee, Wis., Sept. 13, 1960. He was the son of Thomas and Ellen (Radley) Fitzpatrick. His undergraduate and graduate studies were completed in 1911 at Columbia University, New York City, with the Ph.D. Two years later he married Lillian V. Taylor. After teaching in the public high schools of New York, Fitzpatrick was appointed to the Wisconsin State Board for Public Affairs and devoted the rest of his life to educational work in Wisconsin. He served on the University of Wisconsin staff in Madison, Wis. (1919-23), and became dean (1924-39) of the Marquette University Graduate School, Milwaukee. From 1928 until his death he served also as chancellor, and as president of Mount Mary College, Milwaukee. Fitzpatrick edited The Public Servant (1916–17), Hospital Progress (1924–27), and the Catholic School Journal (1929-60). He published articles and books, including Industrial Citizenship (1927), Foundations of Christian Education (1929), I Believe in Education (1938), How to Educate Human Beings (1950), Exploring a Theology of Education (1950), and La Salle, Patron of All Teachers (1951).

[E. KEVANE]

FITZSIMON, HENRY

Missionary and writer; b. Dublin, Ireland, 1566; d. Dublin, 1643. He was the son of Nicholas, alderman of Dublin, and was related to several notable families of the Pale. He was educated as a Protestant at Oxford, but became reconciled to the Catholic Church through Thomas Darbishire, SJ, in Paris. After further studies at Pont-à-Mousson, he entered the Society of Jesus in 1592 at Tournai. He completed his theological course at Louvain and returned to Ireland in 1597. For two years he labored, with brilliant success, to arrest the growth of Protestantism in Dublin and the Pale. When he was arrested and imprisoned in Dublin Castle, he continued his defense of Catholicism from his cell by engaging in controversy with such opponents as Meredith Hanmer and John Rider. Exiled in 1604, he spent the next 26 years chiefly in the Low Countries where he published many books on theology, spirituality, and history. He was unofficial agent of the Irish mission. For his own safety and that of the Jesuits in Ireland, his return to the mission was opposed by Father Christopher HOLYWOOD. However, he returned to Ireland in 1630. He was sent to France on business in 1632, but the letter of the Jesuit general forbidding him to return to Ireland arrived too late. Fitzsimon got back to Ireland, but henceforth his ministry had to be conducted secretly and his name disappears altogether from the Jesuit correspondence after 1635. The account of his last years and death dates from after the Cromwellian conquest.

Edward Fitzgerald.

Bibliography: Archives (unpublished) of the Society of Jesus, Rome. E. HOGAN, Life, Letters and Diary of Henry Fitzsimon (Dublin 1881). C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:766–768.

[F. FINEGAN]

FLACIUS ILLYRICUS, MATTHIAS

The Latinized name of Matthias Vlachich, Lutheran theologian; b. Albona, Istria, March 3, 1520; d. Frankfurt am Main, March 11, 1575. After his father's death he was placed under the tutelage of his uncle, Baldo Lupetino, provincial of the Francicans and a Lutheran sympathizer. Flacius studied for the priesthood at Venice, Basel, and Tübingen before he enrolled at the University of WITTEN-BERG. There he became a confirmed Lutheran and entered into a new period of his life, a period characterized by a violent hatred of the papacy and a passionate defense of what he considered to be the pure Lutheran doctrine. He held the chair of Hebrew at Wittenberg from 1544 to 1549 and in these years developed a violent aversion to the theological position of P. MELANCHTHON. Flacius opposed Melanchthon's Augsburg and Leipzig INTERIMS on the grounds that they were compromises and concessions to the papacy. He became the leader of the GNESIOLU-THERAN party along with such other prominent Lutherans as Nikolaus AMSDORF and Nikolaus Gallus. The Lutheran split originated over the question of nonessentials (adiaphora).

Melanchthon argued that only theological essentials were important and concessions could be made on minor, i.e., nonessential points. Flacius bitterly opposed such views and began a vitriolic campaign against his opponents whom he regarded as traitors to LUTHER. His assault began with the publication in 1549 of his Wider das Interim and continued in a series of personal attacks upon Melanchthon. In 1555 while at the University of Jena, Flacius produced his own version of Luther's works, and four years later he wrote the Book of Confutation, the most important statement of his position. He held that any ceremony, no matter how trivial, if commanded by God and germane to theology was important and could not be glossed over. His theological position and his violent nature were the reasons for his frequent moves, i.e., from Jena to Regensburg, Antwerp, Frankfurt, and Strassburg, and finally back to Frankfurt, where he was to remain.

Among his other works were the Biblical dictionary, Key to Sacred Scripture (1567), and the Glossary of the New Testament (1570). However, much of his fame rests upon the Ecclesiastica historia . . . begun in 1559 and completed in 1574. This work, known since the third edition (Nuremberg 1757) as the Magdeburg Centuries, is the product of a group known as the CENTURIATORS. Written by centuries, and covering the period to 1400, it is polemical and propagandist in scope, designed to prove the validity of the Lutheran position and to attack the Catholic Church. Although the Centuries contains much that is erroneous and false, it forced Catholics and Protestants alike to reexamine their position. The most famous Catholic reply was the Annales ecclesiastici of Caesar BARONIUS, the first volume of which appeared in 1588.

Flacius' position in Reformation history is important because he focused attention upon the interpretation of Lutheran theology. At the same time he created a serious rift between the strict and liberal interpreters of Martin Luther that has persisted until the present day.

Bibliography: W. PREGER, Matthias Flacius Illyricus und seine Zeit, 2 v. (Erlangen 1859–61). E. SCHAUMKELL, Beitrag zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Magdeburger Centurien (Ludwigslust 1898). P. POLMAN, "Flacius Illyricus," Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 27 (1931) 27–73. K. A. VON SCHWARTZ, Die theologische Hermeneutik des Matthias Flacius Illyricus (Munich 1933). L. HAIKOLA, Gesetz und Evangelium bei Matthias Flacius Illyricus (Lund 1952). P. MEINHOLD, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:161–162. G. MOLDAENKE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:971.

[C. L. HOHL, JR.]

FLAGELLATION

There are three stages in the history of flagellation in the Christian Church: (1) as a punishment it was in use from the 4th century; (2) as a form of voluntary penance it developed especially from the mid-11th century; and (3) as a feature of public penitential processions it began in the 13th century.

Penal Flagellation. Scourging was frequently a punishment for delinquent clerics. It was also administered to laymen, mostly to slaves, but occasionally also to free men. More generally, however, it was a feature of monastic discipline. In the East it is mentioned in the rule of PA-CHOMIUS (Reg. 163, in the Latin version of Jerome, Patrologia Latina 23:81d); in the West in the rules of CAE-SARIUS OF ARLES [Opera two (Maredsous 1942) 107], AU-RELIAN OF ARLES (Patrologia Latina 68:392), BENEDICT (only in cases of obstinate incorrigibility: ch. 28, ed. R. Hanslik; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 60:84), and frequently in that of COLUMBAN [Regula coenobialis; ed. G. S. M. Walker, Sancti Columbani opera (Dublin 1957) 142–181]. AUGUSTINE states that it was used in episcopal courts (Ep. 133; Patrologia Latina 33:510). Councils from the 5th to the 7th centuries legislated for flagellation of monks (C. J. von Hefele, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. Leclercq, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907-38) 2:905), as also did monastic customaries (Usus ordinis Cisterciencis, 70; Patrologia Latina 166: 1444; Lanfranc, Decreta pro ordine OSB, 18; Patrologia Latina 150:504). As a punishment for ecclesiastics it was recognized by Canon Law as late as the 17th century.

Voluntary Flagellation. This was a natural development from the penal form. Its motives are: expiation of personal sin and the sins of others, self-conquest, the impetration of divine graces and favors, and especially conformity with Christ in his Passion. In the early Church the martyrs were regarded as closest to Christ; but after the persecutions, the austerities of monastic life were esteemed the nearest equivalent to martyrdom. Monks were the first to adopt scourging as a systematic ascetic exercise, and the practice spread to the clergy and laity, becoming common throughout the Middle Ages. PETER DAMIAN, by his advocacy and example, was influential in stabilizing the practice, first at FONTE AVELLANA, and later in CAMALDOLESE monasteries, at MONTE CASSINO, and elsewhere [De laude flagellorum; Patrologia Latina 145:679–686; Epistolae, 5.8; Patrologia Latina 144:350-352; 6.27, ibid. 414-417; J. Leclercq, "Inédits de saint Pierre Damien," Revue Bénédictine 67 (1957) 154].

As penal flagellation had long been part of the regular discipline of monasticism, the term "discipline" now came to be applied to voluntary penance, signifying the usage, the scourge used, or the individual strokes. The "discipline of rule" or custom became part of the observance of medieval religious orders. It was prescribed and regulated for certain days, especially during the penitential seasons. Similarly, provision for this kind of corporal penance was made in practically all religious rules composed or revised from the 16th to the 18th centuries. Undertaken with the sanction of a religious rule or the guidance of a spiritual director, such corporal penance has continued to be sanctioned by the Church. Without such safeguards it can lead to abuses and aberrations.

Penitential Processions of Flagellants. Originating in Perugia in May 1260 amid the misery of the wars of GUELFS AND GHIBELLINES and the disastrous plague of 1259, processions were stimulated by the eschatological prophecies of JOACHIM DA FIORE, who had predicted the coming of "the third age" for 1260. Instigated by the Umbrian hermit, Rainier Fasani, hundreds or even thousands, preceded by the cross and the clergy, made their way through the city, chanting and crying out for peace, scourging themselves to blood. Fasani's Disciplinati spread from Perugia throughout central and northern Italy, and beyond the Alps into Alsace, Bavaria, Hungary, Bohemia, and Poland. Good effects were noted in Perugia, but the spirit of the movement rapidly deteriorated. Severe measures were taken against the flagellant bands by the bishops of Poland, and in 1261 the processions were forbidden by the Holy See.

As a result, the movement abated and did not revive until the disastrous years of the Black Death (1348–50), when with astonishing rapidity numerous bands of antiecclesiastical flagellants reappeared throughout Europe. Although condemned and prohibited by CLEMENT VI (Oct. 20, 1349), many continued to exist, and in the early 15th century they were reinforced by the adherence of Beghards (see BEGUINES AND BEGHARDS) and the followers of John WYCLIF. They were still active in 1481.

Quite distinct from these fanatical and heretical groups were the associations of Disciplinati, common especially in Italy from c. 1350 until the end of the 16th century. These confraternities were under the control of the Church and were approved and supervised by such bishops as Charles BORROMEO. Similarly, occasional penitential processions of flagellants were held, such as those of VINCENT FERRER. They provoked the opposition in Paris of Jean GERSON, but they were common in the Netherlands and in Austria in the 17th and 18th centuries, and survived in Italy into the 19th. They were encouraged also by Jesuit and Franciscan missionaries in the newly evangelized regions of Asia and Latin America.

Bibliography: P. BAILLY, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 5:392-408. É. BERTAUD, ibid. 3:1302-11. L. GOU-GAUD, Devotional and Ascetic Practices in the Middle Ages, tr. G. C. BATEMAN (London 1927). G. ALBERIGO, "Contributi alla storia delle confraternite dei disciplinati e della spiritualità laicale nei secc. XV e XVI," Il movimento dei disciplinati nel settimo centenario dal suo inizio (Spoleto 1962) 156-252. G. MEERSSEMAN, "Études sur les anciennes confréries dominicaines," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 20 (1950) 5-113; 21 (1951) 51-196; 22 (1952) 5–176. P. TACCHI VENTURI, Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia (2d ed. Rome 1950) v.1.2. W. FERNER, Die Geisselmanie oder der Flagellantismus in den Mönchs- und Nonnenklöstern, ed. G. FRUSTA (3d ed. Stuttgart 1922). G. M. MONTI, Le confraternite medievali dell'alta e media Italia, 2 v. (Venice 1927). O. J. BLUM, St. Peter Damian (Washington 1947) 114-120. J. LECLERCQ, Saint Pierre Damien: Ermite et homme d'Église (Rome 1960).

[F. J. COURTNEY]

FLAGELLATION (IN THE BIBLE)

The Mosaic Law regulated the conduct of society in a threefold way by enacting legislation concerning the conduct of its subjects as individuals, as citizens, and as members of a religious society. The basis of penal legislation was strict retribution (Ex 21.24; Lv 24.17; Dt 19.21). Flagellation was prescribed in two cases that involved sexual crimes (Lv 19.20; Dt 22.18). Judges were permitted to use their own discretion in imposing the sentence of flagellation (Dt 25.1). The number of blows was limited to 40 (Dt 25.3). The Mosaic Law did not specify the instrument to be used. It was presumably the šebet (rod) or the šôt (whip, scourge). The latter was either a single-lash whip or a multilashed flagellum. The varied references to scourging indicate that the practice was well known among the people. It was limited to crimes that did not embrace capital punishment. The sapiential books contain numerous references to the use of the rod [Ps 2.9; 88(89).33; Prv 10.13; 13.24; 14.3; 22.15; 23.13; 26.3; 29.15]; the Hebrews did not "spare the rod" in the correction of children.

"Flagellation of Christ," 17th-century painting. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

In Assyrian law flogging was a common penalty. The number of stripes varied according to crimes, but usually numbered between 20 and 100. Babylonian law as found in the Code of HAMMURABI (par. 202) prescribed it only for the striking of a superior and limited it to 60 stripes. Egyptian task masters are often pictured with a rod or a flagellum.

Roman law limited beating by rods to citizens. Slaves and noncitizens were subjected to scourging. The whips were constructed from leather or chain lashes. Frequently the ends were armed with small leaden balls or metal objects. A similar object seemed to be in the mind of Roboam, who stated: "My father beat you with whips $(\check{s} \delta \hat{t} \hat{m})$, but I will beat you with scorpions ('aqrabbîm)" (1 Kgs 12.11, 14). The latter were the metal-tipped ends of the flagellum. The Romans inflicted scourging on recalcitrant slaves, on political prisoners withholding information, and on criminals condemned to death by crucifixion. They also meted out death by scourging either intentionally or accidentally.

According to Lk 23.16, 22; Jn 19.1, Pontius Pilate imposed flagellation on Jesus as an attempted substitute for crucifixion, not as a prelude to it; but his plan was thwarted. According to Mt 27.26; Mk 15.15, the flagellation of Jesus occurred after the imposition of His death sentence. Actually, the scourging proved to be a prelude to the crucifixion, not a substitute for it. But Pilate's initial move led to confusion regarding the sequence of events in Matthew and Mark and to the erroneous conclusion of some exegetes that Jesus was scourged twice. That Christ suffered at the hands of the Roman soldiers leaves the number of blows struck a matter that cannot be settled. Had He suffered at the hands of the Temple police, His punishment likely would have been limited to the customary 40 blows less one, such as St. Paul suffered on at least five occasions (2 Cor 11.24). The other Apostles had received the Jewish flagellation at least once (Acts 5.40–41).

