NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

5 Ead-Fre

THOMSON GALE

Detroit • New York • San Diego • San Francisco • Cleveland • New Haven, Conn. • Waterville, Maine • London • Munich

in association with THE CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA • WASHINGTON, D.C.

The New Catholic Encyclopedia, Second Edition

Project Editors Thomas Carson, Joann Cerrito

Editorial

Erin Bealmear, Jim Craddock, Stephen Cusack, Miranda Ferrara, Kristin Hart, Melissa Hill, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus

Permissions

Edna Hedblad, Shalice Shah-Caldwell

© 2003 by The Catholic University of America. Published by Gale. Gale is an imprint of The Gale Group, Inc., a division of Thomson Learning, Inc.

Gale and Design[™] and Thomson Learning[™] are trademarks used herein under license.

For more information, contact The Gale Group, Inc. 27500 Drake Rd. Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535 Or you can visit our Internet site at http://www.gale.com

Imaging and Multimedia

Randy Bassett, Dean Dauphinais, Robert Duncan, Leitha Etheridge-Sims, Mary K. Grimes, Lezlie Light, Dan Newell, David G. Oblender, Christine O'Bryan, Luke Rademacher, Pamela Reed

Product Design

Michelle DiMercurio

Data Capture Civie Green

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, The Gale Group, Inc. does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. The Gale Group, Inc. accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion in the publication of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions. Manufacturing Rhonda Williams

Indexing

Victoria Agee, Victoria Baker, Francine Cronshaw, Lynne Maday, Do Mi Stauber, Amy Suchowski

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS CATALOGING-IN-PUBLICATION DATA

New Catholic encyclopedia.—2nd ed.

p. cm. Includes bibliographical references and indexes. ISBN 0-7876-4004-2 1. Catholic Church—Encyclopedias. I. Catholic University of America. BX841 .N44 2002 282' .03—dc21 2002000924

ISBN: 0-7876-4004-2 (set) 0-7876-4005-0 (v. 1) 0-7876-4006-9 (v. 2) 0-7876-4007-7 (v. 3) 0-7876-4008-5 (v. 4) 0-7876-4009-3 (v. 5) 0-7876-4010-7 (v. 6) 0-7876-4011-5 (v. 7) 0-7876-4012-3 (v. 8) 0-7876-4013-1 (v. 9) 0-7876-4014-x (v. 10) 0-7876-4015-8 (v. 11) 0-7876-4016-6 (v. 12) 0-7876-4017-4 (v. 13) 0-7876-4018-2 (v. 14) 0-7876-4019-0 (v. 15)

Printed in the United States of America 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

For The Catholic University of America Press

EDITORIAL STAFF

Executive Editor Berard L. Marthaler, O.F.M.Conv., S.T.D., Ph.D.

> Associate Editor Gregory F. LaNave, Ph.D.

Assistant Editors Jonathan Y. Tan, Ph.D. Richard E. McCarron, Ph.D.

> Editorial Assistant Denis J. Obermeyer

Director of The Catholic University of America Press David J. McGonagle, Ph.D.

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

John Borelli, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C.

Drew Christiansen, S.J., Ph.D., Senior Fellow, Woodstock Theological Center, Washington, D.C.

Anne M. Clifford, C.S.J., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Theology, Duquesne University, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

Raymond F. Collins, M.A., S.T.D., Professor of New Testament, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Cyprian Davis, O.S.B., S.T.L., Ph.D., Professor of Church History, Saint Meinrad School of Theology, Saint Meinrad, Indiana Dennis M. Doyle, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, University of Dayton, Dayton, Ohio

Angelyn Dries, O.S.F., Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religious Studies, Cardinal Stritch University, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

Arthur Espelage, O.F.M., J.C.D., Executive Coordinator, Canon Law Society of America, Washington, D.C.

Eugene J. Fisher, Ph.D., Associate Director of Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, D.C. Edward J. Furton, Ph.D., Editor-in-Chief, The National Catholic Bioethics Quarterly, Brighton, Massachusetts

James F. Garneau, Ph.D., Academic Dean, The Pontifical College Josephinum, Columbus, Ohio

J. A. Wayne Hellmann, O.F.M.Conv., Dr. Theol., Professor of Theological Studies, St. Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri

Joseph T. Kelley, Ph.D., D.Min., Director of the Center for Augustinian Study, Merrimack College, North Andover, Massachusetts

Judith M. Kubicki, C.S.S.F., Ph.D., Assistant Professor of Theology, Fordham University, Bronx, New York

William P. Loewe, Ph.D., Associate Professor of Religion and Religious Education, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. Rose M. McDermott, S.S.J., J.C.D., Associate Professor of Canon Law, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

R. Bruce Miller, M.S.L.S., Head, Theology/Philosophy, Canon Law Libraries, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Francis J. Moloney, S.D.B., S.T.L., S.S.L., D.Phil., Professor of Biblical Studies, The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C.

Katherine I. Rabenstein, B.S.F.S., Senior Credentialing Specialist, American Nurses Association, Washington, D.C.

Joel Rippinger, O.S.B., M.A., S.T.L., Subprior, Marmion Abbey, Aurora, Illinois

Foreword

This revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia represents a third generation in the evolution of the text that traces its lineage back to the Catholic Encyclopedia published from 1907 to 1912. In 1967, sixty years after the first volume of the original set appeared, The Catholic University of America and the McGraw-Hill Book Company joined together in organizing a small army of editors and scholars to produce the New Catholic Encyclopedia. Although planning for the NCE had begun before the Second Vatican Council and most of the 17,000 entries were written before Council ended, Vatican II enhanced the encyclopedia's value and importance. The research and the scholarship that went into the articles witnessed to the continuity and richness of the Catholic Tradition given fresh expression by Council. In order to keep the NCE current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. Now, at the beginning of the third millennium, The Catholic University of America is proud to join with The Gale Group in presenting a new edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia. It updates and incorporates the many articles from the 1967 edition and its supplements that have stood the test of time and adds hundreds of new entries.

As the president of The Catholic University of America, I cannot but be pleased at the reception the NCE has received. It has come to be recognized as an authoritative reference work in the field of religious studies and is praised for its comprehensive coverage of the Church's history and institutions. Although Canon Law no longer requires encyclopedias and reference works of this kind to receive an imprimatur before publication, I am confident that this new edition, like the original, reports accurate information about Catholic beliefs and practices. The editorial staff and their consultants were careful to present official Church teachings in a straightforward manner, and in areas where there are legitimate disputes over fact and differences in interpretation of events, they made every effort to insure a fair and balanced presentation of the issues.

The way for this revised edition was prepared by the publication, in 2000, of a Jubilee volume of the NCE, heralding the beginning of the new millennium. In my foreword to that volume I quoted Pope John Paul II's encyclical on Faith and Human Reason in which he wrote that history is "the arena where we see what God does for humanity." The New Catholic Encyclopedia describes that arena. It reports events, people, and ideas—"the things we know best and can verify most easily, the things of our everyday life, apart from which we cannot understand ourselves" (Fides et ratio, 12).

Finally, I want to express appreciation on my own behalf and on the behalf of the readers of these volumes to everyone who helped make this revision a reality. We are all indebted to The Gale Group and the staff of The Catholic University of America Press for their dedication and the alacrity with which they produced it.

> Very Reverend David M. O'Connell, C.M., J.C.D. President The Catholic University of America

Preface to the Revised Edition

When first published in 1967 the New Catholic Encyclopedia was greeted with enthusiasm by librarians, researchers, and general readers interested in Catholicism. In the United States the NCE has been recognized as the standard reference work on matters of special interest to Catholics. In an effort to keep the encyclopedia current, supplementary volumes were published in 1972, 1978, 1988, and 1995. However, it became increasingly apparent that further supplements would not be adequate to this task. The publishers subsequently decided to undertake a thorough revision of the NCE, beginning with the publication of a Jubilee volume at the start of the new millennium.

Like the biblical scribe who brings from his storeroom of knowledge both the new and the old, this revised edition of the New Catholic Encyclopedia incorporates material from the 15-volume original edition and the supplement volumes. Entries that have withstood the test of time have been edited, and some have been amended to include the latest information and research. Hundreds of new entries have been added. For all practical purposes, it is an entirely new edition intended to serve as a comprehensive and authoritative work of reference reporting on the movements and interests that have shaped Christianity in general and Catholicism in particular over two millennia.

SCOPE

The title reflects its outlook and breadth. It is the New Catholic Encyclopedia, not merely a new encyclopedia of Catholicism. In addition to providing information on the doctrine, organization, and history of Christianity over the centuries, it includes information about persons, institutions, cultural phenomena, religions, philosophies, and social movements that have affected the Catholic Church from within and without. Accordingly, the NCE attends to the history and particular traditions of the Eastern Churches and the Churches of the Protestant Reformation, and other ecclesial communities. Christianity cannot be understood without exploring its roots in ancient Israel and Judaism, nor can the history of the medieval and modern Church be understood apart from its relationship with Islam. Interfaith dialogue requires an appreciation of Buddhism and other world religions, as well as some knowledge of the history of religion in general.

On the assumption that most readers and researchers who use the NCE are individuals interested in Catholicism in general and the Church in North America in particular, its editorial content gives priority to the Western Church, while not neglecting the churches in the East; to Roman Catholicism, acknowledging much common history with Protestantism; and to Catholicism in the United States, recognizing that it represents only a small part of the universal Church.

Scripture, Theology, Patrology, Liturgy. The many and varied articles dealing with Sacred Scripture and specific books of the Bible reflect contemporary biblical scholarship and its concerns. The NCE highlights official church teachings as expressed by the Church's magisterium. It reports developments in theology, explains issues and introduces ecclesiastical writers from the early Church Fathers to present-day theologians whose works exercise major influence on the development of Christian thought. The NCE traces the evolution of the Church's worship with special emphasis on rites and rituals consequent to the liturgical reforms and renewal initiated by the Second Vatican Council.

Church History. From its inception Christianity has been shaped by historical circumstances and itself has become a historical force. The NCE presents the Church's history from a number of points of view against the background of general political and cultural history. The revised edition reports in some detail the Church's missionary activity as it grew from a small community in Jerusalem to the worldwide phenomenon it is today. Some entries, such as those dealing with the Middle Ages, the Reformation, and the Enlightenment, focus on major time-periods and movements that cut across geographical boundaries. Other articles describe the history and structure of the Church in specific areas, countries, and regions. There are separate entries for many dioceses and monasteries which by reason of antiquity, size, or influence are of special importance in ecclesiastical history, as there are for religious orders and congregations. The NCE rounds out its comprehensive history of the Church with articles on religious movements and biographies of individuals.

Canon and Civil Law. The Church inherited and has safeguarded the precious legacy of ancient Rome, described by Virgil, "to rule people under law, [and] to establish the way of peace." The NCE deals with issues of ecclesiastical jurisprudence and outlines the development of legislation governing communal practices and individual obligations, taking care to incorporate and reference the 1983 Code of Canon Law throughout and, where appropriate, the Code of Canons for the Eastern Churches. It deals with issues of Church-State relations and with civil law as it impacts on the Church and Church's teaching regarding human rights and freedoms.

Philosophy. The Catholic tradition from its earliest years has investigated the relationship between faith and reason. The NCE considers at some length the many and varied schools of ancient, medieval, and modern philosophy with emphasis, when appropriate, on their relationship to theological positions. It pays particular attention to the scholastic tradition, particularly Thomism, which is prominent in Catholic intellectual history. Articles on many major and lesser philosophy from pre-Christian times to the present.

Biography and Hagiography. The NCE, making an exception for the reigning pope, leaves to other reference works biographical information about living persons. This revised edition presents biographical sketches of hundreds of men and women, Christian and non-Christian, saints and sinners, because of their significance for the Church. They include: Old and New Testament figures; the Fathers of the Church and ecclesiastical writers; pagan and Christian emperors; medieval and modern kings; heads of state and other political figures; heretics and champions of orthodoxy; major and minor figures in the Reformation and Counter Reformation; popes, bishops, and priests; founders and members of religious orders and congregations; lay men and lay women; scholars, authors, composers, and artists. The NCE includes biographies of most saints whose feasts were once celebrated or are currently celebrated by the universal church. The revised edition relies on Butler's Lives of the Saints and similar reference works to give accounts of many saints, but the NCE also provides biographical information about recently canonized and beatified individuals who are, for one reason or another, of special interest to the English-speaking world.

Social Sciences. Social sciences came into their own in the twentieth century. Many articles in the NCE rely on data drawn from anthropology, economics, psychology and sociology for a better understanding of religious structures and behaviors. Papal encyclicals and pastoral letters of episcopal conferences are the source of principles and norms for Christian attitudes and practice in the field of social action and legislation. The NCE draws attention to the Church's organized activities in pursuit of peace and justice, social welfare and human rights. The growth of the role of the laity in the work of the Church also receives thorough coverage.

ARRANGEMENT OF ENTRIES

The articles in the NCE are arranged alphabetically by the first substantive word using the word-by-word method of alphabetization; thus "New Zealand" precedes "Newman, John Henry," and "Old Testament Literature" precedes "Oldcastle, Sir John." Monarchs, patriarchs, popes, and others who share a Christian name and are differentiated by a title and numerical designation are alphabetized by their title and then arranged numerically. Thus, entries for Byzantine emperors Leo I through IV precede those for popes of the same name, while "Henry VIII, King of England" precedes "Henry IV, King of France."

Maps, Charts, and Illustrations. The New Catholic Encyclopedia contains nearly 3,000 illustrations, including photographs, maps, and tables. Entries focusing on the Church in specific countries contain a map of the country as well as easy-to-read tables giving statistical data and, where helpful, lists of archdioceses and dioceses. Entries on the Church in U.S. states also contain tables listing archdioceses and dioceses where appropriate. The numerous photographs appearing in the New Catholic Encyclopedia help to illustrate the history of the Church, its role in modern societies, and the many magnificent works of art it has inspired.

SPECIAL FEATURES

Subject Overview Articles. For the convenience and guidance of the reader, the New Catholic Encyclopedia contains several brief articles outlining the scope of major fields: "Theology, Articles on," "Liturgy, Articles on," "Jesus Christ, Articles on," etc.

Cross-References. The cross-reference system in the NCE serves to direct the reader to related material in other articles. The appearance of a name or term in small capital letters in text indicates that there is an article of that title elsewhere in the encyclopedia. In some cases, the name of the related article has been inserted at the appropriate point as a see reference: (see THOMAS AQUINAS, ST.). When a further aspect of the subject is treated under another title, a see also reference is placed at the end of the article. In addition to this extensive cross-reference system, the comprehensive index in volume 15 will greatly increase the reader's ability to access the wealth of information contained in the encyclopedia.

Abbreviations List. Following common practice, books and versions of the Bible as well as other standard works by selected authors have been abbreviated throughout the text. A guide to these abbreviations follows this preface.

The Editors

Abbreviations

The system of abbreviations used for the works of Plato, Aristotle, St. Augustine, and St. Thomas Aquinas is as follows: Plato is cited by book and Stephanus number only, e.g., Phaedo 79B; Rep. 480A. Aristotle is cited by book and Bekker number only, e.g., Anal. post. 72b 8–12; Anim. 430a 18. St. Augustine is cited as in the Thesaurus Linguae Latinae, e.g., C. acad. 3.20.45; Conf. 13.38.53, with capitalization of the first word of the title. St. Thomas is cited as in scholarly journals, but using Arabic numerals. In addition, the following abbreviations have been used throughout the encyclopedia for biblical books and versions of the Bible.

Books

Acts	Acts of the Apostles
Am	Amos
Bar	Baruch
1–2 Chr	1 and 2 Chronicles (1 and 2 Paralipomenon in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Col	Colossians
1–2 Cor	1 and 2 Corinthians
Dn	Daniel
Dt	Deuteronomy
Eccl	Ecclesiastes
Eph	Ephesians
Est	Esther
Ex	Exodus
Ez	Ezekiel
Ezr	Ezra (Esdras B in Septuagint; 1 Esdras in Vulgate)
Gal	Galatians
Gn	Genesis
Hb	Habakkuk
Heb	Hebrews
Hg	Haggai
Hos	Hosea
Is	Isaiah
Jas	James
Jb	Job
Jdt	Judith
Jer	Jeremiah
Jgs	Judges
Л	Joel
Jn	John
1–3 Jn	1, 2, and 3 John
Jon	Jonah
Jos	Joshua

Jude	Jude
1–2 Kgs	1 and 2 Kings (3 and 4 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Lam	Lamentations
Lk	Luke
Lv	Leviticus
Mal	Malachi (Malachias in Vulgate)
1–2 Mc	1 and 2 Maccabees
Mi	Micah
Mk	Mark
Mt	Matthew
Na	Nahum
Neh	Nehemiah (2 Esdras in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Nm	Numbers
Ob	Obadiah
Phil	Philippians
Phlm	Philemon
Prv	Proverbs
Ps	Psalms
1–2 Pt	1 and 2 Peter
Rom	Romans
Ru	Ruth
Rv	Revelation (Apocalypse in Vulgate)
Sg	Song of Songs
Sir	Sirach (Wisdom of Ben Sira; Ecclesiasticus in Septuagint and Vulgate)
1–2 Sm	1 and 2 Samuel (1 and 2 Kings in Septuagint and Vulgate)
Tb	Tobit
1–2 Thes	1 and 2 Thessalonians
Ti	Titus
1–2 Tm	1 and 2 Timothy
Wis	Wisdom
Zec	Zechariah
Zep	Zephaniah
Versions
Apoc	Apocrypha
ARV	American Standard Revised Version
4 D17

ARV	American Standard Revised Version
ARVm	American Standard Revised Version, margin
AT	American Translation
AV	Authorized Version (King James)
CCD	Confraternity of Christian Doctrine
DV	Douay-Challoner Version

ABBREVIATIONS

ERV	English Revised Version	NJB	New Jerusalem Bible
ERVm	English Revised Version, margin	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
EV	English Version(s) of the Bible	NT	New Testament
JB	Jerusalem Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	RSV	Revised Standard Version
MT	Masoretic Text	RV	Revised Version
NAB	New American Bible	RVm	Revised Version, margin
NEB	New English Bible	Syr	Syriac
NIV	New International Version	Vulg	Vulgate

E

EADMER OF CANTERBURY

Benedictine monk, historian, theologian, biographer of St. Anselm; b. in or near Canterbury, c. 1060; d. Canterbury, c. 1130. He entered Christ Church, Canterbury, as a child and experienced the transformation in monastic life that took place under the inspiration of Archbishop LANFRANC. When ANSELM became archbishop of Canterbury in 1093, he made Eadmer his chaplain. The two men were never separated until Anselm's death in 1109. During their years together Eadmer acted as a secretary and amanuensis of the archbishop; above all he recorded Anselm's sayings, took notes for a history of his times, the Historia novorum, and began to write the Vita s. Anselmi. Meanwhile he continued his hagiographical work for the church of Canterbury and began a series of devotional writings in the manner of St. Anselm. In 1120 Eadmer was nominated as bishop of St. Andrews, but he left his see after several months of fruitless argument about the rights of Canterbury over the Scottish church. He spent his last years at Canterbury in the office of precentor, in which he continued to serve his church as a hagiographer and devotional writer. The most important work of these years was his Tractatus de conceptione sanctae Mariae, which contains the first theological defense of the doctrine of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION and foreshadows in a remarkable way some of the later arguments on this theme. Eadmer's main claim to fame is undoubtedly as a historian and biographer of St. Anselm. He was the first notable English historian after BEDE, and as a biographer he showed a talent for vivid and intimate delineation of character seldom surpassed in the Middle Ages.

Bibliography: General works collected in Patrologia Latina 158:49–118; 159:301–318, 347–580, 587–606, 709–812. Devotional works, ed. A. WILMART in Revue des sciences religieuses 15 (1935) 184–219, 354–379. Editions. Tractatus de conceptione sanctae Mariae, ed. H. THURSTON and T. SLATER (Freiburg 1904); The Life of St. Anselm, ed. and tr. R. W. SOUTHERN (New York 1962); History of Recent Events in England, tr. G. BOSANQUET (London 1964). For a study of his works as a whole and of his relationship with St. Anselm, see R. W. SOUTHERN, Saint Anselm and His Biographer (Cambridge, Eng. 1963).

[R. W. SOUTHERN]

EALDRED (ALDRED) OF YORK

A monk of Winchester (d. Sept. 11, 1069), abbot of Tavistock (c. 1027), bishop of WORCESTER (1046), and then archbishop of York (1060), Ealdred was a power in both Church and State. He warred against the Welsh and Norse, served on royal embassies to Rome and Germany, and probably crowned Harold II. He administered the dioceses of Hereford and Ramsbury while holding Worcester, but was forced to surrender Worcester before Pope Nicholas granted him the pallium for York. Nonetheless, Ealdred reformed and strengthened his dioceses, especially York, Worcester, Gloucester, Southwell, and Beverley. He submitted to WILLIAM I at Berkhamstead and consecrated him king (Christmas 1066) and Matilda queen (1068), subsequently serving the conqueror loyally, though protesting against any oppression. Sources for his life include the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Folcard's Vita of JOHN OF BEVERLEY, FLORENCE OF WORCESTER, SIMEON OF DURHAM, WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, and the Chronica Pontificum of the Church of York (ed. J. Raine Historians . . . York 2, Rerum Britannicarum medii aevi scriptores, London 1858-96).

Bibliography: The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 1:249–251. E. A. FREEMAN, History of the Norman Conquest, 6 v. (Oxford 1867–79) v.2, 3, 4. F. E. HARMER, ed. and tr., Anglo-Saxon Writs (Manchester, Eng. 1952).

[W. A. CHANEY]

EALING ABBEY

Benedictine abbey in Ealing, a suburb of London, England; dedicated to St. Benedict. At the request of Cardinal Herbert VAUGHAN, monks from DOWNSIDE established in Ealing a parish and a small school (1895), which became priory (1916), autonomous (1947), and an abbey (1955). The neo-Gothic church, damaged during World War II, has been restored (1962). Wolstan Pearson was the first prior; Charles Pontifex, the first abbot. In 1963 the community numbered 30 monks; the parish, 7,000 Catholics; and the public school, 700 boys.

Stone carving statue of female cycladic idol. (©Gianni Dagli Orti/CORBIS)

Bibliography: The Tablet 205 (May, June 1955). The Benedictine Almanac and Guide 1963 (London 1963).

[J. STÉPHAN]

EARTH-MOTHER, WORSHIP OF THE

Turkish excavations in Asia Minor in the first half of the twentieth century showed that the female idols, which can be connected in part at least with the cult of the Earth-Mother, go back to the fourth millennium B.C. The persistence of her cult in Asia Minor is evident from its various offshoots of the Magna Mater type (see MYS-TERY RELIGIONS, GRECO-ORIENTAL), for these offshoots all exhibit a common foundation, and in its various manifestations this cult continues to the end of antiquity. The concept of the Earth-Mother was given a more intellectual and spiritual character as soon as she came to be identified with the ancestor-mother of mankind. Ethnological research holds that this fusion took place at an early date. The Celtic worshipers of the Matres, or Matronae, evidently felt a closer, family relationship with these divinities (see CELTIC RELIGION).

The Greeks may have brought with them a disposition to worship the Earth as an inheritance from the common religion of the Indo-Europeans. In India Prithivī, "the broad" (earth, as a flat surface), is a divine figure. Among the Persians earth worship is probably retained in the cult of the four elements. The Greeks, who entered Greece from the north in several waves, had certainly become acquainted with an earlier farming culture in the Danube area and had come under the influence of its mentality. In Greece they found themselves in the sphere of a common culture that in the third millennium, despite all local variations, dominated the whole region from Palestine, Cyprus, Crete, and the islands of the Aegean Sea as far west as lower Italy. In the second millennium this culture is called the Minoan-Mycenaean, and the worship of a Mistress of Nature, who can be regarded as an hypostasis of the Asianic goddess of life, was one of its characteristic features. The connection with the earth was strongly emphasized.

For the most part, Homer, the poet of the aristocracy, ignored the earth cult in any form. On the other hand, Hesiod, the peasant poet, stressed the religion of the oppressed class. By emphasizing this predominantly agricultural religion-and by advertence to her significant role in his Theogony-he raised the figure of personified Earth to higher recognition. In Hesiod Gaia, it is true, Earth is only the Mother of the Titans (by Uranus), and later-without a father being named-of the Giants. Since Zeus, the son of one of the Titans (Chronus), seizes the rule of the world, she thus appears as one of the great primitive principles. However, her mythology and personification is at first very vague. If the extent of her worship is taken as a norm for divine rank, it must be said in general that Gaia (Ge) as a goddess did not have much significance. The opposing thesis of W. Otto and E. Peterich, his pupil, has been rightly rejected by M. Nilsson (M. P. Nilsson, Geschichte der griechischen Religion 1:428). The position of Earth in law as a guarantee of an oath (already in Homer) is higher than in religion. The occasional appeals to her in tragedy are to be regarded as poetic testimony with a philosophical slant [A. Dieterich, Mutter Erde (Leipzig 1925); Nilsson, op. cit. 432].

The separation of Demeter and of Rhea (the mother of Zeus) from Gaia as more personal figures indicates that Gaia, being conceived as an all too physical and impersonal magnitude, offered insufficient support to religious demands and especially to those of an eschatological nature. The same holds true of Roman Tellus. However, Tellus as a symbol of the vegetative life-force enjoyed a higher esteem in the early Roman farming population than the shadowy and mythless consorts of the gods [F. Altheim, Terra Mater (Giessen 1931)].

Bibliography: M. ELIADE, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1958) esp. 239–247. W. DREXLER, "Gaia," Ausführliches Lexikon der griechischen und röischen Mythologie, ed. W. H. ROSCHER, (Leipzig 1884–1937) 1.2:1566–86. S. EITREM, "Gaia," Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart 1910) 7.1:467–479.

[K. PRÜMM]

EAST ASIAN PASTORAL INSTITUTE

Located on the campus of the Jesuit University of Ateneo de Manila in Quezon City, Philippines and sponsored by the Jesuit Conference of East Asia and Oceania (JCEAO), the East Asian Pastoral Institute (EAPI) is an international multicultural center for spiritual renewal, pastoral training and leadership formation for laity, religious, and clergy in the Asia–Pacific region. In addition to organizing sabbatical, theological reflection, and spiritual renewal programs, it focuses on the training and formation of lay leaders and catechists for service in the local churches of Asia–Pacific. It also offers masters and doctorate programs in theology as part of the Manila Theological Consortium.

History. The EAPI was the brainchild of Johannes HOFINGER, S.J., an Austrian Jesuit missionary to China who was expelled by the Communists in 1949. In 1953, he and a small band of fellow Jesuits established the Institute for Missionary Apologetics in army barracks which formerly housed a World War II Japanese concentration camp. In 1961, this institute was renamed the East Asian Pastoral Institute, and its mission was broadened to include training and formation in catechetics and liturgy. On Aug. 15, 1965, the Jesuit General, Pedro Arrupe reorganized EAPI in response to calls by various Asian bishops, missionaries, and religious superiors for the establishment of an international formation and training center in Asia to implement the pastoral vision of Vatican II. Arrupe appointed a Jesuit missionary in Japan, Alfonso Nebreda as its first director with a mandate to oversee the relocation of the institute to new premises on the campus of Ateneo de Manila university, and to initiate new pastoral and leadership training programs. The relocation was completed with the inauguration of the new building complex in 1968.

Publications. In 1962, the fledging institute launched its first publication, a quarterly entitled Good Tidings. In 1964 two new journals were inaugurated: Amen, which focused on liturgical renewal, and Teaching All Nations, which sought to articulate and promote mission catechetics and liturgy. At the end of 1979, Good Tidings and Teaching All Nations were merged into a new journal, the East Asian Pastoral Review (EAPR). EAPI also publishes a newsletter, The Bridge.

Bibliography: H. CZARKOWSKI, "Zur Bedeutung und Situation der Pastoralinstitute in der Dritten Welt," Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 59 (1975) 112–126. A. M. DE LA CRUZ, "Johannes Hofinger Remembered, 1905–1984," Living Light, 20 (1984) 345–347. F. X. CLARK, "Johannes Hofinger, S.J., (1905–1984), Life and Bibliography," East Asian Pastoral Review 21 (1984) 103–120. A. M. NEBREDA, "Johannes Hofinger: Catalyst and Pioneer," East Asian Pastoral Review, 21 (1984) 120–127.

[J. Y. TAN]

EAST SYRIAN LITURGY

The liturgical tradition that evolved from the usages of Edessa, the ancient center of the Syriac-speaking Christian Church. It is the liturgical tradition of the ASSYR-IAN CHURCH OF THE EAST and the CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH. In addition, the SYRO-MALABAR CHURCH in India and in diaspora traces its liturgy directly back to the East Syrian rite. The variety of nomenclature for the churches of the East Syrian or Assyrian Church of the East tradition merits a preliminary comment. As a result of a complex ecclesial climate at the time of the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451), the ancient Oriental church was branded "Nestorian," an inaccurate designation that derived from and persisted because of theological misconceptions and regional prejudice (see NESTORIANISM). When some factions of the Church of the East united with Rome in the 15th century, the uniates were designated the Chaldean Church or the Chaldean Catholic Church. The Church of the East now designates itself the Assyrian Church of the East or Church of the East, while the uniate Church prefers the title Chaldean Catholic Church. In November 1994 the Assyrian Church of the East and the Chaldean Catholic Church signed a "Common Christological Declaration," ending centuries of discord and paving the way for fuller unity between the two churches that preserve a common liturgical and spiritual patrimony. Members of the Church of the East and the Chaldean Catholic Church are spread throughout the world, with greatest numbers in Iraq, southern Turkey, Iran, and most recently the United States (especially Illinois, Michigan, and California), France, and Australia. This entry will trace the historical development and particularities of the rite, outline the structure of its Eucharistic liturgy, and give brief comment on the daily office, liturgical cycle, and other liturgical celebrations.

Origins of the East Syrian Liturgical Rite. The strongly biblical East Syrian rite developed in the Persian Empire and is also influenced by the culture of Mesopotamia. Debate surrounds the origins of Christianity in the Mesopotamia and Persia, a region torn by turbulent political battles. The Roman Empire expanded its boundaries to the east, acquiring Syria, which became an imperial province in 27 B.C. Further campaigns extended the boundaries to the Euphrates River, which marked the boundary with the Parthian Empire. There were frequent invasions and regressions through the 2d century. Orshoene, with its capital Edessa, became a client kingdom of Rome c. A.D. 166. Rome took over Mesopotamia and made it a province, seized Nisibis, and went south to Babylon and Seleucia. The roads that the Roman armies traveled were also the trade routes that linked Antioch in the west with Iran and India in the east. It is likely that Christianity came early on via these trade routes, and they facilitated the Church of the East's missionary activity that extended to India and even to China along the silk route. In the early 3d century, Ardahshir I of the Persian Sassanian dynasty conquered the Parthians and reigned as king from 226 to 241, when he was succeeded by his son Shapur I (241–272). The Sassanid dynasty would reign for 500 more years. This development led to a certain marginalization of the Church of the East from the Greekand Latin-speaking Great Church of the Mediterranean basin.

A thorough and critical history of the East Syrian liturgy is still wanting. Scholars have generally traced two lines of influence on the development of the early Syriac tradition in general, which were then extended to the East Syrian liturgy in particular. The first line of thinking posits a substantial influence of Jewish liturgical traditions on early Syrian Christianity. The second traces the origins of the Syriac-speaking churches to Antioch, a strongly hellenized church. Following the common line of thinking, East Syrian liturgy has its roots in the liturgical tradition of Antioch influenced by Jewish liturgical usages.

In the late 20th century this thesis was challenged by scholars. Following William Macomber, the ordinary assumption that the East Syrian liturgy is a branch of the Antiochene liturgy is false. Rather, careful study of the Eucharistic and baptismal liturgies suggests that the East Syrian liturgy is sui generis. He proposes that around 400, there were three major liturgical centers: Antioch, Jerusalem, and Edessa. While the Antiochene rite was followed by the Greek-speaking region and the Jerusalem rite in Palestine, the Syriac-speaking Christians to the East followed the rite of Edessa. How uniform this rite was, however, is sheer speculation, since the documentary evidence is scarce. The synod held in Seleucia-Ctesiphon in 410 intended to organize the Church of the East following a period of persecution. It called for the rite used by the bishops of the major center of Seleucia-Ctesiphon (near Babylon) and Maypriqat (to the north at the source of the Tigris) to replace local variants. Macomber judges that the rite in question is that of Edessa, which came to prevail throughout the region, but there is little empirical evidence to support his assumption. The upheaval after the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon led to further developments. The rise of monophysitism in Edessa resulted in the move of the followers of Theodore of Mopsuestia, subsequently known as "Nestorians" because of Theodore's student, to Nisibis where Edessene usage continued in Persia until the Arab invasions in the 7th century forced restructuring.

Few sources survive for tracing the elements and characteristics of the so-called antique Edessene rite. Extant witnesses allow a few generalizations about this rite. First, the early Syriac-speaking Christian communities of the region had a distinctive euchological pattern. The accounts of missionary Eucharist and baptism in the apocryphal Acts of Thomas and Acts of John are taken by scholars as witnesses for emerging liturgical practice and coalescing oral tradition in the late 3d century. These accounts suggest a developing form of a strongly epicletic and eschatological euchology. To this day, the euchology is also strongly doxological, focused on giving praise and glory to God.

A distinctive euchological pattern also appears in the oldest extant anaphora, the anaphora of Addai and Mari, the core of which dates to the early 3d century and is still used by the Church of the East today. Unlike Antiochene anaphoras whose subgenres are ordered anamnesissupper narrative-epiclesis-intercession, Addai and Mari places the epiclesis as the last element, leading into the doxology. It is a fairly undeveloped epiclesis, compared to the more lengthy epicleses of the Acts. The anaphora had a Sanctus, and most likely its original form lacked a supper narrative, a tradition preserved by the Assyrian Church of the East. The anaphora has been judged to be an original Syriac composition and has certain affinities to Jewish prayer forms.

The second observation about the formative period of the East Syrian liturgy concerns the development of the liturgy of the word. As the house-church and missionary celebrations gave way to larger-scale public celebrations, the East Syrian Christians built churches—the oldest of which date from the 4th century—whose apses were filled with an altar, rather than the seats for clergy that are found in the rest of the East and West. In the middle of the nave is a large walled-in platform known as the $b\hat{e}m\hat{a}$ that contains a throne used for the gospel book and cross and seats for the bishop and clergy and that was the center for the liturgy of the word. Scholars debate the possible influence of the Jewish synagogue on the Christian $b\hat{e}m\hat{a}$.

With regard to what Scripture was read at the bêmâ, Anton Baumstark argues that the earliest Syriac lectionary reflects the continuation of a synagogal system that was coming to be replaced by new Christian material drawn from a variety of sources of different provenance. Before the 7th century, several lectionary systems coexisted. One witness, dubbed the early Syriac lectionary (MS London, British Library, Additional 14528), shows an exuberance for Old Testament lections. In the 7th century, the liturgical reform of Ishôcyahb III led to a standardization of the lectionary system and fixed the number of reading to four for the East Syrian Church: two Old Testament (one law, one prophets) and two New Testament (one epistle and one Gospel). The revised lectionary reflects the influence of the Jerusalem system and the confluence of cathedral and monastic systems. In addition to psalmody, the singing of madrāshê (narrative songs) sôgyātâ (dialogue poems) and perhaps mêmrê (metrical homilies) complemented the proclamation of Scripture.

The third important and distinctive aspect of the East Syrian rite is its baptismal liturgy. To this day, the baptismal liturgy is dominated by the imagery and theology of the baptism of Jesus in the Jordan, the imagery of divine adoption, messianic configuration, rebirth, and transformation by the Holy Spirit. The original shape of the East Syrian rite is a prebaptismal anointing followed by water bath and Eucharist. In contrast to the Greek rites, the prebaptismal anointing is strongly pneumatic and messianic rather than exorcisitic or apotropaic. The East Syrian rite eventually adopted a postbaptismal chrismation under influence of the West. The early theologies of Eucharist, baptism, and anointing are given classic poetic expression in the hymns of Ephrem (d. 373). Further significant influence on the developing East Syrian liturgy comes from the School of Nisibis and the work of Narsai (d. 502). In addition to his commentary on the holy mysteries, Narsai's literary legacy includes a number of liturgical compositions.

Structuration (6th–7th Centuries): Reform of Ishô-cyahb III. In the aftermath of the doctrinal controversies and ecclesiastical division in the 5th century, the diversity and variety of local usages gradually give way to more consolidation and structuring in the 6th century.

The following account draws on the work of A. Baumstark, P. Youssif, W. Macomber, S. Jammo, and J. Mateos. Patriarch Abâ I (540-552) played an important role in the introduction of new elements to the East Syrian rite. Abâ I traveled widely before becoming patriarch in 540 and introduced liturgical souvenirs in the form of the Byzantine Trisagion and the "Angel of Peace" litany. He is also reputed to have composed many mêmrê, tûrgāmê, and antiphonal qānônê (psalmody and refrains). According to headings of later manuscripts, he also introduced two new anaphoras to the liturgy, honorifically attrributed to Theodore of Mopsuestia and Nestorius, respectively. The 6th century also marked the end of the catechumenate and its associated rituals. Crucial information on the period comes from the commentary of Gabriel Qatrayâ (615).

A powerful influence on liturgical development following the Arab conquest and collapse of the Persian Empire comes from Ishôcyahb III (580-659) at the upper monastery of Mar Gabriel in Mosul. He is credited with an extensive liturgical standardization and reform that involved the liturgical books and the calendar. Ishôcyahb III redacted a liturgical book of continuing importance, the hûdrâ ("cycle" or "course"). The hûdrâ contains all of the propers texts for the office and Eucharist for the Sundays and feasts of the year, except some more recent feasts. It conformed much of the usage to the liturgy of Mar Gabriel, also known as the Upper Monastery, on the bank of the Tigris River near Mosul. Though late in the manuscript tradition, a number of private prayers of the priest-celebrant, called kûshāconpê, also came to infiltrate the liturgy, including the anaphora.

Further textual reform by Ishô^cyahb III fixed the number of anaphoras at three (Addai and Mari, Theodore, and Nestorius) and assigned when they would be used. He is reputed to have drawn up the ordo or euchologion called the taksâ. As he compiled the rites of baptism, pardon, ordination, and consecration of a church/altar, he may well have revised them. Ishô^cyahb III is also credited with celebrated liturgical refrains and madrāshê. Finally, he established norms for the liturgy of the hours.

Information about subsequent interpolations and ritual changes in the liturgy comes from liturgical commentaries. The 7th-century commentary of Gabriel Bar Lipāh Qaṭrāyâ (sections relevant to the Eucharist are in Jammo in Latin translation) describes a liturgy much the same as the modern. His relative Abraham Bar Lipāh Qaṭrāyâ produced basically the same commentary in questionand-answer form, though he occasionally offers his own interpretations (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium 72, SS 29). The most detailed commentary describes the liturgy of a bishop probably in a city-church because of the elaborate ceremony. The author is not identified and so is known conventionally as the anony-mous commentary (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium 64 and 72); it took on particular weight in the tradition of liturgical commentary in the East Syrian Church. The terminus a quo of this commentary is 780, but its terminus ad quem is uncertain. It is generally dated to the 9th or 10th century.

Composition and Codification. The 10th to 13th centuries mark the end of effervescent composition and the filling out of the monastic offices. Patriarch Elias III (d. 1190), also known as Abu Halim, composed a number of prayers collected in the eponymous liturgical book Abu Halim. George Wardâ crafted poetic refrains, compiled into the eponymous liturgical book, the wardâ (literally, "the rose") along with similar composition by other contemporaries. Baumstark dated it from the 13th century. The gaza (treasure) also dates from the 13th century and fills out what is missing in the hûdrâ for night vigils and later other feasts of the Lord not observed on Sunday and some commemorations of the saints.

After this period of composition and codification of liturgical texts, the East Syrian liturgy underwent further developments as a result of unification with Rome, Latinization, and western missionary influence. Two rival patriarchates fostered two distinct styles of performance. Back-and-forth shifts to unity with Rome affected the liturgical life of the Church of the East. W. Macomber has explored these developments. First, the uniates simplified the ritual of their liturgy, while the original patriarchate lines kept more elaborate ritual actions known as the Alqosh usage. The liturgical texts of the two churches, though, remained the same, apart from some minor variants. Nevertheless, the usage of Alqosh eventually supplanted the simplified liturgy of the first uniate patriarchate. The uniate liturgy underwent further Latinizations when the uniate patriarch was established in Diyarbakir. Patriarch Joseph I's successor also introduced several elements from the Maronite liturgy.

In the following two centuries, the Chaldean Catholic patriarchate of Diyarbakir and the nonuniate patriarchate of Alqosh did attempt liturgical unification, but their rivalry impeded its success. With Abdisho^c V (1894–1899) a serious reform began, but the liturgy he submitted drew opposition from Diyarbakir because it set out the usage of Alqosh. Under Emmanuel II Thomas (1900–1947) a compromise was reached that essentially retained the rite of Alqosh. Throughout this period, the Assyrian Church of the East suffered from repeated massacres and forced emigration.

A major development for the standardization of the liturgy came with arrival of missionaries in the 18th through early 20th century. Anglicans, Presbyterians, Lutherans, Baptists, Roman Catholics, and Russian Orthodox took great interest in the Church of the East, building schools, welfare centers, and hospitals as well as trying to reclaim the Nestorians. The Lazarist and Anglican missionaries to the East also imported a few Westernisms in the Alqosh liturgy. It was the efforts of these missionaries, however, that led to the printing and publishing of the East Syrian liturgical texts. For the first time in its history, major manuscripts gave way to printed and bound books patterned after the Western breviary and missal.

By the late 20th century, there were nine editions of the missal that, despite the standardization of the printing press, still vary one from the other. Among the missals, the edition of J. Kelaytâ (The Liturgy of the Church of the East [Mosul, 1928]) has been considered the most representative of the manuscript missal traditions. This 'missal' (really a taksâ) contains the ordinary of the Eucharistic liturgy and several other rites. The propers are found in the $h\hat{u}dr\hat{a}$ or its supplement. This edition was reissued in 1959 by Archbishop Darmo. It was published again in 1971 by the Chaldeans who cleared away remaining Latinisms and set Algosh rubrics as part of liturgical renewal inspired by Vatican II. With regard to the hûdrâ, the Chaldean (Catholic) version reflects the desire of the editors to avoid expressions that could be construed as Nestorian. The Church of the East hûdrâ has been edited and published by T. Darmo.

Structure of the Current Eucharistic Liturgy. The celebration of the holy mysteries $(r\bar{a}z\hat{e} qadish\hat{e})$ in the current East Syrian rite opens with an office of praise that includes the Lord's Prayer with a refrain that emphasizes God's holiness, psalmody, presidential prayers, the proper anthem of the rails, procession to the bêmâ, incensation, the lakûmarâ (To you, O Lord) hymn unique to the East Syrian rite, and veneration of the cross. At the bêmâ the trisagion is intoned and a presidential collect invokes God as glorious and immortal.

The liturgy of the word includes two Old Testament readings, a verse of psalmody, an exhortation, the epistle reading, imposition of incense, gospel procession, the praise verse and alleluia, Gospel, an optional homily, and the diaconal litanic prayers known as the karôzûtâ.

The liturgy of the Eucharist opens with prostration of the ministers and dismissal of the noncommunicants. The transfer of the gifts and procession to the altar are accompanied by the anthem of the mysteries. When the gifts are deposed, the creed with particular variations is intoned. After preparatory prayers of access, the peace is exchanged and the anphora begins after diaconal proclamation. The anaphora itself is interspersed with private prayers of the priest celebrant. Penitential prayers of the priest celebrant follow the conclusion of the anaphora, followed by an incensation and elevation of the elements. The fraction and consignation follow, with a diaconal proclamation, prayer of absolution, and the Lord's prayer. The call to communion is followed by the versicle "Awesome are you," adoring God. The veil is opened and the elements presented to the people. In the Assyrian Church of the East, the clergy take communion after the people; even the clergy do not take communion themselves but receive communion from another minister. Communion is under both forms while the anthem of the bêmâ is sung. The praise, teshbôhtâ, follows. Concluding prayers and the blessing end the liturgy.

Daily Prayer. The office has been studied in detail by J. Mateos and R. Taft. The liturgy of the hours of the East Syrian rite has retained an essentially cathedral, or popular, character, with monastic influence noted in the lesser hours celebrated only during Great Fast. In the 7th century at the Synod of Darin the laity were enjoined to come to morning and evening prayer in the local church rather than a monastery or at home. The office also reflect the historical developments traced in the periods above. Several types of vigils, known as lelyâ are celebrated depending on the feast day. Morning prayer, saprâ, includes fixed morning psalmody, and on festal days incense, the hymn of light, and the hymn known as the Gloria in the Roman West. Evening prayer, ramshâ, has had the ninth hour office attached to it over time, but its core reflects the fixed vesperal psalmody, litanies, and a stational procession. The daily and festal office is integral to unfolding of the liturgical cycle and a primary expression of the the Church of the East's rich theology.

Liturgical Cycle. In conjunction with the arrangement of the liturgical material, Ishô^cyahb III is also reputed to have fixed the liturgical cycle. The East Syrian liturgical cycle is designated shabo^ce, which means "seven," derived from the common way Mesopotamian and West Asian cultures marked time in 50-day periods of seven weeks plus a day. The seasons are as follows: Annunciation (4 weeks), Epiphany (7 weeks), Fast (7 weeks), Resurrection (7 weeks), Apostles (7 weeks), Summer (7 weeks), Elias (7 weeks), Moses (7 weeks), and Dedication (4 weeks), which has an eschatological color. Due to the variable date of Pasch and Epiphany, however, the seasons are often shortened. The Season of Moses is rarely more than four weeks, and often just one Sunday. Summer is markedly penitential.

Other Liturgical Celebrations. The East Syrian rites' unique characteristics are also apparent in its other liturgical celebrations. Its initiation liturgy is noted above. The marriage liturgy has preserved a number of usages, including common drinking of a mixture of ash from a martyr or saint's shrine and wine, blessing of the bridal robes, crowning before the lections, rich hymnody, and the making of the bed chamber. The henanâ, a mixture of oil, water, and dust or ash from a saint or martyr's shrine, is given to the sick; unction of the sick has fallen into disuse. Holy Order focuses on the laying on of hands with epicletic prayer, and there are different burial rites for clergy and laity. Penance, though in disuse, retains a public character; in most cases a Rite of Pardon (taksâ dhûsayâ) is celebrated in preparation for communion. The Chaldeans, however, adopted and adapted Latin rites for many of the sacramental celebrations.

Bibliography: An extensive bibliography through 1990 is available in P. YOUSIF, ed. Classified Bibliography on the East Syrian Liturgy/La bibliographie classifiée de la liturgie syrienne orientale (Rome 1990). S. BROCK, "The 'Nestorian' Church: A Lamentable Misnomer," Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester 78 (1996) 23-35. A. BAUMSTARK, Nichtevangelische syrische Perikopenordnungen der ersten Jahrtausends (Munster 1921); Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1968). T. DARMO, ed. Ktābâ dqdām wdbātar wdhûdrâ wdkashkôl wdgazâ wqālâ d^c ûdrānê ^c am ktâbâ dmazmôrê, 3 v. (Trichur 1960-61). A. GELSTON, The Eucharistic Prayer of Addai and Mari (Oxford 1992). S. GRIFFITH, "Spirit in the Bread; Fire in the Wine: The Eucharist as 'Living Medicine' in the Thought of Ephraem the Syrian," Modern Theology 15 (1999) 225-246. S. Y. H. JAMMO, La Structure de la Messe Chaldéene du Début jusqu'à l'Anaphore. Étude historique, OCA 207 (Rome 1979). W. F. MA-COMBER, "A Theory on the Origins of the Syrian, Maronite and Chaldean Rites," OCP 39 (1973) 235-242; "A History of the Chaldean Mass," Worship 51 (1977) 107-120. J. MATEOS, Lelva-Sapra. Les Offices chaldéens de la nuit et du matin, 2d ed. OCA 156 (Rome 1972). E. RENHART, "Encore une Fois: Le Bēmā des Églises de la Syrie du Nord''; Parole de l'Orient 20 (1995) 85-94. G. A. M. ROUWHORST, "Jewish Liturgical Traditions in Early Syriac Christianity," Vigiliae Christianae 51 (1997) 77-93. P. YOUSIF, "Appunti sulla preghiera liturgica del rito caldeo e malabarese" (Pontificio Istituto Orientale, Rome 1983, photocopy); "The Divine Liturgy According to the Rite of the Assyro-Chaldean Church," in The Eucharistic Liturgy in the Christian East, ed. J. MADEY (Kerala and Paderborn 1982) 175-237; "Le Déroulement de la messe chaldéene," in Eucharistie: Célébrations, rites, piétés, BELS 79 (Rome 1995); L'Eucharistie chez saint Éphrem de Nisibe, OCA 224 (Rome 1984). G. WINKLER, "Zur frühchristlichen Tauftradition in Syrien und Armenien unter Einbezug der Taufe Jesu." Ostkirchliche Studien 27 (1978) 154-172; "Weitere Beobachtungen zur frühen Epiklese (den Doxologie und dem Sanctus). Über die Bedeutung der Apokryphen für die Einforschung der Entwicklung der Riten," Oriens Christianus 80 (1996) 177-200. R. TAFT, The Liturgy of the Hours in East and West: The Origins of the Divine Office and Its Meaning for Today (Collegeville, Minn. 1986).

[R. E. MCCARRON]

EAST TIMOR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Also known as Timor Lorosae, East Timor lies in the Lesser Sunda Islands in the Indonesian archipelago, between 8 and 10 degrees eastern longitude and between 123 and 127 degrees northern latitude, 375 km south of the equator, to the north of AUSTRALIA and west of Papua New Guinea.

The Portuguese arrived in Timor sometime between 1512 and 1522. They officially annexed the area as a Portuguese territory with the appointment of a governor for Timor and Solor in 1702. During this period there were frequent and sometimes violent territorial disputes with the Dutch, who also claimed portions of the islands. From 1702 Portugal administered the area from Goa in India and toward the end of the 19th century from Macau in China. Portugal and the Netherlands established the boundary between their respective territories in 1859. In 1896 Portuguese-controlled East Timor received the status of an autonomous district and in 1909 became a Portuguese overseas province with its own governor and with financial and administrative autonomy.

With the departure of the Dutch from their colonial possessions in Southeast Asia, Dutch Timor became part of Indonesia and was renamed West Timor. East Timor remained under Portuguese control until 1975. After the Portuguese withdrew, Indonesia annexed and administered the territory from 1975 to 1999. The local population voted overwhelmingly for independence from Indonesia in a 1999 referendum. Shortly after, Indonesian-backed militias went on a rampage, killing clergy, religious and innocent civilians, destroying the territory's infrastructure and forcibly displacing the local populace. The United Nations intervened, sending peacekeepers and establishing the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) with the objective of assisting the East Timorese to full nationhood.

The first known missioner in East Timor was the Dominican Antonio Taveira, who came from the neighboring island of Flores and baptized some 5,000 Timorese, probably in Lifao, Oe-cusse, shortly before 1556. He and his confreres sought to convert the local chieftains, whose subjects might then also enter the Church. The converted rulers became vassals of Portugal, obliged to pay tribute and supply soldiers during wartime. With the arrival of 20 new missioners in 1641, pastoral work on the coast became more routine. In the 17th century the mission was controlled by the "black Portuguese," or Topass, i.e., the royal mestizo families of da Costa and d'Ornay. Only in 1702 was a permanent mission centre established in Timor, at Lifao, which was transferred to Dili in 1769. A minor seminary was established in Oe-cusse in 1734. With the Dutch conquest of Portuguese Malacca in 1641, King John V ordered the Portuguese bishop of Malacca to reside in Timor.

The Timor mission was almost totally neglected during the 18th century. Unrest caused the Portuguese to Capital: Dili.

Size: East Timor (Timor Lorosae) occupies: (1) an area of 14,609 sq. km. comprising the eastern half of the island of Timor, (2) Oe-cusse, an enclave of 524.8 sq. km. on the northern, Indonesian province of West Timor, and (3) the neighboring islands of Atauro and Jaco, totalling 92.8 sq. km. Population: The local Maubere population is a mix of Negroid, Melanesian and Malay. There is a small ethnic Chinese community. Languages: Some 31 languages and dialects are spoken in the east and just five in the west of the territory. By far the most widely spoken is Tetum which East Timor shares with the Belu district of West Timor. Dawan is spoken in the Oe-cussi enclave. Other smaller East Timorese languages include Kemak and Bunak on the border with West Timor. These local languages belong to the Austronesian family of languages. Religions: About 85% of the indigenous East Timorese are Roman Catholics. Protestant Christians are small but growing. The Chinese community is predominantly Taoist and Buddhist. The Muslim community is comprised almost exclusively of migrants from Indonesia who have not fled with the departing Indonesian soldiers and militias in 1999.

Dioceses: (immediately subject to the Holy See): Dili, Bacau, Seme.

withdraw in 1729, only returning in 1748. In 1754 there were ten Dominicans on Timor and according to contemporary records, Timor had some 50 churches in 1780. From 1811 to 1824 there remained just a single friar, and for the following three years no resident priest at all. During this time Dominicans from Dili also had responsibility for Christians on the neighbouring islands of Flores and Solor. The Dominicans retained some political and commercial power until early in the 19th century. This arrangement caused friction with the lay officials and led to a virtual identification of ecclesial and colonial authority in the eyes of the Timorese.

The anticlericalism of the liberal politicians in Portugal gravely injured the mission during the 19th century. Portugal decreed the expulsion of religious orders in 1834 and the Dominicans departed. Four years later Dili was transferred to Goa from where diocesan clergy arrived. A report (c. 1850) speaks of polygamy being the norm and churches empty and unkempt. The situation improved after 1874 when Timor was transferred to Macau, and 11 secular priests arrived. Three years later the first parishes were established. In 1898 four Jesuits arrived and opened a college and meteorological observatory. By 1900 there were 16 schools for boys and four for girls. In 1910 Portugal again expelled religious and restricted the activities of the secular priests, whose numbers declined from 22 in 1910 to ten in 1924. The Salesians (SDB) opened a technical school in 1927 at Fatumaca, near Bacau. The SDB soon became the largest religious congregation in the territory. In 1930 there were 18,984 Catholics and 958 catechumens. A minor seminary was opened in 1936 at Saibada which, in 1954, was transferred to Dare, where it is today. The graduates continued their higher studies in Macau or Portugal. In 1940 Dili was separated from Macau and established as a diocese in its own right.

Japanese occupation during the Pacific War (1942-45) was traumatic. A reinforcement of 400 Australian troops arrived in December 1941, and this small Australian force squared off against 21,000 Japanese with the support of the Timorese. In response, the Japanese forces sacked Dili and ravaged the countryside. Some 40,000 Timorese died through bombardment and starvation. Three priests were assassinated by the Japanese, six fled to the mountains with their people while ten escaped to Australia. In 1946 the Portuguese returned to East Timor and reasserted their control.

Until the end of the 1960s the majority of the East Timorese, then numbering about 560,000, still clung to their traditional religion. Most of the 5,300 Chinese traders were Buddhists, with just 490 Catholics among them. There were also only 380 Muslim traders and a mere 100 Protestants in the capital at Dili. Catholics totalled 113,500, or approximately 20 percent of the population. They included most land owners and officials, for whom baptism became the avenue for advancement under the Portuguese. There were 44 clergy of whom 30 were diocesan, nine Salesian (SDB) and five Jesuit (SJ). Just seven were indigenous Timorese. Sisters numbered 37 with just six Timorese; there were 12 Brothers. There were three secondary and 41 primary schools. This stable situation was violently disrupted when Indonesia invaded in December 1975.

A bloodless, left-wing coup by the Portuguese army on April 25, 1974, ended the 48-year dictatorship in Lisbon and led to a rapid process of decolonization for East Timor. Civil fighting broke out in August 1975, instigated by Indonesian intelligence operatives under "Operation Komodo." On Dec. 7, 1975, with the support of the United States, Britain and Australia, Indonesia invaded East Timor and formally annexed the territory in July 1976. The brutality and greed of the occupying force led to strong resistance by the Timorese. Through aerial bombardment and a war-related famine, over a third of the population-perhaps as many as 40 percentperished in two major assaults in 1976 and 1979. The population decreased from over 700,000 to approximately 540,000. This traumatic genocide went virtually unreported in the outside world. Almost 90 percent of livestock belonging to the indigenous community were wiped out.

Martinho da Costa Lopes, apostolic administrator of Dili from 1978 to 1983, became the voice of the voiceless, but, after condemning atrocities, was removed from office by the Vatican under Indonesian pressure. The Salesian Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo (b. 1948) was appointed his successor in 1983 and ordained bishop in 1988. Within months of his appointment, Bishop Belo himself began condemning Indonesian military atrocities, becoming the one credible voice courageously speaking the truth from within the territory. He maintained that only by acknowledging the authentic ethnic, cultural and religious identity of the Timorese could their human dignity be restored. For 16 years Bishop Belo walked a tightrope between voicing the aspirations of the people and keeping in contact with the occupying forces. Meanwhile from Australia and New York, Jose Ramos-Horta led the campaign for an independent Timorese state. The surreptitiously filmed massacre of Nov. 12, 1991-when 200 to 300 unarmed mourners of the 18-year-old student, Sebastiao Gomes Rangel were gunned down and bayoneted in cold blood at Santa Cruz Cemetery-shocked the world and led to mounting international pressure on the Indonesian authorities. In defiance of worldwide condemnation, the Special Forces Command (Kopassus) under General Prabowo Subianto, Soeharto's son-in-law, instigated further religious conflict in 1995. On Oct 11, 1996, Bishop Belo and Jose Ramos-Horta received the Nobel Prize for Peace in recognition of their courageous efforts.

Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, giving a homily, Dili, East Timor, photograph by Muchtar Zakaria. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Throughout this period of turmoil, religious congregations came from Indonesia to complement the longstanding Jesuits and Salesians, including the Divine Word Missionaries (SVD) in 1980, the Franciscans (OFM), and diocesan Sisters from Larantuka (PRR) and Ende (CIY) in Flores. The Church was the one bulwark that defended the dignity and rights of the people. Unsurprisingly, the Church grew rapidly to encompass 36 percent of the population by 1985 and 83 percent of the diocese of Dili and 89 percent of the diocese of Bacau by 1999. Meanwhile Protestants grew to 12 percent, while a majority of the approximately 100,000 migrants from Indonesia were Muslim. A training college for teachers of religious education was opened in Bacau in 1984. In Dili a Pastoral Institute was entrusted to the SVD in 1987. By 1996 there were 30 parishes. In November 1996 East Timor was divided into two dioceses; Dili which remained under Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo while Bishop Basilio Do Nascimenito was ordained for the new Diocese of Bacau.

The monetary crisis in Southeast Asia in 1997 and the toppling of Soeharto after 32 years of dictatorship the following year broke Indonesia's hold on East Timor. Xanana Gusmao, poet, intellectual, and the Timorese resistance leader, who had been imprisoned in Cipinang Prison, Jakarta, since 1992, was released to house arrest. In May 1999 agreement was reached with Portugal to hold a referendum under United Nations auspices at the end of August. With virtually no preparation and no withdrawal of the occupying forces, a catastrophe was inevitable. Repeated warnings by Bishop Belo went unheeded. Despite months of intimidation and terrorism by Indonesian trained militia gangs and strategic massacres, the most brutal of which was that at Liquica on April 6, 1999, an overwhelming 78 percent of registered voters chose independence. The result was announced on Sept. 5, 1999. That same evening, Indonesian army personnel, together with the militia thugs they had trained, ravaged the country. Virtually every town and village was set on fire, including the harvest in the fields. Eyewitnesses fleeing the violence reported wholesale massacres by marauding militias, including the cold-blooded slaughter on Sept. 6, 1999, of some 100 Timorese who sought shelter in a Catholic church in Suai and the three priests who attempted to shield them, Fr. Hilario Madeira, Fr. Francisco Tavares dos Reis, and Jesuit Fr. Tarcisius Dewanto. Many priests, nuns, religious and seminarians were executed as a reprisal for the Catholic Church's support of East Timorese independence, including the head of Caritas East Timor, Fr Francisco Barreto, killed on September 9, and Jesuit Fr. Karl Albrecht Karim Arbie, head of the Jesuit Refugee Service, killed on September 11. International condemnation of the massacres led to the deployment of a United Nations peace-keeping force. By the time of their arrival, about 60,000 East Timorese had been massacred, 150,000 were hiding in the hills, and 200,000 (about one-third of the population) had fled to Indonesian-controlled West Timor.

Devastated but free, East Timor as a new nation faced a crisis of immense proportions. Two-thirds of youngsters over 15 years of age had never been to school because schools were closed due to the 1975–78 war. A scarcity of trained teachers resulted from the fact that some 86 percent of junior high school teachers and 97 percent in senior high schools had been ethnic Indonesians who fled back to Indonesia after the 1999 referendum. In 1996 the United Nations reported that East Timor had the worst infant mortality rate of the world's 30 least developed countries, some 135 deaths per 1,000 births. At the beginning of the 21st century, this grim picture remained unchanged.

The Catholic Church continued to play an active role in reconstruction and nation building. To accommodate church growth, a third diocese at Seme was erected in 2001. The Diocese of Dili had begun to run the Timor Kmanek radio station. Missionaries returned to assist in the rebuilding of civil society and the Church, as well as preparing the people for independent nationhood.

Bibliography: C. R. BOXER, Fidalgos in the Far East 1550-1770 (London 1968); The Portuguese Seaborn Empire 1415-1825 (London 1969). J. DUNN, East Timor: A People Betrayed (Australia 1983). A. S. KOHEN, From the Place of the Dead. The Epic Struggles of Bishop Belo of East Timor (New York 1999). R. LENNOX, Fighting Spirit of East Timor. The Life of Martinho da Costa Lopes (London 2000). J. G. TAYLOR, Indonesia's Forgotten War: The Hidden History of East Timor (London 1991); East Timor: The Price of Freedom (London 1999).

[J. M. PRIOR]

EASTER AND ITS CYCLE

Easter is the central liturgical season of the Church year, with the Easter season, the 50 days between Easter Sunday and Pentecost, celebrated as one great feast day, the "great Sunday." Since Bede the Venerable (De ratione temporum 1:5) the origin of the term for the feast of Christ's Resurrection has been popularly considered to be from the Anglo-Saxon Eastre, a goddess of spring. Another ancient name that has become more common with the renewal of Biblical studies and the liturgy is Pasch, from the Greek transliteration $\pi \dot{\alpha} \sigma \chi \alpha$ of the Aramaic word for the Hebrew pesach, passover. In the first three centuries Pasch referred to the annual celebration of Christ's Passion and Death; from the end of the 4th century it designated also the EASTER VIGIL; from the 5th century it was reserved more for Easter itself.

Priest saying Easter Mass, covered baskets in the aisle contain the Easter breakfast food, Morave, Slovenia, 1996. (Bojan Brecelj/ CORBIS)

History. In Exodus 12.11 and Numbers 28.16 pesach is used to describe the passage of Yahweh or His angel on the night of Israel's deliverance out of Egyptian slavery. The Hebrews had been commanded to slaughter a lamb and sprinkle blood on their doorposts; the angel then passed over their homes to destroy only the firstborn sons of the Egyptians. Passover referred also to exodus itself and the entrance into the promised land. The term came to be related to the return from Babylonian captivity as the new passover; it also developed an eschatological note referring to the final messianic deliverance. The Old Testament Passover feast joined these themes with those of a primitive spring harvest feast in which the first fruits of grain and flock were offered to the Lord. The primitive liturgical year was composed simply of the regular Sunday celebrations together with the two annual feasts of the Pasch and Pentecost. This simplicity does not reveal so much a poverty of imagination as the vital characteristic of early Christian spirituality: a deep awareness of the risen Christ ever present, ever coming. Every celebration, both the weekly and the annual, was inspired with this awareness. Both this eschatological emphasis and this simple liturgical structure of the year were developments of the apostolic period. Only later evidence shows a growing tendency that has become characteristic, but that is being balanced by regaining a fuller understanding of the Resurrection and ESCHATOLOGY.

The early Christians celebrated Easter as the commemoration par excellence of Christ's Resurrection, but together with the conviction that by initiation into the Church they too had died and risen and ascended with Christ, that by the celebration of each Eucharist they deepened their assimilation to Christ and called for their definitive and full union with Him before the Father. It was natural that they would transform the annual Jewish Passover into their own principal festival.

Date. Not only was the significance of the Jewish feast changed by the Christians, but also the date. The Jewish method of fixing the date, the 14th day of Nisan, did not confine it to any one day; at a very early time Christians began to assign their Pasch to the Sunday following the Jewish feast. By the end of the 2d century this was the universal custom except in Asia Minor, where the Jewish dating was followed by the so-called QUARTODE-

Easter Week procession, Valletta, Malta. (© Bob Krist/CORBIS)

CIMANS. The EASTER CONTROVERSY was settled to some extent by a series of councils and synods in the late 2d and early 3d centuries under Victor I. The Council of Nicaea attempted to enforce uniformity by establishing the rule that the date of Easter fall on the Sunday following the full moon after the vernal equinox. However, because of divergent methods of reckoning, uniformity of observance was not achieved until DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS's work; and even then some provinces, such as Gaul and Britain, went their own way for some years. There is still a divergency of dating between those who follow the Gregorian calendar and those who follow the Julian.

Theme and Characteristics. The paschal mystery, the death and Resurrection of Christ, is the central theme of the Easter cycle—not merely as a historical commemoration, but as a here-and-now manifestation of His glorification in the Christian assembly, and as a fervent prayer for full realization of the Redemption. Like the Jewish Pasch, Easter celebrated deliverance from the slavery of time, sin, and death. Unlike the later Jewish feast, which looked to the coming messianic times, it celebrated the deliverance as already having been achieved in Christ, and as shared by the Church, the Body of Christ. The richness of this theme began to unfold into others at an early date. Easter was considered the ideal time for the initiation of new members into the community of the saved, for their incorporation into the Body of Christ by Baptism, Confirmation, and first Eucharist. The practice led to the development of a preparatory period for Easter itself called LENT. The catechumens were expected to attend instructions, to undergo exorcisms, and to fast. In imitation, and in the wake of the 4th-century monasticascetic movement, there grew a sense of the need for personal preparation for all the faithful, who then began to participate in these exercises. Thus we find the themes of baptismal renewal, of fasting, penance, and prayer, of deepening understanding of and more intensive commitment to the mystery of Christ and the Church. The preparatory period came to be associated with Christ's 40-day fast and with the sorrowful events before His Resurrection (see HOLY WEEK). On the other side of Easter there developed more joyful themes associated with the appearances of the risen Christ to His disciples, His Ascension, and finally the sending of the Holy Spirit. Easter Week itself, as Lent, originally grew out of the initiatory practice: to celebrate the neophyte's new life in Christ.

Paschaltide. This period was originally designated Pentecost, from the Greek πεντηκοστή (literally 50th). The term originally referred to the 50-day duration of the Easter celebration. The Latin equivalent was Quinquagesima. At least from the beginning of the 3d century the Church celebrated these days as one continuous festival of redemption in Christ. All penitential observances were suspended. It was a transformation of the Jewish celebration between their PASSOVER and PENTECOST, during which they joyfully commemorated their possession of the promised land. It was only later that the first 40 days were seen as the time of the risen Christ with His disciples (the Church) before His Ascension, and the last ten days as a preparation for the descent of the Spirit. Originally, Easter itself was the celebration of the whole paschal mystery, death, Resurrection, Ascension, and sending of the Spirit; the 50 days were an extension of the full joy of the Easter Vigil.

Easter Week. After the example of Jewish practice, Easter enjoyed an octave by the 4th century. This octave seems to have been organized principally in view of the newly baptized, who assembled each day for the Eucharist and catechesis. In Rome a development took place between the 6th and 8th centuries. Since Baptism was celebrated during the Easter Vigil, the octave day was the following Saturday, when the neophytes laid aside their white robes. With the disappearance of adult Baptism the week lost its dominant baptismal character and became more the octave of Easter; in the last half of the 7th century the octave day was changed from Saturday to Sunday.

The Easter Sunday Mass came out of the 6th century to supply for the lack created by anticipating the Vigil earlier on Holy Saturday. With the restoration of the Vigil to its nocturnal setting and to its primacy as the Easter celebration, this later Sunday Morning Mass commemorating Christ's Resurrection understandably lost some of the importance it had enjoyed. Two themes characterize this week: that of the Resurrection, heard especially in the lessons, and that of Baptism, especially in the antiphons, taken from Psalms speaking of the exodus out of Egypt and entrance into the promised land.

Low Sunday (2nd Sunday of Easter). Even in early sources Low Sunday is ordinarily considered to be the octave of Easter. The day was also distinguished from the previous days by the fact that the neophytes had laid aside their baptismal robes. The real octave day of Easter was rather the 50th day, Pentecost, after the octave of octaves, emphasizing symbolically the fullness of salvation achieved by Christ in His Resurrection and by the Church in Christ.

Bibliography: T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville, Minn. 1991). A. J. MARTIMORT, ed. The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville, Minn. 1986). A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year, v. 3, The Paschal Triduum, the Eas ter Season (Collegeville, Minn. 1977). J. M. PIERCE, "Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages," in Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFF-MAN (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999) 161–85. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History & Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981).

[E. JOHNSON/T. KROSNICKI/EDS.]

EASTER CONTROVERSY

Controversy surrounded the determination of the date of Easter from the 2d to the 8th century, and is dealt with here as: (1) the QUARTODECIMAN, (2) the Roman-Alexandrian, and (3) the Celtic Easter controversies.

Quartodeciman Controversy. The Asiatic practice in the 2d century of observing Easter on the day of the Jewish Passover conflicted with the Roman custom of celebrating Easter on Sunday, the day of the Resurrection. Occasionally, the Quartodecimans celebrated Easter on the day that other Christians were observing Good Friday. Originally both observances were allowed, but gradually it was felt incongruous that Christians should celebrate Easter on a Jewish feast, and unity in celebrating the principal Christian feast was called for. However, an attempt by Pope VICTOR I (189–198) to impose Roman usage proved unsuccessful in the face of a determined opposition led by Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus. Although Quartodecimanism waned in the 3d century, it survived in some Asiatic Churches as late as the 5th century.

Roman-Alexandrian Controversy. In the beginning Christians depended on Jewish authorities to calculate the date of the Passover, and thus of Easter; but by the 3d century some Christians started to determine Easter independently. Since the date of the Passover (14th of Nisan) depends on a lunar calendar, there was a perennial problem of reconciling the shorter lunar calendar year with the longer solar year of the Julian calendar by the periodic addition of an intercalary month. It was obviously desirable to construct a cyclic arrangement so that Easter, a fixed day in the lunar calendar, would occur according to a predetermined pattern in the Julian calendar. Unfortunately, because of the complexities involved in the calculations, the number of years in the proposed cycles varied from place to place; thus the fixing of the date of Easter varied, affording the basis for a new series of controversies.

In Rome HIPPOLYTUS devised a 16-year cycle, beginning with the year 222; since its calculations were defective, it was replaced later in the century with an 84-year cycle. In the East ANATOLIUS OF LAODICEA (d. c. 282) constructed a calendar with a 19-year cycle, which was adopted at Alexandria. The Council of Arles (314) hoped to achieve uniformity by observing Easter on the same day as the See of Rome, which was charged with announcing the date in advance through circular letters. A similar effort was made in the East at the Council of Nicaea (325). The exact wording of the Nicene decree is uncertain, but it apparently approved the practice of celebrating Easter on the Sunday after both the 14th of Nisan and the vernal equinox, thus implicitly rejecting both Quartodeciman and Jewish calendars (Eusebius, Vita Constantini 3.17-20).

However, no one Easter cycle was universally accepted; rather, different cycles continued to prevail. During the 4th century, this frequently resulted in different dates for Easter (Ambrose, Epist. 23), though on occasion Alexandria accepted the Roman date and vice versa. After repeated efforts by Pope St. LEO I (440–461) to achieve uniformity between the divergent cycles of Rome (84 years) and Alexandria (19 years), Victorius of Aquitaine constructed a 532-year cycle under the patronage of Leo's successor, Hilary (461–468). During the Laurentian schism, the cycle of Victorius was followed by the antipope Laurentius; this resulted in the reintroduction of the 84-year cycle by the party of Pope SYMMACHUS (498–514).

In the East, the 19-year Anatolian cycle had been computed by Cyril of Alexandria for five cycles (436–531). Some years prior to its expiration, DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS, a monk in Rome, constructed an extension (to 626), which basically followed the 19-year cycle. Dionysius, however, decided to date his calendar, not from the era of Diocletian as Cyril had done, but from the birth of Christ. Unfortunately, the calculations of Dionysius in dating the "Christian Era" were inaccurate, but the system still remains in use (A.D. for anno Domini). The acceptance of this cycle in Rome ended Rome's long-standing controversy with Alexandria. Yet it was only in the 8th century that the cycle of Dionysius was universally adopted in Western Europe; according to Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 5.17; 10.23), the cycle of Victorius, retained by a minority, resulted in divergent celebrations of Easter in Gaul during the 6th century.

Celtic Easter Controversy. An 84-year cycle had been introduced into Ireland at the time of its Christianization in the 5th century; subsequently, the Irish monks and missionaries introduced their Celtic calendar in the regions where they settled, thus coming into conflict with Christians who followed other calendars. In Gaul, the monasteries established by St. COLUMBAN (c. 550–615) followed Celtic usages. This aroused considerable opposition from the Gallic bishops who accused Columban of being a Quartodeciman. Nonetheless, he continued to follow the Celtic practice at his monastery of Luxeuil. Sometime after his death, the Gallic calendar was introduced without any recorded opposition.

The Celtic calendar had been introduced also into England. With the arrival of AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY and the Roman missionaries sent by Pope Gregory I (590-604), an attempt to introduce the Roman calendar encountered opposition from the Christians following the Celtic custom. The dispute was carried into the royal family of Northumbria, where King Oswy, following Celtic usage, observed Easter, while Queen Eanfled, according to the Roman calendar, observed Palm Sunday. At an assembly convoked at Whitby (664), King Oswy, after hearing the arguments of St. COLMAN on behalf of the Celtic observance and of WILFRID OF YORK on behalf of the Roman usage, decided in favor of the latter in deference to the authority of St. Peter (Bede, Ecclesiastical History 3.25–26). Subsequently, Theodore of Tarsus (c. 602-690), Archbishop of Canterbury, undertook to extend the Roman calendar throughout England. In Scotland, the Roman usage was introduced by King Naitan in 710; acceptance followed at Iona a few years later (Bede, Eccl. Hist. 5.21–22), and by the 9th century it prevailed in Wales. Uniformity of Easter observance was thus attained in the British Isles.

Bibliography: C. C. RICHARDSON, "New Solution to the Quartodeciman Riddle," Journal of Theological Studies ns 24 (1973) 74–84. H. F. VON CAMPENHAUSEN, "Ostertermin oder Osterfasten: Zum Verständnis des Irenausbriefs an Viktor (Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History 5, 24,12–17)," Vigiliae Christianae 28:2 (1974) R. T. BECKWITH, "The Origin of the Festivals Easter and Whitsun," Studia Liturgica 13 (1979) 1–20 114–138. S. G. HALL, "The Origins of Easter," Studia Patristica 15:1 (1984) 554–567. W. L. PETERSEN, "Eusebius and the Paschal controversy," in Euse bius, Christianity, and Judaism (Detroit 1992) 311–325. K. STRAND, "Sunday Easter and Quartodecimanism in the Early Christian Church," Andrews University Seminary Studies 28 (1990) 127–136.

[J. FORD/EDS.]

EASTER VIGIL

Holy Saturday has been from earliest times consecrated to Our Lord's Sabbath rest, His burial in the tomb. The early Church in both East and West commemorated this burial by spending the day in rest, prayer, expectation of the Resurrection, and strict fasting. There was no Eucharistic liturgy or communion service of any kind. Today the Church keeps Holy Saturday in austere and quiet mourning because Christ her Bridegroom has been taken away from her and lies in the tomb. The theme of Morning Prayer on this day is the death and burial of Christ, and the descent into the dead.

Spirit

In the early Church the paschal feast was one unitive commemoration of the paschal mystery, representing the entire saving work of Christ, including the Passion, Resurrection, and the sending of the Spirit. In a very real sense the feast remains so, for it celebrates the whole achievement of the Paschal Lamb "who by dying destroyed our death and by rising restored our life" (Memorial Acclamation #2).

In spite of its name the Easter Vigil is not the vigil of Easter in the modern sense of the day before a feast but in the ancient sense of the night celebration of the greatest feast of the year. The Easter Vigil is not the preparation for Easter but the true celebration of Easter itself. St. Augustine calls the paschal vigil "the mother of all vigils" (Sermo 219; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 38:1088), by which he means that this is the most important vigil, or night watch, of the whole year. The reason why Pius XII in 1951 "restored" the Vigil to its proper place was to emphasize once again a truth that had become obscured with the passing of time: the Vigil is the Easter Feast.

Time of Celebration. The earliest references to Pascha (the ancient name for the unitive commemoration of the Redemption) show that it was essentially a night celebration. The apocryphal Epistula Apostolorum emanating from Asia Minor or Egypt bears witness to the nighttime celebration of the feast in the 2d century (J. Quasten, ed., Monumenta eucharista et liturgica vetustissima 336–37). Tertullian, writing about 250, calls the Vigil "abnoctantem" (Ad uxorem 2.4; Patrologia Latina 1:1294); and the Apostolic Constitutions (4th century) tells us that the faithful gathered at Vespers of Saturday and continued the Vigil service to the dawn of Easter Sunday (5.19.1; F. X. Funk, ed., Didascalia et constitutiones apostolorum 1:288–90).

Many other statements of Jerome, Augustine, and Paulinus of Nola leave no doubt that this was the consecrated practice both in the East and the West in antiquity [Comm. in evang. sec. Matt. 4.25.6 (Patrologia Latina 21:192); Sermo 219 and 228 (Patrologia Latina 38:1088, 1101); Vita s. Ambrosii 48 (Patrologia Latina 14:43)]. The Eastern Churches in fact never abandoned it, but in the West the Vigil was progressively anticipated, beginning in the 12th century when Roman Ordinal 10 (16; Patrologia Latina 78:1014) had the service start at noon. Before the end of the same century it was begun at 11 A.M. Holy Saturday (M. Andrieu, Le Pontifical Romain au moyen-âge 1:238).

By 1570 the Vigil had been advanced to the early hours of the morning, and the Missal of Pius V made this law. This was the situation that existed in the West until the reforms of Pius XII in 1951. The principal celebration of the greatest feast of the year was held a whole day ahead of time. This had the unhappy effect of deemphasizing the Easter Vigil and simultaneously eliminating any real observance of Holy Saturday as a day of quiet mourning. In restoring the Easter Vigil to its proper time after sundown on Holy Saturday, Pius XII was not merely reviving an ancient practice; he was restoring the feast of Easter to its proper place in the life of the Church. For the nighttime celebration is hardly a matter of sentiment; it is rooted in the very nature of the events it commemorates.

Reasons for Night Celebration. To answer the question why there is so much insistence on celebrating the paschal festival at night is not easy, because there are several reasons for it, and it is hard to say which one has had the greatest influence upon the practice. All of them have their importance and must be taken into account.

The first reason is that Easter is the feast of the triumph of light over the darkness and so the celebration calls for a setting in which this event can be dramatized by using the symbols of light and darkness to good effect (see LIGHT, LITURGICAL USE OF). Another is that Easter commemorates in a special way the Resurrection of Our Lord, and the Resurrection took place during the night.

Probably a night celebration was determined for this feast because Easter is the Christian Passover, the fulfillment of the Jewish Passover. The Jewish feast was always celebrated at night; it is natural that the Christian feast, which replaced it, would also be a nighttime feast.

The wording of the Exsultet gives considerable support to this.

An important part of the Jewish Passover service was the vigil, or night watch, that commemorated the vigil God Himself is represented as keeping through the night of the Exodus (Ex 12.29). God commanded them to observe the anniversary of the deliverance from Egypt as a festival day. By means of this feast celebrated during the night the people of Israel kept alive all that God had done for them—not only the deliverance but what the deliverance had led to—and especially their birth as a holy nation, for it was on that night that Israel began to exist as a nation.

When the Christian Church took over the feast of the Passover, it gave all this a Christian direction. The Church commemorated not just the deliverance from Egypt but a mightier and more far-reaching one—the "mighty deed" of God that had drawn them out of darkness into the kingdom of God's beloved Son. This new deliverance, like the old, was associated with the night and the darkness, for the New Exodus, the death of Christ, took place in the darkness, and the Resurrection that completed our Redemption happened during the night.

Hence, just as the Church, the New Israel, came into being with the death and Resurrection of Christ, so, as in the Jewish feast, the Christian Passover was the commemoration of the beginning of the new People of God. This was probably the real reason for having Baptism during this night, for Baptism is the Sacrament of entrance into the People of God and, at the same time, the way that this People continually renews itself.

But the Israelites who kept the vigil each year on this night were not only recalling the Exodus of the past; they were making ready for a greater exodus and a mightier deliverance to be achieved when God would come again to establish them in His kingdom forever. This would be the true paschal festival, the true and final Passover, not a mere commemoration. Christians, too, continued to look forward to a still more glorious deliverance that they believed would occur on this night, a deliverance of which the Redemption is the pledge and the promise: the final and definitive coming of the Lord who will establish them in glory with Him forever. "This is the night," says Lactantius, "which we celebrate with a night-long vigil because of the coming of our king and God. This night has a twofold significance; in it Christ received life after dying and in the future He will come into possession of the kingdom of the whole world" (De divinis instit. 7:19; Patrologia Latina 6:797). For this reason Christians do on this one night of the year what they should be doing spiritually at all times: waiting and hoping for the coming of the Lord.

Liturgical Ceremonies

The altogether special character of this greatest feast of the Church year is apparent in the beautiful liturgical ceremonies of the night. All of them express the Christian's passing over with Christ from the death of sin to the new life under God.

The Blessing of the New Fire. The introductory rites are a preparation for the Vigil rather than a part of it, and ideally they take place outside the Church. Many of these rites are Gallican in origin. The formula for blessing the new fire originated in Germany in the 10th century, but the practice of kindling the new fire is found there as early as the 8th century. The ancient Roman custom was to bring a light out of hiding for illumination Saturday night. The blessing of the new fire is subordinate to the lighting of the paschal candle and the procession.

The Paschal Candle. The entire first part of the Easter Vigil centers about the paschal candle, the symbol of the risen Lord, and one of the most impressive of the Church's sacramentals. It evokes readily the thought of Christ and His victory, the triumph of light over darkness. Yet the origin of this symbol is uncertain. The idea of symbolizing the Resurrection with lighted lamps appears to have come from the East and particularly from Jerusalem. Nevertheless the paschal candle is not derived from that custom, though its subsequent ritual may have been influenced by this symbolism.

The explanation most favored today is that the candle comes from the ancient practice of lighting and blessing a lamp (or lamps) in the early evening to provide light in the darkness. The ceremony, though practical in origin, became in time an elaborate rite called the Lucernarium, "the lighting of the lamps," accompanied by psalms, chants, and prayers. Because this service introduced Vespers, Vespers itself was sometimes called Lucernarium, as is the case in the Ambrosian Rite. The lighting and blessing of the paschal candle on the greatest night of the year is thus both a survival and a development of a custom once observed every day. That this is probably the true origin of the paschal candle seems to be borne out by the fact that it is still traditionally the deacon who carries the candle into the church and sets it up there; the lighting of the lamps before evening services was the special function of the deacon.

From what can be gathered from references in the writings of the 4th century Fathers [e.g., Jerome, Epist. 28 ad Presidium 1; Augustine, Civ. 15.22 (Patrologia Latina 30:188; 41:467)], the custom of having a paschal candle was observed in other Western rites long before it was adopted in the papal liturgy, for there is no definite evidence of its use there before the 12th century (M. Andreiu, Le Pontifical Romain au moyen-â 1:240).

One significant change which Pius XII introduced in 1951 was to have the candle lighted and blessed at the beginning of the service and then to have it lead the procession into the church. Prior to 1955 this rite took place in church and the candle was not even lighted until about halfway through the Exsultet. All these changes (many of which were really restorations) gave more meaning to the whole rite; the candle recovers the central position and the prominence it deserves because it is the living symbol of the risen Christ.

The celebrant first prepares the candle to be the symbol of Christ by marking it with the sign of the cross and the monogram of Christ and inserting the grains of incense that represent the five wounds. The cross, the Alpha and Omega, and the year are marked with a stylus. This was originally a 9th-century Gallican usage, later adopted for a time at Rome, which was revived in 1955. When the candle thus marked is lighted with the new fire, it becomes the symbol of the risen Lord triumphing over the darkness and bearing in His risen body the five wounds, trophies of His victory.

The full meaning of the paschal candle as the symbol of Christ is apparent when the candle is carried by the deacon into the dark church, dispelling the darkness. This rite is a vivid dramatization of the Resurrection. Pius XII's Ordinal for Holy Week restored to the procession its proper meaning, the triumph of the risen Christ. The deacon heralds the Resurrection with the words Lumen Christi ("Light of Christ"); the community acclaims the risen Lord with the glad cry Deo gratias ("Thanks be to God"). All present receive the Easter light from the paschal candle. This signifies that we all participate in the glory of the Resurrection; we are thereby made light bearers, children of the light.

Upon reaching the sanctuary the deacon sings the beautiful hymn in honor of the paschal candle, the EXSULTET IAM ANGELICA TURBA. This hymn, in the form and style of the ancient hymn of thanksgiving, has for its theme the victory of the King over death, sin, and hell. All the meaning of the paschal feast is concentrated into this paschal hymn. Originally the Exsultet was extemporized, its composition left to the judgment and inspiration of the one who sang it; many such hymns were composed in the early centuries. The modern version, traditionally attributed to St. Ambrose, sums up the redemptive mystery. The Jewish Passover was the prelude to the true Passover, our Lord's passage from death to life. We partake of this passage; His passage becomes ours through the sacred mysteries of Baptism and the Eucharist. Christ is risen from the dead and we are risen with Him to newness of life.

Service of the Word. The oldest part of the Easter Vigil begins with the readings from Scripture. At Rome all these readings (in the ancient Roman ordinal there were six readings) were centered around Baptism. They were intended to be a scriptural commentary on the meaning of the whole rite of Christian initiation. The Collects after each reading show that the "wonders of old time" are renewed in the rite of Baptism. From the Middle Ages onward there were 12 readings, but Pius XII's Holy Week Ordinal reverted to the practice of the time of Gregory I.

Baptismal Rite. Upon the conclusion of the Liturgy of the Word and the homily, the blessing of the baptismal water and the conferring of the Sacraments of Initiation follow immediately. In early centuries the water was blessed only at the time the Sacrament was celebrated, as is still the practice in the Eastern rites. When the administration of Baptism was restricted to the Easter Vigil, the blessing of the water was also confined to that time (and to Pentecost). The modern formula for blessing the water, combining elements from the Gelasian and the Hadrian Sacramentaries, represents a fusion of Roman and Gallican elements. Its general theme is that the water, made productive by the Spirit, gives birth to the divine life in the human race. The font is compared to a womb; it is the womb of Holy Church producing a heavenly offspring conceived in holiness and reborn as a new creation. During the consecratory Preface the priest plunges the candle into the water to show that the waters of Baptism derive their power to sanctify from the Passion and Resurrection of Christ. He pours in the chrism to signify the sanctification of the water by the Holy Spirit who is said to dwell in the chrism. Both these symbolic actions originated in the Middle Ages. Pius XII's Holy Week Ordinal gives greater prominence to the blessing of water by having it take place in the sanctuary so that all can see and hear. The Rite of Christian Initiation (RCIA) follows after the blessing of the water.

Whether the Sacraments of Initiation are celebrated or not, the restored Easter Vigil provides something altogether new, the renewal of the baptismal promises. Our consciousness of being a baptized people has been reawakened by the readings and chants, by the blessing of the water, and especially by the celebration of Baptism itself. Now we give expression to this fresh awareness by repeating the promises we once made to renounce Satan and to serve God faithfully. The whole Lenten observance is intended to lead us up to this moment and to prepare us for a genuine and sincere renewal of our baptismal commitment. Like the other rites of this night it is a symbolic yet real resurrection with Christ to a new life of grace. After the renewal of the promises the priest sprinkles the people with the Easter water as a further reminder of their Baptism.

Mass. The true climax of the Easter Vigil is the celebration of the Eucharist, for the Eucharist is the paschal mystery in its essence. No other way of celebrating our redemption, however beautiful or meaningful, can take its place. In fact everything else that is done in the Easter Vigil is only an unfolding of what is daily celebrated in the Eucharistic mystery. Moreover, the Eucharist that crowns the Paschal Vigil is itself the true and original Easter Mass. All texts speak of the Resurrection and of the new life that the Resurrection brings through the Sacrament of Baptism. The antiquity of this Vigil Mass is shown by the fact that several elements of the Proper and the Ordinary are missing from it. The reason is that this formulary antedates the introduction of these chants into the Mass of the Roman rite.

The singing of the traditional triple ALLELUIA after the Epistle is a special feature of the Easter celebration; it is a song of joyful praise to God chanted at a time when we are most conscious of all the wonders God has wrought on our behalf, especially our redemption. The Easter Preface, sung for the first time on this night, extols the true Paschal Lamb whose sacrifice frees us from sin and enables us to pass with Him to eternal life through the Resurrection.

Bibliography: J. GAILLARD, Holy Week and Easter, tr. W. BUSCH (Collegeville, Minn. 1954). W. J. O'SHEA, The Meaning of Holy Week (Collegeville, Minn. 1958). H. A. SCHMIDT, Hebdomada Sancta, 2 v. (Rome 1956-57). A. OLIVAR, "Vom Ursprung der römischen Taufwasserweihe," Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft 6 (1959) 62-78. R. BERGER and H. HOLLERWEGER, Celebrating the Easter Vigil (New York 1983). G. BERTONIÈRE, The Historical Development of the Easter Vigil and Related Services in the Greek Church (Rome 1972). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (Collegeville 1991). A. J. MARTIMORT, ed., The Church at Prayer IV: The Liturgy and Time (Collegeville 1986). A. NOCENT, The Liturgical Year, v.3. The Paschal Triduum, the Easter Season (Collegeville 1977). J. M. PIERCE, "Holy Week and Easter in the Middle Ages," in Passover and Easter: Origin and History to Modern Times, eds. P. F. BRADSHAW and L. A. HOFFMAN (Notre Dame, Ind. 1999) 161-85. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History & Its Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (New York 1981).

[W. J. O'SHEA/EDS.]

EASTERN CHURCHES

The term Eastern Churches refers to the Churches that developed in the eastern half of the ROMAN EMPIRE along with those communities that were founded in dependence upon them, even though the dependent Churches were found outside of the boundaries of the empire.

DIOCLETIAN in 293 divided the Roman Empire into four prefectures: Gaul, Italy, Illyricum, and the Orient. Upon the death of Theodosius I (395) the empire was divided into two halves that in practice were separate and independent (see BYZANTINE EMPIRE). The eastern half of the empire was made up of the Prefectures of Illyricum and the Orient, which were subdivided into smaller administrative units called dioceses. Illyricum contained the Dioceses of Dacia and Macedonia while the Prefecture of the Orient contained the Dioceses of Thrace, Asia, Pontus, the Orient, and Egypt, with the corresponding capitals, Sardica, Sirmium, Heraclea, Ephesus, Caesarea of Cappadocia, Antioch, and Alexandria. These chief centers of civil administration became the leading ecclesiastical centers as well. Illyricum was divided into an eastern and western portion by an arbitrary decision of Theodosius; the boundary line separating the eastern and western halves of the empire ran along the Sava, Drina, and Zeta Rivers down to the city of Budva and to the Adriatic Sea. All lands west of the line belonged ecclesiastically to the Latin or Western Church, while all lands to the east belonged to the respective Eastern Churches.

FORMATION OF THE EASTERN CHURCHES

All Eastern Churches evolved from the Patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch, and the two Churches of Persia and Armenia, respectively, which developed outside the Roman Empire. Five characteristic families of liturgical rites developed within these five ecclesiastical jurisdictions: the Alexandrian, Antiochene (or West Syrian), Byzantine, East Syrian, and Armenian.

The Churches of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch. Byzantium had been a suffragan see of the metropolitan of Heraclea in Thrace. After it was transformed into Constantinople, the New Rome, its civil importance made it the ecclesiastical center first in importance after old Rome. Canon 3 of the ecumenical Council of Constantinople (381) attributed to it a primacy of honor after the ancient See of Rome; and canon 28 of the Council of Chalcedon (451) recognized an equivalence between its civil and ecclesiastical powers, granting to the See of Constantinople jurisdiction over all the dioceses of Thrace, Asia, and Pontus (see CONSTANTINOPLE, ECUMENICAL PATRIARCHATE OF; CONSTANTINOPLE). Alexandria was the most ancient patriarchate. Geographical and political factors favored Alexandria as the obvious civil and ecclesiastical center for all of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis. The Council of Nicaea I (325) recognized the preeminence of Alexandria. (See ALEXANDRIA, PATRI-ARCHATE OF; ALEXANDRIA.) Antioch enjoyed a lesser civil and ecclesiastical significance but exerted its authority over the Diocese of the Orient. Canon 6 of the Council of Nicaea I (325) speaks of the privileges of the See of Antioch, and canon 2 of the Council of Constantinople (381) confirms its position after that of Rome, Constantinople, and Alexandria. (See ANTIOCH, PATRIARCHATE OF; ANTIOCH.) Jerusalem became the last of the ancient Eastern patriarchates when it was recognized as a patriarchate by the Council of Chalcedon (451), thus taking from the jurisdiction of Antioch all of Palestine and the peninsula of Sinai (see JERUSALEM, PATRIARCHATE OF).

All the daughter Churches that depended upon the three great Eastern Patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch embraced the liturgical rite and came under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of their mother Churches.

Churches of Persia and Armenia. The fourth of the original Churches emerged in Persia. Christianity reached this region by the 2d century, if not the end of the 1st, from Edessa in Syria. The ecclesiastical center of the Persian Church was the great city of Seleucia-Ctesiphon. Because of its location beyond the eastern borders of the Roman Empire, the Church became known as the Assyrian Church of the East. The bishop of this see (c. 400) obtained the primacy over all of Persia, taking the title of catholicos instead of patriarch. The Christian religion was always that of the minority, and the hostile relations between the Persians and the Byzantine emperors made contacts with the Churches within the Byzantine Empire both difficult and dangerous. Under the circumstances and especially because of severe persecutions, the Persian bishops declared themselves an autonomous Church. The Persian Church is the source of the East Syrian liturgical rite, which has preserved a significant amount of archaisms because of its relative isolation from the other churches (see EAST SYRIAN LITURGY).

According to tradition St. Bartholomew was the Apostle of Armenia. The Armenian Church was established toward the end of the 3d century from the Church of Caesarea of Cappadocia. St. Gregory the Illuminator converted King TIRIDATES III of Armenia along with the mass of the population (290–295). Christianity became the national religion, and in the 5th century the national language was used in the Armenian liturgy (see ARMENIAN CHRISTIANITY; ARMENIAN LITURGY).

DEVELOPMENT OF THE EASTERN CHURCHES

The separate development of the Eastern Churches is due primarily to the divisions caused by doctrinal and political disputes. The presentation here is, for the most part, necessarily chronological.

Assyrian Church of the East (Persia). The Assyrian Church of the East exhibited a vigorous missionary expansion that sent missionaries as far as Mongolia and China, as well as in southern India. In this period of expansion from the 6th to the 11th centuries there were 27 metropolitan sees and more than 200 dioceses. Successive waves of persecutions by Muslim conquerors had reduced the size of this Church. Today, the Assyrian Christians are located principally in Iraq with scattered members in Syria, Iran, and South India (see ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST).

Syrian Jacobite Church of Antioch. The Syrian Monophysites are called Jacobites after Jacob Baradai (d. 578), who, during the persecutions waged by Justinian I against Monophysitism, secretly consecrated 27 bishops and some 2,000 priests. The Syrian Jacobite patriarch claims the ancient see of the Patriarchate of Antioch as his legitimate see and resides in Damascus.

Armenian Church. The Armenians are divided into several jurisdictions. The main center of honor and authority is the Catholicate of Etchmiadzin in the Republic of Armenia, U.S.S.R. The Catholicate of Cilicia (Sis) has its present center in Antelias, Lebanon, and is on an equal rank, and in communion with Etchmiadzin.

Coptic Church. The modern Copts of Egypt trace their ancestry to the Egyptian Christians who rejected the Ecumenical Council of Chalcedon (see COPTIC CHRIS-TIANITY). After the Council of Chalcedon (451), those who remained faithful to the byzantine emperor and the teachings of the Chalcedon were originally known as Melkites, while those who rejected Chalcedon formed themselves into the Coptic Oriental Orthodox Church. Both the Melkites and the Copts made use of the liturgical rite of the see of Alexandria. But gradually the Melkites adopted the Byzantine ecclesiastical and liturgical usages, while the original Alexandrian liturgical rite evolved into the present-day Coptic liturgical rite, but with traces of the Greek language and Byzantine usages.

Ethiopian Church. Tradition narrates that in the 5th century there arrived in Ethiopia nine monks from Syria. They founded monasteries and translated the New Testament into Ge'ez, a Semitic language then spoken, but now used only for liturgical services. The Ethiopian Church was under the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria until 1948, when it obtained the privilege of appointing a native Ethiopian as abuna or head bishop, who in reality rules the Church. In 1959 the Ethiopian Church was declared a patriarchate completely independent of Alexandria, which retained only the honor of precedence.

Orthodox Churches. The Orthodox Church developed over the centuries as a result of a great diversity of factors, chief among them were the differences of theological and spiritual emphasis and political, cultural, and social variations coupled with a fundamentally different ecclesiology, at least in the development and exercise of the organ of jurisdictional authority. The various Orthodox Churches are covered in detail in articles dealing with the countries in which they have a dominant or major place.

Eastern Catholic Churches. After the gradual estrangement between Constantinople and Rome that became permanent from the 11th century onwards, there existed much tension and conflict between the Christian East and West. In 1181 the Maronites were reconciled with Rome, and the Armenians in Syria in 1198, but in general the arrogance of the Latin Crusaders deepened antagonism between the Orthodox and Catholics, owing principally to the plundering by Crusaders of Orthodox churches and shrines, especially those of Constantinople. The capture of Constantinople in 1204 and the establishment of the Latin Empire of Constantinople created a lasting hostility and bitterness. Two large-scale efforts to heal the separation were made, but unsuccessfully, at the Councils of LYONS (1274) and FLORENCE (1439). Decrees of reunion were signed, only to be shortly afterward repudiated by the great majority of the Orthodox clergy and people. When the Turks sacked Constantinople in 1453, the center of Orthodox unity was destroyed. Twenty years later the union signed at Florence had been repudiated by all parties involved; and Western and Eastern Christians settled into two large and distinct bodies with little effort made thereafter at effecting mutual communion.

Zealous missionary activities among the peoples of the Near East and Slav countries by Catholic religious orders, especially Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans, and Capuchins, under the aegis of the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH bore fruit in the rise of the Catholic church that retained their Eastern ecclesial and liturgical rites and customs. When such groups became large enough, Rome set up a hierarchy—even at times a Catholic patriarchate—corresponding to their Eastern counterparts. The Brest-Litovsk Union of 1595 was the first large-scale formation of Eastern Catholics. By this union Ukrainians and White Russians living in what was then part of the kingdom of Poland and Lithuania were reconciled with Rome and formed the nucleus of the Ukrainian Eastern Catholic Church of today.

Assyrian Christians or Chaldeans, began a slow process of reconciliation with Rome beginning in 1552, when Patriarch John Sulaqa (d. 1555) made a profession of the Catholic faith. He was martyred for his action, but a more lasting union was effected in 1681 in the city of Diarbekir. Rome made Bishop Joseph the Catholic patriarch, but the situation became complicated when, in 1778, the other Assyrian patriarch became Catholic, thus providing two Chaldean Catholic patriarchs. From 1834 there has been only one Chaldean Catholic patriarch. In 1663 the Catholic Patriarchate of Syria was established, and in 1729, that of the Melkite Catholics. The Armenian Catholic Patriarchate was set up in Sis, Cilicia, in 1742, while that of the Coptic Catholics was erected in Cairo in 1895. Smaller groups of Eastern Catholic Churches were established among the Romanians, Yugoslavs, Ruthenians, Bulgars, and Greeks. In 1930, through the zeal of Mar IVANIOS, thousands of Indian Syrian Jacobite Christians formed the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church.

Eastern Christians in North America. Eastern Christianity made an entrance into North America when Russian Orthodox missionaries first evangelized Alaska in 1794. But the Eastern Christians first came in large numbers as immigrants from Europe and Asia in the second half of the 19th century. The majority of Eastern Christians in North America are Byzantine Christians.

In the U.S. the Byzantine Catholic Slovaks, Hungarians and Croatians were grouped under the jurisdiction of the Ruthenian Eastern Catholic bishops, while in Canada the Slovaks, Hungarians, Croatians, and White Russians are under the jurisdiction of the Ukrainian Eastern Catholic bishops.

History of Eastern Catholics in the U.S. Eastern Catholic Churches in the U.S. comprises 11 different ethnic groups representing eight different liturgical rites. The majority of the Eastern Catholics in the U.S. are Byzantine Slavic ethnic groups. A mass immigration of Slavs from the old Austro-Hungarian Empire, who called themselves Ruthenians or Pod-Carpathian Ruthenians, and others from Galicia, who preferred to call themselves Ukrainians, began in 1880. The first Byzantine-Slav Catholic priest arrived in the U.S. (1884), Ivan Volansky, founded the first Eastern Catholic parish in Shenandoah, PA, in the same year. Other Eastern Catholic priests left their native lands to take care of their displaced brethren. Numerous priests of the two European Ruthenian Dioceses of Mukachevo and Presov and of the Ukrainian province of Galicia founded parishes, mostly in the coalmining areas of Pennsylvania. In 1907 there were 152 parishes and 43 missions. To avoid misunderstanding among the majority of Catholics in the U.S., who were of the Latin rite, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith specified that only celibate or widowed priests were to be sent to America. However, with the increase in immigration, married priests also were sent.

Ruthenian and Ukrainian Problems and Their Solution. The lack of their own hierarchy in the beginning, with the necessity of submission to the local Latin bishops, caused great discontent among these Slavic Catholics. The Russian Orthodox had moved their episcopal see from San Francisco to New York in 1905, to be nearer to this source of Orthodox recruitment. Father Alexis TOTH, embittered by the treatment that he had received from Latin bishops, became Orthodox and spent the rest of his life forming Orthodox parishes from Catholic Slav groups. This movement toward the Russian Orthodox jurisdiction spread rapidly on the East coast, so that an estimated 200 Catholic Eastern parishes with nearly 225,000 faithful became Russian Orthodox. By the mid-20th century, this number had increased to at least 400,000, forming about 60 percent or more of Slavic Christian population in the U.S.

The Holy See, alarmed at the high rate of defections among these Eastern Catholic immigrants, appointed in 1907, Soter Ortynsky as the first Byzantine Catholic bishop, resident in Philadelphia. Unfortunately he did not have his own proper jurisdiction, being dependent upon the local Latin bishops in whose dioceses his parishes were found. This jurisdiction was given him in 1913, but all his problems were not solved. Many of the people under him were of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, while Bishop Soter was from Galicia.

This problem of nationalism plagued all groups of Eastern Catholics, but especially the Slavs, until in 1924 each group received its own bishop. Constantine Bohachevsky was appointed bishop for the Ukrainians and resided at Philadelphia, while Basil Takach was appointed bishop of Pittsburgh for the Ruthenians, Slovaks, Croatians, and Hungarians. In 1928, at the request of the U.S. hierarchy of Latin bishops, the Holy Office issued a decree that only unmarried men could be ordained to the priesthood. This, along with the problem of church elders holding church property in their own corporate name rather than in the name of the local Latin Ordinary, caused thousands of Ukrainian and Ruthenian Catholics to come under the jurisdiction of an already existing Orthodox hierarchy or to form their own independent national Church. Other sources of defection from the Eastern Catholic Churches were the lack of Eastern Catholic priests, intermarriage with Latin Catholics, and the desire to be considered more "American" by forsaking European traditions.

Vatican II resulted in a renaissance and renewed confidence for Eastern Catholic Churches in the U.S. The decree, Orientalium Ecclesiarum, facilitated the retrieval of ancient ecclesial and liturgical usages, as well as stemming the pressure to Latinize the churches.

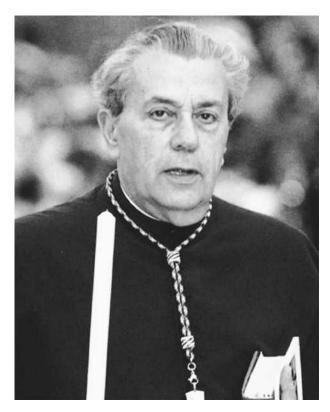

Bibliography: General works. W. F. ADENEY, The Greek and Eastern Churches (New York 1908). D. ATTWATER, The Christian Churches of the East, 2 v. (rev. ed. Milwaukee 1961–62). F. E. BRIGHTMAN, Liturgies Eastern and Western, v.1 (Oxford 1896). L. M. DUCHESNE, The Churches Separated from Rome, tr. A. H. MA-THEW (London 1907). A. FORTESCUE, The Lesser Eastern Churches (London 1913); The Uniate Eastern Churches, ed. G. D. SMITH (New York 1923). M. GORDILLO, Compendium theologiae orientalis (3d ed. Rome 1950); Theologia orientalium cum latinorum comparata [Orientalia Christiana Analecta (Rome 1935–) 158; 1960]. F. HEILER, Urkirche und Ostkirche (Munich 1937). R. JANIN, Les Églises orientales et les rites orientaux (Paris 1955). M. JUGIE, Theologia dogmatica Christianorum ab Ecclesia Catholica dissi dentium, 5 v. (Paris 1926-35). I. H. DALMAIS, Eastern Liturgies, tr. D. ATTWATER (New York 1960). B. J. KIDD, The Churches of Eastern Christendom (London 1927). A. KING, The Rites of Eastern Christendom, 2 v. (London 1950). N. LADOMERSZKY, Theologia orientalis (Rome 1953). V. LOSSKY, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church (London 1957). H. MUSSET, Histoire du christianisme spécialement en Orient, 3 v. (Harissa 1948-49). F. J. MCGAR-RIGLE et al., The Eastern Branches of the Catholic Church (New York 1938). P. RONDOT, Les Chrétiens d'Orient (Paris 1955). N. ZERNOV, Eastern Christendom (New York 1961). The Nestorian Church. G. P. BADGER, The Nestorians and Their Rituals, 2 v. (London 1852). L. E. BROWNE, The Eclipse of Christianity in Asia (Cambridge, England 1933). H. C. LUKE, Mosul and Its Minorities (London 1925). A. J. MACLEAN and W. H. BROWNE, The Catholics of the East and His People (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; London 1892). E. TISSERANT, Eastern Christianity in India, tr. E. R. HAMBYE (Westminster, Md. 1957); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903-50; Tables générales 1951-) 11.1:157-323. A. R. VINE, The Nestorian Churches (London 1937). W. A. WIGRAM, An Introduction to the History of the Assyrian Church (New York 1910). The Monophysite Churches. E. R. HARDY, Christian Egypt (New York 1952). J. MASPERO, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie (Paris 1923). W. A. WIGRAM, The Separation of the Monophysites (London 1923). J. B. COULBEAUX, Histoire politique et religieuse de l'Abyssinie, 3 v. (Paris 1929). J. DORESSE, Ethiopia, tr. E. COULT (New York 1959). D. L. O'LEARY, The Ethiopian Church (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; London 1936). H. LAMMENS, La Syrie: Précis historique, 2 v. (Beirut 1921). Christianity in Travancore (Trivandrum 1901). T. E. DOWLING, The Armenian Church (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge; London 1910), repr. 1955). M. ORMANIAN, The Church of Armenia, ed. T. POLADIAN, tr. G. M. GREGORY (2d ed. London 1955). H. F. TOURNEBIZE, Histoire politique et religieuse de l'Arménie (Paris 1910). Statistics on the Eastern Christians. Oriente Cattolico (Vatican City 1962). World Christian Handbook, ed. H. W. COXHILL and K. GRUBB (London 1962). F. S. MEAD, Handbook of Denominations in the United States (2d rev. ed. Nashville 1961). Parishes and Clergy of the Orthodox and Other Eastern Churches in North America, Together with the Parishes and Clergy of the Polish National Catholic Church (Buffalo 1962).

[G. A. MALONEY/EDS.]

EASTERN CHURCHES, CONGREGATION FOR THE

The Congregation for the Eastern Churches (Congregatio pro Ecclesiis Orientalibus) was established by Pope Paul VI in 1967 pursuant to the apostolic constitution, Regimini Ecclesiae Universae. It replaced the Congregation for the Oriental Church (Congregatio pro Ecclesia Orientali) that was established as a separate curial office of the Holy See in 1917, although its nucleus lies in the 16th century. In 1573 Gregory XIII instituted a Congregation for the Affairs of the Greeks. This office was entrusted not only with handling matters pertaining to Greek Catholics, but also with promoting communion and unity between the Holy See and the other churches of the Christian East.

Achille Cardinal Silvestrini, Prefect of the Congregation for the Eastern Churches. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Clement VIII (1592–1605) changed this office to the Congregation for Matters of the Holy Faith and Catholic Religion. Like its predecessor, it was charged with treating the affairs of the Greeks and other Eastern Christians; at the same time there was added to its competency the promotion of the Catholic faith in pagan lands. Thus it became a kind of forerunner of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, which Gregory XV erected on June 22, 1622. Within this Congregation Urban VIII (1623–44) set up two commissions to administer Oriental affairs: the one treating questions of the Eastern Churches; the other, charged with editing their liturgical books, was expanded by Clement XI in 1719 to the Congregation for Editing the Books of the Oriental Church.

In the course of time it became increasingly evident that the same office could not deal with the approach to problems and methods for both the missions among the pagans and the affairs of the Eastern Churches. Accordingly, Pius IX, in 1862, set up a separate department for handling the affairs of the Eastern Christians within the Congregation for the PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH. It was called the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith for the Matters of the Oriental Rites (Congregatio de Propaganda Fide pro negotiis ritus orientalis). The whole office remained under one cardinal prefect, but it was divided into two sections, each with its own secretary, officials, consultors, archives, and office of protocol.

Erection and Competence. This arrangement, however, did not turn out to be entirely satisfactory: the unfavorable impression was created that this department was a mere appendage of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; the work for the Eastern Churches increased to such an extent that an independent congregation was thought to be necessary. On May 1, 1917, Benedict XV, with the motu proprio Dei Providentis, erected the Congregation for the Oriental Church (Congregatio pro Ecclesia Orientali), reserving to himself the post of prefect.

The Congregation is responsible for all matters pertaining to the Eastern Churches, relations between the Latin and Eastern Churches, and all issues arising from the implementation of the CODE OF CANONS OF THE EAST-ERN CHURCHES and the production of liturgical texts. These faculties are exercised without derogating from the traditional jurisdictional rights of Patriarchs and their Holy Synods in such matters.

Jurisdiction. The territories in which the Congregation has complete and exclusive jurisdiction are: Egypt and the Sinai Peninsula, Eritrea and northern Ethiopia, southern Albania, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Greece, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Palestine, Syria, Jordan, Turkey, and Afghanistan.

Bibliography: Congregatio pro Ecclesia Orientali, Oriente cattolico, cenni storici e statistiche (Vatican City 1962).

[R. ETTELDORF/EDS.]

EASTERN SCHISM

The separation between the Roman Catholic and the Eastern Orthodox Churches (see EASTERN CHURCHES) traces its origins to different ecclesiastical, theological, political and cultural developments in the western and eastern halves of the former Roman Empire. These differences provoked occasional schisms before the 11th century, but between the 11th and 13th centuries a definitive rupture between the two occurred.

From earliest times, Christianity experienced a flexible tension between unity and diversity. When serious disagreements in doctrine or discipline arose, local church councils were convened, following the precedent of the apostolic council described in Acts 15. After their legal recognition of Christianity in the 4th century, Roman emperors convoked general councils in order to address various heresies that threatened to disrupt the unity of the Church. Besides defining normative doctrine, these councils also enacted canons concerning discipline and administration. Seven of these councils held between the 4th and 8th centuries were accepted as ecumenical, meaning that they were considered binding on the entire Church. These are today recognized as authoritative by both the Roman Catholic and the Eastern Orthodox Churches, as well as by some Protestants. Significant populations in the Christian East rejected two of these councils, EPHESUS (431) and CHALCEDON (451), resulting in the schism of the so-called Nestorian and Monophysite (Oriental Orthodox) Churches, respectively.

As Christianity established itself throughout the Roman Empire and beyond, the churches and the bishops of Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch were especially esteemed for their leadership. Besides representing the Christian populations of three of the most important cities of the empire, their prestige derived from the apostolic foundation and succession of their sees. The Council of NICAEA I (325) granted similar honor to the See of Jerusalem, in recognition of its apostolic origins, and the Councils of CONSTANTINOPLE I (381) and Chalcedon raised the See of Constantinople to second in honor after Rome. The government of the empire had been transferred from Rome to Constantinople in 330, so it was thought fitting to recognize the importance of the new imperial city. The establishment of the patriarchate of Constantinople laid the foundation for ecclesiastical rivalry between "old" Rome and the "new Rome," Constantinople. Rome objected to the rationale behind the elevation of Constantinople because it emphasized the political importance of the leading sees rather than their apostolic associations, and for this reason also disapproved of Constantinople's use of the title "Ecumenical Patriarch." The Roman popes cultivated their identity as the heirs to Saint Peter, and their see as the location of the martyrdoms of both Peter and Paul. The five bishops of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, in that order of precedence, came to be recognized as a "pentarchy" of patriarchs, with leadership responsibility for the churches in their territories.

Rome was both the highest ranking see in honor and also the sole patriarchate in the Latin-speaking West. The eventual Eastern Schism entailed the separation of the Latin-speaking churches of the West, under the leadership of Rome, from the Greek-speaking churches of the East, under the leadership of Constantinople. This split was facilitated by the collapse of Roman political authority and the establishment of the Germanic kingdoms in the West, the rise of Islam in the East, and the settlement of the Slavs in the Balkans. These factors resulted in decreased familiarity and contact between East and West, especially as knowledge of Greek in the West and Latin in the East declined. The schism of the Monophysite and Nestorian Churches, as well as the Islamic conquest of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, diminished the wider influence of those sees and increased that of Constantinople.

Being the seat of civil government, Constantinople was particularly vulnerable to imperial pressures. The churches of Rome and Constantinople were temporarily split during the ACACIAN SCHISM (482-519), named for Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople (471-89). In an attempt to win back the Monophysites, Emperor Zeno (474-91) issued the HENOTICON (482), a compromise formula on the two natures of Christ. Rome rejected this compromise, instead upholding the definition of the Council of Chalcedon. With the exception of Pope HONO-RIUS I (625–38) during the Monothelite controversy, the Roman see was distinguished by its adherence to orthodoxy during the period of Trinitarian and Christological controversy. Its prestige as the leading see was further enhanced when the heresy of ICONOCLASM was introduced by Emperor Leo III in 726. Rome rejected the Iconoclast Council of Hieria (754) and supported the Iconophile Council of NICAEA II (787), which became the Seventh Ecumenical Council.

The Iconoclastic controversy drove a wedge between the papacy and the Roman emperors. Emperor LEO III punished the Roman see for its opposition to Iconoclasm by removing Calabria, Sicily, and Illyricum (including Greece) from papal jurisdiction and placing them under the patriarchate of Constantinople. Confronted by the Lombard military threat and unable to rely on help from the East, Pope STEPHEN II (752-57) requested aid from the Frankish ruler, Pepin III. The Franks defeated the Lombards and established the papacy as the temporal ruler of lands in Italy. Papal estrangement from the empire reached its height when Pope LEO III (795-816) declared Charlemagne the emperor of the Romans on Christmas of the year 800, creating a "Holy Roman Empire" of the West to rival the Eastern Roman, or Byzantine, Empire.

After the empress Theodora restored icon veneration in 843, communion was reestablished between Rome and Constantinople. The Eastern church remained unsettled, however, as the bishops who had acquiesced to Iconoclasm were deposed, and rival factions quarreled over the application of canonical strictness. Then, in 856, Theodora was overthrown by her brother, Bardas, on behalf of her adolescent son, Emperor MICHAEL III (842–67). Ignatius, patriarch of Constantinople (847–58; 867–77), was loyal to Theodora and resigned his office. As his replacement, the rival ecclesiastical parties selected a compromise candidate—PHOTIUS (858–67; 877–86), a learned layman and civil servant. Unfortunately, one of the three bishops who consecrated Photius, Gregory Asbestas of Syracuse, had been deposed by Ignatius. Gregory appealed to the pope, but a decision had not yet been returned. The Constantinopolitan synod rehabilitated Gregory and appeared to have reconciled the opposing parties. Shortly afterwards, however, the extreme followers of Ignatius rejected Photius.

Pope NICHOLAS I (858–67) became involved in the situation when Photius sent him the customary announcement of his elevation as patriarch. Nicholas understood papal primacy to mean that he had jurisdiction over the entire Church, not just within the Western patriarchate. He believed that he had the right to adjudicate the internal affairs of the Byzantine church, and so in 863 he declared Photius's elevation uncanonical, excommunicated him, and recognized Ignatius as patriarch. Thus began the so-called Photian Schism between Rome and Constantinople.

Complicating matters was rivalry between the two sees over the conversion of Bulgaria. Frankish and Byzantine missionaries there criticized each other's ecclesiastical customs, provoking Nicholas and Photius's involvement in the production of the first polemical literature between Latins and Greeks. Particularly noteworthy was conflict over the use of the FILIOQUE in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, which would remain a major issue dividing East and West. At a synod in 867, the emperor Michael III, Photius, and the other Eastern patriarchs condemned Pope Nicholas and asked the Western emperor, Louis II, to depose him. But rather Photius himself was deposed when the co-emperor, Basil I (867–86), succeeded to the Byzantine throne after having murdered Michael III.

The legates of Nicholas's successor, Adrian II, attended the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE IV (869–70), confirming the condemnation of Photius and the legitimacy of Ignatius. Jurisdiction over Bulgaria, however, was awarded to Constantinople. This council was accepted by the Roman church as the Eighth Ecumenical later in the 11th century. Ignatius and Photius eventually reconciled with each other, and Photius succeeded to the patriarchate upon Ignatius's death. Photius was recognized by Pope John VIII, who sent his legates to the "Union Synod" of 879–80. The Council of Constantinople IV's condemnation of Photius was at that time annulled.

The Photian Schism was resolved with the understanding that each church would continue to observe its own traditions. But the conflict revealed that East and West had developed different notions of authority in the Church, and no longer shared the same culture of one universal Church coterminous with one universal empire. Their spheres of influence were now clearly two, and they competed for authority in the borderlands of Byzantine southern Italy, the Balkans, and Eastern Europe. As Nicholas I demonstrated, the popes understood papal primacy in a monarchical sense, linked to Peter's primacy, and meaning that they exercised jurisdictional and teaching authority over all bishops in the universal church, including the eastern patriarchs. They also viewed themselves in a position superior to emperors and all other temporal authorities. In the 11th century, the Gregorian reform in the Western church further strengthened this selfconception of the papacy. In contrast, although the Eastern church recognized it as the leading see and had on occasion appealed to Rome over disciplinary or doctrinal matters, the East understood authority in the Church in a collegial sense. Rome was the "first among equals" in the pentarchy of patriarchs. Doctrine was properly defined by the ecumenical councils, which required the participation or consent of all five patriarchs.

The filioque had also emerged as a point of controversy during the Photian Schism. This phrase was added to the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed in the 6th century by the church in Spain in order to combat Arianism. The creed, as originally formulated by the Council of Constantinople I (381), stated that the Holy Spirit "proceeds from the Father." The addition of the filioque changed the text to read "who proceeds from the Father and the Son." This reflected the development of Trinitarian theology in the West, which stressed the unity of the three Persons in the Trinity. The East had rather tended to emphasize the personal distinction among the three, understanding the Father as the unique source of the other two Persons. The Franks spread the use of the filioque throughout the West. Although Pope Leo III had objected to altering the words of the creed and omitted the filioque from the inscription he commissioned for Saint Peter's basilica, no pope ever objected to the doctrine that it taught. The filioque was adopted in Rome at the time of Pope Benedict VIII (1014–15), under German influence. The East objected both to the doctrine, which seemed to them to posit two sources within the Godhead, and to the fact that the West had unilaterally changed the wording of the universal creed of the Church, which had been approved by the Second and Fourth Ecumenical Councils (Constantinople I and Chalcedon, respectively).

Following the Photian Schism, Rome and Constantinople were again briefly out of communion from 912–23. Defying the decision of Patriarch Nicholas I to forbid a fourth marriage intended to legitimize his son, Constantine VII, as heir to the throne, Emperor Leo VI (886–912) appealed to Pope Sergius III and to the eastern patriarchs for approval. A Constantinopolitan synod accepted Sergius's grant of dispensation for the emperor, provoking the resignation of Nicholas and a schism within the Byzantine church. Nicholas was reinstated as patriarch after the death of Leo VI in 912, and asked that Pope Anastasius III (911–13) condemn his predecessor's action. After receiving no reply, Nicholas removed the pope's name from the diptychs, indicating that the two sees were not in communion. This schism was repaired in 923, when Pope John X accepted the decision of the council held in Constantinople in 920, which anathematized fourth marriages.

The year 1054 has conventionally been given as the starting date of the (Great) Eastern Schism, because of the conflict at that time between Pope Leo IX (1049–54) and Patriarch Michael Cerularius (1043-58). But the precise date of the final schism has eluded scholars. Because contemporaries did not recognize a definitive time at which schism occurred, it has been argued that there was no formal schism in the 11th century at all, and other, later, dates for the final break are suggested. Most scholars see the events of 1054 as one significant occasion in the gradual formation and solidification of the schism, which culminated during the Crusades. Others consider the negotiations between Byzantium and Rome that followed this episode to indicate that a break had occurred. Regardless, it is clear that relations between Rome and Constantinople were extremely tenuous during the 11th century. In 1009 Pope Sergius IV (1009-12) sent a letter to Constantinople, announcing his elevation to the Roman see. It was rejected by Patriarch Sergius II (999-1019) because it contained the filioque. Sergius IV's predecessor, John XVIII (1004-9), was the last pope to be commemorated in the Constantinopolitan diptychs.

The conflict between Pope Leo IX and Patriarch Cerularius began when the Synod of Siponto (1050), reflecting the concerns of the reform papacy, condemned Greek religious practices in southern Italy. In response, the patriarch imposed the Greek rite on Latin churches in Constantinople. Differences over the filioque, fasting, celibacy of the clergy, and the Eucharistic use of leavened or unleavened bread (azymes) were the focus of polemicists on both sides. This last issue was seen as particularly scandalous, because it was a visible sign of Latin and Greek divergence in the sacrament of Christian unity par excellence, and reflected different theological interpretations of this primary act of Christian worship.

In spite of the religious controversy, Emperor Constantine IX (1042–55) arranged an alliance with the papacy against the Normans in southern Italy. Leo IX sent a delegation to Constantinople, headed by Cardinal Humbert of Silva Candida and including Frederick of Lorraine, the future Pope Stephen IX. Patriarch Cerularius took offense to the pope's letter to him, which belittled the position of the Constantinopolitan see and questioned his legitimacy as patriarch, and so refused to receive it. This provoked Humbert to publish a response to Archbishop Leo of Ochrid's anti-Latin letter and to engage in a disputation with Nicetas Stethatos. The papal delegation's visit served only to worsen tension between the two churches. On July 16, 1054, Humbert issued a bull of excommunication directed against Cerularius and his followers and placed it on the altar of Hagia Sophia. Ironically, among his complaints, Humbert accused the Byzantines of omitting the filioque from the creed. The patriarch in turn held a synod that refuted Humbert's charges and excommunicated the legates. It is important to note that the excommunications were limited to the people involved, and were not directed by the one church against the other as such. Humbert had acted on his own authority, and in the meantime Pope Leo IX had died. In recognition of these facts, in 1965 Pope Paul VI (1963-78) and Patriarch Athenagoras (1948-72) revoked the excommunications of 1054 as a first step towards healing the schism between the churches; it was not an act that resolved the schism itself.

Efforts to normalize ecclesiastical relations between Rome and Constantinople began shortly after 1054. These negotiations were between the popes and the Byzantine emperors, rather than with the patriarchs of Constantinople, as they were governed by the diplomatic and military concerns of the papacy and the empire. In 1071 the empire was dealt a double blow: a devastating defeat by the Seljuk Turks at Manzikert in Anatolia, and the seizure by the Normans of its last remaining territories in Italy. The Byzantines sought an alliance with the papacy against both the Turks and the Normans. After Emperor Michael VII (1071–78) was overthrown in a palace coup, Pope Gregory VII aligned himself with the Normans and excommunicated the next two emperors. Pope Urban II (1088-99) reversed the excommunication of Emperor Alexius I Comnenus (1081-1118). Alexius convoked a synod in 1089 that concluded that there was no evidence of a formal schism between the two churches. Patriarch Nicholas III (1084-1111) offered to commemorate the pope in the diptychs, provided that he would agree to either come to Constantinople to discuss their religious differences or send a statement of faith. Urban declined to respond, and so his name was not inscribed in the diptychs. Nevertheless, it appears that while Latins and Greeks were conscious of their differences and continued to debate them, there was no general acknowledgement of schism, particularly at the popular level.

In 1095 Urban called on Western Christians to help the Byzantines recover the Holy Land from the Turks. He had hoped thereby to improve relations between the churches, but the resulting Crusades had, unfortunately, the opposite results. The Latins passed through the empire on their way to the East, and the strain of provisioning the troops provoked Latins and Greeks against each other. Complicating matters, the Normans, sworn enemies of Byzantium, were prominent among the Crusaders. Rather than turning their conquests over to the emperor, as they had promised, the Latins established their own principalities. Latin patriarchs were installed at Jerusalem in 1099 and at Antioch in 1100; rival Greek lines of succession existed in exile. At Jerusalem, the Latin hierarch was recognized as legitimate by both Latins and Greeks, until the Latins were expelled and the Greek line restored following Saladin's conquest of the city in 1187. At Antioch, however, the legitimate Greek line was forced out by the Latins, creating two competing hierarchies and an open schism in that see.

Tension between Latins and Greeks escalated in the years leading up to the Fourth Crusade. In 1182 rioters in Constantinople, resentful of the political and economic privileges granted to the Latins, massacred the city's Latin inhabitants. The Norman king of Sicily, William II, then invaded Byzantium, massacred the Greeks of Thessalonica in 1185, and intended to reach Constantinople before being defeated. The immediate pretext for the diversion of the Fourth Crusade to Constantinople was, among others, the promise of a claimant to the Byzantine throne to unite the churches, if the Latins would help install him as emperor. The result was the crusader conquest of that city and the subsequent creation of the Latin empire of Constantinople (1204). The crusaders' sack of Constantinople was particularly brutal and sacrilegious, and the Greeks in the Latin-occupied territories were forced to accept the humiliating "church union" of religious submission to their conquerors, the bitterness of which would linger for years to come. As in the Holy Land, the Latins established their own patriarchate, while the Greek patriarchate joined the Byzantine government in exile at Nicaea. The schism was now complete.

While still in exile, Emperor John III Vatatzes (1222-54) began negotiations for church union as a means of returning Byzantine rule to Constantinople. Although these efforts failed, MICHAEL VIII PALAEOLOGUS (1259-82) succeeded in retaking Constantinople in 1261. Michael pursued union, hoping that the papacy could dissuade the Latin powers from attempting a reconquest. In 1274 the emperor's representatives attended the Council of Lyons II, presided over by Pope Gregory X (1271-76). There they agreed to accept the Latin faith, recognizing the primacy of the pope as understood by Rome, the Latin doctrine on the Procession of the Holy Spirit, and the filioque addition to the creed. Michael had requested that the Greeks be allowed to preserve their rites, including the use of leavened bread in the Eucharist, and that the only change in their worship be the commemoration of the pope. The Roman church, however, continually pressed Michael to enforce the union by requiring the recitation of the filioque in the liturgy. Faced with the opposition of the great majority of the Byzantine clergy and laity, Michael refused to alter the rites of his church, but did cruelly persecute the anti-unionists. Unfortunately, he lost his alliance with the papacy upon the election of Martin IV (1281–85), a Frenchman. Martin was an ally of Charles of Anjou, who hoped to restore the Latin empire of Constantinople. Michael remained faithful to the union, even after Martin excommunicated him in 1281. Charles of Anjou ceased to be a threat to the empire after the Sicilian Vespers uprising in 1282. Emperor Andronicus II (1282–1328) repudiated the union of Lyons immediately following his father's death.

Ironically, Andronicus II reopened union negotiations in the latter years of his reign, as the empire again sought military aid from the West, this time against the Ottoman Turks. Andronicus III (1328-41) continued these discussions, sending the Italian Greek theologian Barlaam of Calabria to France in 1339, to visit both the king and Pope Benedict XII (1334-42). Barlaam explained that the Greeks had rejected the union of Lyons because only the representatives of the emperor, not those of the four Eastern patriarchs or of the laity were present at the council, and even they were not allowed to negotiate-rather, they were forced to submit to the Roman church. Although Barlaam's mission failed to produce results, he had articulated the requirements necessary for the Orthodox to accept any union agreement: negotiation of differences at an ecumenical council, by representatives of all five patriarchs and with the consent of the laity. Contrary to Western notions of Byzantine "caesaropapism," union could not be enforced through the will of the emperor alone.

The papacy saw no reason for calling yet another council to debate questions that had already been defined by the Roman church. Nor was it interested in facilitating military assistance to the schismatic (or heretical) Greeks, before they submitted to its authority. In spite of this stalemate, discussions continued throughout the 14th century. In 1369 at Rome, Emperor John V Palaeologus (1341–91) personally converted to the Roman faith. No union of the churches or military aid resulted from his conversion.

As the Ottomans advanced into southeastern Europe, the Western powers grew alarmed. In 1396 a crusading army led by Sigismund of Hungary was defeated at the battle of Nicopolis. The French king, Charles VI, sent Emperor Manuel II (1391–1425) some troops for Constantinople's defense in 1399. Europe was divided at that time over the Great Schism of the West, in which the Roman and Avignonese lines of the papacy fought for recognition, while the Conciliar Movement challenged papal authority itself. The West was at last motivated to negotiate with the East over terms for convoking an ecumenical council.

The Byzantines were invited by Sigismund, now the Western emperor, to send ambassadors to the Council of Constance (1414–17). This council repaired the Western schism by electing Martin V (1417-31) as sole pope. Discussions begun with Martin came to fruition when Pope Eugenius IV (1431-47) and Emperor John VIII (1425-48) agreed to convene a union council designed to meet Byzantine requirements for ecumenicity. The Greeks chose to negotiate with Eugenius rather than with his rival, the Council of Basel. Although they had desired to hold the council in Constantinople, the Turkish threat made that impossible. The Byzantine delegation to the Council of Ferrara-Florence (1438-39) included Patriarch Joseph II (1416-39), representatives of the three Eastern patriarchs and from the churches of Bulgaria, Georgia, Moldo-Wallachia, and Russia, and distinguished lay philosophers. The papacy pledged economic support for the Orthodox delegation and some military aid for the defense of Constantinople, with more help from the Western powers to follow upon the successful conclusion of union.

Negotiations at the council dragged on, as the emperor hoped for the arrival of official embassies from the Western princes, whose allegiances were split between Eugenius and Basel. In the end, the Greeks accepted the union decree, which defined the controversial points in favor of the Latin doctrine. It declared that the Latin and Greek teachings on the Procession of the Holy Spirit were the same, interpreting the patristic Greek use of the phrase "through the Son" as the equivalent in meaning of the Latin "and the Son." The filioque was defended as having been rightfully added to the creed, but no mention was made of the Greeks being required to add it. It was also agreed that the Eucharist could be celebrated with either leavened or unleavened bread, each church retaining its own custom. Because the Greeks had not speculated much themselves concerning the intermediate state of the soul after death and before the final judgment, they were required to accept the doctrine of purgatory. Finally, the decree asserted the primacy of the pope as teacher and ruler of the Church, while assuring the rights and privileges of the other four patriarchs.

Although church union was the official policy of the Byzantine emperors and the patriarchs of Constantinople from 1439 until the conquest of the city by the Ottoman Turks in 1453, the union was rejected by the Eastern patriarchs, Russia, and the majority of Byzantines, as a betrayal of their traditional faith. In their view, the Roman church had not given up anything that had caused the schism in the first place. Some military help for the defense of Constantinople was indeed deployed (most notably the Crusade of Varna in 1444), but failed to be successful. The church of Constantinople officially repudiated the Florentine union in 1484.

The agreement at Florence was, however, used as a basis for other reunions with the Roman Catholic Church, most notably that of Brest-Litovsk in 1596 with the Ruthenians of Eastern Europe. Today, the status of the Eastern Catholics is a problem in the ongoing ecumenical dialogue between the Roman Catholic and the Eastern Orthodox Churches. The issues of papal primacy (and since Vatican I, infallibility), as well as the filioque, remain major stumbling blocks in the path of union.

Bibliography: F. DVORNIK, The Photian Schism (Cambridge, Eng. 1948, 1970); Byzance et la Primauté romaine (Paris 1964) (Byzantium and the Roman Primacy, tr. E. A. QUAIN [New York 1966, 1979]). D. J. GEANAKOPLOS, Emperor Michael Palaeologus and the West 1258-1282 (Hamden, Conn. 1973); "The Council of Florence (1438-39) and the Problem of Union between the Byzantine and Latin Churches," and "An Orthodox View of the Councils of Basel (1431-49) and of Florence (1438-39) as Paradigm for the Study of Modern Ecumenical Councils," in Constantinople and the West (Madison, Wis. 1989) 224-254, 255-278. J. GILL, The Council of Florence (Cambridge 1959). J. M. HUSSEY, The Orthodox Church in the Byzantine Empire (Oxford 1986). J. MEYENDORFF, Byzantine Theology: Historical Trends and Doctrinal Themes, 2d ed. (New York 1987). A. NICHOLS, Rome and the Eastern Churches (Edinburgh, Scotland 1992). S. RUNCIMAN, The Eastern Schism (Oxford 1955). M. H. SMITH III, And Taking Bread. . . Cerularius and the Azyme Controversy of 1054 (Paris 1978). K. T. WARE, The Orthodox Church (London 1983).

[C. SCOURTIS]

EBBA, SS.

Two saints of this name in Anglo-Saxon England.

Ebba the Elder, abbess; d. Aug. 25, 683. She was the daughter of Ethelfrid, King of Northumbria, and was forced to go into exile after her father's defeat by EDWIN in 616. She became a Christian and later was professed a nun at the double monastery at Coldingham by Bishop FINAN OF LINDISFARNE. At Coldingham she was visited by St. CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE, and by King Egfrid (d. 684) and Queen ERMENBURGA OF NORTHUMBRIA with whom she interceded on behalf of Bishop WILFRID OF YORK. At the urging of ADAMNAN OF IONA, she undertook to reform her convent, which was falling away from a strict observance of the rule. Her relics were translated from Coldingham to Durham in the 11th century.

Feast: Aug. 25; Nov. 2 (translation).

Ebba the Younger, abbess and martyr; d. Coldingham, Berwick, England, 870. According to MATTHEW PARIS, the sole source, the Danes martyred her with the whole community after she attempted to buy a reprieve by mutiliating her own face.

Feast: Aug. 23 and April 2.

Bibliography: Ebba the Elder. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 5:194-199. BEDE, Opera historica, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1896) 1:264–265. Vita S. Cuthberti in Two Lives of Saint Cuthbert, ed. and tr., B. COLGRAVE (Cambridge, Eng. 1940) 79-80, 189-190, 318. EDDIUS STEPHANUS, Life of Bishop Wilfrid, ed. and tr. B. COL-GRAVE (New York 1927), 79. H. H. E. CRASTER, "The Red Book of Durham," English Historical Review 40 (1925) 504-532. H. FAR-MER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912-), 14;1268-69. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933-1938), 2:618-620. Ebba the Younger. MATTHEW PARIS, Chronica majora, ed. H. R. LUARD, 7 v. (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores 57; 1872-83) 1:391-392. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933-38) 2:5-7. H. FARMER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912-), 14:1269-70.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

EBBINGHAUS, HERMANN

German psychologist, pioneer in the experimental investigation of memory, b. Barmen, Jan. 24, 1850; d. Halle, Feb. 26, 1909. He took his doctorate at Bonn with a dissertation on the philosophy of the unconscious of E. von HARTMANN in 1873. Later, while studying privately, he chanced upon a copy of the Elemente der Psychophysik of G. T. Fechner and at once began to adapt Fechner's method to the measurement of learning and memory. He first used himself as a subject and 2,300 nonsense syllables of his own invention for material; later he verified his results and published them in Ueber das Gedächtnis (Leipzig 1885). At this time he was at Berlin where, as assistant professor, he founded a psychological laboratory in 1886. Ebbinghaus is memorable also for the construction of a completion test, the type destined for long use in intelligence testing. In 1890, with Arthur König, he founded the Zeitschrift für Psychologie und Physiologie der Sinnesorgane (Leipzig). He wrote two highly successful books, a general text, Die Grundzüge der Psychologie (Leipzig 1902), and a shorter work, Abriss der Pscychologie (Leipzig 1908). His treatise on memory is considered by some as the original impetus for more research in psychology than any other single study.

Bibliography: E.G. BORING, A History of Experimental Psychology (New York 1950). R. I. WATSON, The Great Psychologists (Philadelphia 1963).

[M. G. KECKEISSEN]

EBBO (EBO) OF REIMS

Archbishop of Reims, France; b. c. 775; d. Hildesheim, Germany, March 20, 851. He was the son of a serf from beyond the Rhine and of Himiltruda, nurse of Louis I the Pious. Ebbo was a fellow student of the prince who, on becoming king of Aquitaine, made Ebbo his librarian. When Louis became emperor, he obtained for his companion the archiepiscopal See of REIMS, and Ebbo fulfilled this charge with distinction, organizing the chapter, constructing buildings, including a new cathedral, and reforming the monasteries. He enjoyed great prestige at court and was royal missus in his province, but he failed in his missionary effort as legate of Pope PASCHAL I to Denmark in 822–823. Under politico-religious pretexts he tried to dethrone Louis the Pious in favor of Louis's son LOTHAIR I, and at Compiegne in 833, he was at the head of the group of bishops who proclaimed the dethronement of the emperor and put him under obligation to do public penance and accept imprisonment. On the restoration of Louis in 835, Ebbo fled and, despite his recantation, was deposed unanimously by the synod at TH-IONVILLE in March of 835 and interned in the Abbey of FULDA. On the death of his father in 840, Lothair restored Ebbo to his see, but he was exiled again after the victory of CHARLES II the Bald over Lothair at Fontenoy-en-Puisaye on June 25, 841. Pope SERGIUS II also refused to recognize him since Ebbo had not been reelected according to proper canonical procedure, and the pope went so far as to reduce him to the lay state for having exercised episcopal functions in violation of the canons. After quarreling with Lothair and being deprived of his revenues for having declined a diplomatic mission to Constantinople, Ebbo took refuge with Louis the German and received from him the See of Hildesheim. He did not, however, renounce his claims to Reims, where HINCMAR had been archbishop since 845, and after a reconciliation with Lothair he arranged for the meeting at Trier of a synod consisting of papal envoys and bishops, especially those loyal to Charles the Bald, that would examine his case. But neither Ebbo nor the papal envoys appeared; he died at Hildesheim without having been rehabilitated. The clergy he had ordained at Reims during his brief restoration from 840 to 841 were the cause of many legal disputes between 845 and 867, for in Gaul, contrary to the Roman opinion, the ordinations performed by a deposed bishop were considered invalid.

Ebbo left only several minor works (Patrologia Latina v.105; 116). FLODOARD OF REIMS (Historia Remensis ecclesiae, 1.2. 19) cited two inscriptions, and the Appendix ad historiam Remensis ecclesiae reproduces a regulation for the "ministers" of the Church of Reims dating from Ebbo's tenure. In a letter to Haltigar, Bishop of Cambrai (d. 831), he invited this bishop to compose a penitential ritual to restore the administration of penance, and in an Apologia the statement he made at the synod of Thionville is partially reproduced. The FALSE DECRE-TALS, justifying Ebbo's conduct, are no longer considered to be his work. The municipal library of Épernay has preserved the famous Evangeliarium of Ebbo (MS 1722), written with perfect regularity in letters of gold on vellum. It originated in the Abbey of Hautvillers in Champagne, where the monks executed it, apparently between 817 and 834, at the request of the archbishop.

Bibliography: M. BOUQUET, Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France (Rerum gallicarum et francicarum scriptores) v.6, 7. Histoire littéraire de la France v.5. É. LESNE, La Hiérarchie épiscopale in Gaule et en Germanie (Lille 1905); L'Origine des menses . . . (Lille 1910). F. LOT et al., Les Destinées de l'empire en Occident de 395 à 888, 2 v. (Paris 1928; new ed. 1940). A. FLICHE and V. MARTIN, eds., Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours (Paris 1935–) v.6. L. HALPHEN, Charlemagne et l'empire carolingien (Paris 1947). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed F. CABROL et al, 4.2: 1697–1703; 14.2:2213–90. P. VIARD, Catholicisme 3:1224–1225.

[J. DAOUST]

EBBO OF SENS, ST.

Archbishop of Sens; b. Tonnerre; d. Aug. 27 c. 740-50. Having been educated at the monastery of Saint-Pierre-le-Vif (Sens), Ebbo succeeded his father as count of Tonnerre, returning to the monastery later as a monk. In 704 he was elected abbot and subsequently succeeded his uncle Goéric as archbishop of Sens (probably in 709). During an Arab raid (725 or 731) Ebbo directed a fiery counterattack. He became interested in a life of solitude, prayer, and penance, and consequently arranged a retreat for himself in the forest of Othe near Arces, about 17 miles from Sens. On Sundays he returned to Sens to celebrate Mass and to instruct the people. He was buried at Saint-Pierre-le-Vif near his sisters, who were former recluses. His relics, exhumed by Archbishop Seguin in 980, were transferred to the cathedral of Sens during the Revolution and are preserved there still. His cult remains active at Arces, site of his grotto and a spring that reputedly cures those ill with fever. Until 1850 there was a solemn procession in his honor each August 27, his feast day.

Bibliography: Sources. Acta Sanctorum Aug. 6:94–100. J. MABILLON, Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti (Venice 1733–1740), 3:601–605. Gallia Christiana (Paris 1856–1865), 12:12–13. Literature. ABBÉ DE MANGIN, Histoire ecclésiastique et civile du diocèse et Langres, 3 v. (Paris 1765) v. 1. L. BRULLÉE, ''Notice sur Saint Ebbon, archevêque de Sens, mort en 750,'' Bulletin de la Société archéologique de Sens 8 (1863) 16–25.

[P. COUSIN]

EBENDORFER, THOMAS

Austrian historiographer, theologian, and diplomat; b. Haselbach, Korneuburg prefecture, lower Austria, Aug. 10, 1388; d. Vienna, Jan. 12, 1464. The son of a landed peasant family and subject to military duty, he began his studies at the University of Vienna in 1408, where he received a doctorate in theology (1428). He became a canon in St. Stephen's Cathedral in Vienna (1427). Sent to the COUNCIL OF BASEL as a representative of the University, he recorded his activities there in the Diarium [ed. E. Birk, Monumenta conciliorum generalium saec. XV (1857) 1:701-783], a sort of official diary. As a councilor of Emperor Frederick III, he went on diplomatic missions, but when the two men began to grow apart, Ebendorfer withdrew more and more to teaching and administration at the University and to writing history. In 1442 Frederick commissioned him to write a Chronicle of the Emperors [ed. W. Jaroschka (Vienna 1956) and F. Pribram, Mitteilungen des Instituts für osterreichische Geschichtsforschung (1890), sup. 3]. In 1451 Ebendorfer delivered the first draft to the Emperor, but he continued to expand the work until his death. His Austrian Chronicle (ed. A. Lhotsky, Monumena Germaniae Historica Scriptores rerum Germanicarum (new series)), planned originally as the seventh book of the Chronicle of the Emperors, developed into a separate major work of five volumes, of which the last section (continued to 1462) was partly in diary form. Ebendorfer belonged to the old school, and there is no trace of the humanistic spirit in his works. His distinguishing features as a historian are a special realism of detail and the use of other than writen sources to an extent then unknown. He wrote also many philosophical, theological, and occasional works (mostly unedited).

Bibliography: H. SCHMIDINGER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 14:1276–81. A. LHOTSKY, Thomas Ebendorfer, ein österreichischer Geschichtschreiber, Theologe und Diplomat des 15. Jahrhunderts (Schriften der Monumenta Germaniae historica 15; Stuttgart 1957); Quellenkunde zur mittelalterlichen Geschichte Österreichs (Graz 1963).

[M. M. ZYKAN]

EBERBACH, ABBEY OF

Near Wiesbaden, Germany. It was founded by Abp. Adalbert of Mainz in 1116 for Augustinian canons, and was taken over by Cistercians of CLAIRVAUX in 1135. It is certain that the Romanesque church (after Clairvaux II) was built by Achard. Ribbed vaults mark the second phase of building, from 1170 to the consecration in 1186. A Gothic aisle for chapels was added on the south side under Abbot William (1310–46). Almost all the medieval buildings remain: the laybrothers' refectory and the monks' dormitory (13th century); the chapter room (12th–14th); the infirmary (12th); since 1617 the winery with a winepress dating from c. 1200. The monastery flourished in the 12th and 13th centuries, with four daughterhouses (1142-74) and an extensive wine trade. In 1206 the monk Conrad, who became abbot in 1221, completed at Eberbach the Exordium magnum Cisterciense (ed. B. Griesser, Rome 1961). The Swedes and Hessians plundered the abbey in the Thirty Years' War, carrying off its rich library. Of the productive scriptorium at Eberbach, 62 MSS (Codices Laudiani) are in the Bodleian Library and ten MSS (Arundel) are in the British Museum, some with magnificent illuminations. The abbey, secularized in 1803, has been a prison, an insane asylum, and a sanatorium; today it is a state winery and museum.

Bibliography: H. HAHN, Die frühe Kirchenbaukunst der Zisterzienser (Berlin 1957). A. BRÜCK, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:627. A. SCHNEIDER, "Deutsche und französische Cistercienser-Handschriften in englischen Bibliotheken," Cistercienser-Chronik 69 (1962) 43–54.

[A. SCHNEIDER]

EBERHARD OF EINSIEDELN, BL.

Abbot; d. August 14, 958. He was born in Swabia of a ducal family and became provost of the cathedral of Strasbourg while still a young man. After establishing a reputation for competence and piety, he gave up this office in 934 to join his friend BENNO OF METZ in the hermitage of EINSIEDELN. As the community grew, Eberhard gave his personal wealth for the building of a monastery, which was named Our Lady of the Hermits, and he became the first abbot of the new foundation. The abbey church was consecrated in 948 by CONRAD OF CON-STANCE and ULRIC OF AUGSBURG. Generosity and prosperity were characteristic of the community under his direction, especially during the great famine of 942. His tomb became a place of pilgrimage, but the relics were lost during the French Revolution.

Feast: Aug. 14.

Bibliography: O. RINGHOLZ, Geschichte des fürstlichen Benediktinerstiftes U. L. F. von Einsiedeln (New York 1904), only v.1 pub. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 3:330. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige, 4 v. (Metten 1933–38) 2:572–574. L. BERRA, A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 1:923. R. HENGGELER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART (Paris 1912–) 14:1288–89. R. TSCHUDI, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:628.

[J. F. FAHEY]

EBERHARD OF ROHRDORF, BL.

The Abbey of Eberbach.

EBERHARD OF ROHRDORF, BL.

Abbot and statesman; b. c. 1160; d. June 10, 1245. Descended from the counts of Rohrdorf, in Baden, Germany, he joined the CISTERCIANS at the Abbey of Salem and became the fifth abbot in 1191. Eberhard proved himself both capable and energetic and yet was noted for his humility. His reign was the most famous in the history of the abbey, coinciding with one of the critical eras of German history, from the death of FREDERICK I BARBA-ROSSA to the end of the Hohenstaufen regime. Eberhard had an influential position in the royal court and was among the earliest and most loyal supporters of the Hohenstaufen. Again and again he appears as a witness to the diplomas of Henry VI and FREDERICK II. Numerous imperial documents of the period were written in Salem, for its scriptorium then had more copyists than the imperial chancellery. The abbot also enjoyed the special favor of the popes. INNOCENT III commissioned him to investigate and report on the most difficult questions of ecclesiastical politics such as the disputed episcopal election in AUGSBURG in 1202 and the settlement of the succession to the archbishopric of Mainz. In 1207 he negotiated a peace between Philip of Swabia (d. 1208) and Pope Innocent III.

Under Eberhard, Salem's holdings were greatly extended, and in 1201 he placed it under the protection of Archbishop Eberhard II of Salzburg (d. 1246). In the Codex Salemitanus, the abbot had the land and legal titles of the abbey noted most meticulously, and this valuable collection of documents is still one of the outstanding sources for the cultural and economic history of upper Swabia. The vigorous growth of the monastic family made possible the foundation of the Abbey of Wettingen in 1227. His monks also provided religious direction for the convents of nuns founded during the abbot's term of office: Wald (1212), Heppach (1230), Kalchrain (1230), Rottenmünster (1223), Heiligkreuzthal (1238), Feldbach (1234), and Gutenzell (1237). In 1240 Eberhard resigned his office because of his great age. He enjoyed the highest regard among his contemporaries, and he was inscribed in the Cistercian martyrology soon after his death.

Feast: April 14 (Cistercians).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:200. M. GLONING, Graf Eberhard von Rohrdorf (Augsburg 1904). H. D. SIEBERT, "Gründung und Anfänge der Reichsabtei Salem," Freiburger Dözesan-Archiv NS 35 (1934) 31–56. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938), 2:296. M. A. DIMIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–), 14:1291–93.

[C. SPAHR]

EBERHARD OF TÜNTENHAUSEN, ST.

Shepherd; b. Freising; d. c. 1370. Eberhard is an uncanonized folk saint, buried under an altar to his honor in the church at Tüntenhausen (Bavaria, Germany). According to the testimony at hearings (1729–34) at which his cult was approved as immemorial, it was said that the faithful took earth from Eberhard's grave and used it as a medicine for sick cattle, yet the grave mound never diminished. Iron and wooden votive statues of animals were left at his grave, and reportedly live calves also were sacrificed. The first mention of his cult is in a letter of 1428. He is the patron of shepherds and domestic animals, invoked in cases of cattle sickness and for good weather.

Feast: Sept. 12, 28, and 29.

Bibliography: L. H. ZOLLING, "Die Verehrung des heiligen Eberhard in Tüntenhausen," Frigisinga (1925) 427–432. L. HEILM-AIER, Die Verehrung des heiligen Eberhard in Tüntenhausen (Freising 1926). R. KRISS, Die Volkskunde der altbayrischen Gnadenstätten (Munich 1953) 1:23–24. J. STABER, Volksfrömmigkeit und Wallfahrtswesen des Spätmittelalters im Bistum Freising (Hohenkirchen 1955) 45–46.

[D. ANDREINI]

EBERLIN, JOHANNES

Evangelical preacher and popular writer; b. Kleinkötz, near Günzburg, c. 1470; d. Leutershausen, before Oct. 13, 1533. He studied at Basel in 1490 and Freiburg in 1493 and entered a Franciscan monastery in Heilsbronn. He lived thereafter in Tübingen, Ulm, and Freiburg, where in 1520 he encountered Luther's writings. On returning to Ulm, he was expelled from the order. In 1521 he published his famous work, Die 15 Bundgenossen (The Fifteen Confederates), combining in a folkish way socio-political and religious demands for reform, and describing a utopian state called Wolfaria. He spent a year in Wittenberg and then traveled as an evangelist to Basel, Rheinfelden, Rottenburg, and Ulm. He married, was called to Erfurt, and at the end of 1525, to Wertheim by Count Georg II. Dismissed on May 6, 1530, he ended his days in Leutershausen, near Ansbach. His greatest importance was his authorship of several volumes of folkish reform tracts and religious treatises.

Bibliography: J. EBERLIN VON GÜNZBURG, Ausgewählte (sämtliche) Schriften, ed. L. ENDERS, 3 v. (Halle 1896–1900). B. RIGGENBACH, Johann Eberlin von Günzburg und sein Reformprogramm (Tübingen 1874). M. RADLKOFER, Johann Eberlin von Günzburg and sein Vetter Hans Jakob Wehe von Leipheim (Nördlingen 1887). J. WERNER, Johann Eberlin von Günzburg, der evangelisch-soziale Volksfreund (Heidelberg 1889). G. BEBER-MEYER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart³ 2:297.

[L. W. SPITZ]

EBIONITES

A Jewish Christian sect that flourished between the first and the fourth century. Despite patristic mention of an Ebion as founder, the word actually refers to the "poor men" (ebjonim) of the Beatitude (Mt 5.3; Lk 4.18; 7.22). This group of ascetics emigrated from Palestine to Transjordan and Syria. Like the Nazarenes and Sadocites of the Qumran tradition, they opposed official Judaism and accepted Jesus Christ as the Messiah foretold by Moses and as the true Prophet (cf. Dt 18.15), but considered His selection as the Christ or Anointed One as due to His eminent virtue achieved under the guidance of the Spirit received in the baptism of John whereby He kept the law perfectly (i.e., was a saddîq). The Ebionites violently opposed the theology of St. Paul because they believed that he had undergone a demoniacal hallucination when he claimed to have had a vision of Christ, and that he had opposed the conversion of the Jews to a perfect observance of the Mosaic Law as intended by St. James in Jerusalem. The Pauline soteriology also was repudiated by the Ebionites, who considered the sacrifices of the Old Law as abolished by the waters of baptism. Their concept of Christ as Son of Man made Him the great reformer of the Judaic Law whose teaching (didascalia) was a critique of the interpolations in the Mosaic Torah.

Devoted to a life of strictest poverty and community of goods, they practiced vegetarianism and ritual ablutions that culminated in the mystical ceremony of baptism. Information about the Ebionites is often inconsistent. They used a so-called Gospel of the Hebrews apparently based on Matthew. Their opposition to St. Paul centered on his apostolate rather than on his theology. The so-called Gospel of the Ebionites and portions of Clementines (Homilies and Recognitions) are thought by some scholars to have had an Ebionite origin. The Ebionites are mentioned by Justin (Dialogues 47, 48), Irenaeus (Adversus haereses 1.26.2; 2.21.1), Tertullian (De praescriptio 33), Hippolytus (Philosphumena 7.34; 9.13–17), and Epiphanius of Salamis (Panarion 29, 30). They are described as Symmachians (after Symmachus, the biblical translator) by the Latin Fathers of the fourth century and were then still extant in Rome, Egypt, and Asia Minor.

Bibliography: H. J. SCHOEPS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 14:1314–19. J. THOMAS, Le Mouvement baptiste en Palestine et Syrie (Gembloux 1935). Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique 30 (Louvain 1934) 257–296. E. MOLLAND, "La Circoncision: Le Baptême et l'autorité du décret apostolique," Studia Theologica 9 (1955) 1–39. A. SALLES, Revue biblique, 64 (Paris 1957) 516–551.

[F. X. MURPHY]

EBNER, MARGARETHA, BL.

Mystic, Dominican virgin; b. c. 1291, Donauwörth (near Nuremberg), Bavaria, Germany; d. June 20, 1351, Medingen, Bavaria, Germany. A child of the nobility, Margaretha received a classical education at home. She was solemnly professed (1306) at the Dominican convent at Maria-Medingen near Dillingen. Dangerously ill for many years, Ebner offered penances-abstinence from wine, fruit, and the bath-for those who had died in the war devastating the countryside. She was suddenly cured, but then forced with the other sisters to leave the convent during the campaign of Ludwig the Bavarian. Shortly thereafter the death of her nurse, to whom she was emotionally attached, caused Margaretha to grieve inconsolably. But in 1332 she regained her composure through the efforts of Henry of Nördlingen, who then assumed her spiritual direction. The correspondence between them is the first collection of this kind in German. Under his tutelage, she wrote with her own hand a full account of all her revelations and conversations with the Infant Jesus, including the answers she received from him, even in her sleep. This diary is preserved at Medingen in a manuscript that dates to 1353. From her letters and diary we learn that she remained loyal to the excommunicated Ludwig the Bavarian, whose soul she learned in a vision had been saved. Among her other correspondents were many contemporary spiritual leaders, including Johannes Tauler. She is considered one of the leaders of the Friends of God. Her body now rests in a chapel built in 1755 in the Maria-Medingen Convent church. Pope John Paul II praised Ebner, the first person he beatified (Feb. 24, 1979), for her perseverance.

Feast: June 20 (Dominicans).

Bibliography: M. EBNER, Major Works, tr. & ed. L. P. HINDS-LEY (New York 1993). M. GRABMANN, Neuaufgefundene lateinische Werke deutscher Mystiker (Munich 1922). P. STRAUCH, Margeretha Ebner und Heinrich von Nördlingen (Amsterdam 1966). A. WALZ, "Gottesfreunde und Margarete Ebner," in Hi- storisches Jahrbuch (1953), 72:253–265. L. ZOEPF, Die mystikerin Margaretha Ebner (Berlin 1914).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

EBRACH, ABBEY OF

In Upper Franconia, Diocese of Würzburg, founded in 1127 as a daughterhouse of the Cistercian Abbey of MORIMOND. It flourished in the 12th and 13th centuries with daughterhouses of its own. The abbey had extensive estates in Franconia. It was secularized in 1803 and has been a prison since 1851. The first church was consecrated in 1134. The early Gothic construction (1200-85), with a rectangular apse and a magnificent rose window on the west façade, was sumptuously decorated in early classical style by Abbot Rosshirt (1773-91) employing the services of Materno Bossi, and is today a Catholic parish church. The monk Conrad (d. 1399), a noted theological writer, taught in the abbey's colleges in Prague and Vienna. A long, bitter struggle with the bishops of Würzburg over full exemption ended in failure in 1522. Valuable manuscripts from Ebrach are in Munich, Bamberg, Würzburg, and Wolfenbüttel.

Bibliography: W. WIEMER, Die Baugeschichte und Bauhütte der Ebracher Abteikirche (Kallmünz, Ger. 1958). M. HARTIG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:636. K. LAUTERER, "Konrad von Ebrach, Lebenslauf und Schrifttum," Analecta Sacri Ordinis Cisterciensis 17 (1961) 151–214; 18 (1962) 60–120.

[A. SCHNEIDER]

ECCE HOMO

The presentation of Christ to the people to be mocked by them concludes His religious and civil trial, which is the last stage of the Passion before the Crucifixion. Crowned with thorns and with the reed scepter in His bound hands, His pitiable figure is exhibited in lonely contrast to the contemptuous horde that views Him.

The iconography of Ecce Homo is derived from Jn 19.4–7. The subject became important in Christian art only after the late Middle Ages and under the influence of mystical interpretation of the Passion of Christ. Thus, the iconography of Ecce Homo developed at the same time as that of the "Man of Sorrows" or "Christ of Pity."

The first representation of Ecce Homo proper is found in the Codex Egberti (10th century, Trier). From the 11th to the early 12th century the subject occurs in the narrative cycle of the Passion. In the early 15th century it began to enjoy an increasingly more important role in art. Contemporary theology as well as late medieval mystery plays of the Passion stimulated the development of the subject, and it became very popular, especially in northern countries. The figure of Christ was isolated from subsidiary motifs in the narrative representation and formed an Andachtsbild. In the 16th century the subject was spread widely by means of graphic art (Dürer, Altdorfer, etc.). Titian painted the full scene three times during his career (1543, Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna; 1547, Prado, Madrid; 1565, Hermitage, Leningrad), and there are further examples from the baroque period by Reni, Rubens, and Rembrandt.

Bibliography: K. KÜNSTLE, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur (Munich 1890; 2d ed. 1897) 1:437–440. O. SCHMITT, Reallexikon zur deutschen Kunstgeschichte 4 (Stuttgart 1958) 674–700. L. RÉAU, Iconographie der l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.2:459–461.

[S. TSUJI]

ECCE IAM NOCTIS TENUATUR UMBRA

An office hymn that was historically sung at Lauds on the Sundays from Pentecost until the end of September. It is considered the counterpart of Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes for Matins of the same season. It is considered the counterpart of the counterpart of Nocte surgentes vigilemus omnes for Matins of the same season. Both hymns consist of three strophes in Sapphic and Adonic. Recent scholars attribute the Ecce to ALCUIN rather than to GREGORY THE GREAT, among whose works it is found both in manuscripts and printed editions. Its style and thought, however, coincide with that of Alcuin and the cultivated tastes of literary circles in the ninthcentury CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE.

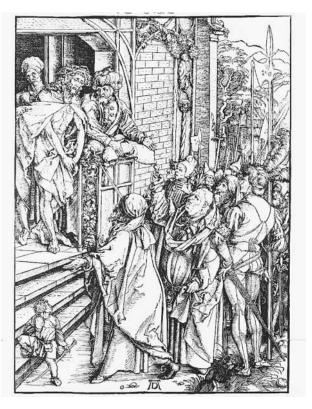

Bibliography: Analecta hymnica 51:31032, text. J. CONNEL-LY, ed. and tr., Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, Md. 1957).

[M. M. BEYENKA]

ECCLESIAM SUAM

Encyclical letter, "On the Ways in Which the Church Must Carry out Its Mission in the Contemporary World," promulgated by Pope Paul VI on the feast of the Transfiguration, Aug. 6, 1964. Ecclesiam suam was the pope's first encyclical letter. In it, he envisions the role of the Church vis-à-vis the secular world.

The prologue, "The Paths of the Church," outlines the encyclical in terms of "three thoughts, which continually disturb [the pope's] heart" (no. 8). First, "the Church should deepen its consciousness of itself" (no. 9). Second, on the basis of this self-awareness, "there arises the unselfish and almost impatient need for renewal" (no. 11). Third, the pope is concerned about "the relationships, which the Church of today should establish with the world which surrounds it and in which it lives and labors" (no. 12). Along these lines, the encyclical is divided into three parts.

"Ecce Homo," woodcut by Albrecht Dürer from the "Great Passion," series, ca. 1497–1500.

Part one, "Awareness," indicates that "it is a duty today for the Church to deepen the awareness that she must have of herself, of the treasure of truth of which she is heir and custodian, and of her mission in the world" (18). The key to this self-awareness is "vigilance." "Vigilance," says the pope, "should always be present and operative in the conscience of the faithful servant; it determines his or her everyday behavior, characteristic of the Christian in the world" (no. 21). He justifies the "boldness" (no. 23) of this invitation because "the Church needs to reflect on herself" and "to experience Christ in herself" (no. 25). Thus, "the first benefit to be reaped from a deepened awareness of herself by the Church is a renewed discovery of her vital bond of union with Christ" (no. 35). Ultimately, this sacred bond is the "mystery of the Church" (no. 36). This mystery "is not a mere object of theological knowledge; it is something to be lived, something the faithful soul can have a kind of connatural experience of, even before arriving at a clear notion of it'' (no. 37). In consideration of the profound and sacred mystery of the Church, the pope teaches that, "if we can awaken in ourselves such a strengthgiving feeling for the Church and instill it in the faithful by profound and careful instruction, many of the difficulties which today trouble students of Ecclesiology, as for example, how the Church can be at once both visible and spiritual, at once free and subject to discipline, communitarian and hierarchical, already holy and yet still being sanctified, contemplative and active . . . will be overcome in practice and solved by those who, after being enlightened by sound teaching, experience the living reality of the Church herself" (no. 38).

In the second section, "Renewal," Pope Paul indicates that the source of his impetus for renewal is "the desire to see the Church of God become what Christ wants her to be: one, holy, and entirely dedicated to the pursuit of perfection to which she is effectively called." Despite this lofty vocation and, "perfect as she is in the ideal conception of her Divine Founder," he affirms that the Church should "tend towards becoming perfect in the real expression of her earthly existence'' (no. 41). He cautions that the Church's call to perfection should not be understood "in the sense of change, but of a stronger determination to preserve the characteristic features which Christ has impressed on the Church'' (no. 47). In view of these criteria for renewal, he indicates that "the Church will rediscover her renewed youthfulness, not so much by changing her exterior laws, as by interiorly assimilating her true spirit of obedience to Christ and, accordingly, by observing those laws which the Church prescribes for herself with the intention of following Christ'' (no. 51). Subsequently, the pope identifies two points that provide matter for reflection for the renewal of ecclesiastical life, namely, the "spirit of poverty" (nos. 54-55) and the "spirit of charity" (nos. 56-57).

The final section, "Dialogue," presents the claim that "if the Church acquires an ever-growing awareness of itself . . . tries to model itself on the ideal of Christ, the result is that the Church becomes radically different from the human environment in which it . . . lives or which it approaches" (no. 58). However, "this distinction is not a separation" (no. 63). To the extent that "the Church has a true realization of what the Lord wishes it to be, . . . there arises a unique sense of fullness and a need for outpouring." A consequence of this outpouring is the "duty . . . of spreading, offering, and announcing it to others." "To this internal drive of charity which tends to become the external gift of charity," says the pope, "we will give the name of dialogue" (no. 64), into which "the Church should enter . . . with the world in which it exists and labors" (no. 65). "Dialogue," he affirms, "ought to characterize our apostolic approach and method as has been handed down to us" (no. 67). In fact, he claims that dialogue "is found in the very plan of God" (no. 70). Identifying its ecclesial significance, the pope explains, "dialogue is . . . a method of accomplishing the apostolic mission" (no. 81). As such, dialogue is both fruitful for the Church and for the partners she engages: "The dialectic of this exercise of thought and of patience will make us discover elements of truth also in the opinions of others, it will force us to express our teaching with great fairness, and it will reward us for the work of having explained it in accordance with the objections of another or despite his or her slow assimilation of our teaching. The dialogue will make us wise; it will make us teachers" (no. 83).

In his concluding remarks, the pope notes that "it is a cause of joy and comfort . . . to see that such a dialogue is already in existence in the Church and in the areas which surround it. The Church is more than ever alive" (no. 117).

[K. GODFREY]

ECCLESIASTES, BOOK OF

A SAPIENTIAL book of the Old Testament canon. This article discusses the meaning of the name, the origin and unity of the book, and the author's teaching.

The Name. The initial phrase, the words of Qoheleth (Heb. dibrê qōhelet), forms the title in the Hebrew text of Ecclesiastes. Throughout the book the word qohelet occurs seven times (1.1, 2, 12; 7.27; 12.8, 9, 10), always with reference to the author of the work, very much as though it were a proper name. The word is related to qāhāl, which means "congregation" or "community." Already the Septuagint translator was perplexed by the term and contributed to its enigmatic character by the choice of an obscure Greek word ἐκκλησιαστής; this term, rare in Greek literature and designating a member of the citizen's assembly, is sometimes translated as preacher. Not having a more acceptable solution to the problem, St. Jerome simply transliterated the Greek word for the title of the book in the Vulgate. The style, mood, and purpose of the author are hardly such as to warrant the title preacher.

Origin, Linguistic Characteristics, and Literary Unity. For centuries Solomon was regarded as the author of this book because of the statements in 1.1, 12, and the general argument of the first two chapters. This view has been universally abandoned; now it is generally agreed that the book comes from a much later period. It has been assigned by critics to every century from that of Zerubbabel to that of HEROD THE GREAT, but the present trend is to date its composition in early Hellenistic times, c. 300 to 275 B.C. The author's apparent ignorance of belief in a RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD excludes a date so late as the times of the Maccabees (2nd century B.C.). An earlier date is excluded because, among other reasons, his subjective, individualistic approach would not have been in character during monarchic times when community and national interests were paramount.

The language of Qoheleth is not the Hebrew of the Prophets. An analysis of the text provides an abundance of forms, words, and constructions that are Aramaic in nature or related to that idiom. For several decades one school of thought has advanced the hypothesis that Qoheleth in its present form is a translation from an Aramaic original (e.g., F. C. Burkitt, F. Zimmermann, C. C. Torrey, and H. L. Ginsberg), whereas the case against the translation theory has been defended by R. Gordis, among others (see bibliography). The linguistic problem may be answered by suggesting that Qoheleth was thoroughly conversant with Aramaic and used it as a vernacular tongue, while employing Hebrew in its contemporary state of transition to the later Mishnaic form for his lectures and the composition of his work.

The author's style, even as his thought, follows no neat pattern. Much is prose, although a prose that at times tends to become metrical under a load of poetic nuances. There are proverbs of the traditional type, some original and some from popular wisdom tradition [see WISDOM (IN THE BIBLE)]; statements seemingly contrary to each other are juxtaposed, and the reader is left to think out the answer; or Qoheleth cites a proverb and immediately adds his own evaluation. It is with this last form that he is most at home (4.9-12; 7.1-14; 9.4-6).

The question of the book's literary unity has become almost a historical one. Because of the author's seemingly unorthodox questioning of accepted orthodox religious and moral standards and because of the peculiarities of language and style, scholars at the beginning of the 20th century favored hypotheses of multiple authorship. The characteristics of the work are now seen from a more profound psychological and historical viewpoint and are interpreted as prime indications of the book's literary unity. Apart from a few evident exceptions, e.g., the opening words in 1.1, the epilogue in 12.9–14, and perhaps the words, ''says Qoheleth,'' in 1.2; 7.27; 12.8, unity of authorship is now generally maintained.

Content and Teaching. Although Ecclesiastes does have a specific theme, an orderly, logical development of that theme is not in evidence. Perhaps the reader would be more sympathetic to the author on this score, if he would visualize the author as a sage advanced in years musing on his favorite subject, now and then glancing at notes made during years of teaching. As once his school audience, so now his readers may best regard his statements as pearls of wisdom that need no further literary framework to enhance their value.

If there is a key to the understanding of Ecclesiastes, it is to be found in the third verse of the book: "What profit has man from all the labor which he toils at under the sun?" Qoheleth had sought to plumb the depths of the mystery of life from the viewpoint of its ultimate worth. He desperately sought for what is permanent, lasting, stable—and failed to find it. Like Augustine, Qoheleth had a "restless heart;" unlike Augustine he was not favored with the revelation that the human heart is destined to quiet its restlessness in the divine embrace. By observation and experience he had come to know, not that there is no profit at all in human objectives, but that the fullness of an enduring and satisfying good is simply not to be had.

The author covers various areas of human interest and effort, namely, wealth, pleasure, wisdom, work, government, family relationships, worship, business, women, loyalty, prudence, knowledge—and ever finds the same answer; none of these yields an ultimate value, none provides a lasting, limitless satisfaction. Even the best of them, wisdom, is undone by death. Therefore all is elemental vanity, nothingness, a chasing after wind.

Nevertheless, Qoheleth remains a sober, humble realist. He knows God has a plan in the universe of things, even though man is unable to piece that plan together. Injustice, death, misery, and folly do not place his religious faith in jeopardy. The disciple who added the final six verses to his master's musings, may well have reflected his teacher's deepest conviction: "Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is man's all; because God will bring to judgment every work, with all its hidden qualities, whether good or bad" (12.13–14).

There exists no evidence concerning Qoheleth's direct contribution to the development of the doctrine of retribution in AFTERLIFE or of blessed immortality. Nevertheless, his trenchant, devastating formulation of the inadequacy of the traditional teaching on RETRIBUTION in this life, together with his probing of the heart's undying desire for limitless possession of truth, goodness, and happiness cannot but have contributed to the evolution toward the belief in an afterlife.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 615–617. V. HAMP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 8:704. K. GALING and W. WERBECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957-65) 5:510-514. R. GORDIS, Koheleth: The Man and His World (New York 1951); "The Original Language of Qohelet," Jewish Quarterly Review 37 (1946-47) 67-84; "The Translation-Theory of Qohelet Reexamined," ibid. 40 (1949-50) 103-116; "Qohelet and Qumran: A Study of Style," Biblica 41 (1960) 395-410. C. C. TORREY, "The Question of the Original Language of Ooheleth," Jewish Quarterlly Review 39 (1948-49) 151-160. H. L. GINSBERG, Studies in Koheleth (New York 1950); "The Structure and Content . . . ," Vetus Testamentum 3 (1955) 138-149. R. PATRUEL, L'Ecclésiaste (new ed. Bible de Jérusalem; 1958). W. ZIMMERLI, Die Weisheit des Predigers Salamo (Berlin 1936). A. MILLER, "Aufbau und Grundproblem des Predigers," Miscellanea Biblica 2 (Rome 1934) 104-132. D. BUZY, "La Notion de bonheur dans l'Ecclésiaste," Revue biblique 43 (1934) 494-511. P. W. SKEHAN, The Literary Relationship between the Book of Wisdom and the Protocanonical Wisdom Books of the O.T. (Washington 1938).

[W. G. HEIDT]

ECCLESIASTICUS

The title commonly applied to the Latin translation (from the Greek version) of the Wisdom of Ben Sira, also known as SIRACH. The word Ecclesiasticus, like ἐκκλησιαστικός of Codex 248, a witness to the Greek II form of the book, is an adjective. But from the 3d century A.D. the Latin word came to be used also as a proper noun-St. Cyprian (d. 258) cites Sirach in this fashion: Apud Salomonem in Ecclesiastico, or simply In Ecclesiastico [Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3 (Vienna 1868) 110, 154, 176, 177, 178, 181]. In the Vulgate tradition this same peculiarity is found; one manuscript begins ecclesiastici liber incipit, and the editions have either incipit liber ecclesiastici or simply Ecclesiasticus, whereas other manuscripts contain the more logical incipit liber ecclesiasticus. The best witnesses of the Vulgate, however, read liber Hiesu filii Sirach, a title more in keeping with most Greek manuscripts. The word Ecclesiasticus-either as an adjective modifying liber (expressed or understood), or worse still as a proper nouncannot be satisfactorily accounted for. Perhaps because the book was so often read in the liturgy, it came to be considered the Church book par excellence; or because it is the most important of the Deuterocanonical books that were rejected from the Jewish canon, The Wisdom of Ben Sira came to be known as the "Churchly" bookone accepted by the Church but not by the Jews.

Bibliography: Sapientia Salomonis, Liber Hiesu filii Sirach (Biblia sacra iuxta latinam vulgatam versionem 12; Rome 1964), a critical ed.

[A. A. DI LELLA]

ECCLESIOLOGY

The branch of theology that studies the nature and mission of the Church. After considering the history of ecclesiology, this article will survey the major developments and issues that have attracted the attention of theologians since the Second Vatican Council.

History. Formal treatises on ecclesiology appeared somewhat late in the history of the Church (even though some writers did compose books on the Church; e.g., St. Cyprian wrote De catholicae ecclesiae unitate). Even scholastic theologians of the Middle Ages, including St. Thomas Aquinas, did not include a special treatise on the Church in their Summae. However, the writers of the New Testament, the Fathers, and scholastics reflected deeply on the mystery of the Church and treated explicitly of its different aspects, especially in relation to Christological and soteriological themes. One can, therefore, speak of the ecclesiology of the New Testament, of St. Paul, St. Augustine, etc., meaning by this the point of view from which they contemplated the Church and the aspects of the mystery emphasized or clarified by their writings. Prescholastic ecclesiology has certain definite characteristics: it expresses itself in symbolic language rather than in abstract formulations; it emphasizes the interior mystical reality mediated and manifested in the visible sacramental life of the Church. The great scholastic theologians in their insistence on speculative theology at times tended to overlook the rich symbolism of the Scriptures and Fathers, yet they carried forward many of the same themes. St. Thomas, for example, following Augustine, developed the theme of the headship of Christ, considering the MYSTICAL BODY as the domain, or sphere of influence, of Christ's sanctifying and salvific action.

When formal consideration was given to the Church in the domain of DOGMATIC THEOLOGY and the first treatises came to be written, this was done in response to definite historical challenges, which were to determine the aspects under which the Church would be considered. Thus John of Paris in De potestate regia et papali (1302–03) sought to delineate the relationship between the spiritual and temporal powers in the context of the conflict between Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair. In the Middle Ages various movements and writers, in reaction to the many abuses in the Church, began to call in question the authority and mediation of the visible Church (e.g., the Franciscan Spirituals, the Waldensians, John Wyclif and John Hus, the conciliar movement consequent upon the tragedy of the Western Schism). These movements found their fullest expression in the theology of Martin Luther and the Protestant Reformation, which ended in rejecting the visible mediation of the Church, especially its priesthood and the authority of the hierarchy.

As a consequence, Catholic theologians began to treat explicitly of the exterior visible aspects of the Church [see Juan de Torquemada, OP, in his Summa de ecclesia (Cologne 1480)]; and when the formal treatises came to be written by the theologians of the Counter Reformation, they placed a strong focus on its visible hierarchical structure (see Cardinal Robert Bellarmine, who set the pace for the others in his De controversiis). In the ensuing centuries, during which the Church was faced with new threats from Jansenism, Gallicanism, the rationalism of the 18th century, etc., this ecclesiology, whose interest was primarily apologetical and which has been unflatteringly described as a "hierarchology," continued to hold sway and was the one incorporated in the theological manuals for use in seminaries. It reached its high-water mark at Vatican Council I with the solemn definition of the primacy of jurisdiction and infallibility of the pope.

During the 19th century, however, a new ecclesiology was slowly being formulated that sought to integrate the ecclesiology of the Church's visible structure into a more complete and vital understanding of the mystery as found in the Scriptures and Fathers. The first great center of this ecclesiological revival was the theological faculty of Tübingen in Germany, whose greatest light was Johann Adam Möhler (1796 to 1838). His ecclesiology was characterized by its insistence on the community and the interior reality of the life of grace (see Die Einheit in der Kirche, 1825, and Symbolik, 1832). This revival was furthered by the Jesuit theologians in Rome, especially Giovanni Perrone (1794 to 1876), Carlo Passaglia (1812 to 1887), Klemens Schrader (1820 to 1875), and Cardinal J. B. Franzelin (1816 to 1886); by Matthias Scheeben (1835 to 1888) in Germany; and Cardinal John Henry Newman (1801 to 1890) in England.

In preparation for Vatican I, a proposed schema on the Church, written largely by Schrader, began by defining the Church as the Mystical Body of Christ. It met with opposition from many of the fathers, and a revised version relegated the image to a secondary consideration, preferring to define the Church as a visible society. The new trends, however, continued to exercise their influence, and between the two world wars there was a greatly renewed interest in the theology of the Mystical Body (of special importance were the works of Karl Adam, Émile Mersch, Romano Guardini, Charles Journet, and Sebastian Tromp). In 1943 Pius XII's great encyclical on the Mystical Body (MYSTICI CORPORIS), while warning against excesses that could lead to a sort of panchristism, incorporated the patristic and scholastic insistence on the interior reality of grace with the theology of the Church as a visible hierarchical society. During the next 20 years modern Catholic ecclesiology, strongly influenced by the ecumenical movement and the scriptural and liturgical revival, continued to make many advances. French Dominican Yves Congar, for example, contributed especially to an understanding of historical development and the role of the Holy Spirit in the Church, with implications for ecumenism, structural reform, the laity, and spirituality. Congar's compatriot, Jesuit Henri de Lubac, expressed a multidimensional vision of the Church as both a social body in the world and a mystery revealed by God. The fruit of this further study and research is expressed concretely in Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen gentium, as well as in its Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Gaudium et spes.

See Also: CHURCH, II (THEOLOGY OF); CHURCH, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: Y. M. J. CONGAR, H. FRIES, ed., Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962-63) 1:801-12. O. SEMMELROTH, Lexikon für theologie und Kirche 3:781-87. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Tables générales 1951-) 1:1110-30. F. M. BRAUN, Aspects nouveaux du problème de l'église (Fribourg 1942). C. ARÉVALO, Some Aspects of the Theology of the Mystical Body of Christ in the Ecclesiology of Giovanni Perrone, Carlo Passaglia and Clemens Schrader (Rome 1959). S. JAKI, Les Tendances nouvelles de l'ecclésiologie (Rome 1957). É. MERSCH, Le Corps mystique du Christ, 2 v. (2d ed. Paris 1936); Eng. The Whole Christ, tr. J. R. KELLEY (Milwaukee 1938; London 1949). M. NEDONCELLE et al., L'Ecclésiologie au XIX siècle (Paris 1960). G. THILS, Les Notes de l'église dans l'apologétique catholique depuis la réforme (Gembloux 1937). Y. M. J. CONGAR, "Considération historique sur la rupture du XVI siècle dans ses rapports avec la réalisation catholique de l'unité" in Chrétiens en dialogue (Paris 1964) 409-36. G. WEIGEL, "Catholic Ecclesiology in Our Time'' in Christianity Divided, ed. D. J. CALLA-HAN et al. (New York 1961) 177-94. A. DULLES, "A Half Century of Ecclesiology," Theological Studies 50 (1989) 419-42. M. HIMES, Ongoing Incarnation: Johann Adam Möhler and the Beginnings of Modern Ecclesiology (New York 1997). R. KRIEG, Romano Guardini: A Precursor of Vatican II (Notre Dame 1997).

[J. R. LERCH/D. M. DOYLE]

The Nature of the Church. Vatican II did not legislate any one definition of the Church. Lumen gentium (LG) insisted that the Church is a mystery and proposed a variety of Biblical images, treating at length the Church as the People of God and as the Body of Christ. It also described the Church as a sacrament and as a communion. This last has come to new prominence while the image of the Church as the People of God seems to have been deemphasized. The 1985 Synod of Bishops, for example, made only one reference to the Church as the People of God. Two reasons may explain this deemphasis: a reaction to the misuse of the People of God by some to justify a "people's church" or "popular church" that is distinct from the hierarchical Church; and the fear that the People of God image might suggest a purely sociological view of the Church to the neglect of its deeper spiritual nature.

Theologians have followed the lead of the Council, avoiding the "perfect society ecclesiology" of the past and preferring an ecclesiology that blends the Biblical sources with historical tradition and contemporary needs. To achieve this end, they search for appropriate images, metaphors, types, and symbols to express the nature of the Church. Avery Dulles has argued persuasively for the use of models in ecclesiology: institution, mystical communion, sacrament, herald, servant, and community of disciples. Others have applied social theory to the study of the Church. Communio ecclesiology, with rich sacramental and pneumatic elements, has become a major theme. The 1985 Synod maintained that the ecclesiology of communion is the central and fundamental idea of the conciliar documents, and used it to explain distribution of power in the Church, the sacramental foundation for collegiality, and the coexistence of unity and pluraformity.

Church and the World. Gaudium et spes (GS) focused on the Church in its relationship to the world, calling for a discernment of the "signs of the times" (GS 4). The Council distinguished earthly progress from the increase of the Kingdom (GS 39) but did not precisely define the nature of their interrelationship. It also affirmed the solidarity of the human family, the collaboration with all people of good will, and the inculturation of the Church in different areas. Theologians have reflected on the role of the Church in the development of social justice and world peace. Political and liberation theologies concentrate on the duty of the Church to defend human life and promote human rights.

Liberation theology, with its stress on orthopraxis, conscientization, and the preferential option for the poor, sees the Church as an agent of social transformation. The Church has a fourfold mission: to announce the gospel of liberation, to denounce all actions that impede human rights, to initiate actions for justice, and to support these initiatives. Rome has criticized some elements in liberation theology: ecclesiological relativism; politicization of the gospel; confusion over human liberation and final redemption; and the use of Marxism, class struggle, and violence.

Although the Church may have no direct political or economic mission with respect to temporal matters, its moral and religious service extends to the entire world. The Church must defend human rights whenever they are violated. John Paul II and the Code of Canon Law, however, prohibit clerics and religious from engaging in partisan politics. A thin line often exists between political activity and partisan politics. The Church cannot retreat from pressing social concerns, but is should avoid excessive involvement in practical politics. Several theologians have developed Karl Rahner's assertion that Vatican II began the era of the world Church—the movement from a Western or European center to an actual world religion. Such a global and multicultural Catholicism encourages the autonomy of regional churches, the adoption of new symbols, languages, and behavioral patterns, and the greater appreciation of non-Christian religions. The challenge of forming new structures and methodologies has deep pastoral implications for the Church.

Local and Universal Church. Vatican II did not fully explain the relationship between the local and the universal Church. Is the local church simply a part of the universal Church or does the universal Church come to be from the communion of local churches? The latter explanation is favored by many ecclesiologists who point to Lumen gentium 26, Sacrosanctum concilium (SC) 41, and Christus Dominus (CD) 11. The local church may refer to the regional church, the ritual or patriarchal church, the diocese, the parish, the family, and the smaller eucharistic communities. Some argue that the term local church also applies to non-eucharistic groupings, such as religious communities and basic ecclesial communities so prevalent in Latin America.

The local church is Church because in it Christ is wholly present. The Church of Christ is incarnate in the local church and has no existence apart from it. The universal Church is not a juridical union of local churches but the communion of local churches united in faith and the Holy Spirit. "In and from such particular churches there comes into being the one and only Catholic Church" (LG 23).

The theology of the local church raises the issue of unity and diversity. Local churches are mutually interdependent; they are always related to other local churches and especially to the Church of Rome. Local churches throughout the world recognize one another and foster the wider mission of the universal Church. Each local church is deeply imbedded in the life of its own people, but it must also be accountable to its sister churches.

If the local church is truly Church, then it would seem that the principle of subsidiarity is applicable. This principle affirms that smaller groups should not be absorbed by larger social bodies. It implies a division of competencies and cooperation and seeks to prevent excessive domination and to encourage local churches to act freely and responsibly. The practical implementation of the principle of subsidiarity inevitably brings up the problem of the tension between authority and freedom: the balance between the rights of the local church and the rights of the Church of Rome. Ministries and Mission. The postconciliar period has seen an explosion in the number and diversity of ecclesial ministries. The Council taught that the ordained priesthood differs in essence and not only in degree from the priesthood of the faithful (LG 10). It described the priesthood largely in pastoral and functional terms rather than in the highly sacral language of the post-Tridentine period. An extensive literature exists on the nature of priestly identity, the programs of priestly formation, and the pastoral strategies needed in view of the critical shortage of priests and the increase in priestless parishes. Many of the theologies of the priesthood focus on charism, service, and community rather than on the power of the office and its ontological grounding.

The Council authorized the restoration of the permanent diaconate in Latin rite churches (LG 29). The deacon is a minister of word and sacrament and ordained to serve the community in charity and justice. The debate continues over these roles: is the primary task of the deacon to assist the priest in liturgical celebrations or to perform works of charity and justice as Acts of the Apostles 6 seems to indicate?

The theology of the laity has remained a controversial topic. According to Vatican II, "the lay apostolate is a participation in the saving mission of the Church itself" (LG 33). The Council taught that the Christian faithful, by their Baptism and Confirmation, share a "common dignity" and possess a "true equality" in regards to the building up of the Body of Christ. They share in the prophetic, priestly, and kingly mission of Christ. The Code of Canon Law enumerates the rights and duties of the laity, but it does not give them any effective power. The increase in lay ministries, the shortage of priests, and the involvement of the laity in ecclesial decision-making at all levels may help shape a more balanced theology of the laity in the future. The role of women, especially in regard to the greater utilization of their special contributions to the Church, is a significant aspect of this question.

Evangelization is an essential function of the Church and a duty of all its members, as Paul VI emphasized in Evangelii nuntiandi (1975) and as John Paul II proclaimed in Redemptoris Missio (1990). But Vatican II further affirmed the positive elements in non-Christian religions and the possibility of salvation for the unevangelized. This new point of view has seriously called into question the traditional understanding of mission work. The number of missionaries declined dramatically since the Council. A debate, unresolved by Vatican II, continues over the primary purpose of missionary activity. Is it the planting of the Church as a sign among the unevangelized or the broader pastoral activity among both the unevangelized and the de-Christianized? Missiology is in a transitional stage as it attempts to answer this question.

Primacy and Collegiality. Church authority, always an intriguing question for theologians, has attracted much attention in the last ten years. Vatican II substantially repeated the doctrine of primacy defined at Vatican I, but contemporary studies examine anew the Biblical, historical, and theological evidence. Particular attention has been paid to the possible limits of the pope's power in the light of revelation, natural and divine law, dogma, and ecclesiastical law—all these look to the very mandate of his office. The voluntary limitation of papal authority is also widely discussed in ecumenical circles.

Primacy cannot be properly understood apart from collegiality, one of the major contributions of Vatican II. The Council stressed that unity and collaboration that should exist between the papal and episcopal offices and described the corporate responsibility which the College of Bishops under papal leadership has for the entire Church. Collegiality rests on the ancient idea of the Church as communio. The Council, however, was vague about the consequences of collegiality and how it affects the future of the papacy. The debate centers on LG 22, which stated that the College of Bishops with its head, the pope, is the subject of supreme power in the Church. Some theologians argue that there are two inadequately distinct subjects of authority in the Church: the pope and the College of Bishops, and the pope can decide to act personally or collegially. They point to the Nota praevia to support their view. This view seems to break the essential unity of Church authority and to separate the papacy from the episcopacy. Others, also arguing from Vatican II, hold that there is only one subject of supreme powerthe College of Bishops. Thus every primatial action is also collegial, since the pope is a member and head of the college. This theory, which has much to recommend it, stresses the unity of power in the Church and the collaboration of the pope and the bishops.

The Synod of Bishops, established by Paul VI in 1965, is a major organ of collegiality. Through 2000, ten general assemblies and eight regional assemblies have been held. The current debate concerns the theological character of the synod: is it a truly collegial act, or is it simply a service to the Pope in his capacity as universal primate? The Code of Canon Law and the history of the synods suggest the latter. The synod is an expression of the collegial spirit (LG 23), but it is merely a consultative body. The pope may grant a deliberative vote to its members, but he has not yet done so.

Episcopal conferences were given formal status at Vatican II (CD 36–38) and made mandatory by Paul VI in 1966. Current discussion focuses on the theological basis of the conferences and their teaching authority. There is no unanimity among theologians on these points. Yet many theologians argue that the conferences have a genuine theological basis as limited expression of the collegial spirit and that they have legitimate authority to teach. In juridical terms the synods and episcopal conferences may not be examples of collegiality in the strict sense. But the life of the Church overflows juridical categories and these collegial expression have greatly benefited the Church.

Magisterium and Disagreement. Another problem in postconciliar ecclesiology is the relationship between the ecclesiastical magisterium and theologians. The Council said little about the authority of theologians. It did teach that the faithful are to accept with "a religious submission of will and of mind" (religiosum voluntatis et intellectus obsequium) the teachings of the Pope and the bishops, even when these teachings are not infallible (LG 25). It presumed assent to Church teaching and did not discuss the possibility or conditions of disagreement. The issue became more than academic in light of the negative reaction to Humanae vitae (1968), the encyclical of Paul VI on birth control. Tensions further increased when the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith with papal approval censured such theologians as J. Pohier. H. Küng, E. Schillebeeckx, C. Curran, L. Boff, and T. Balasuriya.

The present debate concerns largely the extent to which public dissent to some authentic but non-infallible teachings of the magisterium is permissible. How are the rights of theologians to explore the faith compatible with the rights of the Church to teach authoritatively? The Church cannot accept a "free market of ideas" without limit, nor should it unreasonably suppress theological creativity. Public dissent by theologians, however, should not weaken the effectiveness of the magisterium to be a credible witness to the Gospel. Disputes between the magisterium and theologians may be better resolved by beginning the process at the local level and only, when unsuccessful, by appealing to Rome. There is also need for clearer and more equitable procedures for resolving doctrinal conflicts.

A related question is the meaning of the sensus fidelium—the objective sense or mind of the Church. The sensus fidelium, what the faithful believe, is a gift of the Holy Spirit to the Church. It is not constitutive of revelation nor is it self-justifying, but it does play an important role in the development and preservation of doctrine. Current discussions focus on the sensus fidelium as one among several theological sources, its relationship to the magisterium, and the need for greater consultation of the faithful as part of the process by which the Church teaches. Ecumenism. The Catholic Church is committed to working for the reunion of all Christians, but the exuberant spirit following Vatican II has been tempered. Sober minds realize that the road to full unity will be long and arduous. One of the principal ecclesiological tasks is to discern the relationship between the Churches, and even non-Christian religious groups such as Jews, Muslims, Hindus, and Buddhists.

The Council stated that the Church of Christ subsists in the Catholic Church (LG 8). This passage was not precisely explained at the Council and diverse interpretations continue to appear. A moderate view suggests that the term "subsists" (which replaced "is" in an earlier text) means that the Catholic Church, because of its institutional fullness, has all the essential properties of churchliness. The Church of Christ is present in a special manner in the Catholic Church, but it extends beyond any one denomination. Communities separate from Catholicism also possess such ecclesial elements as Scripture, sacraments, prayer, worship, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit. As a result, these communities manifest the Church of Christ in various degrees but not in the subsistent way present in the Catholic Church. The Church of Christ, therefore, includes other Christian churches in the East and the West, although they are not in full communion with the Church of Rome.

Many of the bilateral consultations, such as the Lutheran-Roman Catholic Dialogue in the United States and the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC), have addressed critical ecclesiological issues. They have discussed in detail ecclesial authority, papal primacy, INFALLIBILITY, sacraments, and ministries. The World Conference of the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches held in Santiago de Compostela in August 1993 was devoted to the topic of ecclesiology. John Paul II's 1995 encyclical Ut unum sint, which has been hailed as an ecumenical breakthrough, asks Catholics and other Christians to consider together the forms that the Petrine ministry might take (96). In 1999, Roman Catholics and Lutherans worldwide celebrated a landmark document, "Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification."

Although significant progress has been made, much work remains to be done. Christian union remains a gift and a task. "There can be no ecumenism worthy of the name without a change of heart" (Unitatis redintegratio 7).

The decades following Vatican II have witnessed intense and even acrimonious ecclesiological debate. But in the process some fundamental issues have been clarified and developed. The ferment of ideas, the polarization within the Church, and major cultural shifts will continue to shape the way we understand and live the Christian life.

See Also: INFALLIBILITY.

Bibliography: C. E. CURRAN, Faithful Dissent (Kansas City, Missouri 1986). P. C. EMPIE, et al., eds., Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church. Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VI (Minneapolis 1978). L. J. O'DONOVAN, ed., Cooperation between Theologians and the Ecclesiastical Magisterium. A Report of a Joint Committee of CLSA and CTSA (Washington 1982). F. A. SUL-LIVAN, Magisterium. Teaching Office in the Catholic Church (New York 1983). J. M. R. TILLARD, "Sensus Fidelium," One in Christ 11 (1975) 2-29. R. GAILLARDETZ, Teaching with Authority: A Theology of the Magisterium of the Church (Collegeville, Minnesota 1997). Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, "Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian," Origins 20 (July 5, 1990) 117-26. R. E. BROWN, et al., eds., Peter in the New Testament (Minneapolis and New York 1973). A. DULLES, "Bishops" Conference Documents: What Doctrinal Authority?," Origins, v. 14 (Jan. 24, 1985) 528-34. P. GRANFIELD, The Papacy in Transition (New York 1980); The Limits of the Papacy: Authority and Autonomy in the Church (New York 1987). J. M. R. TILLARD, The Bishop of Rome, tr. J. DE SATGÉ (Wilmington, Delaware 1983). J. RATZ-INGER with V. MESSORI, The Ratzinger Report: An Exclusive Interview on the State of the Church, trs. S. ATTANASIO and G. HARRISON (San Francisco 1985). G. CAPRILE, I Sinodi dei vescovi, 6 v. (Rome 1969-). R. GAILLARDETZ, Witnesses to the Faith: Community, Infallibility, and the Ordinary Magisterium of Bishops (New York 1992). "Reflections on the Position of African Women," Pro Mundi Vita: African Dossier 33 (1985). V. DONOVAN, Christianity Rediscovered (Maryknoll, New York 1982). L. DOOHAN, The Laity: A Bibliography (Wilmington, Delaware 1987). N. MITCHELL, Mission and Ministry: History and Theology in the Sacrament of Order (Wilmington, Delaware 1982). D. POWER, Gifts That Differ: Lay Ministries Established and Unestablished (New York 1980). R. L. RASHKE, The Deacon in Search of Identity (New York 1975). D. SE-NIOR and C. STUHLMUELLER, The Biblical Foundations for Mission (Maryknoll, New York 1983). D. BOSCH, Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission (Maryknoll, New York 1991). United States Conference of Catholic Bishops, Lay Ecclesial Ministry: The State of the Question (Washington 1999). L. BOFF, Ecclesiogenesis. The Base Communities Reinvent the Church, tr. R. R. BARR (Maryknoll, New York 1986). M. AZEVEDO, Basic Ecclesial Communities in Brazil: The Challenge of a New Way of Being Church (Washington 1987). R. SCHREITER, Constructing Local Theologies (Maryknoll, New York 1985). H.-M. LEGRAND, "La réalisation de l'Eglise en un lieu," Initiation à la pratique de la théologie, v. 3, B. LAURET and F. REFOULE, eds. (Paris 1983) 143-345. Proceedings of the Catholic Theological Society of America 35 (1980) and 36 (1981), articles on the local church. J. KO-MONCHAK, "The Church Universal as the Communion of Local Churches," Concilium 146 (1981) 30-35. R. SCHREITER, The New Catholicity: Theology between the Global and the Local (Maryknoll, New York 1997). M. AZEVEDO, Inculturation and the Challenges of Modernity (Rome 1982). L. BOFF, Church: Charism and Power. Liberation Theology and the Institutional Church, tr. J. W. DIERCKSMEIER (New York 1985). W. BÜHLMANN, Weltkirche, Neue Dimensionen. Modell für das Jahr 2001 (Graz 1984). M. KOLBEN-SCHLAG, ed., Between God and Caesar: Priests, Sisters and Political Office in the United States (New York 1985). R. MCBRIEN, Caesar's Coin: Religion and Politics in American (New York 1987). Proceedings of the Catholic Theological Society of America 39 (1984), articles on the world Church. M. HIMES and K. HIMES, Fullness of Faith: The Public Significance of Theology (New York

1992). J. RATZINGER, Kirche, Ökumene und Politik (Cinisello Balsama 1987); Eng. Church, Ecumenism, and Politics, tr. R. NOWELL (New York 1988). D. SCHINDLER, Heart of the World, Center of the Church: Communio Ecclesiology, Liberalism, and Liberation (Grand Rapids 1996). A. DULLES and P. GRANFIELD, The Church: A Bibliography (New York 1999). Y. CONGAR, I Believe in the Holy Spirit, 3 v., tr. D. SMITH (New York 1983). A. DULLES, Models of the Church, (expanded edition; Garden City, New York 1987). Extraordinary Synod of Bishops (Rome 1985). A Message to the People of God and the Final Report (NCCB 1986). B. MONDIN, Le nuove ecclesiologie (Rome 1980). J. M. R. TILLARD, Eglise d'eglises: L'ecclesiologie de communion (Paris 1987). J. D. ZIZ-IOULAS, Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church (Crestwood, New York 1985). D. DOYLE, Communion Ecclesiology: Vision and Versions (Maryknoll, New York 2000). Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission, The Final Report (Cincinnati and Washington 1982). Y. CONGAR, Diversity and Communion, tr. J. BOWDEN (Mystic, Connecticut 1985). P. C. EMPIE and T. A. MURPHY, Papal Primacy and the Universal Church. Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue V (Minneapolis 1974). H. FRIES and K. RAHNER, Unity of the Churches: An Actual Possibility, tr. R. C. L. GRITSCH and E. W. GRITSCH (Philadelphia and New York 1985). F. A. SULLIVAN, "Subsist in': The Significance of Vatican II's Decision to Say of the Church of Christ Not That It 'Is' but That It 'Subsists In' the Roman Catholic Church,'' One in Christ 22 (1986) 115-23. T. BEST, G. GASSMANN, eds., On the Way to Fuller Koinonia: Official Report of the Fifth World Conference on Faith and Order (Geneva 1993). JOHN PAUL II, Ut unum sint, Origins 25 (June 8, 1995) 49-72. J. PUGLISI, ed., Petrine Ministry and the Unity of the Church (Collegeville 1999). Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Dominus Iesus, Origins 30 (Sept. 14, 2000) 209-24.

[P. GRANFIELD/D. M. DOYLE]

ECCLESTON, SAMUEL

Fifth archbishop of Baltimore, Md.; b. Kent County, Md., June 27, 1801; d. Washington, D.C., April 22, 1851. His English grandfather settled in Maryland, where he became a merchant and then a planter. Samuel's parents were members of the Episcopal Church; but after his father died, his mother married a Catholic. As a consequence, Samuel was sent in 1812 to St. Mary's College, Baltimore, conducted by the Sulpician Fathers. While there he became a Catholic, decided to study for the priesthood, and entered St. Mary's Seminary on July 23, 1819, despite opposition from relatives. As a seminarian, he acted as an instructor at St. Mary's College. After ordination on April 24, 1825, he entered the Society of the Priests of St. Sulpice and was sent to Issy, France, for further training.

In 1827 Eccleston returned to St. Mary's College, where he served two years as professor and vice president, and five years as president. He was then named coadjutor of Baltimore, consecrated on Sept. 14, 1834, and succeeded Abp. James WHITFIELD at his death on Oct. 19, 1834. Eccleston served Baltimore for 17 years, playing a significant part in the growth of the Church in the U.S. He presided over five provincial councils, the third to the seventh, which met in Baltimore every third year from 1837 to 1849. He played as active a part in the council of 1849, when there were 25 bishops present, as he did in 1837 when there were only 9.

During his tenure, Eccleston encouraged the establishment of the first American preparatory seminary, St. Charles College, which opened in 1848. Many new churches were founded and work on the cathedral was almost completed. The Visitation Nuns and the Christian Brothers opened schools for girls and boys, respectively, in Baltimore. The number of priests nearly doubled during his episcopate, in part because of the coming of the Redemptorists for German-speaking Catholics and the Lazarists.

Bibliography: P. K. GUILDAY, A History of the Councils of Baltimore, 1791–1884 (New York 1932). C. G. HERBERMANN, The Sulpicians in the United States (New York 1916). M. J. RIORDAN, Cathedral Records from the Beginning of Catholicism in Baltimore (Baltimore 1906). J. G. D. SHEA, The Hierarchy of the Catholic Church in the United States (New York 1887).

[E. F. SCHMITZ]

ECHTER VON MESPELBRUNN, JULIUS

Prince-bishop of Würzburg; b. Mespelbrunn, Lower Franconia, March 18, 1545; d. Würzburg, Sept. 13, 1617. He came of a noble, strongly Catholic family. He studied in the Netherlands, Italy, France, and in Cologne. In 1569 he became a member of the cathedral chapter of Würzburg and was dean in December 1573 when he was elected prince-bishop. After a preparation of 18 months, he was ordained priest and consecrated bishop in May 1575. The Jesuits helped him in the reform of his diocese, which was predominantly Protestant, and Würzburg became outstanding in the COUNTER REFORMATION. In 1582 Echter made a university of the Jesuit college in Würzburg, and in 1589 he founded a seminary. Having set in order the administration and economy of his diocese, he began, with new priests, to reclaim the Protestants of the diocese for Catholicism. Using strong political pressure he regained 100,000 in three years. He built about 300 churches, in the "Julius style," and the "Julius hospital" (1579) shows his interest in social measures. His enthusiasm for the Catholic League (1614) contributed to its success, especially in Fulda and Bamberg. Personally he was ascetic and pious; politically he believed in absolutism. According to the spirit of his time, he persecuted witches. He had early leanings toward humanism, but the claim that he also had inclinations toward Protestantism is erroneous.

Bibliography: G. VON PÖLNITZ, Julius Echter von Mespelbrunn (Munich 1934); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² 3:639–640. W. ENGEL, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart³ 2:301.

[G. J. DONNELLY]

ECHTERNACH, ABBEY OF

Former imperial Benedictine monastery in the present town of Echternach, Luxembourg; it is a pilgrimage site, known for its famous dancing procession to the tomb of St. Willibrord on the Tuesday following Pentecost. An almshouse for itinerant Scottish monks before 689, it was founded as a BENEDICTINE monastery (698-704) by St. WILLIBRORD on an estate of St. IRMINA and her daughter Plectrude, consort of Pepin II. During the 8th century it was the center for missions to the Frisians, and the "port of entry" for Irish-Anglo-Saxon culture (MSS in Paris, Trier, Maihingen) to the Continent. In the Carolingian period it acquired extensive property holdings; its greatest abbot was Beornrad (775–797). About 848 the abbey was converted into a collegiate church ruled by lay abbots. Despite subsequent decline, it had a famous school and SCRIPTORIUM. The last lay Abbot, Count Siegfried of Luxembourg, requested Emperor OTTO I to send CLUNIAC REFORM monks to Echternach; these arrived from Sankt Maximin in Trier (973). Under Abbot Humbert the Echternach school of illumination was at its peak (e.g., the Golden Gospel Books in Nuremberg, Uppsala, and the library of the Escorial, the MSS in Darmstadt, Gotha, and Bremen). Another decline in the 14th and 15th centuries occasioned a new reform by monks from Sankt Maximin in Trier in 1496. Echternach was suppressed in 1797 during the French Revolution. The body of St. Willibrord is buried in the abbey church, which was built between 1017 and 1031, restored between 1862 and 1868, made a minor basilica in 1939, and repaired after World War II. Of the former Carolingian basilica only the crypt has been preserved; the remains of the Merovingian abbey church were discovered 1949. The abbey buildings are an impressive creation of the French baroque (1727–36).

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prierés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1025–26. C. WAMPACH, Geschichte der Grundherrschaft Echternach im Frühmittelalter, 2 v. (Luxembourg 1930); Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 14:1365–75. P. METZ, The Golden Gospels of Echternach, tr. I. SCHRIER and P. GORGE (New York 1957).

[P. VOLK]

ECK, JOHANN

Theologian and principal adversary of Luther; b. Eck in Swabia. Nov. 13, 1486; d. Ingolstadt, Feb. 10, 1543.

He was the son of Michael Maier, a magistrate in Eck. Eckius and Eccius are Latinizations of the place name Johann adopted as a surname after 1505. He was educated at Heidelberg (1498), Tübingen (1499), Cologne (1501), and Freiburg im Breisgau (1502). At Freiburg he first contacted the new humanism. In 1506 he lectured on the Sentences of Peter Lombard; in 1510 he received his doctorate in theology, having been ordained by special dispensation in 1508 at the age of 22.

The Duke of Bavaria invited Eck to become professor of theology at Ingolstadt in 1510. At the same time he became canon of the cathedral of Eichstätt. He wrote on science, philosophy, and theology. Chrysopassus, his principal theological work, treats predestination, grace, and free will; this served to prepare him for his controversy with Luther. He was a prominent figure by 1517. His Obelisci, a reply to Martin LUTHER's 95 theses, although intended only for the private use of the bishop of Eichstätt, drew him into the struggle to which he devoted the rest of his life. In May 1518 Karlstadt, an early Lutheran, published theses against Eck's Obelisci. Eck challenged Karlstadt to a disputation, which took place in Leipzig under the auspices of Duke George of Saxony. In the meantime Eck drew Luther into the debate through 12 theses subtly attacking Luther's doctrine, especially his practical denial of the Roman primacy.

The debate lasted from June 27 to July 16, 1618. Eck had forced Luther to expose his heretical views. Duke George was confirmed in the Catholic cause thereby, but Luther was lost to it forever. After the discussions at Leipzig, Eck, acknowledged champion of the Catholic cause, wrote a treatise on the primacy. This he took to Rome. Leo X appointed him nuncio with Girolamo AL-EANDRO, to publish in Germany the bull of Luther's excommunication, Exsurge Domine, which Eck had partially composed.

Eck wrote many treatises refuting Lutheran teaching on Penance, satisfaction, purgatory, and the Mass (against Bucer). Against Melanchthon's Loci communes, he wrote a famous Enchiridion, which went through 90 editions. He opposed Ulrich ZWINGLI at Baden (1526), and with Konrad K. WIMPINA and Johannes COCHLAEUS represented the Catholic position at Augsburg (1530). In 1537 he made a German translation of Scripture.

Bibliography: Prima (-quinta) pars operum J. Eckii contra Ludderum, 6 v. (Augsburg 1530–35); Enchiridion locorum cōmuniū adversus Lutheranos (Landshut, Ger. 1525). H. GRISAR, Martin Luther: His Life and Work, ed. F. J. EBLE and A. PREUSS (Westminster, Md. 1950). E. ISERLOH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:642–644; Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 14:1375–79.

[C. M. AHERNE]

Missionary in Brazil and later in Russian Poland; b. Bingen, Upper Rhine, Germany, Aug. 4, 1721; d. at the College at Polotsk, Russia, June 29, 1809. At the age of 19 he entered the Society of Jesus, and in 1753 he was sent to the province of Papa in Brazil. During the short time he labored in Brazil he acquired an intimate knowledge of its geography and language. At Marañon he was distinguished as a missionary by his insight and courage; however, his work was cut short by the growing enmity of the Portuguese minister, Sebastião POMBAL, to the Society of Jesus. On trumped-up charges, which were subsequently completely refuted, Eckart and his companions were seized and returned to Portugal in chains. For the next 18 years he was imprisoned in the underground dungeons of Almeida and St. Julian in Lisbon. In 1777, after the death of Joseph I of Portugal, Pombal fell from power, and Eckart and the other survivors were released. He returned to his native Bingen, where as the friend and correspondent of G. V. Murrs he made numerous contributions to the latter's publications. These include notes on his geographical observations in Brazil, an account of the persecution of the missionaries there as well as their sufferings in the Lisbon prisons, and a history of the Jesuits in Portugal.

By the time of Eckart's release the Society of Jesus had been dissolved by the papal bull Dominus ac Redemptor (1773). In Russia, which acquired a large Catholic population with the partition of Poland in 1772, the suppression had not become effective, as the Empress, CATHERINE II, refused to permit publication of the bull of suppression. In this Polish area there existed a number of Jesuit colleges and foundations, including the colleges of Polotsk, Vitebsk, Orsha, and Dünaberg, which were therefore retained by the society. Eckart applied here for readmission to the Polish Jesuits and was received. There he spent the fruitful remaining years of his long life, serving as master of novices in the College of Dünaberg; subsequently he was sent to the College of Polotsk.

Bibliography: A. VON ECKART, Les Prisons du Marquis de Pombal, v. 9 of Documents inédits concernant la Compagnie de Jésus, ed. A. CARAYON, 23 v. (Poitiers 1863–86). A. HUONDER, Deutsche Jesuitenmissionäre des 17 und 18 Jahrhunderte (St. Louis, Mo. 1899). A. WELD, Suppression of the Society of Jesus in the Portuguese Dominions (London 1877). C. SOMMERVOGEL, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–1932) 3:330–331. J. A. OTTO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:645.

[A. M. CHRISTENSEN]

ECKBERT OF SCHÖNAU

Abbot and theologian; b. Rhineland, before 1132; d. Abbey of Schönau, near Trier, Germany, March 28, 1184. He came from a noble family of the Rhineland with important connections in the local Church hierarchy and was a fellow student of RAINALD OF DASSEL at the schools of Paris. He became a canon of the church of SS. Cassius and Florentius at Bonn, but in 1155, after a journey to Rome, he entered the BENEDICTINES at the Abbey of Schönau, in the Diocese of Trier, under Abbot Hildelin (d. 1166). Rainald, then archbishop of COLOGNE, summoned Eckbert to debate the doctrines of the CATHARI in his archdiocese; Eckbert's Sermones contra Catharos (PL 195:11–98), dedicated to the archbishop, proved to be a remarkably clear and penetrating refutation of the heresy. His Stimulus amoris (Patrologica Latina 158: 748-761, 184:953-966) is often attributed to BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX or ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, while another meditation, Soliloquim seu meditationes (Patrologica Latina 153:773-779; 195:105-114), has been credited to Anselm. The tone of his spiritual writings prefigured the later devotion to the SACRED HEART. Eckbert was spiritual director of his sister, ELIZABETH OF SCHÖNAU, a member of the feminine section of the double monastery at Schönau, and after her death he wrote her biography and an account of her revelations (PL 195:119-194). Eckbert was elected abbot of Schönau in 1166 on the death of Hildelin, and even in this busy post kept up his intellectual warfare against the Cathari. This scholarly abbot's vita was written by his successor, Emecho of Schönau [Neues Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere deutsche Geschichtskunde 11 (1886) 448-454].

Bibliography: Works. Patrologia Latina 195:11-194. F. W. E. ROTH, ed., Die Visionen der hl. Elisabeth und die Schriften der Abte Ekbert und Emecho von Schönau (2d ed. Würzburg 1886); ed., Das Gebetbuch der heiligen Elisabeth von Schönau (Augsburg 1886). A. BARRÉ, "Une Prière d'Ekbert de Schönau au saint Coeur de Marie," Ephemerides mariologicae 2 (1952) 409-423. Literature. P. SÉJOURNÉ, "L'Aiguillon d'amour de l'Abbé Egbert," Regnabit 2 (1922) 327-332. U. BERLIÈRE, La Dévotion au Sacré-Coeur dans l'ordre de Saint Benoît (Paris 1923) 8, 15-17. A WILMART, Auteurs spirituels et textes dévots du moyen âge latin (Paris 1932) 194–195, 421–422. J. DE GHELLINCK, L'Essor de la littérature latine au XIIe siècle (Brussels-Paris 1946) 1:160, 169-170. K. KÖSTER, "Das visionäre Werk Elisabeths von Schönau," Archiv für mittelrheinische Kirchengeschichte 4 (1952) 79-119. A. BORST, Die Katharer (Stuttgart 1953), passim. J. C. DIDIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 14:1472-75.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

ECKHART, MEISTER

Dominican theologian and mystic; b. in one of two villages called Hochheim in Thuringia, c. 1260; d. 1327 or 1328. He was probably not of noble parentage. He entered the Dominican Order at Erfurt. In 1277 he was a student of arts at Paris, and before 1280 began studying theology at Cologne. In the years 1293–94, as bachelor of theology at Paris, he commented on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. About 1294 he was prior of the house of his order at Erfurt and vicar of the vicariate of Thuringia. He graduated as master of theology at Paris and lectured there as regent master in 1302 and 1303. The story that the mastership was conferred directly upon him by the pope appears to have been discredited (cf. Koch, Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 17). From 1303 to 1311 he was provincial of the Dominican province of Saxony, and from 1311 to 1313 he was at Paris for a second regency in theology. He was at Strasbourg as professor of theology from 1313 to 1323, probably at the Dominican studium. It was at this time that he became active as a preacher and spiritual director, and was highly regarded by Dominican and Cistercian nuns, Beguines, and others.

Although Meister Eckhart apparently always enjoyed the confidence of his brethren (if we are to judge from the positions of responsibility he occupied), he ran into serious difficulties about his doctrine with ecclesiastical authorities in 1326. Two lists of suspect propositions, taken chiefly from his sermons, were laid before him by inquisitors appointed by Henry of Virneburg, Archbishop of Cologne. The inquisitors were Master Reiner Friso, Canon of Cologne and doctor of theology, and Peter Sommer (de Aestate) OFM, former prior of the Franciscan house at Cologne. Eckhart defended himself vigorously, protesting fidelity to the Church and challenging the competence of the inquisitors because of his exemption as a mendicant friar. He attempted to clear himself by explaining the incriminating propositions in a "Justificative Report" (Rechtfertigungsschrift), which is of the greatest value for understanding the import of his thought. In January 1327, Eckhart appealed to the Holy See, submitting in advance to its decision, and he left for Avignon where he hoped to defend himself personally. He died, however, before his case was concluded.

The documents of the trial consisted of two lists of propositions, the "Justificative Report," and a third list of propositions taken from Eckhart's commentary on St. John; a fourth and fifth list were added later. At the end of the trial, the Avignon theologians submitted the so-called "Avignon Report." It listed 28 propositions, scarcely a fourth part of the number included in the earlier lists. The report also mentioned the explanations occasionally supplied by Eckhart. Notice was taken that Eckhart had denied having taught two of the propositions. Taking into consideration his submissive attitude and orthodox intention, Pope John XXII condemned the propositions only according to their obvious meaning. The condemnation was promulgated Mar. 27, 1329, by the constitution In agro dominico. The 28 propositions are listed somewhat differently than in the Avignon report and are judged more leniently. The first 15 propositions and the last two are condemned as erroneous and tainted with heresy, but the other 11 are declared capable of a Catholic meaning if properly explained.

Doctrine. The doctrine of Meister Eckhart owes much to St. Thomas Aquinas. He was also under the influence of Neoplatonism (particularly that of Plotinus and Proclus), the doctrinal texts of which he knew through the work of St. Albert the Great and through the translations of Proclus by the Dominican William Moerbeke. Eckhart was also well read in the works of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. In short, he reflected the thought of much of the spiritual teaching of his time in the Germanic part of Europe, where everything was not indisputably orthodox, especially among several Free Spirit sects and other similar groups.

It is difficult to make a satisfactory appraisal of Eckhart's doctrine, since his Opus tripartitum was never finished. It would certainly be going too far to see in him only a "spiritualist" and to reduce his theological doctrine, which generally conforms to Thomist tradition and originates from a definite intellectualism, to no more than a speculative prologue to his spiritual doctrine. To the first of the Quaestiones Parisienses, "Is being in God identical with knowing?" his answer is affirmative. It was in this intellectual perspective that he envisioned creation. All creatures have been, from all eternity, supported by the Word of God, and all things look to the return of the soul to God. God alone is, for being (esse, or to be) is God. The creature has no being or existence by itself. Of itself it is nothing. Still the being or existence is not to be confused with the Divine Being.

This sets the fundamental attitude that the soul must assume for its return to God; its "laying bare" takes on a condition transcending the realm of psychological and ethical requirements. It is ontologically imposed on the being that by itself is nothing. If the creature wishes to participate in the being that truly is, he must allow the Father to generate the Word in him. This even goes beyond the evangelical ideas of sin, redemption, and grace. It is put on the level of an essential unity of the soul and Divinity. This theme is developed by means of a dialectic that varied little in the course of Eckhart's career. Moreover, it was the speculative character of the dialectic that did most to put him in opposition to spiritualists such as St. Bernard of Clairvaux and other representatives of the mysticism of "mystical marriage" (or Brautm ystik).

From these presuppositions, Eckhart reached the conclusion that the most elevated part of the soul, that part that engaged in contact with God, was in essence intellectual. This Kraft (virtus) is a spark, Seelenfünklein or scintilla animae. The "foundation of the soul" (Grund der Seele) is "something" (etwas) uncreated and uncreatable. It is this in man that is equal to God, and the seat of divine life and of the truly contemplative life where the spirit reigns. It is also in this uncreated etwas of the soul that the "birth" of the Word takes place and resemblance to God is realized. This birth, which is mainly described in Eckhart's commentary on St. John, comes after liberation from sin and the laying bare of the soul; it creates the "noble man" and is consummated in "identity." Henceforth the spiritual man is one with the Deity in its true essence, not the God whose idolatrous image we form for ourselves. True contemplation is thus attained. It is an intellectual kind of contemplation, but it unites vision and love in a single act, and man finds "all bliss uniquely from God, through God, and in God." This teaching has been called speculative, or essential, mysticism.

The most daring subjects-the absolute transcendence and unknowability of God, total detachment in order to find the unity and image of God-were already touched upon in his writings before 1300, and his teaching was not considered alarming at that time. Moreover, certain of his expressions were not uncommon among the mystics of the Middle Ages. Why then was he condemned? Among other causes, political influences are discernible. Eckhart clashed not with John XXII but with the Franciscans, who were still unreconciled to the recent canonization of the Dominican St. Thomas Aquinas (1323), and with the partisans of Louis of Bavaria who was hostile to the pope, to whom, in general, the Dominicans were faithful. Eckhart also suffered from the suspicion directed toward the more or less heterodox mystic groups, such as the Beguines (condemned at the Council of Vienne in 1312). Oechslin indicates other causes that contributed to Eckhart's difficulties. He used German in many works, and it was necessary for him to form a mystical terminology in that language. His enemies unfairly failed to check his German statements made in sermons with his formal teaching in Latin works (Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire 4:93-116). Still, the propositions condemned in the In agro dominico (cf. H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 950-980) are hard to defend from the point of view of orthodoxy, and nearly all of them were found in Eckhart's writings.

Influence. Despite Eckhart's propositions 16–19 (ibid. 966–969), which, in effect, deny the value of external works, the 16th century reformers, who probably had not read the works of Eckhart directly but only through his disciples, made no use of them. His works were seldom copied after his condemnation. Still he did have an influence upon German speculative mysticism from the 14th to the 16th centuries. John Tauler, Henry Suso, John Ruysbroeck, and others less well known, in Germany, Switzerland, and the Low Countries showed a predilection for topics found in Eckhart's writings. It was through these that some of Eckhart's doctrinal themes passed on to the reformers.

The theory of certain German historians, notably during the period of National Socialism, that Eckhart was the "father of German speculation" must be denied. His thought, according to them, presented strictly "Germanic," or "Aryan," characteristics. However, Eckhart, whose mind was not particularly original, belonged to the cultural world of the medieval Church, more international than ours today, and he always professed an unquestionable devotion to the Church and to the Christian faith.

Bibliography: Editions. The most important complete ed. is Die deutschen und lateinischen Werke, ed. Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (Stuttgart 1936-), Latin works, ed. J. KOCH et al., v.1-4 (1936-61), v.5-6 (in progress), German works, ed. J. QUINT, v.1 (1936-58), v.5 (1954-62), v.2-4 (in progress). Some tracts have been edited in another edition, Opera latina, ed. G. THÉRY (Institutum S. Sabinae; Leipzig 1934). Meister Eckhart: Werke, ed. F. PFEIFFER, v.2 Die deutschen Mystiker (4th ed. Göttingen 1924). The propositions condemned in the constitution In agro dominico are found in H. DENZINGER, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. SCHÖN-METZER 501-529. F. PFEIFFER, Meister Eckhart (Leipzig 1857), tr. with some omissions and additions, C. DE B. EVANS, 2 v. (London 1924-31); Meister Eckhart: An Introduction to the Study of His Works With an Anthology of His Sermons, ed. and tr. J. M. CLARK (London 1957). M. Eckhart, Selected Treatises and Sermons . . . from Latin and German, ed. and tr. J. M. CLARK and J. V. SKINNER (London 1958). Meister Eckhart: A Modern Translation, ed. and tr. R. B. BLAKNEY (New York 1941). Literature. F. VANDEN-BROUCKE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et. al. 14:1385-1403. R. L. OECHSLIN, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et. al. 4:93-116. A. DANIELS, ed., "Eine lateinische Rechtfertigungsschrift des Meister Eckhart, mit einem Geleitwort von Clemens Bäumker," Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 23.5 (1923). F. PELSTER, "Ein Gutachten aus dem Eckhart-Prozess in Avignon," ibid. Suppl. 3.2 (1935) 1099-1124. J. KOCH, "Kritische Studien zum Leben Meister Eckharts," Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum 29 (1959) 5-51; 30 (1960) 5-52. P. KELLEY, "Poverty and the Rhineland Mystics," Downside Review 74 (1956) 48-66; "Meister Eckhart's Doctrine of the Divine Subjectivity," ibid. 76 (1958) 65-103. K. G. KERTZ, "Meister Eckhart's Teaching on the Birth of the Divine Word in the Soul," Traditio 15 (1959) 327-363. E. W. MCDONNELL, Beguines and Beghards in Medieval Culture (New Brunswick, NJ 1954). J. M. CLARK, The Great German Mystics (Oxford 1949). J. ANCELET-HUSTACHE, Master Eckhart and the Rhineland Mystics, tr. H. GRAEF (pa. New York 1958).

[F. VANDENBROUCKE]

ECKHEL, JOSEPH HILARIUS VON

Jesuit historian, numismatist; b. Enzesfeld, Austria, Jan. 13, 1737; d. Vienna, May 16, 1798. Eckhel began his studies in the Society of Jesus in 1751 and was ordained in 1764. He taught grammar in Jesuit schools at Loeben, Steyr, and Vienna until 1766. Meanwhile, Father J. Khell, SJ, introduced him to the study of NUMISMATICS; and when, in 1772, Eckhel had to abandon his teaching career because of illness, he turned to the study of archeology and numismatics. He toured Italy and devoted himself to a careful study of the coin collections in Bologna, Florence, and Rome. After suppression of the Society of Jesus in 1773, he was appointed director of the numismatic section of the Imperial Museum at Vienna; and in 1776, professor of antiquities and auxiliary historical sciences at the University of Vienna. His Doctrina nummorum veterum (8 v. Vienna 1792-98) was his great work and is regarded as the beginning of the scientific study of numismatics, making that discipline an important source of history. He produced also Catalogus musei Caesarei Vindobonensis nummorum veterum (Vienna 1779) and Descriptio nummorum Antiochiae (Vienna 1786).

Bibliography: P. LACROIX, Revue Belge de numismatique et de sigillographie 35 (1897) 45–49. L. KOCH, Jesuiten-Lexikon: Die Gesellschaft Jesu einst und jetzt 1:466–467. P. P. R. FRANKIE, Neue deutsche Biographie 4:302–303.

[F. DE SA]

ECLECTICISM

A term deriving from the Greek $\dot{\epsilon}\kappa\lambda\dot{\epsilon}\gamma\epsilon\nu$, which means to pick out, to single out, or to choose. When eclectic is applied to a philosopher, it designates one who selects various doctrines from different thinkers and weaves them into a loose sort of unity. Whereas the classical schools and systems of philosophy are marked by rigorous adherence to the deductions and conclusions that follow from their fundamental positions, an eclectic philosophy is characterized by its acceptance of principles and attitudes that, in the parent philosophies, are either mutually exclusive or at least antagonistic. An eclectic philosophy is thus an attempt to find a workable combination of previously conflicting attitudes by regarding their principles in a less rigid and more conciliatory manner.

History. In Western thought eclecticism made its appearance as a result of the SKEPTICISM of Carneades (214?–129 B.C.), founder of the New Academy. It influenced such Stoics as Panaetius of Rhodes (2d century B.C.) and Posidonius of Apamea (1st century B.C.), the Platonists Philo of Larissa (d. c. 80 B.C.) and Antiochus of Ascalon (1st century B.C.), and Peripatetics such as Andronicus of Rhodes (1st century B.C.) and Aristocles of Messene (2d century A.D.).

Early Thought. Roman philosophy, except that of LUCRETIUS, was mostly eclectic in spirit. SENECA, EPIC-

TETUS, and MARCUS AURELIUS were partly Platonic and partly Stoic in their philosophies, while the School of the Sextians—which flourished for a while at Rome during the beginning of the Christian Era—combined aspects of Pythagoreanism, Cynicism, and Stoicism. Cicero (106–43 B.C.), the most influential of the eclectics of antiquity, had syncretized elements of Carneadean epistemology, Platonic theology, and Stoic ethics.

Because PLOTINUS absorbed so much of Platonism, Aristotelianism, and Stoicism into his own system, usually called NEOPLATONISM, he has been regarded by some as an eclectic; those who know his Enneads, however, see there a synthesis that is decidedly different from any of its sources. One might designate several of his disciples as eclectic in that they interpreted his doctrine in such a way as to bring it more in line with Pythagoreanism, as did Iamblichus (4th century A.D.); or with Platonism, as did Proclus (A.D. 410?–485); or with Aristotelianism, as did Simplicius (6th century A.D.). Another disciple, Plutarch of Athens (d. A.D. 431), might be called eclectic in that he desired his fellow Neoplatonists to be more concerned with the agreement between Plato and Aristotle than with their differences.

Historians in the past usually described Giovanni PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA as an eclectic because of his intense interest in, and apparent agreement with, the opinions of all thinkers of all eras. More recent studies, especially by Ernst Cassirer, suggest that Pico could well subscribe to seemingly incompatible doctrines because he viewed all human truths as imperfect images and symbols of the Perfect Truth that is God, as variable approximations to the absolute limit that is the Eternal Divine Truth.

Modern Philosophy. The eclectic attitude manifests itself in the thought of G. W. LEIBNIZ, with its constant attempts to reconcile divergent and conflicting viewpoints. Leibniz hoped to bridge the philosophical differences between the rationalists and the empiricists by his monadology and by his doctrine of preestablished harmony. In the domain of religion he also made efforts to mitigate dissensions among various Protestant sects and between Protestants and Catholics. This spirit of syncretism sometimes led him to neglect distinctions between mind and matter, faith and reason, determination and freedom, and grace and nature. The eclectic attitude is seen in other German thinkers of the 18th-century Enlightenment, for example in C. Thomasius, Moses Mendelssohn (1729-86), and Christian Garve (1742-98); this is especially true of C. WOLFF. Following the rationalist tradition of R. Descartes and B. Spinoza, Wolff agreed that philosophy should employ the mathematical method; at the same time, however, he had the empiricist's regard for factual knowledge, insisting that the facts of experience agree wiith the conclusions of reason. Like Spinoza, he viewed the world as a closely concatenated order of efficient causes, although he was also profoundly influenced by the teleological explanations of Leibniz. In explaining the position of Leibniz, he so modified its basic points that he failed to recognize fundamental inconsistencies.

Eclecticism marked the thought not only of followers of Wolff, such as Martin Knutzen (1713–51) the famous mathematician, Alexander Baumgarten (1714–62) the theorist in aesthetics, and Johann Lambert (1728–77) the psychologist, but also that of Wolff's opponents, such as Andreas Rüdiger (1673–1731) and Christian Crusius (1715–75).

But the best-known of the more modern eclectics is Victor COUSIN, who not only was convinced that the French Revolution made necessary new formulations in political life but also demanded a reconstruction in philosophical thought. This reconstruction, he was determined, should be founded upon the method of complete and total observation of consciousness and all its elements. In this way the new philosophy would avoid the imperfections of J. LOCKE, T. REID, and I. KANT, each of whom, in Cousin's judgment, had made only an imperfect analysis of consciousness. Because he was convinced that his method would discover all truths, some of which had been uncovered previously by past philosophies, Cousin called his philosophy eclecticism. Theodore Jouffroy (1796-1842), Étienne Vacherot (1809-97), Paul Janet (1823-99), and Jules Simon (1814-96), his disciples, carried on his work.

Because of the many changes in his philosophical outlook, often brought about by his readings in past and contemporary philosophers, F. W. J. von SCHELLING is judged by some to have been an eclectic; one can nonetheless maintain that he remained an idealist throughout his long and prolific career as a professor of philosophy.

Recent Thought. Much of EXISTENTIALISM could be called eclectic in that it contains elements of Cartesian subjectivism, Kantian moralism, Nietzschean voluntarism, Husserlian phenomenology, and positivistic nominalism. These are held together in different ways by the various existentialists, most of whom deny any validity to systematic thought.

Critique. The history of philosophy shows that the origins of eclecticism are far from uniform. It has arisen, as in the case of the Romans, after a period of skeptical thought has made some men wary of fixed and consistent positions. It has also made its appearance when the human spirit became weary with continuing conflicts among schools of philosophy and was only too ready for a conciliatory approach. This was the case with some of the minor eclectics during the German Enlightenment. In other philosophers it has been engendered by the conviction that each philosophical system contains some truths that can be discovered or recovered by the sympathetic researcher. Leibniz and Cousin could be cited as examples of this attitude. Then, too, eclecticism can be very congenial to a thinker who is sufficiently shallow and superficial to feel at ease with principles that are mutually contradictory. Schelling has been so regarded by some.

As a philosophy, eclecticism makes no appeal to a truly creative spirit, for it lacks the unity and cohesiveness that such a mind demands. For the historian of philosophy it makes an unsatisfactory term of reference since it says nothing positive about the philosopher whom it is attempting to describe; for this reason there is a growing tendency to avoid its use.

Bibliography: F. BARONE, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:1794–96. H. KUHN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:787–88. K. GOLDAMMER and G. PATZIG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:408–09. F. UEERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (11th, 12th ed. Berlin 1923–28) 1:34, 410, 486, 565. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:316. P. FOULQUIÉ and R. SAINT-JEAN, Dictionnaire de la langue philsophique (Paris 1962) 195–96.

[V. M. MARTIN]

ECOFEMINISM AND ECOFEMINIST THEOLOGY

With the awareness of the many threats to the ecological health of Earth, some feminists have broadened their concern beyond the social, economic and political status of women to a fundamental re-envisioning of the whole of reality, including the human relationship to nonhuman nature. The term for this total re-envisioning is "ecofeminism," first coined by Françoise d'Eaubonne in 1974. Ecofeminism draws attention to the connection between the domination of women and the exploitation of nonhuman nature in patriarchal societies. In ecofeminism feminist consciousness is extended beyond specific societal wrongs that diminish women to the recognition that there is no liberation for women and no solution to the ecological crisis within a society whose fundamental model of relationships is one of domination. Ecofeminists, therefore, engage in a twofold advocacy on behalf of (1) the well-being of women and other persons diminished by patriarchy (due to racism, ethnic prejudice, classism and colonialism) and (2) the health of the planet exploited by persons in power for their own economic advantage.

Related to environmentalist movements, the "eco" prefix in ecofeminsm reflects a commitment to ecology as an all-encompassing organic and social reality. Al-though "environment" and "ecology" sometimes are used interchangeably, ecofeminists argue that they are not synonymous. The term "environment" refers to nature set apart from human beings—an object "out there" for us to study, control or restore through science and technology. The term "ecology" conveys a meaning that is more holistic: the study of and commitment to the earthly home that humans along with other living beings, matter, energy and all life forces share. Ecofeminism stresses that humans have a natural biological connectedness with all of Earth's life forms.

Concern with language and the ideology and behaviors it supports is an important characteristic of ecofeminism. Ecofeminists point out that depicting "nature" as external to humans is of one piece with the use of gender metaphors in Western constructions of nature and culture. Ecofeminists identify the nature versus culture dualism as the root of the diminishment of the dignity of women and the destruction of the Earth. The linguistic connection of nature with female subordination and culture with male domination is seen as a manifestation of patriarchy closely associated with Enlightenment thinking and values. Ecofeminists reject the association of women with nature as a faulty cultural construct. They see it as objectifying and commodifying women and nonhuman nature for the advantage of men, especially the men who occupy the top levels of the social and economic hierarchies.

Critique of language patterns by ecofeminists extends beyond those explicitly gender-related to patriarchal perspectives that are both hierarchical and dualistic. Hierarchical analysis, for example, is common in biology and can be benign. Biologists classify species according to a hierarchy of complexity, not necessarily positing that the more complex species have more importance or value than the others. However, in the pervasive mind-set of patriarchy, hierarchies of complexity have been often weighted in favor of the one species designated as the most complex, and therefore the highest of the life forms, homo sapiens. Historically, the elevation of homo sapiens has been at the expense of other species and Earth's limited resources. Ecofeminists maintain that this form of hierarchical promotes excessive dualism an anthropocentricism. Patriarchal anthropocentricism underlies human attempts to dominate nonhuman nature for the sake of "progress" as it is defined by the political and economic leaders of the First World, the countries that have the highest levels of economic wealth. Ecofeminists contend that until anthropocentricism is replaced by a human kinship solidarity with earth's life forms, the ecological crisis will continue.

Ecofeminist Theology. From its inception ecofeminism intersected with religion and theology. In the First World west the ecofeminist criticism of an objectified "nature" prompted the recognition that the Earth, once envisioned as sacred, is no longer viewed as such. The loss of the sacrality of the Earth has contributed to the ecological crisis. To provide a corrective, during the 1970s some ecofeminists began developing earthcentered religious practices. Among these women are those who believed that the gender attributed to the divine is important for the well-being of women and the health of the planet. Some argued that there is nothing redeemable about the transcendent male, sovereign-God of Judaism and Christianity. These ecofeminists looked to Goddess-centered religious practices, reviving past traditions of honoring the sacredness of Earth and of celebrating the immanence of the Goddess in Earth's processes. Some of these ecofeminist expressions of religion combine neo-pagan spirituality with witchcraft. Others draw on archeological discoveries to construct visions of prehistoric Old European religion in which Goddess worship supports human harmony with nature. From these diverse resources ecofeminists have articulated Goddess "thealogies."

Among ecofeminists are Christians who are critical of the syncretistic Goddess religions, arguing that the "thealogians" of these religions have a limited understanding of how God is depicted in the Bible and in extrabiblical Christian sources. Drawing attention to female imagery in the Bible, they believe that Christianity can be a resource for liberating women and nonhuman nature from the effects of patriarchy. Christian ecofeminists acknowledge that the Bible has been used to legitimate human domination of other creatures. The directive that humans exercise "dominion . . . over every living thing that moves upon the earth" (Gn 1.28) has been interpreted in patriarchal ways that both ignore the historical situation of the Jewish people exiled and enslaved in Babylon during the 500s B.C. and confuse dominion in that ancient social setting with the domination of which humans are capable in the modern age. The biblical account of the "Days of Creation" affirms the deep kinship of humans with all of earth's creatures.

To the important concern about the sacrality of nature, Christian ecofemists theologians provided a variety of responses. Rosemary Radford Ruether, a Catholic theologian, proposes an ecofeminist retrieval of the sacramentality of creation (Gaia and God). Her proposal for an ecofeminist sacramentality affirms the intrinsic worth of every facet of creation, apart from the value that a particular group of persons, including those in power, attaches to it. Earth is sacramental because all creatures have their origins in God, are "holy things" revelatory of the divine presence, and cannot exist apart from a God who transcends specific male names and images. The sacrality of nature is affirmed also by Sallie McFague, a Protestant theologian, in her reflections on the metaphorical statement: "the world is God's body" (The Body of God). In speaking of the world as the body of God, Mc-Fague does not propose to equate God with the material "stuff" of the cosmos. God "bodies forth the world" and exceeds the sum of the world's parts. God both transcends the world and is immanent in it. Nothing exists without God nurturing and sustaining it with the divine gift of life, an agency more readily associated with female reality than with male. In their distinctive, yet related, ecofeminist theologies Ruether and McFague find bases for ethical responses to the ecological crisis. For Ruether it is an ethics of "compassionate solidarity" and for McFague a "community care." For both, it is a love commitment to an eco-justice of right relations with all creatures.

For non-Western ecofeminists, especially those in the Third World countries, awareness of the sacredness of nature is less of an issue. Traditional spiritualities of pre-colonial indigenous cultures affirmed that creation is a sacred manifestation of the divine. Among traditional beliefs commonly held was that land was given to the people as a group or tribe for their use by divine favor. Therefore, individual ownership of land was unheard of. Land and all that inhabited it was a treasured gift from God for the good of the whole community. Therefore, the people routinely performed rituals signifying that their use of the land was a privilege. When they harvested their crops, they offered prayers of thanksgiving to God. However, the Christianity presented to indigenous peoples was given an imperialistic cast by Western colonizers who presumed that land privately owned by men was the universal norm. Women were often presumed by the colonizers to have no land rights (and by extension no rights in any sphere of societal life). Through means that were often violent, the colonizers appropriated great tracts of the most valuable land from indigenous peoples to extract minerals and grow cash crops. Land acquisition and exploitation resulted in the destruction of delicate ecosystems, the denigration of women and the reduction of land to a resource to be exploited by a few rather than a gift to be shared by all.

In post-colonial Third World countries a revisionist interpretation of the inculturation of Christianity has awakened prophetic voices among women who challenge First World notions of private land ownership, industrial development, economic progress and the desacralization of the land. Some Third World ecofeminist theologians affirm core beliefs of Christianity, such as belief in God as creator and giver of life, while also affirming traditional beliefs, including earth-centered spiritualities that celebrate the sacredness of the land. Although significant differences can be discerned in these spiritualities, Third World ecofeminists share common ethical emphases: (1) a critique of First World models of development and progress that contribute to their own poverty; (2) commitment to the sustainability of nature that is basic to survival, very important to women because gender roles in these countries often give them the strenuous work of collecting water, food and fuel for their families; (3) emphasis on practical remedies to wasteful consumption of limited resources; (4) resolve to live a lifestyle that embodies a holistic vision of creation and a response of gratitude to the Creator.

Advocates of Christian ecofeminist theology present it as a prophetic call: (1) to attend to and to correct the destructive effects of patriarchy, not only on women but also in all creatures because such domination is not of God; (2) to reverence creatures, female and male, human and nonhuman in all their diversity because they together form a delicate organic web of life that is of God and in God; (3) to commit oneself to eco-justice both locally and globally.

See Also: ECOLOGY; FEMINISM.

Bibliography: C. J. ADAMS, ed. Ecofeminism and the Sacred (New York 1993). C. P. CHRIST, Rebirth of the Goddess: Lending Meaning in Feminist Spirituality (Reading, Mass. 1997). A. M. CLIF-FORD, "When Being Human Becomes Truly Earthly, an Ecofeminist Proposal for Solidarity," 173-189, in In the Embrace of God: Feminist Approaches to Christian Anthropology, ed. A. O'HARA GRAFF (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1995). F. D'EAUBONNE, Le féminisme ou la mort (1974), E.T. "Ecofeminism or Death," 64-67, in New French Feminisms: An Anthology, ed. E. MARKS and I. DE COUR-TIVRON (Amherst, 1980). M. GIMBUTAS, The Goddesses and Gods of Old Europe (Berkley 1982). S. MCFAGUE, The Body of God: An Ecological Theology (Minneapolis 1993); Super, Natural Christians: How We Should Love Nature (Minneapolis 1997). R. RADFORD RUETHER, Gaia and God: An Ecofeminist Theology of Earth Healing (San Francisco 1992); Women Healing Earth: Third World Women on Ecology, Feminism, and Religion (Maryknoll, N.Y. 1996).

[A. CLIFFORD]

ÉCOLE BIBLIQUE

The École Pratique d'Études Bibliques (The Practical School of Biblical Studies) was founded on Nov. 15, 1890 by Father Marie-Joseph Lagrange, OP (1855–1938) in the premises of the Dominican Monastery of Saint Stephen in Jerusalem. Its name underlines its distinctive methodology. The combination of text and monument should ensure that the Bible was studied in the physical and cultural context in which it had been written.

The name was modified in 1920 when the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles- Lettres, Paris, decided to honor the achievements of the École Pratique d'Études Bibliques by designating it the École Archéologique Française de Jérusalem. The first part of the original title was condensed with the result that the official title became École Biblique et Archéologique Française de Jérusalem. Alone of the national archaeological schools in Jerusalem it has a developed teaching program, and since 1983 it has been accredited by the Congregation of Catholic Education to confer the Doctorate in Sacred Scripture. A grant from the European Commission (1999–2001) brought its celebrated library up to fully professional standards.

Faculty. With the exception of Lagrange, who had studied oriental languages at the University of Vienna, none of the original staff had any professional qualifications. Very quickly, however, from the Dominican novices forced to study in Jerusalem by the French anticlerical law of July 15, 1889, he selected and trained a faculty envied by all academic institutions. Marius Antonin Jaussen (1871-1962) became a pioneering ethnographer. Louis-Hugues Vincent (1872-1960) developed into the preeminent Palestinian archaeologist of his generation. Antoine Raphael Savignac (1874–1951) made his mark as a semitic epigrapher, particularly for his work during the three dangerous expeditions with Jaussen into northern Arabia (1907, 1909, 1910-12). The acute critical judgment of Felix-Marie Abel (1876-1953) focused his vast erudition into unrivalled mastery of the Greek sources for the history and geography of Palestine. Eduard Paul Dhorme (1881-1966) became a noted Assyriologist, and was the first to decipher Ugaratic. Lagrange himself concentrated first on the Old Testament, and then on the New Testament, producing the most authoritative Catholic commentaries of their day on the four gospels, Romans and Galatians. The research generated by the close interdisciplinary cooperation of these scholars appeared primarily in the periodical Revue Biblique (1892—) and in the monograph series Études Bibliques (1903-).

In addition to intense productivity, they also trained their successors, all French Dominicans, who began to appear in the 1930s. Bernard Couroyer (1900–92) published extensively in Egyptology, but also taught Coptic and Arabic. Roland de Vaux (1903–71) was noted both for biblical scholarship and field archaeology. Raymond Tournay (1912–99) produced the best translation of the Psalms in any language. Highly significant work in the New Testament was done by Pierre Benoit (1906–87) and Marie-Emile Boismard (1916—). It was these, together with the survivors of the first generation, who gave Lagrange's ideal its ultimate expression with the publication of the one-volume Bible de Jérusalem (1956).

Only in the third generation did the faculty of the École Biblique become international. Jerome Murphy-O'Connor (1935—) was the first non-Frenchman to be appointed (1967). Others soon followed, and eventually non-Dominican professors were added to the staff. In 2000 there were professors and administrators from Brazil, France, Ireland, Italy, Mexico, New Zealand, Poland, Portugal, Switzerland, and the USA. The multinational student body averages some 30 men and women from as many as 20 different countries and many different religious traditions.

Activities. The École Biblique concentrates it activities in two sectors, textual and archaeological. In the first the principal focus is on the text of the Old and New Testaments, which are studied according to the historicocritical method. The troubles that this approach created for Lagrange in the Modernist period no longer exist. More modern approaches are not excluded, and are catered for by invitations to visiting professors, but in fact the interest of the permanent faculty lies in the evolution of texts and the reliability of their historical information. The Dead Sea Scrolls are taught by one of the editors, Abbé Emile Puech of the CNRS, who also edits the Revue de Qumran. All the relevant ancient languages are taught.

Because of the lack of funds for excavations the École Biblique first concentrated its archeological activities on highly fruitful surface exploration of the entire biblical region and on the study of monumental complexes. The latter included the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem (1914), the Haram al-Khalil in Hebron (1923), and above all the city of Jerusalem (1912-55). A series of small excavations (Amwas, Abu Ghosh, En el-Mamoudiyeh) prepared the École Biblique to attempt a major site. Between 1946 and 1962 de Vaux spent nine seasons at Tell el-Farah (11 km NE of Nablus), which he identified as Tirza, the first capital of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. His work there was interrupted by the need to excavate at Qumran, En Feshkha and Wadi Murrabaat (1949-58) in order to provide an historical context for the Dead Sea Scrolls, whose authenticity was disputed at the time of their discovery in the late 1940s.

The École Biblique became responsible for the publication of the Scrolls by default. The fledgling Jordan Department of Antiquities had no textual expert, and the political situation excluded Jewish cooperation. The task fell to Dominique Barthélemy (1921—) and Josef Milik (1922—), a Polish secular priest studying at the École. They coopted Abbé Maurice Baillet when he arrived as a student in 1952. It soon became apparent that the three could not cope with the mass of material. De Vaux won the assent of the Jordanian Government to the formation of an international and interconfession team of experts, of which he became the coordinator (1954). At his death in 1971 he was succeeded by Pierre Benoit until 1986.

The war of June 1967 brought the École Biblique under Israeli jurisdiction, but after excavating in Israel (Tell Keisan), the École went back to Jordan with Jean-Baptiste Humbert, OP (1940—) as field director (Khirbet es-Samra 1981–85, 1993–93; the Citadel in Amman 1986–89), and subsequently moved to Gaza (1995–99).

One of the treasures of the École Biblique is the photo library of some 20,000 glass slides, digitalized from photos taken at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century. In addition to archaeological sites that have been destroyed they portray a world that has completely disappeared. To bring them to the attention of scholars Jean-Michel de Tarragon, OP (1945—) organized a series of exhibitions, accompanied by detailed catalogues, at the Institut du Monde Arab, Paris: "Itineraires Bibliques" (1995), "Périple de la mer Morte 1908–1909" (1997), "Photographies d'Arabie: Hedjaz 1907–1917" (1999), which also went to Riyadh and Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, and "Al Quds al-Sharif" (2002), which also went to the Emirates of the Gulf.

Bibliography: P. BENOIT, "French Archaeologists," in Benchmarks in Time and Culture: Essays in Honor of Joseph A. Callaway, ed. J. F. DRINKARD et al. (Atlanta 1988) 63–86. O. BETZ and R. RIESNER, Jesus, Qumran and the Vatican (New York 1994). F.-M. BRAUN, L'oeuvre de Père Lagrange. Étude et bibliographie (Fribourg 1943). M.-J. LAGRANGE, Personal Reflections and Memoirs (Mahwah 1985). J. MURPHY-O'CONNOR with a contribution by J. TAYLOR, The Ecole Biblique and the New Testament: A Century of Scholarship (1890–1990) (NTOA 13; Fribourg and Göttingen 1990). J.-L. VESCO, ed., L'Ancien Testament. Cent ans d'exégèse à l'Ecole Biblique (CRB 28; Paris 1990). B. T. VIVIANO, "Ecole Biblique et Archéologique Française de Jérusalem," Biblical Archaeologist 54 (1991) 160–67.

[J. MURPHY-O'CONNOR]

ECOLOGY

The term "ecology" designates one of the basic divisions of biology and was first employed by Ernst Haeckel, the German zoologist, in the 19th century. In the mid-20th century ecology emerged as one of the primary scientific and ethical concerns of humanity. The word comes from the Greek root oikos ("house" or "dwelling") and refers to the systemic relationship of abiotic environmental factors with biotic components such as plants, animals, and microbes. Ecology, therefore, is the study of the structure and dynamics of the web of life, i.e., the biological processes that compose and sustain the earth's ecosystem.

In contrast with the Newtonian view that nature is simple in structure, mechanistic in behavior, and static in form, an ecological interpretation stresses that nature is diverse in structure, reciprocal in behavior, and dynamic in form. Basic premises of an ecological interpretation include the following: (1) All forms of life exist in interdependent relationships. Life is sustained by reciprocity and mutuality among organisms. (2) Nature is dynamic rather than static. In its adaptation and growth nature shows a constantly changing face. (3) The stability of nature depends upon diversity. Heterogeneous environments have greater possibilities for change and adaptation than homogeneous environments. (4) Nature is fragile and finite. Through intentional or unintentional intervention the ecological balance can be so disturbed as to be irremediable. Moreover, nature has limits, and its supply of resources is not infinite.

In recent years ecologists have shown in considerable detail that many of the organisms and species on earth are either being irretrievably destroyed or are now in danger of extinction because of damage by human beings to the earth's ecosystems. Numerous ecological perils threaten humans and other living beings today. A litany of these usually includes: the rapid destruction of forests; massive erosion of soil; disappearance of sources of fresh water; desertification; pollution of land, air and water; extinction of species; global warming; and the thinning of the stratospheric ozone layer. Overarching all of these is the burgeoning human population which, along with patterns of excessive consumption, compounds every ecological problem the earth faces today.