Bibliography: J. BLINZLER and G. MESTERS, "Geisselung," Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:608–610. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 786–788.

[G. T. KENNEDY]

FLAGET, BENEDICT JOSEPH

First bishop of Bardstown, Ky., diocese (now Louisville archdiocese); b. Contournat, France, Nov. 7, 1763; d. Louisville, Feb. 11, 1850. Orphaned at the age of two, Flaget with his brothers was left to the care first of an aunt, then of an uncle, Canon Benoît Flaget at Billom. At 17 he enrolled at the Sulpician university at Clermont, then a seminary, and in 1783 entered the Society of Priests of St. Sulpice. After his ordination at Issy c. 1788, he taught theology at Nantes until the French Revolution forced him back to Billom. In 1792 he joined the Sulpicians at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md., with his colleague John Baptist David and seminarian Stephen T. Badin. Enrollment was so limited at the seminary that Bp. John Carroll was forced to use the Sulpicians in the missions, and Flaget was sent to the French settlement of Fort Vincennes, Ind., where, in the two years before he was recalled by his superiors, he transformed the spiritual and material life of the townsmen. His short assignment as professor at Georgetown College, Washington, D.C., was followed by an abortive attempt to found a college in Havana, Cuba. He returned to Baltimore where he taught at the seminary for eight years.

Flaget's nomination to the newly created see of Bardstown, Ky., in 1808 came as a distasteful shock to him, and he journeyed to France to enlist the aid of the Sulpicians in protest. When he realized that Rome would take no refusal, he gathered recruits for his new diocese, among them Simon BRUTÉ, who accompanied him to Baltimore. Flaget was consecrated by Bishop Carroll in St. Patrick's church, Baltimore, on Nov. 4, 1810; his installation in Bardstown took place in Badin's cabin on June 9, 1811.

Carroll's prophecy that in Flaget all factions would be united was soon realized. Before many months had passed, he had visited every Catholic settlement in Kentucky. On Dec. 21, 1811, he ordained Guy Chabrat, the first priest to be ordained in Kentucky. During that winter he established St. Thomas Seminary, and in the summer confirmed almost 1,300 people in three states. By 1812 the Sisters of Loretto and the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth had been founded by the missionaries Charles Nerinckx and John David respectively. In his report to Rome in 1815 Flaget could claim that Kentucky counted 10,000 Catholics with 10 priests, 19 churches or chapels, one monastery, and two convents. On Aug. 8, 1819, the cathedral at Bardstown was consecrated, and two days later Flaget consecrated David as his first coadjutor.

Benedict Joseph Flaget.

The next 13 years were spent as a missionary covering territory that ultimately embraced more than 35 dioceses in Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan, the region between the Great Lakes on the north and the 35th degree of north latitude on the south, from the Alleghenies in the east to the Mississippi River in the west. Flaget also made visitations to St. Louis, Detroit, Vincennes, Cincinnati, and Knoxville. He called the first synod of Bardstown, 1812; consecrated Bp. George Whitfield and attended the first provincial council of Baltimore in 1829; and consecrated Bp. Francis Kenrick for Philadelphia in 1830. In 1832 he resigned the bishopric and David was appointed in his place. However, the uproar that ensued led Rome to reverse the action, and in 1834 Chabrat was consecrated as his second coadjutor. In 1835 when Flaget made his first ad limina visit to Rome, he petitioned for the removal of the see from Bardstown to Louisville. At the request of Pope Gregory XVI he spent two years visiting every diocese in France in the interest of the Propagation of the Faith, and by the time of his departure for his diocese in 1839, all France regarded him as a saint capable of working miracles.

When Martin J. Spalding, his third coadjutor, was consecrated in 1848, Flaget retired to spend his remaining two years in prayer. He witnessed the laying of the cornerstone of the new cathedral of the Assumption in Louisville. Six months later he was laid to rest in its crypts where his remains are still entombed. His 40 years as bishop spanned one of the most vital periods in American Catholic history; his was one of the most influential voices in the councils, and in the creation and staffing of new dioceses. In his own jurisdiction he proved to be an expert administrator, a man not of words but of deeds.

Bibliography: J. H. SCHAUINGER, Cathedrals in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1952); Stephen T. Badin: Priest in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1956). M. J. SPALDING, Sketches of the Life, Times and Character of the Rt. Rev. Benedict Joseph Flaget (Louisville 1852). R. J. PURCELL, Dictionary of American Biography, ed. A. JOHNSON and D. MALONE, 20 v. (New York 1928–36; index 1937; 1st suppl. 1944; 2d suppl. 1958) 6:445–447. C. LEMARIÉ, A Biography of Msgr. Benedict Joseph Flaget, 3 v. (Bardstown 1992).

[J. H. SCHAUINGER]

FLANAGAN, EDWARD JOSEPH

Founder of Boys Town; b. Roscommon, Ireland, July 13, 1886; d. Berlin, Germany, May 15, 1948. He came to the U.S. in 1904 and received his B.A. degree at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, MD, in 1906. After a year at St. Joseph's Seminary, Dunwoodie, NY, he attended the Gregorian University in Rome, but lung trouble obliged him to return to the U.S. He later studied theology at Innsbruck, Austria, where he was ordained for the Archdiocese of Omaha, NE, July 26, 1912. Although he had no formal training in social work, his solicitude for derelict men prompted him to open his Workingmen's Hotel in Omaha in 1914. He became convinced that rehabilitation must begin during the impressionable years of youth and that environment was more vital than heredity, and he discarded the hotel in 1917 in favor of a protectory for unfortunate boys. In 1922, after establishing two temporary homes, he purchased Overlook Farm, ten miles west of Omaha, where he founded the present Boys Town.

Boys Town incorporated many of Flanagan's ideas for the rehabilitation of youth. His familiar adage, "there is no such thing as a bad boy," expressed his conviction that except for organic disorders, man is not born with maladjustments, but sometimes develops them because of extrinsic factors. The varied academic, vocational, and recreational facilities that he established were designed as a corrective for deficient environment. Although he made no attempt to proselytize among inmates accepted from all religious, national, and racial groups, religion played a significant part in his program of selfgovernment under mature tutelage. Flanagan possessed a rare talent for capturing the public imagination, and was universally recognized as an authority on juvenile delinquency. In 1947, at the invitation of the supreme commander of the Pacific theater, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, he visited Japan and Korea to assist their governments in meeting complex youth problems. He was in the process of conducting a similar mission to central Europe when harassments by communists in Austria hastened his untimely death from a heart ailment.

[H. W. CASPER]

FLATHERS, MATTHEW, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Matthew Major; b. ca. 1580 at Weston, Otley, Yorkshire, England; d. March 21, 1608, hanged, drawn, and quartered at York under James I. Three months after his ordination at Arras on March 25, 1606, Matthew was sent to English mission. He was discovered almost immediately by government emissaries, who, after the Gunpowder Plot, had redoubled their vigilance. He was brought to trial on the charge of receiving orders abroad, i.e., from the Vatican, and condemned to death. By an act of unusual clemency, the sentence was commuted to banishment for life. Undaunted, Flathers returned to England in order to fulfill his mission, and, after ministering for a brief time to oppressed Catholics in Yorkshire, was again apprehended. Flathers was offered his life on condition that he take the recently enacted Oath of Allegiance. On his refusal, he was condemned to death and taken to the common place of execution outside Micklegate Bar, York. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891). D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[H.G. WINTERSGILL/K. I. RABENSTEIN]

Father Flanagan with young orphan boy from publicity still. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

FLAVIAN, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE, ST.

Reigned 446 to 449; d. Hypaepa, Lydia. A priest of Constantinople known for his moderation, Flavian succeeded PROCLUS as bishop of that see. Eusebius of Doryleum in a session of the permanent Synod of Constantinople on Nov. 8, 448, forced Flavian to take cognizance of the heretical expressions used by the archimandrite EUTYCHES, godfather of the imperially powerful eunuch Chrysaphius, and Flavian had to accede to his condemnation and deposition (November 22). Upon the appeal of Eutyches to the emperor and the greater Churches of the East and Rome, Pope LEO I complained against Flavian's failure to refer the matter to him for judgment. When he did receive the acts of the synod, Leo supported the bishop of Constantinople's position in his famous Tome to Flavian. In preparation for the Council of Ephesus in 449, convoked by the emperor to vindicate Eutyches, Flavian's synod of 448 was investigated, and he was forced to present a profession of his faith. The council itself was conducted by DIOSCORUS OF ALEXAN-DRIA, who managed it in such fashion that Flavian was condemned, deposed, and exiled on Aug. 8, 449. He died soon after, but not before sending an appeal to the pope, who responded by branding Dioscorus's council Illud latrocinium—the Robber Synod. Upon the accession of Marcian and PULCHERIA in 451, the bones of Flavian were buried with honor in the Church of the Apostles in Constantinople, and he was exonerated at the Council of CHALCEDON. Three of his letters are preserved among the works of St. Leo (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 54:723, 743).

Feast: Feb. 18.

Bibliography: Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum (Berlin 1914–) 2.2.1:77–79. P. BATIFFOL, Le Siège apostolique (Paris 1924). T. G. JALLAND, The Life and Times of St. Leo the Great (London 1941). F. X. MURPHY, Peter Speaks Through Leo (Washington 1952). A. GRILLMEIER, A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, Das Konzil vom Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:195–198. P. GALTIER, ibid., 350–353. H. CHADWICK, "The Exile and Death of Flavian of Constantinople," Journal of Theological Studies 6 (1955) 16–34.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

FLAVIGNY-SUR-MOSELLE, ABBEY OF

Benedictine priory for men, later a Benedictine abbey for women, in the present Diocese of Nancy, France. The priory was founded on the banks of the upper Moselle c. 1020 in the former Diocese of Toul, on land originally given to the Abbey of Saint-Vanne of VERDUN-SUR-MEUSE (c. 950) by Bp. Berengar of Verdun, who transferred there the relics of one of his 5th-century predecessors, St. Firmin. A large tower from the 12thcentury and the late 15th-century church show by their size the importance of Flavigny in the Middle Ages. After the abbey was joined to the Congregation of Saint-Vanne and Saint-Hydulphe in 1640, Flavigny experienced a revitalization. Its most famous superior was Dom CEILLIER, prior from 1733 to 1761, who was author of the important Histoire des auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques. The priory was suppressed in 1791. In 1824 the buildings received a new community, a Benedictine abbey for women made up of Benedictine nuns, formerly of Vergaville (Diocese of Metz). They remained at Flavigny until 1904, when they were forced to leave France. Since 1924 the old priory buildings have been used as a school for mentally retarded children, conducted by the Dominican Sisters of the Presentation of Mary from Tours.

Bibliography: A. DEDENON, Histoire du prieuré bénédictin de Flavigny-sur-Moselle (Nancy 1936). H. DAUPHIN, Le Bienheureux Richard, abbé de Saint-Vanne (Louvain 1946) 167–169. J. VILLE-ROT-REBOUL, "Dom Remi Ceillier et le prieuré de Flavigny-sur-Moselle," Annales de l'est, 5th ser., 10 (1959) 161–172.

[J. CHOUX]

FLAVIGNY-SUR-OZERAIN, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery in the town that has taken its name, in Côte d'Or, France, Diocese of Autun (present-day Diocese of Dijon). This much-fought-over abbey was founded in the 8th century by a Burgundian noble and was much favored by CHARLES MARTEL. Almost immediately, however, the monks and the bishops of Autun entered into a long-lasting struggle over control of the abbey. The presence at the abbey of the relics of St. Reine (or Regina) of Alise, an Autun marytr, had already given it great renown before it became part of the CLUNIAC REFORM movement in the late 10th century. But despite its Cluniac affiliation and its much later incorporation into the MAURIST congregation (1644), the abbey was the prey of the bishops of Autun and later of the Jesuits and had a notable controversy with the Franciscans concerning the relics of St. Reine. The abbey was suppressed in 1790 during the French Revolution; although destroyed, it again became popularly known when J. B. H. LACORDAIRE, the 19th-century Burgundian restorer of the DOMINICANS, founded a novitiate at Flavigny. Today the motherhouse of the Dominicaines missionaires des Campagnes is in the village. Only the crypt of the old monastery is still in existence.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 3:150–152; 8:502–503, a catalogue of the abbots of Flavigny from 755 to 1096. Gallia Christiana, v. 1–13 (Paris 1715–85), v. 14–16 (Paris 1856–65) 4:454–465. D. A. MORTIER, Flavigny: L'Abbaye et la ville, 720–1920 (Paris 1920). R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 4:1337–39.

[L. GAILLARD]

FLEMING, PATRICK

Historian of the Irish Saints; b. Christopher Fleming, Lagan, County Louth, Ireland, 1599; d. Beneschau, near Prague, Bohemia, Nov. 7, 1631. At 18 Fleming entered the Franciscan Order of Strict Observance, taking the religious name Patrick. He was sent to Rome, Louvain, and Douai for studies. During his years on the Continent he came under the influence of the Donegal-born scholar and rector of Louvain, Hugh WARD, who persuaded Fleming to devote research to the collection of materials on the Irish saints. While studying at St. Isidore's College in Rome, Fleming became the close friend of Hugh Mac-Caughwell (later archbishop of Armagh), enjoying an intimate intellectual relationship with him.

In 1631 at the age of 32, Fleming was made first president of the Irish College of the Immaculate Conception at Prague. This was a year of great political and social strife on the Continent during the Thirty Years' War (1618–48). The city of Prague was being besieged by the Elector of Saxony, and while fleeing from the capital with several of his companions, Fleming was set upon by a mob of enraged Calvinist peasants who murdered him. In addition to a Life of St. Columba, a Biography of Bishop MacCaughwell, and a Chronicle of St. Peter's Monastery in Ratisbon, Fleming left, unpublished, a valuable Collectanea sacra that was edited and published 30 years after his death.

Bibliography: J. S. CRONE, Concise Dictionary of Irish Biography (Dublin 1928). J. WARE, The Antiquities and History of Ireland (Dublin 1705). T. COOPER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 7:281–282.