Theology of Nature. In response to the ecological crisis one of the major developments in contemporary theology has been the attempt to reformulate a theology of nature. Six key themes can be discerned. (1) The biblical doctrine of creation (Gn 1) stresses the goodness of the whole created order. In the divine perspective nature has an implicit value of its own in that it manifests the goodness of God and joins in universal praise of its Creator. Nature, therefore, cannot be reduced to an exclusively instrumental status in the service of humanity. (2) Humans are an integral part of the web of life and not an exception to it. So close is the kinship of the human species to its natural environment that the two live in an inescapable reciprocity. Ecology traces the bonds between the two. While emphasizing human continuity with the nonhuman natural world theologians and scientists also call attention to the unique capacities of humans to reflect upon and to project the future of the natural world. Humans are to be responsible caretakers of the earth (Gn 2.15). Within the created order only humans have the capacity to transcend time and place and hence to exercise stewardship with respect to the creation before the Creator. (3) Human sin is illustrated in the fact that the terrestrial sector of creation bears the consequences of our irresponsibility. The ecological crisis calls our attention to the biblical assertion that "the whole creation is in travail" (Rom 8.23). (4) The INCARNATION affirms the value of an individual's personal being before God by affirming simultaneously the significance of earthly life and its natural environment as the context for God's revelation. The Word that became flesh has identity and continuity with the creative Word which called all things into being (Jn 1:3). The New Testament authors extend the LOGOS doctrine into a cosmic view in which Christ is the consummation of all things (Colossians) and the restoration of the cosmos through sanctification (Hebrews). The incarnate Christ restores to the creation its reality and value. (5) Some theologians, notably those influenced by TEILHARD DE CHARDIN or American PROCESS PHILOSO-PHY, emphasize a new formulation of the doctrine of divine immanence. Rather than acting from without, God is seen as the source of constant gracious creativity acting, in a manner consistent with the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, from within the on-going world process. In process thought distinctions are made between God's primordial and his consequent nature. According to process theology the world process is included within the life of God, who at the same time transcends the world. In this sense it can be said that God is the world's "ultimate environment." (6) The God of creation is also the Lord of history. Environmental scientists and theologians are concerned that ecological values be seen in their social as well as natural context. An ecological ethic requires the reordering of economic values. An adequate theology of nature will see the natural and the social worlds as existing inextricably together.

Ecological Theology. Official religious bodies, not unlike other institutions, have paid little attention to ecological issues until recently, but they are now doing so more explicitly than ever before. Moreover, ecology has increasingly come to engage the attention of religious thinkers, including Christian theologians. The objective of ecological theology is to spell out, in this case from within the context of Christian tradition, precisely why people of faith should care about the nonhuman natural world. Ecological theology is especially appropriate at a time when some prominent environmentalists are claiming that religion, and particularly Christianity, is indifferent if not inimical to the well-being of nature. Critics often cite the controversial thesis of historian Lynn White, Jr., that the Bible, by giving humans "dominion" over the earth (Gn 1.26), has sanctioned our "domination" of the natural world. Or they appeal to philosophers like John Passmore, who argues that Christianity will never contribute substantially to ecological ethics without ceasing thereby to be Christian. Preoccupation with the supernatural and with immortality, they argue, has led believers to focus so intensely on the "other world" that they pay little attention to this one.

Many theologians agree that the Christian tradition is somewhat ambiguous in its evaluation of nature, but that it still has the resources for a fresh ecological vision. Since the survival of nature was not a major issue during the emergence of biblical religion we should not expect the latter to come with pre-packaged remedies for our ecological problems. Still, even though concern for treating the earth as our home has not been a prominent feature of Christian spirituality, the central teachings of the faith can now be shown to be powerfully relevant to ecology.

It is not immediately obvious, though, precisely how Christianity can be said to be ecologically significant. Like some other religious traditions, it cherishes a spirituality that at times seems to have made terrestrial reality less important than ecological ethicists would require. Like some other religious traditions it has fostered a spirituality in which humans are in via, on a long journey of homeless detachment. And this ideal of religious homelessness easily lends itself to translation into an environmentally noxious cosmic homelessness. Can the religious call to live homelessly be made compatible with the ecological imperative to treat the natural world as our home?

In the Bible, Abraham, the common ancestor of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, was summoned to leave his ancestral home in order to pursue God's promise. His willingness to endure homelessness for the sake of the promise remained an ideal of Israel's religion which also understood itself in terms of an Exodus journey. Jesus called his own followers to a life of homeless pilgrimage. The Letter to the Hebrews states that faith in the promise makes us "strangers and aliens on earth," seekers of "a better homeland, a heavenly one" (11.13-16) Numerous other Christian writings, hymns, and prayers down through the ages have echoed the same theme: sojourning, the sense of not yet being at home, is central to Christian faith. Thus many Christians, perhaps even the majority of them, find it difficult to see the earth as "home." They sometimes even interpret it as though it were little more than a "vale of soul-making."

This spiritual interpretation of terrestrial existence turns the natural world into little more than a way-station on an exclusively human path to salvation. It robs earthly reality of intrinsic value, and although the doctrines of creation and incarnation clearly exalt the goodness of nature, Christian spirituality has been largely indifferent to the long-term thriving of the earth as a good in itself. FRANCIS OF ASSISI, IGNATIUS LOYOLA, HILDEGAARD OF BINGEN, MEISTER ECKHART, THOMAS AQUINAS, and many others have emphasized the value of all created things, but concern for the long-term welfare of nature has not been a very explicit part of Christian preaching and teaching.

Nevertheless, some concerned theologians have begun to explore the ecological relevance of Christian faith. They are convinced that ecological ethics requires at least some kind of religious grounding and that religious homelessness need not be turned into a cosmic homelessness. While at first sight a pure naturalism may seem to be the only possible framework in which we could embrace the earth as our true home, under examination naturalism fails to demonstrate in sufficient depth precisely why our natural environment is inherently, and not just instrumentally, a good to be preserved and cherished. On the other hand, Christian theology, in spite of its historical ambiguity on the issue, can provide such a foundation.

For convenience one may distinguish three ways in which this theological premise is now being developed. These are the apologetic, sacramental, and eschatological approaches to ecology. None of the three can claim adequacy by itself, and there is some tension among them. But taken together they constitute at least the beginnings of an effective theological response.

The Apologetic Approach. The apologetic approach to ecological theology claims, either explicitly or implicitly, that Scripture and tradition together provide an adequate religious foundation for ecological ethics. Examples are the World Day of Peace Message by Pope John Paul II entitled "The Ecological Crisis: A Common Responsibility" (1990), the American Catholic Bishops' pastoral, "Renewing the Earth" (1992), and the World Council of Churches' statements on "Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation." In addition, a growing body of theological articles and books on ecology voice a similar apologetic concern.

The distinguishing mark of apologetic ecological theology is its sometimes unstated conviction that Christian tradition does not need to undergo drastic revision in order to constitute a sufficiently solid basis for environmental ethics. Its summons to responsible stewardship is a clear signal of biblical religion's concern for the natural world. So our vocation as responsible stewards of creation should provide enough of a religious incentive for Christians to take up the cause of ecology today. Numerous scriptural and traditional texts, many of them passed over before, also demonstrate the considerable extent to which Christian faith quite directly obliges us to protect the environment that we share with all other species of living beings.

This apologetic type of ecological theology also looks for support to the traditional emphasis on timeless religious virtues. Without the practice of love, humility, justice, detachment, and gratitude no alleviation of the ecological crisis is even conceivable. Since human habits of immoderation and injustice have contributed so obviously to pollution and the drain on nonrenewable resources, nothing less than a return by all of humanity to the pursuit of virtue will ultimately restore the earth to health. For this conversion to take place in an effective way people the world over must embrace their role as faithful stewards of the creation, representing God's goodness and care toward all other forms of life.

This approach may be called "apologetic" because it places a somewhat defensive shield over traditional religious teachings, claiming that they do not deserve the complaints they sometimes receive from secular ecologists. Apologists imply that Christianity is in essence immune to criticism since environmental abuse stems only from our disobedience to the dictates of faith and not from any deficiencies inherent in Christianity itself. Consequently, the ecological crisis calls less for the readjustment of Christianity than for a straightforward retrieval of its forgotten teachings about stewardship, justice, and other virtues. If we would only allow the eternal values set forth in Scripture and tradition to shape our environmental policies, we could avert the possible calamity that threatens the earth today. The fault is not with the sources of faith but with our failure to accept their message.

The often strident criticisms of Christianity by some ecologists would seem to justify something like an apologetic response. In spite of the well-known arguments concerning the "religious origins" of our current ecological crisis, it is by no means evident that religion is itself the main culprit. The widespread destruction of ecosystems may stem much less from specific religious attitudes than from irreligious habits and policies uncensored by a healthy sense of human limits and gratitude for the gift of creation.

Nevertheless, although apologetics must be one aspect of any Christian ecological theology today, a growing number of critics from within the Christian community now consider it to be quite inadequate. They concede that its focus on Scripture and tradition is helpful in bringing to our attention many ecologically significant texts and teachings (e.g., the Wisdom Literature, the Noachic covenant with "every living creature," or the psalms that glorify nature as God's creation, not to mention many texts from the New Testament or from early and medieval Christian writers). However, questions still linger about the religious sufficiency of the theme of stewardship and about the general obliviousness to the cosmos that characterizes so much traditional and modern theology. To an increasing number of theologians the ecological crisis requires that we go beyond apologetic theology.

The Sacramental Approach. The ecological crisis, some theologians argue, is so novel and momentous that it calls for a much more radical transformation of Christian faith than the apologetic approach proposes. These theologians seriously doubt that Christianity can adequately confront the problems facing the natural world simply by calling on such classic themes as stewardship and the practice of virtue, important though these may be. Even the most impressive display of scriptural and traditional texts about God and nature may not be enough to demonstrate Christianity's essential involvement with ecology. Theology needs to undergo a new and unprecedented internal change in its whole approach to nature. In brief, according to this second approach, the ecological situation requires that theology develop a much more profound "sense of the cosmos," especially after several modern centuries in which it has focused its attention almost exclusively on themes of history, subjectivity, society, and freedom-usually to the exclusion of nature. Theology is now being challenged to bring the universe back to the center of its concern.

Advocates of this cosmological transformation of theology base their position on what they take to be the sacramentality of nature, a theme already explicit in Scripture and tradition but often subordinated to the biblical emphasis on salvation history. While Scripture and tradition are still essential sources of ecological theology, nature itself is seen here also as powerfully disclosive of God. A fresh acknowledgment of the sacral quality of the cosmos itself is taken as the main reason for our valuing nonhuman nature. The inherently revelatory character of nature gives it an intrinsic, even "sacred," value that should shelter it from exploitative technological and industrial projects undertaken in the name of development and "progress."

Thomas Berry is one of the most prominent advocates of this sacramental approach. In his widely influential writings he argues that Scripture and tradition are by themselves an incomplete foundation for ecological spirituality and theology. Instead, he suggests that we base our ecological perspective on the sense that the universe itself is the primary revelation of God. His theology claims a strong pedigree in the sacramental emphasis of Catholic tradition, both western and eastern. However, advocates of both the apologetic and eschatological theologies are unhappy with the subordinate role he gives to the Bible.

The sacramental theme is also taken up into the "creation-centered" theology associated especially with Matthew Fox. This theology goes far beyond apologetics. Claiming that the traditional call to stewardship and virtue is not nearly enough, it argues that the ecological crisis requires a more radical rethinking of what it means to be Christian within the framework of the entire earthcommunity. Our inherited texts and teachings are not alone capable of leading us through the needed shift in our religious thinking and practice. The rhythms and powers of the universe must also be allowed to guide us. A reattunement to nature requires also that we attend to the voices of native peoples who have always lived close to the earth. All of the traditional teachings of Christianity—if we expect them to be effective in an age of ecological sensitivity-need to be recast in a sacramental, cosmological, relational, non-hierarchical, nonpatriarchal, and non-dualistic fashion.

More than anything else, however, the biblical theme of creation must now be brought to the very center of Christian theology. According to creation-centered theology, this most ecologically compelling of all doctrines has been eclipsed by the tradition's unbalanced exaggeration of a 'fallen'' world and the need for human redemption. According to Fox, a one-sided Fall/Redemption theology diverted our religious attention away from the intrinsic, original goodness of nature. As long as nature seemed to be vitiated by our own sinfulness we failed to greet its sacramental effusiveness with an appropriate reverence. Moreover, a predominantly Fall/Redemption interpretation of the Bible led us toward an anthropocentrism that distracted us from concern about the nonhuman natural world.

Creation-centered theology, therefore, requires a less human-centered understanding of the cosmos than we find in the apologetic approach. Its relativization of the human even carries over to the notion of sin. Sin refers not only to our estrangement from God and other humans, but as well to nature's alienation from us and from God. Likewise "reconciliation" refers not only to the restoration of interhuman bonds, but more fundamentally to the renewal of the entire earth-community to which we belong much more completely than it belongs to us. In this theology Christ is much more than a personal historical savior. First and foremost he is the heart of the whole cosmos, the Word in whose image all of nature was fashioned, and the goal toward which the entire universe moves in its evolution. A cosmic Christology, with its roots in the New Testament writings of John and Paul, as well as in Irenaeus and Teilhard de Chardin, is the deepest foundation of a specifically Christian sacramental approach to ecology.

Countering the ecologically problematic cosmic homelessness of some of the world's religious traditions, creation-centered theology encourages an enjoyment of the natural world as our true home. Accordingly it moves beyond those spiritualities that fostered a sense of discomfort with our embodied existence. It is especially critical of the dualistic strains in Christian tradition that have sanctioned negative attitudes toward nature, women, and the body.

To those who accuse this new theology of advocating a licentious brand of "neo-paganism," sacramental ecologists remind us that their ecological preoccupation exacts a much more difficult kind of renunciation than did the puritanical dualism that defined so much Christian morality in the past. An ecological spirituality imposes upon humans the very strict spiritual discipline of taking into account the implications of all of their actions for the entire natural world and future generations. And while an ecological asceticism does not seek to detach us from the natural world, it does require that we forsake the ideal of autonomous, isolated selfhood with which we have become so comfortable since the Enlightenment. Sacramental ecology is equally intolerant of the privatization of religion. Taking into account the implications of our being intimately intertwined with the wider earthcommunity, and not just with human society, this ecospirituality demands personal sacrifices that we have never made before.

Such an ethic also calls for a wider understanding of justice than we find in most previous Christian moral teaching. Its emphasis on "eco-justice" reminds us that we cannot respond appropriately to any social inequities without attending also to the prospering of the earth's eco-systems. Likewise a truly "pro-life" ethic goes beyond focusing only on issues of human fertility and takes into account the need to protect the earth's complex lifesystems without which there will be a complete and final "death of birth" (McDonagh).

Finally, since a sacramental perspective on ecology discovers in nature an inherent value, it radically questions utilitarian or naturalist attitudes toward the physical world. Inasmuch as nature is essentially the sacramental manifestation of an ultimate goodness and generosity, its value transcends that of simple raw material at the service of purely human projects. Thus the nurturing of a sacramental vision is one of the most important contributions Christianity can make to the grounding of ecological ethics.

The Eschatological Approach. Nevertheless, an accentuation of the theme of nature's sacramentality may not yet be the most distinctive endowment Christian faith can make to ecology. While any attempt to construct a Christian ecological theology today must build on the sacramental interpretation of nature, several theologians (notably Jürgen Moltmann) have asked whether biblical religion's most fundamental theme, that of a divine promise for future fulfillment, is itself of any relevance here. In other words, does ESCHATOLOGY have a significant role to play in shaping an ecologically sensitive theology?

To some ecologists a concern for the eschatological future, as it has been traditionally understood in Christian theology, is ecologically problematic. Discourse about the end of the world or about life beyond death seems to distract us from engagement with present ecological emergencies. On the other hand, since the theme of promise is the backbone of biblical faith, it is doubtful that we could have a distinctively Christian ecological theology without making eschatology central to it.

By "eschatology" theology today no longer means simply the religious concern for a personal destiny beyond death. Instead eschatology refers primarily to the patient, shared hope in God's promise that underlies the stories about Abraham, Moses, Israel's messianic expectations, Jesus' parables of the Reign of God, and the early Christian community's longing for the coming of Christ. Eschatology is not speculation about another world so much as it is the anticipation of God's always surprising and restorative appearance out of the future. It is not a vision that pulls us off the face of the earth, but one that looks toward the renewal of the earth and all of creation. The main theme of eschatology is not escape to the other world, but a new creation of this world, culminating in "the kingdom that will have no end."

Therefore, when viewed eschatologically all of reality, including the natural world, is permeated with promise. Even in all of its ambiguity the entire universe hints at future fulfillment. Authentic faith constantly scans the horizon for signs of the coming of a new future into the world, not for a removal of humans from the earth. Biblical faith looks not only for a God sacramentally revealed in present natural harmony but even more for the future coming of God in the eschatological perfection of creation, which of course includes the resurrection of the dead. This eschatological sense of promise may also help ground a Christian ecological theology.

An eschatological approach to ecology looks upon the natural world itself as essentially a promise of future fulfillment. Thus it is not only the world's sacramental character, but its being permeated by promise that bids us to care for it. If a theology of nature is to have a close connection to biblical religion, then the theme of promise must be made central and not subordinated to other theological criteria. Seen eschatologically, the present cosmos is an installment of the ultimate perfection announced by the good news of God's coming. Consequently, nature is not something from which to separate ourselves in order to find a final fulfillment, but a reality to which we are everlastingly related and whose new creation we constantly await.

Standing on the promissory character of nature an eschatological ecology does not displace but instead gives a distinctively futurist orientation to the sacramental contribution discussed above. Sacramentalism has the felicitous effect of bringing the wider cosmos back to the attention of theology. But in the Bible sacramentality is taken up into eschatology. Biblical hope does not look for a complete and final epiphany of the sacred in any present manifestation of natural beauty. Such a revelation of God awaits the eschatological future which even now relativizes all present cosmic realities, including the natural world in all its splendor. Nature's value then consists not only of its being transparent to God, as the sacramental approach rightly argues, but also of its being a promise of the future unfolding of God's vision for the world. Thus, human violence toward nature is by implication not only a sacrilege against the alleged "sacredness" of life. It is also despair, the turning away from a promise.

As the American Catholic Bishops' pastoral "Renewing the Earth" notes, the fundamental ecological virtue is hope. A genuinely biblical perspective requires that our ecological theology remain deeply connected to the sense of promise. If the sacramental approach seeks to recosmologize Christianity, then the Bible demands that we always embed our cosmology in eschatology. Present cosmic reality is not the conclusive symbolic revelation of God but an intense straining toward a new creation not yet fully manifest.

In its vision of redemptive fulfillment the Bible in fact explicitly includes the entire cosmos, now groaning in the birth pangs of new creation. Following the spirit of Paul in Romans 8.18-22, one may say that the universe is not a mere point of departure for the homeless religious pilgrimage, but in all of its evolution a participant in the human journey into God. Religious homelessness does not have to turn into a cosmic homelessness. The cosmos is not left behind as the children of Abraham pursue the promise. Rather it accompanies us in all of our striving. Nature shares eternally in our fate, and God's incarnational embrace of the world makes the whole universe a perpetual participant in the salvation for which Christian faith hopes. Our own religious longing for future fulfillment, therefore, is not a violation but a blossoming of the cosmos. This way of looking at things should make a difference in how we treat the earth's fragile ecosystems.

Viewing nature as promise, eschatological ecology also allows the universe to have a future that far transcends our purely human aspirations. The cosmic future includes much more than the goals that we humans might formally sketch. According to eschatological ecology, any realization of our plans for the human future must be accomplished in a manner that does not interfere with the promise for a transhuman future that the present cosmos may be carrying within itself. We are ethically obliged to preserve all the diversity of the earth's life systems, irrespective of their value for us, since to destroy them is not only to diminish our own future but that also of the larger world that includes us. As the Wisdom Literature implies-and especially the Book of Job-we are not ourselves the authors of the divine vision that embraces and moves all of creation.

An eschatological interpretation of nature carries two additional implications for ecological theology. In the first place, when the cosmos is viewed as promise nature can claim our respect and conservation without requiring that we prostrate ourselves before it. Sacramentalism, on the other hand, if not carefully tempered by a sense of the future, tends to sacralize nature, at times almost to the point of divinization. Eschatology allows for deficiencies in nature that a purely sacramental ecology may not easily tolerate. When it is taken as promise rather than solely as the present symbolic mediation of God, nature is allowed to be less than perfect. When we do not require the universe at this moment to be fully revelatory of God we will be less surprised and discouraged when it turns out to be bloody as well as beautiful. A sacramental ecology cannot easily accommodate the dark side of nature, whereas an eschatological posture, looking more toward the future than the present for the completion of creation and the final coming of God, can acknowledge the unfinished status of the world.

In the second place, an assimilation of ecology into eschatology allows for, and even demands, a way of thinking about personal life beyond death that will avoid a sense of our final separation from nature. The traditional interpretation of death and beyond was exceedingly problematic from an ecological point of view. In spite of the teaching about bodily resurrection, it has usually pictured human destiny in terms of an immortal human soul abandoning the body on an otherworldly journey to a realm completely beyond nature. This picture could hardly avoid placing the entire natural world, of which the body is a part, in a negative light.

What then would an ecologically satisfying notion of personal immortality look like? Karl RAHNER proposed that a person's death need not imply a separation from the earth and the universe, but rather the possibility of entering into a deeper relationship with nature. Though Rahner's language was still somewhat dualistic, he speculated that in death the soul takes on a "pancosmic" relationship to the world rather than becoming completely detached from it. If it is as persons that we die, Rahner implied, any "personal" survival of death could be construed as a deepening rather than a severing of our connections with the cosmos. In death the person is set free from a shallow relationship to the cosmos and to God in order to assume a more profound one. Such a view is consistent with Christian teachings about resurrection, continuous creation, and divine incarnation, as well as with the sense that nature is filled with promise.

The dualistic anthropology presupposed by much traditional piety, on the other hand, encouraged us to prepare for death by detaching ourselves as thoroughly as possible here and now from the world and the body. Allegedly this ascesis would make us ready for the final flight of the soul from the earth. A spirituality chastened by ecological concern, however, would prepare us for our personal death by having us always cherish and deepen our relationship to the cosmos. We prepare for death not by reducing the degree of our connectedness to the earthcommunity, but by heightening it. Spiritual discipline should under no circumstances mean a weakening of our sense of being intricately related to nature. Thus, in an ecological spirituality asceticism is not so much a matter of leaving things out of our lives as it is the habit of embracing the otherness around us, including the wildness of nature.

For Christian faith, of course, the archetype of such inclusiveness is Jesus himself. The Gospels present him as one who constantly sought out deeper relationships, especially with those who were no longer connected to life: the outcasts, the sick, the sinners-and the dead. Jesus' life, whose central motif is that of including the unincluded, can serve also as the model of our ecological concern. Ecological ethics then is the extension to all beings of the divine spirit of inclusiveness made manifest in Jesus. It is not essential that the historical Jesus himself have made any references to an "ecological crisis" in order to function as the model of our own ecological spirituality today. It is his eschatological spirit of inclusiveness, whose shape may vary from age to age, that is all important. Jesus' radically relational life is the sacrament of a responsive God whose preservative care and concern for life is the ultimate paradigm of our own ecological ethics.

Implications for Environmental Ethics. In light of the three versions of ecological theology discussed above, Christian theology is able to respond substantively to the suspicions voiced by some critics that it is indifferent to the ecological crisis. The apologetic, sacramental, and eschatological strains of ecological theology not only vigorously dispute such a suggestion, but together they make a strong case that Christian faith is inseparable from concern for ecological integrity.

From the apologetic approach ecological theology learns the significance of stewardship and the need for ecologically sustaining virtues. In spite of naturalistic suspicion of the notion of stewardship as being too "managerial," it would be irresponsible for humans now to abandon their vocation as caretakers of nature. Moreover, recent exegesis has shown that the Bible in no way sanctions the human exploitation of nature that Lynn White, Jr., declared to be the main historical cause of the environmental crisis. The biblical theology of human dominion and stewardship was never intended to make humans anything other than bearers of the image of a just and compassionate God in our relationship to the rest of creation.

On the basis of the sacramental approach ecological theology can make the case that Christian faith is essentially, and not just accidentally, bound to the preservation of nature. The loss of nature leads directly to a loss of our sense of God. It is useful to ask what our religions would look like if we lived on a lunar landscape (Berry). From the beginnings of religious history on earth the mystery of the sacred has been revealed through such natural phenomena as clean water, fresh air, fertile soil, clear skies, bright light, thunder and rain, living trees, plants and animals, and life's fertility. Nature, viewed in sacramental perspective, is not primarily raw material to serve human purposes but essentially the showing forth of a divine goodness and generosity. As such it commands a care and concern that a utilitarian view cannot provide.

Finally, an eschatological emphasis allows us to revere nature without compelling us to worship it. It treasures nature as a promise open to future perfection, and in this way provides a distinctively biblical direction to ecological concern.

Bibliography: I. G. BARBOUR, ed., Earth Might Be Fair: Reflections on Ethics, Religion and Ecology (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1972). T. BERRY, The Dream of the Earth (San Francisco 1988). C. BIRCH and J. B. COBB, JR., The Liberation of Life (Cambridge 1981). C. BIRCH, W. EAKIN, and J. MCDANIEL, eds., Liberating Life (New York 1990). H. E. DALY and J. B. COBB, JR., For the Common Good (Boston 1989). D. EDWARDS, Jesus the Wisdom of God: An Ecological Theology (Maryknoll, N.Y., 1995). F. ELDER, Crisis in Eden: A Religious Study of Man and Environment (New York 1970). J. F. HAUGHT, The Promise of Nature (New York 1993). D. T. HESSEL, ed., Theology for Earth Community: A Field Guide (Maryknoll, N.Y., 1996). B. HILL, Christian Faith and the Environment: Making Vital Connections (Maryknoll, N.Y., 1998). S. MCDONAGH, The Greening of the Church (New York 1990). J. MOLTMANN, God in Creation, trans. M. KOHL (San Francisco 1985). C. F. D. MOULE, Man and Nature in the New Testament: Some Reflections on Biblical Theology (Philadelphia 1967). J. NASH, Loving Nature (Nashville 1991). M. OELSCHLAEGER, Caring for Creation: An Ecumenical Approach to the Environmental Crisis (New Haven 1996). K. RAHNER, On the Theology of Death (New York 1961). R. R. RUETHER, ed., Christianity and Ecology: Seeking the Well-Being of Earth and Humans (Cambridge 2000). P. SANTMIRE, The Travail of Nature (Philadelphia 1985). P. SMITH, What Are They Saying about Environmental Ethics? (Mahwah, N.J., 1997). L. WHITE, JR. "The Historical Roots of our Ecological Crisis," Science 155:1203–1207.

[J. C. LOGAN/J. F. HAUGHT]

ECONOMY, DIVINE

Divine economy is the divine plan ($\dot{\eta}$ oἰκονομία, Eph 3.9; cf. 1 Cor 2.7–8) hidden in the intellect of God from all eternity before the creation of the world and revealed in the divine acts of SALVATION, through His Prophets, through Jesus Christ (Rom 16.26), and through His Holy Spirit (1 Cor 2.10). The principal subject of that divine plan, while embracing both the order of nature and of grace (St. Thomas, ST 1a, 22), is salvation realized in and through the INCARNATION of the Person of the WORD, who, coming "in the likeness of sinful flesh as a sin offering" (Rom 8.3; cf. 2 Cor 5.21) in a passible human nature, underwent suffering and death and returned to the Father glorified in that flesh through which He had effected for man universal REDEMPTION (Heb 9.12).

Divine economy likewise embraces the mystery of the execution of the divine plan of salvation. Creatures to whom God communicates a participation in His causality are secondary agents through whom He acts in applying the fruits of His redemptive act. Through these created secondary agents acting in His name and often through His priestly power, that act is prolonged in space and time, especially in the created sacramental signs that He has endowed with power to communicate GRACE to men.

Essentially the concept of divine economy is that of the total mystery of Christ (Eph 1.10), whereby both the world of nature and that of grace are ordered through Him to the Trinity. In accordance with this above concept, one of the two major parts of Oriental theology is economy, or "the study of the restoration of the communion between God and men by Jesus Christ" (Congar).

The word economy is used also by the Oriental Christians to signify the theory and practice whereby the canonical power of the Church is applied benignly to particular cases (Congar).

See Also: Anthropology, theological; Elevation of man; jesus christ (in theology) 3, (special questions), 12; man; supernatural. Bibliography: O. MICHEL, οίκονομία, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wöterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 5:154–155. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 1:1096. W. TRILLING and O. SEMMELROTH, "Heil," H. FRIES, ed. Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, 2 v. (Munich 1962–63) 1:623–633. C. V. HÉRIS, The Mystery of Christ (Westminster, Md. 1950). Y. CONGAR, Catholicisme 3:1305–07.

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN]

ECSTASY

The Greek word ekstasis signifies "being outside oneself." Commonly, ecstasy is understood to involve an intense and pleasurable affective state along with a movement beyond and outside the limits of one's individuality. Its cognitive content may range from a radical "unknowing" to a sense of infinitely expanded knowledge. Sometimes ecstasy, as a state of maximum arousal, is contrasted to states of minimum arousal such as yoga samadhi. This distinction is not always made, however, and conditions as diverse as trance, frenzy, spirit possession, orgasm, rapture, or a quiet contemplative state of bliss may be presented as examples of ecstasy.

A given instance of ecstasy may appear spontaneous, but more often than not there has been some form of either immediate or long-term preparation; for example, meditation, fasting, physical exercises, or the ingestion of drugs. In many spiritual traditions there are elaborate ritual processes that enact an "ascent to the heavens" or a "descent to the underworld," either of which can have an ecstatic quality and effect. Ecstatic experiences may also emerge in either the precipitating or the resolution phases of major psychological crises.

Given its many forms and the vast range of cultural and religious traditions within which they are located, it is not certain that it is possible to define ecstasy in any theoretically consistent way. Nevertheless, in recent decades much research on ecstatic phenomena has been done from the points of view of the history of religions, cultural anthropology, sociology, psychology, and ritual studies.

According to this research, ecstasy is a "liminal" phenomenon and this quality of taking a person beyond normal boundaries has significant sociopolitical implications in addition to the perhaps more obvious psychological and spiritual ones. In many premodern cultures, shamans—individuals gifted and trained in the practice of ecstatic liminality— have a central role of power within culture and governance. Their ecstasy is understood as a sacred way of obtaining divine guidance and approval for societal activities. In other cultures, ecstatics typically arise from among the dispossessed and marginal (often women, minorities, or those considered abnormal). In this case, public display of ecstatic behavior or claims of unique ecstatic insight may be a path to a level of prestige and power otherwise unavailable to such persons. The women mystics of medieval Europe are often cited as examples of this.

Frenzied ecstasy of a wildly dancing figure, a follower of Dionysus, god of wine, incised on the back of a bronze mirror, late 5th century B.C.

Within modern cultures, the liminality of ecstatic experience may lead to its identification with psychopathology. Indeed, some schizophrenics and others with serious mental illness have episodes of blissful or bizarre "going beyond the self." Scientific research on "altered states of consciousness" has attempted to establish physiological correlates for ecstasy as well as other benign and pathological states. An emerging psychological perspective is that ecstasy manifests a natural and normal human potential for ultimate psychospiritual integration. This view may be bolstered by research on "near-death experiences," which finds many people describing the movement into the ultimate liminal moment of death as both supremely integrating and ecstatic.

In this, a paradox becomes evident: what humans find most fearful (death) and what they find most desirable (ecstasy) are convergent. The ecstatic crossing-out of normal boundaries has an innately perilous quality. For this reason, most who have gone by this path have rooted themselves deeply in some form of spiritual tradition that provides symbols, rituals, interpretations, and companions for such a passage.

Bibliography: E. ARBMAN, Ecstasy or Religious Trance: In the Experience of the Ecstatics and from the Psychological Point of View, 3 v. (Stockholm 1963-1970). J. J. COLLINS and M. FISH-BANE, eds. Death, Ecstasy, and Other Worldly Journeys (Albany, N.Y. 1995). I. CULIANU, Expériences de l'Extase: Extase, Ascension, et Récit Visionnaire, de l'Hellénisme au Moyen Âge (Paris 1984). M. ELIADE, Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, tr. W. R. TRASK (Princeton, N.J. 1974). R. FISCHER, "A Cartography of the Ecstatic and Meditative States," Science 174 (November 1971) 897-905. J. GOETZ et al., s.v. "Extase dans les religions nonchrétiennes," and "Extase: Psychologie et faits occasionels," Dictionnaire de Spiritualité (Paris 1961) 4:2045-2072, 2171-2190. F. D. GOODMAN, Ecstasy, Ritual, and Alternate Reality: Religion in a Pluralistic World (Bloomington, Ind. 1988). N. G. HOLM, ed., Religious Ecstasy (Stockholm 1982). I. M. LEWIS, Ecstatic Religion: An Anthropological Study of Spirit Possession and Shamanism (New York 1989). F. VAUGHN and R. WALSH, Paths beyond Ego: The Transpersonal Vision (Los Angeles 1993).

[M. FROHLICH]

ECSTASY (IN CHRISTIAN MYSTICISM)

A concomitant but temporary mystical phenomenon that normally accompanies the prayer of ecstatic union and disappears when the soul enters upon the transforming union. As an external phenomenon it consists in a gentle and progressive swooning that terminates in the total alienation of the senses. The ecstatic person does not hear or see anything and the face is usually radiant, as if the individual has been transported to a scene of great beauty and joy.

A trance or swoon could conceivably be caused by diabolical influence. More common, presumably, is the state of absorption and rapture induced by natural psychological causes and not necessarily associated with religious experience. These conditions are sometimes called ecstasy by reason of the similarity of the external phenomena. This article, however, is concerned only with truly supernatural ecstasy, which always presupposes the elevation of the soul to intimate union with God and its consequent detachment from the sensible world. It admits of two forms: prophetic ecstasy and mystical ecstasy. Prophetic ecstasy is a CHARISM, or gratia gratis data, and is therefore not within the normal or concomitant phenomena of the mystical state. It may be given even to one in the state of mortal sin, for it is given by God as an illumination of the intellect so that the individual may transmit a message to others. The ecstasy occurs only as a means of binding the other faculties lest they disturb or misinterpret the message given by God.

Mystical ecstasy, on the other hand, is a truly concomitant phenomenon of the mystical state, and especially of the higher grades of infused contemplation; it therefore enters into the normal activity of mystical prayer, but only for a time. The essential note of mystical ecstasy is the elevation of the soul to God, the soul's awareness of its union with God, and the resulting alienation of the internal and external senses in the ecstatic trance. The cause of mystical ecstasy is the Holy Spirit, working through His gifts, and especially through the gifts of wisdom and understanding. The ecstasy occurs because of the weakness of the body and its powers to withstand the divine illumination of infused contemplation, but as the body is purified and strengthened, ecstasy no longer occurs.

St. Thomas Aquinas distinguished three degrees of ecstasy: suspension of the external senses alone; suspension of both the external and internal senses; direct contemplation of the divine essence (ST 2a2ae, 175. 3 ad 1). Mystical ecstasy may be gentle and delightful, or it may be violent and painful. The delightful ecstasy is called simple ecstasy; the painful and violent ecstasy is called seizure, flight of the spirit, or rapture (see St. Teresa of Avila, Interior Castle, Sixth Mansions, ch. 5; St. John of the Cross, Dark Night, 2.1–2).

Bibliography: M. DE GOEDT, et al., s.v. "Extase dans le mystique chrétienne," Dictionnaire de Spiritualité (Paris 1961) 4:2072–2171. A. FARGES, Mystical Phenomena Compared with Their Human and Diabolical Counterfeits, tr. S. P. JACQUES (London 1926). J. MARÉCHAL, Studies in the Psychology of the Mystics, tr. A. THOROLD (London 1927). B. MCGINN, The Presence of God: A History of Western Christian Mysticism, 5 v. (New York 1991–). A. POULAIN, The Graces of Interior Prayer, tr. L. L. YORKE SMITH (St. Louis 1950). E. SCHOLL, "Going Beyond Oneself: Excessus mentis and raptus," Cistercian Studies 31 (1996) 273–286. TERESA OF AVILA, The Book of Her Life, tr. K. KAVANAUGH and O. RODRIGUEZ, 2d ed. (Washington, D.C. 1987), ch. 18–21; The Interior Castle, tr. K. KAVANAUGH and O. RODRIGUEZ (Washington, D.C. 1979). E. UNDERHILL, Mysticism: A Study in the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness (Cleveland 1955).

[J. AUMANN]

ECSTASY (IN THE BIBLE)

Etymologically and literally the word ecstasy (from the Gr. ἕκστασις) indicates a displacement; in the sense here intended it means a psychic displacement and designates a state in which some normal functions are suspended and in which the consciousness is absorbed in emotional or mystic experience. The noun ἕκστασις is derived from the verb ἐξίστημι, to displace, drive one out of one's senses, lose one's senses. Both the verb and the noun occur in both the Septuagint translation of the OT and in the NT, though sometimes in the attenuated sense of simple amazement over some wonderful deed. However, the state of ecstasy may be present even when these words do not occur. In the OT ecstasy is sometimes indicated when it is said that the Spirit of the Lord came upon someone (Nm 11.25; 24.2; 1 Sm 10.6, 10; 19.20; 2 Kgs 3.15; Ez 3.14; 11.24), when Ezechiel is "led forth" by the Spirit (Ez 11.24; 37.1), and, in some cases, when an individual is said to "behave like a PROPHET" (hitnabbe, as in Nm 11.25; 1 Sm 10.5-6, 10, 13; 19.20). It would seem that in many of the OT examples the trancelike state is induced, at least partially, through natural means, such as the rhythm of liturgical dancing and singing. Thus, the group of prophets that Saul met coming down from a high place (where worship was offered in those early days) and in whose company he fell into a trance were carrying several kinds of musical instruments (1 Sm 10.5); it is said quite explicitly that Elisae (Elisha) employed a minstrel to bring on a prophetic trance (2 Kgs 3.15). False prophets are accused of using intoxicants to induce ecstasy (Is 28.7; see also Mi 2.11). Religious frenzy is found also among non-Israelites (Nm 24.2; 16; 1 Kgs 18.26-29) and may even have been introduced into Israel through foreign influence. This does not mean, however, that the phenomenon need be considered a purely natural happening when found in the authentic spokesmen of Israel; just as covenant, law, and kingship, although they originated outside of Israel, took on a unique aspect in Israel because they became the vehicle of the revelation of God's will and the accomplishment of His plan, so it was with prophetic ecstasy.

In the NT, Jesus is depicted as experiencing a kind of ecstasy at key moments such as his baptism (Mk 1.9-11) and his transfiguration (Mk 9.2-8). Ecstatic visions or trances befall Zechariah (Lk 1.67-69), Stephen (Acts 7.55), Peter (Acts 10.10; 11.5), and John (Rev 1.10). At Pentecost the gathered disciples are dramatically possessed by the Holy Spirit (Acts 2.2-4). The most important NT ecstatic figure, however, is Paul. Luke clearly presents Paul's conversion and other key events in his life as ecstatic (Acts 9.3-19; 16.9-10; 18.9-10; 22.17-21; 26.12-19). Most importantly, Paul's description in 2 Cor 12.1-4 of a man "caught up to the third heaven" where he "heard things that cannot be told" almost certainly refers to himself. In the latter text and elsewhere, Paul employs imagery and language strongly reminiscent of the depiction of "heavenly journeys" in the Jewish mysticism and apocalypticism of his time. This suggests that he may not have been innocent of training in practices that encouraged ecstasy. In 1 Corinthians, however, Paul exhibits a somewhat ambivalent attitude toward the ecstatic phenomena that were prevalent there, making a point of distinguishing the trance-like condition of the tongues-speakers from the prophets' ability to control their expressions (1 Cor 14). In both OT and NT, then, ecstatic phenomena may or may not be signs of possession by the Spirit of the true God; a key element of discernment is whether or not they function to create holiness, good order, and loving community in the relations of the people of God among themselves and with their neighbors.

Bibliography: T. CALLAN, "Prophecy and Ecstasy in Greco-Roman Religion and in 1 Corinthians," Novum Testamentum 27 (1985) 125–140. W. GRUDEM, The Gift of Prophecy in 1 Corinthians (Washington, D.C. 1982). P. MICHAELSON, "Ecstasy and Possession in Ancient Israel: A Review of Some Recent Contributions," Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament 2 (1989) 28–54. A. F. SEGAL, "Paul and Ecstasy," Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers 25 (Atlanta 1986). R. R. WILSON, "Prophecy and Ecstasy: A Reexamination," Journal of Biblical Literature 98 (1979) 321–337; Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (Philadelphia 1980).

[M. R. E. MASTERMAN/M. FROHLICH]

ECUADOR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A South American nation that takes its name from its geographical position on the equator, the Republic of Ecuador is bordered on the north by Colombia, on the east and south by Peru and on the west by the Pacific Ocean. Formed of a rim of coastal land, two humps of the Andes, and an area of green jungle of unknown size and unsurveyed resources called the Eastern Zone, Ecuador also includes the Galápagos Islands. The coastal plain to the west rises to a highlands region known as the sierra and then falls to rolling hills overtaken by jungle vegetation. Cotopaxi, a mountain located south of Quito in the Andes, is the tallest active volcano in the world.

Natural resources in Ecuador include petroleum reserves, timber, fish and hydropower, while agricultural production consists of bananas, coffee, cocoa, rice, plantains and sugarcane, as well as the raising of livestock. El Niño's effect on agricultural production coupled with unstable oil prices sent the economy into a tailspin during the late 1990s, but hopes were that rising oil prices would aid the new government in stabilizing Ecuador's financial situation in the next decade.

Colonial Period. Europeans first entered Ecuador with Francisco Pizarro in 1531 when he was travelling along the coast on his way to conquer Peru. While Pizarro moved to plunder Cajamarca, Peru, in 1532, the commander of his rear guard, Sebastián de Benalcázar, moved on the Incan kingdom of Quito. Although Pizarro intended that the lieutenant should also found a city there, Benalcázar left in pursuit of gold and emeralds rumored to be near Popayán. Flemish Franciscans, led by Jodoco RICKE, who had been the chaplains of the Benalcázar column, remained in a small settlement called San Miguel Capital: Quito. Size: 104,505 sq. miles. Population: 12,920,090 in 2000. Languages: Spanish; Quecha and other Amerindian languages are also spoken. Religions: 12,274,000 Catholics (95%); 387,600 Protestants (3%); 258,490 practice native religions.

ECUADOR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

de Quito, located near the present city of Quito. In December of 1534 the city of San Francisco de Asís de Quito was founded with 203 Spanish vecinos and two African servants. Guayaquil was begun the following year.

Several groups of religious soon made the new city their home. The Franciscans transferred their residence from San Miguel to San Francisco de Quito early in 1535; the Mercedarians established a friary in Quito friary in April 1537; and the Dominicans who also accompanied Benalcázar to the area established their residence there in June of 1541. The Augustinians began to construct their friary in Quito in the summer of 1573, while the Jesuits arrived in July 1586. As was natural, the first missionaries to enter the new territory selected the best spots in which to work. The Franciscans, drawing on their experience in Mexico, quickly spread out among the sierra tribes and were soon teaching almost two-thirds of the people in that area, including the famous Otavalo natives. The Mercedarians undertook organized work among the tribes of the coast, especially in the provinces of Manabí, Puná and Esmeraldas. The Dominicans, arriving in early 1541, finding Gonzalo Pizarro's expedition to the Land of the Cinnamon in the planning stages, sent one of their number, Fray Gaspar de CARVAJAL, along as one of the chaplains. Carvajal wrote an account of the discovery of the Amazon River, and the Dominicans remained to work among the tribes of the Ecuadorean jungle.

Central to each order's task of evangelizing the native people was the establishment of a school, most of which provided a free elementary-level education. The Franciscans, under Jodoco Ricke and inspired by Pedro de GANTE, founded in Quinto the Colegio de San Andrés in 1551, the first school to teach fine arts in Quito and a dominant influence on artists as far away as Colombia and Bolivia. More importantly, perhaps, the Colegio taught natives how to plow, harvest and care for domesticated livestock. In 1603 the Augustinians established the first faculty of theology in the University of San Fulgencio, while in 1622 the Jesuits of Quito opened the doors of the University of San Gregorio Magno, which specialized in the humanities and noted among its graduates such men as Juan de Velasco y Petroche, Eugenio de Santa Cruz y Espejo, and General Ignacio de Escandón. In the late 17th century the Dominicans opened the University of San Fernando, which would evolve into Santo Tomás, the first university in Quito to teach medicine, mathematics and civil jurisprudence. Among its graduates were José Joaquín Olmedo, Coronel Juan de Salinas and José Mejía Lequerica. In 1754 the Jesuits introduced the first printing press in their residence at Ambato.

Diocesan Organization. On Jan. 8, 1545, Pope Paul III erected the Diocese of Quito and named the chaplain of Francisco Pizarro, D. García Díaz Arias, as the first bishop. Díaz Arias was succeeded by another exemplary bishop, the learned Dominican Pedro de la Peña, consecrated in 1565. Although a zealous priest and a trained canonist, Peña's work was cut out for him. In an effort to organize the diocese, he visited his entire territory and in 1570 convoked the first diocesan synod, during which he outlined the basic laws and responsibilities, while at the same time, taking from the friars some native parishes which were then given to the diocesan clergy. During a second visita, Peña went in to the jungles to confirm the work of the synod and also to stabilize the reductions of the natives, thus founding most of the towns of modern Ecuador. He died in 1583.

Another outstanding community leader was Bishop Alonso de la PEÑA MONTENEGRO (d. 1687), who is considered the founder of Quinto's Christian economy. In his Itinerario para párrocos, the bishop furnished not only the usual instructions for his priests, but also established norms for the payment of indemnities incurred by employees while at work, a just wage, the shortening of the work for the natives on the haciendas; he even set down rules of basic hygiene. Notable, too, was the development of a guild system under the aegis of the Church that protected the rights and health of the workers. Some of these guilds continued to exist into the late 20th century, although diminished in influence.

After the evangelization of the natives living along the coast and in the sierra was completed, missionaries turned to the natives of the headwaters of the Amazon, a far more risky endeavor. In 1563 the Crown established a royal audiencia at Quito, practically coterminous with the bishopric of the same name. As the missions spread, so did the territory of Quito, and modern Ecuador. The Dominicans who had accompanied the expedition of Gonzalo Pizarro remained in the area, while the Mercedarians, Franciscans and Jesuits entered it in the late 16th century. While the Franciscans were moderately successful, especially after the foundation of the Mission College of Popayán, the work of the Jesuits was far more significant. Maynas-an area stretching along the courses of the upper Amazon down to the Solimões and well into eastern Peru along the Ucayali and Huallaga Rivers-became the mission field of such workers as Rafael Ferrer, Francisco de Figueroa and Samuel FRITZ. Unfortunately the Brazilians frequently raided the missions of the Solimões, and in 1767 the Quito Jesuits were expelled by the Crown from the remaining areas. In a subsequent decree, the Crown would entrust these missions to the Franciscan Mission College of Ocopa under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Lima and the viceroy of Peru. From this move Peru gained almost two-thirds of its present territory and Quito, which had governed the area for almost two centuries, retained only the memory of past dominion.

Revolutionary Period. By the end of the 18th century Quito had become a center of intellectual and political fermentation. Bishop José Pérez Calama (1790-92), friend and mentor of Father HIDALGO of Mexico, helped to reorganize the studies of the Dominican University of Santo Tomás in accord with the new philosophy. Santa Cruz y Espejo was spreading his political ideas of complete emancipation while the friars, restless under the ALTERNATIVA, longed for the day when they could enjoy free elections. José Joaquín de Olmedo was formulating the projects that would make him famous at the Cortes of Cádiz. Energized by new ideas, the Catholics in Quito were among the first to call out for independence from Spain. The first freedom manifesto was launched on Aug. 10, 1809, in the Quito Augustinian friary. Declaring the region independent of Spain, the bishop of Quito, José de CUERO Y CAICEDO, was elected vice president of the first patriotic junta, and later president. Priests and friars served as the first legislators and the first draft of a constitution was written by a priest, Miguel Rodríguez, disciple of Santa Cruz y Espejo.

Unfortunately, this very first attempt was to presage the fate in store for the Church before independence was ultimately won. The bishop of neighboring Cuenca (erected in 1769), a fanatical royalist, actively persecuted the patriotic priests of his own diocese and also sheltered the royalist priestly sympathizers of Quito. As the fortunes of the civil war swayed to and fro, Cuero y Caicedo was driven from Quito, and other nationalist leaders soon followed. The powers of Church leaders forced to flee the country were exercised by vicars who were no more able to maintain a neutral position than their bishops had been. Royalist opponents simply appointed a new vicar when they came to power so that at one time Cuenca had three vicars, each representing a different political faction and each persecuting the followers of the others. Ongoing military operations only added to the confusion and ruin. On May 24, 1822, the royalists were defeated on the slopes of Mt. Pichincha by Colombian forces that simply annexed the audiencia of Ecuador, forming Gran Colombia from Ecuador, Colombia and Venezuela. In 1830 increasing chaos prompted General Juan José Flores, a

Archdioceses	Suffragans
Cuenca	Azogues, Loja, Machala.
Guayaquil	Babahoyo.
Portoviejo	Santo Domingo de los Colorados.
Quito	Ambato, Guaranda, Ibarra,

Venezuelan mestizo and commander of the Colombian army in Ecuador, to declare Ecuador independent.

contains a military ordinariate.

Independent Ecuador. Previously subject either to Lima or Bogotá, in 1822 the audiencia of Quito entered a state of independence lacking any real sense of national consciousness. Without trained corps of political administrators or fixed boundaries, the new nation relied on the Church as the sole cohesive force. While political leaders were forced, from necessity, to use the Church and its institutions, they also felt constrained to bend it to the will of the state. The instrument of this control was the highly regalistic constitution of 1824. Under this document, all Church appointments originated with the state. The state also dictated what textbooks could be used in the seminaries. No Church decrees, not even the decisions of a bishop's court, could be executed unless they had first been "revised" by a state-appointed lawyer.

Perhaps the most insidious means adopted by the state to ruin the Church was the application of the recurso de fuerza to churchmen. In colonial Spain, the legal codes provided that anyone who felt his rights infringed upon had recourse to the civil courts, or fuerza. During this recourse whatever was causing the injury, whether a decree or some action of another, had to stop until the court arrived at a decision. Following independence, if a priest did not like an order from his ecclesiastical superior, or if a friar or nun was displeased with an order from his or her superior, recourse to the civil court was not only admitted but required, thereby nullifying Church authority. In Ecuador another wrinkle was added: if some person connected with the Church believed his or her superior to be withholding some merited promotion, recourse to civil courts could also be used to force the superior to divulge the reasons for the lack of such promotion. To compound the problem, the state frequently refused to fill vacant sees. Thus Cuenca went without a bishop from 1827 to 1841; Guayaquil, erected a bishopric in 1838, went without a bishop for ten years; and even Quito frequently suffered lapses of up to five years between bishops, although relations had been restored with the Holy See in 1836.

Under the new constitution the Church became the slave of the state and enthusiasm among the clergy consequently declined. Yet, despite this, the religious remained the best teachers in Ecuador and their schools were crowded.

Another threat to the Church came from Protestant pastors, especially Anglicans and Presbyterians from Great Britain. The Protestants were given full liberty of operation and when Bishop Arteta of Quito protested, he and his diocesan advisers were each fined 2,000 pesos.

The only effective voice of protest was that of Vicente SOLANO, a Franciscan who began a journalistic campaign in defense of the Church in 1828 and persisted until his death in 1865. While in no way subtle, a careful reading of Solano's works showed that he was in many ways far ahead of his times, especially in his judicious assessment of revolutionary leader Simon Bolívar, the evils of militarism and the patronato, a tradition allowing the government to choose Church leaders. While Solano defended the Church, Gabriel García Moreno (d. 1875) defended the people of Ecuador from the forces corrupting his country. He opened negotiations with the Holy See that led to the concordat of 1866, welcomed the first papal representative to Ecuador, installed good bishops such as CHECA Y BARBA and YEROVI, erected the dioceses of Ibarra, Bolívar, Loja and Portoviejo, reformed the religious orders, and recruited orders to undertake the education of Ecuador's young people. Moreno was largely responsible for encouraging the Daughters of Charity to staff the nation's hospitals and the Redemptorists to assist in teaching the natives.

Between 1875 and 1895 the Church continued to enjoy the protection of the state on the whole. New orders were invited to enter the country—the Salesians entering Ecuador in 1888—and in 1884 Julio María Matovalle founded the Association of Catholic Youth, a forerunner of Catholic Action. Although peace and harmony prevailed, tendencies toward liberalism were present, such as the presidential decree of 1891 that terminated the Church tithe and substituted a three percent tax on landed property. Alerted by such government actions, in June of 1892 Ecuador's bishops issued their manifesto on liberalism, a document generally regarded as one of the most notable of its kind.

The Modern Church and the State. In 1895, after a series of scandals by the conservative leadership, the Liberals came to power in the person of Eloy Alfaro, a friend of Juan Montalvo. For the next 15 years Alfaro became the dominant personality in the country, as Moreno had been previously, and the religious face of Ecuador was changed. The concordat with the Holy See was broken; foreign religious orders were forbidden to enter the country and, for a time, even individual foreign priests were excluded; education was placed under complete state control; the property tax was abolished without restoring the tithe; the old law of 1824 of the patronato was restored; and the consecration of the country to the Sacred Heart was officially revoked. In 1904 religious were forbidden to administer their own property and four years later it was confiscated without compensation. In 1906 complete separation of Church and state was decreed with a guarantee of religious liberty; however the Catholic Church was discriminated against and denied the right of incorporation before the law. In 1902 marriage had become a civil ceremony; in 1910 divorce was permitted by mutual consent. The legalization of divorce, as well as a 1935 decree declaring the Church to be without legal representation or protection, caused a near revolution, and the government was forced to negotiate with Rome for a new understanding.

Catholic University of Ecuador residence hall.

On July 24, 1937 a modus vivendi was signed between the Holy See and Ecuador that settled many of the main difficulties and ushered in a period of harmony. Diplomatic representation was resumed after a lapse of more than 40 years, the Church was permitted legal representation under certain circumstances, religious were paid a small amount in compensation for the property taken from them in 1908, and the Holy See was again allowed to appoint bishops directly after informing the government of their choice. The constitution of March 6, 1945, recognized complete separation of Church and state. It also permitted divorce even though this has since been rendered a little more difficult.

The Modern Church. Increasing poverty resulted in political upheaval throughout much of the mid-20th century, and the loss of a war with Peru in 1941 did little to improve the country's stability. José Maria Velasco Ibarra ruled the country during much of the period 1944–1972, and the constitution of 1945 was suspended by a military junta that took power in July of 1963. Oil was discovered in the region in the 1970s, although the wealth it generated did not trickle down to the poorer classes. A series of failed and often corrupt governments ended in 1988 with the election of Rodrigo Borja Cevallos, who nationalized the oil companies. A coalition government in 1992 attempted to institute free-market policies in the country, but cuts in social policies sparked discontent and resulted in the election of populist president Abdala Bucaram (known as "El Loco") in 1996. Despite, or perhaps because of such constant political upheaval, by the end of the 20th century the government had once again established strong ties to the Church, which was considered a stabilizing force.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 Ecuador contained 1,109 parishes, tended by 975 diocesan and 820 religious priests, while its 300 brothers tended to institutions of learning and 4,800 sisters operated schools, hospitals and dispensaries. Education was the greatest preoccupation of the Church, and the government supported the efforts of Catholic schools, although religion was not taught in state-run schools. In addition to primary and secondary schools, the Church operated Catholic training schools for teachers with official accreditation as well as the Catholic University of Quito.

Interior of Catholic Church, with statues standing on gold leaf altar, Ecuador. (©The Purcell Team/CORBIS)

During the 1990s Church leaders actively assisted in moderating several political standoffs. German-born Ecuadorian bishop, Emile Stehle, served as a mediator in several hostage situations involving a Marxist guerilla group active near the border with Colombia. In 1999 Church leaders aided in peace talks that resolved a border conflict with Peru that had escalated into war in January of 1995 after Ecuadorian troops invaded a northern section of Peruvian jungle territory disputed for over a century. Present at the signing of the peace accords, a representative of the Vatican expressed Pope John Paul II's appreciation for providing "an opening to lasting peace." Ending the conflict allowed Ecuadorian bishops to return to addressing the humanitarian needs of a social fabric stressed by a long-running economic downturn, and criticism was leveled at President Bucaram for his decision to allocate money to foreign debt repayment rather than social programs. Bucaram was ultimately impeached on allegations of corruption in 1997 and Fabian Alarcon appointed his successor. Social issues such as abortion rights and an increase in crime due to drug trafficking continued to be addressed by Church leaders through the Latin American Bishops' Council (CELAM), although the Church's efforts to aid the government in implementing a welfare program resulted in several nonfatal bombings in 1998. Although the poverty of rural areas of Ecuador during the 1960s had provided Protestant evangelical groups with inroads to spread their faith, the Catholic Church was still the professed faith of the majority of Ecuadorians by 2000.

Bibliography: L. LINKE, Ecuador (3d ed. New York 1960). J. TOBAR DONOSO, La Iglesia ecuatoriana en el siglo XIX (Quito 1934); La Iglesia modeladora de la nacionalidad (Quito 1953). J. M. VARGAS, Historia de la Iglesia en el Ecuador durante el patronato español (Quito 1962). I. ALONSO et al., La Iglesia en Venezuela y Ecuador (Madrid 1962).

[A. S. TIBESAR/EDS.]

ECUMENICAL DIALOGUES

Following the Second Vatican Council, scores of international and national commissions were established to forward the work of ecumenical dialogue, usually with doctrinal questions as the focus of their concern. For the most part, these dialogues were conducted on a "bilateral" basis, i.e., engaging two churches or confessional families at a time. The Roman Catholic Church has been an active participant in such dialogues, serving as one of the partners in over a third of them. During the 1960s and 1970s, officially sponsored dialogues between churches or confessional families of churches became a prominent component of the movement toward Christian unity. During that time their number increased and their published reports multiplied.

Alongside the conciliar movement and other important components of the ecumenical movement, "bilateral dialogues" continued into the 2000s and revealed further developments of its internal dynamics. From their inception the ecumenical dialogues were aimed at the resolution of issues dividing the church through convergences reaching toward a consensus based on clearer understanding, the exchange of insights, and the discovery of new perspectives that would enable the churches to reappropriate their common Christian heritage. Implicit in this goal was the related but further purpose of moving beyond the attainment of doctrinal consensus to the translation of these agreements into an actual living communion of the churches by way of concrete expressions of church fellowship. In order for this to occur, it became increasingly clear that the findings of the dialogues had to move through a process of "reception" by the churches who sponsored them, and on to decision at appropriate levels of authority. As a preliminary to reception, the churches had to develop adequate means to review and assess the dialogue findings and to respond to them in an official way.

During the 1980s, the churches in certain cases began this new task of official response. The most striking example was provided by hundreds of official responses to the LIMA TEXT on "Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry," published in 1982 by the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches as the fruit of decades of multilateral dialogues.

Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue. Among bilaterals, the first ANGLICAN-ROMAN CATHOLIC INTERNA-TIONAL COMMISSION (ARCIC) took the lead with the publication in 1981 of a final report on the work that it had begun in 1970. This marked the most advanced stage to be reached by any bilateral in which the Roman Catholics had participated. ARCIC I carried out its work in stages, publishing as it proceeded discrete reports of its findings concerning eucharistic doctrine, ministry, and ordination, and also authority in the church. Several years after each of these reports appeared, ARCIC I provided a further "elucidation" for each in which it responded to the various comments, queries, and criticisms its initial statements had provoked. All of this material, plus new material on primatial authority and infallibility, was brought together as a composite whole and submitted to the Anglican and Roman Catholic Churches in the form of "The Final Report."

Work of this significance drew comments from many Anglican and Roman Catholic quarters as it unfolded. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in Rome, as one instance, had not hesitated to offer its observations from time to time, and it did so again on the work as a whole once "The Final Report" itself was published. Such comments as were received generally focused on specific items of appreciation or critical reservation. But it was obvious that a weightier, overall assessment would also have to be made by the churches.

Thus on March 17, 1982, Johannes Cardinal Willebrands, president of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, wrote to all the episcopal conferences of the Roman Catholic Church, seeking their appraisal of the work. In his letter, the cardinal pointed out that "the process of evaluation is not one that can be carried out in a short time; the results of over ten years of dialogue call for serious study by the Church." The secretariat asked the episcopal conferences to examine the report as to whether it was consonant in substance with the faith of the Catholic Church. At the same time, Anglican authorities requested all the provinces of the Anglican Communion to undertake a similar study and to respond to a parallel, counterpart question. It was envisaged that this process of evaluation by the Anglican and Roman Catholic Communions would culminate in 1988, the year in which the Anglican bishops of the world would assemble again for a meeting of the Lambeth Conference. In the four years following this request for evaluation, approximately 20 Roman Catholic episcopal conferences submitted their responses to Rome and a similar number were submitted to the Anglican Consultative Council. The National Conference of Catholic Bishops in the United States published its response in 1984; the General Convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States issued its response in 1985. Other notable responses included those of the episcopal conferences of England and Wales, of France and of Scotland (all in 1985); and the responses of the General Synod of the Church of England and of the Church of Ireland (1986).

While this process of evaluation and response went on, the work of ecumenical dialogue between Anglicans and Roman Catholics also continued. In 1982 Pope John Paul II and the archbishop of Canterbury, His Grace, the Rt. Hon. Robert Runcie, issued a "Common Declaration," thereby establishing the second Anglican-Catholic International Commission (ARCIC II). To it they entrusted the task of continuing the work already begun with a view toward the eventual resolution of the outstanding doctrinal differences which still separated Anglicans and Roman Catholics. The new commission was also charged with the task of studying "all that hinders the mutual recognition of the ministries of our Communions, and to recommend what steps will be necessary when, on the basis of our unity in faith, we are able to proceed toward the restoration of full communion."

In July of 1985 Cardinal Willebrands wrote to the co-chairman of ARCIC II, suggesting significant ways in which progress toward this mutual recognition might be accomplished, notwithstanding the negative judgment Pope Leo XIII had reached concerning the validity of Anglican ordinations in the papal bull of 1896, APOSTOLICAE CURAE. The cardinal wrote:

If at the end of this process of evaluation the Anglican Communion as such is able to state formally that it professes the same faith concerning essential matters where doctrine admits no difference and which the Roman Catholic Church also affirms are to be believed and held concerning the Eucharist and the Ordained Ministry, the Roman Catholic Church would acknowledge the possibility that in the context of such a profession of faith the texts of the (1552 Anglican) Ordinal might no longer retain that nativa indoles (''native character") which was at the basis of Pope Leo's judgment. That is to say that, if both Communions were so clearly one in their faith concerning Eucharist and Ministry, the context of this discussion would indeed be changed. In that case such a profession of faith could open the way to a new consideration of the Ordinal (and of subsequent rites of ordination introduced in Anglican Churches), a consideration that could lead to a new evaluation by the Catholic Church of the sufficiency of these Anglican rites as far as concerns future ordinations. Such a study would be concerned with the rites in themselves, prescinding at this stage from the question of the continuity in the apostolic succession of the ordaining bishop. In our view, such a possibility . . . could do much to assist the climate of the whole discussion . . . [and] would be the strongest possible stimulus to find ways to overcome the difficulties which will hinder a mutual recognition of ministries.

In a contemporaneous exchange of letters between Pope John Paul II, the archbishop of Canterbury, and Cardinal Willebrands (December 1984 to June 1986) concerning the ordination of women, it was also agreed that this topic should continue to remain a matter of discussion in the Anglican–Roman Catholic dialogue, with the most immediate question being how the ordination of women in some parts of the Anglican Communion affects progress toward fuller communion between it and the Roman Catholic Church.

As the agenda for dialogue thus continued to expand, ARCIC II in 1986 completed work on its first report, entitled "Salvation and the Church," and published it in 1987. This report focused on the relation of the doctrine of salvation to faith, to JUSTIFICATION, to good works, and to the doctrine of the Church. ARCIC II also produced "Church as Communion" (1988), "Life in Christ: Morals, Communion and the Church'' (1994), and "The Gift of Authority," (1999). Being at the most advanced stage of all ecumenical relations in which the Roman Catholic Church is engaged, the bilateral relationship with the Anglican Communion clearly displayed the characteristics that could come to mark other bilateral dialogues later in the 1980s and 1990s. First, doctrine remained at the heart of the dialogue, though the emphasis gradually shifted from the overcoming of past doctrinal disputes toward setting forth a common profession of the faith. Second, as the findings of dialogue mounted and achieved a certain "critical mass," they called forth serious evaluation and official response from the churches engaged in them. In 1991, the Holy See published its evaluation of the Final Report. By 1994 clarifications of some of the questions raised in this response enabled Cardinal Edward Cassidy, then president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, to say that "no further work" was necessary at this time on the themes of Eucharist and ministry.

Third, the agenda of the dialogue was extended to include consideration of concrete steps that could be taken by the churches to effect new and further degrees of actual ecclesial communion between them. In the final stage, the churches would need to find ways to authorize and ratify such steps, thus actualizing a fuller church unity.

Other bilateral dialogues. A number of other dialogues conducted at the international level appeared as though they might move in a similar direction to that taken by the Anglican-Roman Catholic relations. Several have continued to exhibit a wide-ranging survey quality, with discussions touching on numerous subjects and sometimes uncovering important findings in one area or another. They seemed to be in the process of accumulating particular agreements, which over time could coalesce into a whole requiring the response of the churches. An example of such a particular agreement, in this case concerning the Eucharist, is found in the 1977 report of the dialogue co-sponsored by the Holy See and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Entitled "The Presence of Christ in the Church and the World," this report surveyed five major areas: Christ's relationship to the church; the teaching authority of the church; the presence of Christ in the world; the Eucharist; and the ministry. Phase II of this dialogue was initiated in 1984, taking up a similarly broad theme: "The Church: The People of God, the Body of Christ, the Temple of the Spirit." Under this theme the bilateral commission investigated such questions as whether there is a God-given structure to the church and prepared a common affirmation of the sole mediatorship of Christ.

The commission that the Holy See co-sponsored with the World Methodist Council (WMC) also set its work in wide parameters. Its reports were timed to coincide with the quinquennial meeting of the WMC and named for the sites in which these meetings were held. Thus after its initial Denver report (1971) and subsequent Dublin report (1976), it went on to issue the Honolulu report in 1981 and the Nairobi report in 1986. The two earlier reports had a certain omnibus quality, providing an overall view of matters of common interest and concern to Methodists and Catholics. The two that followed were more thematically organized. The theme of the Honolulu report was "Toward an Agreed Statement on the Holy Spirit." It took up such matters as: the work of the Holy Spirit; the Holy Spirit, Christian experience and authority; Christian moral decisions; and Christian marriage. The Nairobi report was entitled "Towards a Statement on the Church" and dealt with: the nature of the church; church and sacraments; the call to unity; ways of being one church; structures of ministry; and the Petrine office. This dialogue has produced "The Apostolic Tradition" (1991), "The Word of Life: A Statement on Revelation and Faith" (1996), and "Speaking the Truth in Love" (2001).

The Disciples of Christ-Roman Catholic Dialogue also carried out its work on a five-year basis, completing a series of annual meetings in 1981 with the issuance of an "Agreed Account" of the work done. The sessions, in sequence, were devoted to the following: the nature of the church and elements of its unity; baptism; gift and call in the search for unity; faith and tradition in the life of the church; the dynamics of unity and division; and apostolicity and catholicity in the visible unity of the church. A second five-year series of annual sessions began in 1983 with discussion more tightly focused on the single overall theme, "The Church as Koinonia in Christ."

The Pentecostal-Roman Catholic Conversations carried out six series of meeting, issuing a "Final Report" at the end of the first five. The first of these reports dealt with subjects such as baptism in the Holy Spirit, Christian initiation and the gifts, public worship and the gifts, prayer, and praise. The second dealt with speaking in tongues, faith and experience, Scripture and Tradition, Tradition and traditions, perspectives on Mary, ministry in the church, ordination, apostolic succession, and recognition of ministries. The third dealt with understandings of Koinonia. The fourth provided a text "Evangelization, Proselytism and Common Witness."

The Evangelical-Roman Catholic Dialogue on Mission held sessions from 1977 to 1984 and published its report under the overall theme of "mission." The following subjects were addressed: revelation and authority; the nature of mission; the gospel of salvation; response in the Holy Spirit—the church—and the gospel; the gospel and culture; and the possibilities of common witness. This last topic was also the subject of a major report on "Common Witness" published in 1981 by the Joint Working Group of the World Council of Churches and the Holy See. This study document explored the common ground that enables Christian witness to be a common witness and also discussed occasions and possibilities for the realization of common witness.

Note also must be taken of two international commissions founded in the 1980s that demonstrate the still expanding circle of bilateral dialogues. The International Theological Colloquium between Baptists and Catholics began a five-year series of annual sessions in 1984 under the general theme "Our Common Witness to the World." It was conducted under the auspices of the Baptist World Alliance and the Holy See. The goal of these sessions was set as a mutual understanding of similarities and differences in Baptist and Roman Catholic doctrinal, ecclesial, pastoral, and mission concerns.

The International Catholic-Orthodox Theological Commission was established by the Holy See and 14 autocephalous Orthodox Churches and began its work in 1980. Its first report, published in 1982, "The Mystery of the Church and the Eucharist in the Light of the Most Holy Trinity" was followed by a discussion of the sacraments of Christian initiation, reported in "Faith, Sacraments and the Unity of the Church" (1987), and by a discussion of "The Sacrament of Order (Ordination) in the Sacramental Structure of the Church, with Particular Reference to the Importance of Apostolic Succession for the Sanctification and Unity of the People of God" (1988). The dialogue produced "Uniatism: Method of Union of the Past, and the Present Search for Full Communion" (1993).

Even in a review summary such as this, the several dialogues reveal interesting differences in the themes they select and the way they elaborate them. In many cases, it appears that these differences reflect the historical traditions of thought and teaching brought to the bilaterals by the partner churches along with their particular preoccupations. At the same time, there are certain similarities among the dialogues about which it is possible to generalize. It can be observed that many of these bilaterals were engaged in a survey of the ecumenical terrain and took a broad avenue of approach. Rather than focusing sharply on one or another major neuralgic issue, they explored numerous points at issue, sometimes quite insightfully but not with the intent of providing exhaustive, systematic treatments. Their reports underscored the principles on which agreement could be based and were selective in treating specific details. They are generally succinct in the statement of their findings. Many have not yet drawn their findings together into composite and coherent wholes demanding evaluation and official response by the sponsoring churches. Neither have they, for the most part, advanced specific proposals for action by the churches that would create new degrees of church fellowship. Rather they appear to lay a part of the foundation on which in the future such proposals could rest.

Lutheran-Catholic dialogues. The U.S. Lutheran-Catholic Dialogue, which engendered 11 volumes of scholarly studies along with its reports was something of an exception to these generalizations. So, too, was the International Lutheran-Roman Catholic Joint Commission in its pursuit of a distinctive course. This joint commission was established in 1973 by the Lutheran World Foundation and the Holy See and completed its first period of work in 1984. Unlike ARCIC and the U.S. Lutheran-Catholic Dialogue, it did not in this period broach the topics of primatial authority, teaching authority, infallibility, or justification by faith. These important matters remain on the agenda. It did issue three briefer statements: "Ways to Community" (1980-81), "All Under One Christ" (1980, marking the 450th anniversary of the Augsburg Confession), and "Martin Luther: Witness to Jesus Christ" (1983, marking the 500th anniversary of the birth of the Reformer). In addition to these it produced three book length reports: "The Eucharist" (1978) "The Ministry in the Church" (1981), and "The Church and Justification," (1993). It took up and advanced ecumenical discussion on these pivotal subjects that engage every bilateral at some point. In another major report it undertook a task that no prior dialogue had ever attempted. In "Facing Unity: Models, Forms and Phases of Catholic-Lutheran Church Fellowship'' (1985) it sought to set forth in some detail an integral process whereby through mutual acts of recognition and mutual exchange the churches could advance toward the community of professed faith, a common sacramental life, and unified structures of decision-making and pastoral ministry. In significant ways the joint commission grounded its proposals for the future on models of church life drawn from the ancient church. In doing so it hoped its proposals would obviate the pitfalls encountered by some other models and forms of church union, many of which it reviewed. It also hoped its proposals would combine essential values found in congregational and episcopal forms of church order. This dialogue also moved from dialogue to authoritative decision by proposing a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification. This text was not itself a dialogue, but a formal distilation of the results of the dialogues on this theme. It was evaluated by the member churches of the Lutheran World Federation and by the Holy See. In 1998 the two communities agreed on the content of the Joint Declaration, and the formal signing took place on October 31, 1999 in Augsburg, Germany. This process demonstrates another level of church decision making bringing the two churches into a deeper level of communion.

In a particular way this last named Joint Declaration signaled the fact that as shared ecumenical research began to meet the challenges of past divisions, so shared ecumenical imagination must strive to meet the needs of the Christian future.

See Also: FAITH AND ORDER COMMISSION.

Bibliography: J. F. PUGLISI and S. J. VOICU, A Bibliography of Interchurch and Interreligious Theological Dialogues (Rome 1984); First Supplement (Rome 1985); Second Supplement (Rome 1986). H. MEYER and L. VISCHER, eds., Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level (New York/Geneva 1984). W. RUSCH, H. MEYER, and J. GROS, eds., Growth in Agreement II, (Geneva 2000). J. GROS and J. BURGESS, eds., Building Unity (New York 1989). J. BURGESS, and J. GROS, eds., Growing Consensus (New York 1995).

[J. F. HOTCHKIN]

ECUMENICAL DIRECTORY

The full title of the "Ecumenical Directory" is Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism. It was approved by Pope John Paul II on March 25, 1993 and published on June 8 by the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity as a general executive decree of the universal Catholic Church. It supplants the Directory for the Application of the Decisions of the Second Vatican Council Concerning Ecumenical Matters, issued during the pontificate of Pope Paul VI.

Development of the Ecumenical Directory. When the archbishop of Rouen, J. M. Martin, presented the draft of the Decree on Ecumenism (Unitatis redintegratio) to the Second Vatican Council, he promised that it would be followed by a directory explaining in greater detail the application of its decisions. The Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, charged with the task of making good on this promise, produced the Directory in stages. In 1967 Pope Paul VI ordered the publication of Part I of the Directory, and in 1970 he approved Part II. The first called for setting up ecumenical commissions in Catholic dioceses and episcopal conferences. It addressed the validity of baptism conferred in other churches and ecclesial communities, the fostering of spiritual ecumenism, and the sharing of spiritual resources (prayer, worship, and sacraments) with other Christians. The second par addressed "Ecumenism in Higher Education" and, in a particular way, in theological faculties and colleges.

The publication of the new Code of Canon Law in 1983 prompted a revision and updating of the Directory. Addressing the Roman Curia in 1985, John Paul II said:

> Every particular church, every bishop, ought to have solicitude for unity and ought to promote the ecumenical movement. The new Code of Canon Law recently promulgated recalled this in a clearer than usual fashion, because it is a matter of Christ's will (Canon 755). But the church of Rome and its bishop have to attend to this care in a quite special way. . . . It is therefore useful that in the field of ecumenism we take a look at the path which we have so far covered in the direction of unity and draw from its enlivening spirit. Among the initiatives taken within the Catholic Church I recall first of all the Ecumenical Directory. . . . This directory will need to be progressively updated in coming months, account being taken of the new Code of Canon Law and the progress of the ecumenical movement which the directory is directly intended to serve.

Once begun, it became evident that a revision of the existing directory would not be enough. A new directory that would encompass a wider scope, be more specific and concrete, and recognize the significant diversity found among the particular churches was called for. The new directory had the same aim as its predecessor, namely, the advancement of Vatican II's ecumenical vision of the Church, but it was a difficult challenge. As John Paul II remarked "it is impossible to translate perfectly into canonical language the conciliar image of the Church" though that image must always be referred to as the "primary pattern" that canonical language ought to "express insofar as it can" (Sacrae disciplinae leges, 1983).

Outline of the Directory. The directory is addressed first to the bishops of the Catholic Church and, through them, to all the faithful, and to members of other churches and ecclesial bodies who, "it is hoped," will find it useful. The first of its five parts reaffirms the commitment of the Catholic Church to ecumenism based on the principles of the Second Vatican Council, and explains that a real and certain communion bonds the Catholic Church with other Christian churches and ecclesial communities. It emphasizes the duty of all Christians to work and pray that division be healed and overcome. Part two describes the structures, beginning with the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christianity Unity, diocesan officers, and other personnel within the Catholic Church, that are charged with promoting ecumenism. Part three deals with the aims and methods of inspiring Catholics, especially those engaged in pastoral work, with an ecumenical outlook. It identifies categories of people who are to be formed, as well as theological faculties, catechetical institutes, and other centers that must accept the responsibility for this formation. Part four expands on the communion that exists among Christians on the basis of their common baptism. This section describes various ways that Christians share in prayer, worship, and other spiritual activities. Part four also incorporates new guidelines on mixed marriages. Part five speaks of various forms of ecumenical cooperation, dialogue and common witness, and the principles that should guide ecumenical activities. It singles out Bible study, the adoption of common liturgical texts, ecumenical cooperation in catechesis, collaborative research, and collaboration in social and cultural programs.

Pope John Paul II has cited the Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism on several occasions. It is clear from his 1995 encyclical Ut unum sint that he sees the directory as providing both the inspiration and framework for ecumenism in the Catholic Church.

Bibliography: "Directory for the Application of the Decisions of the Second Vatican Council concerning Ecumenical Matters, Ad Totam Ecclesiam (14 May 1967) in Vatican Council II," The Conciliar and Postconciliar Documents, ed. A. FLANNERY, (Northport, N.Y. 1987), 483–501. Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism, 25 March 1993 (Vatican City 1993). Also U.S. Catholic Conference Publishing Services (Washington, D.C. 1993); Origins 23:9 (29 July 1993): 129; 131–160; L'Osservatore Romano (16 June 1993): i-xvii. For the text of Ut unum sint, see Acta Apostolica Sedis 87 (1995): 921–982.

[J. F. HOTCHKIN]

ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The word "ecumenical" is derived from the Greek word oikumene, meaning the whole of the inhabited world (Acts 17.6; Mt 24.14; Heb 2.5). In traditional Catholic usage it means a general or universal council of the Church. In the 20th century, ecumenical has come to designate the movement that seeks to overcome the scandal of divisions and achieve reconciliation among all Christians. This article deals primarily with the Catholic perspectives and approaches toward the ecumenical movement, as shown in authoritative statements and approved activities, and with the general principles involved.

Since the beginning of the Church there have been heresies and schisms. The Church's attempts to reunite them pertains to general Church history. During the first half of the 20th century, the main impetus in the ecumenical movement came from Protestant church leaders. While representatives of Orthodox churches frequently participated in ecumenical gatherings, Roman Catholic participation was officially restricted although occasionally permitted. This early 20th-century ecumenical movement has two characteristics unique in Christian history: (1) it includes the majority of Orthodox Churches and Protestant communities; (2) it centers in the WORLD COUN-CIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), which is itself a convergence of three organizations, the INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL, LIFE AND WORK, and FAITH AND ORDER.

At the Edinburgh Missionary Conference (1910), conventionally regarded as the birth of the 20th-century Ecumenical Movement, Anglican and Protestant missionaries became more deeply convinced that divisions among Christians were a powerful obstacle to the spread of Christianity. They recognized hostility, contentions, and even differences among Christians as scandals and realized that many causes of these divisions seemed irrelevant in non-Christian lands. The International Missionary Council was formed not only to spread information about effective missionary methods, but also to lessen the scandal of Christian divisions by avoiding competition in non-Christian countries. In 1925 the Life and Work Conference at Stockholm studied the application of Christian principles to international relations and to social, industrial, and economic life. Almost simultaneously the Faith and Order Conferences began to discuss doctrinal matters, with a view to unity in faith and order. From these three organizations was formed in 1948 the WCC, with headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland.

The beginnings were not free from confusion and ambiquity about assumptions and aims. The missionary movement tended to assume that "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God" was independent of all denominational tenets. The Life and Work movement coined the phrase: "service unites but doctrine divides;" and hence avoided doctrinal discussions. There was a question of whether those planning the Faith and Order Conference at Lausanne (1925) were tacitly assuming that Christians are unaware of the kind of Church unity wanted by Christ and must discover it by discussions, and whether they envisioned a league or federation of independent churches based on doctrinal compromise.

Ambiguities of this type probably accounted for Pope Benedict XV's courteous refusal of an invitation from the EPISCOPAL CHURCH in the U.S. (May 1919) to participate in a Faith and Order meeting. After the Life and Work Conference at Lausanne (1927), Pope PIUS XI issued the encyclical, Mortalium animos, (Jan. 6, 1928) on true religious unity, in which he asserted unequivocally that unity must be based upon acceptance of Christ's entire revelation, that doctrinal compromise is utterly inadmissible, and that the Church of Christ cannot be a federation of independent bodies holding different doctrines. The pope forbade Catholics to give any support to such ideas. He also made clear statements on the unity of the Church. The Orthodox delegation at the Lausanne Conference spoke in the same vein as Pius XI, objecting that some reports were based on compromises between conflicting ideas and meanings. This group asserted firmly that compromise has no place in matters of faith and conscience. Pius XI's encyclical caused disappointment at the time among non-Catholic ecumenists. Since then, however, some prominent ecumenists have admitted that Pius XI aided the movement, and have noted the danger of substituting well-intentioned friendliness for unity in truth.

Development. Since 1927 the movement for union among non-Catholics has developed greatly, with many repudiations of any idea of compromise in faith. Faith and Order Conferences at Edinburgh (1937) and Lund (1952) increased realization of the depth of doctrinal differences and of the tenacity of denominational traditions. Paradoxically, efforts at unity have increased denominational loyalties. World associations have been developed by Anglicans, Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples of Christ, Lutherans, Methodists, Pentocostalists, and Presbyterians. These world "confessional" associations had the immediate effect of increasing denominational consciousness; but in the long run they may enable unions to be formed on a wider scale.

Two successful endeavors from the ecumenical movement are: (1) that of Anglicans, Congregationalists, Methodists, and Presbyterians, which resulted in the Church of South India, (1949); (2) that of the Congregationalists, Reformed, and Lutherans, which resulted in the UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST in the U.S. Negotiations have occurred frequently elsewhere, but actual mergers have been comparatively rare, especially between episcopal and non-episcopal churches. Part of the difficulty in arranging mergers resides in nondoctrinal factors, such as historical traditions, established institutions, and differing customs and ways; but most of it stems from divergent doctrinal convictions.

The Lund Conference of the WCC (1952) listed doctrinal differences under the following heads: definition and limits of the Church; Church continuity and unity; goal of the reunion movement; number and nature of the sacraments and their relation to Church membership; scripture and tradition; infallibility; and priesthood and sacrifice. After stating the diverse views held on all these topics, the conference concluded that the method of "comparative ecclesiology," which is one of comparing and contrasting different convictions, had been pursued to its limits and offered no prospects of arriving at reconciliation. It decided to select the following four main points and study them for at least ten years: union of Christ and the Church; tradition and traditions; ways of worship (liturgy); and institutionalism (the Church as a sociological entity, with its law and customs).

Catholic Attitude. The situation changed so radically that many of the papal strictures of 1928 were no longer applicable.

Pius XI. Pius XI had great interest in the Orthodox Churches. Between 1922 and 1939 he issued 23 documents concerning them. He reorganized the Pontifical Oriental Institute, entrusted it to the Jesuits, and provided it with a new building and a large library. He also established the Ethiopian, Ruthenian, and Russian colleges in Rome. In Catholic universities and major seminaries he instituted courses in Orthodox theology and spirituality. To the Benedictines the pope commended a special interest in the Orthodox, which they manifested by founding the monastery at Amay, Belgium (transferred to CHEVE-TOGNE in 1939). Repeatedly, Pius XI urged esteem for Orthodox theology, spirituality, rights, and customs. He renewed Benedict XV's condemnation of attempts at "Latinization." In his address to the Italian University Catholic Federation (Jan. 10, 1927) the Holy Father asserted principles of universal application in his references to the Orthodox when he declared that knowledge and fraternal charity are essential preliminaries to reunion and that ignorance and prejudice were responsible for past failures.

Five unofficial but approved Catholic observers attended the Faith and Order Conference at Edinburgh (1937).

Holy Office Instructions. Shortly after the formation of the World Council of Churches (1948), the Holy Office issued an "Instruction on the Ecumenical Movement" (1949). This document contained several warnings and indicated lines of conduct for Catholics. It did not attempt a systematic treatment of ecumenical problems, but accorded the movement formal recognition, declared it of serious interest to the whole Catholic Church, and encouraged Catholics, especially priests, to pray for its success and participate actively in it. The instruction encouraged pastoral letters to educate the faithful on these questions. It exhorted bishops to keep well informed on the subject, to guard against possible dangers while promoting ecumenism and appointing suitable priests to study it.

The instruction permitted Catholics, with the approval of competent ecclesiastical authorities, to meet non-Catholics as equals and discuss matters of faith and morals, each group explaining its own teachings. These gatherings were permitted to begin or end with the common recitation of the Lord's Prayer or some other prayer approved by the Catholic Church.

For interdiocesan, national, or international conferences, according to the instructions, permission of the Holy See is necessary. Within dioceses, bishops must regulate these activities and permit none but competent priests to engage in theological discussions. In dialogues, Catholics were told to present the Church's doctrines in their entirety, to avoid whittling down the faith or giving any semblance of indifference to truth.

This document marked a stage in the Church's attitude toward the ecumenical movement, which, it said, 'should daily assume a more significant place within the Church's universal pastoral care.''

Participation in Ecumenical Meetings. One hindrance to Catholic ecumenical activities was removed in 1950 when the Central Committee of the WCC issued at Toronto a very significant declaration, entitled "The Ecclesiological Significance of the World Council of Churches," which stated that membership in the WCC does not imply that member churches regard other member churches as "churches in the true and full sense of the word," although they do "recognize in other churches elements of the true Church." This document made clear that the WCC is a purely consultative body and allayed fears lest it make unacceptable assumptions about the nature of the Church. From the beginning, the basis of the World Council of Churches has been acceptance of Christ as God and Savior.

Catholic observers attended the Faith and Order Conferences at Lund (1952); at Oberlin, Ohio (1957); and at St. Andrews, Scotland (1960). At the General Assembly of the World Council of Churches at New Delhi, India (1961), five official Catholic observers were present. Five were also present at the Faith and Order Conference in Montreal (1963), along with 15 Catholic visitors from the North American continent, and about 30 in the press corps. The presence of these officially approved observers indicated a friendly interest by the Catholic Church in the proceedings of the World Council of Churches and its organs. The invitation extended to them, and the friendliness shown to them, demonstrated that the World Council of Churches did not intend to exclude the Catholic Church from its vision of the ultimate unity of all Christians, but on the contrary wished to include the Catholic Church in its counsels and plans.

Catholic Ecumenical Organizations. Other evidences of Catholic interest in ecumenism include the formation during the first half of the 20th century of institutes and associations to promote the union of all Christians. At first interest centered on the Orthodox, but later widened to include all divisions among Christians. This was true of the Benedictine Priory at Chevetogne; the Dominican center, Istina, near Paris; the institute of Byzantine studies in Holland; and the Eastern Churches Quarterly, published by English Benedictines at Ramsgate Abbey.

Germany. In Germany the "High Church" movement among some Lutherans; the Nazi persecution of Lutherans, Reformed, and Catholics alike; and the homogeneity of the German forms of Protestantism facilitated a rapprochement, which was brought to a focus by the UNA SANCTA movement. After World War II a group of Catholic and Lutheran scholars began meeting for theological and historical discussions under the leadership of Abp. Lorenz Jaeger of Paderborn.

France. In France Yves Congar, OP, had weighty influence, especially because of his book, Divided Christendom, translated into English (1939). Abp. Paul Couturier, who began with a special interest in the Orthodox, in 1932, propagated what he called "spiritual ecumenism," urging prayer for the sanctification of different Christian groups and "for the unity which Christ wills and by the means He chooses." This prayer proved widely acceptable. The WCC, especially its Faith and Order Commission, showed growing awareness of the intractable nature of sectarian divisions and emphasized more and more that one essential means of attaining unity lay in humble and universal prayer.

English-speaking World. In these lands enthusiasm for ecumenism developed slowly. Memories of civil and social disabilities, the hard struggle to maintain the faith and build educational institutions, Anglican convictions about the continuity of the Church of England and the ensuing controversies, a certain tradition of suspicion of "unrealistic" proposals for "corporate reunion," the outstanding service of many individual converts to the faith, lesser contact with the Orthodox, and the greater fragmentation of Protestantism in these countries all tended to perpetuate a defensive mentality and to retard appreciation of ecumenism. After the instruction of 1949, and especially after the advent of Pope John XXIII, interest quickened. Books, pamphlets, periodicals, conferences, and contacts with other churches multiplied.

In several countries bishops set up committees or institutes to foster and guide the movement. The Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions, founded in 1952 by the then Rev. J. G. M. Willebrands, has had an impressive though unobtrusive influence, and has worked with the Faith and Order Commission of the WCC. Several Catholics from English-speaking countries were members of this conference and cooperated effectively with it. The Friars of the Society of the Atonement at Graymoor, N.Y., have fostered the Week of Prayer for Unity annually in January, and have also published the English edition of Unitas.

Scholarly Trends. In the background of these direct efforts lay a series of developments. Biblical, patristic, and historical scholarship grew more international and freer of denominational prepossessions. Knowledge of the Orthodox increased through emigration from Russia and the foundation of Orthodox seminaries in Paris, New York, and Boston. Study of Orthodoxy, especially of the Byzantine period, deepened with the establishment of institutes in Rome, Paris, Munich, Berlin, Belgrade, Brussels, Athens, Prague, Boston, and Washington, D.C. (Dumbarton Oaks). Orthodox participation in the World Council of Churches increased understanding of the Orthodox tradition.

Catholic scholars in Germany, Holland, France, and the U.S. began to reassess the history of the REFORMA-TION and to appreciate more positively the religious values that the "reformers" retained. Protestants wrote about the Catholic Church with a new understanding and appreciation of the Catholic position. The era of controversy, and the war mentality that accompanied it, showed signs of ending.

New theological trends were manifest. Theology became more biblical, historical, liturgical, and even sociological. Interest quickened in the role of the laity in the church. Catechism teaching became more kerygmatic. Appreciation of the Church's mission to all mankind deepened. The Orthodox developed a eucharistic ecclesiology and became more conscious, especially in the U.S., of jurisdictional problems. Anglicans and Protestants were much influenced by the new orthodoxy associated with Karl Barth, and they took more interest in tradition, although a "Neoevangelicalism" remained suspicious and aloof. Catholics tended to stress the element of "mystery" in the church, rather than juridical and institutional elements.

John XXIII. Pope JOHN XXIII (1958–63) decisively promoted Christian unity. He deprecated the polemical tone used by some Catholics and frequently spoke about other Christians with respect and affection. His simplicity, openheartedness, optimism, and charity encouraged a general spirit of confidence and friendship. His encyclicals, Mater et Magistra and Pacem in terris, included statements indicative of his concern for Christian unity.

VATICAN COUNCIL II was summoned by John XXIII to stimulate the movement toward unity, among other things. The pope established a Secretariat for the Promotion of the Unity of Christians (June 5, 1960). Through the good offices of this secretariat, under the leadership of Cardinal Augustin Bea, John XXIII held audiences with the Anglican Archbishop Fisher of Canterbury; the presiding bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Dr. Arthur Lichtenberger; the Moderator of the Church of Scotland, Dr. A. C. Craig; and dignitaries of other churches.

Vatican Council II. At the sessions of Vatican Council II observers were in attendance who represented the Orthodox Churches, various Protestant groups, the Anglican Communion, and the WCC. Others were guests of the secretariat. These delegated observers had access to all documents distributed to the fathers of the council and were present at all the general sessions. Although lacking the right to speak or vote at these sessions, they communicated to the Secretariat for Unity their observations and criticism, which in some cases were passed on to the relevant conciliar commissions. Their presence in a conspicuous place in St. Peter's was a reminder of the council's ecumenical purpose. Several of these delegated observers praised the confidence and friendliness accorded them.

The council promulgated (Nov. 21, 1964) a special decree on ecumenism, that treated the principles and practice of ecumenism, and the two chief types of division in the seamless robe of Christ. As the decree explained, the unity of Christ's Church consists of unity of faith, of sacramental worship, and of the fraternal harmony of the family of God secured by the succession of bishops since the time of St. Peter and the Apostles. The document noted the continuing existence of differences among Christians concerning doctrine, discipline, and Church structure and termed these present-day divisions an open contradiction of Christ's will. The stress of the decree, however, was on the unifying elements that are found among Christians as individuals and as corporate groups. Special emphasis was placed on the gifts and endowments of the Orthodox Churches, whose power to govern themselves according to their own diciplines was recognized. Referring to the Churches in the West, where more numerous differences exist among the various Christian denominations themselves and between all of them and the Catholic Church, the council listed several points that all held in common, but it also declared that the other Churches do not share the Catholic understanding of the eucharistic mystery.

Catholics, to whom the decree was addressed, were urged to avoid anything in speech or action that would render relations with other Christians difficult. Recommended, too, was a conversion of mentality and outlook as well as of moral conduct, a willingness to appraise honestly the elements in the Church needing reform or renewal, a spirit of mutual forgiveness shared by Catholics and other Christians, and cooperation between the two in causes for the good of humanity. Catholics were further asked to recognize gladly all the endowments and gifts of other Christian denominations. With due approval Catholics may offer prayer in common with them and engage in interfaith dialogue. In the confrontation of convictions during dialogue, Catholics were counseled to distinguish carefully between the DEPOSIT OF FAITH and formulations of faith, to keep in mind that various theological expressions of divine revelation are often complementary rather than conflicting, and to recall that there is a hierarchy of truths within revelation itself. At the same time, the council decried a false irenicism that would dilute or compromise truth.

Paul IV. The successor of John XXIII continued his predecessor's program for religious unity. PAUL VI's meeting in Jerusalem (January 1964) with the Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras of Constantinople roused worldwide Catholic enthusiasm. It demonstrated the Holy Father's willingness to break with precedent, to express esteem for the Orthodox, and to move toward reconciliation with them. On Dec. 7, 1965, the pope and the patriarch nullified simultaneously the mutual anathemas pronounced by Pope LEO IX and MICHAEL CERULARIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, in 1054, at the start of the EASTERN SCHISM.

As Vatican Council II drew to a close, Paul IV set a papal precedent by participating in interfaith prayer with the non-Catholic observers at the council. During the service in the Basilica of St. Paul-Outside-the-Walls (Dec. 4, 1965) a Methodist minister, a Greek Orthodox archimandrite, and a Catholic priest gave the readings, and a Lutheran hymn was sung.

Ecumenical Principles. The views of non-Catholics and Catholics on the principle of ecumenism have become clearer in the light of study and experience.

World Council of Churches. Since its foundation in 1948 this organization has become increasingly prominent in the ecclesiastical situation. The members generally agree that division among Christians is contrary to God's will and a grave obstacle to the acceptance of Christianity by non-Christians, that Church unity must be visible as well as invisible, and that the Church's unity and mission to non-Christians are inextricably connected; they believe the Church must be supranational, supraregional, and supraracial; that some prevalent organ of conference and council is required and is supplied to the member churches by the WCC itself. In addition they discern a need for closer association with the other Protestant bodies, such as the Southern Baptist Convention and the Missouri Synod Lutherans, and with the Catholic Church. Members aspire to perfect Christian unity. Leaders of the WCC realized from the beginning that this goal involved the inclusion of all other Christian bodies as members of the WCC, or at least as friendly associates in consultation with it.

The conviction has grown that unity must be based upon truth and that friendliness that hides or minimizes differences is not in the long run helpful. It is appreciated, too, that the Eucharist is central to reunion, to Christian worship, and to prayer and that, consequently, there must be a ministry accepted by everyone. Moreover, it is agreed that unity must be stable, continuous, and inclusive of the whole Christian fellowship of all places and ages, but not uniform or rigid structurally, since this would extinguish the spirit. Unity, admittedly, derives from and is governed by the unity of the Word of God Incarnate. Several theologians within the World Council of Churches claim that the Church continues in a real sense the redeeming work of Christ. Catholics share fully all these convictions.

Catholic. Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenicism made it clear that promoting endeavors at reconciliation and unity among all Christians is one of the principal concerns of the Second Vatican Council (Unitatis Redintegratio, 1). It should be noted that Vatican II intended, not to inaugurate a separate Catholic ecumenical movement, but to encourage all Catholics "to take an active and intelligent part" in the existing movement (Unitatis Redintegratio, 4).

Catholic Principles relative to ecumenism may be summed up as follows: through the fulfillment of the promises of Christ by the action of the Holy Spirit the Church has never failed and can never fail to be one in faith, in Sacraments, and in ordered, authoritative guidance through the successor of St. Peter and the successors of the Apostles. The Church, although a mystery believed by faith, is a sign lifted up among the nations, containing in itself evidence of its divine foundation. Its unity admits a large variety of languages, ritual forms, local prerogatives, spiritual currents, legitimate institutions, and preferred activities; it is not static or immobile, but dynamic and developing. The Church needs internal renewal and reform occasionally. Like holiness and catholicity, unity exists in essentials, but is not complete and perfect. As the Church's catholicity becomes fuller and more perfect through reconciliation with other Christian churches, the scandal of divisions among Christians make it more difficult for non-Christians to recognize the one true Church of Christ; and so a reconciliation of all Christians would have considerable influence in the confrontation of the Church with the great non-Christian religions and with unbelievers.

The defects and sins of members of the Church, both past and present, affect ecclesiastical institutions and obscure the presence of the Holy Spirit in the Church. Humility is, therefore, an important element among Catholic principles of ecumenism.

Two principles regarding theological formulations are important in ecumenical dialogue. The first is that all theological formulations must be understood in their historical context; the second is that no theological formulation exhausts the fullness of truth. This does not mean that formulation is false; it does mean, however, that in the total vision of Christian truth, formulations of individual truths assume another aspect than what they do when taken in isolation.

Other Christians who have received valid baptism merit the Church's esteem and solicitude as her children and as belonging to her, although not fully. Not only as individuals, but also as corporate entities, churches, or ecclesiastical communities, other Christians share a common patrimony with Catholics. Among its treasure are faith in Jesus Christ and the grace and gifts of the Holy Spirit, who acts to preserve what is true and holy and inspires efforts toward full unity.

In the West, churches and communities that are not in communion with the Apostolic See differ considerably among themselves in doctrine, doctrinal emphasis, and manner of government. Not all are equally interested in the ecumenical movement, nor do all have the same mutual esteem that the ecumenical spirit brings. Almost all of them maintain belief in baptism and in Scripture as the word of God. Their celebration of "the Lord's Supper" is reverent, and their worship often retains elements that were conspicuous in the ancient liturgies. Their charitable works show an enormous generosity. The churches within the World Council of Churches have developed a greater appreciation of the visible nature and continuity of the Church, of tradition, of the eucharistic liturgy, of the need for an ordained ministry accepted by all, and of the need for the Church to be able to speak to the world with a concordant witness.

The ecumenical method, which is one of "dialogue," envisions frank, friendly discussions about doctrines, pastoral and missionary methods, spirituality, and the devotional life. There are large areas in which Christians can stand and act in unison to maintain Christian values in a secular environment amid the growth of unreligious outlook and conduct.

Massive obstacles bar attainment of unity in faith, sacraments, and authority. On the Catholic side there is fear of indifference that can best be exorcised by loyalty to the directions of the Holy See and by episcopal initiative and leadership. Orthodox, Anglicans, and Protestants dread "domination" by Rome and the more articulated doctrinal convictions of Catholicism. These suspicions can only be allayed by increased knowledge and experience of mutual church life and by cooperation for the defense and spread of the general cause.

The ecumenical movement is essentially a spiritual one, a call to increased holiness, zeal, and union with Christ, into which all intellectual and administrative activities must be integrated. The basis of the movement is the clear will of Christ that all his followers should be united; its method is primarily prayer, and "dialogue" in various forms; and its hope rests upon the omnipotence of God.

Social Thought. A factor of considerable importance in the Churches' search for unity has been the desire for a coherent witness and a common action making relevant the gospel message of justice and peace among men and nations; indeed, it was the original motive and basis for the participation of some of the Orthodox churches in the ecumenical movement after World War I. The forces of what were called the SOCIAL GOSPEL or "applied" or "practical" Christianity sponsored international conferences. They met at Stockholm, Sweden, in 1925 and at Oxford, England, in 1937, before the concerns they represented were officially assumed as an integral function of the WCC at its founding in 1948. Moreover, the basic interests of the World Alliance for Promoting Friendship through the Churches are expressed through the WCC's permanent Commissions of the Churches on International Affairs.

The hope of common action and of coherent witness encounters obstacle in the nature of the WCC, which describes itself as "a fellowship of churches," undertaking only such programs as the member churches authorize. Moreover, the WCC's pronouncements have only the authority of their intrinsic wisdom, the documents of its assemblies being "received and commended to the churches for their serious consideration and appropriate action." In addition, the different theological traditions represented in the WCC give rise to different conceptions of the nature of man, of law, of the state, of the relation of religion to temporal structures, and, in short, of the bases of social ethics. Thus, the attempt to work out an ecumenical consensus with the aid of dispersed and volunteer collaborators, and the need for conciliating viewpoints from opposing social systems, often make the positions taken by the WCC, the organized instrument of the ecumenical community, imprecise and tentative.

The central concept elaborated by the WCC is that of the responsible society, defined as "one where freedom is the freedom of all who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order, and where those who hold positions of authority or economic power are responsible for its exercise to God and to the people whose welfare is affected by it." The concept envisions a social arrangement that maintains in dynamic equilibrium freedom and order, liberty and justice, while barring the road to tyranny and anarchy. The responsible society, it was noted at the Evanston Assembly of 1954, is not conceived of as "an alternative social or political system, but a criterion by which we judge all existing social orders, while at the same time providing a standard to guide us in specific choices we have to make."

The WCC has taken firm stands against racial segregation and for religious freedom; it has consistently supported the United Nations as the best mechanism for reducing tensions between nations. Because of the character of its organization and its ethical criteria, however, its pronouncements on the social order have been, perforce, generalized ones. They are not for that reason insignificant. Thus, they have indefatigably asserted the essential dignity of man who is the object of a divine and redeeming love, the source of all demands for human rights and social justice for every person. They have asserted an obligation of service to the world because of God's love for all men. They have proclaimed the spiritual solidarity of all mankind, thus challenging the pretensions of absolute national sovereignty, the myths of inevitable class conflict, and the fears of irreconcilable national rivalries. They have declared that economic processes and international affairs are neither beyond control nor self-regulatory; they are subject to norms determined by their ultimate function which is to serve man in fulfilling his destiny. They have taught the equality of all men in a common destiny and divinely certified value, thus voicing the irreducible claims of a common humanity to its common goods, and the rights of the individual to an equality of opportunity in providing himself and his family with the necessities for a truly human existence.

Dialogue. Dialogue is one of the ecumenical movement's most characteristic and important steps toward reconciliation. Replacing long-standing patterns of interdenominational polemics, dialogue attempts to create an atmosphere in which all Christians may come to a genuine understanding of each others' beliefs and traditions. The mutual understanding gained through dialogue does not always result in agreement, for understanding another's beliefs may reveal their disparity with one's own position. Accordingly, ecumenical dialogue should not be accompanied by a false irenicism, for nothing is to be gained by pretending that basic differences do not exist or that basic differences can be overcome simply by good will. Nonetheless, ecumenical dialogue has resulted in a remarkable degree of consensus, or a recognition that positions that were previously considered incompatible, can be seen as complementary expressions of God's revelation.

Ecumenical dialogue is conducted in a variety of ways, ranging from multilateral discussions at international meetings sponsored by the World Council of Churches to informal "living-room dialogues" among a few members of different churches. Sometimes ecumenical dialogue takes the form of formal negotiations aimed at uniting two or more denominations. At any one time, several official union conversations may be under way among various churches throughout the world, under the aegis of the the CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION. A number of such negotiations have proved successful; e.g., the union of the Methodist Church and the Evangelical United Brethern in 1967 to form the UNITED METHODIST CHURCH.

Union conversations need to involve every level and locale of the churches participating. Many union proposals have withered for lack of popular support, while other unions have been only partial, since some local churches refused to unite. Even when a union plan is ratified, there is usually a tendency for "denominationalism" to continue in much the same way as previously; thus, a process of continuing dialogue and growing together in union is necessary. In other words, since union involves all the members of the churches uniting—not merely administrators and theologians—"grass roots ecumenicism" is a pastoral necessity if union is to be really effective.

Roman Catholic Participation in Dialogue. In accord with Vatican II's recommendation of "fraternal dialogue on points of doctrine and the more pressing pastoral problems of our time" (Decree 18), Catholics have entered into dialogue with their fellow Christians in many places and at many levels.

Noteworthy on the international level are the bilateral conversations arranged by the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity and the appropriate officials of four world confessional families: the Anglican Communion, the Lutheran World Federation, the World Methodist Council, and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. In general, these commissions have studied the doctrinal issues that originally divided the participating churches and have searched for an acceptable consensus that would overcome the legacy of separation. In addition, Catholic representatives have participated in such international meetings of the Faith and Order Commission and the General Assembly of the World Council of Churches. The Roman Catholic Church is a full member of the Faith and Order Commission, and has observer status at the World Council of Churches. In practice, Catholic organizations and individual Catholics participate in many of its projects and the feasibility of Catholic membership has been explored by both sides.

Similar conversations are taking place at national and regional levels. In the United States, seven bilateral conversations are sponsored by the Bishops' Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs and the appropriate officials of the churches involved: the American Baptist Convention, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), the Episcopal church, Lutheran churches, the United Methodist church, Reformed and Presbyterian churches, and Orthodox and other Eastern churches. The membership of these groups usually consists of a halfdozen or more theologians and administrators from each side. Frequently, the discussions in these groups parallel or augment the efforts of the corresponding international conversation, but in some instances, the particularities of the American religious scene give a special orientation to the dialogue.

Catholics also participate in other ecumenical conversations, such as the Consultation on Church Union, and are working on ecumenical projects, such as those sponsored by the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. Various types of formal and informal dialogues are in operation on the local level. For example, some Catholic dioceses have joined state councils of churches, while individual parishes have become members of local councils of churches. Some Catholic priests have become members of local ministerial associations, while other priests have developed informal contacts with the clergy of other churches. Catholic laity have worked with their fellow Christians on civic projects and have participated in such interchurch activities as businessmen's prayer breakfasts and churchwomen's organizations.

While these different forms of dialogue all aim at improving relations among Christians, each dialogue is usually concerned with some specific area of interest: theology, education, social action, or worship.

Theological Discussion. The primary, although not exclusive, concern of the bilateral conversations is discussion of theological issues. Although the choice of specific topics depends on the historical and theological traditions of the churches represented, in most ecumenical conversations one or more of the following issues tend to surface: (1) Gospel, scripture, and tradition; (2) creeds and confessions; (3) church and ministry; and (4) the Sacraments, particularly the Eucharist.

Each of these topics can be discussed in a variety of ways. For example, discussions on the Church have sometimes focused on the Church in relation to the secular world or the Church's social responsibility; other conversations have centered on the Church's ministry and have treated such matters as the nature and role of the priesthood and episcopate, the validity of ordination, and APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION; still other dialogues have been concerned with freedom and responsibility in the Church and have explored such questions as teaching authority in the Church, the nature and function of the papal office, and the exercise of infallibility. Similar variety enriches the dialogue on other topics, such as the spirituality of the ministry, formation of moral judgments, and the ministry of women in the Church.

A primary aim in theological dialogue is mutual understanding. Frequently, such understanding results in the recognition that doctrinal issues that were previously considered to be conflicting should really be seen as complementary. Doctrinal complementarity was accepted by Vatican II, insofar as "the heritage handed down by the apostles was received with differences of form and manner, so that from the earliest times of the Church, it was explained variously in different places, owing to diversities of genius and conditions of life" (Decree 14). Accordingly, ecumenical dialogue has benefited from both a variety of theological methods and a plurality of doctrinal expressions. Doctrinal discussion has also been aided by the recognition of a "HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS": since doctrines "vary in their relation to Christian faith" (Decree 11), theologians may agree on basic tenets while allowing flexibility in the presentation of related issues. Also, since doctrines have developed in the past, there is no reason to preclude the possibility of further development in the future; accordingly, ecumenical theologians are exploring ways in which doctrines might converge in an acceptable consensus.

While areas of more or less serious disagreement still remain in ecumenical theology, this should not detract from the substantial amount of consensus that has been achieved in a comparatively short time. For example, the American Lutheran-Roman Catholic and Episcopal-Catholic conversations have achieved remarkable consensus on such topics as the Nicene Creed, Baptism, the Eucharist and ministry, and even the papacy.

While manifesting the progress achieved in theological discussion, the publication of consensus statements raises two crucial questions: what degree of consensus is necessary for two churches to enter officially into some type of union? And to what extent is the consensus achieved by theologians shared by members of the churches they represent? Presently, few church officials seem to have envisioned any policy or procedures to implement the consensus emerging from the dialogues of their theologians with those of other churches.

Despite the many ecumenical advances made thus far, theological obstacles to ecumenical growth and progress still remain. Issues like the papal primacy and jurisdiction, ordination of women, sexuality, and especially homosexuality, and such Marian doctrines as the Immaculate Conception and the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, and so-called 'nontheological/moral' factors like the dramatic rise of conservatively-oriented groups inside the various Christian Churches, all constitute points of serious contention and barriers to be overcome.

Liturgical Sharing. The sense of Christian brotherhood created by shared experiences in dialogue, education, and social action usually leads to a desire to worship together. While participation in ecumenical prayer services encounters little or no theological objection, in contrast, there is considerable divergence in policy in regard to sharing in liturgical worship (communicatio in sacris), particularly eucharistic sharing.

Some churches allow "open communion," inviting all Christians attending the service to receive the Eucharist. Sometimes, two churches have reciprocal bilateral agreements permitting intercommunion. Other churches ordinarily welcome only their own members to the Eucharist but do make exceptions in particular cases. Finally, some churches have a policy of "closed communion" which permits only members of that church to communicate. The practice of local churches or particular individuals, however, does not always follow denominational policy.

Present Catholic policy is basically that of closed communion with some exceptions; furthermore, Catholic policy in regard to eucharistic sharing with the Eastern churches differs from that of the Western churches.

Since a basic doctrinal and sacramental commonality exists between the Eastern (i.e., Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox) and Catholic churches, "some sharing in liturgical worship . . . given suitable circumstances and the approval of church authority" is officially encouraged. Accordingly, Catholics are permitted to receive not only the Eucharist but also the Sacraments of penance and the anointing of the sick from Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox clergy, and Catholics are permitted to reciprocate. In reality, however, world-wide agreement on such sacramental sharing remains to be reached, although it occurs on occasion.

In contrast, the lack of recognized doctrinal agreement between the Catholic and Western (e.g., Protestant) churches has resulted in a general prohibition against liturgical sharing, although with some exceptions: (1) non-Catholics who are rightly disposed and believe in the Sacraments in harmony with the Catholic Church are allowed to receive them for adequate reasons. While urgent situations, such as danger of death, persecution, or imprisonment, are generally acknowledged cases for allowing sacramental sharing, these comprise unusual situations and are not meant as general practice.

Bibliography: R. ROUSE and S. C. NEILL, eds., A History of the Ecumenical Movement 1517-1948 (Philadelphia 1954). B. LEEM-ING, The Vatican Council and Christian Unity (New York 1966). R. M. BROWN and D. H. SCOTT, eds., Challenge to Reunion (New York 1964). A. H. ARMSTRONG and E. J. B. FRY, Rediscovering Eastern Christendom (London 1963). A. BEA, The Unity of Christians, ed. B. LEEMING (New York 1963). Anglican/Roman Catholic Commission on the Theology of Marriage and Its Application to Mixed Marriages, Final Report (Washington, D.C. 1976). Anglican-Roman Catholic Commission/U.S., ARC-DOC, I-IV (Documents on Anglican-Roman Catholic Relations) (Washington, D.C.). Baptist-Catholic Regional Conference, The Church Inside and Out (Washington, D.C. 1974). Consultation on Church Union-A Catholic Perspective (Washington, D.C. 1970). P. C. EMPIE and T. AUSTIN MURPHY, Papal Primacy and the Universal Church. Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue 5 (Minneapolis 1974). Lutheran-Roman Catholic Theological Consultation, Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue, 1-5 (Washington, D.C.). Roman Catholic/Presbyterian-Reformed Consultation. The Unity We Seek (New York 1977). L. SWIDLER, ed., The Eucharist in Ecumenical Dialogue (New York 1976). United Methodist-Roman Catholic Dialogue/U.S.A., Holiness and Spirituality of the Ordained Ministry (Washington, D.C.

EDDY, MARY BAKER

1976). N. H. VANDERWERF, The Times Were Very Full: A Perspective on the First 25 Years of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America, 1950-1975 (New York 1975). JOHN PAUL II, Addresses and Homilies on Ecumenism, eds. J. B. SHEERIN and J. F. HOTCHKIN (Washington, D.C. 1981). A. J. VAN DER BRENT, Major Studies and Themes in the Ecumenical Movement (Geneva, Switzerland 1981). J. DESSEAUX, Twenty Centuries of Ecumenism (New York 1984). W. G. RUSCH, Ecumenism A Movement Toward Church Unity (Philadelphia 1985). J. L. SANDIDGE, Roman Catholic/Pentecostal Dialogue (1977-1982): A Study in Developing Ecumenism (New York 1987). P. C. PHAN, Christianity and the Wider Ecumenism (New York 1990) T. D. HORGAN, Walking Together: Roman Catholics and Ecumenism Twenty-five Years after Vatican II (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1990). K. RAISER, Ecumenism in Transition: A Paradigm Shift in the Ecumenical Movement? (Geneva, Switzerland 1991). R. GIRAULT, One Church, One Faith, One Lord: New Perspectives in Ecumenism (Maynooth, Ireland 1993). K. HAGEN, ed. The Quadrilog: Tradition and the Future of Ecumenism: Essays in Honor of George H. Tavard (Collegeville, Minn. 1994). D. BUTLER, Dying to be One: English Ecumenism History, Theology and the Future (London 1996). G. WAINWRIGHT, Worship with One Accord: Where Liturgy and Ecumenism Embrace (New York 1997). M. KINNAMON, The Ecumenical Movement: An Anthology of Key Texts and Voices (Grand Rapid, Mich. 1997). C. E. BRAATEN, Mother Church: Ecclesiology and Ecumenism (Minneapolis 1998). L. CUNNINGHAM, Ecumenism: Present Realities and Future Prospects (Notre Dame, Ind. 1998). N. SAGOVSKY, Ecumenism, Christian Origins, and the Practice of Communion (Cambridge, U.K. 2000). M. VAN ELDEREN, Finding a Voice: Communicating the Ecumenical Movement (Grand Rapids, Mich. 2001). J. GROS, That All May Be One: Ecumenism (Chicago 2001).

[M. A. BROWN/E. DUFF/J. T. FORD/C. V. LAFONTAINE/EDS.]

EDDY, MARY BAKER

Founder of the CHRISTIAN SCIENCE church; b. Bow, N.H., July 16, 1821; d. Chestnut Hill, Mass., Dec. 3, 1910. After a childhood marked by poor health, she married George Washington Glover in 1843. His death and the birth of her son, in 1844, aggravated her nervous disorder. She married Dr. Daniel Patterson, an itinerant dentist, in 1853, but she received a divorce in 1873 on the grounds of desertion. She was wed for a third time, in 1877, to Asa Gilbert Eddy, a sewing machine salesman who died in 1882.

Mrs. Eddy dated her discovery of the principles of Christian Science from 1866 when she recovered from a fall in Lynn, Mass. She began to teach classes in spiritual healing, borrowing freely from the writings of Dr. Phineas P. Quimby, a healer and mesmerist. Her Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures, the textbook of the Christian Science Church, was published in 1875, and the first Christian Science Church was organized in Boston, Mass., in 1879. In 1880 she established the short-lived Massachusetts Metaphysical College to propagate her theories of healing. The official church publication, the Christian Science Journal, was founded in 1883, and a daily newspaper, the Christian Science Monitor, was begun in 1908. At the time of her death, the church had enrolled about 100,000 members. Its doctrines denied the reality of sin, sickness, and death and advanced a panthe-istic conception of God.

Mary Baker Eddy.

Bibliography: E. F. DAKIN, Mrs. Eddy: The Biography of a Virginal Mind (New York 1930). L. P. POWELL, Mary Baker Eddy (Boston 1950). A. JOHNSON, Dictionary of American Biography 6:7–15.

[W. J. WHALEN]

EDEN, GARDEN OF

Term used for PARADISE in the story of man's creation and fall as told in Gn 2.8–3.24 (see PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE). The exact term is really "a garden in Eden" (Heb gan-be ' $\bar{e}den$: 2.8). The author of the account, therefore, evidently thought of Eden as a certain region "in the East" (miqeddem), i.e., in MESOPOTAMIA, where "the Lord God planted a garden . . . and put the man whom he had formed" (2.8); see also 2.10 ("a river rose in Eden''). The Hebrew word 'ēden is probably connected with the Akkadian word edinu, itself a loanword from the Sumerian edin meaning "steppe." The same local significance is attached to the Hebrew term gan-'eden (garden of Eden) in Gn 2.15; 2.23-24; see also Gn 4.16, where Cain is said to have "dwelt in the land of Nod to the east of Eden ('eden).'' The Israelites, however, would naturally connect the term with the native Hebrew word 'eden, meaning "luxury," "delight." Hence, the Septuagint translated gan-'eden in Gn 3.23–24 as $\delta \pi \alpha \rho \alpha \delta \epsilon \log \tau \eta \zeta \tau \rho \upsilon \rho \eta \zeta$ (park of luxury; hence the word paradise). Similarly, in Is 51.3; Ez 28.13; 31.8–9, 16, 18, Eden ('eden) becomes synonymous with "Yahweh's garden" or "God's garden," and in Ez 36.35; Jl 2.3 gan-'eden (garden of Eden) means simply a luxuriant field.

"The Paradise," a panel painting by Lucas Cranach the Elder, depicting various scenes from Genesis involving Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, 1530, in the Kunsthistorisches Museum, Vienna. (©Francis G. Mayer/CORBIS)

Of quite a different meaning is the Hebrew word 'ēden in the term $b^en\hat{e}$ -'eden (sons of Eden) in 2 Kgs 19.12; Is 37.12. This term designates the Edenites, the inhabitants of the region that is called Eden ('eden) in Ez 27.23 and more fully as Beth-Eden (bêt-'eden) in Am 1.5, which is the region known in Akkadian as Bit-Adini, on the Euphrates south of Haran.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 620. O. SCHILLING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:657. E. A. SPEISER, Genesis (Anchor Bible I; Garden City, N.Y. 1964) 16–20. H. RENCKENS, Israel's Concept of the Beginning, tr. C. NAPIER (New York 1964) 193–213.

[I. HUNT]

EDES, ELLA B.

Journalist; b. Dec. 7, 1832; d. Pescina, near Pinerolo, Italy, Feb. 27, 1916. A member of an old New England family, Miss Edes was baptized a Catholic on Feb. 25, 1852. In about 1866 she took up permanent residence in Rome, where she did secretarial work for Cardinal Alessandro Barnabò, prefect of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. After 1870 she became Roman correspondent for various newspapers, including the Tablet (London); the New York Herald; the New York World (as "Anne Brewster"?); the Brooklyn Daily Eagle; the New York Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register; and the Catholic Review and Catholic News (New York). Her interest was in Roman ecclesiastical events. She remained intensely loyal to the successors of her confessor, Abp. John HUGHES of New York, and placed her reportorial talents at their disposal. As an agent of Abp. Michael A. CORRIGAN and his "conservative party" in their conflict with the "progressive" American bishops, Miss Edes incurred the displeasure of the latter. Increasingly unwell after 1900, she closed her Rome apartment at "Via della Mercede, 21" in 1908, and retired to northern Italy. Some of her correspondence with ecclesiastics has been preserved in the archives of the archdioceses of Baltimore, New York, and St. Paul, the Diocese of Rochester, and the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia.

Bibliography: H. J. BROWNE, The Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor (Catholic University of America, Studies in American Church History 38; Washington 1949) and D. F. REILLY, The School Controversy 1891–1893 (Washington 1943) touch on Miss Edes's role in Church conflicts.

[R. F. MCNAMARA]

EDESSA

Arab al-Ruha', modern Urfa, in Turkey, the capital in antiquity of the Osrhoene peoples of northern Mesopotamia. Conquered by the Assyrians (8th century B.C.), it was called Ruhu (Syriac, Urhoi). Under Seleucus I (312–280 B.C.) its name was changed to Edessa and under Antiochus (175-162), to Antioch. In 132 B.C. it was the capital of the Kingdom of Edessa, or Osrhoene, under the Arab dynasty that was replaced by the Seleucids. Destroyed by the Romans under Trajan but rebuilt by Hadrian, it became a Roman military colony as Colonia Marcia Edessenorum in 217. Controlled by the Kingdom of Palmyra (c. 270), it fell to the Persians in 609 but was recaptured by the Byzantines under HERACLIUS in 628, absorbed by the Arabs after 639, and retaken by Byzantium in 1031.

During the First Crusade, it was captured by Baldwin of Flanders (1098) but reverted to the Seljuk Turks in 1144. In 1182 the Sultan Saladin brought it under Egyptian control. It was destroyed by the Mongols (1391) and rebuilt by the Turks in 1637.

Edessa was evangelized by Christians from Palestine. Eusebius of Caesarea cites a legendary letter from the Chronicle of Addai, supposedly written by Abgar V Ukhama of Edessa to Christ, who sent the Apostle Addai to convert the country (Hist. Eccl. 1.13.1–22). The Epitaph of ABERCIUS contains the first certain evidence of Christianity. The Liber legum regionum (c. 250) narrates the conversion of King Abgar IX (179–216), a vassal of Osrhoene, but this evidence is questionable since Eusebius, who cites the text, omitted the conversion passage. However he quotes ORIGEN as saying that the Apostle Thomas preached to the Parthians in eastern Syria and in the 4th century the body of Thomas was venerated at Edessa (Hist. Eccl. 3.1.1). Eusebius likewise mentions the churches of Osrhoene as participating in the EASTER CONTROVERSY (5.23.4) and the Chronicle of Edessa mentions the inundation of a church in 202. The first bishop, Palut, was consecrated by Serapion of Antioch (c. 200) and spread Christianity in East Syria and Persia. The PESHITTA and Tatian's Diatessaron apparently originated in Edessa, as did much of the Syrian apocryphal literature, such as the Acts of Thomas (3d century), the Psalms of Thomas (partly a Judeo-Christian composition of the 2d century), and apparently also the Odes of Solomon and the Gospel of the Truth. The primitive Christian monuments excavated at nearby DURA-EUROPOS in Syria indicate that in this region appeared the first Christian buildings dedicated exclusively to religious service whose decorations were influenced by Judaic, Mithraic, and Greek art.

Edessan Christianity in the 3d century showed marks of stringent asceticism as instanced by the Acts of Thomas and the Tract on Virginity, as well as the vogue of spiritual marriage. TATIAN was there after 170, and also BARDE-SANES (D. 222), the Gnostic hymn writer. It was affected by the persecutions of Decius and Diocletian.

The school of Edessa, rendered illustrious by EPHREM THE SYRIAN (d. 373), was transferred to Nisibis in 457, and had considerable influence on the spread of Christianity in the Sassanid lands. Bishop RABBULA of Edessa (412–435) was a strong anti-Nestorian, who requested that PROCLUS of Constantinople write his Letter to the Armenians; however, Ibas of Edessa (435–457) was deposed as a Nestorian sympathizer at the Robber Synod of Ephesus (449), restored at the Council of CHALCEDON, but later condemned with the THREE CHAPTERS. The Nestorians were expelled in 457, and in the 6th century the Monophysites prevailed through the intrigues of James BARADAI (541–578).

With the Arab invasion Edessa lost significance but was the see of both a Nestorian bishop and a Jacobite metropolitan (until 1097) and produced the Jacobite James of Edessa (d. 708) and the Maronite Theophilus (d. 785). During the Crusades it likewise had a Latin metropolitan but in modern times has become a titular see. The Mission of the Capuchins opened in Edessa in 1841 was suppressed during World War I.

Bibliography: J. DANIÉLOU and H. MARROU, Des Origines à saint Grégoire le Grand, v. 1 of Nouvelle histoire de l'Église (Paris 1963—). J. TIXERONT, Les Origines de l'église d'Édesse (Paris 1888). A. VON HARNACK, Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums (4th ed. Leipzig 1924), Eng. The Mission and Expansion of Christianity, ed. and tr. J. MOFFATT (New York 1908). I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, "Le origini del cristianesimo in Edessa," Gregorianum 15 (1934) 82–91. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERQ and H. I. MAR-ROU (Paris 1907–53) 4.2:2058–2110. F. NAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT (Paris 1903–50) 4.2:2102–03. H. RAHNER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:658–659.

[G. ORLANDI]

EDESSA, CHRONICLE OF

The Chronicum Edessenum, an anonymous chronicle of the late 6th century. It begins with an official record of the flooding of the city in A.D. 201. In this flood, says the record, the ecclesia christianorum or Christian church was hit by the waters, thus supplying valuable witness to early Christianity in OSRHOENE. This document is the first dated Syriac writing. The chronicler uses generally trustworthy sources for his brief, almost annalistic recital of the main events, the succession of bishops, and other matters pertaining to the history of Edessa. It is thus a fine historical source and is preserved in only one manuscript (Vat. syr. 163, 7th century).

Bibliography: I. GUIDI et al., eds. and trs., Chronica minora, 6 v. (Corpus scriptorum Chritianorum 1–6, Scriptores syri ser. 3.4; 1903–05); Eng. tr. B. H. COWPER, The Journal of Sacred Literature, 4th ser., 4 (1864) 28–45. J. TIXERONT, Les Origines de l'église d'Édesse (Paris 1888). I. ORTIZ DE URBINA, Gregoriana 15 (1934) 82–81, origins.

[I. ORTIZ DE URBINA]

EDESSA, SCHOOL OF

The current of theological thought and teaching characteristic of the early Church in Syria and Mesopotamia. With the conversion of the royal house to Christianity (c. 202), EDESSA became a center of Oriental Christian culture and theological activity. Mention is made of the disciples of BARDESANES and LUCIAN OF ANTIOCH, who had studied exegesis with Macarius of Edessa (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte 21.184), and Eusebius of Emesa attended lectures on Scripture there (Patrologia Graeca 67:1045).

In 363 the Emperor Jovian ceded Nisibis to the Persians and EPHREM THE SYRIAN transferred his school of theology from Nisibis to Edessa and directed it there for ten years. Among his earlier disciples, supposedly, were the alleged heretics Paulona and Arvad, and Zenobius, parts of whose writings have been preserved. Ephrem was a competent scholar and controversialist whose literary style and poetry were quickly recognized as classics of Syrian culture and proved a stimulus to the production of exegetical and doctrinal works among his followers. On the death of Ephrem (373), Qiyôrê took charge of the school and gave courses in exegesis. In the beginning he followed Ephrem's methods; later, however, he used the commentaries of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA. Among his disciples were Barsauma of Nisibis and Ma'na of Rêwardašir. Two others, Kûmî and Proba, translated the works of Theodore into Syrian, and the school adopted the Antiochene theology. This caused considerable difficulty with Bishop RABBULA of Edessa (412–435), who was a partisan of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA.

Ibas of Edessa (435–457), an instructor at the school, succeeded Rabbula. His famous Letter to Maris in which he criticized the Alexandrian Christology became an issue at the Council of CHALCEDON (451) and was condemned as one of the THREE CHAPTERS under JUSTINIAN I (553). Many of the students who were formed in theology during the 5th century at Edessa became bishops in Persia; they included Simeon of Beit Aršam, Marûn 'Eloyoto, Acacius the Aramean, 'Abšuto of Nineveh, John of Beit Garmay, Paul bar Qaqay of Karka, Abraham the Mede, and Narses the Leper. These men contributed to the eventual acceptance of NESTORIANISM in the Persian Church. The Acts of the Synods of Tyre and Berytus and of the Robber Synod of Ephesus (449), as well as of the Council of Chalcedon, reveal the difficulties experienced by Ibas.

Narses of Edessa became head of the school in 437 but was expelled from Edessa (451) as a Nestorian and founded a new school at Nisibis on the invitation of Bishop Bar Sauma. In 489 Bishop Cyrus II (470–498) closed the school of Edessa at the order of the Emperor Zeno. On the site of the destroyed school a church was erected in honor of Mary, the Mother of God.

Little is known of the organization of the school at Edessa. Details concerning its teaching and students in the Testament of St. Ephrem have been challenged as interpolations. Its successor, the school of Nisibis, proved to be a stronghold of Nestorian teaching.

Bibliography: Testament de s. Ephrem, ed. R. DUVAL, Journal Asiatique 18 (1901) 234–319. R. NELZ, Die theologischen Schulen der morgenländischen Kirchen (Bonn 1916). A. BAUM-STARK, Geschichte der syrischen Literatur (Bonn 1922) 34, 66, 100–107. E. R. HAYES, L'École d'Édesse (Paris 1930). H. RAHNER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1957–66) 3:658–659. A. VAN ROEY, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 14:1430–32.

[F. X. MURPHY]

EDGAR THE PEACEFUL

King of the English; b. 943; d. July 8, 975. The son of King Edmund and St. Alfgifu, he succeeded his brother

Eadwig in 959. During Edgar's reign England enjoyed internal stability and was spared foreign invasion. He supported Archbishop DUNSTAN OF CANTERBURY and his associates, OSWALD OF YORK and ETHELWOLD OF WIN-CHESTER, in the reform of the English Church and the revival of monasticism. He improved the parish organization and enforced the payment of tithes. His coronation in 973 followed, for the first time in England, a definite liturgical order and emphasized the spiritual side of the ceremony. Edgar was buried at GLASTONBURY, where he was treated almost as a saint.

Bibliography: C. PLUMMER, Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel (Oxford 1892–99) 1:113–121; 2:152–163. A. J. ROBERT-SON, The Laws of the Kings of England from Edmund to Henry I (Cambridge, Eng. 1925) 16–39. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography From the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:365–370. R. STANTON, A Menology of England and Wales (New York 1887) 326–328. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 359–367. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (Cambridge, Eng. 1962). E. JOHN, "The Beginning of the Benedictine Reform in England," Revue Bénédictine 73 (1963) 73–87.

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

EDGEWORTH DE FIRMONT, HENRY ESSEX

Priest; b. Edgeworthtown, County Longford, Ireland, 1745; d. Mitau (or Yelgava), Latvia, May 22, 1807. He was the son of a Protestant pastor who was converted to Catholicism, and who moved with his family to Toulouse in 1749. After studying there under the Jesuits, Edgeworth made his ecclesiastical studies in Paris, was ordained, and then devoted himself in Paris to the direction of consciences. He became the confessor of Madame Elizabeth, sister of the king. During the FRENCH REVOLU-TION, when King LOUIS XVI chose him to assist at his last hours, Edgeworth went to the Temple prison, conversed at length with the condemned monarch, heard his confession, celebrated Mass for him, distributed Holy Communion to him, and remained with him on the scaffold (1793). Since Edgeworth's courage and priestly activity made him hateful to the revolutionaries, he had to hide in Choisy-le-Roi, Fontainebleau, and Bayeux before taking refuge in England (1796). After visiting the Count of Artois in Edinburgh, he became chaplain to Louis XVIII at Blackenbourg and then at Mitau. His devotion to wounded French prisoners during Napoleon's campaign in Poland led to his own death through a disease contracted while caring for them.

Bibliography: H. E. EDGEWORTH DE FIRMONT, Letters from the Abbé Edgeworth to His Friends, ed. T. B. ENGLAND (London 1818). C. S. EDGEWORTH, Memoirs of the Abbé Edgeworth, Con- taining His Narrative of the Last Hours of Louis XVI (London 1815). V. M. MONTAGU, The Abbé Edgeworth and His Friends (London 1913). J. HERISSAY, Les Aumôniers de la guillotine (Paris 1954).

[C. LEDRÉ]

EDIFICATION (IN THE BIBLE)

The technical NT term for "building up" the Church, "edification," has its roots in the OT interplay of the concepts of building the Temple and of building the people; it was used by Jesus Himself to speak of the building of the new people of God; and finally, it was emphasized by St. Paul as a theological term for the spiritual formation of the Christian community.

Use in the OT. Used in the literal sense of constructing a building, the word received its religious stamp in the OT when used in the sense of building the Temple, which is a house for the Lord (1 Kgs 6.1). Because "house" could stand for dynasty, "building a house" could also mean establishing a lasting dynasty. This play on words underlies Nathan's response to David's intention to build God a house-God instead will build a house for David, namely, the Davidic dynasty (2 Sm 7.5, 7, 11). "Building" thus becomes associated with the future of God's people; God will rebuild them [Ps 146 (147A).2; Jer 31.4; 31.28; 33.7]. But cooperation with the divine construction depends less upon descendence from David than upon fidelity to Yahweh (1 Kgs 11.38), so that even neighboring pagan tribes, if they confess Yahweh to be the true God, "shall be built up in the midst of my people'' (Jer 12.16).

In the Gospels. The Synoptic tradition (Mk 12.10; Mt 21.42; Lk 20.17) uses the building theme in the image of the stone that the builders rejected; it becomes the keystone or cornerstone of the whole edifice. Rejected by Jewish leaders, Jesus becomes through His Resurrection the center and head of the new people God now builds. Peter is presented as the foundation of the new people whom Jesus calls His own; a church that He Himself will build upon Peter (Mt 16.18). The destruction and rebuilding of the Temple is an important element in the Passion story (Mk 14.58; 15.29; Mt 26.61; 27.40), clarified by Jn 2.19–22 in the light of the Resurrection: Jesus' body is the new temple of God.

In St. Paul. In St. Paul, the organic union effected by Baptism with the risen Christ, in whom the fullness of the Godhead dwells bodily (Col 2.9), makes Christians members of Christ (1 Cor 3.16–17; 6.15), hence the sanctuary indwelt by the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 6.19). Thus "body of Christ" and "temple" (or "sanctuary") of God become interchangeable terms for the Church, as is illustrated by the mixing of the two figures when Paul says both that the body is built up and that the temple grows (Eph 2.21; 4.12, 16).

The process of "building up" this body-temple, therefore, is a sacred act—a far cry from the sentimental or merely ethical sense that "edification" has acquired in modern times. It is primarily a divine act; God Himself is the builder (1 Cor 3.10; Acts 20.32). This does not exclude, but rather demands Christ's causality, for He is the foundation (1 Cor 3.11; Col 2.7) and source of all building power in the Church (Eph 4.10-16). It also demands the causality of official ministers, especially the Apostles (Eph 2.20; 4.11). They have divine authority to build up (2 Cor 10.8; 13.10; Rom 15.20). Others share in this power but only subordinately to the Apostles (1 Cor 3.10), particularly the Prophets (inspired spokesmen within the community, Eph 2.20; 4.11; one Cor 14.3), but also other ministers, such as evangelists, shepherds, and teachers whom Christ has given to the Church for its upbuilding (Eph 4.10-16). The work of construction belongs also to all the faithful, whose church-building power the official ministers organize and direct. The building power may be a charismatic gift (of any kind, one Cor 14.12, 17, especially prophecy, 14.3, and interpretation of tongues, 14.5) or the superior gift of fraternal charity (1 Cor 12.31; 13), which all must possess and which is the building power par excellence (1 Cor 8.1; Eph 4.16). Every Christian thus has the responsibility for building up the Church (1 Thes 5.11; Rom 14.19; 15.2), and this is a genuine work of ministry corresponding to Christ's design (Eph 4.12).

"Building up" in both OT and NT theology means strengthening more than expansion (Col 2.7: "be . . . built up on him and strengthened in the faith''). Thus, the role of sound teaching is stressed in "upbuilding" contexts in contrast to the divisive and weakening effects of heterodoxy (Eph 4.10-16). Pauline texts also evoke a wider understanding of the concept by relating it to the contact and interaction of members of the body (Eph 4.16): a sharing of consolation (1 Thes 5.11; Rom 1.11–12), of joy (2 Cor 2.3; one Cor 12.26), of sufferings that can win life for fellow members (Col 1.24; two Cor 4.12; two Tm 2.10), and of prayer (Phil 1.19; two Cor 1.11; Phlm 22). "Edification" involves fraternal correction, encouragement, and support (1 Thes 5.11, 14); seeking what is pleasing to one's neighbor, what helps him advance in good (Rom 15.2); avoidance of foul language and making one's speech an occasion of grace for the listeners (Eph 4.29); and promoting unity in the community (1 Cor 14.26, 40). In short, the building up of the community is a good to which all else is to be directed (1 Cor 14.26).

The process is itself directed to a higher end. As a house is built for the one who will dwell in it, so Christians are being "built together to become a dwelling place for God in the Spirit" (Eph 2.22), another way of saying they are growing "into a temple holy in the Lord" (2.21). Edification is thus a religious act: its end is the consummate indwelling of the Divine Persons.

Bibliography: J. PFAMMATTER, Die Kirche als Bau (Analecta Gregoriana 110; 1960). O. MICHEL, in G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 5:122–161. P. BONNARD, Jésus-Christ édifiant son église (Neuchâtel 1948). G. W. MACRAE, "Building the House of the Lord," American Ecclesiastical Review 140 (1959) 361–376. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 286. Y. CON-GAR, The Mystery of the Temple (Westminster, Md. 1962). P. S. MINEAR, Images of the Church in the New Testament (Philadelphia 1960).

[G. T. MONTAGUE]

EDIGNA, BL.

Virgin; d. Puch, near Fürstenfeldbruck, Bavaria, Feb. 26, 1109. According to legend she was the daughter of a French king and fled to Bavaria rather than abandon her vow of virginity and accept marriage as her father directed. She reputedly lived there in a hollow linden tree from which, after her death, holy oil flowed, but when merchants tried to sell the oil, the flow stopped. She is still honored at Puch, where she is buried, as patroness against theft.

Feast: Feb. 26.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:674–675. R. BAUER-REISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns, 5 v. (St. Ottilien 1949–55) 3:46–47. M. J. HUFNAGEL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² 3:660.

[J. C. MOORE]

EDMUND OF ABINGDON, ST.

Archbishop of Canterbury (1234–40) and theologian; b. Abingdon (Berks.), c. 1170 of obscure parents; d. Soisy (Seineet-Marne), France, Nov. 16, 1240. He attended the schools of Oxford and Paris, incepted at Paris and taught arts at Oxford c. 1194 to 1200, and returned to Paris for theology, which he taught at Oxford c. 1214 to 1222. He was appointed treasurer of Salisbury cathedral in 1222, was elected archbishop in 1233, and consecrated April 2, 1234. Elected at a time of national crisis, he averted civil war by his firm leadership, reconciling the party of Richard the Marshal to King HENRY III and forcing the king to reconstruct his council. His episcopate was stormy and litigious. The hagiographical tradition that indicates his withdrawal into voluntary exile, though primitive, lacks historical basis. He was on his way to the papal Curia when he died. He was buried at PONTIGNY abbey, which became the center of his cultus. The only works of his that have been identified are two sermons, his Moralitates in Psalmos and the famous Speculum ecclesiae; the last is an ascetical treatise designed, in its original form, for religious and inflated with didactic matter of a more elementary kind. It shows a heavy debt to the school of Saint-Victor (see VICTORINE SPIRITUALITY), has exerted in turn much influence on later English spiritual writers, and is a real landmark in the history of medieval religious sentiment. He was canonized Dec. 16, 1246.

Feast: Nov. 16 (England, Cistercians).

Bibliography: EDMUND OF ABINGDON, Libellus qui dicitur Speculum ecclesiae in M. DE LA BIGNE, Bibliotheca veterum patrum et auctorum ecclesiasticorum, 8 v. (3d ed. Paris 1609–10) v. 5. Saint Edmund's "Merure de seinte église," ed. H. W. ROBBINS (Lewisburg, Pa. 1924). Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901), 1:2404–17. E. MARTÈNE and U. DURAND, Thesaurus novus anecdotorum (Paris 1717) 3:1775–1927. M. PARIS, The life of St. Edmund, tr. and ed. C. H. LAWRENCE (Oxford 1996). R. ROLLE, Yorkshire Writers, ed. C. HOR-STMAN, 2 v. (London 1895–96) 1:219–261. C. H. LAWRENCE, St. Edmund of Abingdon: A Study in Hagiography and History (Oxford 1960), complete bibliog. and discussion; Month NS 29 (1963) 213–229.

[C. H. LAWRENCE]

EDMUND THE MARTYR, KING OF EAST ANGLIA, ST.

Reigned 855 to 870; b. c. 841; d. November 20, 870. According to ABBO OF FLEURY, his first biographer (c. 987), Edmund was a virtuous king, who was defeated by the Danes. He delivered himself into captivity to save his people. He refused to forswear his faith and was shot with arrows and beheaded at or near Hoxne in Suffolk. Within 40 years he was considered a saint and martyr. In the reign of Athelstan his body was translated to the later BURY-ST.-EDMUNDS. St. Edmund was one of the most widely venerated native saints in Anglo-Saxon England. More than 60 churches were dedicated to him. He is usually represented with crown and arrows and considered a patron against the plague.

The English Benedictines and the Dioceses of Birmingham, Northampton, and Westminster observe his feast on November 20.

Bibliography: Sources. AELFRIC, Lives of three English saints, ed. G. I. NEEDHAM (London 1966). Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey, ed. T. ARNOLD (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores) 96.1:3–50, 93–103. T. D. HARDY, Descriptive Catalogue of Materials Relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores) 26.1.2:526-538. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901), 1:2392–2403. JOCELIN DE BRAKELOND, Chronicle of the Abbey of Bury St Edmunds, tr. of Chronica, tr. D. GREENWAY and J. SAYERS (Oxford 1998). H. KJELLEMAN, La Vie Seint Edmund le Rei (Göteborg 1935). M. E. PORTER and J. H. BALTZELL, "The Old French Lives of Saint Edmund King of East Anglia," Romanic Review 45 (1954) 81-88. A. BELL, "Notes on Two Anglo-Norman Saints' Lives," Philological Quarterly 35 (1956) 48-59. Literature. La Passiun de Seint Edmund, ed. J GRANT (London 1978). E. BORDIER, Des reliques de saint Edmond, roi et martyr (Paris 1971). R. STANTON, A Menology of England and Wales (London 1887) 185-186, 559-561. F. HERVEY, ed., The History of King Edmund the Martyr (London 1929). W. BONSER, An Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Bibliography, 450-1087, 2 v. (Berkeley 1957) v.1, nos. 1174, 3627, 4326-35, 4411. B. HOUGHTON, Saint Edmund: King and Martyr (Levenham 1970). L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien (Paris 1955-1959) 3.1:410-411.

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

EDOMITES

A Semitic people who, during OT times, inhabited the highlands east of the ARABA, south of the Dead Sea. Their territory was bounded on the north by the Zared (Zered) Valley, beyond which dwelt the MOABITES. The name Edom (Heb. 'ědom) is derived from the Semitic root meaning red and was given to the land because of the reddish color of the sandstone of that district. Israelite folklore gave the name first to the eponymous ancestor of the Edomites (whom they identified with ESAU) but, by a popular etymology, derived it from the red stew for which he sold his birthright to the Patriarch JACOB (Gn 25.29–34). The Genesis stories concerning the relations between the twin brothers Jacob and Edom-Esau (25.19-34; 27.1-28.9; 32.4-33.20) reflect the Israelite consciousness of close kinship with the Semitic Edomites as well as the rivalry that existed between these peoples throughout much of their history. The passing of the birthright and blessing from the first-born twin to his junior was seen as an indication of divine election (see Mal 1.2-5) but also reflects the barren nature of the Edomite territory as compared to Israel's and the ascendancy of Israel during much of their history (see Gn 27.24-40).

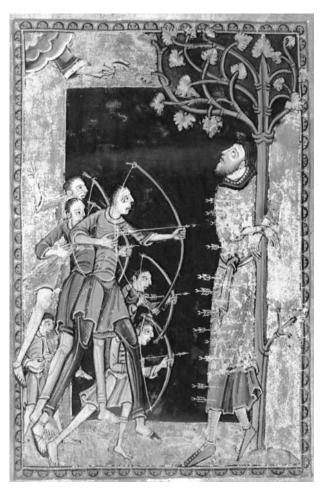

Little is known with certainty of the origins of the Edomite kingdom. Archeological investigations, especially those of N. Glueck, have shown that nomadic invasions (c. 1900 B.C.) destroyed the civilization that had flourished earlier in this region. The invaders may have continued to live there as nomads and may have been the Horrites whom Dt 2.12 says the Edomites drove out when they settled there. At any rate, there was again a settled population there before the close of the 13th century B.C. This archeological finding accords with the Biblical tradition that the Israelites en route to the invasion of Palestine were forced, by the determined opposition of the inhabitants, to detour around Edom (Nm 20.14–21; Dt 2.1–7). A list of eight Edomite kings who ruled before the Israelite monarchy was established is given in Gn 36.31–39 and one Chr 1.43–54, and Gn 36.1–19 lists the clans and subclans of Edom.

The Israelites, under DAVID, conquered the Edomites and annexed their territory (2 Sm 8.13–14). This was a great step forward for the Israelite economy, since the conquest gave them access to trade with Arabia, both overland and through the port at Asiongaber (Eziongeber) on the Gulf of Aqaba; it also gave them access to the rich mineral deposits along the Araba. Solomon exploited these advantages by mining ore and erecting an extensive copper refinery (not mentioned in the Bible) and by building THARSIS (i.e., seagoing) vessels for the Red Sea trade (1 Kgs 9.26–28).

The Edomites, to whom this subjection was hateful, tried on several occasions to rebel against Israel, but as long as Israel remained a united kingdom they were unsuccessful (see 1 Kgs 11.14-22). After the division of the kingdom it would seem that Juda continued to exercise control as far south as the Gulf of Aqaba and may have continued to hold parts of Edom. King Josaphat (c. 849 B.C.) ruled Edom and continued to use Asiongaber (1 Kgs 22.48–49); he was able both to pass through Edomite territory when aiding Joram, King of Israel, in his attempt to subdue Moab and to count Edom's king as an ally in this venture (2 Kgs 3.1-27). Under Joram, King of Juda (c. 849-c. 842 B.C.), Edom successfully revolted (2 Kgs 8.20-22), but was reconquered by Amasia (c. 800-c. 783 B.C.); Amasia's son Azaria (c. 783-c. 742 B.C.) reopened Elath-either near Asiongaber or identical with it-and the Red Sea trade (2 Kgs 14.7, 22). During the 8th century B.C. the Edomites, like all their neighbors, came under the power of the ever-expanding empire of the Assyrians; they are listed (see J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament [2d rev. ed Princeton 1955] 182) as paying tribute to Tiglath-Pileser III (745-728 B.C.). When the Assyrian Empire had been defeated by the Babylonians, the Edomites became subject to the latter. Later, when the people of Judah had been conquered and exiled by the Babylonians, the Edomites saw an opportunity to take for themselves at least a portion of the defenseless land and they occupied part of the Negeb, thus extending their territory to the west of the Araba. For their hostile attitude toward the Israelites, the Edomites were strongly denounced by the Prophets (Is 34.5-7; 63.1-6; Ez 25.12-14; Book of ABDIA).

In NT times the Edomites, now a mixed people known as Idumeans were ruled by the Herod family.

"Martyrdom of St. Edmund," manuscript illumination from a "Life of St. Edmund," c. 1125–1150.

From this dynastic family came HEROD THE GREAT, to whom is attributed the slaughter of the Holy INNOCENTS; his son HEROD ANTIPAS, while tetrarch of Galilee, mocked Christ during His Passion and sent Him back to Pilate to be condemned to death.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 620–624. L. GROLLEN-BERG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg1957–65) 3:663–664. M. NOTH, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:308–309. F. M. ABEL, Géographie de la Palestine, 2 v. (Paris 1933–38) 1: 280–285. A. LEGENDRE, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX (Paris 1895–1912) 3.1:830–837. A. MUSIL, Arabia Petraea, 3 v. in 4 (Vienna 1907–08), v. 2 Edom. V. MAAG, "Jakob-Esau-Edom," Theologische Zeitschrift 13 (1957) 418–429. N. GL-UECK, "The Civilization of the Edomites," Biblical Archaeologist 10 (1947) 77–84. W. F. ALBRIGHT, "The Horites in Palestine," From the Pyramids to Paul, ed. L. G. LEARY (New York 1935) 9–26.

[W. M. DUFFY]

EDUCATION (PHILOSOPHY OF)

A term popularized by John Dewey (1859–1952) to signify a study of the fundamental principles of the theory of education, as distinguished from the "science of education," i.e., the empirical study of the educational process, and from the "art of education," i.e., the techniques or methods of educational practice. For Dewey, the philosophy of education dealt principally with the values or goals of education.

The history of educational thought indicates that fundamental questions of a philosophical type have been raised concerning (1) the nature of man as he is capable of being educated, (2) the goal or the character of the truly educated man, (3) the trained abilities that man acquires in achieving this goal, and (4) the agents by which man is educated. In this context the term "education" should not be limited to merely academic training, but rather taken in its widest sense of the development of all facets of human personality-physical, moral, and intellectual-in their individual and social aspects. On the other hand, the term "philosophy of education" is most properly restricted to a study of education in the light of reason, leaving to a theology of education the profounder questions that can be explored only in terms of a divine revelation concerning the nature and destiny of man.

1. HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

Every human culture has provided some form of education by which it has transmitted a cultural heritage to its young and by which it has striven to prepare them as members of society. In primitive cultures and in the ancient civilizations of Mesopotamia, Egypt, etc., this task was conceived primarily as the inculcation of a traditional wisdom and way of life sanctioned by experience and by some divine approval, in contrast with the foolishness of youth or of the wickedness of adulthood. In the great ancient civilizations this came to be embodied in sacred books, which after long development crystallized an accepted way of wisdom. Education then became a process of inculcating these sacred books and expounding their application to the varying circumstances of life. This form of education is not dead but remains at the base of world education. For Christians, the Sacred Scriptures embody the wisdom of a long human past elevated by a prophetic vision of man's ultimate destiny, and they believe that this vision will eventually be the source of cultural unity for the whole world, not destroying other ancient cultures, but integrating them.

With the rise of Greek civilization, however, a more specific conception of a civic or secular education appeared, paralleled, it seems, by something similar in the Confucianist tradition of China. This new view saw education as the preparation of a class of free men who, in societies based on slavery, were prepared to be citizens capable of debating questions of the common good. In such an education the predominant discipline was the art of persuasion, called rhetoric, but this needed to be supported by a broad culture, which made a man conversant with human nature and public affairs. This kind of education was first fostered in Greece by the Sophists and, with the sponsorship of the Stoics, passed to the Roman Empire, where it flourished until the Dark Ages. Renewed in the Carolingian and the12th-century renaissance, it came to dominate the whole educational tradition of Europe from the full Renaissance of the 15th century until the 19th century in the form of the so-called classical or humanistic education (see CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE).

During the 19th and 20th centuries a markedly different type of education came to occupy a position alongside this old literary education, and then rapidly began to supplant it, namely, scientific education with its emphasis on mathematics and experimental techniques and directed not toward citizenship but toward technology, bringing with it an extension of education to the whole population, in order to integrate it into the industrial scheme. The coexistence of these two different types of education has produced the "Two Cultures" made famous by the English writer C. P. Snow. It should not be thought, however, that this second type of education is completely new. It also has a continuous tradition going back through the Renaissance and Middle Ages to Aristotle, Plato and the early Greek physicists.

Pre-Christian Theories. Almost every philosopher in the West has reflected on these practical educational traditions and attempted to criticize and reform them. In each case the philosopher's conception of the nature of man, of human knowledge, human love, and human society, has formed the basis of a theory of human development that can be called his philosophy of education.

Socrates and Plato. The sophistical or rhetorical type of education described above had its first systematic defender in the rhetorician Isocrates (436–388 B.C.). It was vigorously opposed by Socrates (469–339 B.C.), who believed that education can not be founded on traditional wisdom alone, nor can it prepare man for mere success according to accepted social standards, but that it must rest on a profound insight into the nature of reality. The philosopher plays the role of social educator and critic; he is the "gadfly" of the republic, who by his searching questions awakens men to responsibility and deep reflection.

Following Socrates' lead, Plato (427–347 B.C.) became the most influential figure in the whole history of the philosophy of education. In his Gorgias, Protagoras, Phaedrus, and Ion he vigorously criticized an education based on literary and rhetorical studies, and in the Republic and Laws he outlined a system based on the gradual ascent of the mind, by way of mathematical and scientific studies, from traditional and popular opinion to a wisdom based on a vision of eternal principles of truth.

For Plato, man is a spiritual intellect imprisoned in a body, whose education is a revival of an innate knowledge of unchanging reality attained through a critical dialectic, in which one who has attained wisdom guides another who seeks it. Although the goal of this education is the contemplation of the Good, or the One, and is attained perfectly only in a future life, it is directive of this earthly life and results in right social action in the service of the common good.

Education, for Plato, has also a moral aspect, which is inseparably united to its intellectual progress, since the awakening of the soul to truth is accompanied and motivated by a growing love of truth. A man first falls in love with another human being because of physical beauty; then, as he becomes aware of the interior beauty of the other's soul, he comes to love him with a genuine friendship. Led by this friendship he acquires the virtue of temperance as regards sensual pleasure, and then grows to love not only an individual but society. In his love for society he acquires the virtue of fortitude in its defense and of justice in its service. In this way different levels of the soul are brought into harmony and the intellect is set free for its own ascent toward truth. The intellectual curriculum begins with play and with literature and art, in which the student grasps something of truth in images. Here the teacher must exercise a severe censorship lest the impressionable child be injured. From literature (which is a shadow of a shadow) the student passes on to the study of mathematics and astronomy (i.e., the study of a mathematical type of science), in which the mind first awakens to the possibility of genuine and stable truth. From this he goes on to dialectics, or philosophy proper, by which he criticizes all that he knows until with purified mind he awakens to an inner intuition of the Good. Once this ultimate vision is reached, man returns to judge by the light of the first principles all that he has previously learned.

The teacher of highest wisdom, who controls the rest of education, is the philosopher-king, who rules the whole state as a kind of school, arranging its games, its religion, and its laws, not with the purpose of domination but to lead its citizens to a share in his own vision and love. His right to rule is based on his own wisdom, which he has achieved only by the greatest humility and disinterestedness, after the pattern of Socrates. He teaches first by regulation of the environment, then by a mythical propaganda, but ultimately not by indoctrination but by dialectic. Since truth is innate, even in the slave, the teacher can only awaken the student by questioning and by the example of friendship. The teacher has no right to escape the responsibility of public affairs but must be a king or a counselor to kings.

In the 20th century Plato has been criticized as the forerunner of totalitarianism, but to do so is to ignore the fact that totalitarian systems set military and economic power as the goal of society to which men are subjected, while for Plato the goal is contemplation, in which the individual, like Socrates, becomes wholly free of social pressure.

Aristotle. For 20 years Plato's pupil Aristotle accepted this view of education in most of its features, but gave it a different theoretical justification. He denied the theory of innate knowledge on which it rested. For Aristotle all knowledge comes from sense experience since the soul is the form of the body and can know only through the body. Consequently he laid more stress than did Plato on individual differences, going so far as to hold that some men are natural slaves-incapable, at least de facto in Greek society, of a liberal education, although capable of a technical education. Furthermore, most free men who can be liberally educated do not attain to anything more than a small share in contemplation since they are too involved in the duties of the active life. It is only the few who by a rigorous scientific education attain to contemplation; and this, even for them, is not a direct vision of ultimate Truth, but only an indirect knowledge of God as He is reflected in the world.

Moral and intellectual education ought to be proportionate, but a man may be morally good and have little learning, and vice versa. Moral education, according to Aristotle, is much more complex than Plato pictured. Since man has to deal with a diversity of objects and situations, each type of which requires a special virtue, and virtues are acquired only by exercise, man must therefore be subject to diversified training. The ultimate source of MORALITY is to be found not in external laws or in a metaphysical vision, but in prudence, which is an intellectual virtue concerned with discovering the right means to an end in highly varying circumstances. Prudence cannot be taught—it is learned by experience—but it can be assisted by ethical analysis.

Intellectual education is not an ascent toward an ultimate vision; it consists in learning a diversity of arts and sciences, each of which has its own proper method and special purpose. Some people are apt for one discipline, some for another, and it is rare to meet a man who can excel in many. These different disciplines, however, do have a certain order, which the teacher needs to know in order to facilitate learning. Literature and logic come first as necessary tools for further learning. Then comes mathematics, not because it elevates the mind to a higher realm but because it furnishes exercises in exact reasoning concerning simple facts that even the young have experienced. According to Aristotle, next comes the study of natural science, which occupies the central position since all knowledge rests on man's experience of nature and its changes. The ethical or social sciences, which are the proper study of the matured adult citizen, can be only sketched for young students, who lack the experience and objectivity required to deal with such matters. Finally, a learned and experienced man in his 50s is ready for the study of philosophy in the full sense (metaphysics), which attempts to compare and synthesize all kinds of knowledge in order to gain some notion of the ultimate Cause of all things.

The teacher does not arouse innate ideas but seeks to help the student analyze his own experience. He does this by skillful questioning, which helps the student to perceive problems in a given discipline and to apply to them the special principles of that discipline as they are grasped from experience. The art proper to the teacher is logic, which includes literary criticism, rhetoric, and dialectics. The teacher of intellectual disciplines should make no claim to statesmanship. The statesman is a man whose prudence is based on experience of public life. The teacher is a man of wisdom, trained in scientific precision. He is also a man of research, since growth in knowledge can be based only on a more extensive acquaintance with facts. Hence, for Aristotle, moral education is the task of the father of a family and of the statesman, but intellectual education is the work of scholars, who must work together to extend learning. History, he thought, shows progress, but also regress, in knowledge.

Stoics and Early Christian Writers. The Stoics accepted much of this Platonic-Aristotelian scheme, but they insisted that education, far from being a search for truth, means the inculcation of an already achieved dogma, which is the sure guide of life. The goal of life is moral, not contemplative, and is primarily an individual rather than a social accomplishment. The teacher communicates the true doctrine to a pupil, who is thus freed from confusion and disciplined to a set mode of life, which he knows how to defend against all criticism. The early Christian writers, whose ideas were theological rather than philosophical, tended to adopt this same position, as did the Neoplatonic philosophers. The age sought a way of life that was complete and perfect and not subject to further inquiry. This attitude in its neoplatonic form became typical of Byzantine culture and of the Islamic culture derived from it.

In the Latin West, however, more dynamic possibilities eventually opened up. Here Christian writers did not merely juxtapose Greek learning and the study of the Scriptures, but attempted a new synthesis, which resulted in a new conception of education. St. AUGUSTINE (354–430), developing a point of view found already in ORIGEN (182?–251?), which was rooted in Platonic theory, defended the liberal arts and philosophy as a useful preparation for a profound study of the Scriptures (see PLATONISM). Boethius (475–525) added to this some elements of the Aristotelian tradition. Eventually, this resulted in the scholastic system of the high Middle Ages, best expressed in the views of St. Thomas Aquinas, which are detailed below (see SCHOLASTICISM).

Middle Ages and Renaissance. The educational ideas of the nominalists and the other schools of the 14th century have as yet been little examined by historians. The thinkers of the Renaissance were much concerned with educational theory, since the predominant theme of the period was the idea of human perfectibility. This emphasis was not in itself anti-Christian as is sometimes thought. It was continuous with the medieval view of man as the image of God. The Middle Ages, however, emphasized the notion of God as exemplar, man's fallen condition, and his need for restoration to the divine likeness. The Renaissance, struck with the high degree of human perfection portrayed in pagan literature, and under the leadership of a rising class of educated laymen, wished to emphasize the education of man as a citizen of this world. They found much in Plato and Aristotle to their liking, but drew heavily on Quintillian (35?-95), whose views were those of the old sophistic, rhetorical education. The educational philosophers of the period attempted to paint a picture of the ideal aristocratic gentleman. As a result, to the 20th century their educational theory seems rather narrow and idealistic, as it is found in Giovanni Boccacio (1313-75), Pier Paolo VERGERIO (1349–1420), VITTORINO DA FELTRE (1378–1446), or Bl. John DOMINICI, OP (1356–1419), the last representing a clerical reaction to the general trend. In these writers the accent is on "the whole man," with a tendency to emphasize moral, rather than intellectual cultivation. It is also notable that they were concerned more with education of the very young than with the whole range of education portrayed by Plato and Aristotle. Intellectual culture was thought of as primarily literary and rhetorical, and the study of culture itself was moralistic rather than theological, as, e.g., in ERASMUS (1466-1536) and Juan VIVES (1492–1540). The triumph of this rhetorical approach is to be found in Peter RAMUS (1515-72), but Christian humanism of this general type continued in many writers down to François de la Mothe FÉNELON (1651-1715). Some writers of this tradition, such as John Amos COME-NIUS (1592-1670), emphasized child psychology in learning.

Scientific Education. The new intellectual tendency that was ultimately to range scientific education alongside humanism as a powerful competitor appeared clearly with René DESCARTES (1596–1650), although its roots go back to Italian universities and to the Oxford of Thomas Bradwardine (c. 1291–1349). It was characterized by its accent on mathematics as the fundamental educational discipline, after which all others were to be modeled. Descartes did not develop an educational theory as such, but his influence was very powerful, with his stress on clarity of thought and on deductive procedure in teaching, and his tendency to regard man's imaginative and emotional life as a hindrance to thought and therefore to be rigorously controlled. Reinforced by Calvinistic views of human sinfulness, Descartes' ideas greatly influenced JANSENISM. In England the Cartesian view was not accepted. Rather, the EMPIRICISM of Francis BACON (1561-1626), with its stress on factual information, practical relevance, and the importance of progress in discovery, came to dominate the intellectual scene, but without greatly influencing education. In the Essay Concerning Education of John LOCKE (1632–1704), the humanistic and moralistic tradition is still present, modified only by Locke's emphasis on utility.

Later Developments. The next strikingly new educational approach, and perhaps the most influential for the whole modern period, is that of Jean Jacques ROUS-SEAU (1712–78), who reacted sharply against both narrow Cartesian rationalism and British empiricism.

Naturalism. Rousseau put great emphasis on the nature of the child to be educated. Artificial cultivation imposed on the child results not in true education he maintained, but rather in the corruption of the child, just as civilization has been the corruption of mankind. Reviving themes as old as the Greek Cynics, Rousseau insisted that natural man is good (the doctrine of original sin had already been expelled by the rationalists of the preceding century), and should be given a chance to develop his natural potentialities. What is most important in man are the moral qualities, especially the goodness of heart that is spontaneously humanitarian. Intellectual development is of secondary value since the truths by which man lives are naturally sensed by every good man. For Rousseau, as the general good sense of mankind is ultimately the safest guide in moral and social matters, so the best form of government is democracy. In Rousseau's system, little needed to be said about the curriculum. The teacher is above all a good example and a wise friend who permits the student to develop naturally.

Rousseau's philosophy received support from the critical philosophy of I. KANT (1724–1804), who, without accepting Rousseau's permissiveness, nevertheless stressed the moral character of education, which he based on an autonomous sense of duty rather than on an objective norm. At the same time, Kant accepted the remarkable synthesis of mathematicism and empiricism forged by Isaac Newton. Moral life, however, he believed to rest not on science but on a conviction of the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, and the moral law, all of which are not subject to metaphysical proof but are simply demanded by the moral needs of the individual and of society. Education seeks above all to confirm these moral convictions. On the intellectual level the way is open to an education that is highly scientific and technical in character.

Psychological and Idealistic Theories. Johann Herbart (1776-1841) who stressed the view that all new learning must be in the context of what has already been learned by the child from previous experience, devised a practical methodology of teaching based on this principle. Among the practical educators and theorists, Johann Heinrich PESTALOZZI (1746-1827) was the most famous. He attempted to reduce this general point of view to practice in elementary education, laying most stress on letting the child learn from his own experience and interests. It has had a permanent effect through the theories of Maria MONTESSORI (1870-1956) and John Dewey, who both stressed the "child-centered" character of education; and it has been greatly reinforced by the rapid advance in child psychology by empirical methods. Although all great modern systems of state education have given lip service to the Rousseauian theory, the pressures of mass education have forced these systems to adhere, in actual practice, to a regimented discipline and curriculum.

The idealistic philosophies of the 19th century and the materialism of Karl Marx (1818–63) also stemmed from Kant and G. W. F. Hegel but took a different road. Idealistic and Marxist thinkers were primarily concerned with the notion of social history as an educative process. The whole human race is undergoing education, they held, and therefore every educational system must be judged relative to the stage in this process that it occupies. This view, which has Christian roots, received some rather fantastic formulations in such thinkers as Friedrich FRÖBEL (1782–1852). It remains of importance today, however, in that most contemporary educational theorists view education in the historical context of progress toward the future.

Nationalism. In such systems the state is usually considered the educator and education is a process of social reform. The child must be saved from an environment that is the product of an outmoded past and developed to play his part in a projected future. Thus, in the Marxist theory, it is stressed that most differences between children are not hereditary but environmental in origin. The goal of education is to produce a citizen of a new communistic society, freed from the oppressive limitations imposed by the class structure of the past. This new man will be, above all, a productive member of his society, fully equipped with the methods of science and advanced technology. The teacher is an instrument of the revolution, who assists this progressive action. (Until recently the family in the Soviet Union has played little part in education.) The teacher should make use of the best methods of modern psychology (i.e., the Pavlovian theory of step-by-step conditioning).

Democratic Education. Like Marx, John Dewey had a Hegelian background. He saw education as a process of social reconstruction. For Dewey, as for Marx, the modern scientific method is the key to control over nature and society. He insists that this method is above all a process of searching, inquiring, and problem solving, a method that does not rest on fixed principles. It is a social process, since this inquiry involves the interplay of many minds engaged in free discussion about common needs. The purpose of education is to develop this type of probing intelligence, which alone will make it possible for man to survive in the evolutionary struggle. This survival will itself be possible only if both society and the school are democratic and if the teacher acts as a guide to help the child to fulfill his potentialities. The child, as a growing organism, product as he is of evolution, naturally seeks this free type of growth. The teacher therefore seeks not to inhibit but to promote growth. The moral aspect of education is found in the development of attitudes and motives reflecting this free intelligence. The child should become open-minded, cooperative, inventive, and self-disciplined. The goal of education is this practical intelligence by which the child is able to enter into an open, progressive society, one that not only seeks concrete goals but, having attained one such goal, seeks others beyond. Vague ideals without practical consequences have no place in education. The curriculum is not something fixed but grows out of the actual practical concerns of the child, who is already beginning to live his life as a citizen of the future.

Dewey's philosophy of education is a synthesis of many themes important in modern thought, particularly in its stress on the value of science, democratic society, and practical control over nature. It has been severely criticized by, among others, Robert Maynard Hutchins (1899–1977), Mortimer Adler (1902–2001), and Jacques Maritain (1882–1973). They see his view as essentially a revival of the old sophistic tradition, with its emphasis on the pragmatic orientation as opposed to the contemplative orientation of the Platonic and Aristotelian traditions. They believe that it constitutes a great narrowing of the cultural heritage of the past, capable of severing the roots of Western civilization. It is also under criticism by the newer existentialist and personalist theories of man, which stress the theme that education must awaken the individual to his responsibility for his own life and to the fundamental importance of relations between persons rather than between persons and things.

Bibliography: H. I. MARROU, A History of Education in Antiquity, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1956). W. W. JAEGER, Paideia: The Ideals of Greek Culture, tr. G. HIGHET, 3 v. (New York 1939–44; v.1, 2nd ed. 1945). R. ULICH, History of Educational Thought (New York 1945). J. S. BRUBACHER, Modern Philosophies of Education (3rd ed. New York 1962).

[B. M. ASHLEY]

2. MODERN THEORIES

Humanistic thinking during the Renaissance reflected a decided shift in philosophical emphasis from the metaphysical, eternal, and spiritual to the physical, temporal, and material. In short, the focus of concern became man rather than God. In contrast to the worldly southern humanists, Christian humanists continued to regard individual salvation as supremely important although knowledge was to have direct, practical benefit to the whole of society rather than being an end in itself.

Realism in Education. Desiderius ERASMUS (1466–1536) wrote that the practical application of knowledge to service of the community was an essential end of education, second only to service of God as man's principal duty. Impatient with deductive arguments based on assumptions of preexisting ideas, the Spanish humanist and student of Erasmus, Juan Luis VIVES (1492–1540), stated as the basis of his learning theory that the search for truth began with observations of the external world proceeding through inductive reasoning to its conclusion. Vives was the first to begin with the learner rather than with the subject matter in making proposals concerning the aims and methods of education.

Francis Bacon's (1561–1626) attempt to ''make a small globe of the intellectual world'' influenced the educational thought of the 17th-century Moravian bishop, John Amos COMENIUS (1592–1671). The latter felt that only through an education designed to bring about selfknowledge, self-control, and self-direction to God could man realize his supernatural destiny. He clung to the doctrine of innate ideas and believed that man's germinal capacities must be developed through years of formal schooling, carefully organized to correspond to stages of natural development. Guided by his concept of pansophia—universal wisdom—Comenius developed a detailed methodology by means of which the student might come to acquire a vast array of interrelated factual knowledge. It remained for John LOCKE (1632–1704), at the time of the English Restoration, to reject the doctrine of innate ideas. On the contrary, Locke argued that man's mind is a tabula rasa, a blank slate to be filled in through the effects of sensory experience and later reflection. Holding to the Greek ideal of "a sound mind in a sound body," Locke listed virtue, truth, wisdom, breeding, and learning

Locke listed virtue, truth, wisdom, breeding, and learning as the desired endowments of a "gentlemen" and violently criticized the schools of his day for imbalancing this order. To Locke, reason and discipline were all important and the disadvantages of formal schooling seemed to outweigh all the advantages.

Naturalism. In developing his own educational thought, Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU (1712–78), the epitome of romantic naturalism, extended Locke's criticism of formal education. Since Rousseau believed that man was inherently good and absolutely free, the task of education was to return him to his state of unfettered innocence. This in turn was to be achieved by rearing the child as far from the stifling influences of corrupt society as possible. The child must learn truth by himself, supplied by sense impressions and illuminated by his "inner light." Rousseau postulated natural stages of development and argued for recognition of the child's right to a life of his own. Like Rousseau, Johann Bernhard Basedow (1723-90) realized the importance of play in the life of the child and insisted on the fundamental role of the sensory perceptions in the acquisition of knowledge.

Rousseau's work influenced also Heinrich PESTA-LOZZI (1746-1827) and Friedrich FRÖBEL (1782-1852), even though these later educators rejected Rousseau's isolationist ideas by proclaiming education a socializing process and shared a conception of man as the child of God. The Swiss educator Pestalozzi hoped for the moral regeneration of mankind through love and goodness, advocated education for all, and urged that the school should be homelike and natural. For Fröbel, a German disciple of Pestalozzi, education was a process of selfrealization that aids man in unfolding the divine essence within him. The "Father of the Kindergarten," he recognized not only the socializing aspects of play but also the significance of play in developing self-activity. Insisting on the essential unity and interconnectedness of all things internal and external, the highly mystical Fröbel proposed a system of "gifts and occupations" by means of which the child might develop insight into various aspects of his world, and increased power of controlling them.

Scientism. The thought of Pestalozzi was concretized by Johann Friedrich Herbart (1776–1841), who began the development of a "science" of education through the systematic application of psychological principles to actual problems of educational practice. However, Herbart broke completely with all those who adhered to the notion of substantive mind. Rejecting the postulates of faculty psychology, he renounced all theories of innate and a priori truths and stressed instead the importance of the sense perceptions, the effects of experience, and the changes of relationships among ideas. Thus, an important task of education is to structure man's "mind" through the systematic formation of associations among ideas within the "apperceptive mass." Yet with all his stress on intellectual attainments, Herbart considered such training subordinate to the development of morality and virtue as an aim of the educational process. Harmonious social relations, self-discipline, and individual liberty attended by respect for the rights of others were more prized by Herbart than was the mere acquisition of factual knowledge.

During the same century in England, Herbert SPEN-CER (1820–1903) also discussed "liberty" and "morality" but with a considerable difference in interpretation. Spencer rejected all ultimate ideas and absolute truths and insisted that philosophy must integrate and interpret known scientific facts. He described life as an evolutionary process of endless "adjustment" of internal to external conditions and declared that morally "good" conduct is that which leads to successful adjustment. Spencer considered the function of education to be preparation for "complete living," that is, successful adaptation to one's environment, and he appraised subjects in the curriculum in terms of the contribution each could make toward selfpreservation, social and political well-being, and effective use of leisure.

Another ardent evolutionist was the prominent American psychologist and educator, Granville Stanley Hall (1846–1924), who postulated the existence of a "folksoul" and depicted the development of the individual by stages that recapitulate or repeat, on a compressed scale, the entire past experience of the race as a whole. Obsessed with the significance of the peculiar characteristics of childhood, Hall strongly opposed the traditional view of the child as a miniature adult and urged increasing awareness of children's needs. He also warned that the schools must make greater provision for individual differences and interests in order to facilitate the natural evolution of both individuals and social institutions.

Nationalism and Communism. The growing scientific interest in eugenics exemplified by Hall was distorted to a perverted extreme during Adolf Hitler's (1889–1945) National Socialist ("Nazi") regime in 20th-century Germany. Nazi doctrine singled out "Blood and Soil" as the fundamental realities of man's existence in organized society. Specifically, the Nazis sought to ensure the supremacy of the "Aryan race" in a world dominated by the German "folkish state." It was believed that not only physical type but also such individual characteristics as intellect, leadership, and even musical ability were racial traits transmitted genetically according to Mendelian principles. Recognizing the difficulty of preserving Nordic racial purity, the state asserted its priority over the rights of the individual, parents, and other social institutions in education as in other matters.

In the Socialist-Communist state, the child has likewise been considered the property of the state, which has responsibility for educating him. However, whereas the German National Socialist ideal was the cultivation of an Arvan elite, the Socialist or Communist holds as his ideal the creation of a classless society. To the Communist the determining influence on the life of society is "the mode of production of material values," so that the program of the schools is to be oriented around the concept of socially useful labor. Russian communism rests on a foundation provided by Karl Marx's (1818-83) dialectical materialism, which postulates that conflict caused by internal contradictions inherent in all natural processes is the fundamental means by which change is wrought in the world. All historical development grows out of conflict arising from competition among different socioeconomic classes in society. Translated into action by (1870 - 1924),Vladimir Lenin Joseph Stalin (1879-1953), and their successors, Marxist doctrine makes clear that the liberation of the proletariat with simultaneous formation of the ideal Socialist state can take place only through revolution and not through reform. The school, charged with molding citizens of the Socialist state, with disseminating Marxist-Leninist philosophical doctrine, and with providing vast numbers of technically skilled laborers, is inextricably connected with the political machinery of the state.

Progressivism. In 20th-century America, John Dewey (1859–1952) and his followers in the progressive movement in education have argued that democracy and not socialism represents the highest development of society and that individual freedom is to be valued over socialistic collectivism. Giving instrumental emphasis to the pragmatism of Charles PEIRCE (1839-1914) and William JAMES (1852-1910), Dewey rejected traditional metaphysical problems and focused on probability and change rather than on certainty and fixed principles. Although Dewey wholeheartedly accepted the principles of the theory of evolution, he stressed the importance of control and "reconstruction" of the environment rather than mere passive adjustment to it. Since at any stage of his existence the individual is growing and truly changing and not merely repeating the predetermined cycle of his species, education is a never ending process rather than a stable product. As "the continuous reconstruction of experience" in order to direct future action, education represents the means of continuous growth and not a commodity held passively in storage. In the years following the Depression in the U.S., Dewey and his later interpreters in the progressive movement became the target for increasingly severe criticism from many disparate sources.

Social Reconstruction vs. Tradition. George Counts (1889 - 1974)and Theodore Brameld (1904–1987) warn that drastic social reform rather than minor social adjustments are called for in the present age of crisis; hence their designation as social reconstructionists. In Dare the Schools Build a New Social Order? Counts insists that education must deal with the harsh realities of current social issues. Teachers must seek professional autonomy so that the schools will exert a pervasive influence on national social values and institutions. Stressing the importance of the behavioral sciences in a technological age, Brameld proposes the reformulation of international human goals through the achievement of a "social consensus" in which students would participate through a curriculum that focuses on the evaluation of social problems.

In sharp contrast to these critics, educational traditionalists argue that the school should refrain from involvement in immediate social problems and plans for molding the future, and should look instead to the traditions of the past for guidance in carrying on its work most effectively. Despite differences in philosophical orientation, Herman Horne (1874–1946), Isaac Kandel (1881-1965), and Robert Ulich (1890-1977) generally agree on educational goals. The school as a formal institution should concentrate on intellectual development and its course of study should be dictated by the intellectual traditions of all ages. In fact, such classical humanists as Robert Maynard Hutchins (1899-1977) and Mortimer Adler (1902–2001) champion the "Great Books" of the past as the logical foundation of the curriculum. Linguistic and mathematical skills are of basic importance, while specialized physical, social, and vocational training are best left to other agencies.

Existentialism and Analytic Philosophy. Radically different from traditional philosophies in their relationship to education, neither existentialism nor analytic philosophy seeks to develop a formal philosophy of education. Not concerned with questions of essence, existentialists such as Martin HEIDEGGER (1889–1976), Jean Paul SARTRE (1905–80), Karl JASPERS (1883–1969), and Gabriel MARCEL (1889–1973) emphasize the nature of human existence as man's fundamental concern. Man possesses absolute freedom to choose among possible courses of action but must also assume absolute responsibility for these choices. Life thus becomes a process of self-realization or, to use a favorite existentialist term, of "transcendence." Since individual involvement in life's situations is at the core of human existence, education must be oriented about the unique individual rather than the group. Hence, the existentialist influence in education makes itself felt as an argument for renewed stress on individual self-realization and responsibility in opposition to all utopian schemes involving collective choice and mass consensus.

Analytic philosophy is a movement seeking to clarify man's utterances through logical or linguistic analysis. One school of analytic philosophers, represented by Bertrand Russell (1872–1970) and his followers, prefers to analyze chains of propositions by means of symbolic logic. A second school, typified by Ludwig WITTGEN-STEIN (1889–1951), believes that the clarification of meaning in discourse is the true province of philosophy. Concerned with clarifying problems of logic and of meaning rather than with offering educational prescriptions, both groups attempt to limit themselves to providing methods for the analysis of statements made by educators.

Catholic Philosophy of Education. In close agreement with traditionalist views, Catholic educational commentators, such as Jacques MARITAIN (1882–1973), William Cunningham, CSC (1885–1961), and William McGucken, SJ (1889-1943), emphasize that belief in a personal God is essential to all Catholic thinking on any phase of human activity, including formal education. The general basis of the curriculum remains humanistic and liberal in the traditional sense but with all studies integrated through Christ. In his encyclical letter on Christian education, Pope Pius XI (1857-1939) stressed that the Divine mission of the Church entitles it to precedence over all other agencies with respect to the right to make final decisions concerning educational means and ends. Unlike totalitarian systems of education, however, Catholic philosophy maintains that the family, the state, and the Church all share in the responsibility for the education of youth. Thus, Catholic educational goals require a constant striving for intellectual excellence, social responsibility, and spiritual perfection.

While sharing many insights and methods with other educational systems, Catholic philosophy rejects any position that sacrifices the eternal and supernatural to the temporal and natural. Man is a spiritual as well as a physical being, and only the stable hierarchy of values provided by religion can serve as the integrating principle that unifies these diverse but inseparable elements. Those who follow St. Thomas Aquinas (1225?–74) in believing education to be a lifelong "process of self-activity, selfdirection and self-realization" respect the child's personal integrity and freedom while providing for necessary adult guidance. The child is the "principal agent" in the educational process while the teacher is the "essential mover" who brings potentialities to realization by giving extrinsic aid to the natural reason.

The contemplation of truth begins in this life but reaches perfection only in the next. Only when education provides the individual with a vision of the eternal and supernatural as well as an appreciation of the temporal and natural will he understand the purpose of his life on earth and realize his destiny in the life to come. For the Catholic, then, any education that attempts to achieve less than this is incomplete.

Bibliography: T. B. H. BRAMELD, Philosophies of Education in Cultural Perspective (New York 1955). J. S. BRUBACHER, Modern Philosophies of Education (3rd ed. New York 1962). N. G. MC-CLUSKEY, Catholic Viewpoint on Education (Garden City, N.Y. 1958; rev. ed. Image Bks. 1962). National Society for the Study of Education, Forty-first Yearbook, 1942, pt. 1, Philosophies of Education; Fifty-Fourth Yearbook, 1955, pt. 1, Modern Philosophies and Education. R. H. G. ULICH, History of Educational Thought (New York 1945).

[V. P. LANNIE]

EDUCATION, SCHOLASTIC

A system of education, created by the scholastics of the Middle Ages. The term scholastic, derived from the Latin schola (school), designates both the curriculum of studies and the method of teaching employed.

The foundation of scholastic education was the seven LIBERAL ARTS, taught in an elementary way in the grammar school and in greater detail in the arts faculty of the university. In grammar school the principal emphasis was on Latin grammar learned from Priscian and Donatus, verified in the Latin Psalter, and developed in simple composition. In grammar school only the simplest elements of arithmetic were taught; logic and the more difficult parts of the quadrivium were taught in the arts faculty of the university. By the middle of the 13th century the university curriculum was fully formed. Although the arts faculty had lectures on all the major books of Aristotle, the main emphasis was on logic. The reason for this was the prominence given to scholastic disputations in all the faculties, including theology and law; without the tool of logic, such scholastic exercises would have been impossible.

The method of teaching consisted of two distinct features (see SCHOLASTIC METHOD). The first feature, the basis, was the lecture (lectio), or explanation of an authoritative text. Medieval teachers considered it essential to explain first what great thinkers of the past had contributed to human knowledge. They used Aristotle for logic and philosophy, Cicero for rhetoric, Donatus for grammar, Ptolemy for astronomy, Euclid for geometry, and Boethius for arithmetic and harmonics. The second feature, unique to scholastic education, was the disputation (disputatio), or dialectical debate on critical issues arising from or occasioned by the text (see DIALECTICS IN THE MID-DLE AGES). The purpose of the formalized sic et non debate in all subjects was to secure a deeper rational and critical appreciation of the problem and principles involved. The scholastic disputation followed a strict order of discipline (ordo disciplinae) in raising questions for discussion; this order was a re-creation of the original order of discovery (ordo inventionis). The conspicuous emphasis on order and logical procedure in scholastic education led to a healthy rationalism in all areas of study, including theology, medicine, law, and philosophy. While the immediate purpose of the scholastic method was KNOWLEDGE and SCIENCE, the masters had the additional obligation to form the morals of their students. For this reason, the vote of the masters on the students was always "concerning behavior and knowledge" (de moribus et scientiis). Only a small part of scholastic education remains today in Catholic seminaries; authentic scholastic disputations have been replaced, in large measure, by seminars.

See Also: SCHOLASTICISM; SCHOLASTIC PHILOSOPHY; SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY.

Bibliography: G. A. PARÉ et al., La Renaissance du XII^e siécle: Les Écoles et l'enseignement (Paris 1933). H. RASHDALL, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, ed. F. M. POWICKE and A. B. EMDEN, 3 v. (new ed. Oxford 1936). F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, MD 1946–) v. 2–3. H. O. TAYLOR, The Mediaeval Mind, 2 v. (4th ed. London 1938). E. S. DUCKETT, The Gateway to the Middle Ages, 3 v. (New York 1938; pa. Ann Arbor 1961).

[E. G. RYAN/J. A. WEISHEIPL]

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, KING OF ENGLAND, ST.

Reigned 1042 to January 5, 1066, the last Anglo-Saxon king of England and refounder of WESTMINSTER ABBEY; b. Islip, Oxfordshire, 1004. The son of Ethelred II and Queen Emma, he was reared at ELY Abbey until the Danish invasions caused him to be exiled to Normandy. There he stayed until he was elected king of England in 1042. In a difficult situation, surrounded by hostile earls and a divided people, he contrived to keep his position by a mixture of gentleness and cunning. Pious, generous, and unambitious, he lacked the ruthlessness that the political situation required, but he was respected by all for his unworldliness and chastity: it was widely believed that his marriage to Earl Godwin's daughter Edith was never consummated. His patronage of Normans, often criticized, was not extensive, but he did make some promise of the throne to William, Duke of Normandy (WILLIAM I), though on his deathbed, according to Anglo-Saxon sources, he gave it to Godwin's son, Harold, instead. Visions and miracles were attributed to him during his life; after his death his cult was limited to Westminster, political circumstances not favoring its development. His incorrupt body was translated in 1102 by Gundulf, bishop of Rochester, but in 1138 an attempt at obtaining papal canonization failed owing to the civil war. But in 1161 ALEXANDER III canonized him, and from then onward he became one of the most popular of English saints, frequently represented in medieval art. The tradition of his personal appearance, a long, bearded face with fair or white hair, remains constant from the BA-YEUX tapestry until the time of Henry VII. His feast was extended to the universal Church by INNOCENT XI; his body rests at Westminster Abbey.

Feast: Oct. 13 (translation) in 1163; formerly Jan. 5.

Bibliography: H. R. LUARD, ed., The Lives of Edward the Confessor (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores 3; 1858). M. R. JAMES, La Estoire de Seint Aedward le Rei (Roxburghe Club 1920). M. BLOCH, "La Vie de S. Édouard le Confesseur par Osbert de Clare," Analecta Bollandiana 41 (1923) 5–131. L. E. TANNER, "Some Representations of St. Edward the Confessor," Journal of the British Archaeological Association 15 (1952) 1–12. F. BARLOW, ed. and tr., The Life of King Edward, Who Rests at Westminster (London 1962, 2d. ed. Oxford 1992); Edward the Confessor and the Norman conquest (Bexhill-on-Sea, Sussex 1966); Edward the Confessor (London 1970, 1979). AELRED OF RIEVAULX, Vita S. Edwardi regis et confessoris tr. as The life of Saint Edward, king and confessor, tr. J. BERTRAM (Guildford, Surrey 1990).

[H. FARMER]

EDWARD THE MARTYR, KING OF ENGLAND, ST.

Born c. 962; died Corfe, Dorset, March 18, 978. His succession to his father, EDGAR THE PEACEFUL, in 975 was supported by Archbishop DUNSTAN OF CANTERBURY and opposed by a faction that preferred his younger stepbrother, Ethelred, and employed the forces hostile to monasticism. He was murdered when he visited Ethelred. His body was buried at Wareham, and in 980, translated to Shaftesbury, where it was elevated by order of King Ethelred in 1001. The Vita s. Oswaldi (c. 990–1005) records miracles worked by Edward. In 1008 the king and the witan ordered the observance of his Massday. Edward is listed in the Roman Martyrology; his feast is observed in the Diocese of Plymouth.

Feast: March 18; June 20 (translation).

Bibliography: Sources. T. D. HARDY, Descriptive Catalogue of Materials Relating to the History of Great Britain and Ireland (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores) 26.1.2:579–581. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901), 1:2418–20. J. EARLE, Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1892–99) 1:121–125; 2:163–169, 181. C. E. WRIGHT, The Cultivation of Saga in Anglo-Saxon England (Edinburgh 1939) 146–153, 157–171. Literature. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:423–424. D. J. v. FISHER, "The Anti-monastic Reaction in the Reign of Edward the Martyr," Cambridge Historical Journal 10, (1950–52) 254–270. W. BONSER, An Anglo-Saxon and Celtic Bibliography, 450–1087, 2 v. (Berkeley 1957) Nos. 1296, 1322, 3589, 4411.

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

EDWARDS, JONATHAN

American Congregationalist theologian and philosopher, whose writings revitalized Calvinist theology and introduced a Christian idealistic philosophy; b. East Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703; d. Princeton, N.J., March 22, 1758. He was the son of a Congregationalist pastor and experienced early strivings after piety and a precocious interest in natural science. At Yale (A.B.1720, M.A. 1723), where he was greatly influenced by J. LOCKE's Essay on Human Understanding, he experienced a religious conversion, disposing him to "a new sense of things" and "a sweet delight in God," that was to characterize his later life and writings. In 1727 he was ordained as assistant pastor to his grandfather, Rev. Solomon Stoddard, at Northampton, Mass., and married Sarah Pierrepont. Stoddard had departed from the New England orthodoxy by admitting the unregenerate to the Lord's Supper, seeing it as a means of grace rather than a reward for the faithful, thus carrying the HALF-WAY COVENANT to its logical conclusion. On his grandfather's death in 1729, Edwards succeeded him as pastor, continuing at Northampton until 1750.

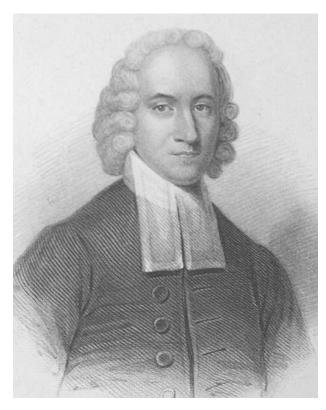

A sermon to a ministerial convocation at Boston, stressing that grace is given not primarily for the individual's good, but for God's glory, God Glorified in the Work of Redemption (Boston 1731), marked him as a defender of Calvinism and foreshadowed his more mature thought on grace and virtue. A religious revival began (1734) at Northampton, described by Edwards in A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God (Boston 1737). Edwards believed that each individual should have a personal dedication to Christ and not merely assent to a body of doctrine, but he opposed ARMINIANISM and the belief that each man was free to choose his own salvation. For Edwards, the revival was a sign of God's grace rather than a means of obtaining it. He was at first well disposed to the GREAT AWAKENING, which began soon afterward, but drew back from its excesses. He was concerned primarily with the pastoral duty of counseling souls to understand and accept God's grace working on them, never a mere revivalist seeking to make converts. In The Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the Spirit of God (Boston 1741) and Some Thoughts concerning the Present Revival of Religion in New England (Boston 1742), he attempted to distinguish true piety from false and to defend the revival movement, in its widest sense, as a genuine work of the Holy Spirit. His great work, A Treatise concerning Religious Affections (Boston 1746), was a penetrating analysis of the difference between gracious affections and fleeting emotions. He held that a genuine change must take place in the heart and that change must show itself in a lifetime of work and worship.

St. Edward the Martyr, King of England, (975–978)—after accepting a drink from his stepmother, Elfrida—was stabbed by one of her attendants. (©Bettmann/CORBIS)

A strict Calvinist himself, as well as a man of sincere personal piety, Edwards had long labored with the problems raised by his grandfather's innovation. As early as 1734 he preached on the dispositions needed to approach the Holy Table, but by 1748 he had concluded that the sacrament was intended by divine ordinance only for "visible professing Christians," excluding those who could not testify to divine regeneration. Edwards, seeking to restore the New England churches to the pure Calvinism of a congregation of the saints, evoked a storm of protest and was dismissed from his pastoral charge in 1750. Long interested in missionary work among the Indians-he had written an Account of the Life of the Late Reverend Mr. David Brainerd, missionary at Stockbridge, Mass. (Boston 1749)-he accepted (1751) a call as Brainerd's successor. Despite harassment by Northampton enemies, he labored faithfully as pastor and schoolmaster until 1758, finding time also to write his most important works, including A Careful and Strict Enquiry into the Modern Prevailing Notions of That Freedom of Will, Which Is Supposed to Be Essential to Moral Agency (Boston 1754), The Nature of True Virtue, and other philosophic treatises that were published posthumously. In 1757 Edwards accepted a call to become president of Princeton, but died soon after his arrival in January 1758. Publication of the Yale edition of his Works, edited by Perry Miller, was begun in 1957.

Jonathan Edwards. (The Library of Congress)

Bibliography: Works, ed. S. E. DWIGHT, 10 v. (New York 1829–30); Freedom of the Will, ed. P. RAMSEY (New Haven 1957); Religious Affections, ed. J. E. SMITH (New Haven 1959); The Nature of True Virtue (Ann Arbor, Mich. 1960). O. E. WINSLOW, Jonathan Edwards (New York 1940). P. MILLER, Jonathan Edwards (New York 1949). R. G. TURNBULL, Jonathan Edwards: The Preacher (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1958). D. J. ELWOOD, The Philosophical Theology of Jonathan Edwards (New York 1960). A. O. ALDRIDGE, Jonathan Edwards (New York 1964). P. G. E. MILLER, Errand into the Wilderness (New York 1957).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

EDWIN, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA, ST.

B. 585; d. Oct. 12, 633. As king of Deira (616) Edwin first united the Northumbrian kingdoms, and then became overlord of all English peoples south of the Humber except those of Kent. In 625 he married ETHELBURGA, daughter of ETHELBERT OF KENT. After his baptism by his wife's chaplain PAULINUS, Bishop of York, he opened his lands to Christianity (627). But his death in the Battle of Hatfield Chase against the pagan King Penda of Mercia halted missionary activity there. King Edwin was venerated, at least locally, as a martyr.

Feast: Oct. 12; formerly Oct. 4.

Bibliography: Sources. BEDE, Historia ecclesiastica, ed. C. PLUMMER (Oxford 1896; reprint 1956) bk. 2, ch. 5, 9–20; bk. 3, ch. 1, 6; Opera historica, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1896) 2:86, 93–117. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901), 1:2428. Literature. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:550–552. R. STANTON, A Menology of England and Wales (London 1887) 487–488, 491. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 65–66, 79–81. C. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (New York 1962).

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

EFFICIENT CAUSALITY

As commonly used, the productive action of the AGENT, or efficient cause, or the relationship of such a cause to its effect. Though philosophers prefer a broader meaning (see CAUSALITY), the terms cause and causality are usually taken to mean this sort of thing, and in what follows this usage is adopted. What this general description obscures, however, is that there may be no common or single meaning for what goes under the name of efficient cause or causality. And this may explain why philosophers have argued more over causality than over any comparable topic. The controversy is reflected already in the way such causes are classified, but it becomes yet more pronounced when one attempts to formulate the causal proposition in precise fashion or to specify the origin of man's conviction that nothing happens without a cause.

Classification. One need but review the more commonly used philosophical and theological distinctions to see what diverse meanings are marshaled under the caption of efficient cause. Many of these point up the unique way in which Christian thinkers have come to view God's causal relationship to creatures.

Primary vs. Secondary. This is particularly true of the tendency of Christians to speak of God as the first or primary cause, in comparison to whom all other agents are only secondary causes. What is implied in this way of speaking is that, since God alone is uncaused, only He exercises His causal efficacy in an absolute or independent fashion. All other agents depend on Him not only for their initial existence (as a statue depends on the creative power of the sculptor) but for their remaining in existence (which the art object obviously does not).

Productive vs. Conservative. This leads to the further distinction made by medieval thinkers between causes that are merely productive (e.g., the sculptor) and those that conserve their effect by a kind of continuous creativity. For ARISTOTLE, efficient causes are always productive, whereas the continued existence or conservation of the effect is ascribed to the material, formal, or final causes. In Neoplatonic adaptations of Aristotelian cosmogony, however, all continually creating or conserving causes responsible for the very being or existence of a thing are also classified as efficient causes. ALFARABI, AVICENNA, and AVERROËS, for example, believed God created immediately only the first and most perfect of the pure spirits or intelligences responsible for producing the animated planetary spheres. Each intelligence in turn created the one immediately below it in perfection, as well as the animated planet it moved as an unmoved mover in the manner of a final cause. Thus a hierarchy of pure spirits emanated from the creative mind of God in chainlike fashion through a peculiar type of efficient causality, reminiscent in some respects of the Christian conception of how the divine Son proceeds from the Father by an eternal and necessary form of generation.

Being vs. Becoming. Though Christian thinkers generally, from St. THOMAS AQUINAS to R. DESCARTES, admitted that only God could create in a strict sense, they retained the distinction under the title of cause of being (causa essendi) as opposed to the cause of becoming (causa fiendi). God is the only instance of the former whereas all other causes, inasmuch as they require some medium or material with which to work, fall into the latter class.

Accidentally vs. Essentially Ordered. Where a chain of such efficient causes is involved, scholastics speak of them as being accidentally ordered to one another in producing their final effect. In a series of procreative causes such as grandfather, father, son, and grandson, for instance, the offspring is not essentially dependent on his ancestors as co-causes in the actual exercise of his own generative powers. On the other hand, causes are essentially ordered to each other if they differ in kind, yet cooperate as a single principle of their common effect. Such would be a causal chain of intelligences as Avicenna described, or male and female in generation, or the mind and object according to some theories of cognition. Here neither cause can exercise its proper causality apart from the co-causality of the other; yet neither owes to this causality what it specifically contributes to the end result.

Essential vs. Coincidental. This distinction should not be confused with another philosophical classification of Aristotle and the scholastics, viz, essential (per se) vs. coincidental (per accidens) causes. Essential causes produce their effect by deliberate intent or by their very nature. Effects resulting from the chance interplay of natural causes or unintentionally happening to or produced by persons, however, are ascribed to CHANCE and to FORTUNE respectively and are called coincidences or accidents.

Free vs. Natural. This leads to a further subdistinction of essential causes into those that are free (i.e., act with foreknowledge and deliberation) and those that are natural (i.e., once the requisite external conditions are present, act in an automatic or determined fashion by reason of their nature or internal constitution). Nature, as the totality of all such causes, came to be regarded by modern thinkers as acting according to unalterable or deterministic laws, a conviction that went unchallenged until the advent of quantum theory in the 20th century.

Physical vs. Moral. The distinction between physical and moral causes reflects another extension of the notion of efficient causality as regards free agents. A physical cause produces an effect by its own direct action, either immediately or by way of some instrument, e.g., the carpenter who builds a bookshelf or the golfer who putts a ball. A moral cause, however, usually refers to a person who by appeal, threat, or the like, induces a second person to act. Here the agent must be distinguished from the motives he sets forth by way of inducement. The latter come under the category of FINAL CAUSALITY. The expression moral cause is applied also to anyone who is ethically or legally responsible for an action's taking place even though he does not make use of a free agent. Thus the man who turns his dog on a bypasser or the doctor who refuses to give his patient the proper medicine or prescribes some quack remedy instead may each be a moral cause of the damage done.

Proximate vs. Remote. Where a chain or sequence of causes is involved, it is customary to distinguish between the proximate, or immediate, cause of the effect and those more remotely related to it. As Avicenna points out, the true cause should coexist with its effect; yet what commonly goes by the name of cause is not the proximate cause but some more remote event or causal situation preceding it in time.

Univocal vs. Equivocal. Another distinction frequently used by scholastic thinkers is that of univocal and equivocal causes. The latter are unlike their effects, whereas the former produce effects of the same nature as themselves. Parents are univocal causes of their offspring, but God is an equivocal cause of his creatures. Fire applied to combustible material is a univocal cause of the resulting flame, but a painter is an equivocal cause of a portrait.

Immanent vs. Transitive. Immanent causes produce their effects within themselves; transitive causes affect something other than themselves. Any vital activity, for example, is an instance of immanent causality, since it is initiated in and by the organism and tends to perfect it. But the degree of immanence varies accordingly as it applies to the life functions of plants and animals or to such spiritual activities as thinking, feeling, willing, and the like. Divine causality, on the other hand, is described as formally immanent inasmuch as it is identified with the divine nature itself; yet it is virtually transitive inasmuch as its effects are something really distinct and other than God (see CAUSALITY, DIVINE).

Total vs. Partial. Another common distinction is that between total and partial cause. Carpenters, plumbers, or plasterers are each a partial cause of the house they construct; man, on the other hand, is said to be the total cause of his own decisions or even of such physical actions as walking, swimming, speaking, and so on.

Principal vs. Instrumental. A peculiar type of partial cause is that known as instrumental. In contrast with the principal cause or agent that produces an effect by virtue of some inherent power or action it initiates, an instrumental cause helps the principal agent do what he could not otherwise do or do so easily. Since the notion of instrument has a measure of vagueness about it, there is also some latitude as to how philosophers and theologians apply it (see INSTRUMENTAL CAUSALITY). Some require that the instrument be more or less passive, e.g., the hammer or chisel of the sculptor. Such tools produce their effect only because of the power communicated to them by the principal cause. When power tools are used, or still more, when the surgeon or radiologist merely applies an instrument with a self-contained energy source, the aforementioned interpretation needs some revising. Others extend the notion still further when they speak of all created or secondary causes as being merely instrumental agents with respect to God, and this not because God creates and conserves them, but rather because He cooperates in a special way each time they exercise their causal powers.

Scholastics commonly hold this to be the case not only with the natural causes but also with the exercise of free will, though there is no agreement as to how God concurs with man's free decisions (see BÁÑEZ AND BAÑEZIANISM; MOLINISM). All agree, however, that unless man is the principal cause of his own actions, he can scarcely be regarded as morally responsible for them. Consequently, many prefer to discuss the divine CONCURRENCE with created causes in terms of the first-named distinction between primary and secondary causality rather than in terms of that between principal and instrumental causality.

Participated vs. Unparticipated. Another way of expressing the fact that creatures exercise their own proper causality, albeit dependently on God, is to say that they share or participate in God's creativity. As the scholastics put it, creatures are called participated causes, whereas God's causality is said to be unparticipated. This medieval usage has its philosophical roots in PLATO and PLO-TINUS, for whom the transcendent world of absolute values and ideals (identified by St. AUGUSTINE with the divine mind) is that which most truly exists. Applied specifically to efficient causality, it leads the Christian thinker not only to regard God's causal action as a paradigm case of what cause means but also as that which, despite its uniqueness, is paradoxically most typical. This way of viewing things, however, tends to obscure the fact, stressed by contemporary philosophers of the linguistic school, that this notion of cause and causality is a far cry from what goes by that name in ordinary, nonphilosophical usage. Particularly among the skeptical and the agnostic, it further raises questions as to the propriety of such an extension of the usual meaning of cause and, still more, as to the validity of the traditional causal approach to the existence of God.

Causal Proposition. The force of such contemporary objections concerning the scope of application of causal notions becomes clearer from a consideration of the problems posed by any attempt to express in a general way what all or most instances of efficient causality imply. One such problem is how to put the causal relationship itself in propositional form. Perhaps the most neutral and universally acceptable statement is "Whatever begins to be has an efficient cause." This avoids such trivial and uninformative versions as "Every effect has a cause" or "No effect without a cause," where no factual criterion is given for identifying an effect or instance of efficient causality. On the other hand, it is not limited to a specific sense of cause as is the determinist's manifesto: "If, in the course of time, a state A of the universe is once followed by a state B, then whenever A occurs, B will follow it'' (P. Frank, 54). How to interpret "efficient cause" still remains to be decided. In Plato's Phile*bus* (26E), for example, Socrates asks: "Does not everything which comes into being of necessity come into being through a cause?" He goes on to describe the cause or agent as "leading" and the effect as "naturally following." If one understands this in a temporal sense, it at best describes a cause of becoming (fiendi or fieri) and not a cause of being or existence (essendi or esse), although it is the latter that figures in the proofs for the existence of God in Avicenna and Aquinas. It should be obvious that this point must be settled before one can answer satisfactorily another question often raised, viz, whether the causal proposition is a principle or a conclusion.

If PRINCIPLE be taken in its etymological sense of a starting point or first premise that needs no proof because it is either self-evident or its truth is commonly admitted, then the causal proposition may be regarded as a principle (see FIRST PRINCIPLES). It was so estimated by Plato, Augustine, and the scholastics, though they rarely called it a principle explicitly; the question of whether its denial is self-contradictory became a philosophical issue only in the 14th century with scholastics such as NICHOLAS OF AUTRECOURT. On the other hand, neoscholastics in the last quarter of the 19th century commonly cited it as a basic principle of metaphysics, and many claimed it to be an analytic truth in the Kantian sense of the term. Most of these, however, worded it in some form equivalent to "No effect without a cause," where it could be shown to be trivially true by virtue of a circular definition of terms. But when "beginning to be" or contingency was taken as the hallmark of an effect, the reputed analyticity of the proposition was soon challenged. A few contemporary scholastics influenced by I. KANT speak of it as a synthetic a priori truth, and others as a postulate of reason; the majority, however, justify it as a proposition entailed by other metaphysical doctrines, such as that of the real distinction between essence and existence or that of PAR-TICIPATION, or by the more general principle of SUFFI-CIENT REASON. [For a neoscholastic critique of this principle, see Mansuetus a S. Felice, De discordia systematis rationis sufficientis cum libertate humana . . . dissertationes septem (Cremona 1775); also A. B. Wolter, Summula Metaphysicae (Milwaukee 1958) 53-55.] See CAUSALITY, PRINCIPLE OF.

Origin of the Notion of Cause. Still another area where the precise meaning of cause figures in the controversy concerns the origin of the causal notion and the related questions of whether any causes are perceived directly or are immediately experienced or whether all instances of causal efficacy must be inferred. That things begin to be is an incontrovertible fact of experience, but there is no similar unanimity as to why man affirms causality as such. RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, for example, declares that the association of "caused" and "what begins to be" is not something directly experienced but is the fruit of a rational analysis of logical alternatives. Whatever is or can be, he points out, (1) either exists eternally or not, and (2) either exists of itself or not. Of the four possible ways of combining such disjunctive notions, only the idea of something "not eternal that exists of itself" is abhorrent to reason. "Whatever in time begins to be was once nothing," he argues. "But while it was nothing it had nothing whatsoever nor could it do anything at all. To neither itself nor to another could it give this, that it be. Otherwise it would give what it did not possess and do what it could not accomplish" (De Trin. 1.6). Richard, of course, is speaking of an idea of cause that would apply to God, and one may well grant that causa esse is not something experienced.

A. Chollet, who uses a somewhat similar argument to try to prove that the link between "what begins to be" and "cause" is a logically necessary one, insists that both notions are experienced inasmuch as consciousness reveals the fact of one's own causality. MAINE DE BIRAN had proposed this view previously on purely psychological grounds, arguing that the notion of causal force is not the result of a habit of expectancy, as D. HUME claimed, but is the result of an intuition of self as a primal source of activity. It is only by means of an inference that man transfers to external objects this force felt within himself.

More recently A. E. Michotte conducted an ingenious series of experiments at the University of Louvain, which he contends disprove the theories of both Hume and Maine de Biran. For they seem to show that man is equipped by nature to see what Michotte calls the "causal effect" in much the same way as he sees locomotion. Any two perceptual objects (be they physical or phenomenal) that move in a certain way with respect to one another will produce the causal impression. If the stimulus conditions are right, the causal impression arises even when an occurrence is observed but once; if the conditions are not right, no amount of repetition will produce an impression of causality. Like the more familiar phiphenomenon or stroboscopic movement, this impression can be produced artificially when no actual physical causality obtains. It appears spontaneously under conditions far removed from any normal situation in which the specific effect might conceivably be attributed to learning. Michotte shows the laws governing the perception of such a "kinematic form" closely resemble the Gestalt laws for the perception of static forms. His experiments, he admits, are concerned only with the phenomenon referred to as causality, not with the epistemological question of how the illusion of causality is to be distinguished from its reality.

Jean Piaget, on the other hand, believes his independent studies on the evolution of the concept of physical causality in children confirms a modified form of Maine de Biran's thesis. In his view, the origin of the concept of causality does stem from an internal experience, although the child does not recognize it as interior at the outset because the distinction between self and the external world only gradually clarifies itself. Other confirmatory evidence suggests that there is a development in a child's perception of causality, although Michotte argues that this is the result of maturation rather than of learning.

Piaget and Michotte have debated the question publicly without settling their differences, seemingly because they are studying initially different types of efficient causality. From Piaget's description almost anything that answers the question "Why?" is regarded as a cause at some stage of a child's intellectual development. Some "causes" are subsequent to their "effects" in time and take the form of a moral obligation. It is the absolute necessity ascribed to the latter, Piaget suggests, that eventually comes to be associated with the physical causality characteristic of nature. Whether this be so or not, it does seem significant that children pass through an animistic stage during which they invest inanimate objects with the kind of causal behavior they seem to understand best, viz, that of free, morally responsible agents. Michotte's work, on the other hand, leaves little doubt that, at a very early age, man without conscious inference tends to group certain temporally successive events in a causal fashion. It is not clear, however, whether the basis is wholly instinctual or partially conditioned by learning.

All this strongly suggests there are at least two fundamentally distinct empirical sources for causality, one external, the other internal. The first, studied by Michotte, could be called mechanical causality since it concerns phenomenal objects that stand in certain temporal and spatial dynamic relationships to one another. It is this relationship that seems to have been extended and generalized in the form studied by Hume and, as a deterministic postulate antedating Heisenberg's UNCERTAINTY PRINCI-PLE, was assumed to hold for the whole of inanimate creation. The other is the notion, studied by Piaget, that underlies the nonmechanical explanations of children involving the attribution of motivation and deliberate intention to inanimate objects. To the extent that these nonmechanical explanations seem to antedate mechanical ones in the gradual evolution of a child's notion of physical causality, it may not be rash to presume that this original notion stems from some primitive awareness of FREE WILL. These original notions may provide the basis for an elaborated and expanded conception of causality, in which each type in its expanded form bears traces of the alternate conception. From such initial data of experience, in fact, all the manifold types of efficient causes listed earlier may be constructed.

Conclusion. Philosophers may disagree on definitions, or challenge particular theories, or become puzzled as to how man knows causes; but few would deny the existence of causes or seriously suggest that all causal terminology be eliminated from ordinary language. L. N. TOLSTOI may well be right in his claim that "the impulse to seek causes is innate in the soul of man," for philosophers down the ages, with Richard of Saint-Victor, seem loathe to admit that something once non-existent can come to be with no originative link with any present or previously existing thing or event. The plethora of causal distinctions is itself indicative of this attitude. Man's very attempt to set up some kind of "principle of causation" represents reason's "demand for some deeper sort of inward connection between phenomena than their merely habitual time sequence seems to be" (W. James, 671).

See Also: GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF; MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed. The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World, 2 v. 1:155–178. AVICENNA, Prima philosophia, tract. 6 in Logyca, Sufficientia . . . (Venice 1508) v. 2, fol. 91r-95r. V. F. LENZEN, Causality in Natural Science (Springfield, Ill. 1954). C. FABRO, Participation et causalité selon S. Thomas d'Aquin (Louvain 1961). L. SWEENEY, A Metaphysics of Authentic Existentialism (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1965). J. OWENS, "The Causal Proposition-Principle or Conclusion?" The Modern Schooman 32 (1954-55) 159-171, 257-270, 323-339, excellent bibliog. A. B. WOLTER, presidential address in American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 32 (1958) 1–27. G. SCHULEMAN, Das Kausalprinzip in der Philosophie des hl. Thomas von Aquin (Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie und Theologie des Mittelalters 13.5; [Münster 1915]). J. GEYSER, Das Prinzip vom zureichenden Grunde (Regensburg 1929); Das Gesetz der Ursache (Munich 1933). A. CHOLLET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (Paris 1903-50) 2.2:2014-39. MAINE DE BIRAN, Oeuvres choisies (Paris 1942). A. E. MICHOTTE, The Perception of Causality, tr. T. R. and E. MILES (London 1963), with critical commentary essays and notes by T. R. MILES. J. PIAGET, The Child's Conception of Physical Causality (New York 1952). M. A. BUNGE, Causality (Cambridge, Mass. 1959). C. J. DUCASSE, Nature, Mind and Death (La Salle, Ill. 1951). V. F. LENZEN, Causality in Natural Science (Springfield, Ill. 1954). P. FRANK, Modern Science and Its Philosophy (Cambridge, Mass. 1949). L. TOLSTOY, War and Peace, Second Epilogue (Great Books 51:675-696). W. JAMES, The Principles of Psychology (1890) 2 v. (repr. New York 1962), v.2.

[A. B. WOLTER]

EGAN, MICHAEL

First bishop of Philadelphia, Pa.; b. Limerick, Ireland, 1761; d. Philadelphia, July 22, 1814. When he was 18, he entered the Franciscan Order of the Strict Observance at St. Anthony's College, Louvain, Belgium, and received minor orders and the diaconate at Malines, Belgium. He then went to Immaculate Conception College in Prague, where he was ordained and was awarded the lectorate in theology. A petition of Oct. 23, 1786, indicates that a Pater Michael Egan, one of seven Irish clerics, asked the Belgian government for clothing and funds to make this trip when they were obliged to leave Louvain because the Franciscan College there was closed.

From May 24, 1787, to May 18, 1790, Egan was guardian of St. Isidore's College, Rome. He then became guardian of the following Franciscan friaries in Ireland: Ennis, 1790 and 1794; Roscrea, 1793; and Castelyons, 1796. He immigrated to the U.S., and joined Rev. Louis de Barth at St. Mary's Church, Lancaster, Pa., in January 1802. He then went to Philadelphia, where his brother lived, and on April 12, 1803, the trustees of St. Mary's Church elected him one of their pastors. He was unsuccessful in his efforts to carry out an apostolic rescript, received Sept. 29, 1804, to found a province of the Franciscan Order in the U.S. He became a naturalized citizen of the U.S. in Philadelphia on Sept. 18, 1807.

In 1806 Bp. John CARROLL recommended Egan as ordinary for the new diocese he wished established at Philadelphia. According to Carroll, Egan appeared to be "endowed with all the qualities to discharge with perfection all the functions of the episcopacy, except that he lacks robust health, greater experience and a greater degree of firmness in his disposition. He is a learned, modest, humble priest who maintains the spirit of his Order in his whole conduct." When Pius VII established the Diocese of PHILADELPHIA in 1808, Egan was named its first bishop. Delayed because of the Napoleonic wars in Europe, the papal bulls did not arrive until 1810; Egan was consecrated by Archbishop Carroll in Baltimore, Md., on Oct. 28, 1810.

Egan's administration of Philadelphia was marred from the beginning by the trustee problem at St. Mary's, where Rev. William HAROLD, OP, and his uncle, Rev. James Harold, openly led the trustees against their bishop. Despite poor health, Egan firmly opposed them; schism was averted when the Harolds returned to Ireland in 1813. Egan died in 1814 and was buried in St. Mary's churchyard. His remains were later transferred to the crypt of the Cathedral of SS. Peter and Paul, Philadelphia.

Bibliography: M. I. J. GRIFFIN, History of Rt. Rev. Michael Egan, First Bishop of Philadelphia (Philadelphia 1893).

[J. F. CONNELLY]

EGBERT OF IONA, ST.

Abbot bishop; b. 639; d. Easter Sunday, April 24, 729. An Englishman by birth, he repaired to Ireland to study at the monastery of Rath Melsigi in Connacht. When the community was visited by a great plague, he was struck down and vowed that if cured he would willingly exile himself from England and go to Germany as a missionary. In a vision he was told that he had an even harder task to accomplish elsewhere, and he sent WIG-BERT and later WILLIBRORD to undertake the mission to Germany and Frisia. He went to Iona (Hy) in Scotland and converted the monks there to the Roman system of determining the Easter date and to the Roman TONSURE.

Feast: April 24.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 3:27, 4:26; 5:22. T. F. TOUT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:564–565. W. BRIGHT, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–1887) 2:49–50. C. J. GODFREY, The Church in Anglo-Saxon England (New York 1962).

[R. T. MEYER]

EGBERT (ECGBERT) OF YORK

Archbishop of York; d. Nov. 19, 766. He was a cousin of Ceolwulf (d. 760) and the brother of Edbert (d. 768), who succeeded Ceolwulf as King of Northumbria. He was educated at Rome and was there ordained a deacon. He became bishop of YORK in 732, and a letter of BEDE in 734 urges him to seek the elevation of his see to an archdiocese, which was granted in 735 by Pope GREGO-RY III. He fostered the school of York with ETHELBERT, later archbishop, at its head and ALCUIN as a pupil. Egbert corresponded with St. BONIFACE and wrote a Pontifical (ed. W. Greenwell, London 1853), possibly a Penitential (PL 89:443-454), and a treatise De iure sacerdotali (PL 89:379-383). The Exceptiones of Canon Law can no longer be attributed to him. He was buried in the cathedral at York. Although he is mentioned in the Benedictine martyrologies, there is no approved cult.

Bibliography: BEDE, Opera historica, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1896) 1:405–423, Bede's letter to Egbert. English Historical Documents 1:735–745. A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, v. 3 (Oxford 1871) 358–360, 388–390, letters of Boniface; 394–395, letter of Paul I; 403–413, De iure sacerdotali; 413–431, Penitential. ALCUIN, De pontificibus et sanctis ecclesiae eboracensis carmen in The Historians of the Church of York and Its Archbishops, ed. J. RAINE (RollsS 71; 1879) 386–387. Acta Sanctorum Nov. 3:744–745. H. DAUPHIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 14:1476–78. A. M. ZIMMERMAN, Kalendarium Benedictinum (Metten 1933–38) 3:334. K. WEIN-ZIERL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:668.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

EGERIA, ITINERARIUM OF

Also known as Peregrinatio Aetheriae, or "Aetheria's Pilgrimage," the work is the account of a Christian woman's three-year journey through Egypt, Palestine, Syria and ultimately back across Asia Minor to Constantinople in the fourth century. Originally entitled by its discoverer J. F. Gamurrini as, Sanctae Silviae Aquitanae Peregrinatio ad loca sancta, it has come to be more commonly identified as the Itinerarium Egeriae, "Egeriae's Travel Notes." Gamurrini discovered the text in 1884 at a religious house in Arezzo, in a manuscript from Monte Cassino that also contained fragments of the hymns of St. Hilary of Poitiers along with Hillary's Tractatus de mysteriis. The text of the Itinerarium has numerous lacunae. Both the beginning and the end of the narrative are lacking and at least two leaves from the body of the text as we have it are missing as well. Scholarly conjecture varies as to the date of the journey (late fourth to early fifth century), with the weight of opinion favoring an earlier dating, possibly the years 381-384 A.D. The precise identity of the traveler and her station in life cannot be determined with certitude. Was she a highborn person with ties to the imperial court? Was she a pious but worldly laywoman of the bourgeoisie? Was she a religious woman? Similary, the particular region of the Empire from which she haled (southern Gaul, either Aquitaine or Arles; Galicia in northwestern Spain; or, as has more recently been argued, Normandy) is a matter of conjecture Literarily, it is in the form of a letter addressed both to a group of women (dominae sorores) and to a person in authority, either an ecclesiastic or an imperial official (vestra affectio), written in a familiar style that mirrors the vulgar or spoken Latin of the Late Empire. It has proven to be a mine of information for philologists, who have analyzed its Latinity for what it reveals of the morphology, the syntax, the fund of vocabulary, even the phonology of the spoken idiom that was slowly evolving in late antiquity into Proto-Romance, out of which would emerge the medieval and modern family of Romance Languages. It is a critical document as well for liturgists and ecclesiologists, particularly historians of monasticism, for geographers and topographers, for students of travel narrative, even for scholars working in women's studies. Although Egeria tends to efface her authorial self before the data that she records, she does emerge as a writer with a distinct literary personality manifested in a lively style blending the spontaneity of oral speech craft with more learned elements to translate vividly, and at times with some humor and even deep emotion, the multifarious experiences of her journey. Moreover, she is the first Christian woman to have authored a book-length text in Latin, and she testifies to the role played by women, religious in church life, even singling out one by name, the deaconess Marthana, whom she encountered in Jerusalem and subsequently visited at her monastery for women at Seleucia of Isauria in Asia Minor.

The Itinerarium's two parts. The text is divided into two parts. The first, composed of twenty-three chapters, recounts Egeria's travels to various pilgrimage sites in the Judaeo-Christian Near East; the second, slightly longer and divided into twenty-six chapters numbered 24 through 49, gives a detailed account of the liturgy of the Church of Jerusalem. The two parts differ substantially from one another, not only in content, but also in genre, form and style. Generically, the first twenty-three chapters constitute an authentic travel narrative and belong to the sub-genre of the pilgrimage. They are arranged chronologically and present the events of the journey sequentially. Speaking in her own name or in that of her fellow travelers, Egeria recounts four distinct journeys, the first three of which she undertook while based in Jerusalem, with the last being her homeward journey, in the course of which she made an extensive detour to visit Edessa and biblical sites associated with the sojourns of Abraham and Jacob at Harran. Indeed, Egeria's various journeys are exclusively motivated by a desire to see first-hand, and to pray at, sites mentioned in Scripture or hallowed by tradition, and to speak with the ecclesiastical personnel-whether bishop, priest, monks or nuns (parthenae, virgines)-associated with these sites. Thus, she travels to Sinai, where the text of the Arezzo manuscript begins, ascends the sacred mountains of Sinai and Horeb, lodges at the monastery, before retracing in reverse the early stages of the Exodus, visiting sites in the Biblical land of Gessen (chs. 1-9). There follow shorter journeys via Jericho to Mount Nebo (chs. 10-12), and by way of the Jordan valley to the reputed site of Job's grave in Idumea, in the course of which she passes through places associated with John the Baptist, Elias and Abraham and Melchisedech (chs. 13-16). Edessa, because of the reputed correspondence between Christ and King Abgar, became the focus of a major pilgrimage, motivating her to interrupt her homeward journey to travel there from Antioch across the Euphrates into Mesopotamia (chs. 17-21). The journey from Antioch to Constantinople (chs. 22–23) is marked by visits to the shrines of Saint Tecla in Seleucia of Isauria and of Saint Euphemia in Chalcedon. The pilgrimage-journey is a never-ending act, however, for, having once reached Constantinople, she informs her correspondents that she is projecting a visit to Ephesus to offer prayer at the tomb of the Apostle John.

The second part of the Itinerarium, written largely in the impersonal style of the reporter-witness, represents a summary of what she observed of the religious life of the Christian community of Jerusalem over a three-year period. Her account is ordered according to the unfolding of the daily, Sunday and annual liturgy of that community, with a lengthy excursus (chs. 45-47) on the catechetical instruction given by the bishop to candidates for baptism. Egeria's text (chs. 24-25) is the first to describe the order of a regular daily office, consisting of the Vigiliae Nocturnae, divided into two parts; a Vigilia matutina, which takes place while it is still night, and a morning office, which begins at daybreak and at which the bishop presides-Sext and Nones; and Vespers (lucenarium). In Lent, Tierce is also observed. Except for Vespers, where the laity are numerous, these are essentially monastic offices. On Sundays, there is first a pre-service outside the Anastasis attended by a large crowd of religious and laity, then within the church proper an Office of the Resurrection at which the bishop presides, followed by the morning office and concluding with the celebration of the eucharist in the Martyrium. In her description of these offices, Egeria stresses the aptness of the hymns, prayers and readings and calls attention to the numerous blessings and dismissals.

Unique to the Church of Jerusalem's observance of the liturgical year is the convergence of historical and commemorative space permitting the celebration of feasts to be held on the sites associated with their occurrence, with the result that the ritual is characterized by numerous processions to and from stational churches within and without the city. Egeria begins her description of the liturgical year with an incomplete account of the Epiphany and its Octave (ch. 25), followed by the Feast of the Presentation (ch. 26), before moving on to the ceremonial order of the first seven weeks of Lent culminating in the celebration of Lazarus Saturday (chs. 27-29). The liturgy of Holy Week (septimana major) is presented in minute detail: Palm Sunday (chs. 30-31); the commemorative rites associated with the observance of the Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of Holy Week (chs. 32-34); finally, the elaborate and emotionally-charged celebration of Holy Thursday and Good Friday (chs. 35-37). There follow accounts of the observance of the Easter Vigil (ch. 38), Easter and its Octave (39-40) and the Paschal Season (ch. 41). The Ascension (ch. 42), interestingly, is observed with a Wednesday vigil in Bethlehem followed by a Thursday morning mass in the Church of the Nativity. The daylong observance of Pentecost (ch. 43), which also includes a commemoration of the Ascension, is marked by vast throngs processing to all major stational churches of the city and its environs. This is followed by a summary of liturgical practices in Ordinary Time after Pentecost (ch. 44) and an incomplete account of the Feasts of the Finding of the Cross and the Dedication of the Constantinian basilica (dies enceniarum) observed in September, with monks from Egypt, the Thebaid, Syria and Mesopotamia coming up to Jerusalem. What other feasts Egeria may have described we cannot know, since the manuscript breaks off at this point.

By dint of reiteration a detailed liturgicoecclesiological topography of Jerusalem and environs impresses itself upon the reader. The focus of the Church of Jerusalem's liturgy was the complex of the Anastasis, comprising various churches, chapels and atria to which Egeria repeatedly refers: (1) the Anastasis proper, a church in the round built over the reputed site of Christ's burial and adjoining the bishop's house, which was the chief locus of the daily Office; (2) the atrium of the ante Crucem, the Calvary (ad Crucem) and the area behind (post Crucem), to which the congregation processed daily for the conclusion of vespers and where various ceremonies of numerous feasts, notably the Good Friday liturgy, were observed; (3) the Martyrium (ecclesia major), where the Sunday eucharistic liturgy as well as that of most principal feasts were celebrated; and (4) the Quintana Pars, the great doorway opening from the city's major thoroughfare and through which the congregation processed on Pentecost. The Syon, called the mother of all churches and built on the site of the apostles' upper room, was the chief locus of the Pentecost litgurgy and figures prominently as a stational church for great feasts and in the weekly liturgy in Ordinary Time. Outside the city are situated the Eleona on the Mount of Olives, commemorating the place where Christ taught his disciples, with the Imbomon, the traditional site of the Ascension nearby; and Gethsemane, the "elegant church" (ecclesia elegans). Also mentioned are the chapel on the road to Bethany, where Christ was met by Lazarus's sister and, in Bethany itself, the Lazarion or Church of Lazarus, as well as the grotto of the Nativity in Bethlehem. Not to be forgotten are the numerous churches she mentions in the course of her various journeys, for example, the Opu Melchisech at Sedima (Salem).

Salient points. From Egeria's narrative emerge a number of salient points about the conditions of travel in late antiquity (for example, the use of military escorts in unsure areas; the hospitality afforded travelers in monasteries; the road network and the way stations, mansiones, along various itineraries) and about the religious life of eastern Christianity. She stresses, for example, the prevalence and importance of monasticism not only in Jerusalem but wherever she traveled, along with the role of monks and women, religious in the liturgy, without, however, neglecting the participation, especially during great feasts, of the laity. She spells out the rules for fasting at different seasons of the year: Wednesdays and Fridays in Ordinary Time; everyday except Sundays in Lent; none during the Paschal Season. She discusses the daily threehour catechetical instruction given to catechumens by the bishop throughout Lent as well as during the Easter Octave, when, after baptism, they were initiated into the deeper mysteries (mysteria Dei secretiora). Her text is also an important document for the meaning of liturgical and ecclesiological vocabulary, notably for a term like missa. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, Egeria embodies in her person the pilgrim-traveler figure, who combines an intrepid spirit of adventure with a reverential quest for the authetification of belief through a vicarious reliving of the mysteries of faith in situ.

Bibliography: Itinera Hierosolymitana saeculi iv-viii, ed., P. GEYER (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum, 39, 1898). L. SPITZER, "The Epic Style of the Pilgrim Aetheria," Comparative Literature, 3 (1949): 225-58. Ethérie: Journal de voyage, ed. and tr., H. PÉTRÉ, (Sources chrétiennes 21, 1948; rev. ed., 1982). Itinerarium Egeriae, eds., E. FRANCESCHINI and R. WEBER (Turnhout, Bel. 1958). J. MATEOS, "La Vigile cathédrale chez Egérie," Orientalia Christiana Periodica, 27 (1961): 281-312. A. A. R. BASTIAEN-SEN, Observations sur le vocabulaire liturgique dans "l'Itinéraire d'Egérie'' (Nijmegen 1962). P. DEVOS, ''La Date du voyage d'Egérie," Analecta Bollandiana, 85 (1967): 165-94. Egeria: Diary of a Pilgrimage, tr. and annot. G. E. GINGRAS, ACW 38 (Washington, D. C. and Paramus, N. J. 1970). G. E. GINGRAS, "Et fit missa ad tertia: A Textual Problem in the Itinerarium Egeriae, XLVI, 4," in Kyriakon. FS Johannes Quasten, vol. 2, ed., P. GRAN-FIELD and J. A. JUNGMANN (Munster 1970): 596-603. CHR. MORH-MANN, "Egérie et le monachisme," Corona gratiarum I Misc. Dekkers (Brugge 1975): 163-80. G. SANDERS, "Egérie, saint Jérome et la Bible: en marge de l'Itinerarium Egeriae, 18,2; 39,5; et 2,2," ibid., 181-99. Egeria's Travels to the Holy Land: Newly Translated with Supporting Documents and Notes by John Wilkinson, 3d ed. (Warminster, Eng. 1999). P. DEVOS, "Une Nouvelle Egérie," Analecta Bollandiana 101 (1983): 43-70. V. VÄÄNÄNEN, Le Journal-Epitre d'Egérie (''Itinerarium Egériae''). Etude linguistique (Helsinki 1987). J. SCHWARTZ, "The Encenia of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Temple of Solomon and the Jews," Theologische Zeitschrift, 43 (1987): 265-81. C. WEBER, "Egeria's Norman Homeland," Harvard Studies in Philology, 92 (1989): 437-56. J. M. SNYDER, The Woman and the Lyre: Woman Writers in Classical Greece and Rome (Carbondale and Edwardsville, Ill. 1989): 141-51. Atti del convegno internazionale sulla Peregrinatio Egeriae. Arezzo 23-25 ottobre 1987 (Arezzo 1990).

[G. E. GINGRAS]

EGIDIO MARIA OF ST. JOSEPH, BL.

Franciscan lay brother; b. near Taranto (Apulia), Italy, Nov. 16, 1729; d. Naples, Feb. 7, 1812. He practiced his father's trade of ropemaking and supported the family after his father's death (1747). Before entering the Alcantarine Franciscans at Taranto (1754) under the impetus of an extraordinary spiritual experience, he led a very devout life and participated zealously in the activities of the Sodality of Our Lady of the Rosary. From 1759 to 1812 Egidio (whose name outside religion was Francesco Pontello) lived at the friary of San Paolo a Chiaia in Naples, where he labored as cook, porter, and alms gatherer (quaestor). His simplicity and serenity won him the affection of the Neapolitan sick and poor, among whom he propagated devotion to Mary and Joseph. He was beatified Feb. 5, 1888.

106

Feast: Feb. 7.

Bibliography: P. COCO, Cenni della vita del beato Egidio Maria di S. Giuseppe, taumaturgo di Taranto (Taranto 1931). M. A. HABIG, The Franciscan Book of Saints (Chicago 1959) 89–92. Acta ordinis minorum 7 (1888) 18–20.

[C. J. LYNCH]

EGINO, BL.

Benedictine, abbot of SANKT ULRICH at Augsburg, Germany; d. Pisa, July 15, 1120. Because of his opposition to the imperial party, he was banished from his monastery in 1098 and took refuge at SANKT BLASIEN (Switzerland). GEBHARD III, Bishop of Constance, sent him on a confidential mission to Pope PASCHAL II. Following the lifting of the ban against the simoniacal Hermann, bishop of Augsburg, he was able to return to that city in 1106, and three years later he was elected abbot of his monastery. He carried out reforms and was a zealous preacher. However, having broken off relations with Bishop Hermann because of the latter's resumption of his old ways, he was eventually forced, in 1118, to flee from Augsburg. In the early months of 1120 he was received with honor by Pope CALLISTUS II. On his return northward that same year, he died at the Camaldolese monastery of San Michele at Pisa and was buried there.

Feast: July 15.

Bibliography: Vita, by his successor UDALSCHALK, Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–) division: Scriptores, 12: 429–448. A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 2:456, 459, W. FINK, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART, et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:17–18.

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

EGMOND (EGMONT), ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey dedicated to St. ADALBERT THE DEACON, in the Diocese of Haarlem (formerly Utrecht), northern Netherlands. Count Theoderic II of Holland rebuilt c. 950 a church dedicated to St. Adalbert (d. 740) and installed there monks from Ghent. In 1130 Egmond accepted the customs of CLUNY, and in 1139 the counts of Holland had the abbey made subject to the Holy See; the privilege of pontificals was obtained in 1251. Intervention by the lords of Egmond in abbey affairs caused serious disorders in the 15th century; attempts at reform from 1451 ended with acceptance of the BURSFELD reform in 1491. The abbey, united to the mensal revenue of the new See of Haarlem (1561) and then neglected, was pillaged in 1567 and 1572 (during the siege of Alkmaar), deserted, and destroyed by Calvinists (1573). Monks of Saint-Paul of Wisques, in refuge at Oosterhout, founded the Priory of Egmond (1935), since 1950 an abbey in the Congregation of SOLESMES. The abbey has published Egmondiana (1937–51), called Benedictijns Tijdschrift voor geestelijk leven en geschiedenis since 1951.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1031–32. R. GAZEAU, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 3:1471–72. O. BAUMHAUER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:673. A. KOCH, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:23–27. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962): v. 1, author part; v. 2, subject part, 2:205.

[N. N. HUYGHEBAERT]

EGOISM

Egoism refers primarily to a theory of ethics, although in philosophical usage it sometimes also designates a theory of knowledge. As an epistemological position, egoism is treated under SOLIPSISM. In ethics, egoism maintains that each man should seek his own good and ignore that of others, except when this would be to his disadvantage. It is thus opposed to altruism and to all natural law and theocentric systems. Its more common types are the hedonistic, which teaches that one should live only for one's own pleasure; the will-topower or superman kind, which makes the achieving of superiority and dominance over others the main goal in life; and perfectionistic egoism, which sees in selfdevelopment the only reason for existence. This last form is found especially among literary people and aesthetes.

Main Proponents. In antiquity, the CYRENAICS and the Epicureans were hedonistic egoists. However, they subdued the selfishness that was logically entailed in their doctrines by their emphasis on such virtues as kindliness and friendship.

With the rise of Christianity, egoism died out, to reappear in Renaissance Italy under such forms as the EPI-CUREANISM of Lorenzo VALLA. It was, however, in the 17th and 18th centuries that the position became especially influential. In England, Thomas HOBBES (1588–1679) espoused materialism and an ethics suitable to it. For him, good is simply the object of men's desires, whereas evil is the object of their hate and aversion. Man's good, given human nature, consists mainly in self-preservation, the increase of personal power, and pleasure. War is thus the natural state of man, for if many desire the same thing, to get it they simply endeavor to destroy or subdue each other. Similar views were defended with biting irony and cynicism by Bernard Mandeville (1670-1733), whose Fable of the Bees had as its moral that private vices are public benefits. This egoistic tradition was continued but mellowed by Jeremy BENTHAM (1748-1832), according to whom benevolence is a main source of egoistic satisfaction. In France, Hobbes's contemporary, Pierre GASSENDI (1592–1655), furthered the revival of Epicureanism by proposing it as the most satisfactory foundation for Christian theology. This effort failed, however, since readers either saw its implausibility, or, accepting the fundamental HEDONISM, shrugged off the Christian superstructure. Thus, influenced by Gassendi and the English empiricists, many of the leaders of the French ENLIGHTENMENT advocated a more or less sensual egoism: C. A. Helvétius (1715-71), J. O. de La Mettrie, and P. H. D. HOLBACH.

In the 19th century egoism tended either to be absorbed by altruism or to manifest itself under radically new forms. Thus, Herbert SPENCER (1820–1903) taught that both selfishness and benevolence are normal and necessary to man, and that these will be ultimately reconciled and combined through evolution: man will be altruistic for egoistic reasons, but also self-seeking for altruistic reasons. On the other hand, Friedrich NIETZ-SCHE (1844–1900) distinguished between slave and master morality. For the slavish masses, the Christian ethics of humility and compassion is suitable. The elite supermen, however, are beyond the usual notions of good and evil; not being subject to any obligations, they creatively determine their own values in expressing their basic willto-power.

In the 20th century egoism has few philosophers to defend it, but as is often the case it continues to be spread through literary works.

Evaluation. Egoism undeniably incorporates in itself certain basic truths: it is natural for man to love himself; he should moreover do so, since each one is ultimately responsible for himself; pleasure, the development of one's potentialities, and the acquisition of power are normally desirable. Despite this, it remains obvious that egoism has a serious and vitiating error at its core: its view that a man is his own end. Such a position is usually the logical corollary of a materialistic or positivistic rejection of divine Providence. It results also from a misconception of the essential sociality of human nature.

These central faults entail others. Among them is the perversion of the whole moral order. An egoism that is consistent with its principles takes as its virtues a subordination of all others to one's ends, the gratification of one's impulses no matter what the cost to others, a fraudulent appearance of kindness, fairness, and geniality; in short, selfishness that is not obvious enough to cause dislike. Many egoists, finding such a view too inhumane, modify it by introducing into their theories such notions as natural feelings of sympathy or of solidarity with their fellow men. Such additions, however, are made at the expense of coherency. Even the latter forms of egoism have no rational way of justifying one's duties to others; hence its proponents are always liable to revert back to selfish tendencies, or to use their fellowmen to serve their own purposes.

The inadequacy of egoism as a philosophy of life can be seen also in its effects on mental health. Subordinating all things to himself, the egoist is in conflict with the indefeasible demands of society and of his own nature. He can neither love nor fit in, and so becomes frustrated and unhappy.

A valid moral philosophy will be the antithesis of egoism on most points. It will admit the existence of the supreme Creator of the entire universe, all of whose parts He has interrelated and ordered ultimately to Himself. Thus all men have the same ends: to know, love, serve, and possess Him. They have, too, the same nature, needs, and rights. They should then love not only themselves but each other. To do so in a properly rational fashion, they must keep in mind a striking paradox of human nature: man best achieves happiness by forgetting himself in the service of God and his fellow men.

Bibliography: J. LECLERCQ, Les Grandes lignes de la philosophie morale (rev. ed. Paris 1954). R. A. TSANOFF, The Moral Ideals of Our Civilization (New York 1942). J. NUTTIN, Psycho-analysis and Personality, tr. G. LAMB (New York 1953). G. MORRA, Enciclopedia filosofica 1:1834–36. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 1:298–301.

[G. J. DALCOURT]

EGREGIE DOCTOR PAULE

Brief office hymn that was traditionally assigned to the feast of St. Paul. In the Roman Breviary of 1632, it was assigned to the feasts of SS. Peter and Paul. It was originally part (stanza 4 and the doxology, stanza 6) of the longer hymn DECORA LUX AETERNITATIS, which was in turn a revised version of a Carolingian poem on the Apostles Peter and Paul, Aurea luce et decore roseo (Analecta hymnica 51:216). In the Decora hymn, Paul is addressed as egregie doctor (cf. Colossians 3 and 1 Corinthians 12) and is asked to "fashion our lives aright and carry off our hearts with yours to heaven."

Bibliography: J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, MD, 1957) 168–170. B. STÄBLEIN, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:674. J. SZÖVÉRFFY, Die Annalen der lateinischen Hymnendichtung (Berlin 1964–65) 1:122–124.

[J. SZÖVÉRFFY]

EGRES, ABBEY OF

Former Cistercian monastery on the Maros River, near Egres, Hungary, Diocese of Csanád (Latin, Egresium). Founded by King Béla III in 1179 and settled by monks from PONTIGNY, it was the second CISTERCIAN abbey to be founded in Hungary. It was richly endowed by the king and soon had daughter foundations: Kerc in Transylvania (1202) and Szentkereszt (Sancta Crux) in Slavonia (1214). One of the greatest benefactors of the abbey was King Andrew II of Hungary (1205-35), father of St. ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY: he had the monastery fortified and the church richly appurtenanced. He was buried there (1235) beside his queen and consort Jolanta (1232). The Mongol hordes destroyed the church and monastery in 1241; after they had been rebuilt they were pillaged (1279) by the Cumans, whom King Béla IV had settled in that area. Abbots of Egres were often appointed by 13th-century popes as arbitrators of various quarrels between peasantry, nobility, towns, and monasteries. During the 14th century spiritual and moral decline set in at Egres, especially under Abbot Peter Peyt from Flanders, who was suspected of heresy. By 1357 the monastery had only six monks. Later, Pope Alexander VI handed over a portion of the abbey's holdings to the bishop of Csanád, and then in 1514 King Ladislaus VI made inevitable its total extinction by giving the abbey with all its possessions to the same bishop. Nothing of the abbey now remains.

Bibliography: E. BARTÓK, Az Egresi cisztercita apátság története (Budapest 1911). R. BÉKÉFI, A magyarországi cisztercita rend története (Budapest 1911) 29–. T. HÜMPFNER, Les Fils de S. Bernard en Hongrie (Budapest 1927). K. JUHÁSZ, Die Stifte der Tschanader Diözese im Mittelalter (Münster 1927); A csanádi püspökség története, 8 v. (Makó 1930–47), passim. L. H. COT-TINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1032. M. A. DIMIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:28–30.

[M. CSÁKY]

EGYPT

This article covers the history of Egypt to the present day, including the broadly defined periods of (1) Prehistory, (2) Pharaonic Egypt, (3) Ptolemaic, Roman and Byzantine Egypt, (4) Medieval Egypt and (5) Modern Egypt.

THE LAND

A short account of the geography and natural resources of Egypt is preceded here by an explanation of the various names that have been used to designate this land.

Names. The name Egypt is derived, through the Latin Aegyptus, from the Greek Atyo π to ζ , an inexact reproduction of the Egyptian term Hi(t)-Ka-Ptah [Temple of the soul of (the god) Ptah], which was one of the ancient designations for the capital city Memphis (biblical Noph). In Pharaonic times Egyptians called their country "The Two Lands" (from the natural division into Upper and Lower Egypt) and "The Black Land" (from the color of the fertile soil of the Nile Valley in contrast to the "red" land of the surrounding desert). In the Hebrew Bible Egypt is called misraim, of uncertain derivation but related to the Akkadian name Misir (Musur) and the Arabic name Misr used for Egypt today.

Geography. In the harsh deserts and mountains of northeast Africa, Egypt is the only densely populated area. The Nile River flows north from the mountains of Ethiopia and through the Nubian Desert, where its two tributaries, the Blue and the White Nile, join at Khartoum in modern Sudan. To the west lies the Libyan Desert (see LIBYA), with five habitable oases, and to the east, the Eastern Desert and the Sinai Peninsula (see SINAI, MOUNT). Prior to the construction of a series of dams at Aswan (ancient Syene) in the 20th century, the Nile's annual summer flood spread from north to south, fed by seasonal rains in Ethiopia. The river deposited fertile silt in the Nile Valley and the Delta and washed harmful salts from the soil, providing the conditions for settled life and bountiful agriculture.

Of the approximately 4,000 miles of the Nile's course, Egypt proper comprises some 600 miles of the lower (northern) part of the river and its widely fanned Delta, where two (in antiquity, seven) branches allow the Nile to flow into the Mediterranean Sea. Egypt's natural southern boundary at Aswan (Syene) is caused by a granite barrier crossing the river bed, creating rapids that make navigation impossible (the first Cataract, of six counted north to south). Egypt falls into two unequal parts, the narrow valley in the south (Upper Egypt) and the wide Delta in the north, which often opposed each other during the country's long history. The meeting point of these two regions is the natural place for a capital, which was Memphis in ancient times and is now Cairo. Important cities in Upper Egypt were Thebes (biblical No-Amon, modern Luxor) and Syene (modern Aswan), where the Elephantine Island marked the southern frontier. Among the cities of the Delta, the eastern site of Tanis (biblical Soan, Zoan) flourished between 1500 and 1000 B.C. due to close contacts with Palestine. In 332 B.C., Alexander the Great founded a new capital at ALEX-ANDRIA in the northwest Delta, providing Egypt with a coastal harbor.

Capital: Cairo. Size: 389,900 sq. miles. Population: 68,359,979 in 2000. Languages: Arabic; English and French are also spoken. Religions: 240,000 Catholics (.3%), 3,830,000 Orthodox (5.6%), 60,273,181 Sunni Muslims (89%), 2,649,598 Protestants (3.8%), 1,367,200 practice other faiths or are without religious affiliation. Ecclesiastical organizations: Egypt is divided between several Catholic sects. The Coptic Catholic Church, the predominant Catholic church, has a patriarchate in Alexandria, with eparchies in Minya, Assuit, Sohag, Thebes-Luxor, and Ismayliah. Greek Melkite Catholics have a patriarchate in Alexandria. Armenian, Maronite, and Syrian Catholics each have an eparchy located in Alexandria, while Chaldean Catholics have an eparchy located in Cairo. Latin Catholics have an apostolic vicariate located at Alexandria.

Natural resources. Agriculture was and is the base of Egypt's economy. The primary ancient crops were emmer wheat and barley, as well as flax for linen. Along the riverbanks were papyrus plants, from which the writing material of ancient times was made (see PAPY-ROLOGY). Today, cotton is the main crop and a valuable export; rice and vegetables are also grown. In ancient times, a series of canals and basins helped floodwaters reach as much arable land as possible. Because the Aswan High Dam holds back the flood and its rich silt, irrigation and chemical fertilizers now support agriculture.

Of the many animals domesticated for agriculture and husbandry, cattle were the most important; sheep played a lesser role than in Palestine. The horse was introduced c. 1650 B.C., but its use was restricted in ancient times. Donkeys were a primary resource for transport and travel, as they are today, and camels were used as well from the 5th century B.C. onwards.

The deserts hemming Egypt are rich in minerals, semiprecious stones and building stones such as limestone, sandstone, granite and porphyry. Copper deposits are found in the Eastern Desert and in Sinai, and gold veins in the Eastern and the Nubian Deserts. Wood for ships and buildings was imported from Lebanon to supplement sparse native trees. Bricks of sun-dried mud were the main building material; the Egyptian name for these bricks, djebet, passed into Arabic and, via Spain, into Spanish and English as the word adobe.

PREHISTORY

Early humans passed through the Western Desert oases and the Nile Valley as early as the Lower Paleolithic Period, some 500,000 years ago. Over time, the climate changed and turned the swamp-like plains into deserts, and c. 10,000 B.C., pastoral settlements began to emerge along the river. Archeologists identify several cultures which flourished as a result of developed agriculture from c. 4500 B.C. onwards.

In the north, Merimda, el-Omari and Helwan were centers for a distinctive northern culture. In the Nile Valley at el-Badari, the Badarian culture is known from pit graves where fine pottery vessels and flaked stone tools were buried with the dead. The nearby site of Naqada has yielded important evidence for a culture which spread throughout Upper Egypt from c. 4000 to 3200 B.C. During this period, society became increasingly stratified as a small portion of the population consolidated its wealth and power. Grave goods include decorated pottery, terracotta figurines, vessels and weapons worked from hard stones, and tools and combs carved from hippopotamus ivory. Gold and semiprecious stones were used for jewelry. Animal-shaped palettes made of greywacke were used to grind pigments for cosmetics and paint. Decorative motifs like animals, human and divine figures, boats and hunting or battle scenes illustrate the development of religious and social structures. The import of pottery and raw materials like lapis (from Afghanistan) and cedar (from Lebanon) indicate active trade with Palestine and the Near East.

By about 3200 B.C., or a little after, the Naqada culture also saw the creation of the hieroglyphic writing system, perhaps to fill a need for better communication and written records in a more complex society. Such developments paved the way for a Pharaonic Egyptian state.

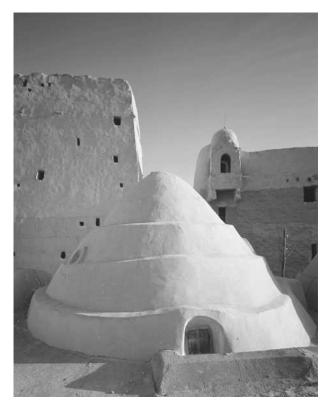

PHARAONIC EGYPT

After a general introduction, this period is treated under the following subdivisions: Protodynastic and Early Dynastic Period, Old Kingdom, Middle Kingdom, Hyksos Age, New Kingdom, Third Intermediate Period and Cushite Rule, and the Late Period.

General Introduction. Lists of kings (or pharaohs, from the Egyptian pr-aa, "Great House") were compiled for temple records in antiquity and are a major source for the Pharaonic history of Egypt. In the 3rd century B.C. the Egyptian priest Manetho used older king lists to write a history of Egypt in Greek for the new Ptolemaic rulers, and his work was quoted by other Greek and Latin historians such as Josephus. Manetho is responsible for dividing Egyptian history into 30 dynasties from the initial unification of the country to its conquest by Alexander the Great (332 B.C.), a model followed by modern scholars.

The chronology of Pharaonic Egypt is, for the most part, well established, although some uncertainties persist. A few astronomically fixed points provide a fairly certain framework for the third millennium B.C., and working back from these points the beginning of dynastic history in Egypt is estimated c. 3000 B.C.

Protodynastic and Early Dynastic Period (c. 3200–2575 B.C.). Modern scholars refer to the period of c. 3200 to 3000 B.C. as the Protodynastic Period because during these years, early rulers expanded their power and formed a unified Egyptian state. Some of these rulers are known by name from works of art, such as a ceremonial palette representing king Narmer. Narmer, who came from Upper Egypt, is generally credited with joining the north and south into one nation. On his palette, Narmer is shown defeating enemies associated with the Delta. The king was central to Egyptian religious and political thought because he was responsible for ensuring that ma'at, or cosmic order and justice, was maintained in the universe. As the palette of Narmer shows, even at this early stage in Egyptian history, artists had adopted a canon, or style, of representation which would remain typical of all Egyptian art.

Monastery of St. Anthony, near Za'faranah, Egypt. (©Andrea Jemolo/CORBIS)

The sequence of numbered dynasties recorded by Manetho begins after the initial unification of Egypt. The first three dynasties (c. 3000–2575 B.C.) comprise the Early Dynastic Period, during which the kings strengthened the structure of Egyptian government. In the Third Dynasty (c. 2650 B.C.) Egypt reached an important point under the reign of Djoser, who built the first large-scale stone monument for his funerary complex at Saqqara, the cemetery of Memphis (biblical Noph). The center of the complex was a structure of seven graduated layers, the so-called Step Pyramid. Djoser was buried in chambers beneath the pyramid, and buildings around it provided a spiritual 'home' for the dead king where religious rituals ensured his eternal life.

Old Kingdom (c. 2575–2140 B.C.). The concentration of Egypt's social, material and artistic skill reached a new height in the Fourth Dynasty (c. 2575–2465). Royal funerary monuments were larger and centered around a true pyramid with straight sides. Kings Khufu (Cheops in Greek), Khafra (Chephren) and Menkaure (Mykerinos) built three pyramids at Giza, north of Saqqara. Khufu's is the largest at 481 feet high, and each pyramid with its temples was enclosed by a wall and served by two temples housing statues of the king. Around this complex were the tombs of the king's relatives and nobles. Khafra, a son of Khufu, also built the Sphinx, an enormous figure of the king with a lion's body carved from natural rock. Images like the Sphinx show the dual nature of the king: he was a mortal carrying out a divine office and representing, on earth, the falcon god Horus, who was a king among the gods.

Head of Pharoah Thutmose III or Queen Hatshepsut, 18th Dynasty

In the Fifth Dynasty (c. 2465–2320) kings also explicitly associated themselves with the sun god RA, whose cult was based at Heliopolis (biblical On) in modern Cairo. Kings built smaller pyramid complexes, probably because the larger projects of the Fourth Dynasty had been too expensive and difficult to complete. The number of nobles, or officials, administering the country expanded and many of their tombs are at Saqqara. In the Sixth Dynasty (c. 2320–2150), kings began to appoint officials to serve in provinces throughout Egypt, leading to decentralization of the government. Politically, the Sixth Dynasty was very active in Egypt and abroad. Copper and turquoise were mined in Sinai, and close commercial connections existed with BYBLOS (Gebal); trading expeditions penetrated into Africa and sailed the Red Sea.