[E. J. MURRAY]

FLEMING, THOMAS

Franciscan archbishop of Dublin (1623-55); b. 1593; d. 1655. The son of William Fleming, baron of Olane (Slane), Fleming was educated at Douai and in St. Anthony's Franciscan college at Louvain. He taught philosophy and theology there until, on Oct. 23, 1623, he was appointed to the See of Dublin; he was consecrated in St. Anthony's on Dec. 30, 1623. He went to Dublin, where the ministry of the Church, although exercised in private with a precarious toleration from the government, was threatened by the violent action of firebrands such as Paul Harris and Patrick Cahill, diocesan priests, and diehard opponents of the regulars. Fleming's tact, zeal, and vigilance were conspicuous in his bringing into being the Pastoral College in Louvain, in his interest in those of Douai and Antwerp, in his holding of a provincial Synod near Portarlington, County Kildare (1640) to implement the decrees of Trent and strengthen diocesan discipline, and in his patronage of the mission to Scotland. A friend of Luke WADDING, the Irish historian, he conspicuously encouraged at home and abroad Irish hagiographical and historical writing. In the crises of the Confederation of Kilkenny he adopted a middle-of-the-road policy.

Bibliography: B. H. BLACKER, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 7:288. C. GIBLIN in Father Luke Wadding: A Commemorative Volume (Dublin 1957) 529–533 and passim. P. F. MORAN, History of the Catholic Archbishops of Dublin (Dublin 1864) 294–411. J. T. GILBERT, ed., History of the Irish Confederation, 7 v. (Dublin 1882–91). M. J. HYNES, The Mission of Rinuccini (Dublin 1932).

[J. J. MEAGHER]

FLETE, WILLIAM

Augustinian hermit and mystic; b. Fleet, Lincolnshire, England, c. 1325; d. probably at Lecetto, Italy, c. 1390. He entered the Augustinian Order c. 1339 and achieved the title baccalarius formatus at Cambridge by the year 1353. Renouncing the opportunity to continue his studies for the magisterium, he left England July 17, 1359, for Italy and the celebrated Augustinian monastery at Lecceto (San Salvadore di Selva di Lago), near Siena, where he became a member of the community in September. He lived an almost exclusively eremitical life from then on.

Flete was a friend, confidant, and quasi disciple of St. CATHERINE OF SIENA. They met on numerous occasions (first in 1367), and Catherine addressed several letters to him, four of which have survived. One may discern his influence on her Augustinian theological formation from 1368 to 1374. When Catherine returned from Avignon in 1377, having persuaded Pope Gregory XI to return to Rome, she visited Lecceto and revealed the basic tenets of her spirituality to Flete, who arranged them and wrote them down. The document is known as her Spiritual Document. Later St. Catherine tried in vain to persuade him to leave his hermitage in order to take a more active part in the apostolate. Despite her disappointment, she remained on friendly terms with the reluctant friar, and before she died appointed him spiritual head of her famiglia or group of disciples.

Flete is the author of a spiritual treatise De remediis contra temptationes, written probably in Cambridge during the years 1352–58. In 1380, perhaps on the occasion of St. Catherine's death, he broke his long silence and sent three letters to his brethren in England. All three letters are strong appeals for a return to pristine fervor through both interior and exterior reform. The first letter, addressed to all the members of the English province, is a kind of commentary on the Rule of St. Augustine.

Bibliography: B. HACKETT, William Flete, O.S.A., and Catherine of Siena: Masters of Fourteenth-Century Spirituality, ed. J. ROTELLE (Villanova 1992).

[R. J. WELSH/B. HACKETT]

FLEURY, ANDRÉ HERCULE DE

French cardinal and statesman; b. Lodève, Languedoc, June 22, 1653; d. Paris, Jan. 29, 1743. He studied in Paris at the colleges of Navarre, Louis-le-Grand, Harcourt, and the Sorbonne. He was tonsured in 1666, and made canon of Montpellier in 1668; he became chaplain in 1675 of Queen Marie Thérèse, and in 1678 of Louis XIV, who made him bishop of Fréjus in 1699. Fleury pursued social and religious reforms in his diocese, which was invaded by armies in 1702 and 1707. He carefully observed the reforms of the Council of Trent and took a sound theological position toward JANSENISM in 1711 when he censured P. Quesnel in letters to Cardinal Noailles, and also in an episcopal letter of 1714. He resigned the see in 1715 to become tutor to Louis XV, for whose spiritual life he showed solicitude. In 1717 Fleury entered the Académie Française. He used his position on the Jansenistic Council of Conscience (in charge of church benefices) to work for religious peace, order, and unity.

Having been a respected counselor of LOUIS XV during the regencies of the Dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, Fleury became prime minister in fact from June 1726 until his death. He was made a cardinal in September 1726. His policies were not fixed but were characterized by frugality and concern for peace. He stabilized the currency and the national credit, which had suffered from the extravagance and wars of Louis XIV. Commerce flourished, and France regained her position as arbiter of European affairs.

Fleury intervened reluctantly in the Wars of the Polish and Austrian Successions. His temporizing with the political and religious aspects of Jansenism was unpopular with both sides, and his quiet policy was not appreciated, but the years of his ministry were the happiest of the reign of Louis XV. He failed, however, to familiarize the king with matters of government.

Bibliography: G. HARDY, Le Cardinal de Fleury et le mouvement janséniste (Paris 1925). A. M. WILSON, French Foreign Policy during the Administration of Cardinal Fleury, 1726–1743 (Cambridge, Mass. 1936). M. DE SARS, Le Cardinal de Fleury, apôtre de la paix (Paris 1942). R. CHALUMEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 4:1344–45.

[W. E. LANGLEY]

FLEURY, CLAUDE

Church historian, educator, and jurist; b. Paris, Dec. 6, 1640; d. Paris, July 14, 1723. The son of a lawyer from Normandy, he was educated in the Jesuit College of Clermont, studied law, was called to the bar at 18 years of age, and practiced law in Paris for about ten years. During this period he read assiduously in civil and Canon Law, history, literature, and archeology. He became a friend and protegé of Bossuet, whom he met in the salon of Guillaume de Lamoignon, first president of the parliament of Paris. He was introduced to and accepted by the intellectual celebrities of France-Bossuet, Louis BOUR-DALOUE, Boileau-Despréaux, etc. At this time he wrote l'Histoire du droit francais and l'Institution au droit ecclesiastique, both published in Paris some years later, the first in 1674 and the second in 1677. Meantime, in 1669, he was ordained and through Bossuet was introduced into the French court, where he held positions most of his remaining years. In 1672 he became tutor to the Princes of Conti, whom Louis XIV wished educated with the Dauphin. When this task was completed in 1680, he became tutor to the legitimized son of Louis XIV and Louise de la Vallière. When the young Count died in 1684, the King named Fleury abbot of Loc-Dieu in the Diocese of Rodez. Until 1689 he assisted Bossuet in the administration of his diocese. Then through FÉNELON he was recalled to court to be tutor of the grandsons of Louis XIV, the young dukes of Burgundy, of Anjou, and of Berry. For 16 years he held this position. In recognition of his in 1706. A quiet and holy man, averse to disputes, he held aloof from the Jansenist difficulties of Port-Royal. In the controversy between Bossuet and Fénelon over quietism, he retained the friendship of both. He was a member of the French Academy, succeeding Jean de La Bruyère in 1691. He wrote a number of educational works that connect him with the ideas of Port-Royal and of the Oratory, such as Traité du choix et de la méthode des études (Paris 1686), which was translated into Spanish, German, and Italian and reprinted eight times in Paris. His Les Moeurs des Israélites (Paris 1681) anticipated the approach of Voltaire in dealing with the manners and customs of nations and was followed by his Les moeurs des chrétiens (Paris 1681) and the Catéchisme historique (Paris 1683). Fleury's most important work was the monumental Histoire ecclésiastique (20 v. Paris 1690-1720), from Christian origins to 1414. This clearly evidenced Fleury's Gallican tendencies, and was considered a standard reference throughout the 18th century. Even more obviously Gallican was his Discours sur les libertés de l'Église gallicane (Paris 1724), written in 1690 but published posthumously.

services he was made prior of Notre-Dame d'Argenteuil

Bibliography: F. GAQUÉRE, La Vie et les oeuvres de C. Fleury (Paris 1925). C. CONSTANTIN, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 6.1:21–24. A. DODIN, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 5:412–419. J. CALVET, Catholicisme 4:1343–44.

[M. M. BARRY]

FLICHE, AUGUSTIN

University professor, historian of the Gregorian Reform; b. Montpellier, France, Nov. 19, 1884; d. there, Nov. 20, 1951. He studied in Paris, becoming a doctor of letters in 1912. He was professor of medieval history at Montpellier from 1919 to 1946 and a member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-lettres from 1941 until his death. He began his career with the publication of his dissertation Le Règne de Philippe I^{er}, roi de France, 1060–1106 (Paris 1912). Shortly afterward he centered his interest on the history of GREGORY VII and the GREGO-RIAN REFORM and produced La Polémique religieuse à l'époque de Grégoire VII (Paris 1914), Les Prégrégoriens (1916), Saint Grégoire VII (1920), and the trilogy La Réforme grégorienne (1924-27). He contributed La Chrétienté médiévale to the series Histoire du monde, edited by Cavaignac, L'Évolution de l'Europe 883 à 1125 to the Glotz series, and numerous journal articles. His greatest undertaking was the Histoire de l'Église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours, a series on the history of the Church that he planned and organized with the cooperation of Msgr. Victor MARTIN. The first volume appeared in 1934. Before his death Fliche had edited 15 volumes, written by a number of Catholic historians selected for this scholarship. Fliche lectured widely throughout Europe; his work was recognized by Pope Pius XII and several European universities.

Bibliography: C. E. PERRIN, Revue Historique 208 (1952) 382–383. J. R. PALANQUE, La Vie intellectuelle 25 (June 1953) 139–153. Études médiévales offertes à M. le doyen A. F. de l'Institut par ses amis, ses anciens élèves (Paris 1952).

[J. J. MUZAS]

FLODOARD (FRODOARD) OF REIMS

Historian; b. Epernay?, c. 894; d. Reims, March 28, 966. He was involved in the synod of Ingelheim (948) and in the episcopal disputes of his time. As canon at Reims, he had charge of the archives. He was elected bishop of Noyon-Tournai (951), but was not installed. In about 930 he wrote in epic hexameter the De triumphis Christi sanctorumque Palestinae, the De triumphis Christi Antiochae gestis, and the De triumphis Christi apud Italiam. The last of these is the most important, since it touches on contemporary events. His Annales, covering the years 919 to 966, is a basic source for the history of northern France and Germany for that period. In 946, he finished the important Historia Remensis ecclesiae (History of the Church of Reims), in four books. The Annales and Historia relate ecclesiastical reaction to contemporary events. The author often cited his sources and reproduced the documents.

Bibliography: Editions. Patrologia Latina 135; Les Annales de Flodoard, ed. P. LAUER (Paris 1905); Monumenta Germanica: Scriptores 3:363–408; poems in Patrologia Latina 135:491–886; Historia Remensis ecclesiae, ed. J. HELLER and G. WAITZ in Monumenta Germanica: Scriptores 13:405–599. Literature. H. PLATEL-LE, Catholicisme 4: 1348. T. SCHIEFFER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:169.

[B. LACROIX]

FLOOD

A cataclysmic event narrated in Gen 6:5–9:19. The account is the theological center of the GENESIS account of prehistory in chaps. 1 - 11 (see PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE). God was heartbroken because human wickedness and violence had corrupted his good creation, and He determined to destroy all created things; but after finding NOAH to be righteous, God decided to preserve Noah and his family. God then had Noah preserve specimens of all living creatures so as to be able to populate a renewed creation in a new world order. The Genesis account is a composite of ancient Israelite traditions and reflects the influence of flood stories from other Near Eastern peoples (see GILGAMESH EPIC). Several New Testament authors refer to the Genesis story in exhortations to watchfulness and to faith.

Terminology. Various Old Testament writers vividly describe both the well-known frequent flash floods and ordinary seasonal flooding using common Hebrew words, but for the Genesis flood the authors reserved the word mabbûl, using the term 12 times. Outside Genesis, the word occurs only in Ps 29:10. There YHWH is described as enthroned above the mabbûl, a reference to the waters above the dome described in Gen 1:7 (see also Gen 7:11). The Deuterocanonical book of Sirach (44:17) and the Dead Sea Scrolls' Genesis Apocryphon (12:10) refer to the Genesis flood using mabbûl. The Septuagint translators used the Greek word κατακλυσμός where the Hebrew had mabbûl, and also in Sir 40:10; 44:17-18, and 4 Macc 15:31 in references to the Genesis flood. But in other places, the translators used κατακλυσμός for ordinary generic floods (Ps 32 [31]:6; Nah 1:8; Sir 21:13; 4 Macc 15:32). In the New Testament κατακλυσμός always refers to the Genesis flood (Matt 24:38-39; Luke 17:27; 2 Pet 2:5).

Literary Character of Gen 6:5-9:19. For more than two centuries scholars have recognized the presence of distinguishable sources in the Pentateuch. In the Genesis flood account at least two distinct sources were woven together, often referred to as the YAHWIST source (Y) and the PRIESTLY source (P). The older J segments use YHWH ("Lord" or "Yahweh") as God's name and depict God in more anthropomorphic terms. For example, in 6:6, the Lord's heart grieved; in 7:16b, the Lord shut Noah and those with him in the ark, and in 8:21, the Lord smelled the pleasing aroma of Noah's sacrifice. The P source uses the common Hebrew word 'elohîm ("God") for the deity and favors genealogies, precise numbers and dates. Examples in the Flood narrative include the repeated emphasis on Noah and his sons as the ancestors of all humanity, the precise dimensions of the ark in 6:15, and the exact dates on which the flood began and ended in 7:11 and 8:13. P also favors the themes of blessing and covenant reflected in 9:3, 7 and 6:18; 9:8-17. The presence of these sources in the flood narrative becomes evident in multiple doublets and inconsistencies. In 6:22 Noah does all that "God" (P) commanded, and in 7:5 Noah does all that the "Lord" (J) commanded. In the P source, God commands Noah to preserve one malefemale pair of every living creature (6:19-20; 7:15-16). In J, the Lord calls for seven pairs of clean animals and birds, but single pairs of those that are unclean (7:2-3). In J the destruction is a consequence of rainfall (7:4,12), while in P it comes when the fountains of the great deep burst and the windows of the heavens are opened (7:11). In P the flood continues for more than a year (7:11,24; 8:3,5,13–14), while in J it is 40 days and 40 nights (7:4,6,10,12). When J elements are extracted from the account, the P components form a complete and consistent narrative. While the earlier J tradition was substantially preserved in the blending of the traditions, gaps between some components suggest that parts may have been omitted, for example, the instructions to build the ark.