Military campaigns in the western and eastern Delta expanded Egyptian territory. Despite such efforts, though, the devolution of power and the long reign (over 90 years) of King Pepi II hastened a collapse of political order.

The last two dynasties of the Old Kingdom (Dynasties 7 and 8, c. 2150–2130) were short-lived and gave way to a group of kings (Dynasties 9 and 10, c. 2130–2040) who were based at Heracleopolis in the Faiyum district and controlled only the northern half of Egypt. Scholars refer to this as the First Intermediate Period because Egypt was no longer united. In the south, local officials did not acknowledge the northern kings, instead governing the provinces (called nomes) in their own right. Over time the governors of Thebes (biblical No-amon) in Upper Egypt established Dynasty 11 and competed with the Heracleopolitan kings by gaining dominion over the south as far as the first Cataract.

Middle Kingdom (c. 2040-1640). Around 2040 B.C. the rulers of Thebes defeated the Heracleopolitan kings, took control of Lower Egypt and reunited Egypt under King Mentuhotep II of Dynasty 11. This dynasty ended when an official, Amenemhet I (c. 1991-1962), claimed the kingship and founded Dynasty 12, which lasted until c. 1783 and became the classical age of Pharaonic Egypt. Powerful kings secured the dynastic succession by appointing the heir presumptive as coregent. Egypt annexed Nubia as far south as the second Cataract and built a system of fortresses there. An Egyptian settlement in Sinai worked the mines and included a temple dedicated to the important goddess Hathor. Egypt exercised a strong cultural influence over Palestine and offered political protection to local rulers in the region; ties with Byblos were particularly close. Throughout the Middle Kingdom, Asiatic peoples from Palestine settled in Egypt, especially in the eastern Delta. Close contacts also existed with CRETE, which brought goods and craftsmen to Egypt by boat.

The close of the Middle Kingdom is not well understood. Internal rivalries may have eroded the central government, and Dynasty 13 consisted of a sequence of short reigns. By c. 1640, Egypt had disintegrated into several small kingdoms, a time referred to as the Second Intermediate Period.

Hyksos Age. During the Second Intermediate Period (c. 1640–1550) the chief rivals in Egypt were a new group of kings at Thebes (Dynasty 17) and a series of kings of Asiatic origin who ruled from the Delta (Dynasties 15 and 16). The Delta kings were known as the Hyksos from the Egyptian term hekau-khasut (rulers of foreign lands), signifying their foreign origin. The Hyksos had probably lived in Egypt for some time, however, and they adopted many Egyptian cultural forms alongside their own. Their capital was at Avaris in the northeast Delta, with a palace and fortifications like those also found in Palestine and Syria. It was the Hyksos who introduced horses and chariot-based warfare to Egypt. They made few changes to the administration of Egypt, instead relying on the loyalty of officials in the north and central parts of the country.

New Kingdom (c. 1550–1070). Around 1550 B.C., a ruler of the Theban 17th Dynasty, Kamose, led a series of military campaigns against the Hyksos king, Apophis. Under Kamose's brother Ahmose, the Hyksos were defeated and Egypt was reunited at the start of a new dynasty. The 18th Dynasty was a time of unprecedented wealth, and rulers with powerful personalities created an Egyptian empire stretching east to Palestine and south to Nubia, control of which had been lost after the Middle Kingdom.

Hatshepsut and Thutmose III. One important ruler of the 18th Dynasty was Hatshepsut (c. 1473–1458), daughter of King Thutmose I and wife of Thutmose II. Hatshepsut was regent for her young stepson, Thutmose III (c. 1479–1425), but declared herself king in her own right, one of several women to do so in ancient Egypt. She built a magnificent funerary temple at Deir el-Bahri on the west bank of the Nile at Thebes and sent a large commercial expedition to the land of Punt, in modern Ethiopia.

After Hatshepsut's death (c. 1458), the fully grown Thutmose III took sole command of the throne and led an army against Palestine and Syria, where local rulers were rebelling against Egyptian supremacy. For several months Thutmose III besieged MEGIDDO, and on another campaign, he defeated the king of Mitanni in southern Mesopotamia and crossed the Euphrates River, the only pharaoh ever to do so. Egypt did not integrate Syria and Palestine into its government or culture but oversaw these regions through the diplomatic efforts of local officials and garrison towns like Gaza.

Thutmose III also extended Egyptian control further south in Nubia, to the fourth Cataract. Unlike Egypt's Asiatic holdings, Nubia was actively colonized and administered by an Egyptian official, the viceroy of Cush [see ETHIOPIANS (CUSHITES)]. Rich gold mines in the Nubian Desert were an important source of wealth for Egypt.

Amenhotep III. A later 18th Dynasty ruler, Amenhotep III (c. 1390–1353), ruled the Egyptian empire peacefully. He undertook many building projects, including Luxor Temple and the impressive Hypostyle Hall of Karnak Temple. Two colossal statues of Amenhotep III, called the Colossi of Memnon by the Greeks, mark the site of his destroyed funerary complex near modern Luxor.

Ramses II.

Akhnaton (Amenhotep IV). The son and successor of Amenhotep III ruled from c. 1353–1336 and introduced radical political and religious changes. Early in his reign, Amenhotep IV changed his name to Akhnaton, meaning "spirit of the Aton (sun disc)," to reflect his loyalty to the cult of this solar deity. Akhnaton was opposed to the powerful priesthood of the Theban god Amun (or AMON), who was the patron deity of 18th Dynasty kings. Instead, Akhnaton promulgated the Aton religion, which credited the sun disc as the only source of life and positioned the king as sole mediator between this all-powerful god and the people of Egypt. The Aton thus replaced both Amun (Amon) and the ancient sun god Re (Ra).

Although Akhnaton's loyalty to the Aton cult is often attributed to the king's religious conviction, there were political considerations as well: the Aton religion made the king central and unique, rather than a servant of the god, and broke the power of the priests. In the fifth year of his reign, Akhnaton emphasized this new political and religious reality by building a capital city at the previously uninhabited site of Akhet-Aton ("horizon of the Aton"), modern el-Amarna. He also introduced sweeping changes in religious ritual, with ceremonies for the

King Tut's burial mask. (Archive Photos)

Aton conducted in the open air, and in art, where stylized physical forms were used to represent Akhnaton, his wife Nefertiti, and their six daughters in the streaming rays of the Aton disc. Officials and private individuals used images of the royal family to make devotions to the Aton.

The novelty of the Aton religion and its opposition to tradition doomed the reforms to failure. Egypt's foreign relations also suffered during Akhnaton's reign, as diplomatic correspondence from some Palestinian rulers (in the so-called Amarna Letters) attests. When Akhnaton died, a new king named Smenkhare, whom some scholars believe was Queen Nefertiti, ruled briefly, followed by a child named Tutankhaton, the son-in-law, and probably also son, of Akhnaton. Representatives of the suppressed Amun priesthood ensured that Tutankhaton renounced the Aton religion and changed his name to Tutankhamun in honor of the Theban god. Tutankhamun (c. 1332–1322) died around age 19 and is best known for the 1923 discovery of his tomb, the only royal burial found intact. The so-called "Amarna Age" came fully to an end when an army commander named Horemheb (c. 1319–1292) claimed the throne and extinguished every trace of the Aton cult, Akhnaton and the city of Akhet-Aton.

Dynasty 19. Horemheb was succeeded by another army commander, Ramses (Ramesses) I, who founded a new line of kings hailing from the northeast Delta. The kings of the 19th Dynasty based themselves there at Tanis (biblical Soan, Zoan), although they continued to build lavish tombs and temples at Thebes. The reestablishment of internal order in Egypt enabled the next king, Seti I (c. 1290–1279), to recapture Palestine. Seti I and his son, Ramses II (c. 1270–1213), both fought against the Hittite kingdom in Anatolia (in modern Turkey). The Hittite king, Muwatalli, was allied with the city-states of Carchemish, Aleppo and UGARIT. Ramses II fought Muwatalli at the battle of Kadesh, but neither king emerged victorious. They declared a truce, cemented by a diplomatic marriage between Ramses II and a Hittite princess.

For the remainder of Ramses II's long reign Egypt was very prosperous; the king built extensively throughout Egypt and Nubia. Some scholars suggest that Ramses II was the biblical pharaoh confronted by Moses, and builder of the cities of Phithom (Pithom) and Rameses (Pi-Ramesses), but Egyptian sources cannot support this. It is interesting, however, that the only Egyptian reference to Israel occurs in a STELE inscription of Ramses II's successor, Mer-ne-Ptah (c. 1213–1204). This stele demonstrates that a people called Israel lived in Palestine at that time, and it was set up to commemorate Mer-ne-Ptah's military victory over Libyans and Sea Peoples (a migratory group from the Near East) in the Delta.

Dynasty 20. The 19th Dynasty was unsettled due to internal problems and foreign attacks like those by the Sea Peoples. In the next dynasty, Ramses III (c. 1187–1156) successfully fought off Libyans and more Sea Peoples, among them the PHILISTINES. War depleted Egypt financially, and although several more kings named Ramses (through Ramses XI) complete the 20th Dynasty, central authority waned.

Third Intermediate Period and Cushite Rule. After the end of the 20th Dynasty, the priests of Amun at Thebes styled themselves as kings (Dynasty 21) and governed southern Egypt, c. 1075–945. In the north, families originally of Libyan descent founded Dynasty 22 (c. 945–715), ruling from the Delta. The first king of the dynasty was Shoshonk (biblical Sesac, Shishak) I, who took a large army into Palestine and sacked Jerusalem, mentioned in 1 Kings 14:25–26 and 2 Chr. 12:2–9. His successors tried to appease Thebes and Upper Egypt but tensions remained, and in the 9th and early 8th centuries B.C., as many as four kings claimed to rule Egypt at once.

While a power vacuum existed in Egypt, Nubia governed itself independently as the kingdom of Cush (or Kush) under a line of rulers based at Napata near the fourth Cataract. One of these rulers, King Piye (c. 750–715) swept through Egypt with his army, meeting little resistance, and then withdrew to Napata. Other ethnic Libyan kings reigned briefly as Dynasty 24, but after 715 B.C. the Cushites returned to Egypt under Piye's successor, Shabaqo. Shabaqo established Dynasty 25, made up of Cushite kings who ruled both their native land and all of Egypt.

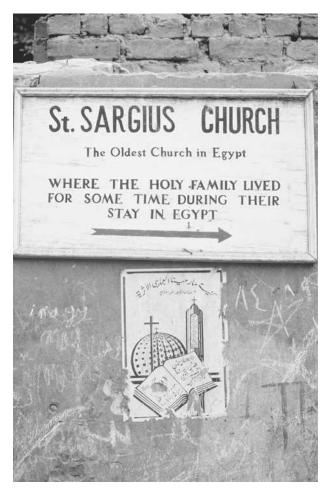

The Cushites worshipped the Theban god Amon and had strong cultural ties to Egypt due to the long relationship between Egypt and Nubia. The might of the Assyrian Empire was a threat to Cushite rule, however, and the Assyrian kings Sennacherib and Asarhaddon both attacked Egypt. Ashurbanipal invaded in 671 B.C., forcing King Taharqo (biblical Tharaca, Tirhakah: 2 Kgs 19:9) to retreat to Napata, where he later died. Taharqo's successor, Tanutamun, re-entered Egypt but was immediately defeated by another Assyrian onslaught, during which Ashurbanipal, with the help of Egyptian vassals, subdued all of Egypt once again.

Coptic icon painted on Monastery of St. Paul, Fafarana, Egypt. (©Bojan Brecelj/CORBIS)

Late Period. The Assyrians governed the country by appointing Egyptians as vassal rulers. One of these vassals, Psamtek (Psammetichus) I (664-610) of Sais in the Delta, broke free of Assyrian control and established himself as sole ruler of the country, founding Dynasty 26 (664-525). He controlled Thebes by appointing his daughter, Nitocris, there as "divine votaress" of Amon. Psamtek I's success was due in part to the help of Greek (Ionian and Carian) mercenaries in his army, and as Assyria declined, Egypt's contacts with foreign countries grew. Greeks were given a free trading port at Naucratis in the Delta, and Psamtek I led troops to Palestine. Nechao (Necho) II (610-595) continued these policies, campaigning unsuccessfully against the Chaldaeans under NEBUCHADNEZZAR (Nabuchodonosor) and defeating King Josiah of Juda. Subsequently, the Egyptian kings Apries (589-570) and Amasis (570-526) also struggled against the Chaldaeans but were thwarted by the rise of the Persian Empire under Cyrus the Great in the sixth century B.C.

Directional sign pointing way to St. Sargius Coptic Church, Cairo, Egypt. (©Dave Bartruff/CORBIS)

In 525 B.C., the Persian emperor, Cambyses, pressed west and captured King Psamtek III (526–525) at Pelusium in the eastern Delta. Egypt became part of the Persian Empire, run by an appointed official called the satrap; Manetho termed this period Dynasty 27. The emperor, DARIUS I (522–486), showed some interest in the country, but after his death Egyptian leaders began to wrest power away from Persia. The last three native dynasties (Dynasties 28, 29 and 30), each based in the Delta, attained Egyptian independence and saw a short-lived renaissance of native culture. In 341 B.C., however, Persia reestablished control of Egypt under the emperor Artaxer-xes III (358–338), succeeded by Darius III (338–335).

Alexander the Great defeated Darius III at Issus in 333 B.C. and then turned to Egypt, where he was welcomed as liberator. He stayed less than a year, but in that time he was crowned as pharaoh. He founded a harbor on the northwest coast of the Delta, named Alexandria in his honor. In the division of Alexander's empire after his death in 332 B.C., Egypt was given to his general, Ptolemy, son of Lagus, who established himself as Ptolemy I Soter (305–285), king of Egypt and founder of the house of the Ptolemies.

PTOLEMAIC, ROMAN AND BYZANTINE EGYPT

This section surveys Egypt's history as a Hellenistic monarchy and then as part of the Roman and Byzantine empires.

Ptolemaic Period (305–30). The Ptolemaic rulers were Greeks who respected some of Egypt's social and religious traditions while fashioning a Hellenistic monarchy for themselves. Their capital at Alexandria became the greatest intellectual center of its time, with a library of approximately half a million scrolls.

Ptolemy III Euergetes I (246–221) took an interest in Palestine and came into conflict there with the Seleucid Dynasty of Syria. The Syrian wars, combined with feuds among the Ptolemies and native rebellions in the south, weakened Ptolemaic authority. In 170 B.C., Rome intervened on behalf of the Ptolemies against the Seleucid king, ANTIOCHUS IV EPIPHANES (175–164), and as a result Egypt entered more and more into the orbit of the Roman Republic.

The contest between Pompey and Julius Caesar for sole rule over Rome decided Egypt's fate. The last Ptolemaic monarch was Cleopatra VII (51–30), who allied herself first with Caesar and then, after his assassination at Rome in 44 B.C., with Mark Antony in an effort to preserve Egypt's independence. Conflict between Antony and Caesar's heir, Octavian (later Augustus), came to a head at the Battle of Actium off the northwest coast of Greece in 30 B.C. After Antony and Cleopatra's forces were defeated, the pair committed suicide and Octavian claimed Egypt for Rome.

Roman Empire (30 B.C.-A.D. 395). Egypt became a Roman province and was the chief source of grain for the entire empire. Roman rule differed from the Ptolemaic system because the Romans imposed a stricter system of social stratification, privileging a Greek-speaking, city-based elite. Romans did not encourage native Egyptian language, although some Egyptian temples continued to be decorated with representations of Roman "pharaohs" until around A.D. 250. As early as the second century, Christianity began to spread in Egypt, with scholars like Clement and Origen based at Alexandria. Despite Roman attempts to suppress it, Christianity continued to grow, and c. 320 St. PACHOMIUS founded the first monastery, in Upper Egypt. MONASTICISM flourished in Egypt as men and women left their homes for these desert settlements.

Byzantine Period. At the partition of the Roman Empire following the death of Emperor Theodosius in 395, Egypt became part of the Eastern Empire and shipped its grain to the capital, Byzantium (Constantinople, modern Istanbul), rather than Rome. Christianity was now the state religion, and under Abbot SHENOUTE OF ATRIPE (Athribis), the Egyptian, or Coptic, Church thrived. Copts continued to adhere to the Monophysite doctrine after this belief in the one divine nature of Christ was condemned at the Fourth Ecumenical Council of CHALCEDON in 451, and Coptic Christianity became separated from mainstream Christianity in the Byzantine Empire.

Under Heraclius (610–641) Byzantine power in the Near East declined, and Arab followers of the new Islamic religion began to filter throughout the region.

MEDIEVAL EGYPT

The following sections cover Egypt from the Arab conquest until 1798: Arab Rule, Fatimid Dynasty, Ayyubid Dynasty, The Mamelukes and Ottoman Egypt.

Arab Rule. In 640, eight years after the death of the prophet MUHAMMAD, the army of Caliph Umar defeated Byzantine garrisons at Pelusium in the Delta and Fort Babylon (at modern Cairo), bringing Egypt into the Muslim world.

Early Arab rulers maintained much of the Byzantine administrative system and did not force conversions to Islam. The Arabs isolated themselves from the native population and founded a new capital called Fustat (at the site of Fort Babylon), which would grow into Old Cairo. Egypt was ruled by Arab and Turkish governors appointed by the ruling Umayyad caliphs in Damascus, and later the Abbasid caliphs in Baghdad. Gradual Islamization of the country proceeded and most people adopted the Arabic language. In 868, Egypt became the fiefdom of a Turkish general whose stepson, Ahmad Ibn Tulun, went to Egypt and founded the Tulunid Dynasty (868-905), which opposed the Abbasid government and helped Egypt's economy and culture flourish. Ibn Tulun's successors squandered their wealth and power, however, and several years of unrest ensued.

Fatimid Dynasty (969–1171). The Fatimid state, based in North Africa, took control and ruled Egypt as an independent country, setting up its own dynasty at Cairo to rival the Abbasid caliphs in Baghdad. The Fatimids were tolerant of Christians and Jews in their government, except for Caliph el-Hakim (996–1021), who destroyed Christian churches throughout Fatimid territory, including the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

The Fatimids followed Shī 'ite Islam (a more esoteric sect which had split off to honor Muhammad's son-inlaw, Caliph Ali), although the majority of Egyptians were, and are, mainstream Sunni Muslims. In the 12th century, struggles within the Fatimid dynasty led to the intervention of Syrian troops, who were Sunni as well. In 1171, the Sunni general, Saladin, wrested control of Egypt and deposed the Fatimids.

Ayyubid Dynasty (1171–1250). Saladin established the Ayyubid dynasty, which restored Egypt to the eastern (Abbasid) caliphate. Under Saladin, Egypt prospered and Cairo became the center of the Arab world. During this period, the CRUSADES touched on Egyptian soil. Damietta in the Delta was captured and occupied for three years (1218–1221) during the Fifth Crusade and again during the Sixth Crusade (1249), when LOUIS IX of France was taken prisoner in Egypt. Saladin was tolerant of Christianity in Egypt and Palestine, and Egypt traded actively with Italian city-states. At the same time, the Ayyubid policy of granting family members control of different parts of the territory encouraged dissent and armed conflict.

The Mamelukes (1250–1517). Ayyubid sultans increasingly purchased Turkish slaves, called Mamelukes, to staff their armies, and in 1250 the Mamelukes took advantage of an Ayyubid feud to elect one of their own men as sultan, backed by Mameluke military strength. The Mameluke Dynasty saw Egypt at the pinnacle of its cultural, economic and political powers. Although the Mamelukes were not ethnically Arab and many did not speak Arabic literature, education and the arts. Mameluke territory in Egypt and Palestine offered a haven to Muslims fleeing Mongol invasions from the Far East, and in part because of this pressure, Christians and Jews were resented and at times persecuted. Conversion to Islam accelerated, and use of the Coptic language declined in favor of Arabic.

Ottoman Egypt (1517–1798). After confrontations between the Mamelukes and the Ottoman Empire over control of Palestine and Syria, the Ottomans defeated the Mamelukes in 1517. Egypt became a province governed from Istanbul (ancient Byzantium, Constantinople) by means of a viceroy, or pasha, in Cairo. Mamelukes still constituted a political and financial elite, identified by the title bey after their names, and in the late 18th century, Mamelukes tried to reassert power against their Ottoman rulers.

MODERN EGYPT

Egypt's history since the Napleonic invasion of 1798 is treated under these subdivisions: French Occupation, Muhammad Ali and his successors, British Occupation, The Kingdom of Egypt and the Arab Republic of Egypt.

French Occupation (1798–1805). In 1798, NAPO-LEON I Bonaparte captured Alexandria with a fleet that included his army as well as a corps of scholars and scientists (savants) interested in Egyptian history and culture. Napoleon claimed to be a friend of the Ottomans who would liberate Egypt from the Mameluke rebels. As the savants set about recording the art, architecture and natural world of Egypt, Napoleon faced the threat of British troops approaching from the Mediterranean and the Ottoman forces from the east. Napoleon slipped by the British and returned to France, leaving his troops behind to hold out against the British until 1801. British forces then withdrew from Egypt in 1803, leaving control of the country to the Ottomans once more.

Although of little military consequence, the French Occupation brought Egypt into close contact with Europe and opened the door for Europeans to study the Egyptian past, most notably through the discovery of the Rosetta Stone—a trilingual Egyptian and Greek inscription which was surrendered to the British—and the publication of the multi-volume Description de l'Égypte, which collected the savants' records of ancient and contemporary Egypt.

Muhammad Ali (1805–1849) and his successors. Amid much debate, Muhammad Ali was appointed pasha and set about establishing himself in a position of almost complete independence from the Ottomans. He restructured the Egyptian administration to break the power of the Mamelukes, effectively making himself chief landowner with an agricultural monopoly. Trade with Europe, especially the British and French, introduced some westernization and opened Egypt to European travelers and archaeologists.

During the reign of Isma'il (1863–1879), a grandson of Muḥammad Ali, the French-designed Suez Canal was opened, making Egypt even more pivotal to Europe and the Ottomans. Isma'il used the title Khedive to distinguish himself from other Ottoman viceroys, and he and his family continued to own most of Egypt's land. Egyptian army leaders and the educated elite, who had been exposed to European administrative ideals, increasingly opposed this autocracy. Under pressure from Britain and France, the Ottomans deposed Isma'il in favor of his son, Tawfiq (1879–1892), which created an opening for further European involvement in Egyptian affairs.

British Occupation (1882–1922). In 1882, British forces occupied Egypt and made it an unofficial, or "veiled," protectorate of the British Empire. Nominally, the Ottoman sultan and the Khedive retained control of Egypt, but Britain installed advisors who oversaw the internal administration, under the direction of the British consul, Lord Cromer.

Khedive Tawfiq was succeeded by his son, Abbas Hilmi II (1892–1914), who at times openly criticized Cromer and General Kitchener, commander of the Egyptian army. In 1898 the army reconquered Sudan and added it to Britain's veiled protection, after which Tawfiq was more conciliatory to the British.

Meanwhile, a growing Egyptian nationalist movement, spearheaded by French-educated lawyer and journalist Mustafa Kamil (1874–1908), turned to the Ottomans for support. The Egyptian upper classes were dissatisfied with the extent and duration of British control, but Cromer did not sympathize with nationalist concerns. By the time Kitchener was appointed consul in 1911, several nationalist factions competed in opposition to the British and to Khedive Abbas Hilmi.

War against the Ottoman Empire was declared in 1914, and Britain made Egypt an official protectorate, deposing the Khedive and appointing his uncle, and later his uncle's brother, as sultan. Kitchener was replaced by a high commissioner, Sir Reginald Wingate, who instituted martial law and abolished the Egyptian assembly.

Two days after the Armistice was signed in November of 1918, an Egyptian delegation (called the Wafd) led by nationalist politician Sa'id Zaghlul approached Wingate to plead for Egypt's independence from Britain. When Wingate refused to meet the delegation, revolt broke out and Britain appointed a new commissioner, Lord Allenby, to reassert control. Zaghlul continued to press for independence, and Allenby, hoping to thwart the most radical nationalists, agreed, resulting in a declaration of independence on Feb. 28, 1922.

The Kingdom of Egypt (1922–1952). In March of 1922, the sultan became King Fuad I of Egypt at the head of a constitutional monarchy with a bicameral parliament. However, political struggles continued between the British, the new king and the Wafd, which had become the major nationalist organization with a large popular following.

When World War II broke out in 1939, Egypt was obliged to offer Britain military assistance under the terms of a 1936 treaty, although King Farouk (1936–1952) was hostile to the British; heavy fighting took place in Egypt in 1942–43. Egypt's involvement on behalf of the Arab cause in Palestine (ending in defeat in the first Arab-Israel war of 1948–49) and the formation of the Arab League in 1945 led to further political disagreement with Britain and public demonstrations against the king.

A group of army officers, called the Free Officers, conspired in an armed coup on the night of July 22–23, 1952. Led by Gamal Abdel Nasser, the officers forced King Farouk to abdicate and leave the country.

Arab Republic of Egypt. Nasser and his associates abolished the 1923 constitution. In July of 1953, the Arab Republic of Egypt was declared (first as the United Arab Republic) and a new constitution was in place by 1956, with Nasser elected as the first president of Egypt.

Nasser (1956–1970). Nasser settled long-standing disputes with Britain over Sudan and the Suez Canal Zone, so that Sudan attained independence and British troops left Suez. Nasser's popular domestic policies were socialist in scope, placing Egyptian industry under state ownership, limiting private landownership and heavily subsidizing commodities like sugar and electricity. He suppressed opposition political organizations, especially the Muslim Brotherhood.

In the postwar political climate, Egypt had an uneasy relationship with the West. In 1956, Nasser provoked a crisis by nationalizing the Suez Canal after the United States and Britain withdrew funding for the Aswan High Dam. With backing from the Soviet Union, the Dam was finally completed in 1968, to provide adequate electricity to Egypt's expanding population.

Antagonism towards the new state of Israel united Egypt and other Arab countries, from whom Israel feared attack. A second Arab-Israeli war in 1956–57 was instigated by the Suez Crisis and ended after American and Soviet intervention convinced Israel to withdraw from territory it had taken in Sinai, bordering the Canal Zone. In June of 1967, the third Arab-Israeli war (called the Six Day War) broke out when Israel launched pre-emptive strikes against Egypt and Jordan. Israeli forces reoccupied the Sinai Peninsula and captured territory in Jordan (the West Bank) and Syria (the Golan Heights).

Sadat (1970–1981). When Nasser died suddenly in September of 1970, vice-president Anwar Sadat succeeded him as president. Sadat inherited an economy struggling with budget deficits, chronic shortages and a military infrastructure nearly destroyed by Israel in the 1967 war.

In October of 1973, a fourth Arab-Israeli war (the October War, or Yom Kippur War) began when Egypt and Syria attacked Israel. To solve the crisis, the United States restored diplomatic relations with Egypt and helped broker a settlement whereby Israel withdrew from Sinai and Egypt fully reopened the Suez Canal to international traffic. Egypt also acknowledged Israel's right to exist. This political victory placed Sadat in a strong position to turn to the West, rather than the Soviet Union, for financial aid. Subsidies and nationalization were curtailed and Western companies began to invest in Egypt, moves which stabilized the economy but were very unpopular. Sadat tried to appease Islamists by giving limited state backing to some religious laws and showing more lenience towards the Muslim Brotherhood.

Sadat also entered into peace negotiations with Israel, and in 1978 he met with the Israeli prime minister, Menachem Begin, and U.S. President James Carter at Camp David near Washington D.C. In March of 1979, Sadat and Begin signed a peace treaty, which brought American support but angered other Arab nations, who immediately excluded Egypt from the Arab League.

Controversial laws adopted in 1980 made it possible for the president to be elected indefinitely, and in September of 1981, members of many opposition groups, including the Muslim Brotherhood, were imprisoned. On Oct. 6, 1981, Sadat was assassinated during a military parade when Islamist army officers opened fire on him.

Mubarak (1981-present). Vice-president Hosni Mubarak survived the attack on Sadat and was immediately elected as the new president. Mubarak restored Egyptian relations with the Arab League in 1989 and has continued to open the Egyptian economy to the West. Mubarak has also used Egypt's pivotal but difficult position with regard to Israel to help further negotiations among moderate Israeli leaders, the Palestinians and other Arab countries, especially during crises like the 1991-92 Persian Gulf War. The activity of Islamist extremists in Egypt remains a serious problem. Coptic Christians in central Egypt have been targeted by radical Islamist militia, and in 1997, members of the outlawed Islamic Jihad group killed more than 60 tourists at Luxor in an attempt to damage the government's vital revenues from travel industry sources. Mubarak was elected to a fourth term as president in 1999.

Bibliography: J. BAINES and J. MALEK, Cultural Atlas of Ancient Egypt (2nd ed. New York 2000). The Oxford History of Ancient Egypt, ed. I. SHAW (Oxford 2000). Egypt: The World of the Pharaohs, ed. R. SCHULZ and M. SEIDEL, tr. P. MANUELIAN (Cologne 1998). B. MIDANT-REYNES, The Prehistory of Egypt: From the First Egyptians to the First Pharaohs (Oxford 2000). B. KEMP, Ancient Egypt: Anatomy of a Civilization (London and New York 1989). D. REDFORD, Egypt, Canaan, and Israel in Ancient Times (Princeton 1992). A. BOWMAN, Egypt After the Pharaohs (2nd ed. London 1996). The Cambridge History of Egypt, ronume I: Islamic Egypt, 640–1517 and volume II: Modern Egypt, from 1517 to the End of the Twentieth Century, ed. M. W. DALY (Cambridge 1998).

[H. GOEDICKE/C. RIGGS]

EGYPT, ANCIENT

This article treats of (1) the religion, (2) the architecture and art, and (3) the language and literature of Pharaonic Egypt.

1. Religion

Herodotus (237) rightfully called the Egyptians the most religious of all men, for religion was one of the most important elements of ancient Egyptian civilization, playing a major role in the life of the state as well as in the life of the individual. The notion of the divine made its impact felt on the most diverse of human activities. Egypt differs from other ancient Near Eastern nations, for example, in that the majority of the names for its territorial divisions or nomes referred to some symbol for the divine. In addition, many of the cities took their names from the local temple or from some epithet or attribute of the god venerated there, and the great majority of the inhabitants bore names referring to the divine in someway.

Statue of Ramses II at Luxor Temple, Egypt. (©Papilio/CORBIS)

On the other hand, the fact that the reconstruction of this civilization is based almost entirely on monuments and documents discovered within sacred enclosures, temples, or necropolises must always be borne in mind. Cities of the living, such as Akhet-Aton (el-'Amârna) and the workers' village at Deir el-Medīnah, have yielded relatively few objects to the excavators. As a consequence, the vestiges of the past tend to place a one-sided emphasis on the religious life of the ancient Egyptians; this leaves a knowledge of their religion nonetheless indispensable for a proper understanding of Egyptian civilization as a whole.

The Gods. The gods of the Egyptian pantheon can be divided into three classes. The most important consists of animals or fetishes, each originally venerated in a single city. Because of the tendency to anthropomorphism, these divinities were represented as men or women with animal heads; for example, the jackal Anubis of Saūti (Lycopolis), modern Asyut; the cat Ubastet of Bubastis in the Delta; the hawk Horus; the ram Harsaphes of Heracleopolis Magna, modern Ehnāsya; the cow Hathor of Aphroditopolis, modern Atfīh; the hawk Haroëris or "Horus the Great" of Damanhur; the ram Khnum of Hypselis, modern Shūtb, and of Latopolis, modern Esnah; the hawk-headed warrior god Montu of Hermonthis; the vulture-goddess Uto of Butō, modern Kōm el-Farā'īn; the crocodile Sobek (Greek Souchos) of Faiyūm; the lioness Sekhmet of Rehesu, near Letopolis, later venerated at Memphis; the fabulous animal Seth, of Ombos; the mummified hawk Sokaris, of the Memphite necropolis; and the ibis Toth of Hermopolis in the Delta, modern of Hermopolis Baklia. and Magna, modern el-Ashmūnēn. Several goddesses bear on their heads the animals they originally represented. Thus the goddess Mut, from the Karnak region, wears the skin of a vulture, and Selkis wears a scorpion. Satis, the goddess of the Island of Sehel and of Elephantine, often wears the crown of Upper Egypt combined with antelope horns. This type of representation is especially typical of divinities who originated as fetishes: Isis, from Iseion, modern Behbīt el-Hagar, formerly personified the royal throne; Nefertem, from the Memphis region, a lotus flower; and Nēth from Saïs, modern Sān el-Hagar, an archaic shield with two crossed arrows.

Relief carving depicting funeral mourners bearing gifts for tomb, 18th or 19th Dynasty, Egypt, ca. 1350 B.C.

Cosmic gods comprise the second category, represented as a general rule in human form, as for example, Shu, the personification of air; the moon-god Khonsu; the ithyphallic god of fertility, Min; and the chthonian god of fertility, Osiris, also a king in prehistoric times. These gods, however, were identified also with local divinities of animal origin. Thus, Shu forms with Tefnut, the personification of moisture, a pair of lions, and the goddess of the sky, Nut, is considered a cow-goddess.

To the third category belong gods personifying abstractions in human form: Atum, from Heliopolis, who expresses the concept of universality; AMON, from Karnak, whose name means "the hidden one"; Ptah of Memphis, god of industrial labor and the arts; and, finally, the goddess Ma'at, personification of cosmic order, manifested in human society in the ethical notions of truth and justice [see J. B. Pritchard, The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament, (Princeton 1954) 573].

Submerged ruins of Egyptian temple, Philae, Egypt. (©Otto Lang/CORBIS)

Theology and the Myths. As a consequence of the political evolution, which brought the cities in closer contact, the problem of the relationships between these local gods, each supreme master in its locale, developed with increasing urgency. The establishment of divine families was a first solution. These families frequently formed a triad, composed of father, mother, and son: thus Ptah, Sekhmet, and Nefertem were brought together at Memphis; and Amon, Mut, and Khonsu, at Thebes. Families consisting of eight or nine divinities appear later. How did the Egyptians reconcile the supremacy of the local god with the existence of the gods of other cities, whose power they never dreamed of contesting? The phenomenon of syncretism, or the identification of the gods, came into play here-the other divinities were considered manifestations or emanations of the local god. There is a text, for example, which in regard to the primordial god Atum, indicates that the other gods are his names, created by him. Similar statements are made concerning other gods, in particular Amon. Syncretism seems to be based on the idea that the divine nature is one and universal. J. Vandier (228-229) concluded from this: "It is all as though the Egyptians had believed in one god, capable of manifesting himself in different forms. . . . Were the Egyptians in the last analysis monotheists unawares?"

Other writers claim to have discovered more palpable proofs of the existence of monotheism. The "Monument of Memphite theology" is of primary concern. H. Junker points out in the god Ur, "the Great," mentioned here, a god of the sky who was venerated as a single god during the prehistoric epoch and was later split up into the numerous divinities of the Memphite pantheon [Die Götterlehre von Memphis, in Abhandlungen der Deutschen (Preussischen, to 1944) Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin (1815–), Phil.-hist.Kl. 23 (1939)].

On the other hand, in the wisdom literature, the divinity is most of the time evoked by the word netter, simply "God." Basing his argument on this fact, and on the ideas expressed in these texts, É. Drioton has defended the hypothesis that the Egyptians, from the beginning of the Old Kingdom, had the idea "of a God named without determination [and consequently thought of as unique], master of events, provident guardian of men, judge of good and evil actions, and giver of just rewards" [La religion égyptienne dans ses grandes signes, excerpt from La Revue du Caire, 1945, in Pages d'Égyptologie (Cairo 1957) 79]. In Le monothéisme de l'ancienne Égypte [Cahiers d'histoire égyptienne (Cairo, Jan. 1949) 168] he formulated his judgment as follows: "The official Egyptian religion was always polytheism acted upon by the philosophical monotheism of its faithful; for the most enlightened among these, the private religion was most frequently monotheism tainted with polytheism."

Fresco painting of a god, in Egyptian tomb, Valley of the Kings, Luxor, Egypt. (©Bojan Brecelj/CORBIS)

Theological Systems. Five theological systems can be reconstructed from the texts, each explaining in its own way the origin of the universe, the gods, and men.

According to one cosmogony, not related to any center of worship, the god of the earth, Geb, and the goddess of the sky, Nut, of unspecified origin, created the sun. Each evening, Nut receives him into hiding for the night, and each morning she gives him back to the world.

The system from On-Heliopolis teaches that Atum-Rē came forth from the primordial ocean, Nun, by his own power. He climbed a hill and raised himself up on the benben stone at Heliopolis. He then drew out from himself, by masturbating, the first divine couple, Shu and Tefnut (air and moisture). These gods brought into the world Geb and Nut, who gave birth to Osiris, Isis, Seth,

Detail of the "Papyrus of Ani" (Papyrus 10470) from a "Book of the Dead," 18th Dynasty and Nephthys. The members of this Ennead governed the country, father succeeding son.

The ancient name Shmūn of the city Ashmūnēn (Hermopolis) means "eight," referring to the four divine couples venerated in this place. These divinities, represented in the form of serpents and frogs, set themselves on the primordial mound, which had come forth from Nun at Shmūn, in order to create light, that is, Rē. According to other texts, the Ogdoad created an egg and placed it on the mound. The sun was born from that egg, and in turn created and ordered the world. Among these gods, Amon afterward met with extraordinary fortune when, during the First Intermediate Period, he became the local god of Thebes, and later, the supreme god of Egypt. The system was then transformed as follows. In the beginning there was a serpent-god Kem-atef (he who finished his time) who was assimilated by the great Amon of Karnak. This serpent died and left to his son, the serpent Ir-ta (the creator of the earth), the care of creating the Ogdoad. Ir-ta was assimilated by the ithyphallic Amon of Luxor. Amon, the member of the Ogdoad, is then his son. The eight gods swam from Thebes to Hermopolis, where they created the sun, and came to die later not far from Medīnet Habu. Later, Horus was linked to this cycle as son and heir of the Ogdoad.

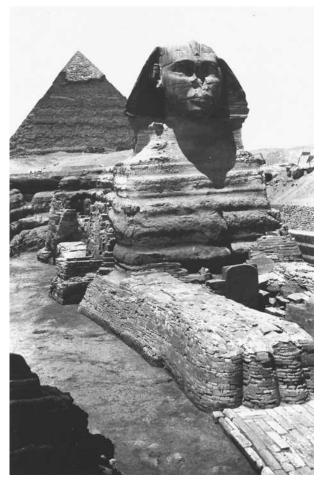

The Memphite system is the only one among these Egyptian cosmogonies that does not have to be laboriously reconstructed from the Pyramid Texts and other religious documents, some funerary, some not. It is preserved in the form of doctrine in stele no. 797 of the British Museum, dating from the reign of Shabaka (Twenty-fifth Dynasty). The original text of this "Monument of Memphite theology," however, was composed, according to H. Junker, between the Third and Fifth Dynasties, and was a fusion of the two preceding systems. Ptah finds himself at the head of eight primordial gods, who are only "forms that exist within Ptah." Ur-Atum, the manifestation of Ptah, accomplishes the work of creation with his heart (the seat of intelligence) and his tongue (instrument of the will). The demiurge first creates the other gods of the Ennead, then the kas and the hemsut, that is, the powers which sustain life, and finally "he caused the cities to rise up and founded the nomes."

Veneration of the sun-god (solar religion) appears alongside the other cults encountered throughout the religious history of Egypt. The name Re probably originated as the common name for the sun. It was associated with several other gods, in particular with Amon and Atum. Rē-Atum is the sun who disappears during the night; Rē is the star of the day. Kheprer (he who is becoming) and Rē-Hor-Akhte (Rē-Horus, dwelling on the horizon) personify the sun that rises in the morning. The Pyramid Texts indicate that the solar religion existed from the most ancient times and that by syncretism with Atum it was integrated into the doctrine of On-Heliopolis. It flourished especially under the Fourth and Fifth Dynasties. During that time several kings bore names formed of compounds based on the name of Rē; and from that time a part of the king's title was sa-Rē or "son of Rē"; the kings of the Fifth Dynasty built solar temples near Abū-Gūrab. A story from the Papyrus Westcar (in the Berlin Museum) tells how the first three kings of that dynasty were born from the union of Rē with the wife of a priest of Rē; the eldest was high priest at Heliopolis before becoming king. Under the Middle Empire, besides Amon-Rē, the names of Khnum-Rē, Min-Rē, and Sobek-Rē appear, attesting to the gradual ascendancy of the solar religion over the other cults. It took on new forms during the New Empire, and even became, under AKHNATON, the only officially tolerated religion.

Myths. The cosmogonical systems, as has just been seen, attributed an uncontested supremacy to the gods. In the myths, on the contrary, they are exposed to all sorts of ambushes and attacks by their adversaries. These legends surround two personages: the sun-god $R\bar{e}$, and Osiris, the god of fertility, lord of the kingdom of the dead. Their vicissitudes are doubtless inspired by the spectacle of nature, in which light and darkness, life and death struggle in unceasing combat.

The "Destruction of Mankind" is an important myth from the solar cycle. Rē sent his eye, the goddess Hathor, against the men who had plotted against him. She caused such a massacre that Rē was obliged to have recourse to a trick in order to rescue the survivors. Wounded by such ingratitude, Rē abandoned the government of the world. His daughter, Nut, the divine cow, carried him up to the sky on her back, but while looking at the earth, she was overcome by vertigo. Rē then ordered Shu to hold her up from underneath.

In the Osirian legend, as in certain solar myths, Horus and Seth are the protagonists. Horus, however, is here the son of Osiris and Isis: he is Horus the child. This legend has been transmitted in its most complete form by Plutarch, De Iside et Osiride. This version describes the benevolent reign of Osiris, which attracted the jealousy of Seth and his supporters. These succeeded by a trick in enclosing him in a coffin, which they threw into the river. The coffin, borne by the waters to Byblos, in Phoenicia, ran aground near a tree, which grew miraculously around it. Isis, gone in search of her husband, found the coffin, after many adventures, and brought it back to Egypt. But after she arrived at Buto close to her son Horus, Seth discovered the coffin and cut up the cadaver into 40 pieces which he scattered. Isis buried the pieces in the places where she found them. Osiris left the kingdom of the dead for a time to prepare his son for combat. Grown to maturity, Horus defied his uncle Seth and overcame him in a series of conflicts. Certain details of this account show Osiris assuming the character of a vegetation god. At the same time, as among other peoples, this vegetation god is also the god of the dead. The name of the city of Byblos provides a link also between Osiris and Adonis, the Phoenician god of vegetation and water who was himself related to the Canaanite-Mesopotamian god Tammuz.

The Sphinx, Cairo, Egypt.

On the gods and the legends, see H. Kees, Der Götterglaube im alten Ägypten (Mitteil. d. vorderasiat.-äg. Ges. 45; Leipzig, 1941).

The Cult. Besides the temples and their personnel, the religious calendars of the Egyptian and the routine daily services of worship of their gods are here described.

The Temples. The contrast between the solar religion and the cult of the other gods is reflected clearly in the construction of the sanctuaries. The solar temple of Abū-Gūrab, built by King Ni-User-Rē, of the Fifth Dynasty, is generally thought to be a replica of the sanctuary at Heliopolis. It is basically a large rectangular court, 75 by 100 meters, bounded by a wall, whose entrance is found in the axis of the east façade. In the west end of the court is an obelisk 36 meters high raised above a truncated pyramid 20 meters high. The obelisk is doubtless a reproduction of the benben stone at Heliopolis. At its foot was placed the table for offerings. Two passageways begin at the entrance and follow the enclosure wall, leading in one direction to the substructure of the obelisk, in another to the storehouses set back against the north wall. Both are decorated with reliefs representing the seasons and various scenes from the life of men, as well as animals and plants. Outside the wall is a large ship made of bricks, symbolizing the ship of the sun.

Egyptian pillar monuments, Kalabsha, Egypt. (©Otto Lang/CORBIS)

The classic temple, however, was conceived as the palace or house of the god (het-neter, per-neter). Temples from the New Empire and from the Ptolemaic Epoch are the only ones preserved, but the ruins of a temple built in the southwest of the Faiyūm by Amenhemhet III and IV show that the sanctuaries of the Middle Kingdom were constructed on the same plan. A monumental gateway, flanked by two towers, the so-called pylons, marked the entrance to the temple. Both towers were adorned with notches into which were fitted great poles ornamented with multicolored pennants. An avenue lined with sphinxes, called the "way of the god," often led through the city to the temple. Beyond the pylons opened a great porticoed court. At the end of the court the columned (hypostyle) hall was erected, its ceiling supported by columns whose capitals reproduced the papyrus flower in bloom or bud. Certain ceremonies were performed here attended only by a limited number of privileged persons; the court was the public part of the temple. Behind the hypostyle hall, also called the vestibule, were a variety of rooms containing, among other things, the objects necessary for the ritual and the treasure of the god, as well as constituting chapels of the gods who were his guests (σύνναοι θεοί). The most important section was the holy of holies or the adyton (bu deser or also set uret). This chapel forms an independent structure within the temple. It has its own roof and receives no light from the exterior. It contains the naos of granite (khemu) in which the statue of the god is placed. On the walls of the vestibule and the other chambers, bas-reliefs depict the ceremonies performed there.

The temple often included a sacred lake in which the priests bathed and purified themselves before celebrating the divine service. Certain ceremonies took place there on feast days. Close by the Ptolemaic temples a small structure was erected, the mammisi, to which the mothergoddess was supposed to have withdrawn to await the birth of her son.

The Clergy. In principle, the king, son of the god, was the sole priest, the sole mediator between men and the divinity. Hence, it is always the king who is shown on the walls of temples performing the ceremonies of the daily ritual; in fact, he was replaced in this function by the priests. Their staffs were attached to each temple, more or less numerous depending on the temple's importance. In spite of several different appellations, notably for the high priests, the hierarchical order appears to have been the same for all these groups. A higher clergy, consisting of the hem-neter, or "servants of God," are generally distinguished from the lower clergy, to which belonged the wāb-priests, "the pure," among others. In fact, besides these two orders of priests, the hem-neter and the $w\bar{a}b$, there existed several classes of clergymen. By virtue of ordination or rather initiation, expressed by the word bes, the priests had the right to enter the adyton and the naos to perform the ceremonies of the cult there. The ritual of Amon indicates that the $w\bar{a}b$ celebrated the divine service, and comparison of the Onomasticon of Amenophis with the circumlocutions employed by the Decrees of Canopus and Memphis lead to the same conclusion.

Among the clergymen, in the first place, were the kheri-heb or "readers," ritualists, as their name indicates, who performed secondary tasks in the cult and who were responsible for the proper regulation of the ceremonies. These men were doubtless preparing themselves for the priesthood by familiarizing themselves with all branches of knowledge in a school attached to the temple, the "House of Life," in which the kheri-heb-heri-tep or "chief readers" and the scribes of the divine book were probably the professors. They also played an important part in the funerary cult, particularly in mummification. The subordinate staff consisted of musicians, chanters, sistrum players, and singers. It is difficult to establish whether the latter were permanently attached to the temple or if they held positions in civil life and came in for a month at a time, three times a year. This was the case with the kautiu and the unutiu. The former performed all kinds of heavy work, such as cleaning the temple, probably acting as porters and participating as well in the management of the goods. The latter kept watch day and night, probably also crying the hour, thus assuring the punctuality of the ceremonies. It is generally held that these three classes of personnel were made up of pious lay people who benevolently offered their services. But comparison of the passage of the Decree of Memphis N16 with that of Canopus 3 makes it appear possible that, as members of the priestly families they belonged to the "sacred tribes" and were considered $w\bar{a}b$, in the later sense of the term, that is, members of the clergy.

The monthly rotation of duty pertained not only to the subordinate staff, but also to the readers and the $w\bar{a}b$ -priests. For this reason all these members of the clergy were divided into four "tribes" or phylae. From the Twenty-first Dynasty up to the close of the Saïte era, the hem-neter or "prophets" became so numerous that they were likewise divided into tribes. But during other epochs, there were only four prophets in each great temple. The hem-neter thus may have been simply the heads of the phylae. The Decree of Canopus did, in fact, establish a fifth phyle and place at its head a prophet "as in the other phylae." The prophets were ranked in ascending order from the fourth to the first prophet, who was ordinarily the high priest or chief of the temple.

On the organization of the clergy, see J. Vergote, Joseph en Égypte (Louvain 1959) 74–94.

Feasts and Daily Ritual. Several liturgical calendars have been preserved in the temple inscriptions, at Medīnet-Habu, Edfu, and Denderah, for example. Unfortunately these acquaint us, in most instances, only with the names of the numerous feasts listed, rarely indicating anything of the nature of the ceremonies. Processions, however, do seem to have been an especially characteristic feature of these feasts. At Edfu, the statue of the god was carried up to the roof of the temple. At Karnak, Amon left his naos to reside several days in his harem (opet) in the South, the temple of Luxor. Descriptions of these feasts may be found in H. W. Fairman, "Worship and Festivals in an Egyptian Temple," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library (Manchester 1903) 37 (1954) 165-203; W. Wolf, Das schöne Fest von Opet (Leipzig 1931); H. Gauthier, Les fêtes du dieu Min (Cairo 1931).

Two papyri from Berlin (no. 3055, 2014, and 3053), which describe the ritual of the temples of Amon and Mut at Karnak, provide better information concerning the daily worship of the divinity. These are in agreement with the inscriptions and representations in the chapels of Amon and five other gods at Abydos, demonstrating a fair degree of uniformity in the rituals honoring different gods. A. Moret explores this data in Le rituel du culte journalier en Égypte (Annales du Musée Guimet. Bibl. d'Études 14; Paris 1902). G. Roeder has slightly altered the order of the ceremonies in his translation of the texts from Abydos: Kulte, Orakel und Naturverehrung im alten Ägypten (Zürich-Stuttgart 1960) 72–141. To these documents has since been added a papyrus preserved partially in Cairo and partially in Turin, as well as the Chester Beatty Papyrus IX in the British Museum. H. Nelson studied these texts in relation to the bas-reliefs in the two great temples of Thebes: "Certain Reliefs at Karnak and Medinet Habu and the Ritual of Amenophis I," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, 8 (1949) 201-232, 309-345. The rite of Horus at Edfu included similar ceremonies (see Fairman, supra). The holy office, celebrated each morning, consisted in the opening of the naos, the adoration and purification of the god with water and incense, and the dressing of the statue, which was then rouged and perfumed. Food and drink were then offered or presented as a sort of meal for the god. Certain texts indicate these offerings may have been made only symbolically, speaking of the offering of Ma'at (in the ritual of Amon) or of the presentation of myrrh (in the ritual of Edfu), for instance. Owing to a ceremony called the "giving back of the offerings," the food was next offered to such other beneficiaries as deceased kings, then carried outside the temple for distribution among the priests, according to their rank. Little is known concerning the makeup of the noonday or evening services.

Piety, Magic, and Morality. Some attention should be directed to the religious life of the people as complementary to the official religion. Unfortunately, the monuments from the early period have yielded little information regarding popular devotion. The wisdom literature is the sole source. This, however, shows, contrary to what has often been said, that the Egyptians of the Old Kingdom had already formed an elevated conception of God and of morality. The New Empire witnessed a change in the relationship that had been formed between the divinities and the faithful. Prayers preserved on the steles depict Amon as the protector of men, the shepherd who watches his flock and who runs to the aid of those who call upon him [e.g., the prayer of Neb-Rē, see J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, (Princeton 1955) 380b]. The great number of ex-votoes, statuettes of the gods, amulets (not all magical), and scarabs with religious devices bears witness to a widespread piety among the people, who addressed themselves by preference to such minor gods as Hapi, the god of the Nile flood; Nepri, god of the wheat; Renenutet, goddess of the harvest; Meskhenet and the seven Hathors, patronesses of women in labor; Taït, goddess of weaving; and Bes and Toëris, protectors of the hearth. The dream books and the ostraca with questions for the oracles demonstrate the wide variety of circumstances that brought the Egyptians into consultation with the deity. Finally, by their personal names they placed themselves under divine protection or proved that they took an active part in the celebration of the religious feasts.

In comparison with prayer, an expression of the dependence of the individual on the divine being, magical incantation treated the god as though subject to certain laws and occult powers. The magician, identifying himself with a god, presumptuously claimed the right to give orders to another god. The Egyptians had no notion of the fundamental contradiction between these two attitudes. Magic, consequently, always played an important part. In their ardent desire to attain their goals, they sometimes alternated sublime prayers with magical injunctions. This practice made itself felt regularly in the rituals and the funerary documents: the Pyramid Texts, the Coffin Texts, and the BOOK OF THE DEAD.

A highly developed moral sense is expressed in the so-called negative confession, in chapter 125 of the Book of the Dead and in the autobiographies represented in the tombs. This witnesses to the innocence of the deceased, before the divine judges, of a wide range of misconduct.

The Life Beyond. Two doctrines concerning life beyond the grave opposed each other, the first being supplanted quite early by the second. According to the Pyramid Texts, the deceased king rose into the sky, taking his place in the solar barque and uniting himself to Rē. The souls of other humans mingled with the stars after death, partaking of their eternal life. The passages toward this heavenly world are located in the East; for that reason this world is called the Dat or Duat, a word also meaning "morning." The life of those who have been thus "glorified" is sometimes depicted as a sojourn in some type of land of plenty, the "field of reeds" or the "field of the offerings." According to the second doctrine, the world of the dead is a subterranean world over which Osiris rules. The roads leading there are the roads to the West; this world is called Imentet (Coptic Amente) or the "West." This conception appears already in a secondary position in the Pyramid Texts, into which it was permitted to penetrate with no little opposition on the part of the supporters of the solar doctrine. It teaches that the dead person must render an account of his good and bad deeds to Osiris. The soul or ba of the just, who is ma'a kheru or "justified by his voice," lives in the tomb close to the mummified body and the statues, or "bodies of eternity," destined to act in lieu of the body in the event that it begins to decay. His happiness consists in "coming into the daylight," in moving among men and gods and "doing what the living do." In the evening, the soul reenters the subterranean world, which Re then visits and entertains throughout the night. The Book of the Dead contains the magic formulas giving the power to overcome the obstacles that could prevent the soul from coming and going. According to the position generally taken, the survival of the soul is dependent upon the preservation of the body or its magic counterparts; the soul disappears into nothingness in the event of their destruction. It is, however, difficult to reconcile this opinion with the notion that the survival of the ma'a kheru is the reward for a virtuous life. On the other hand, the texts from the "skeptics" do not indicate doubt that the soul is immortal: they simply deny that the Osirian funerals guarantee the ba its freedom of movement and they claim that the soul is eternally enclosed in the darkness of the subterranean world. See H. Kees, "Ein Klagelied über das Jenseits," Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache 62 (1927) 73-79. In the Dialogue of the Pessimistic Man with his Soul, the ba only threatens to abandon the body if it should perish by fire. There is reason, therefore, to raise the question whether or not the Egyptians did believe in the full immortality of the soul independently of the preservation of the body. There is not, however, any opposition regarding this point between the ancient solar doctrine and the Osirian doctrine. The aim of the Osirian funerals would have been eternal prolongation of life on earth, which, consequently, must have appeared to them as the greatest good. If the body were annihilated, the soul would go toward the field of reeds, where it knew a beatitude that was, in their eyes, happiness only to a certain limited extent.

If, from the beginning, the soul was not subject to death, that would not mean for the Egyptians that the soul is indestructible. Numerous passages in the funerary texts speak of the destruction of the soul, of the "second death," etc. This was the lot reserved for certain ones among those who were found guilty before the tribunal of Osiris, and perhaps for those who were not protected by magic against the enemies from beyond. These texts were assembled by J. Zandee, Death as an Enemy, according to Egyptian Conceptions (Leiden 1960). It must be noted that these texts do not indicate that the destruction of the soul is an effect of the disappearance of the body.

If one accepts this interpretation of the Osirian funerals, a new meaning is given to the Egyptian civilization as it appears to us, preserved essentially in its necropolises. Rather than the appanage of a people both morosely and morbidly preoccupied with death, these cities of the dead must be seen as homage and a hymn to life, loved by the Egyptians, it seems, more than by all the rest of mankind. See G. A. Reisner, The Egyptian Conception of Immortality (Boston 1912); H. Kees, Totenglauben und Jenseitsvorstellungen der alten Ägypter (Leipzig 1926); A. H. Gardiner, The Attitude of the Ancient Egyptians to Death and the Dead (Cambridge 1942).

Bibliography: J. H. BREASTED, Development of Religion and Thought in Ancient Egypt (New York 1912). A. ERMAN, Die Religion der Ägypter (Leipzig 1934), Fr. La Religion des Égyptiens, tr. H. WILD (Paris 1937). J. VANDIER, La Religion égyptienne, ("Mana" 1.1; Paris 1949). C. DESROCHES-NOBLECOURT, "Les Religions égyptiennes," M. M. GORCE and R. MORTIER, eds., Histoire générale des religions, 4 v. (Paris 1944–48) v. 4. H. FRANKFORT, Ancient Egyptian Religion (New York 1948). É. DRIOTON, "La Religion égyptienne," M. BRILLANT and R. AIGRAIN, eds., Histoire des religions, 5 v. (Paris 1953–56) 3:7–147, 433–437. H. BONNET, Reallexikon der ágyptischen Religionsgeschichte (Berlin 1952). S. MORENZ, Ägyptische Religion (Stuttgart 1960), Fr. La Religion égyptienne, tr. L. JOSPIN (Paris 1962).

[J. VERGOTE]

2. Architecture And Art

Egyptian culture reaches back into the 5th millennium B.C., when neolithic settlements existed in the Faiyûm region at Deir Tasa and Beni Salâma (Merimda). About 3600 B.C. a new, much more advanced culture originated at Gerza and other sites in the north. This chalcolithic period produced some copper pots and some amulets representing gods in the shapes of various animals. Villages turned into towns and districts (the so-called nomes). Two powerful states developed along the banks of the Nile: Upper Egypt in the south, embracing 22 nomes; and Lower Egypt or the Delta land in the north, embracing 20 nomes. Each of these had its totemic symbols of animals or flowers.

Protodynastic Period. During this period (c. 2850-c. 2615 B.C.) the two Egypts were united in a single kingdom by Menes, also called Narmer, who was, according to the historian Manetho of the 3rd century B.C., the founder of the First Dynasty. This event is documented with great aesthetic, as well as historic, value by one of the earliest objects of Egyptian art: the Palette of Narmer (Cairo Museum) (see KINGSHIP IN THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST). Egyptian palettes were plates on which cosmetics were prepared, especially the cosmetic made of powdered malachite mixed with oil, which served as a germicidal eye paint similar to the black ointment that is still put on eyelids in the fly-infested regions of the modern Orient. This 22-inch slate object is decorated on both sides. On one side the king is depicted wearing the tall, white crown of Upper Egypt, as he is about to smite a foe with his lifted mace, while two enemies are fleeing below. The reverse shows Narmer crowned, wearing the red crown of Lower Egypt and surveying two rows of decapitated enemies, whose heads are neatly placed between their feet. Above him the cow heads symbolize the goddess Hathor, protectress of Narmer. Below, the intertwined long necks of two mythical animals form the container in which the ointment was mixed. Even in this early work the convention that was to rule Egyptian art for centuries is already present. The ruler, since he was considered divine, towers high over his vizier and his soldiers. The bodies are represented from the front, whereas the head and legs are seen in profile. This characteristic persists throughout the entire history of Egyptian relief sculpture and painting.

Artistically, the history of Egypt can be divided into three periods corresponding to the Old, the Middle, and the New Kingdoms. The first, called also the Pyramid Age, lasted from c. 2850 to c. 2140 B.C. Since his life was ruled by religion, the art of the Egyptian naturally reflected his faith.

Old Kingdom. Belief in an afterworld, for which he prepared during his whole lifetime, in a resurrection, and in a last judgment necessitated the preservation of his body. According to his prominence in society the Egyptian built his tomb: in the shape of a truncated pyramid called the mastaba or, as in the case of Djosher, the first king of the Third Dynasty, a series of five mastabas on top of one another, which formed his so-called Step Pyramid at Saqqâra (see EGYPT). Out of this structure the true pyramids developed.

Pyramids. The best-known pyramids are those of Khufu (Cheops), Khafra (Chephren), and Menkaure (Mycerinos) at El Gîza. The largest one is the pyramid of Khufu, originally 481 feet high (some of it now covered by sand), on which about 100,000 men labored for 30 years, usually during the period of inundation, when agricultural work was at rest. The core is of yellow limestone, the funeral chamber is lined with granite, and the outer casing, now almost completely stripped off, was once of exquisitely fitted, polished, white limestone that reflected the sun, the sacred emblem of which was a pyramidal shape-a fitting memorial because the kings considered themselves sons of Ra (Re), the sun god. Next to the pyramid a mortuary temple, of which only the foundations are left, was erected. Since tombs were sealed after the body was laid to rest, the temple was used for memorial services. Khafra, who succeeded Khufu, erected a sphinx next to his pyramid as a symbolic guardian of the tomb. The sphinx is a composite figure, lion-bodied with a human head representing the king wearing the linen headdress and the cobra, emblems of royalty. East of the pyramid is Khafra's mortuary temple, to which a causeway once reached from the Nile.

Tombs. Inside the tomb, whether pyramid of king or mastaba of noble, arrangements were made for the comfort and entertainment of the soul of the deceased. The Ka, or life force, was believed to live on in the shape of a bird, the manifestation of the soul after death, called the Ba, and to visit the tomb periodically until the time for last judgment, when the deceased would have to account for his deeds. His heart was balanced against truth before the assembly of gods. If the judgment were favorable, he would become a transfigured spirit and exist in a sphere beyond humanity; if not, he was annihilated by demons. The visiting Ka needed a likeness of the deceased into which it could enter, so portrait statues were placed in each tomb. Those of the kings and nobles were highly stylized and idealized, as, for example, Khafra or the courtier Rahotep and his wife, Nofret. All three statues are in the Cairo Museum. The artist worked from a rectangular block of stone as it came from the quarry, and the result is almost cubistic simplicity. The figures of Rahotep and Nofret were polychromed; the man has a brownish tan all over his body, whereas his lady, who is dressed in a white sheath and wears lavish jewelry, has a light olive complexion. Their eyes are made of crystal, on which the iris is painted, so that they have a startlingly lifelike appearance. The representations of commoners were much more realistic; for example, the limestone figures of the Seated Scribe in the Louvre, whose flabby body witnesses to a sedentary occupation, or the wooden statuette of the portly Ka-aper (Sheikel-Beled, "the mayor"), now in the Cairo Museum.

The walls of the tomb chamber were decorated by polychromed relief sculpture or painting, representing the property or favorite occupations of the deceased. Ti, a court official whose tomb is at Saqqâra, is represented on a hippopotamus hunt, standing up in his reed boat, while his servants attack the animals with spears. Fish swim in the water below, and the papyrus thicket is alive with birds and small beasts above their heads. Another relief from the same tomb represents cattle herded across a river; a herdsman carries a newborn calf, whose head is turned back anxiously toward its lowing mother. It is interesting to observe that, whereas the figure of the deceased Ti is stylized, the herdsmen and especially the animals are quite realistic on these limestone reliefs. A variation in wood is the relief of Hesire in the Cairo Museum, which comes from his brick mastaba at Saqqâra and shows a high degree of technical accomplishment.

Painting at that time was used mostly as an accessory to relief. The painter did not wish to create an illusion; rather he achieved an effect of polychrome harmony. Illustrated papyrus copies of the BOOK OF THE DEAD also are found in the tombs. They served as magical passports that recalled the virtues of the deceased and pleaded for eternal life. They established the formal, archaic style of painting in the Old Kingdom.

Middle Kingdom. During the Middle Kingdom (c. 1989–1776 B.C.) the traditional forms of architecture and sculpture were used, and mortuary temples and pyramids were erected; but none of them was as impressive as those at El Gîza. Sesostris I caused an obelisk to be raised in Heliopolis as a homage to the sun. The pyramidion on top, like the pyramids, was an emblem of the sun. Most of the great architectural projects of this time have disappeared because of rebuilding by rulers of the New Kingdom. In the minor arts the Middle Kingdom reached a very high technical excellence, of which the magnificent collection of jewels in the Metropolitan Museum, New York City, bears witness.

New Kingdom. This period (c. 1570-c. 1150 B.C.), which began after the Hyksos invaders had been driven out of the country, was architecturally the most brilliant period in Egyptian history. The pharaohs built vast temples instead of the huge pyramids to immortalize their names. Plunder of the tombs cautioned the rulers to hide rather than expose their last resting places. These were still magnificently appointed, containing beautiful reliefs, paintings, and all the paraphernalia the Ka might desire; but they were cut deep in the rock and hidden from covetous eyes. The so-called Valley of the Kings and Valley of the Queens near Thebes contain the most grandiose of these rock-cut funeral vaults; but the tombs of nobles at El Ashraf and Deir-el-Medina, though smaller, are artistically just as important and interesting because of their less formal and, at times, impressionistic decoration representing daily life.

Hatshepsut's Temple. The mortuary temple of Queen Hatshepsut at Deir-el-Bahri is one of the most conspicuous monuments of its kind (see TEMPLES). She wished to firmly establish her divine origin in order to sustain her unprecedented position as Lady Pharaoh. Colonnaded porticoes built of white limestone, terraces planted with trees and flowers imported from Punt, which had to be watered laboriously, attempted to transform the arid cliff landscape into an earthly paradise of the sungod Amon-Ra. The noble Senmut, Hatshepsut's chief architect, built sanctuaries to Anubis, the jackal-headed god of the dead, and to the sky-goddess Hathor. The main shrine was dedicated to AMON, and under this the Queen planned her own resting place. However, because of difficulties in cutting the rock, her mortuary chapel was built south of the main sanctuary. She also caused two obelisks to be erected at Karnak, one of which, the largest in all Egypt, is still standing; it is 97 1/2 feet high and contains 180 cubic yards of granite.

Thutmose III, the stepson whom Hatshepsut kept from ruling, avenged himself by decapitating all the Queen's likenesses, erasing her name, and letting her beautiful gardens die.

Temples at Karnak and Luxor. On the eastern shore of the Nile the huge temples of Karnak and Luxor bear witness to the building zeal of the rulers during the Empire Period (1570–1211 B.C.). Usually the approach to the temple was from the river, along a processional way lined by guardian spirits, sphinxes, or rams. The pylon gate was formed by two towerlike stone structures with sloping sides decorated by laudatory reliefs and chased vertically to form flag bases for banners. Cedar doors covered by bronze, gold, or electrum led into the colonnaded forecourt, where the public festivals were held. Beyond it was the hypostyle hall, or hall of appearances, the roof of which was supported by rows of columns. Behind the hall was the small inner sanctuary of the god, to which only the priests were admitted. Within the sacred precinct were also the priests' offices, treasury, and storerooms.

NEW CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

Building on the enormous temple of Amon at Karnak went on for centuries. Within the sacred precinct are smaller temples to Khonsu and Ptah, deities of procreative power, and a sacred lake. The great hypostyle hall was started by Seti I and completed by his son, Ramses II. It is 54,000 sq. feet, the largest columnar hall in the world. It has 16 rows of columns, the two central ones of which supported the clerestory. The height of each column is 79 feet; the diameter is 11 3/4 feet; each papyrus capital could accommodate 100 standing men. Like Karnak, the temple of Luxor is dedicated to Amon-Ra. Amenhotep III built the first temple, but Ramses II made many additions, among others six colossal granite figures of himself, two obelisks, and an avenue of sphinxes leading to Karnak, which are presently being excavated. Within the sacred precinct there is a chapel of Alexander the Great, the remains of a Christian shrine, and a mosque; each era has thus paid homage to divinity.

Temples of Ramses II and III. The mortuary temple of Ramses II, the Ramesseum, was built on the opposite side of the Nile, west of Thebes. Even today the grandeur of the ruins, covering 870 by 570 feet, amazes the visitor. Behind the temple are a series of granaries covered by barrel vaults constructed of mudbrick, probably the earliest vaults in the history of architecture. Nearby, at Madînet Habu, Ramses III built his mortuary temple, which is, in concept, similar to that of his predecessor but much better preserved. A series of two courts with statues of the king led to the hypostyle hall, which was followed by smaller halls leading to the sanctuary. A small palace with audience hall and apartments opened to the south of the main court. The thick stone wall surrounding the precinct had fortified gates on western and eastern sides. The gateways contained apartments in the upper stories. The sculptural decoration was enlivened by rich paint, which is especially well preserved in the sheltered places.

At Abu Simbel, between the second and third cataracts of the Nile, Ramses II caused a temple to be hewn out of the rock above the river. Four colossal portraits of the king (64 feet high) decorate the front, and a smaller representation of the sun-god stands above the entrance. By the legs of the sitting colossi eight small figures represent the Pharao's mother, his beloved wife, Nefertari (a Hittite princess), and their children. The door leads into a great hall, 55 by 50 feet, beyond which is a smaller room and a sanctuary with cult statues of Ramses himself, the sun-god Ra-Harakhti, and the chief gods of Thebes and Memphis, Amon and Ptah. Adjacent is the smaller temple of Queen Nefertari, decorated by six colossi (30 feet high), of which four represent Ramses II, and two, the Queen. The interior contains two small halls dedicated to the cow-goddess Hathor, goddess of love, music, and dance. The construction of the Aswân High Dam, which was to transform the Nile to the south into Lake Nasser, threatened these monuments with inundation. At the completion of the dam, the water level would be 120 feet above the heads of the colossi of Ramses II. To save Abu Simbel for posterity, a $36 million project was undertaken whereby the temples and statues were cut into sections and reassembled as much as possible in their ancient form on a plateau 200 feet above the original site. Forty-eight nations of the world responded to the plea of the United Arab Republic to help salvage these important cultural treasures. The U.S. donated $12 million to the cause.

Naturalism. New Kingdom sculpture, while traditional in its frontality and poses, shows a tendency toward naturalism and portrait likeness. Although Hatshepsut is represented on her statue that is now in the Metropolitan Museum as enthroned and wearing the formal headdress and short, pleated linen skirt of a ruler, she is made to appear femininely delicate both in features and in body. Realism was practiced during the reign of Amenhotep IV, who changed his name to AKHNATON, "useful to Aton." He was unique among ancient Egyptian rulers for his monotheism. He rejected the Egyptian pantheon and proclaimed Aton, represented by the sun disk, the sole deity (see SUN WORSHIP). The new capital that he built at Tell el 'Amârna he called Akhet-Aton, "Horizon of Aton." Search for truth was his doctrine, and this is mirrored in the numerous portraits of Akhnaton, which show a remarkable lack of flattery; the philosopher-poet king is depicted with a slight paunch typical of a man of sedentary habits. His lovely wife, Nefretiti, and his daughters were the subjects of several works of art. The painted limestone bust of the queen in Berlin is the best known of these, but several unfinished portraits have been found that bear witness to her exquisite beauty. Warm family devotion is depicted on a relief in Cairo, which represents the royal spouses seated, holding their children on their laps, the king kissing one; in the background the sun extends its beneficent rays toward them, and each ray ends in a blessing hand. Tutankhamon, who married one of these princesses, had to renounce Akhnaton's monotheism after a religious upheaval and return to the cult of the old gods of Egypt. The tomb of this young ruler, discovered in 1922, yielded the richest find yet of minor art objects, jewelry, lamps, furniture, chariots, etc.

At Thebes, the reliefs of the tomb of Ramose, who was vizier during the rules of Amenhotep III and his son, Akhnaton, reflect the transition from refined formality, as depicted by the festive gathering in which his brother takes part, to a realistic style, which is illustrated by the later decoration of the burial chamber, representing the funeral procession with priests, offerings, and professional mourners.

Late Period. Relief became progressively flat and turned into deeply incised contour lines with only slight modeling during the late period. Nevertheless, the traditional Egyptian style survived the Greek and Roman conquests and their enormous influence over the art of the provinces. The temple of Isis on the small island of Philae, which is now under water during a great part of the year (because of the Aswan Dam), was started by Ptolemy II in the 3rd century B.C.; but its decoration continued during Roman rule as the cult of Isis became popular with the Romans. It was closed finally by Justinian in A.D. 543. The Horus temple at Edfu (c. 200 B.C.) is another example of the survival of traditional architecture and sculpture in Ptolemaic times.

Egyptian Paintings. Painting in the New Kingdom was often applied directly, and the relief was omitted. Earth colors and mineral pigments were used with the al secco technique. Gum arabic, egg white, glue, wax, or honey served as medium. The figures were sketched in with a red or black outline; there is evidence that a grid was used for proportions. After the application of the color, the contour was outlined again with red and white lines. When the subject matter was mythological or ritual, as it usually was when a royal sepulchre was decorated, the drawing was based on traditional conventions resembling the style of the Book of the Dead. When it was biographical, depicting the favorite events of the life of the deceased, as in the more than 400 private tombs near Thebes, the artist invented his own iconography, and the result was a free, lively style of genre painting. These scenes of banquets, musicians, beautiful ladies, pleasure gardens with pools full of carp and lotus flowers, hunters, fishers, harvesters, and artisans at their toil all present posterity with a valuable document that reflects the high civilization of ancient Egypt.

Bibliography: K. LANGE and M. HIRMER, Egypt, Architecture, Sculpture, Painting in Three Thousand Years, tr. R. H. BOOTHROYD (London 1956). A. MEKHITARIAN, Egyptian Painting, tr. S. GILBERT (New York 1954). W. S. SMITH, The Art and Architecture of Ancient Egypt in Pelican History of Art, ed. N. PEVSNER (Baltimore 1958). S. BOSTICCO and H. W. MÜLLER, Encyclopedia of World Art (New York 1959) 4:572–710; plates 319–392. J. WILSON, The Burden of Egypt: An Interpretation of Ancient Egyptian Culture (Chicago 1951). S. LLOYD, The Art of the Ancient Near East (New York 1961).

[I. E. ELLINGER]

3. Language and Literature

The language of ancient Egypt is related both to the Semitic languages of Southeast Asia and to the Hamitic languages of North Africa (Berber, Somali, Galla). This can be explained either by the fusion of intrusive Semitic elements with the Hamitic African substratum or by the remote common origin of the Semitic and Hamitic language families, which split off at an early date and left Egyptian in between.

Language and Script. Texts of different periods make it possible to detect the stages in the history of the Egyptian written languages from the Archaic Period (c. 3000 B.C.) to the Christian era.

History of the Language. Old Egyptian, the language of the Old Kingdom (before 2200 B.C.), was the language of the Pyramid Texts and the earliest biographical inscriptions, which developed probably around the North Egyptian cultural centers of Memphis and Heliopolis.

Middle Egyptian was in general use from the First Intermediate Period to the end of the Eighteenth Dynasty (c. 2200–c. 1350 B.C.) and survived in the late periods as the language of monumental inscriptions and religious literature. Middle Egyptian probably developed in the Herakleopolitan center and was regarded as the classical form of the Egyptian language.

Late Egyptian, apparently the spoken language of Upper Egypt, was first written in the private letters and administrative documents of the Amarna Period (c. 1370–c. 1350 B.C.); in the Ramesside Period (13th century B.C.) it replaced Middle Egyptian elsewhere in nonreligious literature. Demotic was the Late Egyptian of the cursive scripts between 750 B.C. and A.D. 320. The popular language in the Late Egyptian Period developed into Coptic.

Types of Script. The Egyptian hieroglyphic script developed from pictographic signs in the Late Predynastic (Gerzean) Period (last quarter of the 4th millennium B.C.), possibly under the influence of Protoliterate Mesopotamian civilization. The earliest known hieroglyphic inscriptions were written at the beginning of the First Dynasty (Kings Narmer and Aha) and already comprised the standard forms of phonetic signs, which changed very little throughout the whole of ancient Egyptian civilization. The hieroglyphic writing included word signs, phonetic symbols, ideographic determinatives, and a complete decimal numerical system.

From the Old Kingdom to the Roman Empire highly decorative hieroglyphic texts were carved or painted on walls and steles as well as on wooden coffins and papyri of religious significance.

The hieratic script developed early from the cursive hieroglyphic signs and, beginning with the Archaic Period, was used on pottery, wood, and papyrus, undergoing considerable stylistic changes in subsequent periods of Egyptian history.

The demotic script developed in the Saitic Period (663–525 B.C.) and later. It gradually replaced the hieratic script in administration, legal records, letters, and folk stories, and remained in general use to the end of the Roman Empire.

Old-Egyptian Literature. The most dynamic age in the formation of ancient Egyptian civilization began in the Late Predynastic (Gerzean) Period and continued until it reached its summit and achieved stabilization in the Pyramid Age, probably before 2500 B.C. There is no doubt that a complex Egyptian literature existed in the Third Dynasty (c. 2615–c. 2565), especially in the time of King Djoser and his chief architect, Imhotep, who was credited with the authorship of medical texts, books of wisdom, and magic formulas [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1954) 419–420].

Later texts, particularly those of a religious, scientific, magical, and didactic character, were intentionally archaized and claimed great antiquity in order to gain esteem, while really ancient texts were carefully preserved, transcribed, and imitated. The authenticity of their early sources can be verified on the basis of linguistic and circumstantial evidence. At least two such texts, the Memphite Theology [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 4-6], transcribed in the 6th century B.C. by the order of Shabaka (hence known as the Shabaka Stone), and the Edwin Smith Surgical Papyrus, both following originals of the Third to the Fifth Dynasties, are listed among the highest achievements of ancient Egyptian civilization, showing the speculative mind and scientific approach so alien to the Egyptian literature of later periods. The Old Kingdom Teaching of Ptah-hotep [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 412-414], the vizier of King Izezi of the Fifth Dynasty, known from several manuscripts of the Middle Kingdom and later, became the model for Egyptian wisdom literature.

The largest body of the Old Kingdom literature is found in the Pyramid Texts [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 326–328], which include magic spells, incantations, and the earliest examples of hymns, with frequent references to cosmic myths but very little narrative. The other largest domain of the Old Kingdom literature is the tomb inscriptions, including the narrative biographical texts of Uni, Heri-Khuf, Sabni, and others, which could have served as prototypes for the best Middle Kingdom stories.

No Old Egyptian tales are known, with the possible exception of the Story of Cheops [or Khufu] and the Magicians. Circumstantial evidence makes it probable that the stories were first composed in the Fifth or early Sixth Dynasty, but the only manuscript, the Westcar Papyrus, dates from the Hyksos times, and its language is characteristic of the late Middle Kingdom. The text includes several magic adventures told or demonstrated to King Cheops, and it concludes with the alleged prophetic story of the miraculous birth of the first three rulers of the Fifth Dynasty.

Middle Egyptian Literature. The fall of the Old Kingdom authority, the deep crisis of the ancient political and moral order, and the social chaos of the civil war were reflected in the literature of the time of transition, and particularly in the Admonitions of Ipu-wer and the Prophecy of Nefer-rohu (or Neferti); see J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 441-446 and Posenor, Littérature et politique. The imaginative descriptions of disturbance and total disaster were sometimes concluded with a prophecy of the new ruler or "the shepherd," who would restore order and justice to Egypt. But all the above-mentioned texts are known only from much later manuscripts, and the circumstantial evidence suggests that the original texts were composed not earlier than the Twelfth Dynasty as a kind of political propaganda for the new rulers of the appeased country. In any case, they reflect the awakening of social and national consciousness and a tendency to establish new order in the country. Special emphasis was laid upon rightness or justice, personified as the goddess Ma'at.

Wisdom Literature. An important part in the Egyptian renaissance was played by wisdom literature. The ideas of just rule were expressed in the Instructions for Meri-ka-re [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 414–418], the Herakleopolitan king of the Tenth Dynasty, and much shorter Instructions of Amen-em-het I (ibid. 418–419), the first king of the Twelfth Dynasty, assassinated in a palace revolt; and in the Satire de metièrs or Teaching of Kheti (or Akhtoy), son of Duaf, known from numerous corrupt late copies, describing the dignity of the scribe's profession in comparison with other kinds of work. The same ideas were expressed in the Middle Kingdom Egyptian tales.

The Philosophical Dispute of the Misanthrope with his soul is a strange psychological drama of a split personality discussing with his soul (Ba) the problem of death. It includes a sharp criticism of the existing social order, resembling Admonitions of Nefer-rohu and Ipuwer. The Story of the Eloquent Peasant [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 407–410] was used only as a framework for nine speeches on justice addressed by a complaining peasant to the royal officials.

Travel Stories. Two Middle Kingdom travel stories, of Si-nuhe [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² 18-22] and the Shipwrecked Sailor, deal with the patriotic nostalgia that the Egyptians felt when in foreign lands. Si-nuhe was an Egyptian refugee who attained a high position in the Kingdom of Retenu (Syria or Palestine) but finally returned home to die in his own country. The Story of Sinuhe was considered a classic piece of Egyptian literature, and the large number of preserved manuscripts indicates its great popularity. The language and composition are clear, free from verbosity and unnecessary ornamentation, but effective and picturesque, giving good glimpses into the daily life of the time in Egypt and in the land of Retenu. Everything could have actually happened just as described in the story. The Ship-wrecked Sailor is a fantastic story of a sailor's adventures and homesickness on the strange enchanted island of a snake king.

Poetry. Egyptian poetic compositions have apparent strophic arrangement, rhythmic devices, emphasized by periodic repetitions and parallel statements, word play, and alliteration. Some of the Old Kingdom spells of the Pyramid Texts were certainly poems, and the biographical text of Uni (from the early Sixth Dynasty) contains a triumphal hymn, written on the occasion of Uni's happy return from a Nubian expedition, in which every strophe is introduced by a brief clause: "This army returned in safety."

The great religious hymns to the sun-god RA (Re), the hymn to the crocodile-god Sobek, the ritual Hymn to the Crowns, the Hymn to Osiris, the god of vegetation, the Hymn to the Nile [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 372–373]—these and other hymns, some of which may have originated in the Old Kingdom Pyramid Texts, certainly existed in the Middle Kingdom, although they are known mainly from later manuscripts. The hymns of victory are included in the historical royal records. The best known of such hymns, dedicated to Sesostris III (1878–1843), had a rigid strophic form and repetitions, possibly intended for a choir. Four elegiac hymns are included in the philosophical Dispute over Suicide [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 405–407]. Their structure is similar, although they were hardly composed for choral singing.

Religious drama in ancient Egypt, reenacting mythological scenes on special occasions, is attested by some texts with dialogues and presumed stage devices. The Middle Kingdom papyrus from the Ramesseum contains the Coronation Play, based on the myth of Horus and Set. A brief account of a similar dramatic performance held on the occaison of seasonal festivals at Abydos is recorded on the stele of Ikhernofret, an official of Sesostris III.

New Kingdom and Late Egyptian Literature. New Kingdom literature did not break with the ancient heritage. The ancient wisdom literature (of Ptah-hotep, Amenemhet I, and Kheti, son of Duaf), the Middle Kingdom poetry, such as religious hymns and the Harper's Song [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 467], and the best stories (e.g., Si-nuhe) were copied and imitated, serving as literary models in the scribal schools. Middle Egyptian remained the language of monumental inscriptions and sacred literature, which used the traditional phraseology.

Historical records of the Empire include vivid narrations of achievements and adventures and poems glorifying the victories [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 234–263]. The hymn from the poetic stele of Thutmose III was rewritten with some minor alteration for several later pharaos.

Religious hymnal literature reached the highest level in the solar Hymn to Amon-Ra of Suty and Hor [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² 365–366], composed under Amenhotep III; and in the famous Hymn to Aton of the Amarna Period (ibid. 369–371), ascribed to King AKHNATON himself and best preserved in the abandoned tomb of It-ntr Ay (or Eye).

A new literary form, particularly popular in the time of the empire, is represented by charming love songs with clear poetic devices: strophic arrangement, similes, metaphors, play on words, often with humor and satire.

New Kingdom narrative literature must include the historical records of war expeditions and other activities inscribed on the walls of the temples and commemorative steles, especially the records of the Syrian expeditions of Thutmose I and III [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 234–241], the Sportive Stele of Amenhotep II (ibid. 244–245), the Battle of Kadesh of Ramses II (ibid. 255–256), once known as the Epic of Pentawer.

Among the Late Egyptian stories there is the Story of the Two Brothers [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,2 (Princeton 1955) 23-25], which begins as a folk tale of peasant life and develops in a continuous narrative of magic, adventures, and reincarnations. The Story of the Foredoomed Prince (Papyrus Harris 500, see J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² 22b) resembles the European tales of the Glass Mound and Sleeping Beauty. There are at least two historical folk tales: the Story of Sekenenre and Apopis and the Capture of Joppe. The long Story of Wen-Amon [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 25-29] might have been a true account of the travel adventures of an Egyptian official sent from Thebes to Lebanon to bring wood for the sacred bark of Amon. There are also an allegorical Story of the Blinding of Truth and several long mythological stories, such as the Deliverance of Mankind from Destruction (ibid.) inscribed on the shrine of Tutankhamun and on the walls of the royal tombs (Seti I, Ramses II and III), the Tale of Horus and Seth (ibid. 14-17), with their long quarrel before the divine tribunal, and How Isis Gained Magic Power over Ra, the King of Gods. (The last two are preserved on Twentieth-Dynasty papyri in the Chester Beatty collection.)

The Late Egyptian wisdom literature, such as the Instruction of Ani [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 420–421] and the Wisdom of Amen-em-ope (ibid. 421–424), reflect the new attitudes of the period, which J. H. Breasted called the "Age of Personal Piety," emphasizing humility, meekness, and total dependence on divine mercy. The Late Egyptian miscellanies include a large number of school texts, copying, quoting, or imitating earlier instructions, together with model letters, didactic or satirical, advocating learning, obedience, and modesty.

The New Kingdom texts of prayers of this period, which include confession of guilt, reconciliation, supplication, and thanksgiving, have been the subject of a fascinating study by B. Gunn, "Religion of the Poor" [The Journal of Egyptian Archaeology, 3 (1916) 81–94].

Demotic Literature. The Egyptian literature of the latest periods on demotic manuscripts preserves the memory of the glorious past in the cycles of historical novels: the Story of Setne (or Khaemwase), the son of Ramses II, continued in the Story of Si-Osiris, his son, two stories from the Cycle of Petubastis, and fragments of Amasis Tales and of the Story of Patese.

The late demotic Papyrus of Leiden contains the long mythological or allegorical Story of the Solar Eye or the Flight of Hathor-Tefnut to Nubia, which includes several philosophical discourses and animal fables interwoven in the plot of the story. At least one fable of the Leiden Papyrus, The Mouse and the Lion, is known from Greek sources ascribed to Aesop. No animal fables have been found in Egyptian literature outside of the Leiden Papyrus, but their existence and popularity in the New Kingdom is evident from drawings representing animals in human attitudes.

Demotic texts of the Ptolemaic and Roman period include a later version of the BOOK OF THE DEAD and some fragments copied from lost ancient sources, such as the Lamentations of Isis and Nephtys and even the Wisdom of Hor-dedef from the Fourth Dynasty [J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,² (Princeton 1955) 419–420) and the demotic adaptation of the Memphite Theology, showing the deeply rooted traditions of the ancient Egyptian civilization.

Bibliography: Language. A. H. GARDINER, Egyptian Grammar (London 1957). E. EDEL, Altägyptische Grammatik, 2 v. (Analecta orientalia 34, 39; Rome 1955-64). A. ERMAN, Neuägyptische Grammatik (Leipzig 1933). F. LEXA, Grammaire démotique (Prague 1947-51). A. ERMAN and H. GRAPOW, eds., Wörterbuch der aegyptischen Sprache, 12 v. (Leipzig 1926–55). H. KEES, ed., Ägyptologie (Handbuch der Orientalistik 1.1; Leiden 1959). Literature. A. ERMAN, The Literature of the Ancient Egyptians, tr. A. M. BLACK-MAN (London 1927). G. LEFEBVRE, ed. and tr., Romans et contes égyptiens de l'époque pharaonique (Paris 1949). S. SCHOTT, ed. and tr., Altägyptische Liebeslieder mit Märchen und Liebesgeschichten (Zurich 1950). E. BRUNNERTRAUT, ed. and tr., Altägyptische Märchen (Düsseldorf-Cologne 1963). J. A. WILSON, in J. B. PRITCHARD, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament,², passim. G. POSENER, "Recherches littéraires," Revue d'Égyptologie 6 (1951) 27-48; 7 (1950) 71-84; 8 (1951) 171-189; 9 (1952) 109–120; Littérature et politique dans l'Égypte de la XII^e dynastie (Paris 1956).

[B. MARCZUK]

EGYPT, EARLY CHURCH IN

There is no direct evidence for the presence of Christian communities in Egypt before the 2d century A.D. At Alexandria, the greatest port of the eastern Mediterranean, there was a considerable Jewish colony that flourished in the commingling of Oriental, Egyptian, and Greek cultures. This Hellenistic influence produced the Septuagint, and an apologetic literature intended to make Jewish revelation comprehensible to Greek rationalism; there was a considerable body of literature written or

The letter of Emperor Claudius (A.D. 41) regarding the influx of Jews from Syria is no longer considered evidence that Christians were dwelling in Egypt at that date; but Egyptians are mentioned among those who heard the Apostles "speak with foreign tongues" at Pentecost (Acts 2.10). A later passage of the Acts (18.24-25) is concerned with Apollos, a Jew of Alexandria, "who had been instructed [in his country] in the Way of the Lord." If the words "in his country" found in some manuscripts of Acts are authentic, they bear witness to the antiquity of Christian propaganda in Egypt. The tradition that the Church of Alexandria was founded by St. Mark would be conclusive if it had been mentioned by CLEMENT OF AL-EXANDRIA or ORIGEN, but the earliest report is that of Eusebius in the 4th century (Ecclesiastical History 2.16). It is impossible that Clement and Origen could have ignored the foundation of St. Mark. At the moment that the Church of Egypt entered history toward the end of the 2d century, it appeared solidly organized, drawing its members especially from the Hellenic milieu.

The peril of the Christians, regarded with hostility by the Jews, considered a Jewish sect by the Greeks, and banned by the Roman government, was great. Toward the end of the 2d century, the Gnostic writers Valentinus and Basilides spread their doctrines at Alexandria. GNOSTI-CISM was not primarily a Christian aberration, but these two writers were Christian heretics. During the late 2d century, a catechetical school was established at Alexandria that seems to give evidence of a considerable Christian community. Once secure at Alexandria, Christianity spread up the Nile Valley. There is no evidence found in papyri dealing with administration or economic life, but numerous literary papyri bear witness to the presence of Christian communities even in Upper Egypt (Harvard Theological Review 37 [1944] 201).

Early Persecution of Christians. During the early part of the 3d century, Emperor Septimius Severus took action against the Christians. According to Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 6.2), Christian athletes, that is, the confessors who had the constancy to face torture and death, were brought from the THEBAID and all parts of Egypt to Alexandria for trial and execution. In the course of the 3d century, the gospel spread further into the country places, and Bp. DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA devoted himself to converting the Egyptians or "Copts". The word "Copt" is a corruption of the Greek Aĭyuπτιος (Egyptian), which passed first through the Arabic qoubt. The country people were called Egyptian to distinguish them from the city dwellers in Alexandria. More precise information on the spread of Christianity in the countryside may be gathered from documents of the persecution of the emperor DECIUS (249–251), even though the libelli (see LIBELLATICI) or certificates of sacrifice were required of the whole population, not only of Christians. Almost all certificates have come from Fayyûm. It seems that at this period Coptic translations of the Sacred Scriptures existed, at least of the books used in the liturgical ceremonies (Psalter, Gospel Book); but the problems raised by these books relative to their origin and spread have not been resolved.

The recorded history of the Church in Egypt begins with Bp. Demetrius of Alexandria (189-231). (See DEME-TRIUS, SS.) It is probable that until his time the only bishop in Egypt was at Alexandria and that he governed the Christians through their local priests and deacons (Ecclesiastical History 7.24). According to Eutyches (Annales; Patrologia Graeca 111:982), Demetrius was the first to consecrate bishops outside his own capital. That the Egyptian episcopate was the result of a division of the jurisdiction that had formerly belonged entirely to Alexandria explains the absolute authority its bishop enjoyed among his colleagues. His position was confirmed by the sixth canon of the Council of Nicaea (325): "The old customs in use in Egypt, in Libya, and in the Pentapolis shall continue to exist; that is, the Bishop of Alexandria shall have jurisdiction over all these provinces, for theirs is a similar relation to the Bishop of Rome" (Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, 1:389). The power and authority of the bishop, later the patriarch, of Alexandria was exercised and recognized repeatedly until the Arab conquest. After the Council of CHALCEDON (451), the Monophysites disputed the see, and there were often two or more claimants: one, nominated by the emperor, called "melkite" or the king's man, was presumably faithful to the terms of Chalcedon; the other, a Monophysite, was chosen by the Egyptians themselves on the basis of his fidelity to the teachings of Cyril and Dioscorus.

Egyptian Monasticism. In the 3d century, Egypt saw the rise of MONASTICISM. This institution was first associated with the Thebaid, to which many Christians had retired during the persecution of Decius. According to St. JEROME, the first ascetic to settle permanently in the desert was Paul of Thebes (d. c. 341). The Vita Pauli by Jerome is a romantic story of monasticism, but the Vita Antonii written by St. ATHANASIUS (c. 357) is essentially trustworthy. Under Anthony common life began to take the place of the purely eremitical life. With Pachomius, monasticism in its cenobitical form became a permanent institution. From the Thebaid, monasticism spread to Lower Egypt; Ammon of Alexandria (d. c. 356) trained many disciples in the Nitrian mountains; Macarius (d. c.

390) did the same in the desert of Scete. These monasteries were visited by famous pilgrims, particularly in the late 4th and early part of the 5th century, such as Jerome, Rufinus, the two Melanias, Aetheria, John Cassian, Palladius, and Evagrius. The movement continued to attract famous and obscure recruits until the Arab invasions in the 7th century.

Athanasius. The early years of the 4th century had witnessed the persecution of bishops under Maximin Daia, the schism of Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis (see MELETIAN SCHISM) and leader of a policy of rigorism toward repentant LAPSI, and the rise of the heresy of ARIUS. The dominant personality of the period was Athanasius of Alexandria, who took part in the Council of Nicaea, called to condemn Arianism. In the persecution leveled against him by the semi-Arian emperors, Athanasius had the support of the monks, approval expressed by Anthony's visit in 339 or 354. The monks continued to support succeeding patriarchs of Alexandria, regarding them as the highest depositaries of religious authority.

Monophysite Troubles. During the late 4th and the 5th century the patriarchs played a crucial part in the ecclesiastical politics of the age. THEOPHILUS OF ALEXAN-DRIA had JOHN CHRYSOSTOM deposed at the Synod of the OAK (403); Cyril acted as Pope Celestine's delegate at the Council of EPHESUS (431) and excommunicated NESTO-RIUS, while DIOSCORUS attempted to rehabilitate EUTY-CHES at the Robber Council of Ephesus in 449. The patriarchate was the center of the struggle over the Monophysite controversy all during the 6th and 7th centuries. While Emperor JUSTIN I (518-527) did not attempt to dislodge the Monophysite leaders, JUSTINIAN I (527-565) frequently changed the patriarchs and resorted to strong measures or repression. The monasteries outside Alexandria became a refuge for exiled Monophysites, and those in the Nile Valley were taken over by the Aphthartodocetists, followers of JULIAN OF HALICARNAS-SUS.

In 543 the exiled Monophysite patriarch Theodosius performed an episcopal consecration of great historical importance. The Arab vassal Prince Harith had asked for a bishop for his Christian tribes. At the request of THEO-DORA (1), Theodosius sent him the monk Theodore as bishop of the wandering Arab peoples and consecrated James BARADAI as bishop of Edessa. The latter exercised a roving commission among the Monophysites of the Mediterranean world, turning a discouraged party into a determined sect. The division of the Egyptians into Orthodox and Monophysite, and the disagreements of the Monophysites among themselves made the Persian conquest (617) inevitable. Under HERACLIUS I (610–641), the Persians were forced to evacuate Egypt (628), but the imperial victory was short lived. On Sept. 29, 642, 10 years after the death of Muhammad, the Arab conquerors replaced the Roman armies in Egypt.

Bibliography: J. DANIÉLOU and H. I. MARROU, The First Six Hundred Years, tr. V. CRONIN, v. 1 of The Christian Centuries (New York 1964-) 1:127-368. J. LEBRETON and J. ZEILLER, The History of the Primitive Church, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 4 bks. in 2 (New York 1949) 1:365-500; 2:766-1205. J. R. PALANQUE et al., The Church in the Christian Roman Empire, tr. E. C. MESSENGER, 2 v. in 1 (New York 1953) 73-337. H. I. BELL, Cults and Creeds in Graeco-Roman Egypt (Liverpool 1953) 50–105; Egypt (Oxford 1948) 85–134. G. BARDY, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUE-MET (Paris 1947-) 3:1489-97; ibid. 1:310-314, s.v. Alexandrie. E. R. HARDY, Christian Egypt: Church and People (New York 1952). H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 4.2:2401-2571. A. C. MCGIFFERT, ed. and tr., The Church History of Eusebius (A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers, ed. P. SCHAFF, 14 v. [New York 1886-1900]; 2d series, ed. P. SCHAFF and H. WACE [1890-1900] ser. 2, v.1; 1890) 116-331. J. QUASTEN, Patrology, 4 v. (Westminster, Md. 1950-86) 1:254-277; 2:1-120; 3:6-189. R. RÉMONDON, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VIL-LER et al. (Paris 1932) 4:532-548. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, tr. J. R. PALANQUE, 2 v. in 3 (Paris 1949-59) v. 2. J. MASPERO, Histoire des patriarches d'Alexandrie (Paris 1923). L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VIe siècle (Paris 1925). H. I. BELL, Harvard Theological Review 37 (1944) 185–208. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907-38) 1:193-194, 211-212, 335–363; v. 3.

[M. C. HILFERTY]

EHRHARD, ALBERT

Church historian, patrologist, Byzantinist; b. Herbitzheim, Alsace, March 14, 1862; d. Bonn, Germany, Sept. 23, 1940. After his ordination in 1885, he studied at the University of Würzburg, where he became a friend of Hermann SCHELL, receiving his doctor's degree in theology in 1888. After further studies in Munich and Rome, he was appointed professor of Church history at the Grand Seminaire in Strasbourg (1889). In 1892 he was made professor of Church history at the University of Würzburg. He taught at Vienna (1898), Freiburg im Breisgau (1902), the University of Strasbourg (1903), and the University of Bonn (1920-27). Ehrhard's special interest was the editing of the sources of theology, hagiography, and homiletic literature of the Greek Church: Forschungen zur Hagiographie der griechischen Kirche (1897); Die altchristliche Literatur und ihre Erforschung seit 1880 (1894); "Geschichte der byzantinischen Theologie," in K. Krumbacher, Geschichte der byzantinischen Literatur (2d ed. 1897) 37-218. The continuation of his main work, Ueberlieferung und Bestand der hagiographischen und homiletischen Literatur der grEhrhard's critical presentation of the history of the Church contributed to the creation of a new concept of ecclesiastical history. The advance toward precision took form in his teaching and in such publications as Stellung und Aufgabe der Kirchengeschichte in der Gegenwart (1898), Des Mittelalter und seine kirchliche Entwicklung (1908), Die Kirche der Märtyrer (1932), Urkirche und Frühkatholizismus (1935), Die griechische und die lateinische Kirche (1937).

He was also a theologian. A concern with the task of the Church in modern society issued in Der Katholizismus und das 20. Jahrhundert (1901; 12th ed. 1902), in which he aimed to relate the tradition of Catholic belief to modern outlooks in philosophical, historical, and social sciences. Opposition to it appeared in conservative circles, where he was accused of MODERNISM, a charge that he answered in his Liberaler Katholizismus? (1902) and Katholisches Christentum und Kultur (1907). Since he did not hesitate to criticize the papal encyclical Pascendi, he was deprived of the title of domestic prelate, although it was later restored.

Bibliography: H. LEINEN, "Ehrhards Abschiedsvorlesung," Academia 40 (1927) 13. B. ALTANER, Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 61 (1941) 459–464. A. DEMPF, Albert Ehrhard: Der Mann und sein Werk (Colmar 1944), with bibliog. J. QUASTEN, Deutsche Literaturzeitung 76 (1955) 490–493.

[J. QUASTEN]

EHRLE, FRANZ

Cardinal and medievalist; b. Isny (Württemberg), Oct. 17, 1845; d. Rome, March 31, 1934. After entering the Society of Jesus in 1861, he studied in Germany and in England, where he was ordained in 1876. He was assigned to the editorial staff of Stimmen aus Maria Laach until he went to Rome in 1880 to pursue intensive studies in medieval thought. There he collaborated with H. DENI-FLE in publishing Archiv für Literatur und Kirchengeschichte des Mittelalters (7 v. Freiburg im Breisgau 1885–1900). While prefect of the Vatican Library (1895–1914), he published many important texts and studies on medieval thought, libraries, and Roman topography. During World War I, he was in Munich as editor of Stimmen der Zeit, but in 1919 he returned to Rome as lecturer in paleography at the Biblical Institute and (1920) the Gregorianum. In 1922 he was created cardinal and in 1929 was given the position of librarian and archivist of the Roman Church, which he retained until his death. He was widely acclaimed for his vast erudition, and he received honorary doctorates from the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Münster, Munich, Cologne, Tübingen, and Louvain.

See Also: SCHOLASTICISM.

Bibliography: "Miscellanea Francesco Ehrle," Studi e Testi 42 (1924) 37–41. F. PELSTER, La civiltà cattolica 85.2 (1934) 449–461; 85.3 (1934) 17–27. M. GRABMANN, "Heinrich Denifle O. P. und Kardinal Franz Ehrle S. J.," Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 56 (1946) 9–26; Stimmen der Zeit 127 (1934) 217–225.V. CATTANEO, Enciclopedia Filosofica 1:1838–39. F. STEGMÜLLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:719.

[A. M. WALZ]

EINHARD

The biographer and royal counselor of CHARLE-MAGNE; b. c. 770; d. Seligenstadt, March 14, 840. Einhard, educated first at Fulda, was eventually sent to Charlemagne's palace school at Aachen, where he continued his education under ALCUIN. His talent and industry won the favor of Charlemagne, who entrusted him with supervision of the royal building program and with important diplomatic missions. After Louis the Pious became emperor in 814, Einhard remained as a trusted court official, serving especially as adviser to Louis's son LO-THAIR. In 830 Einhard retired from the court and devoted himself to founding a monastery at Seligenstadt.

In addition to his active career, Einhard wrote extensively. His chief work was his Life of Charlemagne, the best biography written in the early Middle Ages. Modeling his work after Suetonius and injecting into it his intimate personal knowledge of Charlemagne, Einhard produced a biography that lauded the great emperor in a dignified, sober fashion. His Translatio SS. Marcellini et Petri, describing the events surrounding the bringing of relics from Rome to Seligenstadt, provides remarkable insight into the religious sentiments of the Carolingian age. A considerable number of his letters also survive and are useful in reconstructing the history of the age of Louis the Pious. All of Einhard's writings reflect the cultural effect of the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE.

Bibliography: Sources. EINHARD, Vita Karoli Magni, ed. O. HOLDER-EGGER, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores rerum Germanicarum 24, tr. S. E. TURNER (Ann Arbor 1960); Translatio et miracula Ss. Marcellini et Petri, ed. G. WAITZ, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Scriptores 15:238–264, Eng. The History of the Translation of the Blessed Martyrs of Christ, tr. B. WENDELL (Cambridge, Mass. 1926). Epistolae, ed. K. HAMPE, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae (Berlin 1826–) 5:105–149. Literature. L. HALPHEN, Études critiques sur l'histoire de Charlemagne (Paris 1921). M. BUCHNER, Einhards Künstlerund Gelehrtenleben (Bonn 1922). A. J. KLEINCLAUSZ, Éginhard (Paris 1942). W. WATTENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtesquellen im Mittelalter. Vorzeit und Karolinger, ed. W. LEVISON and H. LÖWE, 2:266–280. E. S. DUCKETT, Carolingian Portraits: A Study in the Ninth Century (Ann Arbor 1962).

[R. E. SULLIVAN]

EINSIEDELN, ABBEY OF

Benedictine abbey nullius dedicated to Our Lady of the Hermits near Schwyz, Diocese of Chur, central Switzerland. St. MEINRAD came from REICHENAU c. 835 to live as a hermit in the forest there and was slain by robbers (861). Eberhart (934-958) was the first abbot of a community under the Benedictine Rule. The Dukes of Swabia and the Ottos favored the abbey; Otto I granted it immunity and made the abbot a prince of the Empire. Under Gregory (964-996) there was a famous school with St. WOLFGANG OF REGENSBURG. The abbey was destroyed by fire five times (1029–1577); and after a long struggle it lost half its territory to Schwyz (1350), which in 1424 replaced the Hapsburgs as advocati of Einsiedeln. The bishops of Constance contested exemptions of the abbey because of its famous pilgrimage until a compromise was reached (1452-1782). Restriction of novices to the nobility limited the monks to fewer than five after 1350, divine services and the care of pilgrims being entrusted to secular chaplains. Zwingli became a parish priest in Einsiedeln (1516-18). Abbot Ludwig Blarer (1526-44) introduced reform from SANKT GALLEN, Joachim Eichorn (1544-69) restored the cloister, and Augustine Hofmann (1600-29) helped found the Swiss Benedictine congregation. Printing was introduced (1664), and Abbot Augustine Reding (1670-92) was a noted theologian. French troops plundered the abbey and destroyed the chapel (1798), but the monks returned (1801). Abbot Heinrich Schmid (1846-74) founded ST. MEINRAD, New Subiaco, and Richardton in the U.S. In 1948 the Priory of Los Toldos was founded in Argentina. Pius X made Einsiedeln an abbey nullius (1907). The abbot ranks with bishops of the Swiss Bishops Conference.

The baroque convent was built (1704–18) after plans by Caspar Moosbrugger; the church (1719–26) was consecrated in 1735 and restored in 1840, 1911, and 1943. The abbey cares for 12 parishes, a theological school for monks, and colleges at Einsiedeln (320 pupils), Ascona in Ticino (200 pupils), and Pfäffikon (180 agricultural students); the four Benedictine nuns' monasteries under Einsiedeln include Fahr. Einsiedeln settled the Abbeys of PETERSHAUSEN (983), MURI (1027), Schaffhausen (1050), and HIRSAU (1065). According to 14th-century legend, the chapel of St. Meinrad, around which the church was built, was consecrated in 948 by Christ Himself. PILGRIMAGES to Einsiedeln have been popular from the 13th century; the Black Madonna dates from c. 1400.

Benedictine Monastery of Einsiedeln, Switzerland. (©Paul Almasy/CORBIS)

Bibliography: R. HENGGELER, Professbuch der fürstlichen Benediktinerabtei Unserer Lieben Frau zu Einsiedeln (Monasticon-Benedictinum Helvetiae 3; Einsiedeln 1934); Dictionnaire historique et biographique de la Suisse, v.2 (Neuchâtel 1924) 762-765, illus.; Einsiedeln: Our Lady of Hermits (4th ed. Munich 1962), illus. guide. O. RINGHOLZ, Geschichte der fürstlichen Benediktinerstiftes U. L. F. von Einsiedeln, v.1 (to 1526) (New York 1904), no more pub. L. BIRCHLER, Kunstdenkmäler der Schweiz, v.1 (Basel 1927) 17-238, with illus. R. TSCHUDI, Das Kloster Einsiedeln unter den Aebten Ludwig II. Blarer und Joachim Eichhorn 1526-69 (Diss. Fribourg 1946); Our Lady of Einsiedeln in Switzerland (Shrines of the World; Saint Paul, Minn. 1958); Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 3:766-767. L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1034–39. O. L. KAPSNER, A Benedictine Bibliography: An Author-Subject Union List, 2 v. (2d ed. Collegeville, Minn. 1962) 2:205–209. Annuario Pontificio (1965) 729.

[A. MAISSEN]

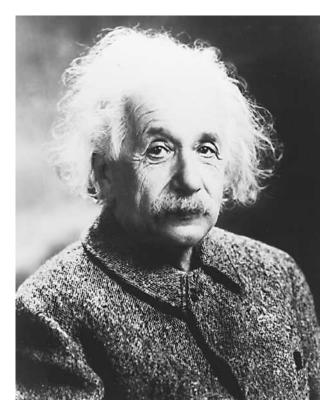

EINSTEIN, ALBERT

Outstanding physicist of the 20th century, author of more than 300 scientific papers and books, and a humanist who fought against man's brutality to man; b. Ulm, Bavaria, March 14, 1879; d. Princeton, N.J., April 18, 1955.

Life and Works. His parents were only nominally of the Jewish faith, and Albert was educated first at a Catholic elementary school in Munich, then at the Luitpold Gymnasium of that city. After an unsuccessful attempt to enter an institution of higher learning without a gymnasium diploma, he obtained one by study at the Swiss town of Aarau and entered the Swiss Federal Polytechnic School at Zurich. On completion of his work there, Einstein was unable to obtain a position either as an assistant to a professor or as a secondary teacher. Having been appointed as engineer in the patent office in Bern, Switzerland, he simultaneously undertook the research that brought him rapid fame. At about the same time he acquired Swiss citizenship and married a fellow student; they had two sons. He also immediately began to publish one or two papers each year on theoretical physics in the Annalen der Physik. In 1905 he published three of particular note: "Über einen die Erzeugung und Verwandlung des Lichtes betreffenden heuristischen Gesichtspunkt" (On a Heuristic Point of View concerning the Generation and Transmission of Light, Annalen der Physik, ser. 4, 17:132-148), in which he described his photon theory of light; "Über die von der molekularkinetischen Theorie der Wärme geforderte Bewegung von in ruhenden Flussigkeiten suspendierten Teilchen" (On the Movement of Small Particles Suspended in a Stationary Liquid Demanded by the Molecular Kinetic Theory of Heat, ibid. 549-560), on Brownian motion; and "Elektrodynamik bewegter Körper'' (Electrodynamics of Moving Bodies, ibid. 891-921), containing the bases of his theory of relativity. These remarkable publications led to a lectureship at Bern and a series of professorships at the Universities of Zurich (1909) and Prague (1910) and at the Polytechnic School at Zurich (1912). While at Prague, Einstein published many additional papers, including his "Über den Einfluss der Schwerkraft auf die Ausbreitung des Lichtes" (Concerning the Influence of Gravitation on the Propagation of Light, ibid. 35:898–908). In 1913 he went to Berlin as a member of the Royal Prussian Academy of Science, a professor at the University of Berlin without teaching or administrative obligations, and a member of the Kaiser Wilhelm Research Institute.

During World War I, Einstein acquired a reputation as an anti-militarist. He also remarried, having separated from his first wife, by mutual consent. It was also during the early wartime years that he developed the theory of general relativity, published in his "Die Grundlage der allgemeinen Relativitästheorie" (The Foundation of the Generalized Theory of Relativity, ibid. 49:769–822). He predicted that light from stars passing near to the sun would be deflected by a certain amount, a prediction that was confirmed by observations made during an eclipse of the sun in 1919. There was considerable opposition to the relativity theory, however, and when Einstein was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1922, the citation spoke only of his work in photoelectricity and "in the field of theoretical physics."

As a public figure, Einstein devoted steadily more and more time to using his prestige to fight for those ideals in which he believed. Both his relativity theory and his pacificism found many enemies, and when the Nazi terror began in 1932, he was a prime target. He was visiting in the U.S. at the time and did not return to Germany. After a brief stay in Belgium he returned to the U.S. and spent the remainder of his life at the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton.

Albert Einstein.

Religion and Philosophy. Einstein's views on religion have been the subject of some controversy. He seems to have had a concept of God not unlike that of B. SPINOZA, viz, a cosmic force that produces a harmony of order in the universe but is unconcerned with the affairs of men. Einstein's belief in the rationality of the universe was expressed forcefully in his Cosmic Religion (New York 1931). In his address to the first Conference on Science, Philosophy, and Religion, held in New York (1940), he reiterated this theme in a much-quoted phrase, "science without religion is lame, religion without science is blind" (see Schilpp, 285). His "religiosity" has, for obvious reasons, come under attack by churchmen.

As a philosopher, Einstein has exerted considerable indirect influence, mainly through his theories of relativity. Not himself an advocate of RELATIVISM, he has sometimes been interpreted as giving powerful stimulus to this doctrine. His epistemology seems to have been basically realist, although logical positivists such as P. Frank, V. Lenzen, and H. Reichenbach have seen in it a confirmation of POSITIVISM, and P. W. Bridgman has used it to develop his own system of OPERATIONALISM. Einstein thought that belief in an external world independent of the perceiving subject must be the basis of all natural science, but he was never clear as to how man can know that external world. He held that the concept is "a free creation of the human mind," and yet seemed convinced that man's mathematical insights could somehow mirror the structure of reality. Of less importance as a philosopher than as a stimulator of philosophical thought, Einstein was nonetheless one of the most original thinkers of the 20th century.

Bibliography: P. A. SCHILPP, ed., Albert Einstein, Philosopher-Scientist, 2 v. (Evanston, Ill. 1949; New York 1959), complete list of writings to 1950. R. NEIDORF, "Is Einstein a Positivist?" Philosophy of Science 30 (1963) 173–188.

[D. H. D. ROLLER/W. A. WALLACE]

EISENGREIN, MARTIN AND WILHELM

Uncle and nephew. Martin, theologian and preacher; b. Stuttgart, Dec. 28, 1535; d. Ingolstadt, May 4, 1578. His father, burgomaster of Stuttgart, favored reform ideas and Martin was raised a Protestant. At the University of Vienna where he was a student and later professor of natural philosophy, he abandoned Lutheranism for Catholicism about 1558. In 1560 he was ordained and two years later returned to Ingolstadt as pastor of the university church. Martin, the friend and collaborator of Peter Canisius and Friedrich Staphylus, was repeatedly honored by Pius V, and played a major role in the Catholic Restoration in Bavaria. Duke Albert V sent him on several important missions. From 1563 to 1564 he participated in the deliberations on communion under both species and clerical celibacy held in Vienna. Though Martin held a succession of academic and administrative posts at the University of Ingolstadt, it was in the ministry, especially as a preacher, that he made his reputation. His sermons, discourses on the most debated issues of the day, were published and circulated throughout Germany. He was preacher at the court of Maximilian II from 1568 to 1569.

Wilhelm, church historian; b. Speyer, 1534; d. Rome, 1584. He was a nephew of Martin and is best known for his refutation of Flacius' Centuries of Magdeburg. The first two volumes of a projected 16-volume work appeared in 1566 (Ingolstadt) and 1568 (Munich). A later work has the same theme, Harmonia ecclesiae historica adversus centurias Magdeburg (Speyer 1576).

Bibliography: L. PFLEGER, 'Wilhelm Eisengrein, ein Gegner des Flacius Illyrikus,'' Historisches Jahrbuch des Gör- res-Gesellschaft 25 (1904) 774–792. V. CONZEMIUS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLAT et al. (Paris 1912–), 15:102–105.

[B. L. MARTHALER]

EKKEHARD OF SANKT GALLEN

The name of three monks of the Abbey of SANKT GALLEN, Switzerland.

Ekkehard I, teacher and poet, of a noble family; b. Thurgau, c. 910; d. Sankt Gallen, Jan. 14, 973. When dean of the monastery he was selected as abbot, but he renounced the dignity. He made a pilgrimage to Rome, establishing friendly relations with Pope JOHN XIII. He composed seven sequences and three hymns or religious poems. Doubt has been cast on his authorship of Wal-tharius, a Latin epic based on German folk saga, which has traditionally been attributed to him.

Ekkehard II (Palatinus, the Courtier); date of birth unknown; d. Mainz, April 23, 990. He was the nephew and pupil of Ekkehard I. He taught in the monastic school of Sankt Gallen and, later, was Latin tutor to the Duchess Hadwig of Swabia, widow of Burchard II. His influential position with the duchess enabled him to render great services to his monastery. He was also prominent at the court of Emperor OTTO I and became provost of the cathedral of Mainz. He was the author of several sequences, including one in honor of St. Desiderius.

Ekkehard IV, teacher, chronicler; b. Alsace, c. 980; d. Oct. 21, c. 1060. He studied under NOTKER LABEO at Sankt Gallen and on Labeo's death became the director of the cathedral school at Mainz. He remained there until 1031 and gained favor with the Emperor CONRAD II. He then returned to his monastery, resumed teaching, and continued the ancient chronicle of Sankt Gallen, the Casus s. Galli, which had been begun by Ratpert and taken as far as Abbot Salamon (883). Ekkehard brought it down to Notker (972). This famous work is an important source for contemporary events and culture, as well as for the history of Sankt Gallen, but is somewhat tendentious and is full of inaccuracies. Ekkehard's other important literary work is the Liber benedictionum, a collection of metrical inscriptions for the walls of the Mainz cathedral, blessings in verse and poems. Of no great literary merit, it nevertheless attests to much learning in monastic studies. Ekkehard also excelled in ecclesiastical music.

Bibliography: M. MANITIUS, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 1:609–614. W. STAMMLER and K. LAN-GOSCH, eds., Die deutsche Literatur des Mittelalters: Verfasserlexikon 1:527–541; 5:183–185. F. BRUNHÖLZL and H. F. HAEFELE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 3:780–781.

EL (GOD)

A singular noun, El (\overline{el}) is the oldest known name for the deity; it was used in varying forms by almost all Semitic peoples as a proper name for God. The Canaanites are known to have worshiped a god whose name was linked with various local sanctuaries (e.g., El-Bethel). The Patriarchs, who also worshiped El, recognized in Him the one true God identified with ELOHIM and YAH-WEH who revealed Himself in different ways (Gn 28.10–22; 33.20; 49.25) and who was the author and guarantor of the promises made to them. The significance of the term, which is the same as the Akkadian ilu, has been sought in a Semitic root 'yl, meaning "to be powerful."

El is a point of contact between Israel and polytheism. In the Phoenician pantheon described in the texts of UGARIT, El appears as the supreme god; he is the father of the gods and lord of heaven, the chief and utterly transcendent one, of moral and benign character. In the Old Testament, El is less frequently associated with particular cultic sites than is BAAL; his association is mainly with persons. Time and space are not obstacles for Him (in Gn 31.13, He appears to Jacob at great distance from His first appearance). He is different from men and superior to them, and His presence arouses in them feelings of both reverence and awe (Gn 28.17; Nm 23.19; Hos 11.9; Ez 28.2). El is a general component of many names (Gn 4.18; 5.12 etc.).

El is used less than the names Yahweh and Elohim to refer to the God of Israel, but in later Psalms [46(47).3; 49(50).14] and in Job (48 times), El is used as a poetic archaizing element. The plural form ' $\bar{e}l\bar{\iota}m$ is used of angels and of pagan gods [Ps 28(29).1; 88(89).7; Ex 15.11]. In English versions El is usually construed to mean ''God.''

Bibliography: W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (London 1961–). Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 633–635.

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

ELBEL, BENJAMIN

Franciscan moral theologian; b. Friedburg, Bavaria, 1690?; d. Soeflingen, near Elm, June 4, 1756. Very little is known of his early life and education. He joined the Order of Friars Minor Recollect and eventually rose to the office of minister provincial of the Strassburg province, serving one term from 1735 to 1738. Elbel taught theology in various seminaries and houses of study of his order, and is best known as a moral theologian. He published his Theologiae moralis decalogalis et sacramen talis per modum conferentiarum casibus practicis illustrata (Venice 1731), as well as an account of the history of the Franciscan Order, Ortus et progressus ordinis minorum S. Francisci ultra quinque saecula (Monaco 1732). Elbel was a skillful casuist, a probabilist whose works and teaching were sound in doctrine; no controversy attends his name.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, *Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae*³ 4:1635.

[A. J. CLARK]

ELDAD HA-DANI

Traveler and explorer of the second half of the 9th century, who claimed to be a citizen of an independent Jewish state in East Africa, inhabited by the tribes of Dan, Aser (Asher), Gad, and Nephthali (Naphtali). When he visited Babylonia and Kairwan c. A.D. 880 and Spain in 883, he told about finding the "ten lost tribes" of Israel in his travels and later recorded these tales in writing. Among them were the Bene Moshe (Sons of Moses), depicted as a Utopian society surrounded by the River Sambatyon, which all week fiercely rolled sand and stones but rested on the Sabbath, when it was enclosed in a barrier of fire for half a mile on both sides. Eldad brought from his country a book of Halakot (see HALAKAH) widely differing from Talmudic laws and completely in Hebrew, the sole language used by all the tribes. The 14 chapters on the laws of slaughtering and postslaughter inspection were, Eldad asserted, "learned from the mouth of Joshua ben Nun, Moses, and God." The inhabitants of Kairwan were disturbed by the differences between these and Talmudic laws, and they questioned Gaon Zemah ben Hayyim of Sura, but they received his reassurance. Eldad is quoted by Hasdai Ibn Shaprut, RASHI, Abraham ben David, and Abraham ben Maimon. Of the commentators, only Abraham ben Meïr IBN EZRA and Meir of Rothenburg expressed doubts about the validity of his narrative. Several prominent historians expressed their suspicions that he was a Karaite missionary; others refuted this contention by pointing out that certain Halakot he cites regarding examination of slaughtered animals were not accepted by Karaites. Historical research has not yet determined his origin and his personality; it is likely that his story was a historical novel, with a blending of truth and imagination.

Linked with the influence of Eldad's narrative was the apocryphal letter of PRESTER JOHN of the 12th century. Although Eldad had claimed that independent Jewish states existed, the Christian writer told of a priest who ruled over the great kingdom of Ethiopia, to which were subject some Jewish tribes, including the Bene Moshe who lived on the other side of the River Sambatyon. Bibliography: I. BROYDE, The Jewish Encyclopedia, ed. J. SINGER (New York 1901–06) 5:90–92. Universal Jewish Encyclopedia (New York 1939–44) 4:46. B. SULER, Encyclopedia Judaica: Das Judentum in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Berlin 1928–34) 6:393–399. M. SCHLÖSSINGER, ed., The Ritual of Eldad Hadani (New York 1908). A. EPSTEIN, Eldad Hadani (Pressburg 1891), in Heb. A. SHOHAT, Entsiklopedyah Ivrit 3 (1951) 423–426, in Heb.

[E. SUBAR]

ELDER, GEORGE

Priest, educator; b. Hardin's Creek, Ky., Aug. 11, 1794; d. Bardstown, Ky., Sept. 28, 1838. He was one of eight children of James and Ann (Richards) Elder. His mother was a convert, his father was noted for his wide knowledge of the Bible, and a sister became a nun. George was taught by his father until, at the age of 16, he was sent to Mt. St. Mary's, Emmitsburg, Md. In 1816 he entered St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Md., where he formed a lifetime friendship with William BYRNE. On Sept. 18, 1819, the two friends were ordained at the first ordination ceremony in the Bardstown Cathedral and the first of Bp. John David. Both were founders and first presidents of Kentucky colleges-Byrne of St. Mary's and Elder of St. Joseph's. Elder carried out the ambition of Bp. Benedict J. Flaget to found a school for the boys of Bardstown. It was begun in the basement of St. Joseph Seminary next to the cathedral; a year later (1820) a new wing was added to the building, which by 1823 had become "the largest and best appointed school structure in the west." Many distinguished men from the lower South were educated there. In 1827 Elder was sent to St. Pius parish, Scott County, to settle unrest there; three years later he returned to the presidency of St. Joseph's College. A fire on Jan. 25, 1838, destroyed the college building; Elder's exertions in fighting the fire aggravated a heart condition, causing his death eight months later.

As editor of the Louisville Catholic Advocate (founded 1836), he wrote the controversial series titled "Letters to Brother Jonathan" and numerous articles on education.

Bibliography: B. J. WEBB, The Centenary of Catholicity in Kentucky (Louisville 1884). M. J. SPALDING, Sketches of the Early Catholic Missions of Kentucky, 1787–1827 (Louisville 1844). J. H. SCHAUINGER, Cathedrals in the Wilderness (Milwaukee 1952).

[J. H. SCHAUINGER]

ELDER, WILLIAM HENRY

Archbishop; b. Baltimore, Md., March 22, 1819; d. Cincinnati, Ohio, Oct. 31, 1904. His parents, Basil Spalding and Elizabeth M. (Snowden) Elder, had 13 children;

William was the second youngest living. He attended a private school in Baltimore and at 12 entered Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmitsburg, Md., graduating in 1837. He then entered the seminary department of the college, received the diaconate in 1842, and was sent to the Urban College in Rome, where he was ordained on March 29, 1846. Upon his return to the U.S., he was appointed professor of dogmatic theology at Emmitsburg. There he taught theology, Church history, and Scripture, and acted as rector of the seminary until Jan. 9, 1857, when he was named bishop of Natchez, Miss.

Ordinary of Natchez. Elder was consecrated on May 3, 1857, at Baltimore by Abp. Francis P. KENRICK and installed at Natchez, May 31. There he found only 13 priests, two of whom were infirm; 11 churches, one of which was the unfinished cathedral; nine young men preparing for the priesthood; and about 10,000 Catholics in the white population of more than 300,000, and 930 Catholics in the African American population of 309,000. The bishop was the only native American clergyman in the diocese. He organized a total abstinence society and took the pledge himself in order to encourage others. During the Civil War the Northern forces entered Natchez in October 1863. When ordered by the commander of the occupying forces, Brig. Gen. Y. M. Tuttle, to insert a special prayer in the Mass for the President of the U.S. and for the success of the Northern arms, Elder refused and on April 7, 1864, wrote a masterful statement of his position to President Lincoln. Although Tuttle was removed and ultimately replaced by Brig. Gen. M. Brayman, the changes were unrelated to Elder's letter to the president. On July 22, 1864, Brayman ordered the bishop to Vidalia where he was confined for 17 days and wrote a second statement of his position to Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton, which again elicited no official action.

Elder attended the three Plenary Councils of Baltimore, serving on committees and confirming his own belief in the conciliar method of ecclesiastical administration. In 1868 he went to Europe to assist at the centennial celebration of SS. Peter and Paul; he attended some sessions of Vatican Council I, but did not stay for its conclusion. In 1878, Elder rendered heroic service during the yellow-fever plague, which took the lives of six of his priests and hundreds of the faithful. During this ordeal, he received word that he had been appointed coadjutor to Abp. Joseph ALEMANY of San Francisco, Calif. Because of the critical conditions in Natchez, Elder's appeal for a postponement was approved. However, on Jan. 30, 1880, he was appointed coadjutor with right of succession to Abp. John B. PURCELL of Cincinnati, and he succeeded to that see on July 4, 1883.

Career in Cincinnati. When Elder arrived in CIN-CINNATI on April 18, 1880, Purcell was already in his last illness, the archdiocese was deeply involved in a bankruptcy action in the courts, and the clergy and faithful were in a state of great uncertainty. As early as 1837, the failure of small savings associations had led to the development of a diocesan project under Rev. Edward Purcell, who accepted the deposits of the faithful and paid six per cent interest. During the 1870s Purcell made large loans to several commercial ventures and when the panic of 1877 brought about the failure of these, the archbishop was thrown into bankruptcy. Legal action was initiated to gain control of all ecclesiastical property, alleging that the debts were diocesan and not those of an individual. The case, tried between April 4, 1882, and June 24, 1882, was not ended until May 11, 1905, almost a year after Archbishop Elder's death.

Elder did not allow this serious financial problem to interfere with his ordinary ecclesiastical activities; in fact he was accused several times of disinterestedness in the church's financial obligations. On March 5, 1882, he presided over the fourth provincial council of Cincinnati, whose decrees were approved by Leo XIII on June 22, 1886. In 1886 and 1898, respectively, Archbishop Elder held the second and third diocesan synods of Cincinnati. He convened the fifth provincial council of Cincinnati on May 19, 1889. In 1887 Mt. St. Mary Seminary, which had been closed for eight years, was reopened, and in 1890, a preparatory seminary dedicated to St. Gregory was established. During his 24-year tenure in Cincinnati, 32 new parishes and missions were founded, with a proportionate growth in the works and institutions of religious. By his wise rule, he restrained the German nationalists in and around Cincinnati. Throughout his life Elder was a prodigious letter writer; his correspondents ranged from cardinals in Rome to poor parishoners of St. Peter's Cathedral in Cincinnati.

Bibliography: Letters of Archbishop William Henry Elder; archives of Mt. St. Mary Seminary, Norwood, Ohio; archives of Notre Dame University, South Bend, Ind., diocesan archives at Jackson, Miss.; diocesan archives at Baltimore, Md.; archives of Mt. St. Mary Seminary and College and St. Joseph College, Emmitsburg, Md. R. O. GEROW, Cradle Days of St. Mary's at Natchez (Natchez, Miss. 1941). M. M. MELINE and E. F. MCSWEENEY, The Story of the Mountain, 2 v. (Emmitsburg, Md. 1911).

[C. R. STEINBICKER]

ELDRAD, ST.

Abbot of Novalese in Piedmont; b. near Aix, Provence; d. March 13, 840–845. Eldrad (Heldrade, Hildradus) was born of an aristocratic family. After a long pilgrimage through Spain and Italy he came to the flourishing Benedictine monastery of Saints. Peter and Andrew at Novalese, near Susa, province of Turin, a cultural center endowed with an excellent library. Elected abbot (c. 826), he ruled the monastery till his death. During his career, the abbey became a favored hospice, providing lodging for pilgrims crossing over the Alps into Italy. Two incidents of his tenure as abbot have been recorded: the gift of the monastery of Appagni by LOTHAIR I in 825, and Eldrad's successful negotiations with Count Boso of Turin in 827. His cult was approved in 1702, in 1821, and again in 1903 [Acta Sanctae Sedis (Rome 1865–1908) 36 (1904) 424].

Feast: March 13.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum March 2 326–333. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2442–46. A. DUMAS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15:129. DE LABRIOLLE, Catholicisme 5:573–574.

[J. E. LYNCH]

ELECTION, DIVINE

The general purpose of God in entering into the course of history was to bring about the reparation of man's primal revolt and to reestablish God's kingdom in this world; this He has done through a chosen people and certain chosen individuals. Their story makes up SALVA-TION HISTORY, which is initiated, directed, and brought to completion by God. The Biblical concept of divine choice or election (Heb. $b\bar{a}har$; Gr. $\dot{\epsilon}\kappa\lambda \delta\gamma \eta$, $\dot{\epsilon}\kappa\lambda \epsilon\kappa \tau \delta \varsigma$) is examined first in the OT, then in the NT.

In the Old Testament. Israel's awareness of being chosen by God goes back to its origins. At Sinai Moses was told by God that the people had been brought there by God Himself and that, "if you keep my covenant, you shall be my special possession, dearer to me than all other people . . . , a kingdom of priests, a holy nation" (Ex 19.5–6). The same awareness is shown in Dt 26.18: "Today the Lord is making this agreement with you, you are to be a people peculiarly his own . . ." (see also Jos 24.3–13). Election, COVENANT, and promise are three fundamental elements of Israel's faith.

The classic statement regarding Israel's election, however, is the late one found in Dt 7.7–10: "It was not because you are the largest of all nations that the Lord set his heart upon you and chose you, for you are really the smallest of nations. It was because the Lord loved you and because of his fidelity to the oath he had sworn to your fathers . . . the faithful God who keeps his merciful covenant down to the thousandth generation towards those who love him . . ., but repays with destruction the person who hates him." This election was no mystery to the Israelites, any more than focused or selective love is in general. The mystery would be why God loves man at all.

Election is a free act of God, and the OT writers, with their usual honesty and insight, never attribute it to any merit of Israel. J. L. McKenzie rightly says that the divine election confers worthiness rather than presupposes it. Just as the potter freely chooses his clay and forms it into an "object of whatever sort he pleases" (Jer 18.4), so the Lord can do with regard to the house of Israel (see also Is 29.16; 45.9–13). The freedom of God's choice is often shown by His choosing the lowly ones of the world, or the younger brother: "the elder shall serve the younger" (Gn 25.23). Election is also described as irrevocable and everlasting, "to the thousandth generation," though Israel's response is not compelled and can falter. On Israel's part it unfortunately led to self-righteousness and even to self-sufficiency. The Prophet Amos had to remind them sternly that election meant responsibility, not privilege (3.1-2), and because they had failed their responsibility, they would feel the divine judgment.

The choice of Israel does not mean the rejection of other nations. In the incomparable Servant of the Lord oracles of Deutero-Isaiah, Israel is said to have been chosen by Yahweh for the sake of all the nations (Is 42.1–9; 49.1–6), and a further note is added that its punishment and suffering is even vicarious (52.13–53.12): "It was our infirmities he bore, our sufferings that he endured."

Besides the divine election of the people of Israel, many individuals were called and chosen by God. Abraham was blessed and set apart. The Judges, Saul, David, Isaiah, Jeremia, and Ezechiel were all called and chosen by the Lord, not for personal privilege, but to serve God and His people, just as the Israelites were God's instrument for the sake of all nations.

The response God wishes from the people He chooses is faith and fidelity along with service. "Abraham believed the Lord who credited the act to him as justice" (Gn 15.6; Rom 4.3). In many places God speaks of Abraham, Moses, Josue, and others as "my servant" (e.g., Gn 26.24); and service is seen to be the end for which the Servant of the Lord of Deutero-Isaiah is chosen.

In the New Testament. The chosen people in the NT are the Church of Christ. St. Peter addresses his first epistle to "the sojourners of the Dispersion . . . chosen unto the sanctification of the Spirit . . ." (1 Pt 1.1). They are the elect for whom the Lord will shorten the last days (Mt 24.22), and the "remnant left, selected out of grace" ($\lambda \epsilon \tau \mu \mu \alpha \kappa \alpha \tau$ $\dot{\epsilon} \kappa \lambda \alpha \gamma \eta \nu \chi \dot{\alpha} \rho \tau \sigma \zeta$) of Rom 11.5. The Christian community is given names similar to those of OT Israel: "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a purchased people" (1 Pt 2.9; cf. Ex 19.5–6). St. James asks, "Has not God chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith?" (Jas 2.5), and St. Paul exhorts: "Put on therefore as God's chosen ones, holy and beloved, a heart of mercy, kindness, humility, meekness, patience' (Col 3.12). The statement of our Lord at the end of the parable of the Marriage Feast, "For many are called, but few are chosen" (Mt 22.14), must be interpreted as referring to the Church in this world. The kingdom of heaven, which the parable illustrates, is a kingdom in two stages, here and hereafter. The "chosen" are those who belong to it in this world, the "many" are all the members of the human race. All are invited in the parable: those who respond to the divine call are chosen. Yet the NT use of the word chosen (čĸ- $\lambda \epsilon \kappa \tau \delta \zeta$) always seems to carry with it the notion of favor and choice on the part of God.

All the Apostles are chosen (Mk 3.13), but individual election can be withdrawn, for Judas, like Saul (1 Sm 13.13–14), is finally rejected (Acts 1.25). Peter (Acts 15.7) and Paul (Acts 9.15) are especially chosen. But it is Christ whose election above all others is announced from the cloud at his BAPTISM (Mk 1.9–11) and TRANS-FIGURATION (Mk 9.1–7). According to NT thought, Christ and His Church fulfill the role of the Suffering Servant.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 642-645. R. SCHNACKEN-BURG, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER, 10 v. (2d new ed. Freiburg1957-65) 3:1061-63. E. L. DIETRICH and J. SCHNEIDER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 2:610-614. H. H. ROWLEY, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (London 1950). K. GALLING, Die Erwählungstradition Israels (Giessen 1928). J. L. MCKENZIE, The Two-Edged Sword (Milwaukee 1956) 130-131. J. BRIGHT, A History of Israel (Philadelphia 1959). F. PRAT, Theology of St. Paul, 2 v. (London 1926-27) 1:436-437. A. JONES, "God's Choice: Its Nature and Consequences," Scripture 13 (1961) 35-43. J. BONSIRVEN, The Theology of the New Testament, tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963). E. SUTCLIFFE, "Many Are Called But Few Are Chosen," Irish Theological Quarterly 28 (1961) 126-131. W. STAERK, "Zum alttestamentlichen Erwählungsglauben," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft 55 (1937) 1-36.

[E. LOVELEY]

ELEMENT

An element may be identified in any subject matter that is capable of ANALYSIS AND SYNTHESIS and in any science or art in which such processes are studied. Compounds are known to be such when they can be resolved into simpler parts. The least parts into which anything can be divided, i.e., the ultimate units or parts out of which other things are formed by combination, are called elements. However, elements are only relatively indivisible, that is, in a certain way or context, or from a certain point of view. Thus, the letters of the alphabet and their sounds are elements of speech and writing, although in other respects they are divisible and are not elements.

Element in Philosophy. An element is a kind of material cause from which something is composed in a primary way, as bread is made of flour and water, and a meal of bread and wine (see MATTER; MATTER AND FORM). Furthermore, an element is somehow in the compound in a positive way and remains in the compound. It is not like illness, which does not remain in the body after health has been recovered, but rather like nourishing food that does remain after eating. Moreover, an element has a specific character of its own, and one which is simple, that is, not further divisible into other species in the same line of division. Again, just as principles are related to consequences and causes to effects, so elements are related to compounds.

Various Usages. In arithmetic, the unit is the element of which numbers are composed. In geometry, lines determined by points are elements, and also surfaces and solids determined by lines. According to ancient and medieval science, the whole world was thought to be composed of four kinds of elementary bodies—viz, earth, water, air, and fire—all transformable one into another, and further entering into the formation of mixtures and compounds. Moreover it was thought that the animal body in TEMPERAMENT and health depends upon the mixture and proportion of four vital elements or humors, viz, blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile.

In modern biology, cells and tissues are the elements of complex organisms, while simple organisms are resolved into nucleus or nuclear materials and cytoplasm with its organic and inorganic parts. In modern physical science the elements are the chemically simple bodies, about 100 in number of kinds, that are classified with natural sequence in the periodic table (see below).

According to another meaning of the word, the elements of a science or art are its primary conceptions and demonstrations. These are the demonstrations that are made, not by long chains of reasoning, but by simple arguments consisting of three terms and employing only one medium of DEMONSTRATION. In this sense one speaks of the elements of ethics or metaphysics, or of any science or art.

Presence in Compounds. A philosophical problem of importance is concerned with the manner in which elements exist in a compound. Some compounds seem to be mere mixtures of elements that retain their own characteristics and their own identity, as sea water is a mixture of water and various salts. On the other hand, a compound such as water or salt has its own characteristics, and seems to be a natural unit of a kind specifically different from its elements, which do not retain their own characteristics unmodified. In compounds such as these, the elements do not seem to retain their own existence, but have become parts of a new unit and exist in virtue of the new unit (virtualiter), somewhat as food becomes part of one organism through digestion and assimilation. If the elements retained their own identity, the compound would not be one in kind, but many.

See Also: ATOMISM; PRINCIPLE; CAUSALITY.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World (Chicago 1952) 1:400–412. A. VAN MELSEN, From Atomos to Atom, tr. H. J. KOREN (New York 1960). V. MIANO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:1847–50.

[W. H. KANE]

ELEMENTS OF EXISTENCE

Elements of existence are called khandha in Pali and skandha in Sanskrit. According to the teachings of the Buddha, all beings are composite, made of parts that are subject to change in time, and therefore impermanent, lacking eternal individuality or soul, and subject to pain. The cause of pain lies in desire, particularly in desire of permanence. The desire of rebirth (bhāva) gnaws the believer in the permanence of life and soul (sessatavādin), as the desire of annihilation (vibhāva) consumes the nihilist (ucchedavādin) convinced that death ends all. Desire is extinguished primarily by the right knowledge of the Truths concerning pain in human existence, impermanence, and inexistence of soul. The doctrine of impermanence is basic in Buddhist philosophy, in which becoming takes the place of being. The refutation of the existence of soul is the main theme of the Kathāvatthu, an extensive collection of controversial topics attributed to Tissa, the son of Moggāli, and comprised in the Abhidhammapitaka. To the metaphysical self, Buddhism opposes the transient and metabolic psychic self. Psychophysical life starts with the union of five elements (Pāli, Pañcakhandha), one corporeal and the others incorporeal: (1) form or body (rūpa); (2) sensation (vedanā) arising from the exercise of the six senses-sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch, and mind-upon sense objects; (3) perception (Pāli, saññā; Sanskrit sañjñā) resulting in the cognition of and reflection upon sensation; (4) disposition (Pāli, sankhārā; Sanskrit, samskāra), including propensity, leaning, proclivity, drive, and passion; (5) consciousness, or conscious thought (Pāli, viññāna; Sanskrit vijñāna), arising from the interplay of the other psychic components. The individual as a unit of the empirical world consists of an ever-changing combination of the five elements, which consequently keeps him in a state of constant flux. The process whereby life continues in a sequence of dependent origination is sustained by the CHAIN OF CAUSATION.

Bibliography: R. S. COPLESTON, Buddhism Primitive and Present in Magadha and Ceylon (2d ed. New York 1908). C. N. E. ELIOT, Hinduism and Buddhism, 3 v. (London 1921) v.1; Japanese Buddhism (repr. New York 1959). K. J. SAUNDERS, Epochs in Buddhist History (Chicago 1924). W. T. DE BARY et al., comps., Sources of Indian Tradition (Records of Civilization 56; New York 1958).

[A. S. ROSSO]

ELEUTHERIUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: 171 or 177 to 185 or 193. His dates are uncertain. According to Hegesippus, Eleutherius was a deacon under ANICETUS. Eusebius (Chron.) places his accession in the seventeenth year of Marcus Aurelius (177) and his death under Pertinax (192), but in his Ecclesiastical History (4.22; 5.1, 3–6, 22) he dates Eleutherius' death in the tenth year of Commodus (189). Most authorities agree on a fifteen-year reign. His pontificate was in general a peaceful one. The Liber pontificalis says that he was a Greek, the son of Habundius from Nicopolis, and that he maintained that Easter should be celebrated on Sunday. It also attributes to Eleutherius the regulation that no food be rejected as naturally unclean by a Christian, but such a rule was more suitable to fifth-century Rome in view of Manichaean food taboos.

Merely legendary is the strange report in the Liber that a King Lucius of Britain asked Eleutherius for missionaries, although it was elaborated by Bede and later medieval chroniclers. However, Rome's growing importance is attested by visits of POLYCARP, JUSTIN MARTYR, and HEGESIPPUS. Its most important visitor at this time was the famous theologian St. Irenaeus, who came to Rome in 177–178 with letters from the Gallic martyrs and the Christians of Lyons asking Eleutherius to judge and mediate the question of MONTANISM.

Tertullian, a convert to Montanism, says that the Roman bishop originally sent out conciliatory letters admitting the authenticity of Montanists' prophetic claims and only later rejected the movement. The pope thus decided in favor of spiritual governance by an institutionalized hierarchy rather than by the charismatic promptings of individual prophets.

Irenaeus's list of Roman bishops, a major source for early Roman Church history, ends with Eleutherius. The statement of the Liber that Eleutherius was buried in the Vatican near Peter is not supported by modern excavations under St. Peter's.

Feast: May 26.

Bibliography: Liber pontificalis, ed. L. DUCHESNE (Paris 1886–92, 1958) 1:cii–civ, 58–61, 136. A. CLERVAL, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique. ed. A. VACANT et al., (Paris 1903–50) 4.2:2319–20. Acta Sanctorum, May 3:363–364; May 6:360–362. E. CASPAR, Geschichte de Papsttums von den Aufängen bis zur Höhe der Weltherrschaft (Tübingen 1930–33) 1:8, 13, 48, 52. J. HALLER, Das Papsttum (Stuttgart 1959–53) v.1. F. X. SEPPELT, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jh. (Leipzig 1931–41, Munich 1954–59) v.1. E. FERGUSON, ed., Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (New York 1997), 1:368. J. N. D KELLY, Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York 1986), 11–12. G. SCHWAGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1995).

[E. G. WELTIN]

ELEUTHERIUS OF TOURNAI, ST.

Bishop; b. Tournai, 456?; d. 531? According to the Vita s. Medardi (2.6) written c. 600, Eleutherius, of Gallo-Roman origin, after a youth passed in royal surroundings, became count of Tournai, and then its bishop; only his accession to the episcopate (497–500) seems incontestable. As bishop of Tournai, probably its first, he is credited with the establishment there of an organic Christian community. Since the vitae of Eleutherius (the earliest was written toward the end of the ninth century) can be accepted only with the greatest reserve—if at all—the facts of his life are almost impossible to establish. Moreover, both the diocesan synod believed to have been summoned by him (520), and the writings attributed to him (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 217 v. 65:69–82) are spurious.

Feast: Feb. 20.

Bibliography: Vita s. Medardi, Monumenta Germaniae Auctores antiquissimi (Berlin 1825–) 4.2:68. Acta Sanctorum Feb. 3:190–210. Historia Tornacensis, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 14:328–329, 356–357. Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2455–70. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienneet de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU (Paris 1907–1953) 15.2:2540–43. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:381. A. D'HAENENS, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–)15:150–153.

[G. M. COOK]

ELEVATION OF MAN

In the abstract, the elevation of man means God's gratuitous assigning to man of a sole supernatural destiny (the BEATIFIC VISION) together with the means necessary and suitable for the attainment of this end. In the concrete, it means the Father's plan for incorporating man, creature and sinner, into Christ the Savior. In epitome, it means the new Adam, Christ, head and members. From all eternity the Father has predestined us "to become conformed to the image of his Son, that he should be the firstborn among many brethren" (Rom 8.29).

Elevation in the First Adam

The Book of Genesis (2.4b-3.24) describes man's origin according to the Yahwistic tradition; the description is primitive, anthropomorphic (Yahweh is a potter working in clay) and contrasts with the later, stylized record of the priestly code preserved for us in Gn 1.1-2.4a (where God has merely to issue a command and things spring into being). Our concern is solely with man's elevation in our first parents. In picturesque and allegorical language, their elevation is depicted as a state of privilege destroyed by sin. Thus Adam is made outside the garden, in the desert, and then transported into Eden, where he lives on terms of familiarity and friendship with Yahweh (what later theology will call the state of grace), enjoying easy access to the tree of life. With Eve he goes about in unblushing nakedness. Sin enters and all is changed. Deprived of their privileges, Adam and Eve are driven out of the garden, back into the desert.

Reflecting on this inspired account, the Church has come to recognize in our first parents what it names the state of ORIGINAL JUSTICE, comprising gifts both SUPER-NATURAL (deification) and PRETERNATURAL (immunity from CONCUPISCENCE and from bodily death). Taking their stand on Gn 3.16–19, Fathers of the Church (e.g., Augustine, Chrysostom) and theologians have commonly attributed to Adam a state of felicity exempt from bodily aches and woes, and enriched with the possession not only of the supernatural knowledge of FAITH but also of divinely infused natural knowledge proportioned to his privileged state, necessary for his self-guidance and for his position as founder of the human race (see KNOWL-EDGE, INFUSED).

However, in crediting Adam with exceptional talents and virtuosities, sobriety is always to be commended. Modern thinkers incline to regard as otiose the elaborate "might-have-been" speculations of, say, F. Suárez (De op. sex dierum 5; Vivès ed., 3:380–447). The sacred writer was probably not at all trying to report on a particular geographical locality of idyllic amenities where our first parents spent some months of happiness; it may well be that he intended to make no statement either about an actual place or about a considerable sojourn in it. Perhaps his interest was centered exclusively in asserting a state or condition, so that his formal teaching might be condensed as follows: our first parents were invested with high privileges forfeited through their disobedience.

Moreover, an excessive lingering over Adam's situation before the Fall could betray a harmful misplacement of accent. An enlightened Christian does not cultivate a nostalgia for paradise, a sighing for a lost age of gold. He is not a pessimist lamenting Adam's sin as the irreparable primeval catastrophe that casts its melancholy shadow over the whole of subsequent history. Rather he will regard this first phase in man's elevation as radically orientated to the second; he will remember that Adam is no more than the type of Christ to come ($\tau \circ \pi \circ \tau \circ \circ \mu \epsilon \lambda \wedge v - \tau \circ \varsigma$: Rom 5.14).

Restoration in Christ

St. Leo the Great (d. 461) wrote: "What fell in the first Adam, is raised up in the second" (Serm. 12.1; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 54:168). St. Paul three times compared Christ with Adam: 1 Cor 15.21-22; 44-49; Rom 5.12-21. The elevation of man lost by ORIGI-NAL SIN is restored by Christ. He, then, is the reconciler, the redeemer, and the renewer. The cumulative force of this trio of typical Pauline expressions means a return to a previously existing state of friendship, freedom, familiarity, or peace [see F. Zorell, Lexikon Graecum NT (Paris 1931) under ἀποκαταλλάσσω, καταλλάσσω, καταλλαγή, ἀπολύτρωσις, ἀνακαινόω, ἀνακαίνωσις, άνανεόω]. Hence there is some factor common to both elevations, essential to each. What is this common element? It is undoubtedly the state of GRACE or deification, comprising the twofold basic gift of indwelling Spirit (see INDWELLING, DIVINE) and created, habitual grace; then the infused theological and moral VIRTUES, together with the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. Thus arises a divinized man, a sharer in the divine nature, an adoptive son of the heavenly Father, holy, capable of meriting, heir to the beatific vision. Such a precious complex of gifts, whether in the first or second elevation, can issue only from divine love-for the grace-life is nothing but the selfcommunication of the Triune God out of personal love. But there is a difference. If Adam's grace-life was, like ours, given in love (ἐν ἀγάπη: Eph 1.4), it was not given in the beloved (ἐν τῷ ήγαπημένῷ: Eph 1.6), in Christ. If Adam had gratia Dei, he did not have gratia Christi. The measure of the difference between the first and second elevation is Christ. Restoration, then, means full incorporation into Christ through the Sacraments of Christian initiation (Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist) so that man, though stricken with the double unworthiness of creature and sinner, is nevertheless made a full member of the MYSTICAL BODY OF CHRIST. He enters into the Church with its divinely guaranteed teaching and governance of men, with its liturgy (above all, the Mass and the Sacraments). He treats as his own the Scriptures, the Mother of God, and the saints. The specific difference marking man's elevation in Christ can be summed up in the sacramental character-if this is correctly understood: in Adam man was elevated above all by grace; in Christ he is elevated by grace together with the distinct entity of the sacramental character [see Heythrop Journal 2 (1961) 318–33].

Relationship between Two Elevations

A triple task confronts us here: first, to explain a negative proposition; second, to explain a positive proposition; third, to assess some difficulties.

Not God's Master Plan. The elevation in Adam was not God's master plan.

First Reason. For this negative assertion, the first reason is based on the sovereignty of God. To identify man's elevation in Adam with God's master plan in the sense that Adam's sin wrecked it, as it were forcing God to concoct some fresh, second-best scheme, is to derogate from God's supremacy. It implies that the will of a creature can be the last and complete explanation of events, whereas in fact it can never wield more than a proximate, partial, and always an essentially subordinate control. Such is the unequivocal teaching of St. Paul. Commenting on God's predilection for Jacob over Esau, he affirms: "for before the children had yet been born, or had done aught of good or evil, in order that the selective purpose of God might stand, depending not on deeds, but on him who calls, it was said to her [Rebecca], 'The elder shall serve the younger' . . . So then there is question not of him who wills nor of him who runs [tpéxovtoç], but of God showing mercy" (Rom 9.11-16).

Second Reason. That revelation proclaims Christ as the center of all (Col 3.11), the goal of God's eternal decrees, is the second reason for this negative assertion. Though second in the course of time, Christ takes precedence over Adam and all others, being the first-born both of every creature in general and of the dead in particular; all things were made through Him, directed toward Him ($\epsilon l \varsigma \alpha \dot{v} \tau \dot{v}$: Col 1.16), and established in Him, head of the Church, redeemer (Col 1.15–20), recapitulator (Eph 1.10).

Third Reason. One is forbidden, thirdly, to identify God's master plan with the elevation in Adam because this latter, while assuredly revealing God's love, does not equally manifest His mercy. Yet revelation lays stress on the manifestation of mercy as God's aim in creating. (A reflection of this appears, e.g., in the Collect, tenth Sunday after Pentecost: "God, you make known your limitless might above all by sparing and showing pity") If God wants to reveal His inmost being through mercy, He has to choose an order into which sin enters. Adam's sin, then, is woven into the pattern of God's plan. Together with the sins that follow, it forms the raw material, so to speak, on which God's mercy works. At the Easter Vigil, the Church pronounces Adam's guilt fortunate-it won for us such and so great a Redeemer: "O felix culpa quae talem ac tantum meruit habere redemptorem." St. Irenaeus (d. c. 202) asserted boldly that since the Son of God preexisted from all eternity precisely as Savior, He needed sinners to save, otherwise His role of Savior would be futile: "Cum enim praeexisteret salvans, oportebat et quod salvaretur fieri, uti non vacuum sit salvans" (Adversus haereses 3.22.3; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 7:958). The implication, of course, is that the Father, because He predestined His Son precisely as Savior, deliberately chose a scheme in which there would be sinners. Such a notion may jolt any who forget that it is in fact only an echo of St. Paul: "For God has shut up all in disobedience, that he may have mercy upon all" (Rom 11.32; cf. Gal 3.22; Rom 3.9-19; 5.20). Further, St. Paul himself has a parallel in the suggestion of many passages from the Gospels: "For the Son of Man came to seek and to save what was lost" (Lk 19.10); "For I have come to call sinners, not the just" (Mt 9.13). Such words are commonly interpreted as expressions of Our Lord's kind and pitiful heart. They have, in fact, a deeper significance: they bear witness to God's eternal choice of the glorification of mercy as His goal in creating, to His selection of a fallen world as providing scope for His mercy. Christ's characteristic consorting with sinners, so scandalous to the Pharisees, was a visible symbol of His Father's eternal selection of such a world where sin, freely committed by men, abounds in order that redemptive grace might superabound (cf. Rom 5.12-21). The return of the prodigal son is celebrated to the chagrin of the elder, irreproachable brother (Lk 15.25-32)-a predilection that the liturgy (Saturday after second Sunday of Lent) tellingly parallels with the preference shown to Jacob over Esau (Gn 27.6-40). Adam's sin, like Rebecca's trickery, can provoke only divine reprobation-yet both throw open the doors to the Almighty's selective purpose, that mystery of SALVATION kept hidden from the beginning of time in the all-creating mind of God (cf. Eph 3.9).

Thus the elevation in Adam, far from being God's master plan, is not even on a footing of equality and coordination with the later phase. It can claim only a priority of time; its very raison d'être and intelligibility depend on the restoration in Christ that it, as a subsidiary and preparatory episode, ushers in.

Superiority of Restoration in Christ. The restoration in Christ enjoys positive superiority over the original elevation in Adam.

St. Paul and the Fathers. This is the emphatic teaching of Rom 5.12–21, where the work of Adam and of Christ are sharply contrasted. According to Paul, Christ did not merely undo the harm spread by Adam's sin; He goes far beyond readjusting the balance; He endows us with much more than was forfeited in Adam [see Rom 5.15: ". . . much more has the grace of God . . . abounded unto the many $(\pi \circ \lambda \partial \widehat{\omega} \mu \widehat{\alpha} \lambda \lambda \circ v \dots \hat{\epsilon} \pi \epsilon \rho$ ίσσευσεν)"; 20: "grace has abounded yet more (ὑπερεπερίσσευσεν)"]. St. John Chrysostom (d. 407) thus urges Paul's thought: "Christ did not only profit us in the measure in which Adam harmed us, but much more and better (άλλὰ καὶ πολλῷ πλεῖον καὶ μεῖζον)'' (In ep. ad Rom. hom. 10.2; Patrologia Graeca 60:476). And again: ". . .Paul did not say grace abounded but superabounded . . . it is as though one did not simply rid a man of his fever but made him handsome, robust and honored; or as though one did not merely feed a hungry man but made him master of much money and constituted him a high-ranking administrator' (ibid. 10.3; Patrologia Graeca 60:478-79). St. Paul's affirmation of the superiority of our elevation in Christ is caught up and repeated again and again by the writers both of antiquity and of more recent centuries. To mention a few: St. Ambrose [De instit. virg. 17.104; De Jac. et vita beata 1.6.21; Ennarr. in ps. 39, 20 ("Felix ruina, quae reparatur in melius.")], St. Cyril of Alexandria [see H. du Maunoir, Dogme et spiritualité chez s. Cyrille d'Aléxandrie (Paris 1944) 175-78, 293-97], St. Leo the Great, and St. Bernard. St. Francis de Sales may be taken as the spokesman of this massive tradition: "Our loss has been to our profit, since in fact mankind has received from its Savior more grace through the Redemption than it would ever have received through the innocence of Adam, had he persevered in this'' [Traité de l'amour de Dieu (Annecy 1894) 2.5].

Liturgy. Likewise bearing witness to the primacy of the restoration in Christ is the liturgy. At the Offertory of the Mass, mingling water with wine, the priest recites an ancient prayer whose drift is not invariably correctly seized. A comparison is drawn between the wonderful dignity of the first creation and the still more wonderful restoration: mirabilius reformasti. It is beyond cavil that in the language of the early Church the dignity of man's creation meant Adam's being equipped with his supernatural and preternatural gifts. In the decrees of the early councils, in patristic literature, in the classical texts of the liturgy man is considered not philosophically or as a rational animal, but historically, i.e., as endowed with God's love in Adam, or as under his curse through original sin. At the Easter Vigil, the prayer concluding the first prophecy expresses exactly the same idea as this Offertory prayer.

Assessment of Difficulties. A number of theological problems arise when one has such an understanding of man's restoration as is outlined above.

God, Author of Sin? If, in order to display mercy, God chooses a world in which sin destroys the elevation in Adam, is not God the author of sin? The answer is negative. God does not cause sin, but He does permit it as consequent upon the free play of man's will. Always and everywhere God seeks the positive good that is Christ and the imitation of Christ; He permits sin only in that perspective. Never could God, without gainsaying His very being, choose sin for its own sake. Man, on the contrary, can will moral evil-the sole thing he can create because it is pure destruction. It might be added that God's foreknowledge of sin does not undermine man's freedom, which God always respects. What violates freedom is an inward constraint on the will. The fact that an event, foreknown by God, inevitably must happen implies a necessity extrinsic, not intrinsic, to the will.

Evils Consequent on Sin. But did not Adam's sin unleash the pack of trials, sorrows, and evils that still affect men? How, then, can the restoration in Christ be anything more than a poor substitute, at best enabling us to save something from all that was lost? Again, even if God, in pardoning the sinner, shows greater liberality and love, is not the very need of mercy sheer loss? Surely it is better not to need, than to need, mercy? Lastly, is not the forgiven sinner, disfigured with the scar of his sin, less resplendent than Adam arrayed in original justice?

To such questions it may be replied that God's pardon is creative. It is not simply a declaration that all is forgiven and forgotten, leaving the sinner inwardly the same. Like the command at the beginning of time that caused the world to exist, God's decree of remission effects an inward change, a regeneration, a miraculous transformation, as St. Paul plainly assures us: "If then any man is in Christ, there is a new creation; the old things have disappeared; something new is there'' (2 Cor 5.17). "For his workmanship we are, created in Christ Jesus. . ." (Eph 2.10). Perhaps one should rethink the seemingly paradoxical words of Our Lord: ". . . there will be joy in heaven over one sinner who repents, more than over 99 just who have no need of repentance" (Lk 15.7). In cold reality, how can there be more joy (whether in heaven or on earth) after sin than before it? Is this text to be dismissed as divine hyperbole and rhetoric? Possibly the solution lies in the creativeness of divine forgiveness. Because the miraculous transformation wrought by the Father's mercy in Christ positively transcends in value an innocence never lost, therefore the joy over the conversion of even a solitary sinner eclipses the joy over innocence persevered in. To be quite concrete: a converted sinner (like Paul, Augustine) who, with the utmost generosity, is incorporated into Christ outshines the angels who never sinned; for he is in Christ Jesus; they are not. For lovers of God, all things (therefore even sin, as SS. Augustine and Thomas Aquinas expressly maintain in their writings) work together for good (Rom 8.28).

Loss of Preternatural Gifts. Even after the Redemption, concupiscence and death, with their attendant drawbacks, tragedies, and even horrors, reign in the world: surely Adam, equipped with integrity and immortality was much better off.

One way of replying to such a statement is to emphasize that the man incorporated into Christ has incomparably more precious gifts—e.g., the Sacraments. No preternatural gift can do what every Sacrament does—to wit, give, ex opere operato, not only a new bond with the Mystical Body but also grace. Penance and the Eucharist in particular, when fittingly and frequently received, aid a man continuously to approach more and more that selfmastery given by integrity; simultaneously, of course, they advance his holiness, his capacity for meriting, and the apostolic worth of his life. Finally, they are his warrant for the eventual resurrection of his flesh.

Furthermore, the trials, sufferings, sorrows, humiliations, weariness, and temptations associated with concupiscence and death take on for the man reborn in Christ a new sense and value. First, they can be used as honorable amends for his own shortcomings and sins; second, properly handled, they can very effectively promote his own holiness; third (and this is the capital consideration here), they have a crusading quality. It was through suffering and death that Christ redeemed the world. He seeks the cooperation of Christians in this supreme work. He invites them to make up in their own flesh what is wanting in His sufferings for the sake of His Body, the Church (Col 1.24). Thus Christ invests the hardships of life with a dynamic and apostolic purpose. Under Him, inspired by His example, in solidarity with Him, Christians are to be cooperators in the salvation of their fellowmen. The means above all to be used, those of Christ Himself, are to the hand of every mortal man-self-denial, suffering, and even death. Christians must accept these not in a spirit of grim stoicism and fatalistic resignation; rather they must welcome them with apostolic joy ("I rejoice now in the sufferings. . .'' Col 1.24; cf. Acts 5.41). They may even go so far as St. Paul-boasting of their fraility, need, and weakness, so that the strength of Christ can rest upon them and be thrown into relief: "For when I am weak, then I am strong" (2 Cor 12.10); "I know whom I have believed" (2 Tim 1.12); "I can do all things in him who strengthens me'' (Phil 4.13). They will draw consolation from the thought that Christ has pronounced blessed those who suffer for love of Him (Mt 5.1-12).

Sin and Mercy. If the manifestation of divine mercy is so great a good, then the more of it the better. Hence, ought not a man sin with abandon so as to afford God wider scope for mercy? St. Paul has anticipated this objection; he asks (Rom 6.1) whether it follows that we ought to go on sinning, to give still more occasion for grace. And he answers: "By no means! For how shall we who are dead to sin still live in it?" (Rom 6.2; note also the following verses.) Our faith, which prompts us to regard Adam's sin as fortunate for us, likewise teaches us that sin is the chief evil, that the end does not justify the means (cf. Rom 3.8) and that the whole posterity of Adam needs Redemption. In harmony with our faith, St. Thérèse of Lisieux asserted that in preserving her from mortal sin God showed greater love and mercy than in liberating Magdalen from many mortal sins. In an absolutely peerless way, God displayed love and mercy toward His Blessed Mother: all others are at best liberated from sinfulness; she alone was preserved from it in whatever form, being redeemed most eminently. As a daughter of Adam, born into the human race through the normal processes of generation, she ought to have had sin. In fact, by a singular privilege of redemptive grace, she was kept utterly innocent. But while the innocence neither of Adam before the Fall nor of the loyal angels came from the Redemption in Christ, hers did. More closely united to Christ than any other creature, full of grace and therefore (redemptive grace is dynamic and apostolic) the special consort of the Redeemer in the salvation of others, paragon of the redeemed, Mary gives perfect expression to the surpassing excellence of the restoration in Christ.

See Also: FRIENDSHIP WITH GOD; GRACE, ARTICLES ON; GRACE AND NATURE; HOLY SPIRIT, GIFTS OF; INCORPORATION IN CHRIST; JESUS CHRIST (IN THEOLOGY) 3 (SPECIAL QUESTIONS), 12. PRIMACY; JUSTIFICATION; MAN 3; OBEDIENTIAL POTENCY; REBIRTH (IN THE BIBLE); RECAPITULATION IN CHRIST; REDEMPTION; BEATIFIC VISION; DESTINY, SUPERNATURAL.

Bibliography: J. SCHILDENBERGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 1:127-30. J. CHAINE, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947-) 1:127-29. L. VAGANAY, ibid. 1:129. THOMAS AQUINAS, Summa theologiae 1a, 94-102; 1a2ae, 85.2. C. BOYER, Tractatus de Deo creante et elevante (5th ed. Rome 1957). P. GALTIER, Les Deux Adam (Paris 1947). F. PRAT, The Theology of St. Paul, tr. J. L. STODDARD, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1958) v.2. J. F. SAGÜÉS, Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACILITIES IN SPAIN, v.2 (3d ed. 1958) 2.2:675-812. M. FLICK, "Il dogma del peccato originale nella teologia contemporanea," in Problemi e orientamenti di teologia dommatica v.2 (Milan 1957) 89-122. R. CARPENTER, "Mirabilius reformasti," Nouvelle revue théologique 61 (1934) 338-49. A. VITTI, "Christus-Adam," Biblica 7 (1926) 121-45, 270-85, 384-401.

ELFLEDA, ST.

Abbess of Whitby; b. 653; d. Feb. 8, 714. A daughter of Oswy, king of Northumbria, and of St. Eanfled, and the sister of three kings and two queens, Elfleda (or Aelbfled in Bede, Ethelfleda, Edilfleda, Elgiva, Æflaed) was a woman of great sanctity and influence. In fulfillment of a vow following his defeat of King Penda of Mercia, Oswy consecrated his year-old daughter Elfleda to a life of virginity at the abbey of (St.) HILDA, then at Hartlepool. Two years later Hilda purchased land at WHITBY, where she erected her famous double MONAS-TERY. Elfleda was reared and educated at Whitby; at the death of Hilda (680), she and her mother ruled the monastery.

Elfleda was a friend of the great Northumbrian saints CUTHBERT OF LINDISFARNE, WILFRID OF YORK, and JOHN OF BEVERLEY. John sought her counsel several times, on one occasion spending several days at Whitby. Wilfrid became a ward of King Oswy when he was 13, and it was Queen Eanfled who sent him to study at LINDISFARNE and then to Rome. Because of her great admiration for Cuthbert, Elfleda opposed Wilfrid and his Roman rites. However, when her father declared for the Roman rites and Cuthbert accepted the judgment of the Council of Whitby (664), the difference between Cuthbert and Wilfrid was settled, and throughout the latter part of Wilfrid's stormy life Elfleda became his advocate. It was largely because of her testimony after the death of her brother, King Aldfrith, who repented his treatment of Wilfrid, that as late as 703 he was able to retain his archbishopric of York. Elfleda kept in close touch with Cuthbert throughout her life, even after he retired to FARNE. In 684, at the request of her brother, King Ecgfrith, she met Cuthbert on Coquet Island to try to persuade him to accept the bishopric at Hexham. Elfleda was buried at Whitby, as were her father, mother, and grandfather, St. EDWIN OF NORTHUM-BRIA.

Feast: Feb. 8.

There are two other saints of this name: (1) an Anglo-Saxon princess (d. c. 936) who became hermit under the obedience of Glastonbury Abbey and was venerated by St. DUNSTAN (feast: Oct. 23); and (2) an abbess at Ramsey Abbey (d. c. 1000; feast: Oct. 29).

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiatical history 3.24; 4.26. Acta Sanctorum Feb. 2:177–186. B. COLGRAVE, ed. and tr., Two Lives of Saint Cuthbert (Cambridge, Eng. 1940). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 1:278–279.

[M. E. COLLINS]

Sir Edward Elgar. (The Library of Congress)

ELGAR, EDWARD, SIR

Distinguished Catholic composer; b. Broadheath, near Worcester, England, June 2, 1857; d. Worcester, Feb. 23, 1934. He received most of his musical training from his father, organist at St. George's Catholic Church in Worcester, but was self-taught in composition. After producing several cantatas and orchestral pieces, he emerged as a major musical figure with the "Enigma" variations (1899) and The Dream of Gerontius (1900), an oratorio setting of Cardinal J. H. NEWMAN's poem. Like Gerontius, his Biblical oratorios The Apostles (1903) and The Kingdom (1906) are affirmations of a deep religious faith in an age of skepticism. They contain many striking passages characterized by excellent vocal and instrumental scoring, richly imaginative (if traditional) harmonies, and magnificent texts, and they are especially effective in depicting states of contemplative tranquility. Like his other extended works, they are criticized mainly for excessive length. His liturgical music consists of a few early motets written for the Worcester church, where he succeeded his father as organist in 1885. Besides the "Enigma" variations, his best-known orchestral works are the distinctively English "Pomp and Circumstance" marches and the Violin Concerto. He was knighted in 1904, received the Order of Merit in 1911, and was awarded honorary degrees by several English and American universities.

Bibliography: D. MCVEAGH, Edward Elgar: His Life and Music (London 1955). P. M. YOUNG, Elgar, O.M.: A Study of a Musician (London 1955). D. E. TOVEY et al., Music and Letters (London 1920-) 16.1 (Jan. 1935) 1-39, a memorial issue. N. SLONIMSKY, ed., Baker's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians (5th ed. New York 1958) 430-432. H. C. COLES, Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, ed. E. BLOM, 9 v. (5th ed. London 1954) 2:909-928. B. ADAMS, "The 'Dark Saying' of the Enigma: Homoeroticism and the Elgarian Paradox," 19th-Century Music, 23 (2000) 218-235. S. LINDLEY, "This Is the Best of Me . . . ," Organ, 79 (2000) 136-138. C. E. MCGUIRE, "Elgar, Judas, and the Theology of Betrayal," 19th-Century Music, 23 (2000) 236-272. B. NEWBOULD, ""Never Done Before': Elgar's Other Enigma," Music and Letters, 77 (1996) 228-241. A. PAYNE, "Being Elgar," Tempo, 204 (1998) 2-3; Elgar's Third Symphony: The Story of the Reconstruction (London 1998). A. P. SIMCO, "Interpreting Elgar's Enigma Variations," Percussive Notes: The Journal of the Percussive Arts Society, 37/1 (1999) 46-48. P. M. YOUNG, Elgar, Newman, and 'The Dream of Gerontius': In the Tradition of English Catholicism (Aldershot, Eng. 1995).

[R. M. LONGYEAR]

ELGUERO, FRANCISCO

Mexican lawyer and literary figure; b. Morelia, Michoacán, Mexico, March 14, 1856; d. there, Dec. 17, 1932. He was noted in his legal profession for his devotion to law and justice. Elguero was well read in contemporary thought, especially in philosophy, literary criticism, and the sacred sciences. As a writer on both legal and general topics, he was a staunch defender of the Catholic faith. Above all he was an apologist, as a lecturer, journalist, and author. Elguero linked the defense of Catholicism with the defense of Spanish civilization and held that the purity of the Castilian language was of primary importance because it was the means of transmitting that civilization. He based his opposition to the anti-Catholic laws and institutions of the persecution on a thorough knowledge of Mexican history and published accounts of the arbitrary acts of the various liberal governments Mexico had had. When the revolution of Carranza was successful, Elguero lived in exile in Cuba, where he wrote a series of apologetic articles for El Diario de la Marina. On his return to Mexico City, he founded the review América española, which stressed Spain's greatness and the Spanish character of Mexican civilization in law, theology, philosophy, and literature. He was a delegate and one of the leaders of the Catholic group in the Madero legislature. A prolific writer, he cultivated all genres-essay, novel, poetry, and oratory. Among his books were La inmaculada (Mexico City 1905), Senilias poéticas (Havana 1920), Comentarios a pensamientos religiosos de Luis Veillot (Mexico City 1924), and Museo intelectual (2 v. Mexico City 1930). He also left many unpublished writings. Elguero was a corresponding member of the Academia Mexicana.

[J. GUISA Y AZEVEDO]

ELIADE, MIRCEA

Historian of religion, man of letters; b. Bucharest, March 9, 1907; d. Chicago, April 22,1986. Upon completing the M.A. at the University of Bucharest in 1928 on Italian philosophy, Eliade went to India and studied Sanskrit and Indian thought with the prominent historian of Indian philosophy Surendranath Dasgupta. In 1931 he spent several months in a hermitage in the foothills of the Himalayan mountains. He was awarded the Ph.D. by the University of Bucharest in 1933, where he began his teaching career. He served as cultural attaché for Romania in London and Lisbon during World War II. Following the war he took up residence in Paris and lectured at the Sorbonne and other European universities. In 1957 the University of Chicago appointed him to a faculty position. He founded the journal History of Religion and was awarded the Sewell L. Avery Distinguished Service Professorship the following year. His appointment marked the beginning of the so-called Chicago school of the history of religions.

Among the leading historians of religions in the 20th century, he specialized in the study of yoga, shamanism and the myths and rituals of primal societies. Eliade's primary interest was symbolism and its expression through the interplay of myth and ritual. The main sources for his writings are the religious texts of India and the social sciences, especially anthropology, with its rich collection of myths and rituals of preliterate societies. His early research work formed the basis for a series of monographs published in the 1950s and 1960s: Yoga, Immortality and Freedom (Fr. 1954, Eng. 1958), based on his doctoral dissertation and revised over two decades, may well be the primary source of his major religious insights; Patterns in Comparative Religion (Fr. 1949, Eng. 1958) is his most comprehensive statement on the nature of religious symbol; Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy (Fr. 1951, Eng. 1964) reflects his lifelong interest in mysticism and the occult.

The fundamental polarity between the sacred and the profane provided a framework for Eliade's thought. For Eliade religious symbol is studied as a hierophany, i.e., as a manifestation of the sacred. In his scheme of things, a hierophany reveals something other than itself; it is an historical manifestation that may be cosmic, biological, physical or psychological; it is relational insofar as it relates one both to something other than the hierophany and to something other than oneself. Hierophanies are identified by their relational function, which brings the experiencer to a new order of reality, truth, and being-an experience which is not conditioned by ordinary time, space, and existence. Hierophanies make sacred the universe; rituals make sacred or consecrate life (birth, puberty, marriage, death); and myths make sacred the experience of time and space. Eliade maintained that homo religiosus seeks that which is beyond ordinary experience and meaning: sacred life and existence, sacred time and space, a sacred universe. Myths transmit from the beginning, ab origine, the archetypes or exemplary models which are paradigmatic in religious experience. Ritual imitation and ritual repetition of these archetypes recreate and reactualize a sacred world.

A series of articles on the primal cults and myths of Australia was his major concern in the 1960s. Other important works included The Quest: History and Meaning in Religion (1969); Two Tales of the Occult (1970); Zalmoxis, The Vanishing God: Comparative Studies in the Religions and Folklore of Dacia and Eastern Europe (1972); Australian Religion: An Introduction (1973); Occultism, Witchcraft, and Cultural Fashion: Essays in Comparative Religion (1976); No Souvenirs: Journal (1959–1969); The Forbidden Forest (1978); Journey East, Journey West: 1907-1937 (1981); and Symbolism, the Sacred, and the Arts (1985). In the final decade of his life he wrote the three volume A History of Religious Ideas (1978, 1981, 1985), an attempt to place his phenomenological work into an historical context, and served as editor in chief of the Encyclopedia of Religion (1985), to which he contributed several entries. As a man of letters he wrote numerous essays, novels, short stories, several volumes of autobiography, and edited compilations of classical texts.

Eliade affirmed the history of religions as an autonomous discipline and envisioned its task as that of integration, synthesis, and creativity. He spoke of a creative hermeneutic, not merely as an academic discipline, but as a spiritual discipline in which cultural development is a distinct goal. Recognized as an early phenomenologist or structuralist, methodologically speaking, Eliade was criticized for ahistorical tendencies.

Bibliography: D. ALLEN and D. DOEING, Mircea Eliade: An Annotated Bibliography 1919–1978 (New York and London 1980).

[W. CENKNER]

ELIAS, PATRIARCH OF JERUSALEM, ST.

Theological controversialist; b. 430; d. 518. Elias, an Arab by birth, was an anchorite in Egypt who fled to Palestine before the Monophysite persecution of TIMOTHY AELURUS, the Patriarch of Alexandria, and was received by Euthymius in his Laura of Sahel. He was appointed patriarch of Jerusalem in 494. He suffered much for his adherence to the Council of CHALCEDON. Refusing to communicate with the Monophysite patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria, he entered into communion with the Constantinopolitan patriarchs Euphemius (490-496) and Macedonius (496-511) but not with Rome as the ACA-CIAN schism was still in effect. Elias submitted a profession of faith to Emperor ANASTASIUS I (c. 509), and when the emperor interpreted it as an anathema against those who professed the two natures in Christ, Elias protested against this false interpretation and sent another profession based on Chalcedon. At the Synod of Sidon in 511 he was summoned to condemn the doctrine of Chalcedon; but Elias won the majority of the bishops to his side and sent a delegation under (St.) Sabas of Constantinople to defend his position in Jerusalem. Upon the deposition of (St.) Flavian, patriarch of Antioch, for his part in the Synod of Sidon, Sabas successfully defended Elias. When SEVERUS OF ANTIOCH (511-518), the Monophysite usurper, condemned the Tome of Pope LEO I and summoned a synod at Tyre to favor his position, Elias broke communion with him and refused to attend the synod. Emperor Anastasius I sent a force under Olympius, governor of Palestine, who ordered Elias to either sign a Monophysite formula or be exiled. When he refused to sign, Elias was exiled to Aila in 516.

Feast: July 20 (Roman Martyrology with St. Flavian); Feb. 18 (Syriac Church).

Bibliography: V. GRUMEL, Bibliotheca Sanctorum (Rome 1961) 4:1054–57. Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857–66) 147:163–174. Acta Sanctorum July 2:28–32. J. J. DE-LANEY and J. E. TOBIN, Dictionary of Catholic Biography (New York 1961) 370. E. HONIGMANN, Évêques et évêches monophysites (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium 127; 1951). R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15:189–190.

[F. DE SA]

ELIAS BAR SHINĀYĀ

Nestorian metropolitan and one of the most important writers of his age; b. Nisibis (modern Nusaybin in southeastern Turkey, just across the border from Kameshli in Syria), Feb. 11, 975; d. there, shortly after 1049. In his youth he became a monk in the monastery of Michael at Mosul and later in that of Shem'ôn near the Tigris. He was ordained in 994, named bishop of Beit-Nûhadra in 1002, and chosen metropolitan of Nisibis in 1088. His writings belong not only to Syriac literature but also to Arabic Christian literature, since he wrote in both languages. In Syriac he composed certain treatises on canon and civil law, a Syriac grammar, which, in its day, enjoyed great popularity, and various hymns and metrical homilies. In Arabic he wrote the Book on the Proof of the Truth of the Faith, a dogmatic treatise written from the viewpoint of Nestorian doctrine, and the Book on the Removal of Suffering, teaching the way to acquire interior peace, as well as certain other dissertations. Probably his best-known work, however, is his great Chronography, a genuine history of the Church from A.D. 25 to 1018, written both in Arabic and in Syriac; it is valuable especially because it mentions the sources, now mostly lost, from which its author drew his historical material. Another important work of his is the Book of the Translator, an Arabic-Syriac dictionary, which is still useful to modern lexicographers. From Elias bar Shināyā are also several pastoral letters, some written in Syriac and some in Arabic, to the clergy and people of Baghdad.

Bibliography: E. BAR SHINAYA, Des Metropoliten Elias von Nisibis Buch vom Beweis der Wahrheit des Glaubens, tr. L. HORST (Colmar 1886). R. DUVAL, La Littérature syriaque (Anciennes littératures chrétiennes 2; 3d ed. Paris 1907) 395. A. BAUMSTARK, Geschichte der syrischen literatur (Bonn 1922) 287–288. E. DELLY, La Théologie d'Elie bar-Sénaya (Rome 1957). P. KRÜGER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:811. F. NAU, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 4.2:2330–31.

[J. M. SOLA-SOLE]

ELIAS EKDIKOS

Twelfth-century Greek theologian frequently confused with Elias, the Metropolitan of Crete, author of scholia on the Homilies of Gregory Nazianzus and John Climacus, and with Elias of Charan. He is probably identical with the hymn writer Elias the monk. Elias Ekdikos is noted for a florilegium, or ascetic collection, called the Didactic Anthologion, written under the influence of the great theologian Simon the Younger (11th and 12th centuries). Elias presents a fully developed Byzantine doctrine of the striving of man toward the attainment of perfection. Employing as a metaphor the exodus of the Hebrews from Egypt, he postulates three steps leading toward this achievement: the exodus of the Hebrew people from Egypt as the cleansing of the body; the crossing of the Red Sea as the cleansing of the soul; and the crossing of the desert as the final purification of the spirit, through which man finds perfection in the promised land. Elias wrote also spiritual poetry of which one canon has been published.

Bibliography: Patrologia Graeca 90:1401–61; 127:1127–76. K. BAUS, *Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche*² 3:812. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, 588. V. GRUMEL, Catholicisme 4:16. M. DISDIER, Échos d'Orient 31 (1932) 17–43, 144–164.

[G. LUZNYCKY]

ELIAS OF CORTONA

Franciscan minister general (1221–27 and 1232–39); b. probably at Bivigliano, near Assisi, date unknown; d. Cortona, April 22, 1253. Elias was a notary at Bologna and was among the early companions of Francis; he was received into the Order at Cortona in 1211.

After the first missionary chapter of the brothers in 1217, Elias was chosen to serve as provincial minister for the new venture in the Holy Land. Later, during his own 1219-1220 visit to the East, Francis met Elias and brought him back to Italy. In 1221, after the death of his first vicar, Francis appointed Elias. Elias presided at the famous Chapter of Mats in 1221 and from there he sent a band of brothers under the leadership of Caesar of Spyer on the Order's mission to Germany. From this same chapter he sent Anthony of Padua to Bologna to teach theology. After Francis's death, the Pentecost Chapter of 1227 elected John Parenti, Minister from Spain, to succeed Elias. Pope Gregory IX then enlisted Elias's organizational and architectural skills to oversee the construction of a new basilica in Assisi to honor and celebrate the memory of Francis.

At the 1232 chapter in Rieti, Elias was again elected minister general, succeeding his earlier successor, John Parenti. During this second tenure in office, Elias promoted theological studies in multiple centers throughout Europe, particularly Paris and Oxford, and he furthered missionary expansion into northern and eastern Europe, Asia and Africa. During these years, as the number of brothers increased toward 40,000 and became a powerful force, he completed the building of the basilica. Giving new impulse to developments in Italian art and architecture, he was respected throughout Europe. He won the confidence of Clare of Assisi who, in 1235, wrote to her sister Agnes concerning Elias: "Follow the counsel of our venerable father, our Brother Elias, the Minister General, that you may walk more securely in the way of the commands of the Lord. Prize it beyond the advice of the others and cherish it as dearer to you than any gift."

Around 1237, complaints about Elias's leadership began to surface. Because he did not make personal visits throughout the provinces, but sent other brothers as visitators (visitators who were not priests), irritation increased. His refusal to call general chapters every three years as required by the Rule and his demand for funds to finish the basilica increased the opposition. At the general chapter in Rome of 1239, called by Gregory IX, the increasing clerical majority rejected Elias's strong centralized governance and won the day. Elias was deposed. The first priest to hold the office of general minister, Albert of Pisa, succeeded him. Elias returned to Assisi to find himself also deprived of his role as Custos of the Basilica of St. Francis and of the Sacred Convent. He then fled to Pisa to the imperial camp of Emperor Frederick II who was in a struggle with the pope for control of northern parts of Italy. Elias thereby fell under the general excommunication issued by Gregory IX on all those who approached the emperor. This caused great scandal and many brothers considered him an apostate from the Order. Elias died reconciled in the Franciscan friary in Cortona where his remains rest today.

Bibliography: R. B. BROOKE, Early Franciscan Government: Elias to Bonaventure (Cambridge, Eng. 1959). P. DALLARI, Frate Elia, architetto della Basilica d'Assisi e di Cortona (Milan 1970). T. ECCLESTON, "The Coming of the Friars Minor to England" trans. P. Hermann, in XIIIth Century Chronicles (Chicago 1961), 79–191. A. FORTINI, Francis of Assisi, tr. H. MOAK (New York 1981). JORDAN OF GIANO, "The Chronicle of Brother Jordan of Giano" tr. P. HERMANN, in XIIIth Century Chronicles (Chicago 1961), 17–77. SALIMBENE, The Chronicle of Salimbene de Adam, ed. J. L. BAIRD, G. BAGLIVI, and J. KANE (Binghamton, N.Y. 1986).

[J. A. HELLMANN]

ELIAS OF REGGIO, ST.

Known also as Spelaiotes (cave-dweller); b. Reggio di Calabria, Italy, c. 865; d. Melicuccà in Calabria, Sept. 11 c. 960. At the age of 19 he became a monk, living briefly as a hermit near Rome, then with a companion, Arsenios, at Armo, south of Reggio. Both then spent eight years in a hermitage near Patras. Elias returned to enter the monastery of Saline in Calabria (see ELIAS OF THESSALONIKA), but soon settled as a hermit in a cave near Melicuccà, where a group of disciples gathered about him.

Feast: Sept. 11.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Sept. 3:848–887. G. MINASI, Lo Speleota, ovvero S. Elia di Reggio di Calabria, monaco basiliano nel IX. e X. secolo (Naples 1893). S. BORSARI, Il monachesimo bizantino nella Sicilia e nell'Italia Meridionale prenormanne (Naples 1963).

[G. T. DENNIS]

ELIAS OF THESSALONIKA, ST.

Sicilian monk and pilgrim; b. Enna, Sicily, 823; d. Thessalonika, Aug. 17, 903. Elias, baptized John, fled with his family before the Saracen invasion of Sicily (831), but he was taken prisoner (838) and sold into slavery in Africa. On being redeemed, he undertook a pilgrimage to the East and in Jerusalem changed his name to Elias in honor of the Patriarch ELIAS OF JERUSALEM. He visited Alexandria, Antioch, and parts of Persia. On his return to Palermo, he found his mother still living. He established the monastery of Salianae or Aulianae on the west coast of Calabria. Later he set out on another pilgrimage, and visited Sparta and Epirus; later he journeyed to Rome, where he was received by Pope STEPHEN VI. Called to the Byzantine court, he died en route at Thessalonika. His body was returned to the monastery of Salianae, where his cult began almost immediately. His vita is one of the earliest pieces of 10th-century Sicilian hagiography. He is to be distinguished from Elias Spelaiotes (d. 960), a contemporary monk and hermit from Reggio, Calabria, also the subject of a vita (Acta Sanctorum Sept. 3:843-888).

Feast: Aug. 17.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 3:479–509. Bibliotheca hagiographica Graeca, ed. F. HALKIN, (Brussels 1957) 580. G. MARSOT, Catholicisme 4:16. A. BASILE, Archivio storico della Calabria 14 (1945) 19–36.

[F. CHIOVARO]

ELIGIUS OF NOYON, ST.

Bishop of Noyon; b. Chaptelat near Limoges, France, c. 588; d. Noyon, 660. Apprenticed as a goldsmith, Eligius (or Éloi) entered the service of Kings Chlotar II (d. 629) and Dagobert I (d. 639) as an official of the royal treasury at Paris; his name appears on the third-ofa-sou piece for the period. In 636-637 he was employed on an embassy to Brittany; then in 641 he became bishop of Noyon. He founded the monastery of SOLIGNAC, another house in Noyon where St. Godeberta (d. c. 700) was the first abbess, and also an abbey in Paris. He was buried in the cathedral at Noyon. His great friend, St. OUEN OF ROUEN, wrote the first account of his life, parts of which are perhaps incorporated in the existing vita. His cult existed in the eighth century, and he was adopted as the patron saint of metal workers, finding great popularity in the 13th century. His work as a goldsmith is greatly praised by his biographer and seems to have been widely available, but little of it can be identified with certainty today.

Feast: Dec. 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Jan. 1:154–155; Oct. 13:740–741. Vita, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 4:634–742. Sermons, ibid., 751–761. P. MOREL, Étude critique de la vie de S. Éloi (unpublished dissertation Paris 1930) 129–133. J. DUQUESNE, Saint Eloi (Paris

Print depicting Elijah carried to heaven in a fiery chariot as Elisha watches, 17th century, Jordan. (©Historical Picture Archive/CORBIS)

1985). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:455–458. É. BROUETTE, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15:260–263.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

ELIJAH

A Prophet from Thisbe (Tishbe) in Galaad, the great champion of the religion of Yahweh during the reign of King Ahab (c. 869—c. 850) of Israel and his wife Jezebel and that of their son (Ahaziah c. 850—c. 849). The whole career of Elijah is summed up in his Hebrew name ' $\bar{e}lly\bar{a}h$ (\hat{u}), ''my God is Yahweh.'' The actual historical career of Elijah is difficult to reconstruct, because his story (1 Kgs 17.1–19.21; 21.1–29; 2 Kgs 1.2–2.12), which probably came from a once independent cycle of stories about the prophets that the editor of Kings excerpted and incorporated into his book, is overlaid with much legendary material, and since it is apparently drawn from various strands of tradition, it is not always consistent with itself or with other data that can be derived from Biblical and other ancient sources.

Well-known are the stories of the long drought that the prophet brought on the land (to show that Yahweh was superior to Baal, the Canaanite god of fertility); his being fed miraculously by ravens in Wadi Cherith of Transjordan and by the widow in Zarephthah of Phoenicia, whose son he raised from the dead; his triumph over the prophets of Baal on Mt. CARMEL; and his flight to Mt. HOREB, where he witnessed the THEOPHANY in which Yahweh was not in the hurricane or the earthquake but in the "still small voice" (to show that Yahweh achieves his purposes quietly and patiently).

The spectacular account of his departure (2 Kgs 2.11) from this world did much to encourage later speculation concerning his role in salvation history. After his return was predicted by Malachi (Mal 3.1, 23-24; see also Sir 48.1-12) as a herald of the DAY OF THE LORD, understood as the precursor of the Messiah, he became a very prominent figure in later Jewish writings. No less than three "apocalypses" are known to have been attributed to him. Like Enoch (Gn 5.21-24), who, unlike the other antediluvian Patriarchs, is not said to have died but to have been "taken by God," Elijah was widely believed not to have died but to be "waiting" somewhere until God should send him to discharge his role in connection with the establishment of the messianic kingdom. Actually, the NT clearly regards the prediction of Malachi to have been fulfilled in the person of St. JOHN THE BAPTIST (Mt 11.10, 14; 17.10-13; Mk 1.2; 9.10-12; Lk 1.16–17, 76; 7.27), but speculation concerning Elijah continued to flourish, even to the present day, at times taking on a very far-fetched character.

In Christian iconography the figure of Elijah appears frequently both in the Byzantine East and the Latin West. His common attributes are a raven (referring to the birds that fed him during the famine), a flaming sword (alluding to the fire he brought down from heaven on the Mt. Carmel sacrifice), and a fiery chariot (in which he ascended into heaven). The various events of his life, particularly his miracles and his marvelous departure from the earth, have often been portrayed.

Bibliography: V. HAMP et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Frieburg 1957–65) 3:806–810. G. FOHRER, Die Religion in Geischichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:424–427. Encylope-dic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN, (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek, 646–647. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 2.1:347–359.

[B. MCGRATH]

ELIJAH (SECOND COMING OF)

"Lo, I will send you Elijah, the prophet, before the day of the Lord comes, the great and terrible day . . ." (Mal 3.23). This prediction, coupled with the Prophet's dramatic departure from the earth (2 Kgs 2.11), generated a conviction among the Jews that Elijah would return to prepare the day of Yahweh. The Gospels offer evidence of just such a belief in Palestine at the time of Christ. The Jewish levites and priests came to JOHN THE BAPTIST asking if he were Elijah (Jn 1.21); others thought that Jesus Himself might be the Prophet (Mt 16.14; Lk 9.8). And although John denied that he was the Prophet, Christ Himself said of the Baptist: "And if you are willing to receive it, he is Elijah who was to come" (Mt 11.14; cf. 17.10–13).

These texts of the Old and New Testaments pose an exegetical problem. According to Christ, John was the long-awaited Elijah; yet the Baptist was obviously not the Prophet himself, for the Scriptures have left a detailed account of his birth and parentage. One is compelled, therefore, to ask the question: is the prophecy of Malachi completely fulfilled in John, or is one to look for Elijah himself to reappear in eschatological times? Quite different answers have been given by patristic writers and by contemporary exegetes.

Perhaps the clearest statement of the patristic view can be found in Augustine. "As there are two comings of the Judge," he writes, "there will be two heralds. The [Judge] sent before Him the first herald [John] calling him Elijah, because Elijah would be in the Second Coming what John was in the first" (In evang. Ioh. 4.5). In Augustine's interpretation, therefore, John was properly called Elijah because he was a symbol, or type, or the eschatological figure who would precede the Second Coming of Christ (see PAROUSIA).

Augustine's view was strongly endorsed by Cardinal Bellarmine and persists in theological manuals. C. Pesch, for instance, identifies the two "witnesses" of Rv 11.3 as Elijah and Enoch [Praelectiones dogmaticae, v.9 (5th ed. Freiburg 1923) 352].

Modern exegetes, however, have moved away from this older opinion, convinced that it lacks any solid basis in the Scriptures. The prophecy of Malachi, they believe, is not to be understood literally, but rather of one who has the power of Elijah. That the Baptist fulfilled this prophecy was first vaguely indicated by the angel's words to Zechariah ". . . and he himself shall go before him in the spirit and power of Elijah . . ." (Lk 1.17). The angel's veiled hint becomes luminously clear in the words of Christ who declared that John was indeed Elijah. Modern exegesis sees no compelling reason to look for any further fulfillment of the prophecy.

Bibliography: Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–), Tables générales 1:1154. V. HAMP et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:806–810. E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de la Bible, ed. F. VIGOUROUX, 5 v. (Paris 1895–1912) 2.2:1670–76. G. JACQUE-MET, Catholicisme 4:10–11. L. CERFAUX and J. CAMBIER, L'Apocalypse de Saint Jean, lue aux chrétiens (Paris 1955).

[G. J. DYER]

ELIOT, THOMAS STEARNS

Anglo-American poet and critic; b. St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 26, 1888, d. London, Jan. 4, 1965. He was the seventh and last child of Henry Ware Eliot and Charlotte Stearns Eliot, and the grandson of William Greenleaf Eliot, Unitarian minister and founder of Washington University, St. Louis. At Harvard, then under the presidency of his distant relative C. W. Eliot, he encountered DANTE, the metaphysical poets and the French symbolists and commenced writing experimental verse that borrowed its voice from Jules Laforgue and its habits of imagery from late Elizabethan drama. After receiving his bachelor's (1909) and master's (1910) degrees, he spent a year in Paris, where he wrote much of "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," and then returned to Harvard for graduate study in philosophy (1911-14), envisaging an academic career. Further work in Germany was cut short by World War I, and in 1914 he enrolled at Merton College, Oxford, where he read Aristotle's Posterior Analytics and commenced his doctoral thesis on Francis Herbert BRAD-LEY's theory of knowledge. His marriage to Vivien Haigh-Wood in 1915 marked the termination of his academic career. He submitted the thesis to Harvard in 1916 but never took the degree. Eliot worked in the foreign exchange department at Lloyd's Bank and reviewed numerous books for small sums. These labors, added to the work of equipping himself to be a poet in the contemporary world and the strain of coping with his wife's continual emotional derangements, brought on by 1921 a comprehensive breakdown; during his recuperation at Margate and Lausanne he wrote the first major 20thcentury poem in English, The Waste Land.

Thomas Stearns Eliot, London, England, 1956. (AP/Wide World Photos)

In September 1914 Eliot had met Ezra Pound in London. Pound secured publication of "Prufrock" in Poetry (Chicago) and during several years' close association accelerated Eliot's assimilation of models and his development of a sharp, unrhetorical, virtuosic verse technique. By 1919 Eliot had blocked out, and in large part occupied, the intellectual territory from which he meant to operate. He had arrived at a workable view of literary tradition: the past that has been deliberately assimilated, the past to the future understanding of which present work in turn, if rightly done, will make an irreversible difference. He had clarified his grasp of the tradition accessible to him, which drew vitality from the Elizabethans and the metaphysicals and from 19th-century France. But he found in Milton a "Chinese Wall"; in the Romantics, insufficient knowledge; and in the Victorians, diffuse rumination. He had perfected, in a series of poems in quatrains, an aesthetic of sinewy statement, playing against the closed form a rich syntactic variety. And he had defined the dramatic function of rhetoric: a symptom of the speaker's absorption with the figure he is cutting, and so the precise index of a mind's self-consciousness.

Key Poetry. All this knowledge is articulated in The Waste Land, in which the poet's awareness of his own plight echoes the weary self-consciousness of the postwar "mind of Europe," stored with resonant fragments and preoccupied with imaginative and spiritual drought. A tough arid eloquence pervades its mosaic of allusions. Shakespeare and St. Augustine, Buddha and Andrew Marvell, the Journey to Emmaus and the Grail-Knight's pilgrimage to a deserted chapel where to inquire after the meaning of symbols is perhaps to resurrect them, all enter a plenum in which the 20th-century imagination has ever since been learning to know its own identity. This poem (1922) and the essays in The Sacred Wood (1920) affirmed but did not for some years implement Eliot's authority as the presiding intelligence in literary London and ultimately in the English-speaking West.

"The Hollow Men" (1925), a dry, dead spiritual void amid which articulation is miraculously sustained, terminated what Eliot expected to be his final collection of verse. He was editing the Criterion (1922–39) and working in the publishing firm founded by Geoffrey Faber. In 1927, however, he commenced a new life, naturalized as a British subject; confirmed in the Church of England, of which he was to become his time's most eminent lay communicant; and initiating with "Journey of the Magi" (1927) a sequence of religious poems that culminated in Ash-Wednesday (1930) and bore autumnal fruit in the major work of his maturity, Four Quartets (1935–42).

The church attracted him initially by its embodiment of his idea of tradition, by its transcendental authority in a shifting time, and by its power to define as a meaningful ideal the asceticism that for the poet of The Waste Land had been only an appalled refusal of chaotic sensuality. His Magi, in the blank years when the Word on earth has not yet undertaken his ministry, have been accorded not peace but a permanent alienation from the world's satisfactions. His most conspicuously Christian poem, Ash-Wednesday, begins by not hoping to turn again (as though going back, not on, would be a good thing if one were permitted to hope for it) and closes in "the dream-crossed twilight between birth and dying," praying to learn "to care and not to care."

Murder in the Cathedral (1935) may be read as a commentary on Ash-Wednesday. In this play about the murder of St. Thomas BECKET, the archbishop must learn to care and not to care; for if he merely chooses not to care, and abandons himself to his destroyers, he will be a suicide rather than a martyr. Probably no drama has ever explored so subtle a moral point; but even in the extraordinary scene in which Thomas is tempted by fore-knowledge of his own beatification, Eliot's hand is sure—and a Christian drama emerges from what a merely clever writer would have turned into an intellectual puzzle; and a merely theatrical writer, into a thriller.

Out of passages not used in this play grew "Burnt Norton'' (1935); out of "Burnt Norton," under the stress of the war years, grew Four Quartets, Eliot's comprehensive meditation on the meaning of his own life and that of his ancestors, the contemporary world and the past it fulfils and half disowns, the Christian revelation and the secular pleasures it incorporates, judges, and transcends. The décor, like that of Gray's Elegy, comes from the 18th-century tradition of the local meditative poem; the structure of each Quartet is drawn from that of "The Waste Land"; the images extend those of Eliot's earlier poems; the whole is quiet, steeped in tradition, and utterly modern, suggesting, as the title implies, a wordless conversation like that among stringed instruments. Only George Herbert's The Temple (1633) supplies partial analogies for the quality of feeling in this purest and most characteristic of Eliot's works, and only Rilke's Duino Elegies offers a parallel modern concern for the feel of living in time under eternal sanctions.

Popular Theater. In 1947 Mrs. Eliot died; they had long been legally separated. In 1948 Eliot received the Order of Merit and the Nobel prize for literature. In 1950, with The Cocktail Party, a play about contrasting modes of salvation, he reached a large popular audience for the first time. Two more plays for the popular theater followed, The Confidential Clerk (1954) and The Elder Statesman (1959). In 1957 T. S. Eliot's marriage to Valerie Fletcher inaugurated what were conspicuously the happiest years of his life. He wrote little, traveled much, continued on a reduced schedule his work as a partner of Faber and Faber, and enjoyed, with some irony, the esteem in which he was held as England's most eminent man of letters. His last publication was the longsuppressed 48-year-old doctoral thesis on Bradley's philosophy, which dated from the end of his academic career and the beginning of his life as a poet and man of letters. His ashes were interred in the Somerset village of East Coker, celebrated in Four Quartets, where Eliots or Elyots lived for some two centuries before the poet's ancestor Andrew Eliot emigrated in 1667 to found the American branch of the family. "East Coker" begins, "In my beginning is my end," and closes, "In my end is my beginning."

Bibliography: T. S. ELIOT, Collected Poems, 1909-1962 (New York 1963); Selected Essays, 1917-1932 (2d ed. New York 1950); Murder in the Cathedral (New York 1935); The Family Reunion (New York 1939); The Cocktail Party (New York 1950); The Confidential Clerk (New York 1954); The Elder Statesman (New York 1959); The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (Cambridge, Mass. 1933); The Idea of a Christian Society (New York 1940). D. C. GALLUP, T. S. Eliot: A Bibliography (New York 1953). H. KENNER, The Invisible Poet (New York 1959); ed., T. S. Eliot: A Collection of Critical Essays (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1962). N. FRYE, T. S. Eliot (New York 1963). G. C. SMITH, T. S. Eliot's Poetry and Plays (Chicago 1956). B. RAJAN, ed., T. S. Eliot: A Study of His Writings by Several Hands (New York 1948). L. UNGER, T. S. Eliot: A Selected Critique (New York 1948). G. WILLIAMSON, Reader's Guide to T. S. Eliot: A Poem-by-Poem Analysis (New York 1953). H. HOWARTH, Notes on Some Figures behind T. S. Eliot (Boston 1964), contains much biog. material. R. S. KENNEDY, Working out Salvation with Diligence: The Plays of T. S. Eliot (Wichita, Kans., 1964). KENNETH ASHER, T. S. Eliot and Ideology (Cambridge, U.K., and New York, 1995). ANTHONY JULIUS, T. S. Eliot, Anti-Semitism, and Literary Form (Cambridge, U.K., and New York, 1995). CARO-LINE PHILLIPS, The Religious Quest in the Poetry of T. S. Eliot (Lewiston, N.Y., 1995). NARSINGH SRIVASTAVA, The Poetry of T. S. Eliot: A Study in Religious Sensibility (New Delhi, 1991).

[H. KENNER]

ELIPANDUS OF TOLEDO

Chief proponent of the 8th-century heresy of ADOP-TIONISM in Spain; b. July 25, 717; d. after 800 (807?). He was appointed archbishop of Toledo c. 783. In condemning Migetius for SABELLIANISM (Seville, c. 782), Elipandus himself became the author of the Spanish form of adoptionism, claiming that there are two distinct persons in Christ. Felix of Urgel, a contemporary and a subject of Charlemagne, introduced adoptionism into the southern part of Charles's kingdom. He is sometimes considered the author of adoptionism; but ALCUIN blames Elipandus (Patrologia Latina 101:231–300). BEATUS OF LIÉBANA and Etherius, Bishop of Osma [Symbolum fidei Elipandianae (785); (Patrologia Latina 96:916–920], opposed Elipandus, and Pope ADRIAN I condemned him. CHARLEMAGNE convoked a council at Frankfurt (794), to which the Pope sent legates, and adoptionism was formally condemned. The submission of Elipandus is uncertain, since all documents that assert it derive from a single doubtful source. The error of Elipandus is variously ascribed to Moslem or Nestorian influence or to that of the MOZARABIC RITE. Vernet states, however, that adoptionists had rejected Moslem Christological errors. Some Nestorian influence—real, but hard to trace—and the emphasis of the Mozarabic liturgy seem to be the principal sources of his erroneous theories.

Bibliography: H. FLÓREZ et al, España sagrada 5:561–564. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoires et conciles d'après les documents originaux, trans and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 3:985–992. F. VER-NET, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 4.2:2330–40. J. F. RIVE-RA, "La controversia adopionista del siglo VIII y la ortodoxia de la liturgia Mozárabe," Ephemerides Liturgicae 47 (1933) 506–536; Elipando de Toledo (Toledo 1940). É AMANN, "L'Adoptionisme espagnol du VIII^e siècle," Revue des sciences religieuses 16 (1936) 281–317. A. BIGELMAIR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:815.

[C. M. AHERNE]

ELISHA

Prophet and successor of ELIJAH, Elisha (Heb. 'Ĕlîŝa', God saves), from Abel-Mehula (south of Beth-San) was active in the second half of the 9th century B.C. The account of his career is given in 1 Kgs 19.16, 19-21; 2 Kgs 2.1-8.15; 9.1-3; 13.14-21. Much of his story, which once circulated in separate form before it was reworded and incorporated by the editor of Kings into his book, is overlaid with legend. Some of his miracles [see MIRACLES (IN THE BIBLE)], for example, have more than a touch of the bizarre about them. Immediately after the "ascension" of Elijah, for instance, the story is told how Elisha "sweetened" the waters of Jericho (2 Kgs 2.15-22); even today the copious spring at ancient Jericho is pointed out to travelers and pilgrims as the Fountain of Elisha. Following this is the incident of the boys who mocked the Prophet and, at his prayer, were torn apart by bears (2.23-24). The story of his relations with the rich woman of Sunam and his raising of her young son from the dead (2 Kgs 4.1–37) is remarkably similar to the story of Elijah and the widow of Sarephta (1 Kgs 17.9-24). The most significant event in Elisha's career was his designation of Jehu as King of Israel. Even after his death he was credited with working miracles (2 Kgs 13.20-22); but his fame and influence were much less enduring than those of Elijah, who, for example, is mentioned about 30 times in the NT, whereas Elisha is mentioned only once (Lk 4.27), in connection with his curing the leprosy of Naaman the Syrian (2 Kgs 5.1–19).

Bibliography: V. HAMP, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:821–822. G. FOHRER, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:429–431. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963), from A. VAN DEN BORN, Bijbels Woordenboek 650.

[B. MCGRATH]

ELIZABETH, ST.

Wife of Zechariah and mother of JOHN THE BAPTIST. The NT spelling of the name ($`E\lambda\iota\sigma a\beta\epsilon\tau$) represents a late, possibly Aramaic form of the name of the wife of Aaron (Heb. 'ělîseba'; Ex 6.23). Elizabeth was a descendant of her OT namesake, for she was ''of the daughters of Aaron'' (Lk 1.5), i.e., descended from Aaron's line. She is designated as a relative ($\sigma \upsilon \gamma \gamma \epsilon \upsilon \zeta$; Lk 1.36) of Mary, the Mother of Jesus, but it is not possible to ascertain the exact nature of their relationship; according to the legend of the apocryphal History of Hanna, Elizabeth's mother, Sophia, was a sister of Mary's mother, Anna. Already advanced in age and sterile (cf. Gn 18.11 for the parallel case of Abraham and Sarah), she and her husband were promised a son by the Angel Gabriel, who appeared to Zachary in the Temple.

The statement that Elizabeth and her husband were "virtuous before God, walking blamelessly in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord" (Lk 1.6) indicates that her sterility was not a result of God's disfavor; she takes her place alongside the holy women of the OT, such as Sarah and Anna, whose barrenness was the prelude to a mighty act of God. Nevertheless, by this phrase, St. Luke intends to contrast her to Mary, who is "full of grace" (1.28), and whose Son would be the promised Savior, while the son of Elizabeth was to be His precursor. Like Jeremiah (Jer 1.5), the promised child was to be "filled with the Holy Spirit from his mother's womb" (Lk 1.15). This son of her old age would be called a "prophet of the Most High" (1.76).

At Mary's visit Elizabeth was six months pregnant. Her greeting to Mary, "And how have I deserved that the Mother of my Lord should come to me?" (1.43) indicates her belief that Mary is to be Mother of the Messiah. At Mary's greeting the infant in Elizabeth's womb leapt with joy (1.15). Three months later she gave birth to the son promised to Zachary. At the time of the child's circumcision she insisted that he be called John ("Yahweh is gracious").

According to legend Elizabeth escaped with her infant son at the time of the massacre of the innocents, and she and her child hid in a cavern, which had opened up to receive them. While there, they were miraculously fed and cared for by angels (Protoevangelium of James, 22).

The principal scene in which Elizabeth is represented in sacred art is the Visitation. There are no representations in the catacombs of the Visitation. She is shown greeting the Blessed Virgin Mary in a carving on a 5thcentury sarcophagus at Ravenna and in frescoes from the 6th century in the Church of Sergius at Gaza.

Feast: Nov. 5 (Roman Church); Sept. 8 (Eastern Church).

See Also: VISITATION OF MARY.

Bibliography: P. GAECHTER, Maria im Erdenleben (Innsbruck 1953) 98–100. L. RÉAU, Iconographie de l'art chrétion, 6 v. (Paris 1955–59) 3.1:415–417.

[M. E. MCIVER]

ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND

Reigned Nov. 17, 1558, to March 24, 1603; monarch of England's golden age and architect of its final break with the papacy; b. Greenwich, Sept. 7, 1533; d. Richmond. She was the daughter of HENRY VIII and Anne Boleyn. In order to make Anne his wife and in the hope of securing a male heir, Henry repudiated Queen CATHERINE OF ARAGON, rejected papal authority, and became supreme head of the Church in England (1534). The birth of a daughter was a disappointment, and he tired of Anne, who was accused of adultery and executed. Nevertheless Elizabeth had a happy childhood and was educated in the New Learning by such brilliant English humanists as Roger Ascham. Under the rule of her half-sister Mary (1553-58), she was in considerable peril, but it could not be proved that she was implicated in Sir Thomas Wyatt's abortive attempt to overthrow the queen. She conformed to the Catholic religion, but it was fairly clear that she was not a Catholic at heart. The long reign of Elizabeth I was one of the most remarkable in English history, and the queen was a legend in her own lifetime. During these 45 years both English Protestantism and English nationalism achieved success, and England experienced new maritime supremacy, a strengthened economy, and a brilliant literary vitality.

When she became queen (1558) she was illegitimate by both English law and the canons of the Church. If she had wished, she could probably have come to terms with the papacy, but her personal inclinations and, still more, her assessment of the political situation were against it. Elizabeth had no desire to be dependent on either Spain or the papacy, and she decided to throw in her lot with the Protestant cause. The Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity in 1559 declared her Supreme Governor of the Church of England, required the use in all churches of the Book of Common Prayer, and imposed penalties on those who did not attend the parish church on Sundays and holy days. The form of religion that gradually took shape during her reign was uniquely English. It rejected the Church of Rome but retained a great deal of Catholic tradition, although not as much as the queen herself would have liked. Elizabeth was not very interested in theology and not particularly concerned about what men believed in their hearts, but she was determined that they should accept the royal authority in religion and conform outwardly. Though not personally cruel or vindictive, she, like most 16th-century rulers, Catholic and Protestant, was not prepared to tolerate two religions within the state.

"Elisha and Gehazi," c. 1860s. (©Historical Picture Archives/ CORBIS)

In 1570 Pope Pius V excommunicated Elizabeth I and absolved her subjects from their allegiance to her. From Elizabeth further legislation against Catholics followed, but the most ferocious parts of the penal code in the 1580s and 1590s were the product of two other factors—the great success of the missionary priests who began to come into England from 1574 onward and the growing possibility of foreign invasion. The seminary priests and the laity were, with few exceptions, loyal to the queen; but Cardinal William ALLEN, the Jesuit Robert PERSONS, and others were working for her overthrow. Persecution increased, and almost 200 priests and laymen were put to death. Many more were imprisoned and fined. (See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.) Elizabeth was generally successful in imposing her religious settlement and by the end of her long reign the Church of England enjoyed national prestige. A large Catholic and a strong Puritan minority survived, nonetheless, and the queen left to her successor, James I, a number of unresolved issues.

"Holy Family with St. Elizabeth and the Infant St. John the Baptist," by Francesco Primaticcio. (©Alexander Burkatowski/CORBIS)

Bibliography: The best guide to the vast literature on Elizabeth is C. READ, ed., Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485-1603 (2d ed. New York 1959); Mr. Secretary Walsingham and the Policy of Queen Elizabeth, 3 v. (Cambridge, MA 1925); Mr. Secretary Cecil and Queen Elizabeth (New York 1955). M. CAMPBELL, The English Yeoman under Elizabeth and the Early Stuarts (New Haven 1942). E. M. W. TILLYARD, The Elizabethan World Picture (New York 1944). M. CREIGHTON, Queen Elizabeth (London 1899). J. E. NEALE, Queen Elizabeth I (New York 1934; repr. 1959); Elizabeth I and Her Parliaments, 2 v. (New York 1959). J. B. BLACK, The Reign of Elizabeth, 1558-1603 (2d ed. Oxford 1959). E. P. CHEYNEY, History of England from the Defeat of the Spanish Armada to the Death of Elizabeth, 2 v. (New York 1914-26). A. L. ROWSE, The Elizabethan Age, 2 v. (London 1950-55). J. HURSTFIELD, Elizabeth I and the Unity of England (New York 1961). J. B. CODE, Queen Elizabeth and the English Catholic Historians (Louvain 1935). M. SCHMIDT, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957-65) 2:432. P. HUGHES, The Reformation in England, 3 v. in 1 (5th, rev. ed. New York 1963). S. DORAN, Monarchy and Matrimony (New York 1996). S. FREY, Elizabeth I (New York 1996). C. LEVIN, The Heart and Stomach of a King (Philadelphia 1994). W. MACAFFREY, Elizabeth I (New York 1993). A. SOMMERSET, Elizabeth I (London 1991).

[P. MCGRATH]

ELIZABETH OF HUNGARY (THURINGIA), ST.

Hungarian princess, Franciscan penitent, patroness of secular and regular Franciscans; b. 1207; d. Nov. 16/ 17, 1231. Elizabeth was the daughter of King Andrew II of Hungary and Queen Gertrude. Her sister Mary would marry Asen II, the king of Bulgaria. Her brother Béla would eventually become the king of Hungary. Her maternal aunt was Queen Hedwig of Poland and her first cousin on her father's side was Agnes of Bohemia with whom St. Clare of Assisi corresponded and who is known in these extant letters as Agnes of Prague. Among her other maternal relatives were Mathilda, the abbess of Kitzingen-on-Main, and Eckbert, the bishop of Bamberg. In 1211, at the age of four, she was betrothed to Ludwig IV of Thuringia, son of Duke Hermann and Duchess Sophie of Bavaria. At that time she was brought to the castle in Thuringia, the Wartburg, near Eisenach. There she was raised with her intended husband and his siblings. In 1221, Elizabeth and Ludwig were married. She was fourteen and he twenty. They had three children: a boy, Hermann (1222), and two girls, Sophia (1224) and Gertrude (1227). Ludwig died in 1227 as he was embarking for the Holy Land. Elizabeth died four years later. Pope Gregory IX canonized her in Perugia on May 27, 1235.

Elizabeth I, Queen of England. (© Archive Photos, Inc.)

Elizabeth's initial contact with Franciscan spirituality dates from 1221 when the friars successfully settled in Germany. Contact with them and a Brother Rodeger, her personal spiritual director for a time, helped develop her sensitivities and dedication in providing food for the poor and hungry and her care for the sick. She built two hospitals, one near Wartburg castle and the other in the town of Marburg. These works of mercy were hallmark activities of the early sisters and brothers of the Order of Penance. Desiring a life of voluntary poverty and humility and anxious for personal involvement in these works of mercy, she was clothed in the grey habit of the Franciscan penitents on Good Friday of 1228. Sometime before her husband's death, Conrad of Marburg took over the role of her spiritual guide. Some few letters from Conrad as well as excerpts from the process of canonization form the nucleus of the earliest records of Elizabeth's life.

Feast: Nov. 17.

St. Elizabeth of Hungary.

Bibliography: J. ANCELET-HUSTACHE, Gold Tried by Fire: Saint Elizabeth of Hungary, tr. P. J. OLIGNY and V. O'DONNELL (Chicago 1963). B. CAZELLES, The Lady as Saint: A Collection of French Hagiographic Romances of the Thirteenth Century (Philadelphia 1991) 52–171. R. MANSELLI, "Royal Holiness in the Daily Life of Elizabeth of Hungary: The Testimony of Her Servants," tr. E. HAGMANN. Greyfriars Review 11 (1997) 311–330. G. SCHINELLI, "Elizabeth of Hungary: Medieval Princess or Sharper Image?" The Cord 50 (2000), 281–288.

[G. SCHINELLI]

ELIZABETH OF PORTUGAL, ST.

Queen, Franciscan tertiary; b. 1270 or 1271; d. Estremoz, July 4, 1336. Elizabeth (Isabella), daughter of Pedro III and Constance of Aragon, and grandniece of ELIZA-BETH OF HUNGARY, married King Dinis of Portugal in 1282. She bore his infidelity with loving patience, raised his illegitimate children as her own, and frequently intervened between him and their rebelling son, Alfonso. She devoted herself to the welfare of her subjects, especially the poor, and on several occasions averted war between the kings of Aragon and Castile. When widowed in 1325, she took the habit of the Franciscan Third Order and lived close to the POOR CLARES in Coimbra. She died in Estremoz on her way to make peace between her son and her nephew, Alfonso XI of Castile. Urban VIII canonized her in 1625. Her iconography shows her in regal garb with a dove or olive branch.

Feast: July 4 (formerly July 8).

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 2:169–213. A. DE VAS-CONCELOS, Evolução do culto de Dona Isabel de Aragão, 2 v. (Coimbra 1894), reprinted as Dona Isabel de Arag o: a Rainha Santa, 2 v. (Coimbra 1993). J. CRESPO, Santa Isabel na doença e na morte (Coimbra 1942). P. CANTERO CUADRADO, Santa Isabel, reina de Portugual (Zaragoza 1971). A. MUÑOZ FERNÁNDEZ, Mujer y experiencia religiosa en el marco de la Santidad medieval (Madrid 1988). D. GIESREGEN, The Search for St. Elizabeth (Park Falls, Wis. 1992). F. B. LEITE, O Rei D. Dinis e a Rainha Santa Isabel (Coimbra 1993). V. J. MCNABB, St. Elizabeth of Portugal (New York 1937). J. BRANQUINHO DE CARRALHO, As festas da canonização da Rainha Santa Isabel promoridas (Coimbra 1953). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3:37–38.

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

ELIZABETH OF SCHONAU, ST.

Benedictine nun and mystic; b. in the Rhineland, perhaps near Bonn, Germany, 1129; d. Schönau, Hesse, June 18, 1164. She entered the double Benedictine monastery in Schönau at 12, was professed in 1147, and appointed mistress (superior) of the nun's convent in 1157. In 1152, after a serious illness, she had begun to experience extraordinary visions and ecstacies, of which her brother Egbert (see ECKBERT OF SCHÖNAU) commanded her to write detailed accounts. He published three books of her Visiones with a preface of his own and a chronological list of the visions and most important spiritual experiences. Her second work, the Liber viarum Dei, was written in imitation of the Scivias of St. HILDEGARD. Both works reveal the controlling hand of Egbert, especially in matters of theology, Church discipline, and politics. Siding with FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA, Elizabeth [Egbert] supported the antipope Victor IV against ALEXAN-DER III, violently denounced heretics and abuses in the Church, and addressed stern warnings and prophecies of doom to clergy and laity. Her bizarre elaboration of the already fantastic St. URSULA legend (Visiones, 2.3), also probably the result of Egbert's influence, was enormously popular in the Middle Ages, as were all her visionary writings, although they were never sanctioned by the Church. Contemporary authorities testify to her sincerity, purity, and genuine zeal. Apparently through a confusion of the two monasteries in Schönau, Cistercian and Benedictine, her name was inscribed as a Cistercian in the Roman MARTYROLOGY in 1584, under GREGORY XIII.

Feast: June 18.

Bibliography: ELISABETH OF SCHÖNAU, Die Visionen der hl. Elisabeth von Schönau..., ed. F. W. E. ROTH (Brünn 1884); Das Gebetbuch der hl. Elisabeth von Schönau, ed. F. W. E. ROTH (Augsburg 1886); Elisabeth of Schönau: The Complete Works, tr. A. L. CLARK (Mahwah, N.J. 2000). ECKBERT, Sanctae Elisabeth vita, Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 217 v. (Paris 1878–90) 195: 119–194. Acta Sanctorum June 4:499–532; Oct. 9:167–171. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 2:578–580. E. SPIESS, Ein Zeuge mittelalterlicher Mystik in der Schweiz (Basel 1935). W. OEHL, Deutsche Mystikerbriefe (Munich 1931). W. LEVISON, Das Werden der Ursula-Legende (Köln 1928).

[M. F. LAUGHLIN]

ELIZABETH OF THE TRINITY, BL.

Carmelite mystic; (name in the world, Elisabeth Catez) b. July 18, 1880, Camp d'Avor, Bourges, France; d. Nov. 9, 1906, Dijon, France.

Elizabeth Catez is to be distinguished from two other Carmelites of the same name: Elizabeth of the Trinity of the Carmel of Tours (de Quatrebarbes, 1506 to 1660), and Elizabeth of the Trinity of Nantes (E. Duterte de la Coudre, 1881 to 1919). When Elizabeth was seven, her father, a military officer, died; but Elizabeth and her sister Marguerite received an excellent Christian education from their mother, who was much devoted to the writings of St. TERESA OF AVILA. Her mother also encouraged the development of her musical talent by sending her to the Dijon Conservatory. At the age of 14, Elizabeth made a vow of virginity. She entered the Carmel at Dijon Aug. 2, 1901; received the Carmelite habit from Bishop Le Nordez of Dijon on Dec. 8, 1901; and was professed Jan. 11, 1903. On Nov. 21, 1904, she composed her celebrated prayer, "Oh My God, Trinity Whom I Adore" (see M. Amabel du Coeur de Jésus; bibliography). About Easter 1905 she discovered in St. Paul her vocation, which was the praising of the glory of the Trinity. She twice received the grace of transforming union, first on the Feast of the Ascension (1906), and again a little later.

At 19, reading the Way of Perfection of Teresa of Avila, Elizabeth's attention was drawn to a formula that is the key to the understanding of her interior life and her spiritual doctrine: 'in the heaven of my soul.' Her personal existence came to be spent entirely in the presence of God, where she wanted nothing to distract her or prevent her life from becoming a continuous prayer. She desired to retire within herself and live in the little cell God had built in her heart, in that little corner of herself where she could see him and have the feeling of his presence.

Two steps mark the rapid spiritual ascension of Elizabeth. In the first she appears in great purity of soul, reaching out to the enjoyment of the presence within her of the Three Divine Persons: "I have found my heaven upon earth, for heaven is God, and God is in my soul" (letter to Mme. de Sourdon, June 1902). In the second and more sublime stage she appears passing beyond herself in order to give herself more to the praise of the glory of the Trinity, just as Jesus had no thought but for the glory of the Father: "Since my soul is a heaven wherein I dwell while awaiting the heavenly Jerusalem, this heaven, too, must sing of the glory of the Eternal, nothing but the glory of the Eternal" (Last Retreat, seventh day). The holy soul devoted to the divine indwelling thus became an apostle of the praise of the glory of the Trinity. The indwelling of the Trinity in the soul was the center of her doctrine as it was of her life. At the root of her teaching, as a condition fundamental to all spiritual life, is inner silence, i.e., a withdrawal from all that is created and a stilling even of the soul in the presence of God. All within should be quieted that the soul may hear the Word and be instructed by him. In this silence the contemplative soul finds the fullness of God. The essential acts of this intimacy with the Guest within consist in a continual exercise of faith and love. Love proves itself by these acts and leads to an absolute fidelity to the will of God even in the slightest matters. The supreme model of this divine life is the Word, perfect praise of the glory of the Father, who wishes to prolong in each of us the mystery of his adoration and redemptive immolation. "O my Christ . . . crucified for love, I beseech You to identify my soul with all the movements of Your soul, to immerse me, to possess me wholly and to substitute Yourself for me, so that my life is nothing but a ray beaming out from Your life" (Prayer to the Trinity). Elizabeth saw in the Virgin of the Incarnation all the concentration upon God within her that was her own ideal of holiness. It seemed to her that the attitude of the Virgin during the months between the Annunciation and the Nativity is a model for all interior souls. The issue of this spiritual life is the unceasing praise of the blessed in heaven that is described in the last chapters of Revelations, which became Elizabeth's favorite reading.

This spiritual doctrine concerning what is, in effect, the ultimate unfolding and development of the Christian's baptismal vocation was gathered together in two retreats composed at the end of her life: How to find Heaven upon Earth and the Last Retreat on the Praise of Glory, which she left as a spiritual last testament.

At the age of 22 she displayed the first signs of Addison's disease, which led to her death at 26. Her last words: "I go to the light, to love, to life." She was beatified on Nov. 25, 1984 by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: Nov. 8 (Carmelites).

Bibliography: Works by St. Elizabeth: The Archives of the Dijon Carmel contain nearly all her original writings. Souvenirs

(Dijon 1909); Eng., The "Praise of Glory:" Reminiscences . . . (London 1913; repr. Westminster, Md. 1962); Spiritual Writings, ed. M. M. PHILIPON, tr. MOTHER ST. AUGUSTINE OF THE SACRED HEART (New York 1962). Complete Works of Elizabeth of the Trinity, Major Spiritual Writings, v. 1, tr. A. KANE (repr. Washington, DC 1996); Letters From Carmel, v. 2, tr. A. E. NASH (San Diego 1984); Light Love Life: A Look at a Face and a Heart, ed. C. DE MEESTER, tr. A. KANE (Washington 1987). Literature. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 79 (1987): 1268-73. L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 50 (1984). 12, 2. AMABEL DU CŒUR DE JÉSUS, The Doctrine of the Divine Indwelling: A Commentary on the Prayer of Sister Elizabeth of the Trinity (Westminster, Md. 1950); À la lumiére, à l'amour, à la vie (Paris 1933). H. U. VON BALTHASAR, Elizabeth of Dijon, An Interpretation of Her Spiritual Mission, tr. A. V. LITTLEDALE (New York 1956); Two Sisters in the Spirit: Thérèse of Lisieux & Elizabeth of the Trinity, tr. D. MARTIN (Fort Collins, Col.: Ignatius, 1997). L. BOUYER, Women Mystics: Hadewijch of Antwerp, Teresa of Avila, Thérèse of Lisieux, Elizabeth of the Trinity, Edith Stein, tr. A. E. NASH (Fort Collins, Col. 1993), 155-72. L. BORRIELLO, The Spiritual Doctrine of Blessed Elizabeth of the Trinity: Apostolic Contemplative, tr. J. AUMANN (Staten Island, N.Y. 1986). P. M. FÉVOTTE, Aimer la Bible avec Elisabeth de la Trinité (Paris 1991); Virginité, chemin d'amour: à l'école d'Elizabeth de la Trinité (Paris 1993). J. MOORCROFT, He Is My Heaven (Washington, D.C. 2001). M. M. PHILIPON, The Spiritual Doctrine of Sister Elizabeth of the Trinity (Westminster, Md. 1947). J. RÉMY, Ce que croyait Elisabeth de la Trinité (Paris 1984). E. VANDEUR, Trinity Whom I Adore: Prayer of Sister Elizabeth of the Trinity (New York 1953); Pledge of Glory; Meditations on the Eucharist and the Trinity (Westminster, Md. 1958).

[M. M. PHILIPON]

ELIZALDE, MIGUEL DE

Jesuit theologian; b. Echalar, Navarre, 1616; d. San Sebastián, Nov. 18, 1678. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1635, and later taught theology and philosophy at Valladolid, Salamanca, and Rome, and for a time was rector of the Jesuit college at Naples. In his Forma verae religionis quaerendae et inveniendae (Naples 1662) he ranked himself among the few 17th-century theologians who favored a more rationalistic apologetic, claiming that strict proof of the fact of revelation was possible. This idea was coldly received at the time but took better root in the 19th century and won wide acceptance. But Elizalde is better known for his attack upon PROBABILISM. Without the approval of his religious superiors and in defiance of the criticism and advice of the revisers of the society, he published his De recta doctrina morum, quatuor libris distincta, quibus accessit: De natura opinionis under the anagrammatic pseudonym of Antonio Celladei (Lyons 1670). A second and enlarged edition was published posthumously (Fribourg 1684). Elizalde's own moral system is described as PROBABILIORISM, but it could perhaps be better classified as TUTIORISM. On certain points he verged toward Baianist and Jansenist doctrine.

Bibliography: C. SOMMERVOGEL et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus (Brussels-Paris 1890–32) 3:281–383. I. VON DÖLLINGER and F. H. REUSCH, Geschichte der Moralstreitigkeiten in der römischkatholischen Kirche seit dem sechzehnten Jahrhundert, 2 v. (Munich 1889) 1:51–56, 141–144, 157, 203, 206; 2:23–45, 47–48.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

ELLARD, GERALD

Liturgist; b. Commonwealth, Wis., Oct. 8, 1894; d. Boston, Mass., April 1, 1963. Gerald was the second of four children born to Hugh Ellard and Margaret Fitzgerald, all four of whom became religious; he followed his older brother, Augustine, into the Society of Jesus, July 27, 1912. In 1925 while studying theology at St. Louis University he met Martin Hellriegel and Virgil MICHEL, and the resulting friendship influenced his determination to do graduate studies in liturgy. He was ordained on June 16, 1926, and began his doctoral studies in the history of liturgy at the University of Munich in 1928. His doctoral dissertation, Ordination Anointings in the Western Church before 1000 A.D. (Cambridge, Mass. 1933), was acclaimed as the first scholarly work by a citizen of the United States in the field of liturgy. Research for this work resulted in the publication of another book, Master Alcuin, Liturgist (Chicago 1956). While professor of liturgy and Church history at St. Mary's College, St. Marys, Kans. (1932-63), he continued to write and lecture. His most influential work was a textbook for college students, Christian Life and Worship (Milwaukee 1933). Other important works were Men at Work and Worship (New York 1940), Mass of the Future (Milwaukee 1948), which was revised and published as Mass in Transition (Milwaukee 1956). He also contributed numerous articles to Orate Fratres, later known as Worship, of which he was one of the original associate editors.

A charter member of the Liturgical Conference, he served on the board of directors until 1956, and delivered papers at many Liturgical Weeks. He continued to serve the liturgical renewal until his death, which came only a few days after he had given a paper before those gathered at Harvard School of Divinity for a Roman Catholic-Protestant colloquium.

Bibliography: E. A. DIEDERICH, Yearbook of Literary Studies (Chapel Hill, NC) 4 (1963) 3–21.

[E. A. DIEDERICH]

ELLIOTT, WALTER

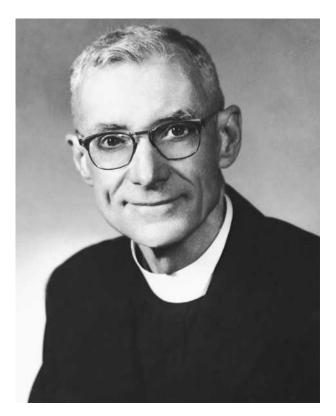

Missionary, author; b. Detroit, Mich., Jan. 6, 1842; d. Washington, D.C., April 18, 1928. He was the ninth child of Robert J. and Frances (O'Shea) Elliott. After attending St. Anne's School, Detroit, and the University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Ind., he began to study law in Cincinnati, Ohio. At the outbreak of the Civil War, he enlisted in the 5th Ohio Infantry, and he fought at Port Republic, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. After the war, he resumed his study of law in Detroit where, after admission to the bar, he opened a law office. When Father Isaac HECKER lectured there in May 1868, Elliott was in the audience. Three months later he joined the PAULISTS; he was ordained on May 25, 1872, and began his missionary career, which continued with few interruptions for more than 25 years. An effective preacher, he also became a leader in the temperance crusade and was actively identified with the Catholic Total Abstinence Union.

In 1886 he temporarily left mission work to become Hecker's companion during his declining years. At Abp. John J. KEANE's suggestion, Elliott recorded his conversations with Hecker, using them for a biography of Hecker, which first appeared serially in 1890–91 in the Catholic World (v. 51–53). In 1891 it was published in book form as The Life of Father Hecker. A French translation and adaptation appeared in 1897 and figured largely in the AMERICANISM controversy.

In 1893 Elliott inaugurated, on a national scale, missions to non-Catholics, organizing for that purpose diocesan mission bands in the dioceses of New York; Cleveland, Ohio; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Hartford, Conn.; and Providence, R.I. To aid the missionaries financially and to disseminate Catholic literature, he and Alexander P. Doyle, CSP, founded the Catholic Missionary Union and the Missionary magazine. Elliott also raised funds for the establishment of the Apostolic Mission House, a training center for mission work on the campus of The Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C., and became its first rector in 1902. Except for the years from 1909 to 1912 when he served as general consultor of the Paulist community in New York City, he spent the remainder of his life at the Mission House as rector, professor, and staff writer for the Missionary. His published works include Missions to Non-Catholics (New York 1893), The Life of Christ (New York 1902), Jesus Crucified (New York 1906), Parish Sermons (New York 1913), The Spiritual Life (New York 1914), Manual of Missions (Washington 1922), A Retreat for Priests (Washington 1924), A Retreat for Nuns (Washington 1925), Mission Sermons (Washington 1926), and a translation from the German of The Sermons of John Tauler (Washington 1910).

Bibliography: Apart from a short sketch of 17 pages in J. MCSORLEY, Father Hecker and His Friends (2d ed. St. Louis 1953), there is no published life of Father Elliott. His papers and correspondence are in the Paulist Fathers Archives, New York City.

[V. HOLDEN]

Gerald Ellard.

ELLIS, JOHN TRACY

Priest, pre-eminent historian of the American Catholic community, teacher, writer; b. Seneca, Ill., July 30, 1905; d. Washington, D.C., Oct. 16, 1992. The eldest of two sons of Elmer L. Ellis and Ida Cecilia (née Murphy), Ellis' father owned the local hardware store and was Methodist, his mother was a housewife and Catholic; his brother Norbert (1913–53) continued the family business.

Ellis' early training was local: at St. Patrick's Elementary School (1911–19); Seneca High School (1919–21), and at St. Viator Academy (1921–23) in Bourbonnais, Ill. In 1927 he graduated magna cum laude from St. Viator College with a B.A. in English literature. Recipient of a Knights of Columbus Fellowship, he attended The Catholic University of America (1927–30) where he studied under Peter GUILDAY, majoring in medieval history. His master's thesis "Anti-Papal Legislation in Medieval England 1066–1377" (1928) was expanded into his doctoral dissertation and published as his first book (1930). In the spring term of 1942, Ellis audited courses in American history at Harvard University as part of his preparations to teach American Catholic history.

His first teaching post was at his alma mater St. Viator College (1930–32) where as a layman he taught history. The next two years (1932-34) found him at the College of St. Teresa in Winona, Minn. He returned to Washington, D.C., to study for the priesthood and during this period began his long and fruitful career teaching at The Catholic University of America (1935–64). From 1964 to 1976 he was Professor of Church History at the University of San Francisco. He returned to the Catholic University as Professorial Lecturer in church history (1976-89). He taught summer school at Catholic institutions of learning throughout the United States, and held numerous lectureships: e.g., University of Chicago as Walgreen lecturer (1955), North American College in Rome (1967, 1974–76), Brown University (1967), University of Notre Dame (1970), Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley (1970-71), Gregorian University (1974-75), St. Thomas University-Angelicum (1976), and The Catholic University of America as the first Catholic Daughters of the Americas' visiting professor (1976).

Writings and Influence. A prolific writer, Ellis has published over 150 books, articles, and pamphlets, and over 250 minor works such as book reviews, forewords to books, encyclopedia articles, obituary notices, letters to editors, and reports as secretary of the American Catholic Historical Association. In addition, the archives of The Catholic University of America contain over 100 of his unpublished sermons, commencement addresses, and interviews. A dozen or so books constitute his principal writings. The first three reflect his movement from medieval [Anti-Papal Legislation in Medieval England [1066–1377] (1930)], to modern European [Cardinal Consalvi and Anglo-Papal Relations, [1814–1824] (1942)], to American church history [The Formative Years of The Catholic University of America (1946)]. These were followed by his major work in two volumes based on over three years of extensive archival research The Life of James Cardinal Gibbons Archbishop of Baltimore, 1834-1921 (1952), which was reissued in a condensed version in 1963 and reprinted in 1987. His survey of the history of the Catholic Church in America that originated in the Walgreen Lectures, American Catholicism (1956), was revised in 1969 and has remained for many years one of the principal textbooks in its field. Ellis' admiration for John Lancaster Spalding, bishop of his native diocese, that had earlier led him to write a book on the founding of The Catholic University of America in which this bishop played a significant role, later resulted in a study of this bishop's educational views: John Lancaster Spalding: First Bishop of Peoria, American Educator (1961). A collection of about 20 essays on historical and educational themes was published as Perspectives in American Catholicism (1963). A projected multivolume history of the Catholic Church in America never progressed beyond Catholics in Colonial America (1965). His life-long interest in priestly formation resulted in two major studies: Essays in Seminary Education (1967) and a lengthy article in his edited volume The Catholic Priest in the United States: Historical Investigations (1971). As important aids to scholars he published A Select Bibliography of the History of the Catholic Church in the United States (1947) which was revised as A Guide to American Catholic History (1959), and once again revised with Robert Trisco and republished in 1982. Ellis' other major study tool was his Documents of American Catholic History (1956), revised in 1962, expanded to two volumes in 1967, and to three in 1987.

Ellis' approach to the writing of church history followed no set method or school of interpretation. His predilection, however, was for biography, for organizing his accounts of the past around the life of a prominent churchman. Although never the subject of one of his own biographies, John Henry Cardinal Newman was a major source of inspiration to him over the years and he strove to imitate the power and beauty of his prose and his total dedication to truth. Ellis' Commitment to Truth (1966) set forth eloquently his own ideals of honesty and integrity. His insistence on including in his accounts the historically relevant faults and mistakes of churchmen won Ellis both admirers and critics.

Ellis' influence on the field of American church history was also exercised through his teaching. For over 30 years he guided the work of doctoral students at The Catholic University of America. At least a dozen of these have gone on to publish important books in the field of American Catholic history.

By his numerous sermons, public addresses, essays, interviews, and letters to the editor, Ellis gained stature as one of the principal spokesmen of the Catholic community in America. The most important of these addresses was his "American Catholics and the Intellectual Life" (1955) which had a wide circulation and stirred at times a heated debate over the extent and reasons why the American Catholic community has produced so few intellectuals.

Priestly Career. Simultaneous with this academic career was Ellis' life as a priest. In 1934 he joined the Diocese of Winona and began his studies for the priesthood at the Sulpician Seminary (now Theological College) in Washington, D.C. On June 5, 1938, Bishop Francis M. Kelly ordained him a priest at the College of St. Teresa in Winona. On returning to Washington he took up residence (1938–41) in the home of Msgr. Fulton J. SHEEN whom he had served previously as personal secretary. In 1947 he became the first priest incardinated into the newly-formed Archdiocese of Washington. On December 5, 1955, he was named a domestic prelate of Pope Pius XII. Over the years he has assisted nearby parishes or the cathedral on weekends and gained a reputation as an eloquent preacher. Although invited by Robert E. Tracy, Bishop of Baton Rouge, to serve as peritus at the Second Vatican Council, he declined. Ellis served the National Conference of Catholic Bishops as chairman of the Sub-committee on History of the Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry (1967-71) and as a member of the Sub-committee on History for the Observance of the Bicentennial (1973–76). In 1988 he was named honorary protonotary apostolic by John Paul II. James Cardinal Hickey presided at his funeral Mass in the National Shrine on Oct. 20, 1992, and Msgr. Thomas Duffy preached the sermon "A Priestly Ministry to the Truth." Ellis was buried in Seneca, Illinois. His rare combination of frankness, courtesy, and deep dedication to the Church helped to make him a personal friend and advisor to many prelates.

Bibliography: For a comprehensive bibliography of Ellis' works (1923-85) see M. A. MILLER, Studies in Catholic History in Honor of John Tracy Ellis, eds. N. H. MINNICH, et al. (Wilmington, Del. 1985) 674-738. Life and career. J. T. ELLIS, Faith and Learning: A Church Historian's Story (Lanham, Md. 1988); "Reflections of an Ex-Editor," Catholic Historical Review 50 (1965) 459-474; "Fragments from My Autobiography, 1905-1942," Review of Politics 36 (1974) 565-591; "The Catholic University of America, 1927-1979: A Personal Memoir," Social Thought 5 (1979) 35-62; Catholic Bishops: A Memoir (Wilmington, Del. 1984). E. C. BIANCHI, "A Church Historian's Personal Story: An Interview with Monsignor John Tracy Ellis," Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia 92 (1981) 1-42. G. E. SHERRY, interviews with Ellis, Our Sunday Visitor 72 (Feb. 5, 1984), 4-5; 76 (May 3, 1987) 8-9. G. G. HIGGINS, "John Tracy Ellis, RIP: A Well-Ordered Life," Commonweal 119 (Nov. 6, 1992) 5-7. T. J. SHELLEY, "In Memoriam: John Tracy Ellis (1905-1992)," America 167 (Nov. 7, 1992), 340; "The Young John Tracy Ellis and American Catholic Intellectual Life," U.S. Catholic Historian 13 (1995) 1-18. Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia 104 (1993) 1-18. Historical method. J. D. THOMAS, "A Century of American Catholic History," U. S. Catholic Historian 6 (1987) 25-49, especially "Eclectic Church History: John Tracy Ellis," 41-48. J. T. ELLIS, A Commitment to Truth (Latrobe, Penn. 1966); "The Ecclesiastical Historian in the Services of Clio," Church History 38 (1969) 106-120. Current state of American Catholic intellectual life. D. LIPTAK and T. WALCH, "'American Catholics and the Intellectual Life': An Interview with Monsignor John Tracy Ellis," U. S. Catholic Historian 4 (1985) 188–194. H. W. BOWDEN, Church History in an Age of Uncertainty: Historiographical Patterns in the United States, 1906-1990 (Carbondale, Ill. 1991).

[N. H. MINNICH]

ELLIS, PHILIP (MICHAEL)

Benedictine monk of St. Gregory's, Douay, and zealous vicar apostolic of the (English) Western District; b.

Waddesdon, Bucks., 1652; d. Segni, Italy, Nov. 16, 1726. As the third son of Rev. John Ellis, he was brought up a Protestant but became a Catholic while a boy at Westminster School. He was known at school and throughout life as "Jolly Phil." He smuggled himself across the English Channel, and entered the Benedictine monastery at Douay, where he was professed on Nov. 30, 1670. One of his brothers was the Protestant bishop of Meath, and another, secretary of state to William III. Later Ellis became chaplain to James II, and was consecrated bishop of Aureliopolis in partibus on May 6, 1688, in the chapel of St. James's Palace (then a Benedictine monastery). At the fall of the monarchy, he was imprisoned in Newgate Prison. On his release he went to Rome, was befriended by the Dominican Cardinal Philip Thomas HOWARD, and made assistant prelate at the pontifical throne by Innocent XII. He resigned his vicariate and was made bishop of Segni in 1705 by Clement XI. He labored zealously for his new diocese, founded a seminary there, and held a synod in 1710.

Bibliography: J. GILLOW, A Literary and Biographical History or Bibliographical Dictionary of the English Catholics from 1534 to the Present Time 2:161–164. B. HEMPHILL (pseud. for B. WHELAN), The Early Vicars Apostolic of England, 1685–1750 (London 1954) 20–21. G. OLIVER, Collections Illustrating the History of the Catholic Religion in the Countries of Cornwall, Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Wilts, and Gloucester (London 1857). A. À WOOD, Athenae Oxonienses, 5 v. (London 1817) 3: 710–711. G. A. ELLIS, The Ellis Correspondence, 1686–88, 2 v. (London 1829). N. LUTTRELL, A Brief Historical Relation of State Affairs from September, 1678 to April, 1714, 6 v. (Oxford 1857). G. PANZANI, Memoirs, tr. J. BERINGTON (Birmingham 1793). J. A. WILLIAMS, "Bishops Giffard and Ellis and the Western Vicariate, 1688–1715," Journal of Ecclesiastical History 15 (1964) 218–228.

[B. WHELAN]

ELLUL, JACQUES

Theologian, historian, sociologist, b. Bordeaux, France, Jan. 6, 1912; d. May 29, 1994. Growing up on the docks of Bordeaux, Ellul became a Marxist at age 19, and then at age 22 he converted to Christianity without ever quite letting go of Marxist thought. Ellul was dismissed from his teaching post at the University of Strasbourg by the Vichy government and participated in the French resistance during World War II and the National Liberation Movement in 1944. After the war he served as deputy mayor of Bordeaux and after 1958 devoted much of his energy to working with juvenile delinquents in order to help them be "positively non-adjusted" to society. In the 70s and 80s Ellul also became actively engaged in the ecological movement in France and in related issues concerning the use of nuclear energy. Ellul not only wrote a Christian ethic for a technological civilization, he lived it, leaving a rich legacy of word and deed. One of the major Protestant theologians of the 20th century, his primary contribution was to help Christians rethink the meaning of the Gospel for a technological civilization.

Professional Career. Ellul is unusual in that professionally he was not only a theologian, but also an historian and sociologist. He served as professor of law and of the sociology and history of institutions at the University of Bordeaux in France from 1946 until his retirement in 1980. Following in the tradition of Kierkegaard and Karl BARTH, Ellul was one of the leading theologians of the Reformed Church in France. Of the more than 40 books he wrote during his lifetime, approximately half of them were sociological and historical works critically analyzing the impact of modern technological civilization on human life. The other half of his work was a theological response to the issues raised by his critical analysis of modern technology.

Ellul insisted on keeping these two sides of his work separate, so that one reading his sociological works would scarcely have a clue that he was also a theologian. In his theological writing Ellul was deeply influenced by Barth without being an orthodox Barthian, and in his sociological work he was deeply influenced by Karl MARX without being an orthodox Marxist. Ellul described his situation as one of being drawn to both the Gospel and to Marx without ever being able to reconcile the two. Out of that creative tension emerged one of the most thorough and significant Christian theological and ethical critiques of technological civilization in the 20th century.

Scholarly Works. On the sociological side his most important works were The Technological Society (1954, English translation [ET] 1964), Propaganda (1962, ET 1965), The Political Illusion, (1965, ET 1967) and The New Demons (1973, ET 1975). His argument in The Technological Society was later updated in The Technological System (1977, ET 1980) and again in The Technological Bluff (1988, ET 1990). On the theological side of his work Ellul responded to the issues raised by his sociological studies in key theological works on the contemporary meaning of various books of scripture. His response to The Technological Society was The Meaning of the City (1975, ET 1970); to The Political Illusion it was The Politics of God and the Politics of Man (1966, ET 1972); to Propaganda it was The Judgment of Jonah (1952, ET 1971); and to The New Demons it was Apocalypse, the Book of Revelation (1976, ET 1977). In addition to these scriptural commentaries Ellul wrote a series of theological critiques of life in modern technological civilization, including The Presence of the Kingdom (1948, ET 1967), Hope in Time of Abandonment (1972, ET 1973), and The Ethics of Freedom (1975 and 1984, ET 1976).

The key to understanding Ellul's complex life work at the interface between sociology and theology is his book, The New Demons. This is Ellul's masterful work on the sociology of religion in modern technological civilization. What distinguishes it is the thesis that in modern technological civilization, the sociology of religion and the sociology of technology have one and the same subject matter. This is so, he argues, because the sacred that was once embodied in the order of nature is now embodied in the technological order. That is, while human beings once believed that nature was that power that governed their destiny and so treated it with religious awe and subservience, now it is technology that elicits such awe and subservience from human beings.

Technology is out of control, Ellul argues, because human beings have engaged in a religious surrender of their freedom to its demands on the conviction (whether conscious or unconscious) that it offers them their best hope of salvation. The contemporary theological task is to do for a civilization dominated by the myths of technology what Christianity once did for ancient civilizations dominated by the myths of nature: to desacralize its sacred order in the name of the Holy. While the sacred sacralizes the technological order of this world, hope in the Holy One, who is Wholly Other than this world, leads to the desacralization, liberation, and humanization of our technological civilization. Ellul's theological view was also distinctive for his vigorous advocacy of universal salvation, namely, the view that in Christ God brought reconciliation and salvation to the whole human race, not just to believers. At the time of his death he left behind him not only a rich legacy of writings but the witness of an extraordinary life.

Bibliography: Jacques Ellul's works in sociology include: The Technological Society (New York 1964); Propaganda (New York 1965); The Political Illusion (New York 1967); The New Demons (New York 1975); The Technological System (New York 1980); The Technological Bluff (Grand Rapids 1990). Those in theology include: The Presence of the Kingdom (New York 1967); The Judgment of Jonah (Grand Rapids 1971); The Politics of God and the Politics of Man (Grand Rapids 1972); The Meaning of the City (Grand Rapids 1970); Hope in Time of Abandonment (New York 1973); The Ethics of Freedom (Grand Rapids 1976); Apocalypse the Book of Revelation (New York 1977). The following are works on Ellul: D. B. CLENDENIN, Theological Method in Jacques Ellul (Lanham 1987). D. J. FASCHING, The Thought of Jacques Ellul (New York and Toronto 1981). D. GILL, The Word of God in the Ethics of Jacques Ellul (Metuchen, NJ and London 1984). J. M. HANKS, Jacques Ellul: A Comprehensive Bibliography (Greenwich 1984).

[D. J. FASCHING]

ELLWANGEN, ABBEY OF

Former BENEDICTINE monastery and later a collegiate church, at Ellwangen, Württemberg, Germany, in the former Diocese of Augsburg, currently the Diocese of Rottenburg. The abbey's patrons have been Our Savior, Mary, perhaps Peter and Paul; Sulpicius and Servilianus, whose relics were translated there from Rome between 772 and 795; and Vitus, certainly since 1147. It was founded c. 750—according to tradition, specifically in 764-for the purpose of supporting the Carolingian Franks against the Bavarians, celebrating the divine services, and clearing the local forest. The legendary Vita Hariolfi (841-851) by ERMENRICH OF PASSAU states that the abbey's founders were two brothers, Bp. Hariolf and Bp. Erlolf of Langres; according to other sources, Erlolf and Hariolf were the same person. However, there appears to be some connection between the abbey and Langres, for both have the same coat of arms. In 817 it was made an imperial abbey; in 979 Ellwangen was taken under papal protection; and in 1215 the abbot was made a prince of the empire. The abbey became embroiled in a war with the local town, which Abbot Rudolph burned to the ground in 1255. First the counts of Oettingen, then from 1370 on, the counts of Württemberg served as lay patrons. In the 15th century deteriorating discipline, bad administration, and a fire (1443) prompted the religious to convert the abbey-with papal approval-into an exempt collegiate church (1460) of secular priests with a prince prior, 12 canons (all of the nobility), and 10 vicars. The dean of the chapter was mitered in 1784. During the Reformation, the prior, Cardinal Otto TRUCHSESS VON WALDBURG (1552-73), called in Peter CANISIUS, and thus Ellwangen remained Catholic. In 1611 a Jesuit house was established there; its college with Gymnasium was built (1721–23), and its church (1724–29), now Lutheran, was decorated by Scheffler.

Ellwangen's Marian shrine church on the Schönenberg was constructed under Bl. Philipp JENINGEN's supervision (1682-86); in 1709 it was destroyed by fire and was rebuilt. A seminary was built there in 1747, but was dissolved in 1798; today the site is held by the Redemptorists. In the secularization of 1802-03, all Ellwangen holdings went to the state of Württemberg, and the collegiate church was dissolved. Ellwangen's jurisdiction over the Catholics of Württemberg (1812–17) and its seminary moved to the new diocesan seat at Rottenburg; the theological school founded at Ellwangen in 1812 became part of the University of TÜBINGEN. The old abbey church (consecrated in 1233) was the prototype of Worms cathedral; it now shows the effect of baroque remodeling in the 17th and 18th centuries. Excavations on the site since 1959 have uncovered a pre-Romanesque reliquary.