The doublets and differences in the sources were skillfully woven into a unified narrative with an extended palistrophe, a narrative device that divides a story in two, so that many events and details in the first half of the account mirror or parallel details and events in the second half. The Lord's decision to destroy creation in 6:5–8 (J), announced by God to Noah in 6:11 (P) finds a parallel in the Lord's decision to never again destroy creation in 8:21-22 (J), announced to Noah in 9:8-17 (P). The names of Noah's three sons at 6:10 are repeated at 9:18-19. God's promised covenant with Noah and his family in 6:18 is fulfilled at 9:9-17. The Lord's command for Noah and the animals to enter the ark in 7:1, followed by the account of Noah and the animals entering the ark in 7:7-8 is paralleled by God's command that Noah and the animals leave the ark in 8:16-17, followed by an account of their exiting the ark in 8:18–19. The waters swell and lift the ark, covering the mountains in 7:18–20. The waters recede, the mountains appear, and the ark comes to rest in 8:3-5. Only Noah and those with him in the ark were left in 7:23, and God remembered Noah and all the wild animals and all the domestic animals that were with him in the ark in 8:1. The elaborate structure contributes to the narrative flow, with everything centered on God's remembrance of Noah in 8:1.

Significance. The main character of the composite biblical account is God. Noah, described as perfectly obedient (6:22; 7:5), does not even speak. The reason for the flood is the grief in the Lord's heart because humans' hearts were inclined continually and only toward evil (6:5-6) and because human sin had spoiled what had been God's "very good" creation (6:11-13, see Gen 1:31). After the flood, when the Lord recognizes that the flood has not changed the inclination of human hearts toward evil, He decides to never repeat the destruction (8:21). Prior to the flood, increasingly pervasive human sin brings curses upon the ground (3:17; 4:11) and the ultimate curse, the flood itself. In the renewed created order after the flood, God's new response to human sin is blessing and covenant (9:1-17). To counter violence, bloodshed, and vengeance, Noah and his offspring, acting with God's authority, are made accountable for preserving all life, animal and human. In God's new order, humanity is charged with limiting vengeance and keeping lawlessness from spoiling the new creation. The story of Noah and his sons that follows the flood account (9:18–29) illustrates this new order. God is not even present as a character. Noah, speaking for the first and only time, curses Ham and Ham's descendant Canaan for their sin. Noah blesses Shem and Japheth for their righteous behavior.

The use of the Hebrew word mabbûl in the Genesis flood account and in Ps 29:10, along with the reference to the fountains of the great deep and the windows of the heavens in 7:11 and 8:2, suggests that the P tradition understood the flood as a near return to the formless chaotic void of the P account of creation in Gen 1:2. The "wind" $(r\hat{u}ah.)$ with which God stops the flood in 8:1 is the same "wind" (rûah.) of God that hovered over the waters of the great deep in 1:2; but the renewed world after the flood populated by the people and animals God saved with Noah in the ark is far different from the ordered and sevenfold good creation of Genesis 1. The original harmony between humans and nature and among humans themselves has been altered. Now animals will fear and dread human dominion (9:2). Because the original abundance of nourishing trees and vegetation is no more, humans are permitted to kill and eat animals for food (9:3), and because the potential for murder remains, God ordains societal punishment of murderers so that desire for revenge will not again degenerate into limitless lawlessness (9:6).

This P tradition of understanding supplements and develops themes present in the earlier J tradition. In J's flood account, "rain water," was the instrument of destruction of all living things (7:4); in J's creation account, it was acknowledged as essential for life (2:5-9). Sin, initiated by the first man and woman's disobedience (3:1-7), becomes increasingly pervasive in J's accounts of Cain's murder of his brother (4:1-16), Lamech's polygamy and ruthless vengeance (4:19-24), and the use of status and power to exploit and abuse the weak and defenseless (6:1-4). Each story illustrates a growing alienation between the Lord and humanity, between human and human, and between humanity and nature. In the J account, what would seem to be advances in civilization are progressive movements away from the Lord and the Lord's intended order (4:20–22) until the Lord regrets having made anything (5:7). For J, the Lord's new direction after the flood comes when the Lord smells the pleasing odor from Noah's sacrifice (8:20-22). Sacrificial worship is the remedy for human hearts' continued inclination toward evil. Noah's sacrifice of some of every clean animal and bird explains why in J it was necessary for Noah to bring more than one pair of each clean creature onto the ark. In the J tradition, covenant and blessing come into the picture in the Lord's call to Abram in Gen 12:1-3, while for P, sacrificial worship does not come until God gives Moses instructions for the conduct of the sacrificial cult beginning at Exodus chapter 35.

In the New Testament, in Matt 24:37-39 and Luke 17:26-27, Jesus likened the coming of the kingdom of God to the coming of the flood that caught Noah's contemporaries unaware. Jesus' followers are called to constant vigilance so as to be prepared when the Son of Man appears. The author of 2 Peter includes the flood among examples of instances where God punished human sinfulness (2:4). Then in 3:3-7, the author offers the destruction by the flood as proof that the judgement is coming and will actually occur. The author of 1 Pet 3:20-21 refers to the ark, whose inhabitants were saved through water, as prefiguring baptism that saves from sin. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews presents Noah as an example of faith who, warned by God about the unforseen coming destruction, obeyed the warning, and became heir to the righteousness that comes in accord with faith (Heb 11:7).

Other Flood Traditions. While flood traditions were widespread among many ancient civilizations, three from Mesopotamia are of special interest in relation to the Genesis account: Atrahasis, Gilgamesh Tablet XI, and Ziusundra (J. B. Pritchard, ed. Ancient Near Eastern Texts, pp. 42–44, 93–97, 104–6). The accounts of the dimensions for the ark in Genesis and for the ship in the Akkadian Gilgamesh story illustrate the nature of the many parallels in the narratives. In Genesis, P describes the ark as 450 feet long, 75 feet wide, and 45 feet high (a biblical cubit = 1.5 feet). It had three decks, a pitched roof, and a door in its side (6:15–16). In Gilgamesh, the ship is a cube, 180 feet to each side. There are six decks, seven levels, and a sectioned floor plan (Ancient Near Eastern Texts p. 93).

The many such parallels in these accounts with the Genesis flood story do not suggest direct literary dependence. The manifold differences between details in these accounts and those of Genesis, especially in their depiction of the deities and their motives and their interpretation of events, make these accounts significant to understanding and interpreting the Genesis account. An example is the Genesis account of the Lord's smelling of the pleasing odor of Noah's sacrifice (8:21). In Gilgamesh, "The gods smelled the savor, The gods smelled the savor, The gods smelled the savor, The gods crowded like flies about the sacrificer" (Ancient Near Eastern Texts p. 95).

Historical and Scientific Issues. The composite character of the Biblical account and the variations in details within the Mesopotamian accounts suggest that no one of these is an account of a particular historical flood. Floods were common in ancient Mesopotamia, and occasionally devastated whole cities; but no scientific, geological, or historical evidence even suggests that at one time a single flood totally wiped out all of civilization in ancient Mesopotamia, let alone the whole world. That marine fossils are commonly found in mountainous areas throughout the world is the result of geological uplifts. Periodically, news accounts appear about wood that is claimed to be from the ark, recovered on modern Mt. Ararat in Turkey. Carbon 14 tests consistently show that the wood is from the current era, about 1600 years old. The wood is thought to come from the ruins of an ancient monastery that served as a pilgrims' hostel.

The various flood accounts from Mesopotamia suggest that experiences with devastating local floods helped human imaginations to construct accounts of an even worse flood in the distant past that did almost destroy humanity. The accounts reflect the helplessness that humans experience in the face of raging flood waters capable of devastating entire cities. The accounts similarly reflect belief that such natural phenomena were expressions of divine power and will, brought on out of spite or irritation or capriciousness. Because some humans survived each local flood, in each account some humans survive, sometimes due to chance, and other times to the intervention of a sympathetic divine power.

The ancient authors of the Genesis flood story wove their Israelite traditions around one such devastating flood to create a compelling story about their God and His relationship with humanity. The scientific or historical accuracy of the biblical narrative, measured by modern human standards, is irrelevant to the accounts' abiding theological significance.

Bibliography: W. BRUEGGEMANN, Genesis (Atlanta, 1982). A.F. CAMPBELL and M.A. O'BRIEN, Sources of the Pentateuch: Texts, Introductions, Annotations (Minneapolis, 1993). N. COHN, Noah's Flood: The Genesis Story in Western Thought (New Haven, 1996). A. DUNDES, ed., The Flood Myth. (Berkeley, 1988). W.G. LAMBERT and A.R. MILLARD, Atra-Hasīs: The Babylonian Story of the Flood (Winona Lake, IN, 1999). J. B. PRITCHARD, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton 1955). J.W. ROGER-SON, Genesis 1–11 (Sheffield, 1991). G. J. WENHAM, Genesis 1–15 (Waco, TX, 1987). C. WESTERMANN, Genesis 1–11 (Minneapolis, 1984).

[J. E. JENSEN]

FLOREFFE, MONASTERY OF

Second house of the PREMONSTRATENSIANS, Diocese of Namur, formerly Liège. It was founded and endowed by Count Gottfried of Namur in 1121–22, and has always held a place of prominence in the order; one of the provinces, the Circaria Floreffiae, was named after it. Floreffe founded seven daughterhouses, maintained 22 parishes, and had three convents under its guidance. It had its own college at Louvain. In 1560 it managed to end its previous incorporation as a benefice of the Diocese of Namur. It had 61 religious when suppressed in 1797. When an attempt to reestablish Floreffe in 1842 proved unsuccessful, the monastery was converted into a college conducted by the diocesan clergy. The 103 carved 17thcentury choirstalls are a reminder of former magnificence.

Benozzo Gozzoli, self-portrait, detail of the "Journey of the Magi" fresco in the chapel of the Medici-Riccardi Palace in Florence. Gozzoli's signature for the large fresco series is painted on the band of his headgear.

Bibliography: C. L. HUGO, S. Ordinis Praemonstratensis annales, 2 v. (Nancy 1734–36) 1:75. J. and V. BARBIER, Histoire de l'abbaye de Floreffe, 2 v. (Namur 1890–92). L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1155–56. N. BACKMUND, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 v. (Straubing 1949–56) 2:373–378. Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores (Berlin 1826–) 16:618–631.

[N. BACKMUND]

FLORENCE

City on both banks of the Arno River, in Tuscany, central Italy. It was an economic and artistic center in the late Middle Ages and Renaissance, and its dialect became the standard vernacular of Italy. Since 1420 Florence has been the capital of an archdiocese.

Medieval chroniclers report that Florentia Tuscorum was founded by Caesar (59 B.C.), and recent studies indicate that it is unlikely that modern Florence was derived from an Etruscan city. The Roman city, the focus of north-south roads at the foot of the Apennines, by A.D. 200 was a commercial center, having an aqueduct, baths, a theater, and other public monuments. It was the capital of the sixth region of DIOCLETIAN'S Diocese of Italy (Tuscany and Umbria) and c. 300 began to suffer from the economic crisis of the ROMAN EMPIRE. Heavy taxes, rural impoverishment, and a decline in trade caused politicoeconomic difficulties.

Early Christian History. Christianity came to Florence c. 200. In the small Christian community there were several martyrs under DECIUS, to one of whom, St. Miniatus, a basilica was dedicated. Felix, the first known bishop, attended the Council of Rome against the Donatists (313). St. Ambrose consecrated a basilica in Florence (394), where religious life flourished under St. Zenobius (c. 412). Bishop Podius organized pastoral care and instituted many parishes.

Stilicho and the Romans thwarted the sudden attack on Florence by the Ostrogoths under Radagaiso (405), but the city did not recover. In 541 the Byzantines defended it against Totila. Under the Lombards, who replaced the Byzantines, Florence had a duke and a royal court. The Franks placed it under a count in their reorganization. Charlemagne was in Florence for Christmas (786). LOTHAIR I in the Constitutio Olonensis (825) assigned Florence one of eight schools for students for the priesthood. The Franks fostered monasteries, which later influenced both the city and the diocese. Ottonian immunity contributed to the growth of church property, which became more and more important. Margrave Hugh of Tuscany founded many monasteries, which became centers of reform. Countess Matilda of Canossa (Tuscany), under whom the commune took form, sided with the papacy against the empire in the investiture struggle.

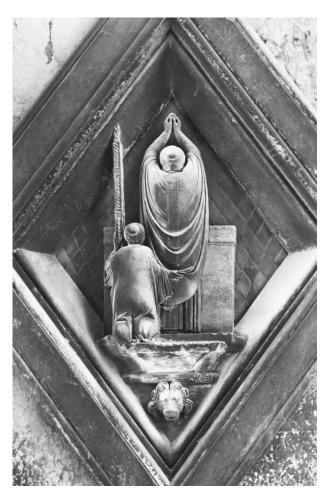

In the 10th and 11th centuries religious life flourished. St. ROMUALD and St. JOHN GUALBERT founded the first reform cenobite monasteries, especially CAMALDOLI and VALLOMBROSA. The cathedral chapter, reformed under Benedict IX (1032–45), led a life in common. The German emperor attended Pope Victor II's Council of Florence (1055), which promulgated stringent rules against simony and concubinage. Nicholas II (1058–61), the former Gerhard of Burgundy, had been bishop of Florence (1046–58). During the rise of the commune, the bishops were important in political life.

Several forms of autonomy, especially economic, developed in Florence and were defended against feudal lords who controlled the land around the city. Florence reduced them to obedience one by one and had them build houses within its walls and live there part of the year. Even the imperial envoys, associated with the feudal lords, came to terms with the commune. Against imperial rights, Florence was allied with the pope, then the strongest opponent of the emperor. When common goods had to be administered and collective rights defended, powers were delegated to a limited number of citizens (boni homines). The first consuls appeared in 1138. The first evidence of the commune in action was the war against Fiesole (1123), fought for territory, political hegemony, and diocesan boundaries. Fiesole was taken and destroyed. The commune built new walls (1172–75) and divided the city into quarters and sixths, each of which furnished representatives to the consular magistracy.

The commune developed as a federation of groups (arti). At first, there were two associations: the Society of the Torri or nobles (optimates), and the bourgeois Arte of Calimala, which headed the arte of the refining and dyeing of wool cloth, Florence's first and most important bourgeois industry. In time, divers industries and trades separated and formed independent arti, later to divide into major and minor arti. At its peak, the organization of arti clashed with and defeated the nobility, upsetting the consular constitution. A new supreme official, the podestà, was chosen first from the citizenry and then from foreigners.