Bibliography: L. H. COTTINEAU, Répertoire topobibliographique des abbayes et prieurés, 2 v. (Mâcon 1935–39) 1:1042–43. P. SCHMITZ, Histoire de l'ordre de saint Benoît, 7 v. (Maredsous 1942–56). K. HALLINGER, Gorze-Kluny, 2 v. (Studia anselmiana 22–25; 1950–51). W. SCHWARZ, "Studien zur ältesten Geschichte des Benediktinerklosters Ellwangen" in Zeitschrift für württembergische Landesgeschichte 11 (1952) 7–38. B. BUSHART, Die Stiftskirche in Ellwangen (Munich 1953). H. PFEIFER, Verfassungs-und Verwaltungsgeschichte der Fürstpropstei Ellwangen (Stuttgart 1959). E. H. FISCHER, "Zur kirchlichen Verfassung des Ellwanger Stifts" in Ellwanger Jahrbuch 17 (1956–57) 63–84. W. FINK, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 15:242–246. V. BURR, ed., Ellwangen 764–1964, 2 v. (Ellwangen 1964).

[G. SPAHR]

ELMO, ST.

Legendary martyr, also known as Erasmus, Rasmus, Ermo. He is probably identified with Erasmus who since the 13th or 14th century has been venerated as one of the FOURTEEN HOLY HELPERS. He is reputed to have been the bishop of Formia in the Campagna, and GREGORY THE GREAT stated that his relics were preserved in the cathedral of that town. When Formia was destroyed by the Saracens in 842, Elmo's remains were moved to Gaëta, where he became patron of that city. Nothing else in the fabulous tales told of St. Elmo has any basis in reality; e.g., that he was the bishop of Antioch who underwent many tortures in DIOCLETIAN's persecution and died after being miraculously transported to Italy. As one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers he finally became a patron against cramps, colic, and all intestinal troubles, and even of women in labor. In Mediterranean countries he became the protector of sailors, and among Neapolitan sailors, the electrical discharges seen around mastheads before and after storms were called ST. ELMO'S FIRE.

Feast: June 2.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 1:206–214. O. ENGELS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d. new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:955. R. FLAHAUT, S. Érasme (Paris 1895). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, rev. ed. H. THURS-TON and D. ATTWATER, 4 v. (New York 1956) 2:453–454.

[L. L. RUMMEL]

ELOHIM

The divine name ($\check{E}l\bar{o}h\hat{n}m$) most frequently used in the Old Testament, a plural form of Eloah, which appears only in poetical books (34 of the 57 times in Job alone). The form Elohim, when used of the God of Israel, is a plural of majesty, signifying the one God who embodies in Himself all the qualities of divinity, and is almost always accompanied by singular verbs and adjectives. Elohim is used also for other gods in general (Ex 18.11; Dt 10.17) and for particular gods, e.g., Chamos, god of the Moabites (Jgs 11.24); the goddess ASTARTE of the Sidonians (1 Kgs 11.5); BEELZEBUB, god of Accaron (2 Kgs 1.2). It is used also for the ghost of Samuel (1 Sm 28.13), for Moses (Ex 4.16; 7.1), for the King [Ps 44(45).7], for angels [Ps 8.6; 28(29).1; Jb 1.6; Gn 6.1–4; etc.], for princes and judges [Ps 57(58).2; 81(82).6; cf. Jn 10.34], and for David's dynasty and the Messiah (Za 12.8; Is 9.5).

That Elohim was not a particularly Hebrew name for God is indicated by its appearance in Phoenicia long before its use by the Israelites; both the Amarna Letters and the texts found at UGARIT, where it is sometimes construed with a singular verb referring to the supreme god as representative of all the gods of the pantheon, provide instances of its earlier use. The Israelites, however, used Elohim for their one and only God, who excludes all other genuine deities. He is seen as the creator God endowed with all-embracing power, the ruler of absolute will. YAHWEH, the God of Israel, is the only God, and there is no other (Dt 4.35; 6.4; Is 46.9).

Bibliography: W. EICHRODT, Theology of the Old Testament, tr. J. A. BAKER (London 1961–). P. VAN IMSCHOOT, Théologie de l'Ancien Testament, 2 v. (Tournai 1954–56).

[R. T. A. MURPHY]

ELOHIST

Name (abbreviated E) given to a certain narrative and legal tradition identifiable in the Pentateuch. It was preserved among the tribes more closely associated with the Exodus and events at Mt. Sinai and developed by them in the northern part of Canaan where they settled. It was given its definitive form about the middle of the eighth century B.C. After 721 B.C. it was conflated with the YAHWIST (J) document in the South. E suffered in this conflation so that it now appears mainly as a supplementary narrative. Its character as an originally independent source, especially in Genesis, was once seriously questioned, but is now generally accepted. E's history, as preserved in the canonical Pentateuch, begins with Abraham (traces perhaps in Genesis ch. 15), continues with the rest of the patriarchs and the story of the Exodus, Sinai covenant, and the wandering in the desert. It carefully uses the name ELOHIM for God (whence its name) in the pre-Sinai narratives (e.g., Ex 3.11-14). Its vocabulary, style, and especially its theological outlook are distinctive. The last includes a concern for the covenant and its stipulations, a resulting stricter morality, a tendency to avoid anthropomorphisms, and an emphasis on an idealized desert existence.

[E. H. MALY]

EL PASO, DIOCESE OF

Suffragan of the Metropolitan See of San Antonio, the Diocese of El Paso (Elpasensis) comprises the counties of El Paso, Brewster, Culberson, Hudspeth, Jeff Davis, Loving, Presidio, Reeves, Ward, and Winkler, covering 33,817 square miles in West Texas. It was erected on March 3, 1914, and originally also included 30,617 square miles of southern New Mexico that was separated and designated as the Diocese of Los Cruces in 1982. Approximately 77 percent of the total population were of Hispanic origin. Total Catholic population is estimated to be about 76 percent of the total population.

Diocesan Development. Earliest settlements in this diocese date from 1682, with the Spanish land grant to Tigua Native Americans for the Ysleta Mission and to Piro Native Americans for the Socorro Mission. These two Missions were built following the Spanish government retreat to present day Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, from its northern New Mexico capital of Santa Fe at the time of the Pueblo Rebellion in the year 1680. With the coming of the railroads in the 1880's the population grew rapidly, necessitating the construction of many new churches under the supervision of Rev. Carlos Pinto, SJ, and other Italian Jesuits serving the El Paso area.

Guided by Bishops Anthony J. Schuler, SJ (1915–1942), Sidney M. Metzger (1942–1978), Patricio F. Flores (1978–1979), Raymundo J. Peña (1980–1995) and Armando X. Ochoa (appointed 1996), the Diocese of El Paso has sought to meet the challenges arising from its location on the United States–Mexico border.

The persecution of the Church in Mexico in the early 20th century caused the flight of thousands of Mexican Catholics to the United States. The attempt by Bishop Schuler to harbor numerous priests and religious (among whom was Blessed Miguel Augustin Pro, SJ) led to the near-bankruptcy of the diocese in the 1930s. From the 1940s through the 1970s, Bishop Metzger fought successfully for the rights of miners and garment industry workers. Bishop Peña continued Catholic leadership in social issues on the International Border by his concern for the plight of undocumented immigrants, eventually calling for a "middle ground" in the 1994 INS blockade against undocumented immigrants working at low-paying jobs in El Paso.

Many challenges continue to surface in this multicultural, bilingual diocese. To meet these needs, the diocese has devised many strategies and programs, among which are the Tepeyac Institute for ministry training, and a professionally staffed Diocesan Refugee and Migrant Services Office. The El Paso Interreligious Sponsoring Organization (EPISO), with predominantly Catholic support, has launched many successful social, health, and educational initiatives. The Diocesan Office of Peace and Justice promotes Catholic Social teaching and conducts ongoing research into social and environmental issues affecting the border area.

Diocesan offices for Youth Ministry, Marriage and Family Life, Prison and Hospital Ministry, Religious Education, Reverence for Life, Catholic Counseling Services, and a bi-lingual diocesan newspaper (Rio Grande Catholic) also contribute to the spiritual and moral wellbeing of the Church in west Texas. A full-time priest vocation director seeks to deal with the ever growing need for bilingual priests.

In 1999 the diocese began hosting a summer program in Hispanic ministry for seminarians from the Archdiocese of Atlanta. In 2000 this program was expanded to include the academic year. In 2001 the diocese entered a "pact of solidarity" with the dioceses of Choluteca (Honduras) and Brownsville (Texas) as a response to the devastation in Honduras by the 1998 hurricane Mitch. Also, in 2001 the Diocese of El Paso established the Catholic Foundation of El Paso to meet growing financial requirements.

Bibliography: C. E. CASTAÑEDA, Our Catholic Heritage in Texas, 1519–1936, 7 v. (Austin 1936–58).

[G. CARIE]

ELPHINSTONE, WILLIAM

Bishop, chancellor of Scotland, founder of the University of Aberdeen; b. Glasgow, c. 1431; d. Edinburgh, Oct. 25, 1514. Elphinstone graduated (M.A.) from the University of Glasgow in 1462, and later distinguished himself in Canon Law and civil law at Paris and Orléans before returning to Glasgow in 1471. Having been elected rector of the University in 1474, he was appointed senior ecclesiastical judge of Scotland in 1478 and bishop of Ross in 1481, and was transferred to Aberdeen in 1483. A trusted friend of James III, he became chancellor of Scotland in 1488 but was deprived of the office on the king's murder later that year. A skillful diplomat, he negotiated several treaties for the Scottish crown with England, France, and Germany. He founded the University of Aberdeen in 1495, effected a number of important legal and liturgical reforms, and was nominated archbishop of Saint Andrews after the disaster of Flodden in 1513. The most informed, alert, and wisest Scot of his age, he died before his promotion could be ratified.

Bibliography: Hectoris Boetii Murthlacensium et Aberdonensium episcoporum vitae, ed. J. MOIR (Aberdeen 1894). L. MACFARLANE, 'William Elphinstone,'' Aberdeen University ReCapital: San Salvador.
Size: 8,124 sq. miles.
Population: 6,122,515 in 2000.
Languages: Spanish; Nahua is spoken in some regions.
Religions: 5,265,360 Catholics (86%); 857,152 Protestants (14%).
Metropolitan See: San Salvador, with suffragans Chalatenago, Santa Ana, San Miguel, San Vicente, Santiago María, Sonsonate, and Zacateclouca. There is also a military ordinariate located in El Salvador.

view 36 (1956) 225–241; 37 (1958) 253–271; 39 (1961) 1–18; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 3:829.

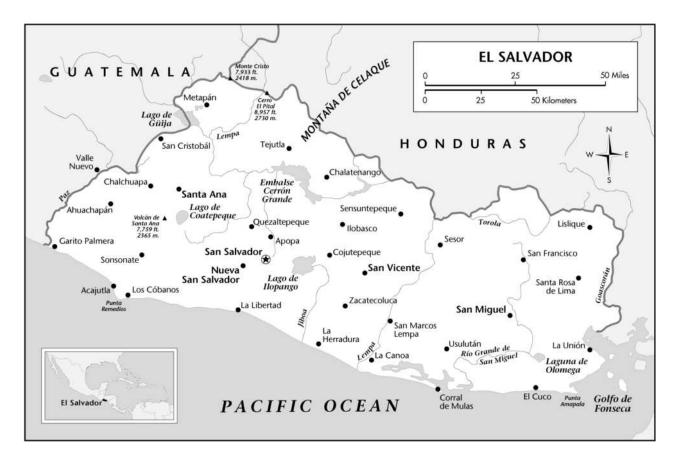

[L. MACFARLANE]

EL SALVADOR, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The territory of El Salvador is bounded on the north by Honduras, on the east by Honduras and the Gulf of Fonseca, on the south by a 160-mile stretch of North Pacific Ocean coastline, and on the west by Guatemala. The most densely populated republic in Central America, El Salvador is also the smallest, containing several volcanic mountain ranges in addition to a plateau region and the narrow coastal region. It is characterized by a tropical climate, frequent earthquakes, and regular volcanic activity. The nation still reflects its heritage as a Spanish colony through its inhabitants, most of whom are mestizo; only five percent have pure native blood.

About 63 percent of Salvadorans are engaged in agriculture, the major production of which includes coffee, sugar, corn, and cotton. Textiles and the production of electricity also figure prominently in El Salvador's economic base. Boasting the most developed highway system in all Central America in the early 20th century, El Salvador continued to be easily navigable despite its mountainous terrain.

Originally inhabited by Maya and Pipil tribes, El Salvador's Custatlán region was discovered and subsequently conquered by Pedro de Alvarado, a lieutenant under Spanish conquistador Hernan Cortéz, in 1523. In April 1525 Alvarado founded the city of San Salvador in the Valle de la Bermuda, naming Diego de Holguín the first governor. De Holguín gradually expanded his domain, and the area now know as El Salvador became a province of the Captaincy General of Guatemala in 1542. Religious sent from Spain to administer to the region's Spanish populations also instituted missionary activities, although many of the natives in the region ultimately died as a result of European-introduced diseases.

The movement for political independence from Spain first took shape in Custatlán in November of 1811; it failed, as would a second rebellion in 1814. Ultimately, however, the Captaincy General of Guatemala declared its own independence from Spain on Sept. 15, 1821, releasing as it did so each of its provinces. The civilian government of El Salvador opposed the immediate annexation of the newly emancipated Central American states to the Mexican empire of Augustín de Iturbide, and when forced to join, threatened to instead seek incorporation in the United States. The formation of the United Provinces of Central America via a constitution approved on Nov. 22, 1824, resolved the situation, as El Salvador and the other four Central American republics formed a federation of their own. That constitution, on the motion of Salvadorean priest Simeón Canãs, also abolished slavery. Due to internal conflicts, the United Provinces dissolved, leaving El Salvador an independent republic in 1839. Battles between liberal and conservative factions within its civilian government stagnated economic development for the next 70 years.

By the early 20th century El Salvador had developed an elite ruling class, the majority of its citizens exploited and forced to work the coffee plantations. In 1932 peasant unrest resulted in an outbreak of violence, called the Matanza, during which 10,000 lost their lives at the hands of the military. Although a series of military coups wrestled political power and attempted to institute social reforms in the country, their efforts were checked by the financial strength of the nation's landowning families.

In the early 1960s the Church supported efforts by the newly formed Christian Democratic party and the United States to encourage economic development in El Salvador by an infusion of aid to encourage business growth. However, by the early 1970s it became clear to Church leadership that such aid did little to help the poor, but instead contributed to the tradition of exploitation. Rising threats from communist sympathizers spurred on by Cuban dictator Fidel Castro, as well as outbreaks of guerilla-type violence from the Marxist militant group Frente Faravundo Marti de Liberación (FMLN) prompted the United States to back a restrictive, authoritarian regime during the 1980s. During over a decade of civil war 75,000 Salvadorans lost their lives, their tragic deaths documented by the San Salvador Archdiocese human rights office, Tutela Legal, despite government opposition.

As the people of El Salvador struggled against poverty and oppression, they found a leader in Oscar ROMERO, installed as archbishop of San Salvador on Feb.

Church in El Salvador. (©Cory Langley)

23, 1977. Like many Catholic leaders, Romero turned to unionization and education of the peasantry as a way out of El Salvador's economic difficulties, believing it would be by such means that the Church would be a force for liberation. He attempted to end the violence of desperate leftist guerillas as well as powerful right-wing military extremist factions, calling on soldiers to lay down their arms. Unfortunately, such tactics threatened the ruling class, and Church organizations were vilified by the media as reforming priests were expelled from the country or assassinated by paramilitary groups bearing such names as the Wind Warriors Union. Handbills appeared proclaiming "Be a Patriot. Kill a Priest!" The violence increased following a bloodless coup by members of the military ostensibly representing Christian Democrat interests on Oct. 15, 1979. During a radio sermon on March 23,1980 Romero reminded soldiers that they were not obligated to obey a law contrary to God's law: "In the Name of God," Romero exhorted, "stop the repression." He was assassinated by a right-wing death squad the next day, as he was offering the sacrifice of the Mass. His funeral procession was met by further violence, as 26 people were killed in gunfire and explosions. On a visit to San Salvador in February 1996, Pope John Paul II would pay homage to the legendary priest and would be presented with a petition requesting Romero's beatification.

Violence against the Church continued into the late 1980s, as priests, nuns, and other religious were systematically killed by right-wing death squads. Fortunately, in 1992 the political situation in El Salvador was defused when guerillas signed a treaty with the pacifist government of President Felix Alfredo Cristiani, ending the era of violence. Aided by such Church leaders as San Salvadoran Archbishop Arturo Rivera Damas, the peace process proved successful, although inclusion of the leftist FMLN resulted in the 1998 introduction of legislation to legalize abortion in the predominately Catholic country. El Salvador continued to operate as a democratic republic under the constitution of Dec. 23, 1983; due to an increase in exports and international financial aid, its economy was in an upturn in 2000.

As El Salvador's government worked to improve the lives of its citizens, it was struck by a series of natural disasters as 1999's Hurricane Mitch was followed two years later by a massive earthquake that left 50,000 families homeless. Church leaders responded in all cases with massive humanitarian aid, and Pope John Paul directed his personal charity, Cor Unum, to send financial aid to the region. During the late 1990s Protestantism began making inroads into this predominately Catholic country. After peace was restored to the region, El Salvador witnessed an increase in missionary activity by the estimated one million Protestant evangelicals entering the country.

Bibliography: F. D. PARKER, The Central American Republics (New York 1964).

[L. LAMADRID/EDS.]

ELVIRA, COUNCIL OF

Elvira, the Roman city of Illiberis in southern Spain, near modern Granada, a bishopric in Roman and Visigothic times, was the site of a synod held either in 300–303 (L. Duchesne) or in 309 (H. Gregoire). Attending were 19 bishops and 26 priests representing 37 separate communities, all but five situated in southern Spain, the exceptions being Saragossa, León, Toledo, Calahorra, and Braga. The five provinces of Galicia, Tarragona, Baetica, Lusitania, and Carthagena also were represented. Bishop Felix of Acci (Guadix) presided, and among the delegates was Bishop Hosius of Córdoba. This is the first known council held in Spain, as well as the first council of which the disciplinary canons have been preserved, providing the first real knowledge of the Church in Spain.

The Council was evidently called to deal with disciplinary rather than doctrinal questions. It sought to combat pagan influences in the rapidly increasing Christian body, both by imposing a series of penalties based on exclusion from the Sacraments, and by reinforcing the rights and powers of the hierarchy. The success it achieved is shown by the reproduction of 14 of its 81 canons in the later Councils of ARLES, NICAEA, and SARDICA.

The council has been accused of rigorism; its canons are certainly severe. Most of them deal with penitential discipline. Lesser faults were punished with deprivation of Communion for one, two, three, five, or even ten years. For certain faults no reconciliation was possible even at the hour of death. These faults included idolatry (cc. 1-3), murder by witchcraft (c. 6), repeated fornication or adultery (cc. 7, 47), divorce (c. 8), procuring (c. 12), marriage with pagan priests (c. 17), incest (c. 66), homosexual rape (c. 71), an accusation responsible for the death of the accused (c. 73), and false accusations of the clergy (c. 75).

Definitive exclusion from the Communion in cases of reiterated major sin existed before the council, but it seems to have extended this penalty to cases when the sin was committed for the first time. This severity appears again in the Council of Saragossa (380); it was mitigated by c. 400. Until then the Church considered that it did not possess authority to forgive certain sins, and abandoned the sinner to God's mercy.

According to the testimony of the canons, in Spain the catechumenate normally lasted two years (c. 42), but could be extended in doubtful cases (cc. 4, 37). Circus charioteers and actors could not become catechumens without giving up their profession (c. 62). The canons mention Baptism and Confirmation (cc. 38, 77) and the indissolubility of marriage (c. 9). They insist on a holy way of life for the clergy, bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons. They are to be carefully selected (cc. 24, 30, 51, 80), are not to immerse themselves in trade (c. 19) or to practice usury (c.20). The purity of their life is stressed (cc. 18, 27). Canon 33 is the oldest legislation enjoining clerical continence in marriage. Canon 53 prohibits one bishop from receiving back into communion a Christian excommunicated by another. Canon 36 prohibits all paintings in churches. This regulation no doubt results from a wish to avoid the appearance of imitating paganism.

Dicing was prohibited since the dice bore images of pagan gods (c. 79). The pagan practice of lighting candles in cemeteries was forbidden (c. 34). Marriage with an ordinary pagan was condemned, but less severely than with Jews or heretics (cc. 15–16). One should not eat with Jews (c. 50), sacrifice with pagans (c. 59), or (ideally) tolerate idols in one's house (c. 41); but a Christian who was killed for public, unprovoked attacks on idols was not thereby a martyr (c. 60). A Christian magistrate was not allowed to take part in church services during his year of office (c. 56). Christians who functioned as pagan priests were more severely disciplined (cc. 2–4, 55).

Bibliography: J. D. MANSI, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 v. (Florence-Venice 1757-98) 2:2–406. Patrologia Latina 84:301–310. A. C. VEGA, ed., España Sagrada, v.56 (Madrid 1957) critical ed.; ibid. v.53–54 (Madrid 1961) discussion. J. VIVES et al., Concilios visigóticos e hispano-romanos (Madrid 1963) 1–15. C. J. VON HEFELE, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux, tr. and continued by H. LECLERCQ, 10 v. in 19 (Paris 1907–38) 1:212–264. G. BARGILLE, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 4.2:2378–97. Z. GARCÍA VILLADA, Historia eclesiástica de España, 3 v. in 5 (Madrid 1929–36) 1:301–325. J. GROTZ, Die Entwicklung des Bussstufenwesens in dervornicänischen Kirche (Freiburg 1955) 414–427. J. GAUDEMET, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–)15:317–347. H. GRÉGOIRE et al., Les Persécutions dans l'Empire romain (Brussels 1950).

[J. N. HILLGARTH]

ELWELL, CLARENCE

Educator, bishop; b. Cleveland, Ohio, Feb. 4, 1904, one of six children of George and Josephine Messer Elwell; d. Columbus, Ohio, Feb. 16, 1973. He grew up in Holy Name Parish, Cleveland, where he attended grade and high school.

After attaining his bachelor's degree at John Carroll University, Elwell attended St. Mary Seminary in Cleveland and then went to the University of Innsbruck, Austria, where he was ordained on March 17, 1929.

From 1929 to 1933, Elwell served as assistant pastor at St. Cecilia Parish in Cleveland. He was then appointed assistant superintendent of diocesan school in Cleveland and in 1934 received his master's degree from Western Reserve University. In 1938, he received his doctorate from Harvard. His doctoral dissertation, "Catholic Religious Education in France 1750–1850," was published in book form by Harvard's Graduate School of Education.

In 1938, Elwell was named director of high schools and academies in Cleveland and in 1946 was appointed diocesan school superintendent. He was named a right reverend monsignor in 1949 and a prothonotary apostolic in 1960. At this time, he also received an honorary doctorate from John Carroll University.

Elwell was named auxiliary bishop of Cleveland on Nov. 7, 1962, and was consecrated in St. John Cathedral on December 21. In February 1966 he was named rector of St. John's Cathedral. In November of that year he was named vicar for Catholic education in Cleveland.

Over the years as superintendent of schools, his range of performance was wide indeed as the following would indicate: he returned the schools to the phonics method of teaching reading; he developed a planned acceleration program for the gifted grade school students; he brought more male teachers into the grade schools; he furthered advanced teacher training through the formation of associations for high school teachers; he greatly expanded the diocesan school board, bringing in numerous professionals, including religious and laymen; he developed numerous textbooks and series, which have spread to many dioceses; he established a diocesan radio station to broadcast to the school system's classrooms; he brought about the $22 million high school building program; he expanded the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine program.

On May 29, 1968, Elwell was named the Eighth Ordinary of the Diocese of Columbus. He stated that in Columbus his objective would be to complete already wellestablished programs. In four years he brought to fruition several religious, educational, charitable, and social programs.

[B. APPLEGATE]

ELY, ANCIENT SEE AND ABBEY OF

In the 8th century Venerable BEDE recorded the main points of the tradition of a Benedictine abbey at Ely (Hist. Eccl. 4.19), and the monk of Ely who wrote the 12thcentury Historia Eliensis amplified Bede's account. Bede noticed the unusual location of Ely in a province of the East Angles surrounded by marshes and the sea, "in the nature of an island." In 649 St. ETHELREDA (Audrey), daughter of Anna, King of the East Angles, received the "Isle of Ely" as a marriage gift from her husband Tonbert, chieftain of the South Gyrwe. After his death she married Egfrid of Northumbria, who allowed her to become a nun. Returning to Ely, she built a double monastery (673) on the west bank of the Ouse (16 miles NNE of Cambridge) and ruled over it until her death (679). Her sister Sexburgh succeeded her as abbess.

Marauding Danes destroyed St. Ethelreda's convent c. 870. A century later, ETHELWOLD, Bishop of Winchester, persuaded King EDGAR to establish at Ely a Benedictine house for men. Edgar's charter of foundation and liberal endowment created the medieval "liberty" of Ely, the territorial base of a quasi-palatine authority enjoyed by subsequent abbots and bishops. This temporal power and responsibility became very significant soon after the Conquest. Ely and the surrounding fenland provided a stronghold for Hereward during his legendmaking resistance (1070) to King WILLIAM I. For almost two centuries thereafter Ely was a bordermarch, a citadel that English kings endeavored to protect-not always successfully-against seizure by an opponent. The search for loyal and experienced administrators led to frequent royal interference in abbatial and episcopal elections at Ely.

In October 1109 the Diocese of Ely was separated from that of Lincoln. The Benedictine monks of the conventual cathedral, numbering about 70 at most, formed the bishop's chapter. Bishop Harvey, translated from BANGOR, first ruled the diocese, which included Cambridgeshire as well as the Isle of Ely. Within the "liberty" of Ely the bishop performed functions comparable to those of a royal sheriff. A remarkable number of the bishops of Ely (for a list of bishops, see P. Gams, Series episcoporum ecclesiae catholicae 188) were appointed to the highest offices in the realm; prior to the 16th-century dissolution, Ely provided eight chancellors and seven royal treasurers.

The cathedral of Ely contains architectural elements representing building styles predominant between 1100 and 1500. The nave and transept are late Norman; the Galilee porch is early English; the lady chapel is in the decorated style and the chantry of Bishop Alcock is an example of perpendicular. The cathedral's most notable feature is a large octagonal tower over the central crossing.

During the bishopric of Thomas Goodrich (1533–54) the monastery at Ely was suppressed (Nov. 18, 1539) and the conventual church transformed into a secular cathedral (1541). Eight prebendaries and the dean thereafter formed the new cathedral chapter. The last Roman Catholic bishop was Thomas Thirlby (1554–59). He was imprisoned by Elizabeth and died in 1570.

Bibliography: THOMAS OF ELY, Liber Eliensis, ed. D. J. STEW-ART (London 1848). Liber Eliensis, ed. E. O. BLAKE (Camden Society, ser. 3, v.92; London 1962). J. BENTHAM, History and Antiquities of the Conventual and Cathedral Church of Ely (2d ed. Norwich, Eng. 1812). The Victoria History of the County of Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely, ed. L. F. SALZMAN et al., 4 v. and index (London 1938–60). E. MILLER, The Abbey and Bishopric of Ely: . . . from the 10th Century to the Early 14th Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1951). D. J. STEWART, On the Architectural History of Ely Cathedral (London 1868). D. KNOWLES and J. K. S. ST. JOSEPH, Monastic Sites from the Air (Cambridge, Eng. 1952).

[A. R. HOGUE]

ELZÉAR OF SABRAN, ST.

Count of Ariano (Benevento), Franciscan tertiary(?); b. Ansouis (Provence), France, 1286; d. Paris, Sept. 27, 1323. He married DELPHINA OF SIGNE (1299 or 1300), and in 1316 they each took a vow of chastity. In 1312 Elzéar fought for Naples against Emperor HENRY VII, and he conquered Ariano in 1313. From 1317 on he was counselor to Duke Charles of Calabria, for whom he went in 1323 as ambassador to Paris. He died there and was buried in the Franciscan habit. His remains were brought to Apt the following year. In 1369 he was canonized by his own godchild Urban V, who published the papal bull only in 1371. His remains were transferred to the cathedral of Apt in 1791. Elzéar was a great apostle of Christian charity.

Feast: Sept. 27.

Bibliography: S. BERNARD, Les époux vierges : Elzéar de Sabran et Delphine de Signe (Paris 1994). P. A. GIANGROSSO, Four Franciscan Saints' Lives : German Texts from Codex Sangallensis 589 (Stuttgart 1987).

[L. HARDICK]

EMANATIONISM

A philosophical and theological form of PANTHEISM, according to which all things emanate or flow forth from God as from a primal source or principle. It is opposed to the doctrine of CREATION and of PARTICIPATION, and also to world-formation and evolutionary theories. Whereas the doctrine of creation maintains that the world was formed from nothing (ex nihilo), emanationism holds that all things (some immediately, others mediately) proceed from the single substance of God, and this by a type of natural necessity and not by a decree of the divine will. Whereas world-formation theories teach that there is some eternal matter or substrate from which the universe was formed, emanationism maintains that everything is contingent, matter included, and that matter itself emanates from the primal source. In most forms of evolutionism the world principle is regarded as itself undergoing transformation and development and as entering into the constitution of the universe; in emanationism, on the other hand, the primal source or principle remains unchanged as everything else proceeds from it. Again, the process of evolution, at least in its totality, is generally regarded as an ascent, a movement upward toward a greater perfection; emanation, however, is a descent, beginning with the infinitely perfect and yielding emanated beings that are increasingly less pure, less perfect, and less divine. The Infinite is postulated as a starting point, instead of being the goal that the universe continually strives to realize.

History. Vague indications of emanationism are found in ancient mythologies and religions, especially those of India, Egypt, and Persia. Thus in the UPANI-SHADS things are said to issue from their eternal principle, as the web, from the spider; the plant, from the earth; and the hair, from the skin. Though these and other expressions may be interpreted in the sense of emanationism, however, they are not sufficiently explicit to serve as a basis for the assertion that such systems of philosophy or religion are emanationistic. The teaching of PHILO JU-DAEUS on this point is not much clearer. His thought was influenced by two distinct currents: Greek philosophy, especially PLATONISM, and JUDAISM. In his effort to reconcile their teachings, he sometimes falls into inconsistencies and it is difficult to ascertain his true position. According to Philo, God, who is infinitely perfect, cannot act on the world immediately but only through powers or forces (δυνάμεις) that are not identical with Him, but proceed from Him. The primitive divine force is the Logos. Whether the Logos is a substance or only an attribute is not clear in his teaching. From the Logos proceeds the Spirit (πνεῦμα), which is a type of WORLD SOUL. Sometimes God is described as the efficient and active cause of the universe, sometimes also as immanent, as the one and the whole ($\epsilon \hat{i} \zeta \kappa \alpha \hat{i} \tau \hat{o} \pi \hat{\alpha} \nu \alpha \dot{\nu} \tau \dot{o} \zeta \dot{\epsilon} \sigma \tau i \nu$).

Neoplatonism. The first clear and systematic expression of emanationism is to be found in the Alexandrian school of NEOPLATONISM. According to PLOTINUS, the most important representative of the school, the first principle of all things is the One. Absolute unity and simplicity is the best expression by which God can be designated. The One is a totally indetermined essence, for any attribute or determination would introduce both limitation and multiplicity. Even intelligence and will cannot belong to this primal reality, for these imply the duality of subject and object, and duality presupposes a higher unity. The One, however, is also described as the First, the Good, the Light, and the Universal Cause. From the One all things proceed; not by creation, which would be an act of the will and therefore incompatible with unity, and not by a spreading of the divine substance, since this would do away with the essential oneness. The One is not all things, but is before all things. Emanation is the process by which all things are derived from the One. The infinite goodness and perfection overflows, as it were; and while remaining within itself and losing nothing of its own perfection, it generates other beings, sending them forth from its own superabundance. Or again, as brightness is produced by the rays of the sun, so everything is a radiation ($\pi\epsilon\rho(\lambda\alpha\mu\psi\iota\varsigma)$) from the Infinite Light. The various emanations form a series, every successive step of which is an image of the preceding one, though inferior to it. The first reality that emanates from the One is the Nous, a pure intelligence, an immanent and changeless thought that effects no activity outside of itself. The Nous is an image of the One and, coming to recognize itself as an image, introduces the first duality, that of subject and object. The Nous includes in itself the intellectual world, or the world of Ideas of PLATO. From the Nous emanates the World Soul, which forms the transition between the world of Ideas and the world of the senses. The World Soul is intelligent, and in this respect similar to the ideal world, but it also tends to realize the Ideas in the material world. It generates particular souls, or rather plastic forces that are the forms of all things. Finally, these souls and their particular forces beget matter, which is of itself indetermined and becomes determined by its union with the forms.

With a few variations in the details, the same essential doctrine of emanation is taught by IAMBLICHUS and PROCLUS. With Plotinus, Iamblichus identifies the One with the Good, but assumes an absolutely first One, which is anterior to the One and is utterly ineffable. From it emanates the One; from the One the intelligible world (Ideas); and from the intelligible world, the intellectual world (thinking beings). According to Proclus, from the One come the unities ($\dot{\epsilon}\nu\dot{\alpha}\delta\epsilon\varsigma$), which alone are related to the world. From the unities emanate the triads of the intelligible essences (being), the intelligible-intellectual essences (life), and the intellectual essences (thought). These again are further differentiated. Matter comes directly from one of the intelligible triads. Gnosticism. The Gnostics taught that from God, the Father, emanated numberless divine, supramundane Aeons, less and less perfect, which, taken all together, constitute the fullness (πλήρωμα) of divine life (see GNO-SIS; GNOSTICISM). Wisdom, the last of these, produced an inferior wisdom named Achamoth and also the psychical and material worlds. To denote the mode according to which an inferior is derived from a superior degree, BASI-LIDES employs the term ἀπόρρια, meaning flowing from, or efflux; and VALENTINUS, the term προβολή, meaning throwing forth or projection.

Christianity. The Fathers of the Church and Christian writers, especially when treating of the divine EXEM-PLARISM or of the relations of the three divine Persons in the Trinity, and sometimes when speaking of the origin of the universe, use expressions that remind one of the theory of emanation. Such expressions, however, must be interpreted in light of the doctrine of creation to which they adhered. PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS follows Plotinus and the later Neoplatonists, especially Proclus, and frequently borrows their terminology. Yet he attempts to adapt their views to the teachings of Christianity. For him, God is primarily goodness and love, and other beings are emanations from His goodness, as light is an emanation from the sun.

JOHN SCOTUS ERIGENA took his doctrine from Pseudo-Dionysius and interpreted it in the sense of pantheistic emanationism. For him, there is only one Being, who, by a series of substantial emanations, produces all things. Nature has four divisions, or, more precisely, there are four stages of the one nature: (1) The nature that creates but is not created, i.e., God in His primordial, incomprehensible reality, unknown and unknowable for all beings, even for Himself. God alone truly is, and He is the essence of all things. (2) The nature that is created and also creates, i.e., God considered as containing the ideas, prototypes, or primordial causes of things. This is the ideal world. (3) The nature that is created but does not create, i.e., the world of things existing in space and time. All of these flow, proceed, or emanate from the first principle of being. Creation is a "procession," and creatures and God are but one and the same reality. In creatures God manifests Himself-hence the term theophania, by which Erigena describes this process. (4) Nature that neither creates nor is created, i.e., God as the term toward which everything ultimately returns.

Arabian Philosophy. Influenced in many points by Neoplatonism, ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY generally holds much the same form of emanationism, viz, the emanation of the different spheres to which all things celestial and terrestrial belong. According to ALFARABI, from the First Being, conceived as intelligent (and in this Alfarabi departs from Plotinus), the intellect emanates; from the intellect, the world soul; and from the world soul, matter. Avicenna teaches that matter is eternal and uncreated. From the First Cause comes the first intelligence, from which follows a series of processions and emanations of the various celestial spheres down to the earthly sphere on which man dwells. For Averroës, the intellect is not individual but is identical with the universal spirit, which is an emanation from God. A later Arab mystic, IBN 'ARABĪ, illustrates the process of emanation by comparison with a mirror, which receives the features of a man although the man and his features remain united.

Jewish Philosophy. In medieval JEWISH PHILOSO-PHY, influences of Neoplatonism are apparent in the teachings of Avicebron and MAIMONIDES. In the CABALA, the doctrine of the Sephiroth, which was developed and systematized early in the 13th century, is essentially a doctrine of emanations. The Sephiroth are the necessary intermediaries between God and the universe, between the intellectual and the material world. They are divided into three groups, the first group of three forming the world of thought; the second group, also of three, the world of soul; and the last group of four, the world of matter.

Catholic Teaching. For Catholics, a discussion of emanationism can only take place in the context of the solutions proposed to the problem of God's nature, especially His simplicity and infinity (see GOD; INFINITY OF GOD; SIMPLICITY OF GOD). The doctrine of the Catholic Church is contained in the definition of the dogma of creation by the Fourth Lateran Council (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 800). VATICAN COUNCIL I also expressly condemns emanationism and anathematizes those who hold "that finite things, both corporeal and spiritual, or at least spiritual, have emanated from the divine substance" (Enchiridion symbolorum 3024; see also 3002).

See Also: MONISM.

Bibliography: C. A. DUBRAY, The Catholic Encyclopedia, ed. C. G. HERBERMANN et al., 16 v. (New York 1907–14) 5:397–99. T. P. ROESER, "Emanation and Creation," The New Scholasticism 19 (1945) 85–116. G. FAGGIN, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:1861–64. K. JÜSSEN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:841–42. H. DÖRRIE, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:449–50.

[C. A. DUBRAY/W. A. WALLACE]

EMANCIPATION, CATHOLIC

Term applied to the process, culminating in the Emancipation Act of 1829, whereby Roman Catholics in England, Scotland, and Ireland were relieved of civil disabilities dating back to the 16th century. Although the movement for repeal of anti-Catholic laws was initiated earlier, the term was first employed in the early 19th century by analogy with the British movement for the emancipation of slaves.

Early Relief Acts. Under legislation initiated in the 16th century, commonly known as the penal laws, Roman Catholics in England, Scotland, and Ireland were subjected to severe penalties and disabilities. The measures, varied in character, often were passed to meet the demands of political exigencies and were at times and in different places only partially and sporadically enforced. Nevertheless, they constituted a perpetual threat to Catholics, and the slow and complicated work of repeal did not begin until the reign of George III (1760-1820). Under the Quebec Act of 1774, George III's new subjects in Canada, formerly subjects of Louis XV of France, were accorded nearly all the religious privileges they had previously enjoyed. Catholic bishops might legally exercise their powers, their rights to tithes from their flock being enforceable at law; and the Protestant government was permitted by Rome to exercise a nomination right in the appointment of higher clergy. Little opposition was encountered in the British Parliament during the passage of this measure, save from William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, but the significance of this last is only evident in the establishment of Pitt clubs in the next generation as centers of Protestant resistance to Catholic emancipation. The first real Anglican protest emerged over the proposals to relieve Nonconformist ministers and teachers from subscription to the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. In a hostile speech opposing the consequential Parliamentary Relief Bill, Sir Roger Newdigate raised the question whether George III could consent without breaking his coronation oath to maintain the Anglican establishment unimpaired.

Toleration for Catholics, as well as for Nonconformists, really began in the three kingdoms in the atmosphere of revolution in America and in France. During the American War the first concessions were made permitting Catholics to avoid penalties for religious observance, and an act of 1778 (17, 18 George III ch. 49, 60) enabled Catholics to hold long leases and to own landed property. These and all subsequent concessions depended upon subscription to an oath enacted in the Irish Parliament in 1774, testifying to the allegiance of the Catholic subscriber to the Hanoverian line and the Protestant settlement of 1702; denying to the exiled Stuarts any allegiance, and to the Pope any temporal power in the King's dominion; and denying belief in the doctrine that no faith should be kept with heretics, or that it was lawful to kill heretics. The 1778 English act, as well as the Irish, went through the respective Parliaments uneventfully. In Scotland, however, there was a great wave of antipapal feeling stimulated by the Presbyterian clergy, resulting in riots, the burning of the residence in Edinburgh of the Catholic bishop, George Hay, and the burning of Catholic property in Glasgow. The result was an appeal from pro-Catholic authorities to abandon the proposed relief bill. There followed in London the GORDON RIOTS, ten days in June 1780 of burning and looting by an antipopish mob.

Further progress in Catholic relief was necessarily inhibited; Edmund BURKE unsuccessfully appealed to the English Parliament to persevere with the Scottish relief bill. In Ireland, however, the second step taken in 1783 gave Catholic clergy legal protection and extended to the absolute purchase of real property by all Catholics the long lease concessions of 1778. After the outbreak of the French Revolution, England's second move toward international association with Catholicism took place in the flight of the old order from France. Many Catholic exiles took refuge in England. Not merely did the government, Anglican bishops, and landed class give refuge to the emigré French clergy, but modest schemes to provide for their support out of public money were set on foot. Privately, in Scotland, pensions were given to the two vicars apostolic and the few parish priests. Small capital building sums also were provided for Hay's seminaries at Alquoheries and Lismore. The third Irish relief bill was passed in 1791, admitting Catholics to the professions. In England the same year saw the passage of a similar measure over which there emerged a division between clergy and laity, as, under the influence of Charles BUTLER (1750–1832), papal pretensions were drastically tailored to Protestant prejudices, and even the Catholic community was for a moment in danger of being statutorily termed "protesting Catholic Dissenters." Ultimately, under episcopal advice, the Irish oath was adopted. Butler responded by founding the Cisalpine Club, arguing that such an organization properly distinguished tolerable Catholic ideas from the ultramontane ones dominated by the Vatican.

In 1793, without a division, Parliament passed the first Scottish relief bill in approximately the same terms as for England and Ireland. In the same year, in the Irish Parliament, an advance was made that was maintained only in that kingdom until the final act of 1829. Catholics were now admitted to the franchise. More professional appointments were open to them, but not membership of Parliament. Proposals in 1795, under the aegis of the Whig Lord Lieutenant, Earl Fitzwilliam (1748–1833), to extend fully the relief measures, were abandoned in consequence of his embarrassing the government over attempting to displace the ruling Dublin clique. Two years later the Irish Parliament, recognizing the termination of Irish ecclesiastical education by the French authorities, approved the establishment of a seminary at home, with a body of trustees nominated in the act. These included the Protestant chief justices, the four Catholic archbishops, and additional bishops, the prelates being nominated personally without reference to their diocesan titles. In consequence, and with government money, there was established the Royal College of St. Patrick of Maynooth.

Act of Union. Regular association, as trustees, with the Catholic archbishops and other bishops gave such statesmen as Lord Castlereagh (1769-1822) considerable insight into the Irish political situation. The rebellion of 1798 was organized by the United Irishmen, a body concerned with political reform, drawing its strength from Dublin Protestants and Belfast Presbyterians, but also including some members of the Catholic Committee, which had played a decisive part in securing mitigation of the laws. After the war with France had commenced, Parliamentary reform had been outlawed, and the United Irishmen had sought support in a revolutionary program linked with Catholic agrarian societies, such as the Defenders, but also with the agnostic French revolutionary government. Few Catholic priests supported the rebellion of 1798; many condemned it, notably bishops, largely because of the association with French revolutionary destruction of organized religion.

Pitt's government, in the light of the French menace under Napoleon, determined to bring about the legislative Union amalgamating the Parliaments. Pitt persuaded the Irish Catholics not to oppose the Act of Union on the understanding that it would be followed by full emancipation. Castlereagh won support for the measure from most of the bishops and also planned a full emancipation scheme involving state payment of clergy and the veto on papal appointments to higher Church positions. The Union passed, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland came into being on Jan. 1, 1801. The Protestant Episcopalian Church became the "United Church of England and Ireland," doubly secured in a clause declared to be a fundamental article of the Act of Union. That the Church of Scotland was Presbyterian was tactfully ignored. And nothing was done for the Catholics. The King's susceptibilities regarding his coronation oath emerged nearly 30 years after Newdigate's, and Pitt resigned. When Pitt returned to office in 1804, George III insisted that he promise not to take up Emancipation again. However, the question became of greater significance particularly with the rise in Ireland of the Catholic middle class, until this latter element played the decisive part in forcing on government the solution of 1829.

Veto Question. After Pitt's death, the Whigs again took up Emancipation, sometimes reluctantly, but rarely abandoning it completely. Their ministry "of all the talents," in deference to George III, postponed the issue as long as possible; they then resigned after withdrawing a relief bill. The King again insisted on guarantees of immunity from further ministerial pressure on the Catholic question. About 1808, the desire to dissolve anti-Catholic prejudices led in England to security proposals, such as one that Rome should concede the British government a veto on ecclesiastical appointments. Most of the English prelates agreed, but not so in Ireland, where the ten years since Castlereagh's negotiations had brought about fresh thinking. In particular, lay opinion in the Catholic Committee resented a measure that might result in the diocesan clergy becoming the government's paid agents. In subsequent years the veto proposal commended itself more and more to pro-Catholic Protestant statesmen. Henry Grattan (1746-1820), the leading Irish Whig, sponsored such a measure in 1813, which, however, was not presented on strict party lines, as it gained support from George Canning (1770-1827), the pro-Catholic Tory. Previous to its introduction, the Grattan-Canning bill had been approved by G. B. Quarantotti, Prefect of Propaganda, the Pope being Napoleon's prisoner and not in a position to decide.

Rise of O'Connell. At this stage Daniel O'CONNELL emerged as one of the leading Irish lay exponents of the question on the Catholic Board, as the successor to the Committee was called. He welcomed the bill but deplored the securities. The clergy of the Dublin province had already approved both, expressing themselves, under the influence of James Warren Doyle, Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin (1819-34), in a noncommittal manner. The clergy of the three remaining provinces were hostile in their reactions. O'Connell became the Irish spokesman by insisting that Irish Catholicism, so far as the United Kingdom was concerned, was more orthodox than Rome: "I confess myself a Catholic, but I deny myself a Papist." Many of the Whigs now considered the abandonment of the veto and other securities. After the deaths of George III and Grattan in 1820, optimism prevailed temporarily regarding the possible favor of George IV. William Conyngham Plunket (1764-1854) introduced a further relief bill still maintaining the veto, but it failed to secure more than the approval of the Commons. The general antipathy of the Lords was now clear. George IV also showed himself unwilling to abandon the extreme Protestant position, which under his father had become identified with the maintenance of the prerogative. A bill of 1823 failed. It was now evident that monarchical and aristocratic objections could be maintained indefinitely. The reorganization in Ireland of the Catholic Association, as the Catholic Board had become to evade the law, again made the matter a real political issue. O'Connell's intimidatory tactics and his appeal to the forces of nationalism and democracy aroused fear among the Conservatives. The Whigs again rallied, this time making the mistake of forcing it into a party issue. The result was the revival of antipopery agitation by the ultra-Tories.

Protestant clubs, Pitt clubs, and Brunswick clubs attempted to intimidate the government from the "open" system, which, since Lord Liverpool (1770-1828) became Prime Minister in 1812, had permitted ministers to maintain a pro-Catholic attitude while not committing the government. But the absence of ultra-Conservative talent made these conspiracies ineffective. Each successive government after Liverpool's found itself more and more involved. The election of 1826 resulted in an increased number of anti-Catholics being returned to the Commons, indicating how extensive was Protestant antipathy among ordinary British voters. Again it was Ireland that brought about the change. The democratic Catholic Association pushed O'Connell into supporting a political agitation against members unprepared to advocate emancipation. In a few spectacular cases, landlord domination of county constituencies was overthrown. The Whigs and the Tories alike were subjected to strong pressure from their pro-Catholic members, who were virtually under notice from O'Connell that the large Catholic vote would be turned against them and would turn them out if they failed to advocate emancipation.

O'Connell's Election. The fact that O'Connell carefully distinguished the Catholic question from that of Parliamentary reform, to which he did not commit himself until the Tories drove him into the Whig camp, secured the alertness of more Irish members than merely the Whigs. His strength emerged in his successful return at the by-election in Clare when he displaced William Vesey FitzGerald in order to force the government from the "open" policy of neutrality through fear of losing Irish support. O'Connell's election in itself was yet a further threat to the ascendancy of Parliament. Whether or not the Duke of Wellington (1769-1852) and Sir Robert Peel (1788–1850), who had in the meantime conceded Nonconformist relief, were correct in thinking that the alternative to granting Catholic emancipation and admitting O'Connell was civil war in Ireland, the fact is that the Union was certainly threatened. The Catholic Association would undoubtedly be able to secure the election of a number of Catholics who might well collectively claim, perhaps at College Green, Dublin, to speak for Ireland and to deny to Westminster any representative character. Thus, to save the Union and to quiet Ireland, emancipation was conceded in the Emancipation Act, which became law on April 13, 1829.

Act of 1829. "An Act for the relief of his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects" (10 George IV ch. 7), as it was entitled, abolished the anti-Catholic oaths imposed in former statutes defining the qualifications for membership of the legislature and for public offices (save for a few offices still confined to Protestants, functioning personally for the monarch or in relation to the control of the established church). However, it still remained essential to take an oath of allegiance similar to the Irish oath of 1774, upholding the Protestant succession to the crown, denying the temporal power of the pope within the United Kingdom, and undertaking not to weaken the Protestant establishment. Its immediate positive effects were small. Few Irish and next to no English and Scottish Catholics were returned to Parliament or given high office for more than a generation. Its prestige significance, particularly for Ireland, is almost impossible to exaggerate, and as such it was resented by most of the Anglicans, by contrast with the rest of the Protestants. It was a moral victory in the eyes of Catholic Europe, which gave O'Connell the role of the leading Catholic liberal, particularly as he allied increasingly thereafter with the Whig reformers to compel Protestant vested interests to enforce the act.

In England the resentment of the establishment was evident in the reenactment by the 1829 act of the petty restrictions upon further recruitment to the religious orders, the prohibiting of usage of Church vestments in public or of the robes of public officeholders at Catholic ceremonies, as well as by the banning of the Catholic Association of Ireland and the refusal to admit O'Connell to Parliament until he was again elected. Even the English Catholics reflected the anti-Irish feeling by slighting him, and the Irish hierarchy pointedly ignored him in publicly thanking Wellington for securing the passage of the measure. On a long-term basis the act made possible the building up of the Catholic Church in both countries, though the change was not so apparent in Britain until the great Irish immigration of the mid-century.

Later Relief Acts. In 1844 (7 and 8 Victoria ch. 102) and 1926 (16 and 17 George V ch. 55) most of the remaining obsolescent anti-Catholic laws were repealed. The ineffective Ecclesiastical Titles Act of 1851 (14 and 15 Victoria ch. 60) prohibiting the use of territorial titles by Catholic bishops was repealed in 1871 (34 and 35 Victoria ch. 53). Among the disabilities still retained is the law restraining either the king or the queen of England from being a Roman Catholic. Roman Catholics are barred also from the offices of regent, lord chancellor, and keeper of the great seal, and from a few university places.

Bibliography: W. J. AMHERST, The History of Catholic Emancipation and the Progress of the Catholic Church in the British Isles... from 1771 to 1820, 2 v. (London 1886). G. F. A. BEST, "The Protestant Constitution and Its Supporters, 1800–1829," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th ser. 8 (London 1958) 105-27. R. D. EDWARDS, Church and State in Tudor Ireland (New York 1935); "Minute Book of the Catholic Committee, 1773-1792," in Archivium Hibernicum 9 (1942). N. GASH, Mr. Secretary Peel (Cambridge, Mass. 1961). É. HALÉVY, History of the English People in the Nineteenth Century (London 1924-), v.1-2. U. HENRIQUES, Religious Toleration in England, 1787-1833 (London 1961). R. B. MCDOWELL, Public Opinion and Government Policy in Ireland, 1801-1846 (London 1952). G. I. T. MACHIN, The Catholic Question in English Politics, 1820-1830 (New York 1964). J. A. REYNOLDS, The Catholic Emancipation Crisis in Ireland, 1823–1829 (New Haven 1954). M. ROBERTS, The Whig Party, 1807-1812 (New York 1939). H. W. V. TEMPERLEY, "George Canning, the Catholics and the Holy See," in Dublin Review 193 (1933). M. WALL, The Penal Laws, 1691-1760 (Dublin 1961). T. WYSE, Historical Sketch of the Late Catholic Association of Ireland, 2 v. (London 1829). D. GWYNN, The Struggle for Catholic Emancipation, 1750-1829 (London 1928); A Hundred Years of Catholic Emancipation, 1829-1929 (London 1929). B. N. WARD, The Dawn of Catholic Emancipation, 1781-1803, 2 v. (London 1909); The Eve of Catholic Emancipation, 1808-1839, 3 v. (London 1911-12); The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation, 1830-1850, 2 v. (London 1915).

Joseph Médard Emard.

[R. D. EDWARDS]

EMARD, JOSEPH MÉDARD

Archbishop, educator; b. St. Constant, Canada, April 1, 1853; d. Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, March 28, 1927. He was the son of Médard and Mathilde (Beaudin) Emard. After pursuing classical studies at the Seminary of St. Thérèse and theology at the Grand Seminary, Montreal, he was ordained at Montreal June 10, 1876, and was appointed curate of Mile End (1876-80). He subsequently spent three years at Rome and received doctorates in theology and Canon Law. Before returning to Canada he toured the Holy Land. From 1880 to 1887 he served as pastor of St. Joseph's parish, Montreal. He lectured in ecclesiastical history at Laval University, Quebec, where he served as vice chancellor (1886-89) and was named chancellor (1889). In 1891 he became a canon of the cathedral and a year later was appointed bishop of Valleyfield when that diocese was established April 5, 1892. He was consecrated by Abp. E. C. Fabre of Montreal on June 9, 1892, and proved to be a talented administrator. He organized diocesan works, wrote several important pastoral letters, and founded a classical college affiliated with Laval University, as well as a kindergarten and a normal school for young women. He also introduced a community of Poor Clares. Emard took an active part in the First Plenary Council of Quebec (1909). While bishop of Vallevfield he served as ordinary for the Canadian armed forces during World War I. He was made assistant to the pontifical throne (1917) and promoted to the archiepiscopal See of Ottawa (June 2, 1922), where he was installed on September 20. He was the author of Souvenirs d'un voyage en Terre-Sainte (Montreal 1884), and several short works, instructions, and pastoral letters, which he compiled in his Oeuvres complètes (5 v. Montreal 1921-24). His pastoral letter Congrès Eucharistique de Montreal was quoted at length by Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli during that congress at Montreal in 1910.

[J. T. FLYNN]

EMBER DAYS

By an ancient tradition in the Roman rite, the historical 12 liturgical and penitential days arranged in four triads (Quattuor tempora, "the four seasons"). According to this tradition, a Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday in a determined week of each season were constituted Ember Days in the liturgical calendar: winter (the week after the third Sunday of Advent), spring (the week after the first Sunday of Lent), summer (in the week after Pentecost Sunday) and autumn (after the feast of the Holy Cross, September 14). They were observed liturgically in that each Ember Day has its own proper Office and Mass celebrated in violet vestments (red, however, in Pentecost). Though formerly observed as days of fast and total (1917 Codex iuris canonici (Rome 1918; repr. Graz 1955) c.1252.2) the Ember Days were not included among the days on which fast or abstinence are required according to the reorganization of penitential discipline contained in Pope Paul VI's apostolic constitution Poe-nitemini of Feb. 17, 1966.

186

Origin. Though the ultimate origins of the Ember Days are obscure, certain Jewish and pagan influences were operative in their formation. In view of the fact that the roots of the primitive Christian Church were in Judaism, it is not surprising that its religious practice influenced the discipline of the penitential system of the ancient Church. As early as the Didache, at the end of the apostolic period, therefore, Wednesday and Friday were observed as fast days, later as stational days, too. The penitential character of Wednesday was very probably inspired by the consideration that it was the day on which the Passion (the arrest of the Lord) commenced, while Friday was the traditional day on which the death of Christ was commemorated by the Church.

According to the Liber pontificalis (ed. L. Duchesne, 1:141) Callistus I (d. c. 223) created, basically, the Ember Days by constituting Saturday in addition to Wednesday and Friday as a fast day to be observed three times (summer, autumn, winter) in the year "in accordance with the prophecy of grain, wine and oil." We have here an example of Christian practice adapting (paralleling) a much older Roman usage, the so-called pagan feasts of nature, the feriae messis (harvest time in June to July), feriae vindemiales (vintage time in September), and feriae sementinae (seed time in December). But the early Church (e.g., Leo, Sermo 90.1; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 54:447) saw also in these fast days a reflection of the ancient Jewish observance of which the book of Zechariah (8.19) speaks: "The fast days of the fourth, the fifth, the seventh and the tenth months shall become occasions of joy and gladness." While the origin of the penitential character of Saturday is somewhat uncertain, it seems probable that it developed through its close association with Friday. Thus Innocent I (d. 417), who extended the Saturday fast to every week of the year, wrote (Epistola 25 ad Decentium 4; Patrologia Latina 20:555): "Reason shows most clearly that we should fast on Saturday, because it stood between the sadness [of Good Friday] and the joy [of Easter Sunday]." And the Liber pontificalis (ed. L. Duchesne, 1.222) reports that Innocent constituted Saturday a fast day "because on Saturday the Lord was placed in the sepulchre and His disciples fasted." In 494 Gelasius I appointed Ember Saturdays as the liturgical days on which ordinations were to take place.

Though Callistus instituted three seasonal fasts, which the Roman Church observed in the fourth (June), the seventh (September) and the tenth (December) months, without however further determining the specific weeks in which these fasts were to be kept, it is not altogether clear when the fourth annual fast was instituted. Primitively the Lenten fast in its totality was regarded as the spring fast. Thus Leo described the practice of the Church that was current in his day: "The [fasts] are so spread throughout the whole circle of the year that the law of abstinence is operative at all seasons. Thus indeed we observe the spring fast at Lent, the summer fast at Pentecost, the autumn fast in the seventh month, and the winter fast in this month [December] which is the tenth" (Sermo 19.2; Patrologia Latina 54:186). Much later, the Gelasian Sacramentary (seventh century) gives evidence of a new fast in March, the first month, which was celebrated as a fast distinct from the Lenten observance. By the end of the seventh century this March fast had come to coincide with the fast of the 1st week of Lent [A. Chavasse, "Les Messes quadragésimales du Sacramentaire Gélasien," Ephemerides liturgicae 63 (1949) 260–261]. This gradual development was confirmed by Gregory I (d. 604), so that at the end of his pontificate the Church in Rome was observing seasonal (March, June, September, December) fasts of three days (Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday).

The Ember Days, conceived and developed as a product of the Roman Church, were spread throughout northern Europe by missionaries who had been educated in the liturgical traditions of Rome. By the middle of the ninth century the observance of the four groups of Ember Days was widespread in the West. In the time between Gregory I (d. 604) and Gregory VII (d. 1085) the variable factor in the celebration of the Ember Days was the date of their occurrence. Different local churches followed different usages within the broad framework prescribed by Gregory I. The decision of Gregory VII, taken at the Roman Synod of 1078, is believed to represent the first authoritative determination of the specific days of the year on which the Ember Days would be observed by the universal Church in the course of the liturgical cycle (Bernold of Constance, Micrologus 24; Patrologia Latina 151:995).

Stational Observance. In the ancient church of Rome special churches were assigned for the liturgical observances of these days: the ecclesia collecta (where the people gathered) and the ecclesia stationalis (whither the people proceeded for the celebration of the liturgy of the day). At the Mass on Ember Wednesday three lessons were read; on Friday, two; and on Saturday, six (plus the Gospel), which may be a vestige of the old title, Sabbatum in XII lectionibus. It is possible that at one time 12 lessons were read on Ember Saturday; or it may be that at one time the six lessons were read both in Latin and in Greek. In the early Church Ember Saturday was an all-night (Saturday to Sunday) vigil, which culminated in the ordination rite on Sunday morning so that properly speaking there was no Liturgy celebrated on Saturday itself. Six of the holy orders were conferred, one after each of the first six lessons, the priesthood before the final verse of the Alleluia or the Tract that stands immediately before the Gospel. In terms of Ember Saturday as an ordination day the choice of the traditional stational churches can be explained: St. Mary Major (scrutiny of the candidates on Wednesday), the Twelve Apostles (public approbation of the candidates on Friday), St. Peter's (ordination on Sunday).

Bibliography: A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year: Its History and Meaning after the Reform of the Liturgy (Collegeville 1981). A. NO-CENT, The Liturgical Year, 4 v. (Collegeville 1977). T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year, rev. ed. (Collegeville 1992). T. J. TALLEY, "The Origin of the Ember Days: An Inconclusive Postscript," Rituels: mélanges offerts à Pierre-Marie Gy, ed. P. DE CLERCK and E. PALAZZO (Paris 1990) 465–72. I. H. DALMAIS, P. JOU-NEL, and A.G. MARTIMORT, The Liturgy and Time, The Church at Prayer v. 4 (Collegeville 1992).

[R. E. MCNALLY/EDS.]

EMBOLISM

Means insertion, interpolation. In the liturgy, although used of other formulas, it usually refers to the prayer appended to the Lord's Prayer. A comparison with other liturgies shows that the Embolism to the Lord's Prayer is very ancient. In Gallican rites, as in the Roman Mass, the Embolism amplified only the last petition of the Our Father. Eastern liturgies (except the Byzantine, which has no Embolism but only a doxology) stress the last two petitions, often by a marked expansion.

In the Roman Rite of the Mass, the Embolism enlarges upon the last petition of the Our Father. The current translation reads: "Deliver us, Lord from every evil and grant us peace in our day. In your mercy, keep us free from sin and protect us from all anxiety, as we wait in joyful hope for the coming of the Savior, Jesus Christ."

Bibliography: J. A. JUNGMANN, The Mass of the Roman Rite, tr. F. A. BRUNNER, 2 v. (New York 1951–55) 2:284–285, 289.

[F. A. BRUNNER/EDS.]

EMBURY, PHILIP

Founder of the first U.S. Methodist congregation; b. Ballingrane, County Limerick, Ireland, September 1728; d. East Salem, N.Y., August 1773. His parents were German refugees from the Palatinate. He attended the village school and was apprenticed to a carpenter at an early age. Converted at a Methodist meeting in 1752, he became in 1758 an itinerant preacher. In 1760 he and his wife, Margaret Switzer, immigrated to New York City, where Embury taught school and worked as a carpenter. At the request of Mrs. Barbara Heck, he resumed preaching in 1766 and soon formed a congregation. Services were held in his home and in a rigging loft until 1768, when Embury built the first John Street Methodist Church, working on the construction of it himself. In 1770 Embury moved to a farm in Albany (now Washington) County, N.Y.

Bibliography: J. B. WAKELEY, Lost Chapters Recovered from the Early History of American Methodism (New York 1858). W. CROOK, Ireland and the Centenary of American Methodism (London 1866). S. SEAMAN, Annals of N.Y. Methodism (New York 1892).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

EMEBERT OF CAMBRAI, ST.

Identification of Emebert is difficult. Some historians claim that he was bishop of Cambrai-Arras after 627 but before 645 to 652 and that nothing else is known of him (J. Lestoquoy, Catholicisme 4:43). Others claim that Emebert was probably the CHORBISHOP of Brabant, son of St. AMALBERGA and the Count of Kontich (Antwerp), and brother of St. GUDULA and St. Renelda (N. Huyghebaert, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 15:382–383). Of this Emebert, it is known only that he willed his villa of Merchtem (Brabant) to the church of Our Lady of Cambrai and died after 712 at Ham (Brabant), where he was buried.

Feast: Jan. 15 (Dioceses of Arras, Cambrai, and Lille).

Bibliography: L. DUCHESNE, Fastes épiscopaux de l'ancienne Gaule (Paris 1907–1915) 3:108–110. R. PODEVIJN, De hl. Gudula en hare familie (Aalst 1927). H. LANCELIN, Histoire du diocèse de Cambrai (Valenciennes 1946). M. COENS, "Le Lieu de naissance de sainte Renelde d'après sa 'Vita,'' Analecta Bollandiana 69 (1951) 348–387.

[É. BROUETTE]

EMERIC OF HUNGARY, ST.

Prince (Imre in Hungarian); b. 1007; d. Sept. 2, 1031. He was the son of STEPHEN I, king of HUNGARY, and Gisela. Very little is known about this young prince beyond the fact that he was educated by GERARD OF CSANÁD, made a vow of chastity but was married c. 1026 for reasons of state to some foreign princess, and died in a hunting accident. In some sources he appears under the name Henry. Popular in Hungary and Poland, Emeric was canonized in 1083. In the 20th century his cult was revived, particularly in the interwar years when he was honored as the patron saint of Hungarian youth. His legend was written early in the 12th century and his relics are preserved in Székesfehérvár and in Esztergom. Usually he is represented holding a lily.

Feast: Nov. 4.

Bibliography: Sources. Legenda sancti Emerici ducis, in Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum, ed. I. SZENTPÉTERY, v. 2 (Budapest 1938) 441–460. Acta Sanctorum Nov. 2.1:477–491. Literature. L. HARSÁNYI, Az elragadott herceg: Szent Imre herceg életregénye (Budapest 1990). S. TÓTH, Magyar és lengyel Imrelegendák (Acta Universitatis Szegediensis, Acta Historica 11; Szeged 1962). Szent István Emlékkönyv, 3 v. (Budapest 1938) 1:412–418, 557–570; 2:570–573. D. VARGHA, Szent Imre problémák (Budapest 1931). J. SZALAY, Catholicisme 4:44.

[D. SINOR]

EMERSON, RALPH WALDO

Clergyman, essayist, poet, and philosopher; b. Boston, Mass., May 25, 1803; d. Concord, Mass., April 27, 1882. He came of a long line of clergymen; his father had left Calvinism for Unitarianism and was minister at Boston's famous First Church. Emerson entered Harvard College (1817) and upon graduation taught school for a time. He entered Harvard Divinity School (1825), and was appointed pastor of the Second Church (Unitarian) in Boston in 1829. He married in 1829, but his wife died in 1831. He very quickly found himself at odds with Unitarian doctrine and in 1832 resigned his pastorate. The same year he sailed for Europe. After a year of deeply stimulating experiences (he met, among others, COLERIDGE, Wordsworth, and Carlyle, he returned home. He made two more trips abroad, in 1847 and 1872.

In 1836 he published Nature, which, like so many of his writings, has a strong manifesto-like quality. It is a challenging declaration of truths toward which many of his contemporaries were groping, and reveals Emerson probing into human reality and the world of nature in order to liberate men from a mechanistic view of the world. Soon there gathered around him a loosely knit group known as Transcendentalists. (See TRANSCENDEN-TALISM, LITERARY.) In 1841 he published Essays, First Series and in 1844 Essays, Second Series. Then followed Poems (1847), Representative Men (1850), English Traits (1856), Conduct of Life (1860), May Day (1867), Society and Solitude (1870), and Letters and Social Aims (1875).

Emerson was to a marked degree universal-minded. Thus he felt drawn to both the Orient and the Occident, as well as to the most advanced movements of thought in his own time. He was always at home in the great literatures, and entered with ease worlds that seemed far removed from his own. It was characteristic of him that he could be carried away by Dante's Vita Nuova, which he said "reads like the Book of Genesis." Under great difficulties, this son of the Puritans undertook its translation.

It is significant that Emerson's universality should have blossomed out of a mind so strikingly American. In essays like "The American Scholar" and "Self-Reliance," Emerson speaks for the frontier and not merely for ROMANTICISM; the pioneer spirit was as vital in him as his feeling for his Puritan ancestry and his ties with Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Carlyle. Emerson was moved by this frontier spirit to follow in the footsteps of the Puritan thinker Jonathan EDWARDS. Emerson became passionately attached to the world revealed by the senses, and viewed its perception as integral to spiritual vision itself. Moreover, as with other Americans, the enterprise of carving a new world out of the wilderness left its mark on him, reinforcing to a maximum degree that feeling of the all-embracing unity of life and interconnectedness of things that springs up so spontaneously in man. Again, as were other Americans, he was alert to the dynamism that drives man onward and fills him with a sense of new and strange possibilities that lie ahead.

Man is no alien presence in the world. This is Emerson's resounding message. He therefore applied himself to the business of penetrating to "the aboriginal Self," so that he might lay bare and resuscitate a primal state of consciousness in which one rises to an awareness of higher dimensions within reality as well as of one's own immersion in nature and process.

Given such an outlook, the self-reliance of which Emerson makes so much has little in common with the self-sufficiency of one who remains insensitive to the bond linking him with things and who feels no surge within himself of a world that presses on to new and unforeseeable goals. To Emerson the call to self-reliance was a call to an original confrontation with the universe out of the depths of one's own uniqueness; for, as he saw it, the doorway to life and universality is to be found in selfhood. He was not antisocial. For him it was simply a matter of affirming the truth that society is most healthy when it respects the infinite potentiality of each person, while welcoming diversity and uniqueness.

In his deeper reading of human experience, Emerson could show that personality in its spiritual depths is organically connected with the rocks and the plants and all living creatures, as well as with the divinity that stands behind things. In building his picture of the world, he made use of a doctrine already taught by Jonathan Edwards, which can be traced back to medieval times and beyond, namely that the world is a descending manifestation of spirit. Within such a context Emerson was able to develop his doctrine of the indispensability of organic language, the language of symbolism, to the normal functioning of mind and spirit. In his view, it is through organic language that the world around us evokes answering echoes in the psyche, hinting at realities that escape the grasp of nonpoetic language. Ever close to experience, Emerson believed that symbolic consciousness plays a dominant role in the process by which man seeks to transcend himself toward larger wholeness of life and meaning.

Ralph Waldo Emerson.

See Also: EMANATIONISM; NEOPLATONISM.

Bibliography: Complete Works, ed. E. W. EMERSON, 12 v. (Boston 1903–04); Journals, ed. E. W. EMERSON and W. E. FORBES, 10 v. (Boston 1909–14); Letters, ed. R. L. RUSK, 6 v. (New York 1939). DANTE ALIGHERI, La Vita Nuova, tr. R. W. EMERSON, ed. J. C. MATHEWS (Chapel Hill 1960). R. L. RUSK, The Life of Ralph Waldo Emerson (New York 1949). F. I. CARPENTER, Emerson Handbook (New York 1953). V. C. HOPKINS, Spires of Form: A Study of Emerson's Aesthetic Theory (Cambridge, Mass. 1951). S. PAUL, Emerson's Angle of Vision: Man and Nature in American Experience (Cambridge, Mass. 1952). S. E. WHICHER, Freedom and Fate: An Inner Life of Ralph Waldo Emerson (Philadelphia 1953).

[R. C. POLLOCK]

Jacques André Émery.

ÉMERY, JACQUES ANDRÉ

Sulpician priest outstanding in French ecclesiastical life; b. Gex (Ain), France, Aug. 26, 1732; d. Paris, April 28, 1811. Born into a family notable in the law, he made secondary studies at the Jesuit college in Mâcon, theological studies in Paris, entered the SULPICIANS (1757), and was ordained (1758). The next 34 years were spent training candidates for the priesthood as seminary teacher or superior. This experience enlightened him on contemporary religious and social problems. Disturbed by the inadequacies of current apologetics and spirituality, he published several works, including L'Esprit de Leibnitz (1772), and L'Esprit de Sainte Thérèse (1775). Elected superior general of the Sulpicians (1782), he succeeded by his wisdom and firmness in reforming the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice in Paris, reserved for younger sons of the nobility destined for the higher clergy.

The FRENCH REVOLUTION, by causing the emigration of almost all the bishops and cutting off relations with Rome, thrust on him a role of highest importance without any official title. His priestly reputation made him the guide and the living conscience of the French clergy deprived of leaders. Very firm in matters of principle, he condemned the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, and the oath to support it. Remaining at his post, he strove to remove the Church from all political compromise with aristocratic and royal counterrevolutionary activities, in order to arrive at a conciliation with the new regime. With this latter aim he authorized taking the oath of Liberty and Equality (1792) by declaring it purely political after studying Gensonné's interpretation of it. After taking it himself, he retracted at peril of his life during the Reign of Terror, when Rome condemned it.

As vicar-general of the Archdiocese of Paris, he kept in communication with its archbishop, M. de Juigné. The interception of one of his letters to the latter led to his arrest (July, 1793) and detention for 15 months in the Conciergerie prison in Paris. During this period he exercised a very active ministry among condemned prisoners. Liberated after Thermidor, Émery worked for religious restoration, recommended what was called "the Parisian method" of reconciling constitutional clergy or priests who had apostatized. He also authorized the clergy to take the various oaths demanded of those exercising religious functions.

During the Consulate and Empire period his line of conduct remained identical. NAPOLEON called him "the little priest," and thereby rendered homage to his action, so priestly and discreet. This man who wanted to be nothing, and who refused several times the episcopate, exercised a profound influence over the clergy. He counseled making the promise of fidelity to the Constitution of the Year VIII (1799), favored the CONCORDAT OF 1801, advised the pre-Revolutionary bishops to resign in accordance with the provisions of this Concordat, and assured nominations of worthy men to the new sees. Most prelates sought his advice, especially FESCH, reformed by him. He reconstituted the Sulpicians, the Seminary of St. Sulpice, and provincial seminaries. When conflict broke out (1806) between Napoleon I and Pius VII, Monsieur Émery, as he was commonly known, courageously defended the pope; opposed the intrusion of MAURY; aided the "black cardinals"; and by his secret correspondence bureau, diffused the letters of Pius VII, brought to him from Savona by the KNIGHTS OF THE FAITH. As a member of the ecclesiastical commissions (1809-11) charged by the emperor to resolve his differences with the pope, Émery refused to sign the decisions of the commissions. Finally, at a famous meeting in the Tuileries (March 17, 1811) attended by leaders in Church and State, Napoleon directed all his questions during a pathetic two-hour dialogue at the septuagenarian, moderate Gallican priest who courageously sustained the cause of Pius VII. So tactful was he that the emperor, far from being irritated, displayed his admiration. Death came the following month.

Bibliography: Oeuvres complètes de Monsieur Émery, ed. J. P. MIGNE (Paris 1857). J. LEFLON, Monsieur Émery, 2 v. (Paris 1945–46); Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 15:394–397.

[J. LEFLON]

EMESA (HOMS)

Situated on the Orontes, was the center of the worship of the Syrian sun-god Baal. Roman influence beginning with Pompey and Caesar was firmly established under DOMITIAN. Elagabalus (Heliogabalus), the chief priest of the sun-god who bore that deity's name, was proclaimed imperator in this city by the Syrian troops, assumed the name Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, and ruled from 218 to 222. His debauched reign was ended by a pretorian revolt, and with his demise, efforts to spread the worship of the unconquered sun-god (Sol Invictus) in the Roman Empire ceased temporarily. In 272 Aurelian's outnumbered forces gained a significant victory over Zenobia near Emesa. Attributing his success to an apparition of the sun-god who encouraged his troops, Aurelian entered the city, venerated the god, and built a shrine in his honor (Historia Augusta, Divus Aurelianus 25).

It is uncertain when Christianity entered this stronghold of pagan worship. The first known bishop of Emesa is Silvanus who suffered martyrdom under DIOCLETIAN (EUSEBIUS, Ecclesiastical History 8.13); a later successor, Anatolius, attended the Council of Nicaea. Evidence for the progress of Christianity in Emesa is provided by the so called Chronicon Paschale [Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne (Paris 1857–66) 92:741B], which states that the great church in the city was desecrated under JU-LIAN THE APOSTATE by the erection of a statue of Dionysus. In Byzantine times Emesa, the home of the renowned hymnographer ROMANUS MELODUS (d. c. 560), became famous for the possession of the head of St. John the Baptist.

The see became an autocephalous archbishopric in 452 and, as Homs, has been the administrative center for the patriarchates of the Jacobites and Melchites and for the Roman Catholics. Because of its geographical location commanding the road north from Egypt, Palestine, and Damascus, Emesa experienced the vicissitudes of war from the armies of Arabs, Mongols, Turks, and Crusaders.

Bibliography: Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. (Stuttgart) 5.2 (1905) 2219–22; 10.1 (1917) 948–951. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (Paris 1907–53) 4.2:2723–30. R. JANIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912) 15.1:397–399. K. BAUS, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 5:470–471. H. G. BECK, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich (Munich 1959) 195. E. HONIGMANN, Byzantion 20 (1950) 64–71. Annuario Pontificio (Rome 1964) 183.

[H. DRESSLER]

EMILIANI, JEROME, ST.

Founder of the Order of the Somaschi; b. Venice, Italy, 1486; d. Somascha (Bergamo), Feb. 8, 1537. The son of a patrician family headed by Angelo Emiliani and Eleonora Morosini, he served in the army of the Venetian Republic at Castelnuovo of Quero, where he was taken prisoner. Set free miraculously on Sept. 27, 1511, Jerome left his manacles in thanksgiving at the shrine of the Madonna Grande in Treviso. Joining the Oratory of Divine Love, founded by St. CAJETAN, he took care of the incurables in Venetian hospitals. Later he established institutions for orphans, giving them religious and civil education on a pattern that anticipated the present schools of arts and manual training. Using the question-andanswer method, he taught Christian doctrine to children and peasants, and later he was able to extend his work to Padua, Verona, Como, Milan, and Bergamo. He was joined in these labors by Alessandro Besuzzi and Agostino Barili. In 1534 with numerous other followers he founded the Society of the Servants for the Poor, which was approved in 1540 by PAUL III and promoted to a religious order by St. PIUS V in 1568 as Clericorum Regularium a Somascha, with solemn vows, exemption, and the privileges of mendicants.

Jerome also devoted time to prayer and penance in a hermitage that he built in the mountains of Somascha. His spirituality is characterized by love of charity, imitation of Christ in his suffering, and devotion to the Guardian Angels and to the Blessed Virgin, Mother of Orphans. He was beatified by BENEDICT XIV in 1747; canonized July 16, 1767 by CLEMENT XIII; and declared universal patron of orphans and abandoned children by PIUS XI, March 14, 1928.

Feast: Feb. 8 (formerly July 20).

Bibliography: Vita del clarissimo signor Girolamo Miani gentil huomo venetiano, tr. as Life of Jerome Emiliani, most distinguished Venetian nobleman, tr. Somaschi (Manchester, N.H. 1973). S. ALBANI, Vita del venerabile e devoto servo di Iddio Ieronimo Miani (Milan 1600). A. TORTORA, Vita Hieronymi Aemiliani (Milan 1620). G. LANDINI, S. Girolamo Miani (Rome 1947). San Girolamo Miani nel V centenario della nascita, ed. G. SCARABELLO, et al. (Venice 1989). M. HEIMBUCHER, Die Orden und Kongregationender katholischen Kirche (Paderborn 1932–1934) 3:275–278.

EMMANUEL

Symbolic name found in Is 7.14; 8.8 (and see 8.10) meaning "God with us" (Heb 'immānû-'ēl). St. Matthew interprets it in a messianic sense and applies it directly to Christ (Mt 1.22). Although exegetes generally agree that Is 7.14 is rightly understood to be a messianic text, they are not wholly in accord in explaining it. Formerly it was widely held that the sign promised to Ahaz, King of Juda, in this passage referred to the VIRGIN BIRTH of Christ and that the sign in question was a miracle in the strict sense of the word. A more critical study of the problem, however, indicates that such an interpretation of the text in the Book of ISAIAH is inaccurate. The sign offered to Achaz was intended to assist him to make a practical decision, i.e., to put his trust in the Lord rather than in Assyria on the occasion of the Syro-Ephraimitic invasion; but the birth of a child 700 years later could hardly be expected to help him. Further, the fact that Christ was miraculously born of a virgin can hardly be used to prove anything to a skeptic, for this is something not open to human observation but is rather an object of faith. Aside from this, the text does not clearly speak of a virgin birth, for the technical Hebrew term for virgin $(b^e t \hat{u} l \hat{a})$ is not used here, but a more general term ('almâ) that means maiden or young woman. Finally, the child is associated with the contemporary scene (7.15-16). Thus, modern interpreters understand the "sign" more in accord with the sense that word (Heb ' $\hat{o}t$) usually has in the Old Testament, i.e., a meaningful, effective indication of God's intervention. Yet, the import of the promise is messianic, for it probably refers to the birth of Hezekiah, son of Ahaz, who would continue the Davidic line, which was the vehicle of God's messianic promises (see MESSIANISM; DAVID) at a time when its existence was severely threatened (see Is 7.2–6). The ultimate meaning of the promise, even for Isaiah, would be fulfilled only when the expected messianic deliverance had been realized, and so the oracle continued to look to the future, to the coming of the Son of David par excellence. The Septuagint translators rendered 'almâ by $\pi\alpha\rho\theta$ évoc, the technical Greek term for virgin, as an indication that they expected the MESSIAH to have a marvelous birth, and Matthew knew that this did, in fact, come to pass in the birth of Jesus Christ.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 655–657. H. JUNKER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 3:847–848. E. JENNI, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 3:677–678. J. COPPENS, "La Prophétie de la 'Almah, Is 7.14–17," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 28 (Bruges 1952) 648–678. "La Prophétie d'Emmanuel," L'Attente du Messie, ed. L. CERFAUX et al. (Paris 1954) 39–50. F. L. MORIARTY, "The Emmanuel Prophecies," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 19 (Washington 1957) 226–233.

[M. J. CANTLEY]

EMMANUEL, BL.

Bishop; b. Cremona?, c. 1225; d. Adwert (Aduard), Holland, Oct. 1, 1298 (feast, Feb. 27). Knowledge about his youth is unreliable, but it is clear that in the 1270s he was professor of Canon Law at the University of Paris. He became archdeacon in Cremona (Italy) and in 1291 or 1292, was bishop there. Having been a staunch defender of the Church against secular encroachment, he was forced to resign in 1295. He spent the last three years of his life at the Cistercian Abbey of Adwert where he was venerated as blessed, although he was never canonized. In 1940 his remains were unearthed and transferred to the Abbey of Notre-Dame de Sion at Diepenveen.

Bibliography: A. ALMA, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:423–424, with bibliography.

[L. J. LEKAI]

EMMERAM, ST.

Marytr, itinerant preacher, possibly bishop, suffered a violent death in Bavaria, perhaps c. 660. His original name was Haimhramm. He is the patron of the monastery of SANKT EMMERAM (formerly St. George), where he was buried and was honored as a martyr by 737. No other facts are known about his life. The vita by Bp. Arbeo (Aribo) of Freising (c. 772) contains a kernel of fact, but the similarity of most of its details to those in Arbeo's life of CORBINIAN (D. C. 725) makes their authenticity improbable. According to Arbeo, Emmeram was bishop of Poitiers (although his name appears on no list) before coming to Bavaria to preach to the Slavs. He was detained at Regensburg by Duke Theodo and eventually murdered by members of the Duke's household on a false accusation to which Emmeram submitted voluntarily. In art, he is shown in episcopal robes, and either pierced by a lance or bound to a ladder and mutilated (as in Arbeo's account of his death).

Feast: Sept. 22.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 4:452–524. H. C. F. TIMERDING, ed., Die christliche Frühzeit Deutschlands in den Berichten über die Bekehrer, 2 v. (Jena 1929) v.1. H. FRANK, Die Klosterbischöfe des Frankenreiches (Münster 1932). A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 3:88–91; 4:90. G. JACQUEMET, Catholicisme 4:60–61. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 1:352–354. R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns (2d ed. St. Ottilien 1958–) 1:53–54.

EMMERICH, ANNE CATHERINE

Stigmatic and mystic; b. Flamsche, Westphalia, Sept. 8, 1774; d. Dülmen, Feb. 9, 1824. Her parents were poor, and from childhood her health was not good. At an early age she exhibited phenomena of clairvoyance. In November 1802 she entered the novitiate of the Augustinian nuns at Dülmen; but in 1811 the convent was secularized, and she was received into the house of an emigrant French priest. About a year later she received the stigmata, including a double cross on her breast, and though she tried to hide it, her stigmatization soon became known and aroused not only curiosity but also considerable hostility among unbelievers and rationalists. After years of intermittent investigations by doctors and theologians the civil authorities intervened, and in August 1819 she was forcibly removed to another house and kept under close surveillance for three weeks, but no evidence of fraud came to light.

In the year before this investigation Catherine had been visited by the Romantic poet Clemens Brentano, then recently reconciled to the Church after a period of unbelief, and he was so impressed by her that he decided to remain in Dülmen and to devote himself to writing down the experiences Catherine communicated to him. These activities resulted in two books, The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and the slightly less popular Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Two facts make the evaluation of these books difficult. First, we do not know how much Brentano communicated or suggested to her in their long conversations. Second, it is impossible to determine exactly what, in Brentano's works, came from her and what from the poet himself. What is certain is that under Brentano's influence her visions became much more elaborate than they had been before. Catherine herself certainly took them very seriously, for she declared that God had commanded her to make them known and that those who had no faith in them would have to render an account for their negligence.

The written reports of the visions themselves contain long descriptions not only of Biblical events but also of apocryphal stories, and they include many historical and topographical details, some of which are correct, others, quite mistaken.

The popular English translation of The Dolorous Passion was made from the French translation of the German original and is frequently faulty.

Bibliography: T. WEGENER, Sister Anne Katherine Emmerich, tr. F. X. MCGOWAN (New York 1898). H. J. SELLER, Im Banne des Kreuzes, ed. I. M. DEITZ (2d ed., Würzburg 1949). W. HÜMPFNER, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 4.1:622–627, very good for the bibliography of the controversy about her life and works. H. THURSTON, Surprising Mystics, ed. J. H. CREHAN (Chicago 1955) 38–99.

[H. GRAEF]

EMMONS, NATHANAEL

Congregationalist minister; b. East Haddam, Conn., April 20, 1745; d. Franklin, Mass., Sept. 23, 1840. He graduated from Yale in 1767, studied theology under Rev. Nathan Strong of Coventry, Conn., and was ordained in 1773 for the Second Church of Wrentham (now Franklin), Mass. He held this charge for 67 years. Emmons trained divinity students in his home and, besides his voluminous published sermons, contributed theological articles to the religious press. An advocate of home and foreign missions, he edited the Massachusetts Missionary Magazine. He defended the orthodox Calvinist positions of Jonathan EDWARDS and Samuel Hopkins against the Unitarians and Universalists, and supported Congregational polity against the Presbyterians. In politics he was a Federalist, and characterized Thomas Jefferson as Jeroboam in a famous sermon.

Bibliography: Complete Works, 6 v. (Boston 1842), includes an autobiography. E. A. PARK, Memoir of Nathanael Emmons (Boston 1861).

[R. K. MACMASTER]

EMOTION (MORAL ASPECT)

Throughout human history, two opposing attitudes toward man's emotional life can be distinguished, the Stoic and the hedonist. The Stoic ideal of the rational man has no place for emotion. The perfect man is "apathetic," indifferent alike to pleasure and pain. For the hedonist, on the contrary, pleasure and pain are the ultimate principles of action. The wise man pursues pleasure as the supreme human value and avoids pain as the ultimate evil. The Christian outlook on emotion is between these two extremes. Christ the perfect man was angry (Mk 3.5) and wept on hearing of the death of Lazarus (Jn 11.33–34).

Use and Misuse of Emotion. Although it is primarily the human will that moves a human being to act, the will is facilitated by the sensitive inclination of the flesh toward what is willed. The role of the emotions is therefore an important and even a necessary one. Without them a man would be relatively inert and slow to move himself to activities needed for change, growth, evolution, or improvement. It is only through the agency of the emotions that a man can tap the reservoirs of his physical powers and energies to enable him to face the crises of life, to defend himself against harm, and to perform with fidelity and thoroughness actions that are necessary to his well-being. But on the other hand, when the emotions get out of control they can lead a man to the gravest disorders and excesses.

Morality. The fact of the baneful consequences of uncontrolled passion no doubt accounts for the suspicion and distrust with which the emotions have been regarded by some, but the necessity of emotions to human life is so manifest that it seems absurd to judge them to be per se evil. In themselves they are morally neutral, neither good nor bad, and they become one or the other only insofar as they influence a man in the direction of good or evil. They are good when, with respect to their quality and intensity, they are appropriate to the objects that arouse them, and they are evil when they are inappropriate, the objects in either case being the objects as they appear in the light of reason judging according to the norms of moral law.

This supposes, however, that the activity of the emotions is in some way subject to the control of man's deliberate will, because nothing that does not proceed, either directly or indirectly, from the deliberate will can rightly be considered to have moral quality. Different instances of emotional activity, however, are differently related to reason and to will, and this may alter considerably the moral character of the emotion itself and of what is done under its influence. Moralists therefore distinguish antecedent and consequent emotion.

Emotion is said to be antecedent if it arises independently of any stimulation or encouragement on the part of the will. It is thus not a voluntary insurgence of the sense appetite, but one that is set off spontaneously on a subvolitional level. It is called antecedent because it arises prior to any act of the will causing or approving it. It anticipates the will act. Since emotion of this kind is not subject to voluntary control, it cannot be accounted voluntary. The man thus impassioned is not responsible for his emotion until it is possible for the will to assume control of it. At the moment when the will deliberately accepts or consents to the emotion, it becomes voluntary and hence ceases to be an antecedent emotion. This also happens when the will, without actually consenting to the emotion, nevertheless neglects to subdue it, in spite of the fact that it could and should do so.

Not all sudden outbursts of emotion can rightly be classified as antecedent. There are cases in which an individual could and should foresee and make suitable provision against events likely to occasion emotional disturbance. If one voluntarily neglects to do this, then the resulting emotion is not antecedent, but is, on the contrary, indirectly voluntary inasmuch as it is a foreseen consequence of the failure to take the measures necessary to forestall it.

It is difficult to determine concretely when one could and should foresee a sudden movement of undesirable emotion and make provision against its occurrence. The majority of medieval theologians inclined to rigorism in this matter and appear to have held that movements of undesirable emotion are always venially sinful, because there is always an element of negligence in the failure to foresee and prevent them, and because the sense appetite shares in some degree in the freedom of the will.

Later theologians took the more benign view that certain sudden movements of emotion are completely beyond the possibility of human control. These they held to be totally devoid of morality. They classified the different movements of sensuality in the following manner: (1) motus primo-primi, emotions that are completely beyond the possibility of human control, either because they arise too suddenly or because they are due simply to a bodily condition, and these were held to be amoral in character; (2) motus secundo-primi, emotions that are not deliberately willed, but are in some way subject to a man's control and so involve some culpable negligence and are consequently venially sinful; (3) motus secundi, disordered emotions that are deliberately willed.

Consequent emotion is voluntary, whether indirectly, as when the will neglects to subdue it, or directly, as happens when the emotion itself is the object of direct desire either for its own sake or as a means to something else. The will can and does on occasion deliberately incite, nourish, encourage, or strengthen emotion, either for the sake of the pleasure to be derived from it, or because it is seen as a means necessary to the accomplishment of something the will wants.

Influence of Emotion upon Responsibility. The moralist is concerned not only with the voluntariness and imputability of an emotional state itself, but also with the bearing emotion may have upon the morality of actions that are performed under its influence. The common position of Catholic moralists on this matter can best be set forth in the following separate conclusions:

(1) Antecedent passion increases the voluntariness of an action proceeding from it, but at the same time diminishes the freedom of that action. It increases the voluntariness of the action because its momentum carries the will with it, so that one performs the action more willingly under its impulse than if such impulse were lacking. But it diminishes the freedom of the action because on the one hand it beclouds the vision of the mind and on the other it weakens the control of the will over the other powers, and this to an extent that may limit materially the possibility of deliberate choice. Since it lessens freedom, it diminishes responsibility also, for one is responsible for what he does to the extent in which he acts freely.

EMPEDOCLES

(2) The extent to which antecedent emotion diminishes responsibility will depend upon its violence. If it is of such force or vehemence that it deprives one altogether of the use of reason, then no real freedom remains and the action that occurs cannot be morally blameworthy. In such a case one is, for the time being, in so disturbed a mental state that he is incapable of moral action. Less violent passion, leaving some use of reason, will not totally abolish responsibility, but will diminish it in proportion to the force of the emotional impulse.

(3) Consequent passion, however strong it may be, lessens neither the voluntariness nor the freedom of an action. The reason is that emotion of this kind is itself voluntary, whether directly or indirectly, and in willingly and freely stimulating it or allowing it to exist, one takes upon himself responsibility for the actions to which he can reasonably foresee that it will lead. It might happen, of course, that one's emotion, though voluntary, might reach an unexpected pitch of intensity and thus result in an action more far-reaching than was foreseen. In this case the emotion itself would be partly antecedent and partly consequent. Up to the point to which the person foresees and intends the emotion to reach, it is consequent and voluntary, but the unforeseen excess of emotion would be antecedent and involuntary, and responsibility for actions committed because of it would be accordingly diminished.

Emotion and Virtue. Since the human sensitive appetite has its own act and is, in a sense, rational, because of its intimate association with reason and will, it can be the subject of such virtues as TEMPERANCE and FORTI-TUDE. The role of such moral virtue is not to destroy or eliminate emotion, but to make the sensitive appetite readily responsive to the dictates of reason. Because of the wounds of original sin, the process of acquiring moral virtue in the sensitive appetite is painful; however, constant effort wears down its resistance, and the continued control of reason leaves its imprint on the appetite. This imprint when fully developed becomes moral virtue. Moral education is an extrinsic help toward this end, but the most important help comes directly from God when He gives grace for the task. Because the whole man, including his sensitivity, has been redeemed, God gives sufficient grace for its control. Indeed, Christian tradition testifies to the infusion at Baptism of the moral virtues of temperance and fortitude.

See Also: CONCUPISCENCE; VIRTUE.

Bibliography: R. E. BRENNAN, Thomistic Psychology (New York 1954). J. MARITAIN, Moral Philosophy (New York 1964). T.

V. MOORE, The Driving Forces of Human Nature and Their Adjustment (New York 1948). P. O'BRIEN, Emotions and Morals (New York 1950). W. FARRELL, "Man's Emotional Life," Cross and Crown 6 (1954) 178–198. R. ALLERS, "Cognitive Aspect of Emotion," Thomist 4 (1942) 589–648. P. LUMBRERAS, "De sensualitatis peccato," Divus Thomas 32 (1929) 225–240.

[J. CAHILL]

EMPEDOCLES

Empedocles was a Greek philosopher born of an aristocratic family in the Dorian city-state of Akragas on the southern coast of Sicily. The exact dates of his lifetime are a matter of conjecture. It has been argued that he was born c. 521 B.C. and died c. 461 B.C., but he is usually said to have flourished c. 444 B.C. There is little reliable information about his life, but we know that he was banished from his native city. Although Diogenes Laertius reports that he ended his life by leaping into the crater of Mt. Etna, the historian Timaeus tells us that he left Sicily for the Peloponnesus and that the manner of his death is unknown. He was actively engaged in politics, religion, and medicine, and his name was surrounded with an aura of mystic wisdom. He wrote in verse and fairly extensive fragments of two of his poems, one on nature (Περί φύσεως), the other on purifications (Καθαρμοί), are extant.

Theory of the Elements. Empedocles's cosmological theory was developed as a response to the Parmenidean insistence on the immutability of being. He agreed with PARMENIDES that whatever exists cannot have come into being nor can it go out of being; yet change is a fact that must be explained. Empedocles's solution rested on a denial of Parmenidean monism. He held that whatever exists is reducible to four basic elements or "roots": earth, air, fire, and water. Each minimal unit of these four roots is immutable in its being, and change is the aggregation of these roots into the familiar objects of experience and their subsequent dissolution. In this way Empedocles felt that he could agree with Parmenides that being is immutable and also find room for change in the world of experience.

Furthermore he looked upon the four roots as passive, requiring the imposition of an external force to bring about the combinations and dissolutions of the world of change. Hence he posited the force of love, which is attractive, and the force of hate, which is separative. According to Aristotle (Meta. 1075b 1–7), Empedocles assigns to love the dual role of being a material and an efficient cause, since, despite the metaphorical implications of these terms, love and hate were postulated as material forces. Hence Empedoclean cosmology was thoroughly materialistic. Empedocles envisioned the history of the universe as an eternally recurring cyclic process involving the following four stages: (1) love predominates, and all the elements are thoroughly mixed together; (2) hate progressively expresses itself, and the elements begin to separate out into distinguishable objects; (3) hate predominates, and the four elements are completely separated from each other; and (4) love progressively reasserts itself, and the elements begin to combine into distinguishable objects. This theory of cosmic process enabled him to develop an evolutionary theory of life.

Psychology. He taught the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, a view also found in the Pythagorean school and in the Dialogues of Plato. Yet it is not clear how the implication of personal immortality can be made consistent with his doctrine of the cyclic aggregation and separation of the elements. His explanation of perception is, however, a direct consequence of the materialistic commitments of his cosmology. According to Aristotle (Anim. 427a 22), Empedocles made no distinction between thought and sense perception. Rather all knowledge is the result of material effluences given off by external objects entering into the pores of the sensory organs. If these effluences are neither too small nor too large in relation to the pores of the sensory organs, then they properly enter into the organs and produce sensation. Empedocles saw that a purely mechanistic theory of knowledge and consciousness is demanded by his materialistic cosmology, and he did not shrink from drawing the consequences.

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY; MATERIALISM; MECHANISM.

Bibliography: For the extant fragments, see H. DIELS, Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker: Griechisch und Deutsch, (10 ed. Berlin 1960–61). English. K. FREEMAN, tr., Ancilla to the Pre-Socratic Philosophers (Cambridge, Mass. 1957). EMPEDOCLES, The Fragments of Empedocles, tr. W. E. LEONARD (Chicago 1908). Secondary studies. F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946) 1:61–65. J. BURNET, Early Greek Philosophy (4th ed. London 1930). W. KRANZ, Empedokles (Zurich 1949). E. BIG-NONE, Empedocle (Turin 1916). H. LONG, "The Unity of Empedocles' Thought," American Journal of Philology 70 (1949) 142–158.

[R. J. BLACKWELL]

EMPIRICISM

Empiricism, more a philosophical presupposition than a definitive system, insists in general that knowledge begins with the senses and with sense experience. Some empiricists limit all knowledge to sense knowledge and deny the reality of universal ideas, necessary truth, and innate or a priori ideas (see SENSISM). This form of empiricism is opposed to RATIONALISM and IDEALISM, which attempt to deduce the nature of reality from the intelligible content of ideas in the mind. A less radical form of empiricism insists that experience be the final test for the validity of any idea or proposition, or holds that any knowledge transcending the data of experience can be only probable. EXPERIENCE itself has different meanings for empiricists. It may refer exclusively to sense data or to man's existential contact with external objects. For Locke, Hume, and Berkeley, it meant the impressions and ideas generated either by external objects or by the mind itself.

This article describes the various forms that empiricism takes in philosophical and scientific thought, surveys the historical development of empiricist attitudes, and concludes with a critical evaluation from the viewpoint of moderate realism.

Types of Empiricism. The principal positions that can be classified as empiricist include strict and relative empiricism, metaphysical empiricism, scientific empiricism, and logical empiricism. These may be characterized in summary fashion as follows:

Strict and Relative Empiricism. A strict or thoroughgoing empiricism refuses to recognize the validity of any knowledge that is not grounded in and verified by sense experience. Denying the validity of METAPHYSICS, it substitutes association and habit for causality, and collections of secondary qualities for substance, tending in general toward SKEPTICISM and AGNOSTICISM. As opposed to this, relative empiricism holds that while sense experience gives rise to ideas, such experience can be intelligently grasped by the intellect to furnish a metaphysical insight into the nature of reality as such.

Metaphysical Empiricism. Relative empiricism can also be termed metaphysical empiricism, although the latter expression has a somewhat different meaning in contemporary philosophy, where it designates a limited metaphysics of finite being growing out of sensible experience. Such a metaphysical empiricism grants the quasi reality of universal ideas or categories, together with the reality of cause and effect, possibility and existence, and substance and accident. At the same time it restricts such categories to the area of finite being and is content with a limited and relative truth about this area. It is strictly opposed to any sort of transcendent metaphysics or to claims for absolute and unchanging truth.

This empiricism purposes to be objective and realistic, and attempts to escape from the skepticism generated by the strict empiricism of Hume and from the subjectivism of KANT. At the same time it refuses to trust the ability of the human mind to rise above the finite and the temporal. Scientific Empiricism. Scientific empiricists seek to unify the laws of science so as to deduce the laws governing particular sciences from unified principles. Behind this enterprise lies the conviction that only natural science can provide certain knowledge. Scientific empiricism is closely allied to LOGICAL POSITIVISM, linguistic analysis, and contemporary British and American analytical philosophy.

Logical Empiricism. This is the logical counterpart of scientific empiricism. The movement began in the 1920s at the University of Vienna with a group known as the Vienna Circle, composed of men such as M. Schlick, R. Carnap, L. Wittgenstein, P. Frank, and H. Reichenbach. Their aim was to construct a theory of meaning and knowledge that would reconcile the valid elements of rationalism and empiricism through the use of logic and the procedures of natural science. Mathematical or symbolic LOGIC and linguistic analysis were their chief tools. Most logical empiricists adopt Hume's notions of causality and induction, insist on the tautological nature of mathematical and logical truth, and conceive of philosophy as a clarification of everyday language. They usually reject metaphysics as a pseudo-science based on pseudo-problems, having their source in linguistic confusion. One of their principal commitments is to the verifiability principle, which states that only those propositions can be held as true that are capable of actual or possible experiential verification.

Historical Origins. EPICURUS of Athens (341–270 B.C.), from whom EPICUREANISM takes its name, was probably the first radical empiricist. For him, the criteria of truth are sensations, preconceptions, and feelings; and all knowledge is based on sensation. The universe is a void in which atoms move and combine with one another to form material things. These things continually emit minute particles that impinge on the corporeal soul of man and, forming images of themselves there, produce knowledge. His is a crude MATERIALISM, basically reducible to sensism. Zeno of Citium (c. 336–264 B.C.), the founder of STOICISM, conceived of the universe as matter penetrated with and guided by an eternal fire. This fire he identifies with nature, the touchstone and key to all knowledge and wisdom.

Medieval Empiricism. The conflict between Platonic and Aristotelian thought was repeated in medieval thought in the persons of St. Augustine (A.D. 354–430) and St. THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–74), respectively. For St. Thomas, as for Aristotle, everything in the intellect is somehow grounded in sense experience; thus, Aquinas finds in the sensible world principles that explain the structure and intelligibility of all being. More empiricist in mentality was WILLIAM OF OCKHAM (1290?–1349), who restricted human certitude to propositions having direct experiential reference. Since only singulars exist, and since all the singulars with which man makes contact are sensible, it is to the sensible world and to the concepts that stand for it that he goes for certitude. All other knowledge, for him, is abstractive and can give no real idea of existence. For example, Ockham sees no way in which either the existence of God or the existence and spirituality of the human soul can be rationally demonstrated. He does admit, however, that one can make an act of faith in the existence of realities transcending sensible experience.

Renaissance Period. The empirical tradition was carried on during the Renaissance chiefly by four thinkers. LEONARDO DA VINCI (1452-1519) conceived of nature as a product of the divine mind. For him, only by an investigation of nature can man return to its source and learn something of divinity. "Wisdom is the daughter of experience" was a favorite saying of his, and it is mathematics that enables one to interpret experience and come to an understanding of the rational order operative in nature. Juan Luis VIVES (1492-1540) is often credited with being the father of experimental psychology, since his approach to the human soul was based on introspection and experience. Tomasso CAMPANELLA (1568-1639) was especially interested in harmonizing the new science with both a philosophy based on experience and the teachings of Christianity. He wrote a defense of Galileo in which he stated that if Galileo was to be proved wrong, it must be done by new observations and not by a priori judgments. Galileo GALILEI himself (1564-1639) can be considered an empiricist insofar as he held sense experience to be necessary for ascertaining the existence of objects before mathematical method could be applied to them. Yet experimental verification of mathematical conclusions, while helpful in some cases, was not regarded by him as necessary for those who understood his mathematical method.

British Empiricists. Francis BACON (1561–1626), dissatisfied with rationalism and scholastic philosophy, pleaded for a new system of education based on factual data and conclusions derivable from such data by strictly empirical and scientific methods.

John LOCKE (1632–1704) used a psychological approach, his investigation of experience taking the form of an examination of consciousness. He held that what is known are ideas, and that the whole knowledge process consists in reflecting on the content of these ideas and in discerning their relationships. His empiricism, therefore, is primarily subjective. Locke had to assume a world of things with the power to cause sensible changes in a knowing subject. This world of things he reduced to a minimum of so-called primary qualities, viz, motion, rest, extension, magnitude, and number. Secondary qualities, for him, were the impressions made on the knower, viz, color, taste, sound, odor, resistance. Behind qualities there might be substance; but, since this was never directly sensed, the knowing subject could never account it as more than a collection of secondary sensible qualities. Locke thus thoroughly undermined the foundations of REALISM, and his successors were not slow to remove those foundations entirely.

George BERKELEY (1685–1753) concluded from this that, since man could never know things, but only ideas of things, there were no things at all. God could just as well cause the ideas of things within us as the things themselves.

In his own way, David HUME (1711–76) was no less drastic. Never denying a reality independent of mind, he nonetheless reduced that reality to the barest minimum. Since the human intellect could make no contact with substance, the most that could be asserted was that there were ideas of events, and that these ideas were more or less vivid, more or less closely associated in the human mind. The mind itself was nothing more than a series of ideas, all following each other successively. Since only substance can exercise causality, he argued that causality could mean only a habitually constant association of ideas. This process led him to a hesitant skepticism about the validity of all knowledge.

American Development. In the United States the empirical movement developed chiefly under the influence of Charles Sanders PEIRCE, William JAMES, and John Dewey. Peirce (1839–1914) is generally considered the founder of PRAGMATISM, a form of empiricism in which the emphasis is on activity. According to Peirce, the purpose of thought is to produce belief, and belief has three characteristics: (1) it is something of which man is aware; (2) it appeases the irritation of doubt; and (3) it involves man in establishing habits of action. Thus, beliefs are ordered to action, and different beliefs are distinguished by the diverse actions to which they lead. Hence, sensible effects become the criterion of the content value of any idea. Yet Peirce does attempt to account for abstract and class concepts. The concrete object of experience is for him an exemplification of the possible and as such is able to refer the knower beyond itself; this reference is not sufficient, however, to transcend the order of experience as a whole, and Peirce makes no attempt to do so.

With William James (1842–1930) a more radical form of empiricism appeared, affirming that the only way to settle metaphysical disputes is to refer them to action and practical consequences. James advocated a deemphasis of principles in favor of consequences and facts. He went further than Peirce in stating that its results not only give a proposition meaning, but even make it true. Hence, for him, truth is any activity that enables one to get into practical harmony with his experiential situation. In his preface to The Meaning of Truth (New York 1909), James describes his empiricism as consisting of (1) a postulate, (2) a statement of fact, and (3) a generalized conclusion. The postulate states that only those things that can be defined in terms drawn from experience should be debated by philosophers. The statement of fact is that the relations between things are as much part of experience as the things themselves. The conclusion is that the parts of experience are held together by relations that are themselves parts of experience. Thus does James reduce both knowledge and the object of knowledge to the flux of experience.

John Dewey (1859-1952) applied the teachings of Peirce and James to history, sociology, politics, and education. He taught that philosophy must grow out of the philosopher's personal experience in the cultural and historical situation in which he finds himself, this alone being of the real and constituting the real. Yet for Dewey such experience takes place in the naturalistic context of the 19th century, which accepted the Darwinian theory of evolution and regarded mind and man as climactic processes emerging out of the universal dynamism of nature. Experience, in his understanding, cannot be distinguished from nature, and reality is a series of events acting and reacting on one another on a purely physical level. In such a universe, truth is only a precarious balance of interconnecting events that constitute a situation, this situation being constantly modified from within and without. Natural science provides man with the most stable sort of knowledge possible. And faith becomes an act of trust and hope in science, in human intelligence, and in man's quest to unite himself ever more perfectly with the flow of events of which he is a part.

Critical Evaluation. Empiricism is forced to limit KNOWLEDGE to the order of experience and to treat the human INTELLECT simply as a more powerful sense faculty. Yet there is evidence, found in experience, that the intellect transcends the material order. Man does form class concepts, or UNIVERSALS; and, while sense experience may be needed in order to begin, the term of the process, the CONCEPT, is free from the limitations that matter everywhere imposes. A material thing is always individual, and so is a SENSATION. The intellect, however, forms concepts that are predicable of many different individuals in exactly the same way; such concepts abstract from individual differences and particularizations (see ABSTRACTION). Since the principle of particularity is matter, to be free from such limitation is to be free from matter (see IN-DIVIDUATION).

The fact of intellectual REFLECTION also indicates that there is more to knowledge than what the senses provide. The intellect is aware of its own act as it places it, but the eye, for example, cannot see itself seeing. Intellectual reflection, too, can identify the principles that structure a sensible thing. There must be more than matter in a material thing; how else can the evident difference between one material thing and another be explained? Material things exist, yet existence and matter are not synonymous; otherwise how can thought that transcends the limitations of matter, but is just as real, be explained?

Empiricism emphasizes a truth without admitting its full implications. The need of experience in the knowing process must be recognized, but it must be recognized too that knowledge cannot be adequately explained merely in terms of the sensible. In fact, the human intellect finds in experience the need to transcend the sensible order and arrive at truths that alone make such experience intelligible.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; PHENOMENALISM.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, Contemporary Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1956). J. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). G. FAGGIN, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:1878–94. É. H. GILSON, Elements of Christian Philosophy (New York 1960). S. H. HODGSON, The Metaphysic of Experience, 4 v. (New York 1898). G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Philosophy of Human Nature (New York 1953). G. DE SANTIL-LANA and E. ZILSEL, The Development of Rationalism and Empiricism (Chicago 1941). R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe (Berlin 1927–30) 1:334–336.

[H. R. KLOCKER]

EMRYS AP IWAN

Methodist minister, Welsh critic; b. Abergele, March 24, 1851; d. Rhewl, Denbighshire, Jan. 6, 1906. Robert Ambrose Jones (his real name), who was partly of French origin, studied on the Continent, later taught English in Switzerland, and was ordained a Methodist minister in 1883. His vital contribution to Welsh literary studies was the discovery that the definitive period of Welsh classical prose was the renaissance era between the Protestant reform and the Methodist revival that originated with the work of Gruffydd Robert of Milan. This conclusion was the fruit of his search for the finest instrument of clarity and style for the propagation of the Gospel in Welsh. His study of Welsh classical poetry also brought him face to face with the Catholic past of Wales. His esteem for Pascal deepened his interest in Catholicism as he saw its organic and sacramental strength in contrast with divisive tendencies in Nonconformity. But his hatred of clericalism, reinforced by the influence of the French anticlerical pamphleteer Paul Louis Courier, posed a dilemma that he never resolved. However, he objectified it in Breuddwyd Pabydd Wrth Ei Ewyllys (posthumous, 1931, A Papist's Wishful Dream), which depicted a future Catholic Wales, reconverted by a native clergy, as the link between Welsh Christian culture and Catholic truth. A proper study of the native language, he thought, would aid in this process. This view involved him in public dispute with Methodist leaders over their policy of opening English churches in predominantly Welsh localities, thereby weakening the currency of the Welsh language. He devoted himself to the education of children through the medium of Welsh, and his uncompromising stand for the purity of Welsh was a Christian defense of the cultural bases of Christianity. He was a prolific writer of homilies, sermons, and essays, a master of a rational and discursive style far removed from the evangelical exhortatory fervor of early Methodism. His works, prophetic in their diagnosis of Welsh cultural developments, continue to exercise great influence in contemporary Wales.

Bibliography: EMRYS AP IWAN, Detholiad o erthyglau a llythyrau, ed. D. M. LLOYD, 2 v. (Aberystwyth 1937–40). Dictionary of Welsh Biography down to 1940 (London 1959) 509–510. J. S. LEWIS, Ysgrifau dydd Mercher (Aberystwyth 1945). T. G. JONES, Cofiant Emrys ap Iwan (Cardiff 1912).

[C. DANIEL]

EMS, CONGRESS OF

The meeting of the representatives of the three prince-electors of Mainz, Cologne, and Trier, and the prince archbishop of Salzburg at Bad Ems (July 25 to Aug. 25, 1786). Its purpose was to establish a common policy for the German metropolitans against the alleged restrictions of their jurisdiction by the Roman Curia through the accreditation of papal nuncios to various German principalities.

Background. This anti-Roman attitude of the archbishops was as much the result of the enlightened ideas of FEBRONIANISM and GALLICANISM as of the lust for power of the metropolitans that was supported by Emperor JOSEPH II. The immediate occasion for this congress was the erection of a papal nunciature in Munich at the request of the Bavarian Prince-Elector Karl Theodor (Feb. 17, 1785). Its purpose was to limit the jurisdiction of foreign bishops in Bavaria, after the Roman Curia had declined to erect new bishoprics in Bavarian territory. Thereupon the three prince-electors, as well as the archbishop of Salzburg and other bishops, sent a written protest to the pope and to Karl Theodor. The latter, however, assured the churchmen that this new nunciature did not change anything in German Canon Law and, like PIUS VI, he rejected the protest as devoid of application. Then the archbishop of Mainz, Friedrich Karl Joseph von ERTHAL, sent a written complaint to the emperor, requesting him as protector of the German Church to protest to Rome against the sending of a nuncio to Munich. The ruler replied that he recognized the nuncios in Munich and in Cologne only as diplomatic representatives of their secular sovereign, not as the bearers of any ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and he invited the prince-elector of Mainz to let him know his own and his suffragans' objections against the Roman Curia. Encouraged by this answer from the emperor, the German archbishops refused to accept the credentials of the papal nuncios in Cologne and Munich, prohibited any appeal to their tribunals, and declared their jurisdiction in the Reich as ended. When the new nuncios began to exercise their rights anyway, the metropolitans tried to counter this move of the pope by assembling at Ems under the leadership of Erthal.

The Punctation of Ems. The 23 articles of the Ems agreement (Aug. 25, 1786), signed by all delegates, proposed to limit the pope to those rights he had held prior to the time of the False Decretals. Its main resolutions were as follows: The plenary powers of the nuncios in matters of dispensation, inquisitorial proceedings, and acceptance of appeals should in the future pass to the bishops. The episcopal oath prescribed by Gregory IX (1227-41) was declared incompatible with the duties of an imperial prince. Appeals to Rome were to be abolished. Exemptions of religious orders were to be revoked, and their connection with Rome severed. Roman decrees were to require the episcopal placet. Roman benefices and Roman legal procedure were to be reformed in favor of the national bishops. Finally, the Vienna concordat agreed to in 1448 by the Holy See and Frederick III would have to be abrogated and replaced by the decrees of the Council of Basel (1431-49) and the Agreement of Aschaffenburg (1447). Early in September of 1786 the articles of the Ems draft agreement were sent to Joseph II, who approved them but suggested a consultation between the metropolitans and their suffragan bishops. (See FALSE DECRETALS.)

Opposition to the decrees. Meanwhile, however, a strong party fought the Ems resolutions through fear that a great increase in power of the metropolitans might even cause a schism. The opposition of the bishops was strengthened by the uncompromising attitude of the prince-elector of Bavaria, who in a Promemoria directed to the Imperial Diet defended the nuncios and energetically opposed the usurpation of the archbishops. When other secular princes approved this standpoint, there appeared early in 1790 the Pii Papae VI responsio super nuntiaturis apostolicis (1789), which refuted the complaints against the papal nunciatures, reprimanded in a paternal way the revolt of the archbishops, and refused to accede to their request for a papal legate to the Imperial Diet, saying that negotiations about this matter were outside the competence of such an envoy. Impressed by this papal declaration, Abp. Clement Wenceslaus of Trier withdrew from the agreement within a month. The metropolitans of Cologne and Salzburg gave up their attempts at ecclesiastical innovations in the wake of the French Revolution. Thus, there remained only the initiator of the congress, Prince-Elector von Erthal of Mainz, who did not want to bow down. But he could not realize his subversive ecclesiastical plans. The victorious French revolutionary armies invaded Germany, annexed a large part of his domains to the French Republic, and drove him and the two other Rhenish metropolitans from their capitals. The Punctation of Ems thus became meaningless.

Bibliography: H. SCHOTTE, "Zur Geschichte des Emser Kongresses," Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 35 (1914) 319–348. G. J. JANSEN, Kurfürst-Erzbischof Max Franz von Köln und die episkopalistischen Bestrebungen seiner Zeit (Bonn 1933). E. WOLF, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:462–463. L. JUST, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957-65) 3:856–57.

[F. MAASS]

EMSER, HIERONYMUS

Humanist and literary adversary of Martin LUTHER; b. Weidenstetten, near Ulm, March 26, 1478; d. Dresden, Nov. 11, 1527. He studied humanities at the University of Tübingen in 1493 and law at the University of Basel in 1497. At this time he became secretary to Cardinal Raimondo Peraudi, who was papal delegate in Germany for the preaching of the jubilee indulgence for a crusade against the Turks. In 1504 he lectured at the University of Erfurt on the comedy of Johann Reuchlin, Sergius, sive capitis caput, with Luther as one of his listeners. He was employed in 1509 as secretary to Duke George of Saxony, who sent him to Rome the next year to plead for the canonization of Benno, Bishop of Meissen (d. 1066). On his return Emser wrote the Vita Bennonis (1512), claiming that it was based on sources; however, it is unreliable. About 1512 he was ordained and received a benefice at Dresden and at Meissen. Present at the Leipzig disputations of 1519, he became the opponent of Luther, whom he had earlier admired for his courage. To Luther's publicized Ad aegrocerotem Emserianum M. Lutheri additio he replied with the harsh A venatione aegrocerotis assertio. He was also the adversary of Karlstadt on images, and Zwingli on the Canon of the Mass. Between 1520 and Bibliography: E. L. ENDERS, Luther und Emser, Ihre Streitschriften aus dem Jahre 1521, 2 v. (Halle 1890–92). F. LAU, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:462. E. ISERLOH, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² 3:855–856. A. HUMBERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 4.2:2499–2500.

[E. D. MCSHANE]

EMYGDIUS OF ANCONA, ST.

Bishop of Ascoli Piceno, Italy; martyred at Ancona, Aug. 5, 303-4. A legend describing the life, miracles, and death of Emygdius (also Emygdus, Emigdius, Emidius) is extant in several conflicting versions, none earlier than the 11th century. According to the legend, Emygdius was a barbarian from Trier and was converted to Christianity there. At an early age he went to Rome and undertook a vigorous missionary activity under Pope MARCELLUS I. After he provoked popular indignation by his desecration of a statue of Aesculapius, Marcellus consecrated him a bishop and sent him to evangelize the region of Ascoli Piceno. His missionary work was successful. During the persecution of Diocletian, he was beheaded at Ancona with his three companions, SS. Eupolus, Germanus, and Valentinus. His cult spread through Italy, where he is considered an effective protector against earthquakes. Perhaps for this reason he is now venerated in San Francisco and Los Angeles, Calif.

Feast: Aug. 9.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 2:16–36. P. A. APPIANI, Vita di S. Emidio (Rome 1702). J. F. MASDEN Y MONTERO, Difesa critica degli antichi atti del S. Martire Emidio (Ascoli 1794). A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956–) 3:292–293.

[J. BRÜCKMANN]

EN CLARA VOX REDARGUIT

The office hymn that was historically assigned for Lauds in Advent. Under the title Vox clara ecce intonat it originated probably in the fifth century, and is sometimes ascribed to St. Ambrose. The four strophes in iambic dimeter set forth the message of John the Baptist as found in the readings for the first Sunday of Advent (Rom 13.11–14; Lk 21.25–36). After an introductory strophe the call goes out to arouse the slothful soul so that it might see the bright new star, or sun, depending on whether sidus refers to the star of Jacob (Num 24.17), or morning star, stella (Apoc 22.16), or to the Sun of Justice (Mal 4.2). Since the Lamb of God is sent to pay man's debt (Jn 1.29), man must do penance and ask pardon (Ps 78.9) in the hope of protection (Is 42.8) when Christ comes in glory. In the revised version of this hymn that was found in the Roman Breviary of 1632, only four lines were left unchanged from the original text.

Bibliography: H. A. DANIEL, Thesaurus hymnologicus, 5 v. (Halle-Leipzig 1841–56) 1:76, text. J. JULIAN, ed., A Dictionary of Hymnology (New York 1957) 2:1228–29. Analecta hymnica 51:49. J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster MD 1957) 52–53, Eng. tr.

[M. M. BEYENKA]

EN UT SUPERBA CRIMINUM

An office hymn that was historically prescribed for the Vespers of the feast of the Sacred Heart. It is the work of an anonymous 18th-century author who composed two other "Ambrosian" hymns honoring the Sacred Heart, Auctor beate saeculi and COR ARCA LEGEM CONTINENS, each with five strophes and a doxology. Biblical references (Mt 11.29; Eph 5.2; Heb 6.6) and the teachings of the Fathers provide material for the poet. The hymn declares that through the thrust of the centurion's lance and man's sin, the side of Christ was pierced. Thence was born the Church, Bride of Christ, who sends forth streams of grace in the Sacraments. The faithful Christian will return Christ's love by love and avoid sin, which wounds the Sacred Heart.

Bibliography: J. CONNELLY, Hymns of the Roman Liturgy (Westminster, MD 1957) 132–137, text and Eng. tr. M. A. WIL-LIAMS, The Sacred Heart in the Life of the Church (New York 1957). H. LAUSBERG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:910.

[M. M. BEYENKA]

ENCOMIENDA-DOCTRINA SYSTEM IN SPANISH AMERICA

This system was based on the cooperation of the encomendero and of the doctrinero. The encomendero, usually a conquistador or his descendant, was to supervise the integration of his native wards into the social and economic life of Europe and help the doctrinero (teacher) establish the cultural and religious patterns of Christianity. This cooperative system, as far as we know today, first appeared in Mexico in the 1520s and was based on the often tragic experience of Spain in the three preceding decades in the Antilles. Quite possibly, it was the result solely of this common experience and can not be credited to any individual. However, its prompt establishment in Mexico owes much to the foresight and compassion of Cortés and to the cooperation of Mexico's first priests, the Franciscans.

The Doctrinero. In 16th-century Spanish America the doctrinero was almost always an Augustinian, Dominican, Franciscan, or Mercedarian friar. Royal policy did not favor granting this work to the diocesan clergy. The Jesuits, founded only after the initial conversion of the Americas was well under way, did not share notably in this work. The friar was selected by his provincial, who had to clarify that the individual was adequately trained in theology and in the respective native language. The actual appointment was made by the viceroy or his equivalent in the name of the king. Quite often, the doctrinero was not appointed to a specific doctrina but to a central convent situated near his charges. It was the duty of the superior of this convent to supervise the work of the friars under his care, to appoint each to a definite doctrina, and to visit the doctrinas at least three times each year. He reported to the provincial, who, in turn, had to visit the doctrinas once every three years. The doctrinero had to return to this central convent each Friday for a short theological discussion and for recreation, a humane provision.

The Doctrina. A typical doctrina contained a church, priest's residence, school, hospital, cemetery, and often an obraje. No non-native, and this included even the parents of the doctrinero, could remain longer than three days in the doctrina. The cost of the plant was defrayed one-third by the crown, one-third by the encomendero, and one-third by the native tribes. In the hospital the sick were cared for and travelers were given lodging. The quality of the hospitals varied greatlysome were merely miserable huts, while others were richly endowed and staffed with trained surgeons and numerous slaves. Hospital care was free because each native taxpayer gave one tomin a year as part of his head tax. The school was intended to train the sons of the caciques and other prominent families in Christian doctrine, reading and writing Spanish, a little arithmetic, and instrumental and vocal music. The students with their teachers formed the parish choir. The teachers assisted the doctrinero and in his absence even conducted church services, such as funerals, simple Baptisms, and processions. At first, the friars were the teachers. Within a few years, the task was entrusted mostly to trained natives, who were rewarded with the title of Don, exempted from personal services and numerous taxes, and paid in food and clothing. The obraje was the village workshop where the natives wove cloth, worked leather or metal, or made pots for sale to pay for a new church or to pay those taxes which were demanded in money so the head of the family would not be forced to labor outside the doctrina to acquire the needed sum. Later these frequently became sweatshops and were often manned by prison labor.

Methods. There was a wide variation in the details of the methods whereby the doctrinero cared for the spiritual instruction and needs of his people. However, on the broad outline there was general agreement. Essentially this agreement was forced by the circumstance that the Indians numbered many millions, the doctrineros, hundreds. To aggravate the problem, the native tribes were scattered over a vast and often inhospitable territory. It was obviously impossible even to think of individual instruction. Group indoctrination was the only feasible solution if the task was to be accomplished with reasonable speed and thoroughness. Even this presented a problem. If each group had to be completely instructed in the faith before Baptism, many decades would certainly pass before the work could be completed and numerous natives would die without the Sacrament. The solution was found in the protracted catechumenate. This system demanded that the native be reduced to living in a town under the control of the encomendero and doctrinero. Then the native could be baptized after instruction in the doctrines which theologians considered essential for salvation, on the supposition that this rudimentary instruction would be perfected in the course of years by enforced attendance at doctrinal classes held at regular intervals, once a week in some places and twice a week in others, and conducted by the doctrinero or his substitute. Therefore, the native was reduced to pueblo life and each pueblo was divided into districts with a native fiscal, or alguazil, in charge. On the days when the people of the district were to appear for instruction, the fiscal would knock on their doors to remind them and would then go to the church plaza to check their presence against the official roll. Repeated absences without excuse were punished. No native was forced to be baptized (although at times impatient or stupid doctrineros did use force), but once baptized, he had no choice about attending the classes in doctrine.