Guelfs and Ghibellines. The internal antagonisms of the commune became a struggle between GUELFS and Ghibellines. After a long conflict, the Ghibellines, aided by FREDERICK II, drove the Guelfs into exile. On Frederick's death (1250), the Guelfs returned and promulgated a new constitution. A new magistracy was created beside the podestà, the capitano of the people, to look out for their interests. In 1252 Florence coined the first gold florins. Ghibellines returned with Manfred when SIENA defeated Florence at Montaperti (1260). In 1265 DANTE was born, and in 1266 the battle of Benevento marked the end of the Hohenstaufen-Church conflict and the triumph of Italian Guelfs. Florence, backed by the popes and the kings of Naples (House of Anjou), became a bulwark of Guelfism.

At Colle in 1267 Florence avenged the defeat at Montaperti, and at Campaldino in 1289 it fixed its hegemony over Ghibelline Arezzo. Cardinal Latino negotiated a peace (1279) that sought to end party rivalries and smooth the way to a new form of government, the primate of the arti. The major arti first had access to government, and then the minor arti (corporative trade groups of the popolo minuto), sanctioned by Giano della Bella's Ordinamenti di giustizia (1293). In 1300 Guelfs split into Blacks and Whites over how Guelfism should be expressed (Blacks intransigent, Whites somewhat moderate) and over independence of the Angevins and the popes. Whites first held a series of priorships, to one of which Dante belonged; but in 1301 the Blacks seized power with the support of Boniface VIII and banished White leaders. Dante died in exile in Ravenna (1321). The hopes of the Whites for a political revolution caused by the arrival of Emperor HENRY VII in Italy were ended with his death in 1313. Florence had recourse to Charles of Calabria, king of Sicily, for aid against Castruccio Castracani of Lucca, who defeated Florence in 1325. The deaths of Castruccio and Charles of Valois in 1328 freed Florence from an Italian threat and a foreign enemy.

"The Eucharist," one of the reliefs of the Sacraments by the Tuscan sculptor Andrea Pisano (1290?–1348) on the Campanile of the cathedral at Florence. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

After winning territory from nearby Pistoia, Arezzo, Cortona, and Siena, Florence was defeated by Pisa in a contest over the possession of Lucca; and the great banking houses of Peruzzi and Bardi failed. Walter of Brienne, Duke of Athens, accepted rule of the city but was expelled in 1343 after a year of misrule. The war of the "Eight Saints" (1375) was fought against the papal legate William of Noellet (d. 1394), who attempted to take Florence. Afterward party conflict raged stronger in the city. In 1378 the proletariat of workers (Ciompi), excluded from corporative rights and rule, seized power, making Michele di Lando gonfalonier. Democratic rule lasted to 1382, when the oligarchy was restored under Maso degli Albizi. Capture of Pisa (1406) and Leghorn (1421) gave Florence access to the sea.

Skyline of Florence, with the dome of the Cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore (the Duomo) visible at right, and the tower of the Palazzo Vecchio at far left. (©Michael Lewis/CORBIS)

The Medici. The rule of the Albizi lasted until Cosimo de' Medici, a shrewd politician and rich merchant, replaced it (1434), founding a dynasty that reached its peak under his grandson, Lorenzo the Magnificent (1469–92). The aspirations of the oligarchs out of power exploded in the PAZZI plot, to which Lorenzo's brother Giuliano fell victim; but Lorenzo survived to consolidate his hold on the city. Not only did he rule well, assuring external peace with painstaking alliances, but he fostered internal growth; under him Florence attained its economic, artistic, and intellectual peak in the Renaissance. He was surrounded with humanist genius: Poliziano PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, Marsilio FICINO, the Camaldolese theologian and humanist Ambrogio Traversari (1386–1439), and others. In his Biblioteca Laurenziana he collected codices of Greek and Latin classics. Great artists worked for him; Michelangelo was raised in his house. At the time of his death, Girolamo SAVONAROLA was denouncing the corruption of morals in the new age. Savonarola obtained the expulsion of Piero, Lorenzo's son, who ceded Florentine land to Charles VIII of France, and he established a Christian republic that was intended to be the center of a disciplinary reform of the Church. The oligarchy reacted, however, and the friar's dream vanished with him on his pyre (1498).

After being briefly out of power, the Medici returned in 1512, protected by two Medici popes, Leo X and Clement VII. In 1530 the republic came to an end following a siege by Emperor CHARLES V. Duke Alessandro (1510–37), who belonged to a collateral branch of the Medici, became lord of Florence. During the ensuing principate, Florence's history was regional rather than municipal. The ducal dynasty died out in 1737 and was replaced by Francis II of Lorraine. Except for the Napoleonic period (1801–14), the Lorraine dynasty ruled until 1859, when Leopold II (d. 1870) left after a plebescite voted annexation to the kingdom of Italy, of which Florence was the capital (1865–70).

Façade of the Pazzi Chapel, designed by Filippo Brunelleschi, located in the cloister of the church of Santa Croce. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY)

Religious life flourished from the 12th century onward. The faith inspired Florence's greatest creations. They included Dante's Divine Comedy and the Cathedral of S. Maria del Fiore, consecrated by Eugene IV (1430). The convents of S. Maria Novella, S. Spirito, S. Croce, and the Charterhouse were founded. A number of medieval saints claimed Florence as their native city: the recluse St. Verdiana (1182?-1242?), St. Julia of Certaldo, Bl. Joan of Signa, Bl. Umiliana de' Cerchi, and Bl. Villana De Botti (1332–60). The Servites (Servants of Mary) were founded in Florence by the seven saints (1233–49). The 17th ecumenical council, transferred from Basel to Ferrara, met in Florence (1439-43). St. ANTONINUS PIEROZZI, OP, founder of the Convent of San Marco, where Fra ANGELICO worked, was a virtuous and strong archbishop (1446-59). The reform of morals and of the Church that emanated from San Marco had its most fervent apostle in Savonarola, leader of Florence's late fifteenth-century spiritual Republic. In the 17th century Florence produced new saints: CATHERINE OF RICCI, Mary Magdalene de' PAZZI, and Hippolytus Galantini (founder of a congregation of lay catechists). Archbishop della Gherardesca founded the major seminary (1712). Under Cardinal Elia Dalla Costa (1932–61), who founded the minor seminary (1937), were held the Etruscan Council (1934) and two diocesan synods. The University of Florence (1348) moved to Pisa (1472); it was reconstituted in 1923, and is one of the largest in Italy.

CATHARI were prevalent in the 13th century and had a bishop in Florence; PATARINES were condemned by a diocesan synod (1327). Protestantism had almost no influence in the diocese, though PETER MARTYR Vermigli was born there. The Jansenist tendencies of Bp. Scipione de' Ricci of Pistoia did not affect the people of the city.

Bibliography: G. LAMI, S. Ecclesiae Florentinae monumenta, 4 v. (Florence 1758). R. GALLUZZI, Storia del Granducato di Toscana sotto il governo di casa Medici, 9 v. (Florence 1781). F. SCHEVILL, Medieval and Renaissance Florence, 2 v. (New York 1963). A. PANELLLA, Storia di Firenze (Florence 1949). R. DAVID-SOHN, Storia di Firenze, 5 v. (Florence 1956–62), tr. of the German (Berlin 1896–1927). M. LOPES PEGNA, Firenze dalle origini al Medioevo (Florence 1962). Annuario dell' Arcidiocesi di Firenze, 1965. Annuario Pontificio (Rome 1912–) (1964) 152. G. BRUCKER, Renaissance Florence (New York 1969). E. COCHRANE, Florence in the Forgotten Centuries 1527–1800 (Chicago 1973). R. GOLDTHWAITE The Building of Renaissance Florence (Baltimore 1980). R. TURNER, The Renaissance in Florence (London 1997).

[E. SCOZZAFAVA]

FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF

By the bulls Doctoris gentium of Sept. 18 and Pridem ex iustis of Dec. 30, 1437, Pope EUGENE IV transferred the Council of BASEL to Ferrara. There it opened on Jan. 8, 1438, under the presidency of Cardinal ALBER-GATI. Eugene arrived on January 24. The first sessions were occupied in asserting the canonical validity of the council, in declaring null the sanctions voted in Basel against it, and in imposing penalties on opponents. For voting the council was divided into three estates: prelates, abbots and religious, and lower church dignitaries—the consent of two-thirds of each estate being needed for a conciliar decision.

At Ferrara. The Greeks arrived in Venice on February 8 and in Ferrara, March 4-7: the emperor John VIII Palaeologus and his brother Demetrius; the patriarch of Constantinople, Joseph II; with Gregory, the emperor's confessor, 20 metropolitans (five of whom acted also as procurators of the patriarchates of ALEXANDRIA, ANTI-OCH, and JERUSALEM); deacons, monks, and courtiers. There were in all about 700. All their expenses in coming, returning, and maintaining themselves in Italy were to be paid by the pope. At the solemn inauguration on April 9, besides the Greeks, there were 118 Latin prelates. John VIII, however, had requested a delay of four months before any doctrinal discussion, to allow the Western secular powers time to send representatives, since from them he wanted military help for CONSTANTINOPLE, which was threatened by the Turks. To satisfy Latin impatience, in June discussions about PURGATORY were instituted between two committees of ten. The Latins proposed a purgation of punishment by fire; the Greeks, accepting the possibility of relief for the departed, denied fire and asserted that souls await the Last Judgment before entering on their final state. No agreement had been reached when the plague descended on Ferrara. Isidore, Metropolitan of Kiev and All Russia, arrived during this time (August 1438).

The council proper began on October 8. Cardinal BESSARION of Nicaea (one of the six spokesmen of the Greeks) gave an opening address and then Mark EU-GENICUS, Metropolitan of Ephesus, introduced the subject chosen by the Greeks: the legitimacy of the addition by the Latins of the words FILIOQUE to the NICENE CREED. In 13 sessions, from October 8 to December 13, the Greeks contended that any addition to the creed, even of a word or syllable, even if true, had been forbidden by the Council of EPHESUS (431). Bessarion spoke in two sessions and Mark Eugenicus in all the rest. The Latins interpreted the prohibition of Ephesus as referring to the faith expressed by the creed, not to the formula of expression. Of the six appointed Latin orators, Andrew of Rhodes, OP; Aloysius of Forli, OFM; and especially Cardinal CESARINI were the principal speakers. No agreement was reached. Instead the Greeks, weary, nostalgic, and discouraged, wanted to go home. Eugene, in financial straits, was in arrears in his payments to them and was threatened by Milanese troops. He persuaded the Greek delegation to go to Florence (Jan. 10, 1439) and to discuss the doctrine of the Filioque.

At Florence. After a preliminary meeting of two committees of 40 on February 26, there were eight sessions between March 2 and 24. The Latins contended that within the Blessed Trinity the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and from the Son (ex Patre Filioque); the Greeks, that He proceeds from the Father only. John of Montenero was the sole speaker for the Latins; Mark Eugenicus, for the Greeks. Five sessions were spent largely in discussing which side had the more accurate texts of a few passages from the Fathers, especially from Basil's Adversus Eunomium. In the sixth, Mark quoted the Scriptures, the councils, and the Fathers as all supporting the Greek position. In the seventh and eighth, Montenero used the same sources in favor of the Latin doctrine. The result was a stalemate.

During the following two months in an atmosphere of frustration and pessimism, the Latins urged more sessions; the Greeks, weary of discussion, demanded another road to union, otherwise they would go home (April 11). Meetings of committees bore no fruit. The Latins presented an accurate statement of doctrine (cedula); the Greeks amended it into ambiguity. Urged to clarify their reply, they again refused and threatened to depart (May 21). As a last resort Eugene addressed the council on May 27, congratulating, encouraging, chiding, and exhorting. His words gave a new impulse to the efforts for union.

The Greek prelates believed that every saint, precisely as a saint, was inspired by the Holy Spirit and therefore could not err in faith. If they expressed themselves differently, their meanings must substantially agree. At this stage of the council this axiom was pressed by those Greeks who favored union. Latin saints stated that the Holy Spirit "proceeds from Father and Son"; Greek saints (as abundantly quoted by Montenero, Bessarion, and others) variously wrote "comes forth from," "issues from," "springs from," "the Father," "the Father and the Son," "from Both," "from the Father through the Son." The patriarch TARASIUS had said: "proceeds from the Father through the Son." Once the Greeks accepted that the Latin Fathers had really written Filioque (they could not understand Latin), the issue was settled (May 29). The Greek Fathers necessarily meant the same; the faiths of the two Churches were identical; union was not only possible but obligatory (June 3); and on June 8 the Latin cedula on the Procession was accepted by the Greek synod. On June 10 Joseph II died and was buried in the church of S. Maria Novella.

During the next six weeks the Latins gave the Greeks cedulae on the primacy (see PRIMACY OF THE POPE) and the Eucharist (which were explained in two sessions, June 16, 18), and on purgatory. There were difficulties and tensions and concessions on both sides before agreement was reached. More friction arose over the wording of the decree, composed of the cedulae previously agreed on, to which an introduction and conclusion were added. The resulting Laetentur caeli was promulgated in solemn session, July 6, 1439, signed by Eugene and 116 Latins and by the emperor with 32 Greeks, four of whom acted as proxies of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. Both groups agreed that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son as from one principle and spiration, the Latin "from" and the Greek "through" being equivalent and causal. In the Eucharist, rites in fermented and unfermented bread are both valid. After death some souls are purified by purgatorial punishments; others immediately receive their eternal destiny in hell or, with different degrees of beatitude, in heaven. The pope is the successor of St. Peter, head and teacher of the whole Church, and successor to the plenitude of power given by Christ to St. Peter; the usual precedence of the patriarchates is included.

As the Greeks departed, two representatives of the Armenians arrived from Caffa (August 13). In the bull Moyses vir Dei (September 4), Eugene challenged the ecumenicity of the Council of CONSTANCE when it decreed conciliar supremacy (see CONCILIARISM [HISTORY OF]) and condemned Basel for daring to "depose" him. Union with the Armenians was promulgated on Nov. 22, 1439, in Exultate Deo (the Decree for ARMENIANS). On Feb. 4, 1440, by Cantate Domino, union was established with the Coptic Church of Egypt and, after the council went to the Lateran in Rome (Sept. 24, 1443), unions were concluded with certain Syrians (April 30, 1444) and with Chaldeans and Maronites of Cyprus (Aug. 7, 1445). When the council ended is not certain, for no document of closure is extant. In the meantime, to fulfill the obligation undertaken in Florence, Eugene had raised a crusade to drive the Turks from Europe. Only Poland and Hungary by land and Burgundy and Venice with the papal ships by sea took part. At Varna (Nov. 10, 1444) the Christian army was defeated, and Cesarini and King Ladislas of Poland-Hungary were killed. A powerful argument for union, namely, aid for Constantinople, thereby lost all its force.

Conclusion. The union with the Greeks did not last long. Mark Eugenicus, its one consistent Greek opponent, found ready support in the ill-educated monks and populace of Constantinople, and the majority of the bishops, themselves with little theological formation, yielded to popular pressure. All the intellectuals remained constant—Mark, against union; and for union, Bessarion, Isidore, Dorotheus of Mitylene, Metrophanes (successor of Joseph II) with at least five others (of the 18 episcopal Greek signatories), and Patriarch GREGORY III, successor of Metrophanes.

The reason commonly given for the general defection is that the union was never genuine, and was signed under duress. That some of the Greeks suffered hardship from the pope's inability to pay them punctually, and that their prolonged stay in Italy and ill success in convincing the Latins in argument distressed and depressed them is clear. The Greeks also desired to obtain help for their homeland. But that these influences did not amount to duress is shown by the events themselves. After the unsuccessful sessions in Ferrara the Greeks were prepared to return home. Also, after the sessions in Florence they twice gave the pope an ultimatum. In neither case, however, was there the slightest sign of their being cowed by want or oppressed by the plight of their country; on the contrary, they resisted Latin pressure obstinately. Similarly, it is said that the emperor, determined on union for his own ends, allowed no freedom of speech. In the sessions Greeks spoke as frequently as Latins and in all the sessions but 2, i.e., in 19 out of 21 (or, including the deliberations on purgatory, in all but 3, i.e., in 23 out of 26) the Greek spokesman, Mark Eugenicus, was the sole constant opponent of union, and that with the emperor's consent. Besides, Mark (as he himself later testified) always spoke freely in the Greek private meetings, did not sign the decree, and was taken back to Constantinople in the imperial ship. It must be concluded, therefore, that the Greeks in Italy, though suffering certain disabilities, retained freedom of action and expression; that in Florence all who signed the decree did so freely, though in some cases influenced more by example than by conviction; and that in Constantinople they again followed the prevailing example and recanted. Consequently, in Constantinople itself there was sharp division. The emperor, though himself faithful to the union, did little to impose it. It was not officially promulgated till Dec. 12, 1452, by Isidore of Kiev as papal legate, under the shadow of Turkish attack. Mahomet captured Constantinople on May 29, 1453, and the union there ended. Elsewhere the unions continued until Turkish arms prevailed.

Effects. Laetentur caeli is an infallible document, the only one of the council. The union it expressed in Florence was real and, in a sense, model. It defined that the Latin faith and the traditional Greek faith were identical and allowed difference in their expression. It did not impose on the Greeks the addition of the Filioque to the creed; it approved difference in Eucharistic rite. Thus it established the sound principle of any union, identity of faith with liberty in rite, that has since been followed by the Ukrainians, the Rumanians, and many others. As regards the primacy, though the definition and the previous explanation of it were more general, the Greeks probably regarded it as a canonical, not a theological, question. A more important effect of the council was perhaps the check it gave to conciliarism. The Councils of Constance and Basel had tended to alter the traditional constitution of the Church by making councils, nearly always in session, into the supreme authority of the Church, with power in the hands of the lower clergy. The fact of union and the definition of the primacy in Florence, together with the intense antipapalism of Basel, though it did not kill conciliarism, certainly rendered it largely harmless. Further, the council stimulated interest in the Christians of Abyssinia and India, occasioning the voyages of discovery that ended by opening China in the East and America in the West.

Bibliography: Sources. Concilium Florentinum: Documenta et scriptores (Rome 1940-), esp. v. 5 Acta graeca, ed. J. GILL and v. 6 Acta latina, ed. G. HOFMANN. E. CECCONI, Studi storici sul Concilio di Firenze (Florence 1869). S. SYROPULOS, Aπομνημονε ύματα, ed. and tr. R. CREYGHTON as Vera historia unionis non verae (The Hague 1660). Literature. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907-38) v. 7. J. GILL, The Council of Florence (Cambridge, Eng. 1959); Eugenius IV: Pope of Christian Union (Westminster, Md. 1961); Personalities of the Council of Florence (New York 1964). T. FERGUSON, "The Council of Ferrara-Florence and Its Continued Historical Significance," Saint Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 43:1 (1999) 55-77. G. E. DEMA-COPOULOS, "The Popular Reception of the Council of Florence in Constantinople 1439-1453," Saint Vladimir's Theological Quarterly 43:1 (1999) 37-53. G. ALBERIGO, ed., Christian Unity: The Council of Ferrara-Florence 1438/39-1989 (Louvain 1991).

[J. GILL]

FLORENCE OF WORCESTER

Benedictine chronicler and monk of Worcester Priory; d. July 7, 1118. The Chronicon ex chronicis attributed to him is one of the earliest Latin world chronicles to be compiled in England after BEDE. Up to 1073 it is principally an enlargement of the annals of MARIANUS SCOTUS, taking over his chronology and making use of other sources including the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Asser's Life of Alfred, and Coleman's Life of Wulfstan. From 1082 it is an important independent source, though it also includes extracts from the works of EADMER and other contemporary historians. The exact nature of the author's contacts with WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY and ORDERICUS VITALIS has still to be established. The chronicle became a standard source for later medieval historians. Though the work was undertaken at the instigation of WULFSTAN, Bishop of Worcester (d. 1095), there is evidence that it was still in its early stages in 1103. Florence appears to have collected materials and may have written the entries up to 1110 or 1113 at the latest. It is, however, just possible that the whole chronicle in its present form is the work of John of Worcester, who certainly compiled the continuation from slightly before the death of Florence until 1140.

Bibliography: Chronicon ex chronicis, ed. W. HOWARD (London 1592), complete; ed. B. THORPE, 2 v. (London 1848–49); tr. T. FORESTER (London 1854). The Chronicle of John of Worcester, 1118–40, ed. J. K. H. WEAVER (Oxford 1908). The Vita Wulfstani of William of Malmesbury, ed. R. R. DARLINGTON (Camden 3d ser. 40; London 1928) xv–xviii. R. R. DARLINGTON, Anglo-Norman Historians (London 1947). V. H. GALBRAITH, Historical Research in Medieval England (London 1951) 19–22. A. D. VON DEN BRINCKEN, Studien zur lateinischen Weltchronistik bis in das Zeitalter Ottos von Freising (Düsseldorf 1957) 173–181.

[M. M. CHIBNALL]

FLORENSKIĬ, PAVEL ALEKSANDROVICH

Russian philosopher, theologian, and scientist; b. Tiflis, 1882; place and date of death unknown. After studying mathematics and philosophy at the University of Moscow, he declined an offer to teach mathematics there. Instead he studied at the Moscow Theology Academy, taught philosophy and history there from 1908, and was ordained an Orthodox priest (1911). Florenskiĭ impressed contemporaries as a mathematician, physicist, philosopher, theologian, poet, historian, musician, archeologist, astronomer, engineer, polyglot, and mystic. Most of his writings could not be published because of the closing of the theological academies after 1917; but his dissertation, The Pillar and Foundation of Truth: An Essay on Orthodox Theodicy in Twelve Chapters, was printed in 1914 and attracted wide attention. After the revolution Florenskiĭ accepted a post in the main office of the electrical industry. In 1927 he invented a noncoagulating machine oil called dekanite. Also he wrote a standard textbook on dielectrics. His refusal to renounce Holy Orders caused his imprisonment several times. Because of his scientific reputation he dared in 1929 to address a meeting of engineers in Leningrad dressed in cassock and priest's cap. This act greatly displeased the Communists. In 1935 Florenskiĭ was sentenced to ten years in a concentration camp. Rumors of his death reached Sergeĭ BULGAKOV in 1943 and were heard by Russian refugees in 1946, but they were never verified.

In his metaphysics and in his theology of the Trinity Florenskiĭ applied the notion of consubstantiality. He divided all philosophical systems into rationalistic (homoiousian) and Christian (homoousian). The former, he believed, recognized generic likeness only, whereas the latter admitted consubstantiality, since it is the philosophy of ideas and of reason, the philosophy of personality and creative achievement. Florenskii's repetition of the doctrine of KHOMIAIAKOV on SOBORNOST (togetherness) as the principle of Church organization evoked sharp criticism from BERDIAEV. Florenskii's natural theology was based on living religious experience as the sole method of knowing dogmas "in a personal encounter with God." Following SOLOV'EV he defined "Sophia" (Wisdom) as a precosmic hypostatic concentration of divine prototypes. Thus in his outlook the cosmos, purified in Christ, becomes with Sophia a part of the Absolute merging in a total unity. Without the metaphysics of the Incarnation, however, the connection between the "two worlds" remains obscure and the concept of Sophia can result only in a philosophical incompleteness.

Bibliography: B. SCHULTZE, Russische Denker (Vienna 1950). N. O. LOSSKIÍ, History of Russian Philosophy (New York 1951). V. V. ZEN'KOVSKIĬ, History of Russian Philosophy, tr. G. L. KLINE, 2 v. (New York 1953).

[J. PAPIN]

FLORENTINA, ST.

Virgin; fl. in or near Seville, c. 600. She and (St.) Fulgentius (of Écija) were born between their Greeknamed brothers (SS.) LEANDER and ISIDORE, both of whom became bishops of SEVILLE. Leander, who seems to have endowed Florentina (Florence) with a convent, wrote for her and her community the De institutione virginum et contemptu mundi, known in manuscripts from Betica (ninth century), San Millan (11th), SILOS (11th), and MONTE CASSINO (13th). The work exalts consecrated virginity and offers a "rule" of 31 chapters for virgins in monasteries. Isidore dedicated his De fide catholica contra Judaeos to Florentina. Her relics, discovered with those of Fulgentius near Guadalupe (c. 1330), were shared between the ESCORIAL and Murcia (1593). The cult of Florentina, patroness of Plasencia, dates from the 15th century.

Feast: June 20.

Bibliography: A. C. VEGA, S. Leandri Hispalensis De institutione virginum et contemptu mundi (Escorial 1948), originally pub. in La Ciudad de Dios 159 (1947) 357–394. J. MADOZ, Analecta Bollandiana 67:407–424. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:1349. A. M.. ZIM-MERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:340–341.

[E. P. COLBERT]

FLORENTINI, THEODOSIUS

Swiss Catholic leader in educational, charitable, and social work, founder of two religious congregations; b. Münster, Graubünden canton, Switzerland, May 23, 1808; d. Heiden, Appenzell canton, Feb. 15, 1865. He joined the Capuchins (1825) and was ordained (1830). After teaching theology in the Capuchin house of studies in Baden, Switzerland, he became superior there (1838). Government suppression of religious houses caused him to flee to Alsace (1841). Upon his return he became active in the renewal of Swiss Catholic life, mainly in the fields of education and charitable works. To effectuate his plans Florentini founded the Teaching Sisters of the Holy Cross (1844) and the Sisters of Mercy of the HOLY CROSS (1856). By 1865 these two congregations had 441 members. For the former group Florentini drew up a plan of elementary education. In 1856 he reopened the former Jesuit college in Schwyz and developed for it a program of humanistic studies and industrial training.

Florentini believed that a solution of the labor problem was among the most urgent needs of his time, and he developed a social theology as well as an active reform program. He advocated model factories, to be established and even managed by religious orders as examples of shops run according to the principles of justice and charity. Some factories were opened at Florentini's instigation. In them he tried to bring about a "better distribution of revenue between dead money and working energy." In each new attempt he utilized lessons learned from previous failures. Florentini's most important enterprise was the cloth factory that he took over in 1860 in Oberleutensdorf, Bohemia, then part of Austria-Hungary. The higher clergy and nobles were well-disposed toward the project, which anticipated later developments in enlightened social management but which proved economically unprofitable.

When Florentini became vicar-general of the Diocese of Chur in 1860, he undertook new pastoral projects and helped inaugurate the Swiss bishops' conferences. He was also a noted preacher and author of many popular spiritual works. His unselfish labors won him the esteem of both Catholics and non-Catholics.

Bibliography: V. GADIENT, Der Caritasapostel Theodosius Florentini (2d ed. Lucerne 1946). A. BÜNTER, Die industriellen Unternehmungen von P. Theodosius Florentini (Freiburg 1962). B. VON MEHR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 4:170.

[A. BÜNTER]

FLORENTIUS, RADEWIJNS

Cofounder with Gerard GROOTE of the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE; b. Leerdam, Holland, c. 1350; d. Deventer, March 24, 1400. Returning as a master of arts from the university in Prague, he heard a sermon by Groote, became his disciple, and at his insistence proceeded to ordination. In Deventer, center of the so-called DEVOTIO MODERNA, he joined Groote in his apostolate among poor clerical scholars. Gathering a number of these together as the Brethren of the Common Life, he thus fulfilled the desire of Groote to found such a community. In 1386 Windesheim became the center of the brotherhood, and other foundations soon followed. THOMAS À KEMPIS lived under Radewijns' care at Deventer for seven years and, when he came to write his master's biography, depicted Radewijns as one who drew others to Christ not by subtle argument, but by the humility of his way of life.

Bibliography: T. À KEMPIS, "The Life of Florentius," The Founders of the New Devotion, tr. J. P. ARTHUR (St. Louis 1905) 81–162. T. P. VON ZIJL, Gerard Groote, Ascetic and Reformer, 1340–1384 (Washington 1963). F. VANDENBROUCKE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 8:964–965.

[M. S. CONLAN]

FLORES GARCÍA, MARGARITO, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. Feb. 22, 1899, Taxco, Guerrero, Diocese of Chilapa, Mexico; d. Nov. 12, 1927, Tulimán, between Chilapa and Chilpancingo. From the age of 12, Margarito dedicated himself to God's service, while working in the fields to help support his poverty-stricken family. He entered the seminary at Chilapa and was ordained priest (1924). Soon thereafter he was appointed professor in the seminary. He took refuge in Mexico City during the persecution and attended the academy of San Carlos. After he was arrested, then released there, he decided to return to Chilapa, where the vicar general had named him pastor of the parish at Atenango del Rio, Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FLORES VARELA, JOSÉ (JOSEPH) ISABEL, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. Nov. 20, 1866, Santa María de La Paz, San Juan Bautista de Teúl, Zacatecas, Archdiocese of Guadalajara, Mexico; d. June 21, 1927, Zapotlanejo's cemetery, Jalisco, Archdiocese of Guadalajara. Flores was among the most distinguished graduates of the seminary of Guadalajara. After his ordination (1896) he worked in various parishes (Teocaltiche, Zapotlanejo, Tonalá, and Matatlán), where he promoted First Friday devotions and founded Marian associations. A long-time friend denounced him before the municipal authorities at the outbreak of the revolution. He was captured en route to a ranch to celebrate Mass, imprisoned for three days, and offered his freedom in exchange for allegiance to Plutarco Elías Calles. Upon his refusal, he was beheaded. Fr. Flores was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA, MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979). V. GARCÍA JUÁREZ, Los cristeros (Fresnillo, Zac. 1990).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

FLÓREZ, ENRIQUE

Scholar; b. Villadiego (Burgos), July 21, 1702; d. Madrid, May 5, 1773. An Augustinian since 1718, he had moderate success as a theologian in Alcalá (Theologia, 5 v., 1732–38), but the chief result of the regime of study and seclusion he followed for the last 40 years of his life was the first 29 volumes of the España sagrada (1747–75), still in publication. In this gigantic task of putting order into Spanish history, diocese by diocese, he received the generous help of many other Spanish scholars, a subsidy from Ferdinand VI, and ecclesiastical privileges from Benedict XIV. The work is still valuable for the many sources edited therein and today is itself the object of historical study. Flórez's Clave historical (1743; 18th ed. 1854) is a handbook of European history. His Memorias de las reinas católicas (1761, 1945) is a scholarly work. In 1765 he published the Viage santo of Ambrosio de Morales (d. 1591), whose work he had inherited at Alcalá. The Medallas (3 v., 1757–73) is a study of Hispano–Roman and Visigothic coins. His edition of the Commentary on the Apocalypse by BEATUS OF LIÉBANA (1770) was the only one in print until 1930. His fervent and purposeful scholarship was not entirely without fault. Flórez's voluminous correspondence is scattered.

Bibliography: F. MÉNDEZ, Noticias sobre la vida, escritos y viajes del... Flórez (2d ed. Madrid 1860); Indice-catálogo de la biblioteca del padre E. Flórez, ed. A. C. VEGA (Madrid 1952). Enciclopedia universal illustrada Europeo-Americana, 70 v. (Barcelona 1908–30; suppl. 1934–) 24:150–152. B. SÁNCHEZ ALONSO, Historia de la historiografía española, 3 v. (Madrid 1941–50) v.3. M. VALLEJO GIRVES, "Enrique Florez y sus contemporaneos ante la Intervencion de Gregorio Magno en obispados de la Espana bizantina," Hispanica Sacra 49 (1997) 655–673.

[E. P. COLBERT]

FLORIANS (FLORIACENSES)

Italian monastic congregation. JOACHIM DA FIORE, the great Calabrian "prophet" and mystic was the abbot of the Cistercian Corazzo, but in pursuit of a stricter life he founded, in 1189, S. Giovanni in Fiore, a new abbey in a remote wilderness of Calabria. In his concept monks, detached from worldly cares and dedicated to contemplation in severe penances, were to herald the third and final phase of salvation, the kingdom of the Holy Spirit. The legal framework of the new organization was similar to that of the Cistercians, but the discipline and spirituality anticipated those of the Franciscans. In 1196 Celestine III approved the new congregation, which spread quickly throughout Italy, numbering in the middle of the 13th century about 40 houses. By the end of the 15th century, however, most houses had become depopulated and impoverished. In 1505 the Abbey of Fiore returned to the fold of the Cistercians and other communities were eventually absorbed by the Carthusians or Dominicans. In the 17th century the abbeys that had rejoined Cîteaux became members of the Cistercian Congregation of Calabria, ending the independent life of Florians.

Bibliography: F. RUSSO, Gioacchino da Fiore e le fondazioni florensi in Calabria (Naples 1959). G. PENCO, Storia del monachesimo in Italia (Rome 1961).

[L. J. LEKAI]

Archdiocese/Diocese	Year Created
Archdiocese of Miami	1968
Diocese of Orlando	1968
Diocese of Palm Beach	1984
Diocese of Pensacola-Tennessee	1975
Diocese of St. Augustine	1870
Diocese of Saint Petersburg	1968
Diocese of Venice	1984

FLORIDA, CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Admitted (1845) to the Union as the 27th state, Florida is a peninsula between the Atlantic Ocean on the east and the Gulf of Mexico on the west. It is bounded on the north by Georgia and Alabama. The capital is Tallahassee. Miami is the largest city. In addition to the Metropolitan See of Miami there are six dioceses in the state (Orlando, Palm Beach, Pensacola-Tallahassee, St. Augustine, St. Petersburg, and Venice) which together form the ecclesiastical Province of Miami.

The tribes who inhabited Florida before the coming of Europeans hunted animals and gathered roots and shellfish. They lived along the extensive coastline and waterways, using the dugout canoe, and moved continually according to food supply. These natives were known as the Apalachees (in the Panhandle), Timucuas (north central), Tequestas, and Calusas (both in south Florida). As Europeans arrived, the Seminoles rebelled and were defeated. Most were forcibly removed to Oklahoma, but small bands fled to the Everglades and the Lake Okeechobee area to live on reservations.

The first recorded European in Florida was the Spaniard Juan Ponce de León. In 1513 he landed on Florida's northern Atlantic coast during the Easter season and named the newly discovered land Pascua Florida. Subsequently, Flordia's history falls into three distinct time periods. The Colonial period, beginning in 1565, was dominated by the Spanish, and lasted about 200 years. During this period, for a brief time between 1763 and 1821, Spain ceded the territory to Britain. Later, Florida came under American control.

The Colonial Period. In 1549 the Dominican Luis Cancer made the first real attempt to evangelize Florida. He encountered the native Tocabaga near Tampa Bay, a people who disliked the Spanish because of previous unsavory encounters with them. The Tocabaga bludgeoned Cancer to death, and he became the first in a series of martyr missionaries in colonial North America.

On Sept. 8, 1565, Pedro Menéndez de Avilés founded St. Augustine, the first permanent European settlement in what would become the United States. Menéndez's 1,000 colonists included four diocesan priests, who founded America's first parish (San Agustín) and its first mission to the Native Americans (Nombre de Dios). In 1566 Menéndez enlisted Jesuits to evangelize Florida's natives—three came. Pedro Martínez, S.J., was martyred by aborigines near the mouth of the St. John's River. Francisco Villareal, S.J., established a mission on the shores of Biscayne Bay (Miami), while Juan Rogel, S.J., founded San Antonio de Padua Parish (near Ft. Myers Beach) among the Calusa in March 1567. However, various unfavorable conditions forced the Jesuits to leave Florida by mid-1569.

Sacred Heart Catholic Church, Tampa, Florida. (©Tony Aruza/CORBIS)

The Franciscans arrived in 1573 to take up the missionary enterprise. By 1595 they claimed 1,500 converts among the Timucuans of Northeast Florida and the Guale of coastal Georgia and South Carolina. Headquartered at their St. Augustine convent which was constructed in 1605, the Franciscans created a separate province, Santa Elena, for the Florida missions in 1612. That same year, Francisco de Pareda, O.F.M., published a catechism and confessional guide in Spanish and Timucuan. The friars' linguistic studies led them to produce catechetical and devotional works, as well as dictionaries and grammars in native languages. By 1675 the Franciscan missions reached their apex with about 75 friars serving in 38 missions (doctrinas), which extended as far north as the South Carolina coast, as far south as modern-day Ocala, and as far west as present-day Mariana, and included about 30,000 baptized natives from four major tribal groups.

In Florida, Native Americans lived a sedentary village-based lifestyle when the Spanish arrived. Following the previously established model of reducción first implemented in Mexico, the friars created separate autonomous native Christian enclaves, largely segregated from what was considered the corrupting contact with Spaniards. Besides evangelization and pastoral care, the friars were engaged in teaching European arts and crafts, as well as improving agricultural techniques. The Apalachee were so successful as agriculturalists that they not only fed Spanish Florida, but also exported foodstuffs to Cuba.

After 1675, the Florida missions declined. The native population decreased due to 17 major epidemics between 1513 and 1675. Moreover, fewer friars were sent to Florida and those who did come were less capable than the first. The Florida missions came to an end as a result of Queen Anne's War (1702–1708). Governor James Moore of Carolina, with a force of approximately 500 English colonists and 1,000 Creeks, systematically destroyed them all. Consequently, about 10,000 to 12,000 Christian natives were carried off to South Carolina as slaves. Others escaped to neighboring tribes, while nearly 3,000 were killed and about 300 found refuge in St. Augustine.

While the Franciscans ministered to the natives, diocesan priests maintained pastoral care of the colonists and soldiers at St. Augustine (1565) and at Pensacola (1698). Florida was under the ecclesiastical authority of Santiago de Cuba until 1763, when Havana took over jurisdiction. The first episcopal visitation to Florida was in 1606, when Juan de Altamirano confirmed 981 colonists and mission natives. Florida's second episcopal visitation was made by Gabriel Calderón during ten months in 1674-75, when he ordained seven creoles to the priesthood in St. Augustine. About one-third of the Franciscans of Santa Elena Province in the 17th century were creoles, that is Florida-born Spanish colonials. Visiting the doctrinas north and west of St. Augustine, Calderón confirmed 13,152 natives, commenting favorably on their piety, devotion, and practice. Florida's third episcopal visitor was Bishop Dionisio Resino, who arrived at St. Augustine in 1709, but remained only three months. When Francisco de San Buenaventura y Tejada came to St. Augustine to take up episcopal residence in 1735, he quickly set about to ameliorate the spiritual decadence he found. In 1736 he confirmed 630 colonists, along with 143 slaves and free African Americans. Buenaventura left in 1745 to become the bishop of Yucatán. Florida's next resident bishop did not arrive until 1754, Pedro Ponce y Carrasco, whose poor health limited his stay to ten months. The last colonial resident bishop was Pedro Agustín Morell, the bishop of Santiago de Cuba, who after having been made prisoner by the British who invaded Cuba, was eventually shipped to St. Augustine in December 1762. That spring he confirmed 639 persons before returning to Cuba.

In 1687, 11 fugitive slaves escaped from South Carolina to St. Augustine. Spanish authorities granted them their freedom, but required them to become Catholic and work on fortifications, especially St. Augustine's Castillo. By 1738, 38 households of former slaves were settled by authorities two miles north of St. Augustine at Santa Teresa de la Gracia Real de Mosé, the first legally free African-American community in what became the United States. Eligible males served in a free African-American militia stationed at nearby Fort Mosé, St. Augustine's first line of defense against an English land attack.

British Control. When Spain ceded Florida to Britain in 1763, Fort Mosé and its adjacent settlement was abandoned. Its 87 residents, along with about 300 remaining Catholic natives, as well as most Spanish colonists from St. Augustine and Pensacola, were transported to Havana, along with church records and furnishings. The British disposed of church property in St. Augustine as they saw fit. The Franciscan convent was converted into barracks (today the site of the Florida National Guard Headquarters); the provisional parish church of La Soledad was renamed St. Peter's Anglican Church.

As a British possession from 1763 to 1783, Florida lacked both priests and Catholics. In 1768 Andrew Turnbull founded New Smyrna as an indigo and cotton plantation. Collecting 1,403 Italians, Greeks, and mostly Minorcans as indentured servants, Turnbull, whose wife was Catholic, enlisted a Minorcan priest, Pedro Camps, to care for the spiritual needs of the colony. The enterprise soured; with inadequate food, clothing, and shelter, the colonists died at alarming rates. Frustrated with Turnbull's malfeasance, the plantation's residents set off on foot for St. Augustine to seek redress. The British governor released them from their indentures and allowed them to settle in St. Augustine. By November 1777, the British permitted the opening of San Pedro Catholic Church for the spiritual care of the refugees. Camps remained their pastor until his death in 1790. The descendants of this group, many of whom still reside in St. Augustine, provide a direct link between contemporary Florida Catholicism and its colonial past.

At the end of the American Revolution, both East and West Florida were ceded back to Spain, beginning the second Spanish colonial period from 1783 to 1821, during which time Pensacola usually had only one priest, whereas St. Augustine had as many as five Irish priests in the 1790s. As early as 1597, Richard Arthur served as pastor in St. Augustine, the first of a long line of Irishborn priests in Florida. The Irish had the advantage of being bilingual, a fact that was especially useful when Irish soldiers of the Hibernian Regiment were stationed at St. Augustine during the 1780s.

There had not been a permanent parish church in St. Augustine since 1702. In 1784 two priests from the Irish College at Salamanca, Thomas Hassett and Michael O'Reilly, arrived. Soon thereafter, Hassett lobbied royal authorities for a new parish church. The edifice was formally opened on Dec. 8, 1795, not by Hassett, who had been transferred to New Orleans, but by O'Reilly. In another major contribution, Hasset founded a free Catholic school for the Minorcans in 1787, probably the first such school in what is now the United States.

From 1783, Florida was under the supervision of Louis William Du Bourg, bishop of Louisiana and the Floridas. In 1787 East Florida had 900 whites and 490 African-American slaves; Pensacola, the capitol of West Florida, had only 265 inhabitants, while St. Augustine had 469. Catholics represented less than 50 percent of the total population of the two Floridas. Conversions to Catholicism were few, despite legal incentives. The practice of the faith was even less encouraging. In 1790, only seven people made their Easter duty in Pensacola, which had an overall population of 572. The following year, even after strenuous efforts by a visiting bishop, only 70 completed their Easter duty. The Spanish colonial enterprise in Florida was declining politically and spiritually.

Early American Period. Florida became a U.S. territory in 1821 and a state in 1845. With the creation of the Diocese of Charleston in 1820, Florida was included in the jurisdiction of the bishop of Charleston, John England, until 1825, when the apostolic vicariate of Alabama and the Floridas was created under Michael Portier. By 1827, Portier had "sublet" his Florida jurisdiction to Bishop England until 1829, when the Diocese of Mobile was created, with Portier as its head. As a result, neither Portier nor England had the means to oversee Florida effectively. During this period, Pensacola's St. Michael's Parish erected its first permanent church building in 1833. When the Diocese of Savannah was created in 1850, its first bishop, Francis X. Gartland, oversaw Catholicism in Florida. In February 1852 Gartland traveled by ship from Savannah to dedicate St. Mary, Star of the Sea Church in Key West.

In 1857, territory east of the Apalachicola River became the apostolic vicariate of Florida (land west of the river remained with the Diocese of Mobile until 1968). The vicar apostolic, Augustin VEROT, a 53-year-old French Sulpician, who had taught at St. Mary's College, Baltimore, then later was pastor of St. Paul's Parish, Ellicott Mills, arrived in St. Augustine in June 1858. The vicariate contained four parishes, eight missions, several stations, but only three priests. Pastorates at Tallahassee and Key West were vacant. The biggest parish, St. Augustine, had 952 white and 376 African-American Catholics, while St. Mary's in Key West had about 350 parishioners. Florida's Panhandle, under the Diocese of Mobile, had three parishes, two missions, and two priests. The state had neither parochial schools nor any other Catholic institutions. Despite these privations, which only increased with wartime conditions, Verot energetically undertook the challenges of his widespread mission territory.

In May 1859 he traveled to Europe in search of personnel. With the seven priests he recruited from France, he was able to assign pastors in Tallahassee and Key West, and by 1860 founded new parishes in Tampa, Fernandina, and Mandarin. He journeyed to New England and French Canada in 1859. In Hartford, CT, he enlisted five Sisters of Mercy, and in Montreal, three Christian Brothers, who proceeded in the fall of 1860 to open schools for girls and boys in St. Augustine, which served Catholics, Protestants, and free African Americans. When the war between the states broke out, Verot supported the Southern cause and in July 1861 was appointed the bishop of Savannah, while retaining charge of Florida.

The war wrecked havoc on Verot's development plans. Both Catholic schools in St. Augustine closed. By the war's end, Verot characterized the pastoral situation in Georgia and Florida as "a heap of smoking ruins." Four churches were ruined and the people were demoralized and impoverished. Not only did the war liquidate his assets, but debts remaining from his prewar expansion left him a pauper.

Undaunted, Verot initiated a physical and spiritual reconstruction program. He begged money from the Society of the Propagation of the Faith in France and from parishes in the Northeast, some proceeds from which he invested in a series of successful parish missions conducted by the Redemptorists during 1868 and 1869. He also commenced a limited experiment to educate newly freed slaves by recruiting from France the Sisters of St. Joseph, who opened in 1867 their first Catholic school for African Americans in St. Augustine. By 1876 they had over 360 students in seven such schools. In 1868 he engaged the Sisters of the Holy Names, of Montreal, to found in Key West a similar school. At first the Sisters opened an academy for whites, but by 1876 they had also opened St. Francis Xavier School for African Americans.

A Frontier Diocese. After relinquishing Savannah, Verot became the first bishop of St. Augustine in 1870, governing territory created from his former apostolic vicariate. Following his death in 1876, Irishman John Moore was named bishop in 1877. William Kenny, the first American bishop (1902–13), was, in turn, succeeded by Irish-born Michael Curley, who served from 1914 to 1921, when he was translated to Baltimore.

In 1880 Florida had almost 269,500 residents; 50 years later it had just under 968,500. During this period, Florida Catholics numbered about 3 percent of the state's population. New urban centers developed, the result of the introduction of the railroad along both of Florida's coasts by the 1890s, an improvement which brought commerce and tourism. Whereas, in 1880 only 10 percent of the population lived in cities, about 36 percent lived there by 1920. In 1900 Jacksonville was Florida's largest city with 28,249 persons, followed by Pensacola (17,747), Key West (17,144), and Tampa (15,839).

Moore enthusiastically responded to Florida's first growth spurt. When he took over in 1877, he was responsible for eight parishes, 12 missions, and eight diocesan and two religious priests; by his death in 1901, the diocese contained 15 parishes, 25 missions, 14 diocesan priests, and 17 religious priests. He introduced several important initiatives: the on-going recruitment of Irishborn priests; the ordination of the first native diocesan priest (Edward A. PACE in 1885); the requirement of an annual report from each parish; the introduction of the Benedictines of St. Vincent Abbey to pastorally oversee three West Coast counties (where some Germanspeaking people resided) and to start a college in 1887 (St. Leo's College, Florida's first Catholic college); and the recruitment of the New Orleans Jesuits in 1888, to whom he gave exclusive pastoral care of the southern half of his diocese in 1889. Headquartered in Tampa, the Jesuits also opened a high school for boys there in 1899. By 1920, 21 Jesuits served six parishes, 12 missions, and 46 stations in South Florida.

Moore also changed the focus of the diocesan Sisters of St. Joseph from teaching African Americans to running academies for whites, and from being a predominantly French community to being a predominantly Irish one. Also under his direction, in 1882, the Sisters of the Holy Names began work in Tampa, where they founded an academy.

Immigration was different in Florida compared to many other states. European immigrants were not numerous. Beginning in 1868, Cubans emigrated to Key West, as a result of a war of independence on their island. In response, the Holy Name Sisters, in 1873, opened a school for Cuban girls. By 1885, Key West had the largest concentration of Catholics in the state: 7,000 Cubans, 648 whites, and 70 African Americans. In 1886 Cubans, as well as Spaniards and Italians, began settling in Tampa, attracted to work in the cigar industry recently translated from Key West. By 1890 about 3,000 people from these three ethnic groups resided in Tampa; by 1920 there were 9,000. Tampa's Jesuits responded to this multilingual and multiethic challenge by founding new parishes. Meanwhile, both the Sisters of St. Joseph and the Sisters of the Holy Names inaugurated academies in the 1890s to serve these immigrants.

As was typical throughout the South, many Florida Catholics lacked access to a church or a priest on a regular basis, hence the domestic church was essential in keeping Catholicism alive. Wealthy benefactors, such as Edward Bradley, Kate Jackson, Mother Katherine Drexel, Mrs. Edward Morrell (Louise Drexel), and James McNichols played an indispensable role in the building of churches and schools, as did the benefactors of the Catholic Church Extension Society.

World War I to World War II. Bishop Michael Curley was so successful at recruiting priests from his native Ireland that by 1920 about 80 percent of Florida's 38 diocesan priests were Irish-born and over 50 percent of them were under 35 years of age. By 1921 Curley had enough secular clergy to begin to entrust the pastoral care of South Florida to diocesan priests, and not just to the Jesuits.

In 1920 Florida's largest parishes generally did not exceed 650 households, the average parish having about 500. By 1940, although the largest parishes contained around 2,000 households, the average parish still held only about 350. In 1920 the diocese had 30 parishes, with a Catholic population of approximately 51,000; in 1940, 62 parishes served an estimated 66,000 Catholics, a modest 29 percent increase. In the same period, the state population jumped from 968,470 to 1,897,414, a substantial 96 percent increase. Catholics represented about 5 percent of the state's population in 1920, but only about 3.5 percent in 1940. In 1920 only 36.5 percent of Floridians lived in urban areas, while 55.1 percent lived there in 1940.

Curley's successor was Irish-born Patrick Barry (1922–40). By 1937 he had 127 priests, 71 of whom were diocesan, and 60 percent of whom were Irish-born because Barry continued recruiting priests from Ireland. He introduced into the diocese the Adrian Dominican Sisters and the Allegany Franciscan Sisters, who soon made contributions in Catholic education, hospital administration, and ministry to African Americans. In 1940 the Adrian Dominicans founded Florida's second Catholic college, Barry College for women at Miami Shores.

Individuals, mostly from the Northeast, and the Extension Society, continued as important benefactors during this period. By far the biggest challenge for Barry, the pastors and parishioners was managing the effects of the Depression. A parish building boom of the 1920s created a diocesan debt of $1.6 million by 1928. In response to the problems exacerbated by the Depression, Barry collectivized and centralized parish finances so that the diocese might refinance parish debts. Yet despite his diocesan consolidation, pastors still (up to 1940) maintained a significant amount of independence and discretionary power.

Postwar Consolidation. During Joseph Hurley's episcopacy (1940–67), Florida Catholicism grew in population and developed in complexity. In 1940 Florida was the 27th most populated state with 1.9 million residents, by 1960 it was the tenth most populated with 4.9 million people. At that time Florida Catholics represented 11.9 percent of the state's population. Catholics increased in number from approximately 66,000 in 1940 to 753,000 in 1968, an increase of 1,041 percent. Already by the late 1940s the suburban parish had become the model for new parishes, and by 1968 the average parish increased to about 1,000 households, with the largest at 3,500 households.

Hurley consolidated power by means of heavy taxation of parishes in order to fund his extensive real estate purchases for parochial and institutional expansion and to centralize diocesan services. He assumed much of the former discretionary power of pastors. Although he continued to recruit priests from Ireland, he also stressed native vocations. Nevertheless, Irish priests reached their apex in numbers and influence under Hurley's leadership. The number of diocesan priests doubled, as did the number of parishes. By the late 1950s, Hurley had founded a diocesan hospital, organized a system of diocesan high schools, and established missions for Latino farm workers.

In 1958 the southern one-third of Hurley's diocese was erected as the Diocese of Miami, with Pittsburgh native Coleman Carroll as its first bishop (1958–77). Like Hurley, Carroll was a consolidator and builder. Within his first ten years, he presided over the establishment of 45 parishes, 17 parish schools, 58 new churches, 11 new high schools, and introduced 35 religious communities. He also invited the Vincentian Fathers to staff two seminaries he founded as a stimulus to native vocations. St. Vincent de Paul Seminary produced its first ordination class in 1968. Carroll was also a prominent community leader, responding to Cuban exiles with several creative programs and organizing a Human Relations Board for Miami to address racial injustice.

Changing Times. Both Hurley and Carroll attended the Second Vatican Council, and in the years after Vatican II, both favored gradualism and caution in the implementation of the letter and spirit of the Council. The postconciliar period coincided with major shifts in American culture, the papacy of John Paul II, and the continued growth of Catholicism in Florida.

In 1968 Miami became an archdiocese, with St. Petersburg and Orlando created as new dioceses. The Panhandle, long under the jurisdiction of Mobile, AL, became part of the Diocese of St. Augustine. A fifth Florida diocese was created in 1975, Pensacola-Tallahassee, and a sixth and seventh in 1984, Palm Beach and Venice. In 1969 the dioceses joined together to form the Florida Catholic Conference, an agency designed to represent the Church's position on policy and social issues and to coordinate its action statewide. It works with government agencies, as well as other religious groups, in addressing such matters as immigration, education and right-to-life issues.

This multiplication of dioceses in Florida reflected the rapid population and institutional growth. By 1990 Florida was the fourth largest state in population, with 13.2 million residents, of whom 1.7 million or 13 percent were Catholic. The 2000 census counted 15.9 million Floridians, of whom approximately 2.1 million or 14 percent are Catholic. Miami has the highest percentage of Catholics with 21 percent, while Pensacola-Tallahassee has the lowest with 5 percent.

At the dawn of the 21st century Florida Catholicism faces a number of challenges, some of which include: secularism, the size of parishes (the average parish is about 2,000 households); fewer priests per Catholic; multiculturalism (the 2000 census reports that Florida is 16.8 percent Latino, 14.6 percent African American, 1.7 percent Asian, and 3 percent other ethnic groups); increased bureaucratization on the diocesan and parish levels; the continued implementation of Vatican Council II, especially evangelization, ecumenism, interfaith dialogue, and lay spirituality and initiatives. Florida Catholicism's long tradition of adaptability, flexibility, and creativity, derived from its frontier missionary past, may be expected to serve it well in the future. Bibliography: H. P. CLAVREUL, Notes on the Catholic Church in Florida, 1565–1876 (Saint Leo, Abbey, FL, n.d.). M. J. GEIGER, The Franciscan Conquest of Florida, 1573–1618 (Washington 1937). L. G. DE ORÉ, The Martyrs of Florida, 1513–1616, ed. and tr. M. J. GEIGER, Franciscan Studies 18 (St. Bonaventure, NY 1936). V. F. O'DANIEL, Dominicans in Early Florida (New York 1930). M. V. GANNON, The Cross in the Sand: The Early Catholic Church in Florida, 1513–1870 (Gainesville 1965); Rebel Bishop: The Life and Era of Augustin Verot (Milwaukee 1964). M. J. MCNALLY, Catholic Parish Life on Florida's West Coast, 1860–1968 (St. Petersburg 1996); Catholicism in South Florida, 1868–1968 (Gainesville 1984). G. R. MORMINO, The Immigrant World of Ybor City: Italians and Their Latin Neighbors in Tampa, 1885–1985 (Urbana, IL 1987).

[M. J. MCNALLY]

FLORILEGIA

The word florilegium comes from the Latin words flores (flowers) and legere (to gather, to collect). It corresponds exactly to the word anthology, which derives from the Greek. It denotes a collection of flowers, the word flowers being used metaphorically, not to mean literary artifices with which an author embellishes his work, but rather to designate excerpts from earlier writings. This article confines itself to a study of Christian florilegia.

Terminology. A separate study, or monograph, on florilegia has not yet been undertaken. As a first step toward this end, a complete inventory of all florilegia needs to be made. Following are many of the terms by which florilegia are designated in the catalogues of manuscripts and printed works. This list, in which Greek and Latin words are mixed together, includes terms common to a number of collections, as well as terms that are applied to only one collection: Alphabetum, Analecta, Apomnêmoneumata, Anthologia, Apophthegmata, Aurifodina, Breviloquium, Candela, Collationes, Collectanea, Communiloquium, Deflorationes, Delucidarium, Dieta salutis, Eclogae, Epitome, Evergétinon, Excarpsus, Excerpta, Exerceptiones, Fasciculus, Floretum, Florilegium, Flosculi, Glaphyra, Gnomai, Gnomica, Gnomologion, Hiera, Liber pancrisis, Loci communes, Manipulus, Margarita, Melissa, Mensa spiritualis, Milleloquium, Miscellanea, Oculus moralis, Panarion, Pandectes, Parallela (sacra), Paterika, Pharetra, Philocalie, Polyan-Pré spirituel, Promptuarium, thea, Rapiarium, Reductorium, Resina scriptuarum, Rosarium, Rosetum, Scarapsus, Scintillae, Sophologium, Speculum, Stillae verborum, Stromates, Sylloge, Sylva locorum communium, Themata, Thesaurus, Via salutis, Viridarium.

Literary Genre. Florilegia belong to gnomic or sententious literature, but within this type of literature they differ from collections of original thoughts or anonymous proverbs in that they consist of borrowed literature. In other words, they are compilations of excerpts (Latin, excerpta) taken from earlier authors. The role of the compiler is expressed by the Latin verbs carpere, decerpere, deflorare, and colligere. The origin of this literary genre is intertwined with the beginnings of world literature. In Christian literature, the genre appears in the first Christian generations with the collections of the logia of the Lord or the Apostles and with the lists of auctoritates and testimonia, which were the earliest efforts toward a catechism, liturgical formularies, or Christian legislation. Later, there developed the anthologies of sententiae (see SENTENCES AND SUMMAE), of which ISIDORE OF SEVILLE was the first great compiler and which found their masters in SCHOLASTICISM. The history of Christian florilegia has been traced in "Florileges," Dictionnaire de spiritualitéascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. Viller et al. (Paris 1932-) 5:435-512. The present study is confined to their classification and evaluation.

Classification. Florilegia can be classified according to the sources they use or according to their objectives. If classified according to their sources, florilegia are either profane, Christian, or a mixture of both. Although the profane florilegia are not the concern of this article, the mixed florilegia, because they borrow from both profane and sacred writers, are usually of Christian inspiration and are of interest in a study of Christian florilegia. In the classification of Christian florilegia according to sources, one can distinguish Biblical, patristic, Biblicalpatristic, and mixed (sacred-profane) anthologies. At times a florilegium was compiled from the works of a single author, and in such case serves as an indication of his influence.