In class, great stress was laid on learning by heart a formulary of the main truths that the Spaniards called the doctrina cristiana. It consisted of the sign of the cross, the Our Father, the Hail Mary, the Apostles' Creed, the Hail Holy Queen, the 14 articles of faith, the commandments of God, the commandments of the Church, the Sacraments, the spiritual and corporal works of mercy, the theological virtues, the cardinal virtues, the seven capital sins, the enemies of the soul, and the four last things. As an aid to understanding, the doctrinero used charts, pictures, tableaux, mystery plays, reenactments of portions of the Bible, processions, and especially music. Many parts of the formulary as well as translations of some of the hymns of the ancient Church such as the Athanasian Creed were set to song. The people were encouraged to sing them at home and at work. Many hymns were used for their social dances, a custom in keeping with their pagan rites where the dance was an integral part of their religion. At the same time, the liturgy was conducted with great solemnity. For this purpose, the teachers of the local school were taught to play the part of the canons in the cathedrals and to come to church in the mornings and afternoons. In the morning they chanted a short morning prayer and then a hymn that described some part of the life of Christ. Each day had a different hymn. In the afternoon, they chanted a sort of evensong made up of a few short psalms, an act of contrition, and a petition that God bless them and their village for the night. It was a sort of monastic ritual shared by the people of the whole town.

The doctrinero was supposed to check the knowledge of each native individual at the time of the Easter confession. If it was not satisfactory, the individual could not receive this Sacrament or Communion and ordinarily would be remanded to a special class for intensive instruction. Usually extra priests were sent to help the doctrinero during the Lenten season.

By 1574, the encomienda-doctrina system was found in approximately 9,000 pueblos in Spanish America with about six million inhabitants, according to Juan López de Velasco. These figures are especially valuable because in 1573 the crown forbade the extension of the encomienda beyond the territory in which it was then established. This decree marked the end of the encomienda-doctrina system as a frontier institution. In time, the doctrina was to become simply a parish entrusted to the care of the diocesan clergy under the supervision of the bishop. A new institution would be developed to care for the pagan natives beyond the frontier of Spanish America. It would be called the mission (see MISSIONS IN COLONIAL AMERICA).

[A. S. TIBESAR]

ENCUENTROS, NATIONAL PASTORAL

Three national pastoral Encuentros assembled Hispanic Catholics from across the United States in Washington, D.C., in 1972, 1977, and 1985. The meetings were characterized by frank deliberations with broad sociological, anthropological, and ecclesiological implications. After briefly surveying the situation of Hispanic Catholics in the U.S., this entry describes the National Pastoral Encuentros and their outcome.

Latino Identity. Before Vatican II, Latino Church identity was largely regional. Archbishop Robert E. Lucey of San Antonio had helped organize the Bishop's Committee for the Spanish Speaking in 1945, but it was limited to diocesan efforts. Later he guided an interdiocesan outreach to migrant workers, but ethnic concentrations of Puerto Ricans in New York, Cubans in Miami, and Mexicans and Chicanos in the West and Southwest still led the Church to more specific consideration of local challenges and opportunities. Lay involvement was generally restricted to area cofradías and parish organizations. Television and other media, however, made Hispanics of one region more visible to those of other areas. World War II and national civic organizations such as the G. I. Forum strengthened the bonds of national identity. The burgeoning civil rights movement added to the ferment and led to the organization of other national Hispanic publications and conferences.

New theological and ecclesiological dialogue in Catholic South America, reflected at Medellín, also affected U.S. Catholic Hispanics. In 1969 Chicano priests organized Padres Asociados por los Derechos Religiosos, Educativos y Sociales (PADRES) and two years later Chicana Religious formed Las Hermanas. Lay movements such as the Cursillo, Marriage Encounter, and the Christian Family Movement swept the country, creating national networks and training thousands of new leaders. César CHÁVEZ, a cursillista, began to organize farmworkers, and in 1970 Patricio Flores, himself a farmworker, was ordained the first U.S. Hispanic bishop. A coalition of many of these leaders, led by Virgilio Elizondo, founded the Mexican American Cultural Center (MACC) in 1972.

The First National Encuentro. All these events were indirectly essential remote preparation for the first national Encuentro. Its immediate organization began at a 1971 meeting between Robert Stern, director of the Spanish Speaking Apostolate for the Archdiocese of New York, and Edgar Beltrán of the Latin American Episcopal Conference.

The 1972 Encuentro consisted of a few hundred participants, mostly Church leaders, who demanded full participation of Hispanics in all aspects of Church life. As a result, ecclesial authorities began implementing changes. The Division for the Spanish Speaking in the United States Catholic Conference became an independent secretariat with layman Pablo Sedillo as director. Regional offices for Hispanic ministry were initiated or reorganized. More Hispanics were ordained bishops, and dioceses founded agencies for Latino ministry. A permanent committee of Bishops for Hispanic Affairs was also created. These were important steps obtained as a direct result of a national effort of U.S. Hispanic Catholics who worked together toward common objectives.

At the first Encuentro, although there were inevitable tensions between the various ethnic groups later labeled Hispanic, there was also dialogue. The first Encuentro had a sparse representation of laity, women, youth, or the poor, but it set in motion a national networking and consensus building that continued to grow. Recognition of the importance of the Spanish language and Hispanic culture, and the acknowledgment of Latinos' rightful role and contribution to the entire U.S. Church, accelerated significantly after the First Encuentro.

The Second Encuentro. The process of the second Encuentro addressed many previous tensions. Almost five times as many delegates and observers attended, the fruit of a national consultation of over 100,000 people. Rather than a series of presentations, this Encuentro was a working session of grass roots organizers. Spanish was the official language. The second Encuentro elicited more episcopal participation in its proceedings that were published by the United States Catholic Conference. The conclusions called on both the participants and the entire Church to: (1) continue with the consultative Encuentro process; (2) form Basic Christian Communities; (3) correct injustices within and outside the Church using an option for the poor; (4) promote ecclesial unity based on diversity; and (5) foster lay ministry. Of particular note was the heightened profile of youth.

The Third Encuentro. Unlike the first two, the third Encuentro of 1985 was convoked by a pastoral letter of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops titled The Hispanic Presence: Challenge and Commitment. This was the first NCCB publication dedicated solely to Latino concerns. After an overview of the reality of U.S. Latinos, the bishops summarize the achievements of Hispanic ministry and outline consequent pastoral implications. Further, they make a "Statement of Commitment" that pledged to the Church the use of its resources for the temporal and ecclesial needs of the Hispanic community. Finally, they convoke the third Encuentro to help them to "face our responsibilities well."

The bishops expressed a desire to draft a National Pastoral Plan for Hispanic Ministry based on the conclusions of this Encuentro. Diocesan and national teams began the process of massive consultation with particular emphasis on previously under represented groups. The great majority of participants had taken part in the exhaustive process of local, diocesan, and regional preparation that reached an estimated 200,000 people through this classic Church event. Efforts paid off in a balanced delegation that included more women and the poor, but young people were still under represented.

Specific themes coalesced into a working document presented to almost 1,200 delegates representing over 130 dioceses. The open and genuine dialogue included some disagreement, for example, several hundred Encuentro delegates staged a protest until the emphasis on the value, equality, and dignity of women was restored to the text of the concluding statement. However, this organized protest itself witnessed to the success that the Encuentro process had achieved in promoting lay leadership in general and women leaders in particular. Ada María Isasi-Díaz, Yolanda Tarango CCVI, Ana María Díaz Stevens, María Luisa Gastón, Rosa Marta Zarate, María Iglesias SC, Ana María Pineda RSM, Olga Villa Parra, Dominga Zapata SH, and countless others witness to the fact that virtually all the extant Hispanic national leadership among women was involved in the Encuentros.

Based on the conclusions of the third Encuentro, the NCCB published the National Pastoral Plan for Hispanic Ministry (NPPHM) in 1987. As in the case of the proceedings of the prior Encuentros, the implementation of the NPPHM has been mixed. The process, if not all the documents, however, represents a milestone in the history of the U.S. Church.

Enduring Influence of the Encuentros. Sociologically, the Encuentros fostered greater national networking among Latinos. Numerous diocesan and regional offices attest to this fact, as well as the National Secretariat, and the growing number of national Hispanic Catholic organizations such as the Academy of Catholic Hispanic Theologians of the United States (ACHTUS). Anthropologically these assemblies defended, even celebrated, the right of all Church members to be at once both universally Catholic, and peculiarly distinct in language and culture. No other ethnic group in the country has incarnated this insight as successfully. Ecclesiologically they championed a Church that is communitarian, evangelizing, and missionary. Indeed, some of the Encuentro proceedings predate both of the similarly collaborative U.S. pastoral letters on peace (1983) and the economy (1985).

Only greater historcal perspective will afford a comprehensive evaluation of the Encuentros, but it can already be said that their influence did not end in 1985. The Encuentros gave rise to noted national organizations such as the Instituto de Liturgia Hispana, and they have continued to grow and mature. Many dioceses began their first coordinated efforts at serving and empowering Latinos as a direct result of the National Pastoral Plan. The best example of the enduring influence of the Encuentros is the National Catholic Council for Hispanic Ministry. In 1990 some eighteen regional and national Hispanic Catholic associations founded this consortium precisely to continue the collaborative efforts so successfully pioneered at the Encuentros. By 1995 the NCCHM counted forty-nine member organizations. Among their activities was a national Congress held in Los Angeles in 1992, and another in Chicago in 1996. In method and content both the NCCHM and its congresses purposefully follow and consciously continue the three national Encuentros.

The post-Encuentro period has seen a boom in the publication of documents concerning Latinos through the USCC, and other editorials, as well as a plethora of periodicals devoted to Hispanic ministry. Latino representation on theological faculties and in such organizations as the National Conference of Catechetical Leaders, while still small, continues to expand.

Bibliography: J. P. DOLAN and A. F. DECK, Hispanic Catholic Culture in the U.S.: Issues and Concerns (Notre Dame 1994). S. GALERON, R. M. ICAZA, and R. URRABAZO, Prophetic Vision: Pastoral Reflections on the National Pastoral Plan for Hispanic Ministry (Kansas City 1992). M. SANDOVAL, On the Move: A History of the Hispanic Church in the United States (Maryknoll 1990). S. A. PRI-VETT, The U.S. Catholic Church and its Hispanic Members: The Pastoral Vision of Archbishop Robert E. Lucey (San Antonio 1988). A. M. STEVENS-ARROYO, Prophets Denied Honor: An Anthology on the Hispanic Church in the United States (Maryknoll 1980).

[K. G. DAVIS]

ENCYCLICAL

A letter, "essentially pastoral in character" (John Paul II, Ut unum sint [May 25, 1995], no. 3), written by the pope for the entire Church. Encyclicals have not been used for dogmatic definitions, but rather to give counsel or to shed light on points of doctrine that must be made more precise or that must be taught in view of specific circumstances. For instance, the encyclical Veritatis splendor (Aug. 6, 1993), "limits itself to dealing with certain fundamental questions regarding the Church's moral teaching" (no. 5).

An encyclical is, first, a papal letter and is therefore distinguished from pastoral letters written by an ordinary for his diocese. Second, it is a letter, and therefore distinguished from other papal documents, such as apostolic constitutions. Since it is a pastoral document, it pertains ordinarily to doctrinal, moral, or disciplinary matters; it is not a legislative text. An encyclical letter is ordinarily addressed either to the bishops or to the entire Church, although at times it is also addressed to those persons who are not members of the Church, but are of "good will." The encyclical letter is also used both in the Orthodox Churches, as is evidenced by the ecumenical patriarch's regular encyclicals for Christmas and Easter, and in the Anglican communion, for instance, at the end of Lambeth Conferences held every 10 years.

History. There have been formal papal letters written for the entire Church from the earliest days of the Christian era. But it seems that the first modern usage of the encyclical as now known was made by Benedict XIV on Dec. 3, 1740, in his encyclical epistle Ubi primum, dealing with episcopal duties. It is only in more recent times, from the reign of Pius IX, that encyclicals have become frequent expressions of the pope's ordinary teaching authority.

Authority. The teaching contained in an encyclical has generally not been given as belonging formally to the deposit of revelation, but as Pius XII stated it pertains to Catholic doctrine: "In writing them, it is true, the Popes do not exercise their teaching authority to the full. But such statements come under the day-to-day teaching of the Church. . . . For the most part the positions advanced and the duties inculcated by these encyclical letters are already bound up, under some other title, with the general body of Catholic teaching" (see Pius XII, Humani generis [Aug. 12, 1950], AAS 42 [1950] 568). Because of this, an encyclical is generally considered to be an expression of the pope's ordinary teaching authority; its contents are presumed to belong to the ordinary magisterium unless the opposite is clearly manifested. Because of this, the teaching of an encyclical is capable of being changed on specific points of detail (see Paul VI, Allocution, June 23, 1964, AAS, 56 [1964] 588).

Pope John Paul II began to use encyclicals to present points of church teaching that are henceforth to be considered "definitive." For instance, in Evangelium vitae (March 25, 1995), he used the following formulas: "Therefore, by the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, and in communion with the Bishops of the Catholic Church, I confirm" (no. 57). Or, again: "Therefore, by the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, in communion with the Bishops . . . I declare" (no. 62). And: "In harmony with the Magisterium of my Predecessors and in communion with the Bishops of the Catholic Church, I confirm" (no. 65).

Reception. Although Catholics are to give assent to the moral and doctrinal content of papal encyclicals, three points must be kept in mind. First, encyclicals possess less authority than dogmatic pronouncements made by the extraordinary infallible magisterium (unless otherwise specifically provided). Second, they usually do not contain definitive, or infallible, teaching (unless otherwise clearly stated, as noted above). Finally, the publication of an encyclical does not imply (unless otherwise provided) that the theological issues examined in the encyclical are now closed. An encyclical necessarily expresses a particular theological point of view, but it is usually not a definitive assessment.

Social Encyclicals. Beginning in 1891 with Leo XIII's Rerum novarum, the teaching of the Church relating to matters of social justice, human rights, and peace has been expressed in encyclicals. Pius XI issued Quadragesimo anno (1931); John XXIII, Pacem in terris (1963); Paul VI, Populorum progressio (1967). Three major social encyclicals of John Paul II are: Laborem exercens (1981), Sollicitudo rei socialis (1987), and Centesimus annus (1991). These teachings are usually centered on the dignity of the human person and on the gospel message that is a basis and motivation for action (Centesimus annus, nos. 53, 57).

Bibliography: R. P. MCBRIEN, ed., Encyclopedia of Catholicism (San Francisco 1995), s.v. "Encyclical." F. G. MORRISEY, Papal and Curial Pronouncements: Their Canonical Significance in Light of the Code of Canon Law (Ottawa 1995) 11–12.

[F. G. MORRISSEY]

ENCYCLOPEDIAS AND DICTIONARIES, CATHOLIC

An encyclopedia is a comprehensive summary of the significant knowledge of an era. It may either embrace all fields of human interest or be limited to the coverage of a specific subject area. The modern encyclopedia, however, because of the massive volume of facts accumulated in all fields, is less ambitious than its ancient and medieval counterparts.

Ancient Works. To the Greeks, "encyclopaedia" meant "circle of knowledge" or "complete education," a concept exemplified by the extensive works of Aristotle, who attempted to assemble all knowledge available through human observation and thought. With a similar intention, Pliny the Elder claimed to treat in his Historia naturalis (A. D. 77) "the subjects included by the Greeks under the name of 'Encyclic Culture.' Naturally, when the Church in the early Middle Ages undertook to preserve and disseminate the knowledge and wisdom of the ancient world, her scholars had at hand ready models for their own compendia.

As early as 551, Cassiodorus, distinguished statesman and secretary to Theodoric, produced the Institutiones divinarum et humanarum lectionum after his retirement to his monastery of the Vivarium, later adding notes to his manuscript for the benefit of the "simple and unpolished brothers" of his community.

Medieval Compilations. The standard medieval encyclopedia was the Etymologiarum libri XX of Isidore of Seville, completed in 623. The first work to contain a printed map of the known world, the Etymologies is a primary source for the modes of thought and factual knowledge of the preceding centuries. Its influence on later encyclopedias can scarcely be overrated. The De univer- so two centuries later of Rabanus Maurus, Abbot of Fulda, was a rearrangement of the Etymologies that bowdlerized, as well as plagiarized, it. The greatest achievement of the Middle Ages was undoubtedly the Speculum maius of Vincent of Beauvais (1190–1264), written under the patronage of St. Louis of France, who supplied numerous copyists for the many extracts incorporated in it. The first vernacular encyclopedia was the work of Brunetto Latini (d. 1294), a Florentine statesman and friend of Dante who wrote Li livres dou trésor during his exile in France.

Other compilers and titles of importance in the medieval period were: Honorius of Autun, Imago mundi (1090); Lambert of Saint-Omer, Liber floridus (1120); and Alexander Neckham, an Augustinian of St. Albans (1157-1217), who compiled a De naturis rerum. The Abbess Herrad of Hohenburg (d. 1195) was the first woman to compile an encyclopedia: her Hortus deliciarum was one of the finest illuminated manuscript encyclopedias of which there is record. The Compendium philosophiae (c. 1320), with traces of the influence of St. Albert the Great, has been attributed to the Dominican Hugh of Strassburg, author of the well-known Compendium theologiae. Pierre Bercheure, a Benedictine friend of Petrarch, compiled a three-part Reductorium, repertorium, et dictionarium morale utriusque testamenti (1340), and Gregor Reisch dedicated his Margarita philosophica to "ingenuous youth." Giovanni Balbi's Catholicon (1460), strongly influenced by the Etymologies, was printed, possibly by Gutenberg, "without help of reed, stylus or pen, but by the marvelous concord, proportion, and harmony of punches and types."

Before the late Middle Ages, nearly all these compilations of facts and conjectured facts were written in Latin, and their use was limited to the scholar. Translation into English began in 1480 with William Caxton's Myrrour of the World. This was the first illustrated book and one of the first encyclopedias to be printed in England, explaining "how moche the erth hath of heyght, how moche in circuyte, and how thycke in the rnyddle." The term encyclopedia, however, first appeared in English in Sir Thomas Elyot's The Governour (1531), which referred to the "circle of doctrine, whiche is in one worde of greke Encyclopaedia."

The Summas and the Mirrours of the Middle Ages and early Renaissance were followed by the Treasures and Tableaux of the 16th century. The latter were, in the main, collections of facts showing little or no mastery of the material and giving no evidence of critical research or basic plan.

Influence of Printing. The spread of printing accelerated the encyclopedic movement, yet there was little advance over Vincent's Speculum, first printed at Strasbourg (1473–76), then at Basel (1481), Nuremberg (1473–86), Venice (1484, 1494, 1591), and finally by the Benedictines at Douai in 1624. Raffaele Maffei included biographical sketches and an index in his Commentariorum urbanorum libri XXXVIII (1506). Francis Bacon was the first to base his work on the philosophy and interrelation of the sciences. Although his Instauratio magna (1620–23) was never completed, its comprehensive and well-ordered plan greatly influenced Diderot and D'Alembert in their work on the controversial Encyclopedie two centuries later.

Louis Moréri's Le grand dictionnaire historique (1674) was deliberately designed as an apologia and defense of the Church. Noteworthy for its new emphasis on geographical and biographical material, it greatly influenced German, Spanish, and English encyclopedias of the period. The Biblioteca universale sacro-profano of the Franciscan Vincenzo Maria Coronelli would have been the largest alphabetically arranged encyclopedia in existence, but only seven volumes were completed (1701–06). It is important for its plan and for innovation of the practice of italicizing the titles of books cited in the text.

After Ephraim Chambers' Cyclopaedia (1728), "compiled from the best authors," had changed the pattern of encyclopedia publishing from single authorship to collaborative effort, two more Catholic contributions were compiled single-handed. Jacques Paul Migne was responsible for the Encyclopédie théologique (1844–66), a series of 168 special Dictionnaires covering dogmas, heresies, liturgy, symbolism, and many auxiliary sciences. Gaetano Moroni (1840–79) published his Dizionario di erudizione, which, though poorly organized, was rich in notes not found elsewhere. Wetzer and Welte's Kirchenlexikon (1847–60; 2d ed. 1882–1903) and Der Grosse Herder (1853–57; 5th ed. 1952–56), however, followed the pattern set by Chambers.

Modern Developments. With the 20th century, as knowledge became progressively specialized, practically every country began to produce well-edited encyclopedias for reference in special, as well as in general, fields. The U. S.-edited Catholic Encyclopedia (1907–14) was for more than half a century the most significant Catholic reference work in English. The New Catholic Encyclopedia (1967) replaced the older work for all practical purposes, but the earlier publication is still useful for historical material in some areas and for specific facts that can be located by means of its excellent index.

In France, Letouzey began (1903) publication of the great French series *Encyclopédie des sciences reli*gieuses, composed of the following individual works: Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie (eds. F. Cabrol and H. LeClereq); Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (eds. A. Baudrillart et al.); Dictionnaire de théologie catholique (eds. A. Vacant, E. Mangenot, and É Amann); Dictionnaire de la Bible (ed. F. Vigouroux); and Dictionnaire du droit canonique (ed. R. Naz). Since these works have been in progress for over half a century, some of the material is out of date, and some of the bibliographies have been superseded by later publications. The Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, however, is being brought up to date by elaborate indices, and the Dictionnaire de la Bible is being replaced by the Supplément (1928-, ed. L. Pirot), so the series as a whole is still an essential source of information of vast proportions. Beauchesne's Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique, ed. M. Viller et al. (1932-), includes many biographies. Catholicisme hier, aujourd'hui, demain (1948-), now being issued by Letouzey under the editorship of G. Jacquemet, is the most recent French publication covering these subjects.

The Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. Buchberger (1930–38), has been replaced by a new work of the same title, ed. Josef Höfer and Karl Rahner. The Italian Enciclopedia cattolica, completed in 1954, covers historical and contemporary matters of concern to the Church. The Netherlands has produced De katholieke Encyclopaedie (1950) and the Encyclopaedie van het Katholicisme (1955–60); the Jesuits at Sophia University, in collaboration with the German publishing house of Herder, have published the Japanese Katolikku Daijiten (1940–53).

The Staatslexikon (6th ed. 1959–63) of the Görres-Gesellschaft, the Herder Lexikon der Pädagogik (3d ed. 1962), H. Aurenhammer's Lexikon der christlichen Ikonographie (1959–), and the Handbuch Theologischer Grundbegrifle, ed. Heinrich Fries (1962–63), are typical of the many encyclopedias and dictionaries in special fields published under Catholic auspices.

Since the end of Vatican II in 1965 there have been additions to this list of the encyclopedias and dictionaries. The most extensive of these publications is Concilium: Theology in the Age of Renewal which began publication in 1964 and is still in process. With multiple issues per annum there are now more than 220 volumes. It appears in English, French, German, Spanish, Portuguese, and Dutch. Immediately following Vatican II the six volume Sacramentum Mundi and the three volume Sacramentum Verbi, both published by Herder and Herder, the former edited by Karl Rahner and the latter by Johannes Bauer, were published as encyclopedias, which brought the documents of the Council to bear on theology and biblical theology. One volume abridged versions of these encyclopedias appeared a few years later.

In the United States the short-lived Corpus Publications produced the three volume Encyclopedic Dictionary of Religion and the one volume Corpus Dictionary of Western Churches. More recently there have been series of one volume encyclopedias on specific topics. Michael O'Carroll, C.S.Sp., has edited a series of five volumes entitled: Corpus Christi, an Encyclopedia of the Eucharist; Theotokos, a Theological Encyclopedia of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Trinitas, a Theological Encyclopedia of the Holy Trinity; Veni Creator Spiritus, a Theological Encyclopedia of the Holy Spirit; and Verbum Caro, an Encyclopedia on Jesus. In addition Christopher O'Donnell, O. Carm., has edited Ecclesia, a Theological Encyclopedia of the Church for this series. These were published by Michael Glazier and The Liturgical Press. The Liturgical Press has also published an extensive series of one volume encyclopedias: The New Dictionary of Theology; The New Dictionary of Sacramental Worship; The New Dictionary of Catholic Spirituality; The New Dictionary of Catholic Social Thought; Consecrated Phrases: A Latin Theological Dictionary; A Concise Dictionary of Early Christianity; and The Liturgical Dictionary of Eastern Christianity. There is also the Dictionary of Christian Biography which is ecumenical in scope.

Mention must also be made of a number of one volume encyclopedias from various publishers. The Historical Dictionary of Catholicism, by William J. Collinge (Scarecrow Press, 1997) is no. 12 of the series Historical Dictionaries of Religions, Philosophies, and Movements. Michael Glazier and Thomas J. Shelley have published The Encyclopedia of American Catholic History, a vast and unique collection of information. There is the specialized Dictionary of the Liturgy, edited by J.P. Lang, OFM, published by Our Sunday Visitor. Three onevolume general encyclopedias complete our coverage of American publications. In 1987 Thomas Nelson Publishers gave us The Catholic Encyclopedia, edited by Robert C. Broderick. Two years later, Harper-San Francisco produced The Harper-Collins Encyclopedia of Catholicism. In 1994 The Modern Catholic Encyclopedia was published by The Liturgical Press. These three publications approach Roman Catholicism from differing viewpoints and can be used in conjunction with one another. The multi-volume New Catholic Encyclopedia published updated volumes 16 through 19 along with the Jubilee Volume of 2000.

From Italy we have the Dictionary of Fundamental Theology (English edition edited by Rene Latourelle). Italy has also given us the multi-volume Dizionario degli Istituti di Perfezione, published by Edizioni Paolini beginning in 1973, and the two-volume Dizionario Patristico e di Antichità Cristiane, produced by the Institutum Patristicum Augustinianum in 1991. An English translation came out in 1992 as Encyclopedia of the Early Church. In the 1990s Germany produced a completely revised edition of the Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche. The French continue the work of completing several of the vast encyclopedias mentioned above.

Bibliography: R. BÄUMER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiberg 1957–65) 6:998–1001. "Dictionaires," Catholicisme 3 (1952) 742–746. R. L. COLLISON, Encyclopaedias: Their History throughout the Ages (New York 1964). G. A. ZISCHKA, Index lexicorum (Vienna 1959). R. BALLEY, Guide to Reference Books (11th ed. Chicago 1996). A. J. WALFORD, Guide to Reference Material (London 1961). L. M. MALCLÈS, Les Sources du travail bibliographique, 3 v. in 4 (Genève 1950–58). S. P. WALSH, comp., General Encyclopedias in Print, 1965 (Newark, Del. 1965).

[M. C. CARLEN/R.B. MILLER]

ENCYCLOPEDISTS

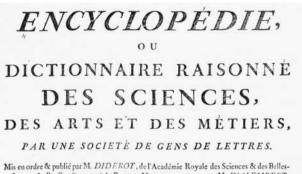

Originally the term encyclopedists referred to the contributors to the French Encyclopédie, but it has come to be used for all the 18th-century Frenchmen who shared the scientific, political, and religious views popularized in that work.

Origins of the Encyclopedia. The Encyclopédie, ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers, par une société de gens de lettres, like many revolutionary ideas of its century, had its immediate source in England. In 1728 Ephraim Chambers had published a two-volume work titled Cyclopedia; or an Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences; Containing an Explication of the Terms, and an Account of the Things Signified Thereby, in the Several Arts, both Liberal and Mechanical, and the Several Sciences, Human and Divine . . . the Whole Intended as a Course of Ancient and Modern Learning. Between 1743 and 1745, John Mills, an Englishman, and Gottfried Sellius, a native of Danzig then residing in Paris, arranged for a French translation of this work, and requested the bookseller André LeBreton to undertake its publication. LeBreton obtained the necessary privilège royal, but shortly afterwards eliminated Mills and Sellius from the project, perhaps because their translation was found to be inadequate. In their place he recruited Jean LeRond D'Alembert and Abbé Jean Paul Gua de Malnes. One year later Denis Diderot was added to the staff, and in 1747 he became the general editor. It is generally thought that Diderot was responsible for the decision to enlarge the general scope of the Encyclopédie; in his prospectus of 1750 he described it as a compilation "particularly from the English dictionaries of Chambers, J. Harris [Lexicon technicum, or an Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, 1704], and T. Dyche [A New General English Dictionary, 1740]."

The first volume of the Encyclopédie, published in Paris in 1751, caused great concern among the orthodox, especially the Society of Jesus. Some charged that the JE-SUITS wished either to destroy the project or to take it into their own hands, pointing out that their Dictionnaire de Trévoux was actually a literary competitor, while their Journal de Trévoux regularly attacked the Encyclopédie. Leading Jansenists also expressed their dismay at the nature of the publication (see JANSENISM). However, the work found some favor at court, if only because Mme. de Pompadour cared for neither Jesuits nor Jansenists, and no official action was taken against the Encyclopédie until the appearance of the second volume in 1752. At that time the council of LOUIS XV suppressed the two volumes in existence because they contained "maxims tending to destroy the royal authority, to establish a spirit of independence and revolt . . . to build the foundations of error, of moral corruption, of irreligion and of unbelief." Nevertheless, the license to publish further volumes was not revoked, and the work continued with a new volume appearing each year until 1757. During this period the Abbés Tamponnet, Millet, and Cotterel acted as official censors, reviewing all articles, not only those touching theological matters. By 1757 the original list of subscribers had grown from about 2,000 to about 4,000.

In 1759 there was a new suppression of the work, this time by the Parlement of Paris. Later the same year the privilége royal was revoked. At this juncture Diderot (D'Alembert had dissociated himself from the project the previous year) proceeded clandestinely with the remaining ten volumes of text, which were published together at Neufchâtel in 1765. These aroused little opposition, however, partly because LeBreton had taken it upon himself, without Diderot's knowledge, to eliminate all passages he thought might offend civil or ecclesiastical authorities. By the time Diderot discovered what had been done it was too late to repair the damage. Marie-Angélique Vandeul, Diderot's daughter, relates that her father ordered LeBreton to print a copy of the ten volumes with the deleted passages restored, but no such copy has ever been found.

Contents and Contributors. The Encyclopédie, in its completed form, consists of 17 folio volumes of text and 11 volumes of plates published by LeBreton, four supplementary volumes of text and one of plates published by C. J. Panckoucke in Paris (1776–77), and two volumes of index prepared by Pierre Mouchan and published in Amsterdam (1780). The first volume of the Encyclopédie contains D'Alembert's celebrated "Preliminary Discourse," in which he asserted that the purpose of the undertaking was to present the principles and essential details of all the sciences and arts; to provide a ready means of instruction, both for teachers and for those who wished to learn by themselves; and to preserve man's knowledge for posterity. Following Francis BACON, D'Alembert divided all the sciences into three classes, depending on whether they pertained to memory (history), imagination (the beaux arts), or reason (philosophy). The entire schema is delineated in a chart in the first volume. There are articles on various phases of biology, chemistry, cooking, gardening, grammar, history, mathematics, medicine, philosophy, physics, and religion, as well as on the trades and manufactures of 18thcentury France.

Mas en ordre & public par DL DIDEROT, de l'Academie Royale des Sciences & des Belles-Lettres de Pruffe; & quant à la PARTIE MATHEMATIQUE, par M. D'ALEMBERT, de l'Académie Royale des Sciences de Paris, de celle de Pruffe, & de la Société Royale de Londres.

Title page of the first edition of the Encyclopédie, 1751.

In many instances the Encyclopédie articles are totally lacking in the objectivity that one expects to find in a 20th-century encyclopedia or dictionary. The authors availed themselves of any and every opportunity to introduce their own political, philosophical, or theological points of view, often in an indirect or satirical manner. While many articles reflect a completely orthodox point of view, others express atheistic or deistic ideas popular among French intellectuals. However, much of what shocked the more conservative segments of society is no longer thought daring, e.g., the advocacy of freedom of the press, the denial of supreme papal power in temporal affairs, the denunciation of slavery, the suggestion that Scripture often uses the language of the common man rather than that of the scientist, and the rejection of INNA-TISM in knowledge.

Approximately 60 writers contributed to the Ency-clopédie. Some of the better-known authors are: the Chevalier de Jaucourt, Diderot's chief aid and practically his only assistant while the last ten volumes were in preparation; George Louis Buffon, a naturalist; the Marquis de CONDORCET, mathematician and philosopher; Baron Paul HOLBACH, author of the Système de la Nature and other antireligious works; Baron de MONTESQUIEU, famous for his Esprit des lois and Les Lettres Persanes; Jacques Necker, financier and economist of sorts; Jean-Jacques ROUSSEAU, man of letters and political philosopher; Anne Robert Turgot, economist and statesman; and François Marie Arouet VOLTAIRE, philosopher and literateur.

It would be difficult to overestimate the influence the Encyclopédie exercised over French intellectuals at the time of its publication; it is generally conceded that it was one of the principal intellectual sources of the Revolution. In the 20th century, of course, it is very dated as an encyclopedia, and its chief value is as a historical document.

Bibliography: The Encyclopédie of Diderot and D'Alembert: Selected Articles, ed. J. LOUGH (Cambridge, Eng. 1954). A. M. WIL-SON, Diderot: The Testing Years, 1713–1759 (New York 1957). P. GROSCLAUDE, Un Audacieux Message: L'Encyclopédie (Paris 1951). F. VENTURI, Le Origini dell'Enciclopedia (Florence 1946). J. E. BARKER, Diderot's Treatment of the Christian Religion in the Encyclopédie (New York 1941). J. LEGRAS, Diderot et l'Encyclopédie (5th ed. Amiens 1928). L. DUCROS, Les Encyclopé distes (Paris 1900).

[R. Z. LAUER]

END

A term with many meanings. It frequently has the sense of a terminus or limit, especially of time or place or quantity; so one speaks of the end of an hour, the north end of a city, or the end of a rope. Sometimes end denotes the pure result of a cessation of activity, such as death or the end of a battle. Another meaning, of major importance in philosophy and theology, is end as "the object by virtue of which an event or series of events happens or is said to take place; the final cause" (Webster's Third New International Dictionary). End in this sense, as final cause, is that for the sake of which something exists or is done, that for which an AGENT acts or action takes place. A surgical operation has as its end health; a knife is for cutting.

Characteristics. To understand adequately the latter sense of the word end, one must recognize its terminal nature, its causal aspect, its identity with the good, and its relation to means.

End as Terminal. The end as final cause has often been described as that which is first in the order of intention and last in the order of execution or activity. "Last in the order of activity" expresses its terminal quality. Since the end is simply the outcome or goal of what an agent does or seeks, as such it terminates his movement toward that goal; for example, the physician's work is over when the patient returns to health. Even when the goal aimed at is action, as when one plays simply for the action involved in playing, the end, in this case the action itself, completes the agent's striving (St. THOMAS AQUI-NAS, C. gent. 3.2).

End as Causal. Although end is, then, last in the order of activity, it is first in the order of intention; and this primacy in intention has reference to its causal nature (Summa Theologiae 1a–2ae, 1.4). When a patient dies in the midst of an operation, death is for him an end in the sense of a terminus; in the same sense, his death terminates the operation. But the patient's death is not the end in the sense of the cause or reason for the operation, since it is not what the surgeon intends.

The intended end, health, is responsible for each step taken by the surgeon in preparing for and carrying out the operation, viz, (1) health is desired; (2) an operation is necessary; (3) thus anesthesia must be administered; and (4) the patient has to be wheeled to surgery. Steps (2), (3), and (4), it should be noted, are chosen only in virtue of the basic aim, health. If health were not intended, they would not be. Moreover, as planned procedures, they exist only as psychic states. In the execution of the acts, the order is inverse: (1) wheeled to surgery, (2) anesthesia, (3) operation, and (4) health. What is first intended (health) is the last thing achieved and what is last intended (wheeled to surgery) is the first thing done. Moreover, what is first intended exercises a determining influence over everything else. The end, then, must be said to be a cause, if it is right to call a cause anything that influences the becoming or existence of a thing (In 5 meta. 1.751). Paradoxically, that which is final in the sphere of action is the cause of all the activity leading up to it; hence, the name final cause (see FINAL CAUSALITY).

End as Good. The concepts of end and GOOD necessarily involve each other. The end is that which an agent tends to or wills; he intends or wills it because he sees it as good or as suitable to him. In St. Thomas's words, "since the essence of good consists in this that something perfects another as an end, whatever is found to have the character of end also has that of good" (De ver. 21.2; see also 1.1).

The essence of good rests in its relation to the power by which one seeks for or desires things, the power called APPETITE. Appetite implies want; want implies incompleteness. Whatever then satisfies appetite (perfects it) is suitable to it, and is therefore desirable. The good is that which completes or perfects appetite.

This concept of good is obviously wider than that of moral good. Man has different levels of appetite, and an object may be good insofar as it is desirable by any one appetite. An object will be morally good only if it fulfills and is suitable to the whole person; it must befit man as man, not simply as he is a sensitive or a living being (see MORALITY).

Its desirability is the very reason why the good is a cause. A man can make a desk, read a book, or rob a bank; but, whatever he does, he does it because he thinks it is of value to him, that it will benefit him in some way; in other words, he finds it desirable. The causality of the good is basically a matter of attraction. The good causes by so enticing the agent to itself that he not only intends to get the good but also intends to do whatever is necessary to get it. Aristotle rightly defines the good as "that at which all things aim" (Eth. Nic. 1094a 3).

End, final cause, and good thus are seen to be identical. One and the same thing is called end because it is the term of an agent's striving, final cause because it influences the agent to act to begin with, and good because it indicates why the agent is so moved.

End as Related to Means. A desire for a good implies both a recognition that the good is attainable (otherwise it is not truly desired but merely wished for) and a resolve to take those measures judged apt for securing it. The measures taken to obtain the end are commonly referred to as the means. In the description of the end as "that for the sake of which something exists or is done," the phrase "something exists or is done" designates the means.

A means cannot be understood without referring it to the end in view of which it is chosen. As Aquinas observes, "the means are good and willed, not in themselves, but as referred to the end. Wherefore the will is directed to them, only in so far as it is directed to the end: so that what it wills in them, is the end" (Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 8.2). What attracts the agent is not so much the nature of the means as a particular kind of thing as it is its value for achieving the end. In other words, what the agent sees and seeks in the means is basically the goodness of the end itself. Both a biologist and lumberman may value a virgin forest, but for different reasons because their purposes are different.

What influences the agent to desire the end thus influences him to choose the means. The character of the end is then imprinted on the means, so that the means takes on the nature of the end in much the same way that wax takes on the nature of the form impressed on it. Thus, the physical action of walking can be a healthful exercise for a recuperating patient, a punishment for a cadet, or a job for a professional golfer (cf. Summa Theologiae 1a2ae,13.1; De ver. 22.15).

The means, of course, still retains its own nature as a particular kind of thing, and as such it will have other attributes that may or may not be desirable. A medicine with a high alcoholic content may relieve the cough for which it was taken but also may be otherwise appealing. The initial and basic attraction of the means is its participation in "the goodness of the end." However, one may be additionally inclined or disinclined to it by features that are peculiarly its own. These features may at times prevent the choice of that particular means. But if the means is willed, then willed also are all its known concomitant attributes, desirable or not. They become part of what is intended.

The foregoing analysis of the end may be summed up as follows. A thing is recognized by an agent to be of value to him. It is a good. The attractiveness of the good causes the agent to desire it and to choose the appropriate means to attain it. It is a final cause. When the means have been determined, the order of intention is closed. The agent then begins to execute the means. The appropriate actions are formed until the desired good results. The actions have reached their term, which is called the end.

Kinds of end. While the distinction between ends and means is clear, the reality these terms describe is not so simple. Sometimes a thing may be an end in one respect and a means in another. To deal more precisely with the complexities of the concrete situation, scholastic philosophers make various divisions of end.

Related ends in a given series may be distinguished on the basis of their order of achievement. A proximate end is that for the sake of which something is done directly or immediately. An intermediate end is that in view of which the proximate end is sought and which itself is desired for something else. Both proximate and intermediate ends are also means, each often being referred to as a means-end. The last end in the series is called the ultimate end. A business employee attending night school studies hard to pass a particular course (proximate end). Passing the course will help him earn a degree (intermediate end), which will enable him to get a promotion (ultimate end). An ultimate end is said to be relatively ultimate when the series of which it is the last is subordinate to a higher end or ends. The promotion (relatively ultimate end) may be desired because the salary increase will finance the children's education (a higher end). The absolutely ultimate end—the supreme end—is that to which all of an agent's actions are directed and which is sought for its own sake alone. The supreme end of man is HAPPINESS.

Another division of end is that into objective end (finis qui), the good or object itself that is sought, for example, money or knowledge; personal end (finis cui), the person for whom the good is desired, for example, health is sought for Peter; formal end (finis quo), the act in which the good is possessed or enjoyed, for example, the enjoyment of food is in the eating.

The end of the work (finis operis), sometimes called the end of the act, is the normal purpose or function of a thing or action, or the result normally achieved; for example, cutting is the normal function of a knife. The end of the agent (finis operantis) is what the agent actually intends when acting, be it identical or not with the end of the work (an agent may use a knife for cutting or as a screwdriver). The end of the work, and also the end of the agent, is called an intrinsic end when it perfects the agent interiorly, for example, knowledge; it is called an extrinsic end when its benefit is felt outside the agent, for example, the doctor's healing felt in the patient. Extrinsic end also may signify the end of the agent when the latter differs from the end of the work.

Natural end is distinguished from supernatural end. Natural end is a good responding to needs within the order of nature and attainable by the natural powers of a being. Supernatural end is one that fulfills a need of supernatural life and is secured only with divine assistance. Natural end has at least two additional meanings: it may signify a good to which a being is inclined by an innate appetite, or it may be used as a synonym for the end of the work (see MAN, NATURAL END OF).

Does the end justify the means? The preceding study of end should clarify the issues involved in this question, which, in the history of thought on end, has received considerable attention. Can a morally good intention of itself make an act good?

Scholastic Solution. Attempts to formulate and resolve the question began as early as the twelfth century, when Peter ABELARD took the extreme position that all human acts are in themselves morally neutral and receive whatever morality they have from the agent's intention. PETER LOMBARD partially disagreed, arguing that, although the intention is the principal source of morality, there are intrinsically evil acts that no intention can make good. STEPHEN LANGTON at the start of the thirteenth century assumed the other extreme position, that the morality of an act is determined almost exclusively by its object that which the act immediately tends to achieve (see "end of the work," above)—and the circumstances in which the act occurs, the intention contributing little or no moral value.

Lombard's solution, given more elaboration and precision especially by St. Thomas Aquinas, prevailed. Discounting certain terminological differences, all the great masters of the thirteenth century maintained that, although the end is the primary moral determinant, both the object (end of the work) and the circumstances of the human act are contributing, and sometimes decisive, moral factors (Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 18–21; De malo 2–6).

The end is the chief moral element because it is the very reason for choosing and executing the means-act by which the end is realized. But no end is seen and willed in isolation; it is always willed as viewed through the means, as touched, so to speak, by the character of the means. The means-act is, then, part of what is intended, and its moral nature must be taken into account.

The morality of the means-act is drawn from its object. If what the act immediately tends to achieve conforms to the norm of morality, then the act is good; if contrary to that norm, the act is bad. An objective study of the human act, one made apart from the agent's intention and the circumstances of the individual case, reveals three distinct types of acts: (1) those that are good by nature because they always or normally have a morally good object, for example, acts of charity; (2) those evil by nature because they always or normally have a morally bad object, for example, blasphemy; (3) those morally indifferent by nature, because their object is neutrally related to the norm of morality.

The word "normally" in (1) and (2) above is significant, for circumstances alter cases. Just as in the physical order accidents sometimes cause effects other than what nature tends to achieve (e.g., the birth of a malformed child), so in the moral order the circumstances of an individual act may bring about an other than normal moral result. Normally, it is right to return on request something (e.g., a gun) held in trust, but not if the owner has an evil purpose in mind (e.g., to kill his wife). Similarly, the status of normally indifferent acts may be affected by moral CIRCUMSTANCES. In truth, since a means-act is never willed in abstraction but always in particular surroundings, the circumstances are part of the means-act and, consequently, part of the agent's intention.

In sum, if intention is understood to comprehend the whole order of intention, the willed-circumstanced means-for-an-end, then morality is completely in the intention. The intention is good if every part of it is good, and bad if a single feature is bad. However, if intention stands for the agent's purpose in distinction from the means-act chosen to realize it—and only when intention is so understood does the problem of the end justifying the means make sense—then the intention is the primary, but not exclusive, source of morality. It is primary because it is the reason for willing the means-act. A bad end can make a bad means worse, and it can make an indifferent or good means bad. A good end renders a good means better and an indifferent means good. Finally, a good end can never make a bad means good, although it does extenuate the evil. The moral guilt of one who steals to help the poor is certainly not as great as that of one who steals to pamper his sensual appetites.

This solution of the thirteenth-century scholastics to the problem of whether the end justifies the means became and remained the foundation of Catholic moral doctrine. That fact was challenged, however, four centuries later.

Historical Controversy. Defending JANSENISM by means of a strong offensive attack, Blaise PASCAL accused the Jesuits of teaching that the end justifies the means. It is interesting to note that, in the ensuing debate, neither side ever claimed that the end justifies the means; the dispute was solely over whether the Jesuits did in fact teach that it did. When advising confessors on how to assess the extent of a penitent's guilt, certain Jesuit casuists had used the phrase "direction of intention," meaning simply that the penitent's intention must always be examined. Pascal claimed that "direction of intention" was actually a methodological principle that enabled the casuists to justify any sin. The charge was categorically denied; but master of irony that he was, Pascal made the charge stick in the public mind. (See G. Goyau, "La Fin Justifie les Moyens," Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, 4 v. [Paris 1911-22] 2:9-17, for a concise but superb history of the controversy.)

The center of the controversy passed quickly from France to Germany, where Pascal's criticisms became the basis of the Protestant polemic against the missionary activity of the Jesuits. The debate heated up measurably from 1850 to 1905, when a considerable prize was offered by two priests (the Jesuit P. Roh in 1852 and Father G. F. Dasbach in 1903) to anyone who could show to a jury of law professors a book authored by a Jesuit that contained the explicit or equivalent formula that the end justifies the means. In 1903 one Paul de Hoensbroech appeared before the Court of Appeals in Cologne to make the only serious attempt to collect the prize. Unable to quote any Jesuit as saying that a good intention justifies a bad means, Hoensbroech contended that certain solutions of some Jesuit casuists proved they held this view. He referred specifically to a dispute among a number of Jesuits over the rightness of counseling a person bent on sinning to do something less evil, for example, to visit a prostitute rather than rape a young virgin. C. HURTADO and M. SA took the negative position because for them the means was bad. G. VAZQUEZ, A. de Escobar y Mendoza, and others argued that what the act of counseling (means) immediately achieved in this instance was simply the lack of a greater evil; it did not cause the evil itself because it did not provoke to sin someone already determined to commit sin. They concluded that the means was morally neutral and therefore the act was good by reason of a good intention. Hoensbroech claimed that the latter solution was based on the principle that the end justifies the means.

The German court ruled against him, and with good cause. As Goyau points out, in the case cited and in all the cases on which the accusations against the Jesuits were founded, the source of the divergent opinions among the casuists themselves and the object of their dialectical subtlety was always the moral nature of the means. Precisely because they firmly held that a good end could not justify a bad means, their entire mental effort was spent on evaluating the morality of the means. However one may disagree with the results of their evaluation, one must admit that the accusations against them were unjust. One may note finally, with Goyau, that since the Reformation, Catholics have been reproached for overemphasizing the objective nature of the moral act, and yet in this controversy they are accused of over-stressing the role of the subjective intention. The real issues are not always what they seem.

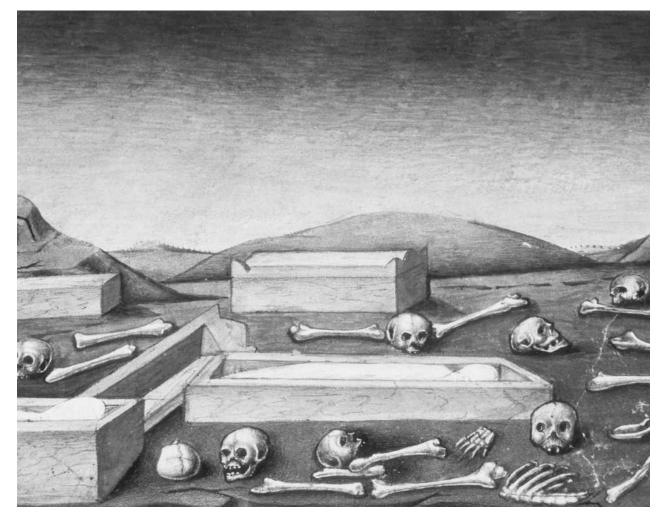

See Also: TELEOLOGY; CAUSALITY; HUMAN ACT; MORALITY; VOLUNTARITY.

Bibliography: General. V. J. BOURKE, Ethics (New York 1958). M. CRONIN, The Science of Ethics, 2 v. (Dublin 1939). É. H. GILSON, Moral Values and the Moral Life, tr. L. R. WARD (St. Louis, Mo. 1931; repr. Hamden, Conn. 1961). O. LOTTIN, Principes de morale, 2 v. (Louvain 1947). Special. C. DE KONINCK, "General Standards and Particular Situations in Relation to the Natural Law,' Laval Theologique et Philosophique 6 (1950): 335-338; "The Nature of Man and His Historical Being," ibid. 5 (1949): 271-277. C. HOLLENCAMP, Causa causarum: On the Nature of Good and Final Cause (Quebec 1949). L. H. KENDZIERSKI, "Object and Intention in the Moral Act," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 24 (1950): 102-110. O. LOTTIN, Psychologie et Morale aux XII e et XIIIe siècles, 3 v. in 4 (Louvain 1942-54) 4:309-517. B. PASCAL, Provincial Letters, tr. T. M'CRIE (New York 1941). J. WARREN, "Nature: A Purposive Agent," The New Scholasticism 31 (1957): 364-397.

[J. J. WARREN]

END OF THE WORLD

Christian revelation has nothing to say about the end of the world as a purely physical phenomenon that can be forecast or described in scientific terms. To seek such information in the Bible is a waste of time. When references are made to the beginning of the world (Gn 1.1; 2.4; Heb 1.2; 11.3) and the end (1 Thes 4.16; 2 Pt 3.10; Rv 21.1), the sacred writers are dealing with religious truths. Christianity is primarily concerned with the relationship between MAN and GOD, and the material universe is never considered for its own sake, in isolation, but is always to be understood in reference to man's ultimate supernatural DESTINY. Consequently one cannot give a satisfactory account of our belief concerning the end of the world without taking into consideration other truths of revelation and so fitting it into a much wider theological context.

"The Dead Risen Out of Their Sepulchres," from "The End of the World and Last Judgment," from "Predis Codex," 1476 manuscript painting by Cristoforo de Predis. (©Archivo Iconografico, S.A./CORBIS)

This article deals with (1) the end of the world as the term of salvation history, (a) the Messianic Age, present and to come, (b) difficulties in describing the future event, (c) problems connected with time, (d) the importance of the future event; (2) the end of the world and the material creation, (a) the part of matter in the redemptive plan, (b) the transformation of matter.

End of the World—Term of Salvation History. God is not aloof from the world He has created. He is a Father who intervenes in man's affairs and the supreme intervention was in sending His Son to save mankind.

Messianic Age, Present and to Come. The Messianic Age inaugurated by Christ is the great event of human history, and in a sense the end of the world has already begun. We are in the last days, since the world is in the process of apprehending the Redemption achieved in Christ for which it was created (see REDEMPTION). In his first Epistle, St. John says: "It is the last hour" (1.18), and he urges his readers to associate themselves with Christ, the truth and the life, and have no part with the powers of darkness (1.6). The final battle is already joined "so now many antichrists have arisen" (2.18).

This theme is developed in REVELATION, which was written to give encouragement to Christians suffering under the persecution of Domitian. St. John is concerned with spiritual realities, with God as punisher and rewarder. He is not setting out to give a description of the end of the world but rather of the situation with which the Christian will be faced as long as the present age lasts. What he says has a value for any moment in history. No matter how much evil may seem to prevail, God is in control. SATAN has been conquered even though his final overthrow has not yet taken place. This conflict is described in richly symbolic terms. The work of Redemption is still incomplete; only when the heavenly Jerusalem appears in its final glory will the individuals who make up the kingdom attain their full and complete Redemption.

The Gospels express this same truth in their teaching on the kingdom. The term kingdom is to be understood as rule or dominion, so the KINGDOM OF GOD is God's supreme rule or dominion. This was challenged by man at the Fall (see ORIGINAL SIN), and the work of Christ is to restore the kingdom. The parables in Matthew 13 indicate something of the complex nature of the kingdom. It will grow like a mustard seed; it will contain good and bad until the final judgment, as a net contains good and bad fish; it involves conflict between good and evil as good seed has to overcome the cockle; it is a leaven working to transform the whole batch; and it is likened to a wedding feast. In other words, the kingdom is not something static; it has a state here on earth and it has a future state of perfection. The perfect reign is still to come, it is not yet realized because the Church is still imperfect, it is not yet without spot and wrinkle. The kingdom in its fullness still lies in the future. So it is that one prays "Thy kingdom come," and because the kingdom is in one sense here and in another yet to come, there is a tension between "now" and "not yet."

Difficulties in Describing the Future Event. The future and final state involves the last judgment (see JUDG-MENT, DIVINE), the Second Coming of Christ, the RESURRECTION of the dead; and it implies a transformation that cannot adequately be described in human language. A similar difficulty confronted the PROPHETS of the Old Law when they tried to convey the glories of what was then the future, Messianic Age. They often had recourse to figurative language. This is especially true of the so called apocalyptic literature, such as the books of EZEKIEL and DANIEL. These works deal with God's judgments and they make use of symbolic and stylized phraseology to a much greater extent than normal writing and speaking. As signs of God's judgment there is earthquake (Is 13.13), the sun appearing as sackcloth (Is 50.3), the moon as blood (JI 3.4), the stars fall from heaven (Is 34.4), the mountains are moved (Jer 4.24), men call upon the mountains to fall upon them (Hos 10.8). These figures found their fulfillment in the various calamities of nature and war that befell Juda and Israel whereby God showed His judgment on the wicked. Such language was used to express times of crisis, and when one finds similar expressions used in Revelation and Our Lord's discourse in Mt 24.5-31, one has to be careful and not interpret them too literally. When one reads in 2 Pt 3.10-13 of the last days described in terms of the elements being dissolved in fire, the convention must be kept in mind. It was not intended to give an exact physical description of the changes that will be wrought in the material universe. The sacred writers are concerned with spiritual values and are anxious to create in the minds of their readers a strong impression that will drive them to practical action in their own lives. They wish to convey certain religious truths in the most effective way. At the end of time God will manifest Himself in a final judgment on mankind.

Problems Connected with Time. The new age that began with the MESSIAH works to its fulfillment in space and time, but the Prophets saw this age as a whole, and the time distinctions were blurred and telescoped so that there is often no clear distinction made between the initial coming of the Messiah and the final consummation. The sacred writers were more concerned with καιρός, the time of opportunity and fulfillment that is in God's hands (cf. Eccl. 3.1-8), than with χρόνος, time as measured in the calendar. Just as one is in danger of accepting certain references to physical happenings too literally, so the Apostles did not always allow for the time distinctions that have to be made if SALVATION HISTORY is to be accomplished in human conditions. They looked for a glorious manifestation of the Messiah all at once, and so in Mt 16.21 Christ made it clear that the triumph of the kingdom would not be established before His own death. At the beginning of Acts it is clear from the questions of the Apostles that they were still expecting the final stage of the kingdom to take place. It was only when they saw the ASCENSION OF JESUS CHRIST that they had final evidence that there would be a Second Coming-a coming that would finally complete the kingdom.

Revelation is silent as to when this event will take place in chronological time. It is only concerned that it will take place at the right time, God's time. So one has to be careful not to interpret too literally the signs of the end of the world. That the gospel must be preached to the whole world (Mt 24.14) is obvious when one considers that the Second Coming of Christ is the culmination of the Messianic Age. One cannot hope to deduce a date for this in the future since even St. Paul could speak of the faith of Christians being known to all the world (Rom 1.8). The Jewish tradition that Elia would come again in the days immediately preceding the last days to repeat the scene on Mt. Carmel (1 Kgs 18.36) and manifest the supremacy of Yahweh over false gods finds support in Mal 3.23 and Mt 17.11. But these last days can be interpreted of the Messianic Age itself, and the words of Christ in Mt 17.11–13 indicate that the prophecy is fulfilled, to some extent at least, in JOHN THE BAPTIST. Similarly, the references to a final apostasy (2 Thes 2.3) and the coming of ANTICHRIST can be understood of the continual conflict that assails the followers of Christ.

St. Thomas Aquinas (Summa theologiae 3a, suppl., 73) maintains a healthy skepticism as to the interpretation of these signs and does not indulge in some of the fantasies of his contemporaries. Theologians agree as to the suddenness of the end, at least in the sense that it will come about through a divine INTERVENTION and not simply as the result of natural processes. Although it must be admitted that the more one knows of matter, the more he becomes aware of its inner mutability, yet one has to beware of a purely scientific "proof" that the world will end some day. Such a view does not take into account the full reality of God's concern in human affairs and can easily lead to a deistic attitude toward creation. Exactly how far God will make use of secondary causes is just as much a problem for the last day as it is for the origins of the human race. It is permissible to hold that God will not dispense entirely from secondary causes any more than He dispensed from them in the origins of life. But it would be rash to read into some of the biblical accounts, 2 Pt, for example, a reference to a vast nuclear explosion.

Importance of the Future Event. The Second Coming of Christ became one of the predominant themes in the early Church, just as in the days before Christ there had been the expectation of the Messiah. This truth was seen to be intimately bound up with the whole of revelation. The certitude that Christ was risen meant that He would certainly come again to judge the world. A belief in the kingdom of God established by Christ meant a belief in the growth of that kingdom and a final manifestation at the last day. The whole prayer life of the Christian was geared to this event in the future. In Gal 6.10 it appears as the spur to charity. There is a close link between the paschal mysteries and the PAROUSIA. What was achieved in Christ at the first Easter will be fully accomplished in men at the last day (Phil 3.20). The liturgical assembly, the breaking of Bread, not only looks to the past, the death and RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, but also to the future coming (1 Cor 11.26). The liturgy transcends time, for Christians are united to the risen Christ now reigning with the Father and the Holy Spirit. It looks to the "eternal liturgy," the worship proffered by the blessed who are outside this world of change and time. So it is that in Revelation, St. John describes the heavenly worship in terms borrowed from the liturgy of his day. One is reminded of the connection between the Eucharist and the last day in the prayer O sacrum convivium: "the memory of His Passion is recalled, the mind is filled with grace, and the pledge of future glory is given to us." Some of the early Christians went so far as to expect the Second Coming to take place at night while they were watching at the vigil ceremony for the dawn Eucharist.

The end of the world caused a problem for the Thessalonians. It seemed as if death excluded men from the possibility of sharing in the Parousia. St. Paul (1 Thes 4) answers the difficulty by saying that those who have died in Christ will rise, and then all, the living and the dead, will go together to meet Christ when He returns to earth. He pictures the advent of Christ in terms of a conqueror coming home and all the citizens going to meet him at the city gates. The anxiety of the Thessalonians indicates an appreciation of the Parousia that has been lost. Christ is not only the savior of the individual, but He saves the Church. One's individual SALVATION is to be achieved in the Church and with others. The concern of the Thessalonians that their departed brethren should be present at the last day shows their sense of solidarity and true charity for all.

In this same Epistle one becomes aware of the feeling in those days that the Second Coming could not long be delayed. It should be remembered that the Church of NT times was so near to its origins that the figure of Christ had a great attraction at the purely human level. There were men still alive who had known and loved Him personally, and who could not bear the thought of being separated from Him for long. The beginning of the first Epistle of St. John captures this mood. No wonder that their prayer was "Come, Lord Jesus." They earnestly desired the Second Coming and were perhaps inclined to read their own fallible hopes into the teaching of Christ. But the Second Coming was delayed, Jerusalem was destroyed, and still the Lord had not come. In 2 Pt the assurance that the end will come is given, although one cannot say when. The apparent delay is due not to indecision on God's part, but to the fact that His judgment has to be worked out in time. Time is the measure of human events not of divine ones, and God shows Himself to men in time, as long-suffering and merciful (2 Pt 3.8-10).

As the Church grew and progressed there came a shift of emphasis in relation to the Second Coming. This event was now seen as the term of a long process. There was a realization that the Church had to work in the world, it had to grow according to human laws as well as divine. The significance of the parables of the mustard seed and harvest time was now realized. With the settlement of Constantine there came a growing concern for the transformation and conversion of the world in which the Church found itself. The need was felt to care for material as well as spiritual realities. There was the command to work until the Lord returns. In this way the implications of the INCARNATION were brought out, the idea of God working through human history now, just as He had done in the past. The history of the Church takes on a new significance. Salvation history is ended in so far as there can be no further revelation to supplant that of Christ, but it is still being enacted in so far as the world has yet to be completely sanctified in Christ.

In times of great natural disaster and political upheaval there has been a return to the idea that the end of the world is at hand. This was so in the days of Gregory the Great (d. 604) [see Hom. 1.1.5; 1.4.2, PL 76:1080; 1090] and also as the year 1000 approached (reflected in the Cluny liturgy of the dead). But for the most part, the exhortations to watch and the references to the suddenness of the end are now applied to the DEATH of the individual. This different outlook is understandable and good in so far as it brings out the truth that death is the encounter of the individual with the risen Christ, and at death one's eternal lot is determined, judgment is passed on one's life. But there has been a tendency in certain circles since the Renaissance to neglect altogether the consideration of the end of the world and to concentrate exclusively on the fate of the individual Christian. Retreats, missions, spiritual writers often put before the faithful the individual end of each man. Death, judgment, heaven, and hell are seen almost exclusively in reference to the individual (see HEAVEN, THEOLOGY OF; HELL, THEOLOGY OF). Perhaps the rather unsatisfactory attempts of fundamentalists to explain the end of the world in terms of physical science contributed to this shift of emphasis (see FUNDAMENTALISM). But in recent years there has been a growing appreciation that the sources of revelation are not at all concerned with a description of the physical end of the world. There is a greater awareness of the effects of Christ's saving mission working themselves out in the human situation. The whole of humanity has been incorporated into Christ and has Christ as its goal. This has resulted in the conviction that the teaching of Scripture on the Parousia has certain important social implications and that some sort of synthesis between the theology of the end of the individual and the theology of the end of the world has to be attempted.

End of the World and the Material Creation. One cannot understand the Christian message without a clear grasp of the meaning of the material world and its place in the Redemption. All this has a bearing on the way in which one understands the end of the physical world.

The Part of Matter in the Redemptive Plan. The Redemption was effected through the Incarnation. The fact that God became man and lived a human life, died, and is now in glory with His human body means that there is a theology of MATTER and terrestrial realities (see TEM-PORAL VALUES, THEOLOGY OF). While holding fast to the primacy of the spirit and being careful to avoid anything that savors of the false MESSIANISM of a purely earthly kingdom or the condemned view of the millennium [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, (Freiburg 1963) 3839], nevertheless one must assert that matter has its part to play in the future kingdom. The sacred writers are primarily concerned with spiritual values, but in so far as man has a body he is also part of the material world, and so revelation must have something to say, at least indirectly, about this side of creation. One is assured that man will live on, and man is not a disembodied spirit but body and soul, a totality. The doctrine of the resurrection of the body implies the survival of the material creation in some form or other and it is reasonable to suppose that all matter will have some part in the new world, not only the matter immediately associated with the human body. For the Christian, belief in the end of the world is not belief in the total ANNIHILATION of matter and the survival of purely spiritual realities. Today theologians tend to explain the end in terms of a gradual transformation rather than a discontinuity between this world and the one to come (see G. Thils). The end is a transformation of the world to which one belongs, at least a return to the original harmony of the creation before man sinned. God does not destroy what He has made but He brings it to completion, and the disorders created by man's sin and its consequences will finally be righted in the total victory of Christ. Such a view of the world implies a theology of human history (see HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF). God does not save man by withdrawing him from the world, but man is saved in and through history. The story of mankind is the story of a progress toward a final consummation of all things in Christ, the God-man. It is a progress that is only achieved with the help of divine intervention and not by man's unaided efforts. If man had not sinned there would be no such thing as human history as one knows it, and when on the last day all is accomplished, then human history will cease and so eternity will begin. P. TEILHARD DE CHARDIN has some valuable insights into this interpretation of the history of the human race when he speaks of all tending toward the omega point. So it is that a process of continual renewal, an unending series of "ends of the world" such as described by many pagan religions, does not fit in with the biblical idea of time as leading to a definite point in the future that will be the consummation of all [M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion, tr. R. Sheed (New York 1958) 388-409]. From time to time similar theories have been put forward, but they have never found a permanent place in orthodox Christian thought, and on occasion they have been condemned, as for example the Origenist error of a final pardon for the damned [Denz 411]; (see APOCATASTASIS).

The account of creation in GENESIS is another indication that the material world was meant to serve man. Man was made lord of creation by God. His dominion is indicated by the naming of the animals in Gn 2.18-20. He brings order into creation. By the Fall, he lost the gift of INTEGRITY and the fact that he is now mortal and subject to disease means that there has been some indirect influence of his sin on nature. Nature has a greater ascendancy over man than it had before the fall of ADAM. Only man fell: creation below man, animate and inanimate, did not sin. But because of his subjection to CONCUPISCENCE, the world and the flesh are instruments of the devil and occasions of sin. It is not so much a question of the rebellion of nature, nature becoming wild, as of man being no longer able to control nature. With the coming of Christ and His conquest of sin at the Resurrection there began the gradual restoration of the lost ascendancy of man over the rest of creation. Through the Incarnation and then through the Resurrection of Christ, matter has been raised and brought into conjunction with the spiritual. The MIR-ACLES of Christ indicate the transformation foretold in Is 65.17; 66.22. Water is turned into wine, Jesus feeds thousands with a few loaves, He walks on the waters, after His Resurrection He manifests even greater powers over nature. This process is continued by the Church, a human and divine SOCIETY, and by the sacramental system whereby spiritual benefits are conferred by and through matter. At the last day complete integrity will be restored to man when his body rises, and it is hard to see how this cannot but have an effect on the rest of the material universe.

Transformation of Matter. The Resurrection of Christ is the prototype of men's resurrection. It is the promise that the just will one day be fully redeemed in body as well as soul. It is not by putting off the body that man achieves himself but by putting on the risen body. The risen body of Christ is an indication of the future state of man at the end of the world. But one must remember that the Apostles who saw it and testified to it were not themselves risen, and so they could grasp this reality only in an imperfect way. The NT accounts of the Resurrection show one that they did not recognize Him at first; FAITH was required in addition to mere bodily sight (Mt 28.17). It was the same Christ as they had known before His CRUCIFIXION, but He now belonged to a new mode of existence, not indifferent to the material world and its needs, but not constrained by them. To describe such a body baffles the human mind. St. Paul in 1 Cor 15.44 calls it a "spiritual body," that is, a true body but one that fully expresses the spirit.

As Christ is risen and as Mary too is in heaven with her body, the abode of the blessed even now, before the general resurrection, must connote some idea of place (see ASSUMPTION OF MARY). But physical space as one experiences it on earth is cramped and limited. For the blessed it is not so limited. Remember, that as Christ and Mary have their bodies, matter even now is already transformed or under the dominion of spirit in some respect. Moreover, the doctrine of the Real Presence in the Eucharist means that transformed matter (Christ's risen body) impinges on the world of man in the sacramental presence.

Despite all this, it would be foolish to try to determine where heaven is located in terms of the universe as one knows it. Since one must hold to the bodily existence of all men after the general resurrection, it is reasonable to suppose that the world will remain in some changed form as the connatural surroundings of risen man, as it is today the connatural surroundings of mortal man.

Quite apart from the teaching on the resurrection of the body there are indications in Scripture that point to a final state of the material universe. In 2 Pt 3 there is reference to a change and transformation of the world rather than annihilation. The end is likened to the new creation after the Flood and the material universe is seen to partake in the final judgment of God on mankind. The Hebrew mentality delighted in associating all of nature with man in his Fall and Redemption and is quite opposed to any Manichaean view of matter as intrinsically evil. Moreover, the traditional teaching that there is real fire in hell, at least in the sense that some material element is used as an instrument of God's justice, could be an indication that matter has some place in the final state of mankind.

Rom 8.19–23 speaks of creation itself groaning and travailing and awaiting deliverance. Many commentators see here some reference to a future renewal of the material creation. Although St. Augustine is one of the few to interpret "creation" of mankind alone, nevertheless he does admit (De civitate Dei, 22.14, 16) that the material world will assume a new and important role when man's body in a mirabilis mutatio will pass out of time into eternity. St. Thomas infers the renewal of the world from the fact that the object of the world is to serve mankind, and when man is transfigured in the resurrection there will be need for the world to be transfigured too (Summa theologiae 3a, Suppl., 91.1). With all this in mind one need not hesitate to think of the end of the world in Rv 21.1.

See Also: ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, (Paris 1903–50) 5.2:2504–52. Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, Tables générales, (1951–) 1527–30. A. PAUTREL and

D. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et. al. 4:1321-94. A. FEUILLET, ibid. 6:1331-1419; Catholicisme 4:1304–10. G. LANCZKOWSKI et al., Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957-65) 3:1083-98. E. PAX and K. RAHNER, ibid. 8:120-124. Works of general introduction. R. W. GLEASON, The World to Come (New York 1958). J. J. QUINN, Eschatology (Foundations of Catholic Theology; Englewood Cliffs, NJ 1965). M. SCH-MAUS, Von den letzten Dingen (Regensburg 1948); Katholische Dogmatik, 5 v. in 8 (5th ed. Munich 1953-59) v.4.2. On salvation history and the end of the world. O. CULLMANN, Christ and Time, tr. F. V. FILSON (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1964). J. MARSH in A Theological Word Book of the Bible, ed. A. RICHARDSON (New York 1950) 258-267. J. MOUROUX, The Mystery of Time (New York 1964). J. DANIÉLOU, The Lord of History, tr. N. ABERCROMBIE (Chicago 1958); Histoire des doctrines chrétiennes avant Nicée (Paris 1958) v.1, ch. 11. B. RIGAUX, "La Seconde venue de Jésus," La Venue du Messie: Messianisme et eschatologie (Récherches Bibliques 6; Bruges 1962) 173-216. R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1963). On the material creation. G. THILS, Théologie des réalités terrestres, 2 v. (Louvain 1946-49). K. RAHNER, Theological Investigations, v.2, tr. K. H. KRUGER (Baltimore 1964) 203-216; On the Theology of Death, tr. C. H. HENKEY (Quaestiones disputatae 2; New York 1961). P. TEILHARD DE CHAR-DIN, The Phenomenon of Man, tr. B. WALL (New York 1959). T. E. CLARKE, "St. Augustine and Cosmic Redemption," Theological Studies 19 (1958) 133-164.

[M. E. WILLIAMS]

ENDO, SHUSAKU

Novelist; b. March 27, 1923, Tokyo, Japan, the son of Tsunehisa Endo, an employee of Yasuda Bank, and Ikuko Endo; d. Sept. 29, 1996. The family moved to Manchuria in 1929 when his father was transferred there. After his parents' marital separation he returned with his mother to the Kobe area of Japan, where they lived with an aunt who was Catholic. His mother became a Catholic, and at her insistence Endo was baptized, receiving the name Paul.

Endo studied French literature at Keio Preparatory School, graduating in 1948. Two years later he went to France and studied modern Catholic literature; he was greatly influenced in methodology by François Mauriac, especially Thérèse Desqueyroux and its probing of the depth of human evil, but also Mauriac's break with the Versailles Garden formula of French psychological novels in favor of the realism of Dostoevsky. Existentialism in its myriad forms dominated the philosophical and literary expression of Endo's French world.

His novel Chinmoku (Silence) appeared in 1966 and established his reputation as a major author. Its story centers on the sixteenth– and seventeenth-century contact of the Jesuit mission with Japan and the subsequent persecution. It was an economic, political, and religious clash of East and West. His Life of Jesus was first published in magazine articles designed to introduce Christ to non-

Shusaku Endo. (AP/Wide World)

Christians; the book enjoyed phenomenal success, yet he felt that it needed continual revision to express his new faith insights.

Endo achieved a reputation as one of Japan's foremost and most prolific writers. His Catholic faith underscored his portrayal of life, the depths of evil together with the aspirations towards divine union. His greatest novel, Deep River, traces the religious journey of five Japanese to the Ganges River where God is symbolized with the name "Onion." Otsu, who reflects Endo himself speaks, "My trust is in the life of the Onion who endured genuine torment for the sake of love . . . as time passes, I feel that trust strengthening within me. I haven't been able to adapt to the thinking and the theology of Europe, but when I suffer all alone I can feel the smiling presence of my Onion, who knows all my trials." Endo spent his literary life delving into the unconscious of his characters. There was an East-West contrast throughout, a Buddhist-Christian dialogue, the encounter of world religions, and in it all there was his personal growth in Catholic faith reaching out to all cultures. Endo felt the basic human unity at the unconscious level seeking the ultimate in art, music, language, and culture.

He died Sept. 29, 1996, in the embrace of his Church, receiving the last sacraments from his intimate priest friend Fr. William Johnston, S.J. His influence and the paths he has opened into interreligious dialogue remain a major legacy to be pursued as the Church continues to interact with the great religious traditions of Asia.

Bibliography: The Complete Literary Works of Shusaku Endo in 15 volumes is under way at Shincho Publishing Company. Important works now translated into English include: Silence (Kodansha International 1982); Life of Jesus (Tokyo 1979); Deep River (Tokyo 1994); Foreign Studies (Tokyo 1989); Golden Country (Tokyo 1970); The Final Martyrs (Tokyo 1993); Scandal (Tokyo 1988); The Sea and Poison (New York 1972); Volcano (Tokyo 1979); When I Whistle (Tokyo 1974).

[P. O'DONOGHUE]

ENGEL, HANS LUDWIG

Canonist; b. Castle Wagrein, Austria; d. Grillenberg, Austria, April 22,1674. He was a Benedictine of the monastery of Mölk; he studied law at the University of Salzburg, assuming the role of professor of Canon Law, and later, by unanimous consent, that of vice chancellor in 1669. He left Salzburg, returned to Mölk, and died in the parish of Grillenberg. Engel was influential in Germanic circles. His work Collegium universi juris canonici . . . published between 1671 and 1674 is admired for its lucidity and profundity. In it he defends the papal supremacy and treats of episcopo-papal relations. Among his more famous works are Privilegia monasteriorum ex jure communi deducta (1664), Tractatus de privilegiis et juribus monasteriorum (1693), and Manuale Parochorum (1661).

Bibliography: G. LEPOINTE, Dictionnaire de droit canonique 5:342–343. J. F. VON SCHULTE, Die Geschichte der Quellen und der Literatur des kanonischen Rechts 3.1:150–151.

[B. R. PISKULA]

ENGELBERT I OF COLOGNE, ST.

Archbishop; b. c. 1185; d. Schwelm, near Gevelsberg, Germany, Nov. 7, 1225. He was a younger son of Engelbert, count of Berg, and because of a medieval abuse whereby even children could receive ecclesiastical benefices, he became provost of St. George and St. Severinus in Cologne and of St. Mary's in Aachen in 1198, and of Cologne Cathedral on April 9, 1203. He was excommunicated and deposed by INNOCENT III in 1206 for supporting Philip of Swabia (d. 1208) against OTTO IV but was restored in 1208, and by way of penance he participated in the crusade against the ALBIGENSES in 1212. His efforts to settle the disputed episcopal succession in Cologne resulted in his own consecration as bishop on Sept. 24, 1217, and he received the PALLIUM on April 24, 1218. In 1220 he was appointed administrator of Germany and guardian of the young Henry, later HENRY VII, the son of FREDERICK II, whom he had supported against Otto IV. As an administrator he struggled indefatigably to establish peace in Germany and in Berg, of which he had become count (1218) upon the death of his brother. As bishop, he was pious and charitable but unpopular because of his zeal for strict monastic discipline and administrative justice. He was murdered by his cousin Frederick of Isenberg, whom he had tried to restrain from injustice toward the nuns of Essen. Though he was never formally canonized, his cult was established on Nov. 7, 1617, when his name was added to the Roman MARTYROLOGY. His relics are in the cathedrals of Cologne and Altenberg. His vita, written in 1226 by CAE-SARIUS OF HEISTERBACH, still has historical value.

Feast: Nov. 7.

Bibliography: Vita by Caesarius of Heisterbach in Acta Sanctorum Nov. 3:644–681, tr. as Leben, Leiden und Wunder des Heiligen Erzbischofs Engelbert von Köln, ed. and tr. K. LANGOSCH (Weimar 1955). R. KNIPPING, Die Regesten der Erzbischöfe von Köln im Mittelalter, 4 v. (Bonn 1901–15) 3.1:26–88. H. FOERSTER, Engelbert von Berg der Heilige (Elberfeld 1925). W. KLEIST, Der Tod des Erzbischofs Engelbert von Köln (Diss. Berlin 1918). J. DUBOIS, Catholicisme 4:199–200.

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

ENGELBERT OF ADMONT

Abbot and scholar; b. Volkersdorf, Styria, Austria, c. 1250; d. Priory of Gallenstein Schloss, in the valley of the Enns, Austria, May 12, 1331. From a consequential family in Styria, he entered the BENEDICTINES c. 1267 at the Abbey of ADMONT, a foundation with a proud tradition of scholarship. In 1271 he enrolled in the cathedral school of St. Vitus at Prague, where he studied under Gregory of Hasenberg (d. 1301), but was forced to leave there in 1274, when Ottokar II of Bohemia went to war with the Hapsburg Emperor Rudolph I. Engelbert returned to Admont, where he began a poem in honor of Rudolph's election to the imperial dignity. In 1278 he was at the University of Padua, where he spent the next nine years completing his studies, including four years of theology with the Dominicans. After returning to Austria c. 1287, he was elected abbot of the Abbey of SANKT PETER in Salzburg in 1288. Ten years later he was the compromise choice of Archduke Albert of Austria and the archbishop of Salzburg for abbot of Admont. He ruled there for 30 years, fought against the encroachments of the ministeriales on the abbey's rights, and, although he rarely left the cloister, was very active intellectually. He resigned his office in 1327 because of his age and retired to Gallenstein Schloss. He was buried in nearby Admont. His writings cover a wide range of topics, including theology: De corpore domini and De gratiis et virtutibus beatae Mariae virginis; natural science: translations and commentaries on a number of Aristotle's works; ethics: De summo bono hominis in hac vita; politics: De regimine principum; history: De ortu, progressu et fine Romani imperii; and poetry: De electione regis Rudolfi. A number of his works are unpublished. Philosophically and theologically, Engelbert can hardly be labeled an enthusiastic follower of THOMAS AQUINAS; he was rather an eclectic, perhaps even in part a Scotist. Politically, he rejected Ghibelline claims (see GUELFS AND GHIBELLINES) and also the GALLICANISM of JOHN (QUIDORT) OF PARIS, against whom he drafted the official Church reply.

Bibliography: Works. De causis longaevitatis hominum in Thesaurus anecdotorum novistimus (Augsburg 1721-29), ed. B. PEZ, 1.1:439-502; De gratiis et virtutibus beatae Mariae virginis, ibid. 1.1:503-762; Tractatus de libero arbitrio, ibid. 4.2:119-148. Engelbert's letter listing his works, ed. G. B. FOWLER, in Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 29 (1962) 298-306; Speculum virtutum ad Albertum et Ottonem duces Austriae, ed. B. PEZ in Bibliotheca ascetica antiquo-nova, 12 v. (Regensburg 1723-40) 3:1-498; Tractatus de providentia Dei, ibid. 6:49-150; De passione Domini secundum Matthaeum, ibid. 7:65-112; Da statu defunctorum, ibid. 9:111-192; De summo bono hominis, ed. J. C. PEEZ in Opuscula philosophica (Regensburg 1725); Dialogus consupiscentiae et rationis, ibid.; Utrum sapienti competat ducere uxorem, ibid; De ortu, progressu et fine Romani imperii in Maxima bibliotheca Patrum (Lyons 1668) 25:362-378; De musica in M. GERBERT, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra potissimum (Milan 1931) 2:287-369; Tractatus de officio ancillari Beatae Mariae Virginis, ed. G. B. FOWLER, Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung 62 (1954) 379-389. Ed. of E. of A's political writings by G. B. FOWLER, MGStaatsschriften des späteren Mittelalters v.1.2. Literature. F. STEGMÜLLER, Repertorium Commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi (Würzburg 1947) 2:2240-45. G. B. FOWLER, Intellectual Interests of Engelbert of Admont (New York 1947); "Engelbert of Admont's Tractatus de officiis et abusionibus eorum," in Essays in Mediaeval Life and Thought: Festschrift A. P. Evans, ed. J. H. MUNDY et al. (New York 1955) 109-122; "Engelbert of Admont and the Universal Idea," Fundamente 3 (1958); Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al (Paris 1932-) 4.1:745-747; "MSS of E. of A . . . ," Osiris 11 (1954) 455-485; "Additional Notes on MSS of E. of A.," Recherches de théologie ancienne et médiévale 28 (1961) 269-282; "A New Dedicatory Preface to the Commentary on Ps. 118 by E. of A.," ibid. 29 (1962) 306-312.

[B. J. COMASKEY]

ENGELHARDT, ZEPHYRIN

Missionary, historian; b. Bilshausen, Germany, Nov. 13, 1851; d. Santa Barbara, Calif., April 27, 1934. When he was one year old, Charles Anthony, as he was baptized, immigrated with his parents to the U.S. where they settled at Covington, Ky. He joined the Order of Friars Minor at Teutopolis, Ill. (Sept. 22, 1873), and was ordained at St. Louis, Mo. (June 18, 1878). From 1880 to 1900 he was a missionary among the Menominee at Keshina and Superior, Wis., and among the Ottawas at Harbor Springs, Mich. In 1882 he published Kachkenohamatwon Kesekoch (Guide to Heaven), a translation from Chippewa to Menominee, and in 1884 his Kateshim (Catechism) appeared in the same language. He began in 1896 a monthly journal, Anishinabe Enamaid (Praying Indian), written in the Ottawan language. At Harbor Springs, he wrote his first historical works, The Franciscans in California (1897) and The Franciscans in Arizona (1899).

After 1900 Engelhardt devoted his life to travel and the writing of California mission histories. Stationed principally at Mission Santa Barbara, Calif., he journeyed to Florida, New Mexico, and Mexico. His monumental Missions and Missionaries of California was published in four volumes between 1908 and 1915. It was followed by 16 volumes on individual missions and a life of The Holy Man of Santa Clara (1909), Fray Magín Catalá, for whose cause he was vice postulator. He also contributed about 200 historical articles to newspapers and magazines throughout the U.S. Engelhardt's mission histories, which contain abundant translations from original sources, have remained standard works in their field.

Bibliography: Engelhardt Diaries, June 2, 1901–Apr. 21, 1934, Santa Barbara Mission Archives. Provincial Annals, ed. M. GEIGER, 6.2 (April 1944), a review of his life and writings. F. B. STECK, Commonweal (June 29, 1934) 236–238, an appraisal of the man and his writings.

[M. GEIGER]

ENGELS, FRIEDRICH

Collaborator with Karl Marx in propagandizing socialism; b. Barmen, Prussia, Nov. 28, 1820; d. London, Aug. 5, 1895. He was the oldest of eight children of Friedrich and Elise Engels, whose lineage can be traced in the state of Wuppertal as early as the end of the 16th century. At an early age Engels rebelled against the strict Prussian discipline and somber Lutheran piety in which he had been reared. Upon completion of high school in Elberfeld, he worked for a brief period in his father's textile mill. At the age of 17, at his father's insistence, he took a job as an unsalaried clerk in the export business of Consul Leupold in Bremen. Abundant free time, however, permitted him to develop his own preferences-reading and writing. He learned several languages (he boasted later of being able to converse in 25 tongues) and began contributing to many newspapers and magazines on a variety of subjects ranging from religion and philosophy to politics and military strategy, all self-taught.

Friedrich Engels.

The social consciousness that had its awakening in his firsthand experience with factory conditions in Barmen and later in his father's mill in Manchester, England, came to fruition in his association with Karl Marx, whom he met at Cologne in 1842. Marx was then editor of Rheinische Zeitung, a newspaper opposed to the government, which was suppressed by decree in 1843. Together Marx and Engels became political exiles in Switzerland, Paris, Brussels, and finally England.

Although Engels opposed marriage as a bourgeois institution and had no children, he finally married Lizzy Burns on her deathbed in 1878. He had previously lived with her sister Mary, an Irish revolutionary leader, from 1845 until her death in 1863. In 1869 he sold out his share of the Manchester firm and retired at 49; thus, when Marx died in 1883, he was able to devote all his time to editing Marx's Das Kapital. However, from 1870 to 1890, through correspondence, pamphlets and articles, and personal contacts, he continued to school leaders of the new and growing European working-class parties in France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Poland, Hungary, Spain, Portugal, Roumania, Bulgaria, Austria, Italy, and finally Russia. Ironically, only England, his adopted homeland, and the U.S. remained outside his sphere of influence, largely because their trade-union and socialist movements believed in parliamentary solutions of economic problems and did not trust his revolutionary determinism.

When Engels died of cancer at his home in London, the proletarian class movement that he and Marx had begun and nurtured lost a dedicated chief of staff, whose talent for stimulating, disseminating, and popularizing highly complicated theories has rarely been equaled.

Engels' proliferation of letters to socialist leaders and articles in newspapers and magazines of almost every industrial center in the world gives a clear picture of his ideas and actions. Although Marx is recognized as the intellectual father of communist thought, Engels was its promulgator and missionary. Dialectical materialism for him filled the void left by his successive abandonment of Lutheranism and Hegelian statism, and he espoused the cause of political and social reform wherever it appeared likely to advance revolutionary communism.

Among his published works are The Holy Family (with Marx, 1843), The Condition of the Working Class in England (1844), German Ideology (with Marx, 1845), Communist Manifesto (with Marx, 1848), Development of Socialism from Utopianism to Science (with Marx, 1876), and Marx's Das Kapital (ed., v.2 1885; v.3 1895).

Bibliography: D. B. GOLDENDACH, Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, tr. J. KUNITZ (New York 1927). G. MAYER, Friedrich Engels, tr. G. and H. HIGHET (New York 1936).

[G. W. GRUENBERG]

ENGLAND, JOHN

First bishop of Charleston, S.C., author, orator; b. Cork, Ireland, Sept. 23, 1786; d. Charleston, April 11, 1842. He was the son of Thomas and Honora (Lordan) England. He completed his primary education at Cork and then apprenticed himself to a barrister. After two years, however, he entered (1802) St. Patrick's College, Carlow, where, while still a student, he taught and also preached a Lenten series at the cathedral. By dispensation he was ordained before the prescribed age on Oct. 11, 1808, by Bp. Francis Moylan at St. Mary's Cathedral, Cork. As a priest in Cork he became lecturer at the cathedral; chaplain to the North Presentation Convent, the Magdalen Asylum, and the city prison; inspector of the Catholic poor schools; and teacher of philosophy, and president (1812–17) at St. Mary's College.

During these years he took an active part in the Veto Question, opposing, particularly through the pages of the Cork Mercantile Chronicle, of which he was a trustee, any program that would give the British government the right to interfere in the appointment of bishops. He was parish priest at Bandon, 16 miles from Cork, from May 1817 until he resigned in August 1820, when notified that he had been named bishop of Charleston.

Ordinary of Charleston. England was consecrated in St. Finbar's Church, Cork, on Sept. 21, 1820, and arrived in Charleston, Dec. 30, 1820, to take up the administration of a diocese more than 140,000 square miles in area, with about 5,000 Catholics. His first act, after notifying the archbishop of Baltimore of his arrival, was to issue a pastoral letter to the faithful, the first such letter in the history of the American Church. He made a visitation of the Carolinas and Georgia, the three states within his diocese. England was particularly conscious of the need for education and prepared a missal and a catechism to help and instruct his flock. They were printed, not without objections from other U.S. bishops, and distributed.

To combat attacks upon the Church made in the press, he began a newspaper, the United States Catholic Miscellany, the first Catholic newspaper in the U.S. It was published weekly, with occasional short lapses, from 1822 until 1861. England wrote the greater part of the material, edited, and even assisted in printing the paper. His writings have been collected from copies of the paper and published on three occasions—one edition running to seven volumes. "Everything," wrote his successor Bp. Ignatius Reynolds, "which Dr. England published, . . . is worthy of being preserved and read by posterity." His statement of the Catholic's duty as a citizen has retained its relevance for more than a century.

His newspaper continued publication with very little support from the rest of the hierarchy. England's ideas were frequently considered radical and at times seemed to be opposed because they were his. Thus, when his diocesan constitution called for an annual convention of the clergy and lay delegates representing the parishes, the program was labeled "democratic" by his archbishop, a term that carried a bad connotation in the early 19th century. The constitution was designed to forestall TRUSTEE-ISM by ensuring an agreeable method of handling temporalities. The only church in Charleston was so entangled by its vestrymen that to make it a cathedral would have been unwise. Accordingly, a procathedral was occupied until an adequate building could be erected.

It was the bishop's hope that the Philosophical and Classical Seminary of Charleston, which began operating in January 1822, would attract vocations to the clergy. St. John the Baptist Seminary, which he opened in 1825, soon provided trained priests for the diocese, four of whom became bishops. In 1829 he organized a diocesan community, the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy, to catechize poor children and to care for orphans and the sick. At his invitation, the Ursuline nuns from Blackrock, Cork, opened an academy in 1833. Under England a social welfare program of the Brotherhood of San Marino, the first Catholic society for workingmen in the U.S., undertook the support of a small hospital, staffed by the Sisters of Charity of Our Lady of Mercy, to aid the poor in the fever epidemics. The society and the hospital were short-lived. The bishop's concern for blacks irked the slaveowners who blocked his effort to operate a school for slaves.

National Leadership. In 1833 he was appointed apostolic delegate to Haiti for the purpose of improving the status of the Church there. He was the first U.S. bishop to be chosen by the Holy See for so important a diplomatic mission. It proved, however, to be the one great failure of his career. Nevertheless, Gregory XVI, as a mark of his personal esteem, named England an assistant to the pontifical throne.

His attempt at peacemaking in the Hogan schism in Philadelphia was misinterpreted; his offer of 1822 to accept Rev. William Hogan into the Charleston diocese only served to bring him into disfavor with several U.S. bishops. This experience, and a similar one in connection with the nomination of a successor to Bp. John Connolly of New York, made England press ardently for the calling of a council to achieve a proper understanding among the bishops of the nation. It was almost his insistence alone that finally initiated the Councils of Baltimore.

England visited the chief cities of the Union and traveled to Europe four times, seeking aid in money, vestments, books, and candidates for his convents and seminary. On Jan. 8, 1826, while visiting Washington, D.C., he was invited to address the Congress, the first Catholic clergyman to do so. It was but a month before he received his final papers as a citizen of the U.S.

Pressure of work moved England to request a coadjutor but the choice of William Clancy of St. Patrick's College, Carlow, Ireland, proved unfortunate and Clancy obtained a transfer in 1838, within a year of his arrival. When England died in 1842, the diocese had 14 churches, with three more under construction; 20 priests; and a Catholic population of about 12,000.

Bibliography: P. GUILDAY, Life and Times of John England, 2 v. (New York 1927). S. G. MESSMER, ed. The Works of the Right Reverend John England, First Bishop of Charleston, 7 v. (Cleveland 1908). P. CLARKE, A Free Church in a Free Society: The Ecclesiology of John Ireland, Bishop of Charleston, 1820–1842: A Nineteenth Century Bishop in the Southern United States (Hartsville, SC, 1982).

[R. C. MADDEN/EDS.]

Bl. John Paine, one of the "Forty Martyrs of England and Wales."

ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF

The term, as commonly used, includes all the men and women, priests and laity, belonging to all the older religious orders, the secular clergy, the Society of Jesus, and to every class, trade, or profession, who gave their lives in England and Wales rather than deny their faith. The subjoined chronology includes only those whose cause of beatification or canonization has been formally introduced into the Congregation of Rites, is now pending, or has been concluded: it excludes many who died in prison (e.g., the wife of St. Swithin Wells), others who suffered in reprisal for their part in religious risings (e.g., the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE, 1536), and about 43 (e.g., Henry GARNET) whose cause has been deferred because of some defect of information. These, known technically as dilati, are listed at the end of the chronology. While all could have saved their lives by renouncing their faith, priesthood, or allegiance to the See of Rome, the indictments on which they were found guilty of death varied according to the period and its particular political or religious circumstances: in law all but a few suffered as traitors, whether it was their refusal to take the oath of supremacy or their ordination overseas that made them such.

The protomartyr of the English Reformation was St. John Houghton, prior of the London Charterhouse, executed at Tyburn on May 4, 1535; the last, Bl. William Howard, Viscount Stafford, grandson of St. Philip Howard (d. Oct. 19, 1596), beheaded on Tower Hill, Dec. 29, 1680. Unless otherwise stated in the list, all these martyrs were hanged, drawn, and quartered. This was the death reserved for traitors. The sentence of execution ran: "Ye shall be drawn through the open city to the place of execution, and there be hanged and let down alive, and your privy parts cut off, and your entrails taken out and burnt in your sight; then your head to be cut off and your bodies divided into four parts, to be disposed of at his (her) Majesty's pleasure." In the case of certain martyrs the Sovereign, in the exercise of his prerogative of mercy, commuted the sentence, as with SS. Thomas More and John Fisher, to that of beheading; in others, particularly in the later persecution, the martyrs were permitted to hang until they were dead; but the greater number suffered the full rigors of the sentence. St. Edmund Gennings (d. Dec. 10, 1691), for instance, was heard to invoke St. Gregory, patron of England, while the hangman held the priest's heart in his hand.

Henry VIII. In 1533 HENRY VIII, after failing to secure at Rome a divorce from his lawful wife, CATHERINE OF ARAGON, put her away. In the following year the pope's jurisdiction over England was renounced by Act of Parliament (25 Hen. VIII, c. 21). The Act of Succession (c. 22), the same year, made it a capital offense to reject or deny the validity of the king's marriage to his mistress, Anne Boleyn, while the Act of Supremacy (1534; 26 Hen. VIII, c. 1) made it high treason not to acknowledge the king as "the only Supreme Head on earth of the Church in England." It was under these two Acts that most of the first 50 martyrs in the list suffered death.

Elizabeth I. When Elizabeth I succeeded her halfsister, Mary, on Nov. 17, 1588, a new Act of Supremacy (1 Eliz., c. 1) made it treason to maintain the pope's authority in the realm (1 Eliz., c. 1) and imposed an oath compelling acknowledgment of the queen as "Supreme Governor as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things as temporal"; a new Act of Uniformity (1 Eliz., c. 2) restored the Book of Common Prayer (first issued 1549, revised 1552), prohibited the Mass, and made attendance at Protestant service compulsory. In 1569 Dr. William ALLEN (later Cardinal) founded at Douai a seminary for the training of English priests. In November of that year occurred the Northern Rising, which was followed by a wholesale execution of northern Catholics (none of them included in the list below, apart from Bl. Thomas Plumtree, their chaplain). This rising led PIUS V to issue the bull Regnans in Excelsis (Feb. 25, 1570) excommunicating the queen, who retaliated by issuing acts (13 Eliz., cc. 1, 2) making it treason to call her a heretic or to introduce papal bulls into the realm.

Under these measures, or on the pretext of alleged complicity in real or feigned plots against the Queen, 38 martyrs suffered between the years 1570 and 1585, including the most famous of them all, St. Edmund Campion and St. Richard Gwyn, the poet, schoolmaster, and protomartyr of Wales.

Without question it was Elizabeth I's intention to supplant the old religion with the new in a bloodless manner. It is significant that there were no martyrs in the first 12 years of her reign, and only five in the years from 1570 to 1577. The entry of new priests into England from the seminaries abroad (the English College in Rome was founded in 1579) induced legislation that increased the number of martyrs. In 1585 a law was passed which the Jesuit historian, Father Pollen, has termed the "act which made the martyrs." This was the famous "Act against Jesuits, seminary priests and other such like disobedient subjects" (27 Eliz., c. 2), which made it high treason for a native-born subject of the queen, after receiving priestly orders abroad, to return and minister in the realm, unless he gave himself up to the authorities within 48 hours of his landing. Yet Bl. Henry Walpole, executed at York April 7, 1595, suffered for his priesthood, although, as he pleaded, he was captured before the expiration of the statutory time limit. By an extension of this act any lay person who harbored or assisted a priest was liable to the same penalties. All the Acts concerning the persecution are printed, some in full, others in summary, in G. W. Prothero's Constitutional Documents (1558–1625).

The following list includes members of the group of 63 martyrs who were beatified equipollently (per modum cultus) by Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886, and May 13, 1895, as well as those beatified by Pius XI, after a formal process, on Dec. 15, 1929. SS. John Fisher and Thomas More were canonized by the same pope on May 19, 1935. The other saints included in the list are the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales, canonized by Paul VI on June 21, 1970, and the 85 martyrs beatified by John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987.

After the Low Week meeting of the hierarchy of England and Wales in 1960, in a letter dated April 27, Cardinal Godfrey, as president of the same hierarchy, petitioned John XXIII to reassume the cause of canonization of a selected group of these martyrs. By an understanding with the Holy See only those were included in the list who were (1) already beatified, (2) well-known, and (3) established in the devotion of the faithful. Since that date the cause has been promoted with remarkable results. In August 2000, a revised liturgical calendar was approved for England and Wales that includes a common feast day (May 4) under the title "The English Martyrs" for the 85 martyrs beatified in 1987 and the Forty Martyrs canonized in 1970. This date coincides with a similar feast in the (Anglican) Church of England. Separate feast days are maintained for SS. John Fisher and Thomas More. Individual dioceses and churches may celebrate the memorials of those martyrs of special local interest. The Roman Calendar continues to maintain the feast of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales on October 25.

The following abbreviations have been used in the appended list: sec. priest for secular priest; sem. priest, seminary priest; b., born; d., died; educ., educated; G.S., Grammar School; Coll., College; ord., ordained; adm., admitted; Engl. miss., English mission; cond., condemned.

Under Henry VIII

1535

St. John Houghton, priest, Carthusian monk, prior of London Charterhouse; b. Essex; educ. Cambridge. d. Tyburn, May 4

St. Robert Lawrence, priest, Carthusian monk, prior of Beauvale, Notts. d. Tyburn, May 4

St. Augustine Webster, priest, Carthusian monk, prior of Axholme, Lincs. d. Tyburn, May 4

St. Richard Reynolds, priest, Bridgettine monk of Syon Abbey, Mddx.; b. Devon; educ. Corpus Christi Coll., Cambridge. d. Tyburn, May 4

Bl. John Haile, secular priest, bachelor of laws; rector of St. Dunstan's, Cranford, vicar of Isleworth, Mddx., canon of Wrigham, Kent. d. Tyburn, May 4

Bl. Humphrey Middlemore, priest, Carthusian monk, vicar of London Charterhouse; b. Edgbaston, Warwicks. d. Tyburn, June 19

Bl. William Exmew, priest, Carthusian monk, procurator of London Charterhouse. d. Tyburn, June 19

Bl. Sebastian Newdigate, priest, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse; b. Harefield, Mddx.; educ. Cambridge. d. Tyburn, June 19

St. John Fisher, cardinal, bishop of Rochester; b. Beverley, E.R. Yorks.; educ. Cambridge; chancellor of Cambridge University. Beheaded. (Canonized 1935). d. Tower Hill, June 22

St. Thomas More, layman, lord chancellor; b. London; educ. Canterbury Hall, Oxford, and Inns of Court. Beheaded. (Canonized 1935). d. Tower Hill, July 6

1537

Bl. John Rochester, priest, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse; b. Terling, Essex; educ. Cambridge. Hanged in chains. d. York, May 11

Bl. James Walworth, priest, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse. Hanged in chains. d. York, May 11

Bl. William Greenwood, Carthusian brother of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 6

Bl. John Davy, deacon, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 8

Bl. Robert Salt, Carthusian brother of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 9

Bl. Walter Pierson, Carthusian brother of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 10

Bl. Thomas Green, priest, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse; fellow of St. John's Coll., Cambridge. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 10

Bl. Thomas Scryven, Carthusian brother of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 15

Bl. Thomas Redyng, Carthusian brother of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, June 16

Ven. Antony Brorby (Brookby), priest, Franciscan; educ. Magdalen Coll., Oxford. Strangled in prison. d. Newgate, July 7

Bl. Richard Bere, priest, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse; b. Glastonbury; educ. Oxford and Inns of Court. Starved to death. d. Newgate, August 9

Bl. Thomas Johnson, priest, Carthusian monk of London Charterhouse. Starved to death. d. Newgate, September 20

Ven. John Travers, sec. priest; educ. Oxford; M.A., D.D.; chancellor of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. Cond. under Act of Supremacy. Executed. d. Dublin, date uncertain

1538

Bl. John Forest, priest, Franciscan, Greenwich Observant Friar; educ. Oxford; confessor to Queen Catherine. Hanged, then burned. d. Smithfield, May 22

Ven. Thomas Cort (Covert), priest, Franciscan, Greenwich Observant Friar. Starved to death. d. Newgate, July 27

Ven. Thomas Belchiam, priest, Franciscan, Greenwich Observant Friar. Starved to death. d. Newgate, August 3

1539

Ven. John Griffith (sometimes misnamed Clark), sec. priest; vicar of Wandsworth, Surrey, and rector of Dolton, Devon. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Southwark, July 8

Ven. John (?) Waire (Maire), priest, Franciscan. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Southwark, July 8

Bl. Adrian Fortescue, Kt. of St. John of Jerusalem, layman; of Punsbourne, Herts., and Stonor Park, Oxford. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. Beheaded. d. Tower Hill, July 9

Ven. Thomas Dingley, Kt. of St. John of Jerusalem, layman; of a Hampshire family. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. Beheaded. d. Tower Hill, July 9

Bl. Richard Whiting, priest, Benedictine, Abbot of Glastonbury; b. Wrington, Somerset; educ. Cambridge. d. Glastonbury, November 15

Bl. John Thorne, priest, Benedictine monk of Glastonbury. d. Glastonbury, November 15

Bl. Roger James, priest, Benedictine monk of Glastonbury. d. Glastonbury, November 15

Bl. Hugh Faringdon (vere Cook), priest, Benedictine, Abbot of Reading; b. (prob.) at Faringdon, Berks. d. Reading, November 15

Bl. John Eynon (Onyon), priest, Benedictine monk (of Reading?); priest at St. Giles's, Reading. d. Reading, November 15

Bl. John Rugg, priest, Benedictine monk (of Reading?); prebendary of Chichester. d. Reading, November 15

Bl. John Beche (vere Marshall), priest, Benedictine, abbot of Colchester; educ. Oxford. d. Colchester, December 1

St. John Stone, priest, Augustinian monk of Austin Friars, Canterbury. d. Canterbury, not later than December 29

1540

Bl. Thomas Abell, D.D., sec. priest; educ. Oxford; chaplain to Queen Catherine. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Smithfield, July 30

Bl. Edward Powell, D.D., sec. priest; a Welshman; fellow of Oriel Coll., Oxford; headmaster of Eton Coll.; prebendary of Salisbury; vicar of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Smithfield, July 30

Bl. Richard Fetherston, D.D., sec. priest; educ. Cambridge; tutor to Princess Mary; archdeacon of Brecknock. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Smithfield, July 30 Bl. William Horne, Carthusian brother of London Charterhouse. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Tyburn, August 4

Ven. Edmund Brindholme, sec. priest; parish priest of the Church of Our Lady, Calais; supporter of Cardinal Pole. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Tyburn, August 4

Ven. Clement Philpot, layman; supporter of Cardinal Pole. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. d. Tyburn, August 4

1541

Bl. Margaret Pole, countess of Salisbury, laywoman; b. Castle Farley, Somerset; of Christchurch and Warblington, Hants.; mother of Cardinal Pole; lady governess of Princess Mary. Cond. by Bill of Attainder. Beheaded. d. Tower of London, May 28

Bl. David Gonson (Gunston or Genson), Kt. of St.John of Jerusalem, layman. Son of Vice-Adm. Gonson.Cond. by Bill of Attainder and under Act of Supremacy.d. Southwark, July 12

1544

Bl. John Larke, sec. priest; rector of St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate, then Chelsea. d. Tyburn, March 7

Bl. German Gardiner, layman; educ. Cambridge; secretary to Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester. d. Tyburn, March 7

Bl. John Ireland, sec. priest; chaplain to the Roper Chantry; St. Dunstan's, Canterbury; afterward at Eltham. d. Tyburn, March 7

Ven. Thomas Ashby, layman. Cond. under Act of Supremacy. d. Tyburn, March 19

Under Elizabeth I

1570

Bl. Thomas Plumtree, sec. priest; b. Diocese of Lincoln; educ. Corpus Christi Coll., Oxford; chaplain to the insurgents. d. Durham, January 4

Bl. John Felton, layman; b. Bermondsey; of a Norfolk family. Cond. for publishing the Bull. d. St. Paul's Churchyard, August 8

1571

Bl. John Story, layman, doctor of law; b. Salisbury; educ. Oxford; D.C.L.; president of Broadgates Hall, Oxford; M.P., Hindon, Wilts. Cond. for pretended treason. d. Tyburn, June 1

1572

Bl. Thomas Percy, earl of Northumberland, layman;b. Northumberland. Cond. for the Rising. Beheaded. d. York, August 22

1573

Bl. Thomas Woodhouse, sec. priest and Jesuit. A Marian priest in Lincolnshire; 12 years a prisoner for religion. d. Smithfield, June 19

1577

St. Cuthbert Mayne, sem. priest; b. Yalston, near Barnstaple, Devon; educ. Barnstaple G.S.; St. John's Coll., Oxford; convert minister; Douai; ord. 1575; Engl. miss. at Golden, Cornwall. Cond. under Act of Supremacy and for priesthood. (Protomartyr of the Seminaries.) d. Launceston, November 30

1578

Bl. John Nelson, sem. priest and Jesuit; b. Skelton, near York; educ. Douai; ord. 1575; Engl. miss., London. d. Tyburn, February 3

Bl. Thomas Sherwood, layman, student; b. London; a woolen draper; taken on way to Douai. Cond. under Act of Supremacy (aged 27). d. Tyburn, February 7

1581

Bl. Everard Hanse, sem. priest; b. Northamptonshire; educ. Cambridge; after conversion, Rheims; ord. 1581; taken in London. d. Tyburn, July 31

St. Edmund Campion, priest; b. London; educ. at Bluecoat School; scholar and fellow of St. John's Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Douai; adm. SJ at Rome, 1573; Engl. miss., June 1580–August 1581. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, December 1

St. Ralph Sherwin, sem. priest; b. Rodsley, Longford, Derbyshire; fellow of Exeter Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Douai and Rome; ord. 1577; Engl. miss., 1580. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. (Protomartyr of the English Coll., Rome.) d. Tyburn, December 1

St. Alexander Briant, sem. priest; b. Somersetshire; educ. Hart Hall, Oxford; Douai; Engl. miss., 1578, London; adm. SJ in prison. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders (aged 25). d. Tyburn, December 1

1582

St. John Paine, sem. priest; b. Diocese of Peterborough; educ. Douai; ord. 1576; Engl. miss., Ingatestone, Essex. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Chelmsford, April 2

Bl. Thomas Ford, sem. priest; b. Devon; fellow of Trinity Coll., Oxford; convert; Douai; ord. 1573; Engl. miss., 1576, Oxfordshire and Berks. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 28

Bl. John Shert, sem. priest; b. Shert Hall, near Macclesfield, Cheshire; educ. Brasenose Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Douai and Rome; ord. 1576; Engl. miss., 1579, Cheshire and London. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 28

Bl. Robert Johnson, sem. priest; b. Shropshire; educ. German Coll., Rome and Douai; ord. 1576; Engl. miss., 1580, London. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 28

Bl. William Filby, sem. priest; b. Oxfordshire; educ. Lincoln Coll, Oxford; after conversion, Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., 1581. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 30

St. Luke Kirby, sem. priest; b. near Richmond, N.R. Yorks. (?); educ. Louvain; after conversion, Douai and Rome; ord. 1577; Engl. miss., 1580. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 30

Bl. Laurence Richardson (vere Johnson), sem. priest; b. Great Crosby, Lancs.; educ. Crosby, and Brasenose Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Douai; ord. 1577; Engl. miss., Lancs., etc. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 30

Bl. Thomas Cottam, priest; b. Dilworth or Tarnacre, Lancs.; educ. Brasenose Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Douai; adm. SJ, Rome; Engl. miss., 1580. Cond. for the fictitious plot in Rome and Flanders. d. Tyburn, May 30

Bl. William Lacey, sem. priest; b. Horton, near Settle, W.R. Yorks.; married; on wife's death ord. priest at Rome, 1581; Engl. miss., 1581, Yorks. d. York, August 22

Bl. Richard Kirkman, sem. priest; b. Addingham, near Skipton, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Douai; ord. 1579; Engl. miss., Lincoln and Yorks. d. York, August 22

Bl. James Thompson (alias Hudson), sem. priest; b. York; educ. Rheims; ord. 1581. d. York, November 28

1583

Bl. William Hart, sem. priest; b. Wells, Somerset; educ. Lincoln Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Douai, Rheims, and Rome; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., Yorks. d. York, March 15

Bl. Richard Thirkeld, sem. priest; b. Cunsley (Coniscliffe?), Durham; educ. Queen's Coll., Oxford; Douai and Rheims; ord. 1579; Engl. miss., Yorks., 1579–83. d. York, May 29

Bl. John Slade, layman; b. Milton, Hants.; educ. New Coll., Oxford; schoolmaster. Cond. under Act of Supremacy. d. Winchester, October 30

Bl. John Bodey, layman; b. Wells, Somerset; educ. Winchester, and New Coll., Oxford; after conversion, law student at Douai; schoolmaster. d. Andover, November 2 1584

Bl. William Carter, layman; b. London; printer. Cond. for printing Catholic books. d. Tyburn, January 11

Bl. George Haydock, sem. priest; b. Cottam Hall, near Preston, Lancs.; educ. Rheims and Rome; ord. 1581. d. Tyburn, February 12

Bl. James Fenn, sem. priest; b. Montacute, near Yeovil, Somerset; educ. Corpus Christi Coll., and Gloucester Hall, Oxford; schoolmaster; married; on wife's death went to Rheims; ord. 1580. d. Tyburn, February 12

Bl. Thomas Hemerford, sem. priest; b. Stoke (?), Dorset; educ. St. John's Coll., and Hart Hall, Oxford; Engl. Coll., Rome; ord. 1583. d. Tyburn, February 12

Bl. John Nutter, sem. priest; b. Reedley Hallows, near Burnley, Lancs.; educ. Blackburn, and St. John's Coll., Cambridge; Rheims; ord. 1582. d. Tyburn, February 12

Bl. John Munden, sec. priest; b. Coltley, S. Maperton, Dorset; educ. Winchester and New Coll., Oxford; schoolmaster in Dorset; Rheims; Rome; ord. 1582. d. Tyburn, February 12

Bl. James Bell, sec. priest; b. Warrington, Lancs.; educ. Oxford; a Marian priest, who had conformed, and died for being reconciled (aged 64). d. Lancaster, April 20

Bl. John Finch, layman; a yeoman farmer of Eccleston, Lancs.; convert and harborer of priests. d. Lancaster, April 20

St. Richard Gwyn (alias White); layman; b. Llanidloes, Montgomery; educ. St. John's Coll., Cambridge; schoolmaster in Flints and Denbighshire; convert. (Protomartyr of Wales.) d. Wrexham, October 17

1585

Bl. Thomas Alfield, sem. priest, b. Gloucester; educ. Eton, and King's Coll., Cambridge; after conversion, Douai and Rheims; ord. 1581. Cond. for distributing Allen's book, Defence of the English Catholics. Hanged. d. Tyburn, July 6

Ven. Thomas Webley, layman; b. Gloucester; dyer's apprentice; convert. Cond. for distributing Allen's book, Defence of the English Catholics. Hanged. d. Tyburn, July 6

Bl. Hugh Taylor, sem. priest; b. Durham; educ. Rheims; ord. 1584. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, November 26

Bl. Marmaduke Bowes, layman; b. Ingram Grange, Ellerbeck, N.R. Yorks. Cond. for harboring a priest. Hanged. d. York, November 27 Bl. Edward Stransham (alias Barber), sem. priest; b. Oxford; educ. St. John's Coll., Oxford; Douai, Rheims; ord. 1580; Engl. miss., 1581, London and Oxford. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, January 21

Bl. Nicholas Woodfen (alias Devereux, vere Wheeler), sem. priest; b. Leominster; educ. Leominster G.S.; Douai, Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., 1581, London. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, January 21

St. Margaret Clitherow, laywoman, nee Middleton; b. York; convert and receiver of priests. Pressed to death. d. York, March 25

Bl. Richard Sergeant (alias Lea and Long), sem. priest; b. Stone(?), Gloucestershire; educ. Oxford and Rheims; ord. 1583. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, April 20

Bl. William Thomson (alias Blackburn), sem. priest; b. Blackburn, Lancs.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1584. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, April 20

Bl. Robert Anderton, sem. priest; b. Isle of Man; educ. Rivington G.S. and Brasenose Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Rheims; ord. 1584. Cond. for priesthood. d. Isle of Wight, April 25

Bl. William Marsden, sem. priest; b. Goosnargh (or Chipping), Lancs.; educ. Rivington G.S., and St. Mary Hall, Oxford; Rheims; ord. 1585. Cond. for priesthood. d. Isle of Wight, April 25

Bl. Francis Ingleby, sem. priest; b. Ripley, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Brasenose Coll., Oxford and Inner Temple; Rheims; ord. 1583; Engl. miss., 1584, Yorks. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, June 3

Bl. Robert Bickerdike, layman; b. Lowhall, near Knaresborough, W.R. Yorks. Cond. for "traitorous" speech. d. York, July 23 (?)

Bl. John Fingley, sem. priest; b. Barnby, near Howden, E.R. Yorks.; educ. Cambridge; Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., 1581. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, August 8

Bl. John Sandys, sem. priest; b. Lancashire; educ. Rheims; ord. 1584. Cond. for priesthood. d. Gloucester, August 11

Bl. John Lowe, sem. priest; b. London; convert minister; Douai, Rome; ord. 1582; Engl. miss., 1583, London. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, October 8

Bl. John Adams, sem. priest; b. Martinstown, Dorset; educ. Oxford; convert minister; Rheims; ord. 1580. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, October 8

Bl. Robert Dibdale, sem. priest; b. Shottery, Warwicks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1584; Eng. miss., 1584, Denham, Bucks. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, October 8 Bl. Richard Langley, layman; of Ousethorpe, near Pocklington, E.R. Yorks. Hanged for harboring priests. d. York, December 1

1587

Bl. Thomas Pilcher, sem. priest; b. Battle, Sussex; educ. Balliol Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Rheims; ord. 1583; Engl. miss., 1583, W. Counties. Cond. for priesthood. d. Dorchester, March 21

Bl. Edmund Sykes, sem. priest; b. near Leeds, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Oxford(?); Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., 1581, Yorks. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 23

Bl. Stephen Rowsham (alias Rouse), sem. priest; b. Oxfordshire; educ. Oriel Coll., Oxford; minister at St. Mary's, Oxford; after conversion, Rheims; ord. 1582. Cond. for priesthood. d. Gloucester, April?

Bl. John Hambley, sem. priest; b. St. Mabyn, near Bodmin, Cornwall; convert; Rheims; ord. 1584; Engl. miss., 1585, London and West. Cond. for priesthood. d. Salisbury, April?

Bl. Robert Sutton, sem. priest; b. Burton-on-Trent, Staffs.; educ. Burton, and Christ Church, Oxford; parson of Lutterworth; after conversion, Douai; ord. 1578; Engl. miss., Stafford, nine years. Cond. for priesthood. d. Stafford, July 27

Bl. George Douglas, sem. priest (Franciscan); b. Edinburgh; educ. Paris; ord. c. 1560; schoolmaster in Rutland. Cond. under Act of Supremacy. d. York, September 9

Bl. Alexander Crow, sem. priest; b. S. Duffield (or Howden), E.R. Yorks.; shoemaker; student at Rheims; ord. 1583, Engl. miss., Yorks. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, November 30

1588

Bl. Nicholas Garlick, sem. priest; b. Dinting, Derbyshire; educ. Mellor G.S., and Gloucester Hall, Oxford; schoolmaster at Tideswell G.S.; Rheims; ord. 1582; Engl. miss., Midlands. Cond. for priesthood. d. Derby, July 24

Bl. Robert Ludlam, sem. priest; b. Radborne, near Derby; educ. St. John's Coll., Oxford; Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., 1582, Derbyshire. Cond. for priesthood. d. Derby, July 24

Bl. Richard Simpson (alias Highgate), sem. priest; b. Well, near Ripon, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Gloucester Hall, Oxford; convert minister; Douai; ord. 1577; Engl. miss., ten years. Cond. for priesthood. d. Derby, July 24

Bl. William Dean, sem. priest; b. Linton-in-Craven, W.R. Yorks.; convert minister; Rheims; ord. 1581. Cond. for priesthood. Hanged. d. Mile End Green, August 28

1586

Bl. Henry Webley, layman; b. Gloucester. Hanged for aiding Dean (above). d. Mile End Green, August 28

Bl. William Gunter, sem. priest; b. Raglan, Monmouth; educ. Rheims; ord. 1587. Cond. for priesthood, Hanged. d. Shoreditch, August 28

Bl. Robert Morton, sem. priest; b. Bawtry, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims, Rome; ord. 1587. Cond. for priest-hood. Hanged. d. Lincoln's Inn Fields, August 28

Bl. Hugh More, layman; b. Grantham, Lincs.; educ. Broadgates Hall, Oxford and Gray's Inn; convert; Rheims. Hanged for being reconciled. d. Lincoln's Inn Fields, August 28

Bl. Thomas Holford (alias Acton and Bude), sem. priest; b. Aston in parish of Acton, Cheshire; schoolmaster in Herefords.; convert; Rheims; ord. 1583; Engl. miss., London and Cheshire. Cond. for priesthood. Hanged. d. Clerkenwell, August 28

Bl. James Claxton (Clarkson), sem. priest; b. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1582. Cond. for priesthood. Hanged. d. Isleworth, August 28

Bl. Thomas Felton, friar minim; b. Bermondsey; son of Bl. John Felton (see above, 1570); educ. Rheims; not yet ord. Hanged for being reconciled. d. Isleworth, August 28

Bl. Richard Leigh (alias Garth or Earth), sem. priest; b. London; educ. Rheims and Rome; ord. 1586. Cond. for priesthood. Hanged. d. Tyburn, August 30

Bl. Edward Shelley, layman; of Warminghurst, Sussex. Hanged for harboring or relieving priests. d. Tyburn, August 30

Bl. Richard Martin, layman; b. Shropshire; educ. Broadgates Hall, Oxford. Hanged for harboring or relieving priests. d. Tyburn, August 30

Bl. Richard Flower (vere Lloyd or Floyd), layman; b. Anglesey. Hanged for harboring or relieving priests (aged 22). d. Tyburn, August 30

Bl. John Roche (alias Neale), layman; an Irish waterman. Hanged for harboring or relieving priests. d. Tyburn, August 30

St. Margaret Ward, laywoman; b. Congleton, Cheshire. Cond. for rescuing a priest. Hanged. d. Tyburn, August 30

Bl. William Way (alias Flower, sometimes misnamed Wigges), sem. priest; b. Devon; educ. Rheims; ord. 1586. Cond. for priesthood. d. Kingston-on-Thames, September 23

Bl. Robert Wilcox, sem. priest; b. Chester; educ. Rheims; ord. 1585. Cond. for priesthood. d. Canterbury, October 1 Bl. Edward Campion (vere Edwards), sem. priest; b. Ludlow, Shropshire; educ. Jesus Coll., Oxford; after conversion, Rheims; ord. 1587. Cond. for priesthood. d. Canterbury, October 1

Bl. Christopher Buxton, sem. priest; b. Tideswell, Derbyshire; educ. Tideswell G.S.; after conversion Rheims, Rome; ord. 1586. Cond. for priesthood. d. Canterbury, October 1

Bl. Robert Widmerpool, layman; b. Widmerpool, Notts.; educ. Gloucester Hall, Oxford; schoolmaster. Hanged for helping a priest. d. Canterbury, October 1

Bl. Ralph Crockett, sem. priest; b. Barton-on-the-Hill, Cheshire; educ. Christ's Coll., Cambridge, and Gloucester Hall, Oxford; schoolmaster, Norfolk and Suffolk; Rheims; ord. 1586. Cond. for priesthood. d. Chichester, October 1

Bl. Edward James, sem. priest; b. Breaston in parish of Wilne, near Derby; educ. Derby G.S., and St. John's Coll., Oxford; after conversion Rheims, Rome; ord. 1583. Cond. for priesthood. d. Chichester, October 1

Bl. John Robinson, sem. priest; b. Ferrensby, W.R. Yorks.; on wife's death, Rheims; ord. 1585. Cond. for priesthood. d. Ipswich, October 1

Bl. William Hartley, sem. priest; b. Wilne, near Derby; educ. St. John's Coll., Oxford; convert minister; Rheims; ord. 1580. Cond. for priesthood. Hanged. d. Shoreditch, October 5

Bl. Robert Sutton, layman; b. Kegworth, Leicestershire; educ. Oxford(?); schoolmaster in London; convert. Hanged for being reconciled. d. Clerkenwell, October 5

Bl. John Hewett (alias Weldon and Sayell), sem. priest; b. York; educ. Caius Coll., Cambridge; Rheims; ord. 1586. Cond. for priesthood. Hanged. d. Mile End Green, October 5

Bl. Edward Burden, sem. priest; b. Durham; educ. Corpus Christi Coll., Oxford; Rheims; ord. 1584. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, October 31 or November 29

Bl. William Lampley, layman, a Gloucester glover. Cond. for "persuading to popery." d. Gloucester, date unknown

1589

Bl. John Amias (Anne), sem. priest; b. near Wakefield, W.R. Yorks.; clothmonger at Wakefield; married; on wife's death, Rheims; ord. 1581. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 15

Bl. Robert Dalby, sem. priest; b. Hemingborough, E.R. Yorks.; convert minister; Rheims; ord. 1588. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 15 Bl. George Nichols, sem. priest; b. Oxford; educ. Brasenose Coll., Oxford; master at St. Paul's School; Rheims; ord. 1584; Engl. miss., Oxford. Cond. for priesthood. d. Oxford, July 5

Bl. Richard Yaxley, sem. priest; b. Boston, Lincs.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1586; Engl. miss., Oxford. Cond. for priesthood. d. Oxford, July 5

Bl. Thomas Belson, layman; of Brill, Bucks. Hanged for relieving Nichols and Yaxley (above). d. Oxford, July 5

Bl. Humphrey Pritchard, layman; a Welsh servant. Hanged for relieving Nichols and Yaxley (above). d. Oxford, July 5

Bl. William Spenser, sem. priest; b. Gisburn, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Trinity Coll., Oxford; convert; Rheims; ord. 1583. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, September 24

Bl. Robert Hardesty, layman; a serving-man; b. Yorkshire. Hanged for relieving Spenser (above). d. York, September 24

1590

Bl. Christopher Bales, sem. priest; b. Coniscliffe, Durham; educ. Rome and Rheims; ord. 1587. Cond. for priesthood. d. Fleet Street, March 4

Bl. Nicholas Horner; layman; b. Grantley, W. R. Yorks.; a tailor. Hanged for assisting priests. d. Smithfield, March 4

Bl. Alexander Blake, layman, a London ostler. Hanged for assisting priests. d. Gray's Inn Lane, March 4

Bl. Francis Dickenson (Dicconson), (alias Laurence and Keighley), sem. priest; b. Otley, W.R. Yorks.; convert; educ. Rheims; ord. 1589. Cond. for priesthood. d. Rochester, April 13 or 30

Bl. Miles Gerard (alias William Richardson), sem. priest; b. Ince, near Wigan, Lancs.; schoolmaster; educ. Rheims; ord. 1583. Cond. for priesthood. d. Rochester, April 13 or 30

Bl. Edward Jones, sem. priest; b. Lyndon(?), Diocese of St. Asaph; convert; educ. Rheims; ord. 1588. Cond. for priesthood. d. Fleet Street, May 6

Bl. Antony Middleton, sem. priest; b. Middleton Tyas, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1586. Cond. for priesthood. d. Clerkenwell, May 6

Bl. Edmund Duke, sem. priest; b. Kent; convert; educ. Rheims; Rome; ord. 1589. Cond. for priesthood. d. Durham, May 27

Bl. Richard Hill, sem. priest; a Yorkshireman; educ. Rheims; ord. 1589. Cond. for priesthood. d. Durham, May 27 Bl. John Hogg, sem. priest; b. Cleveland, Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1589. Cond. for priesthood. d. Durham, May 27

Bl. Richard Holiday, sometimes listed as John Holiday, sem. priest; a Yorkshireman; educ. Rheims; ord. 1589. Cond. for priesthood. d. Durham, May 27

1591

Bl. Robert Thorpe, sem. priest; b. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1585. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, May 31

Bl. Thomas Watkinson, yeoman, of Menthrope, E.R. Yorks. Hanged for harboring Thorpe (above). d. York, May 31

Bl. Montford Scott, sem. priest; b. Suffolk; educ. Douai; ord. 1577. Cond. for priesthood. d. Fleet Street, July 1

Bl. George Beesley, sem. priest; b. Goosnargh, Lancs.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1587. Cond. for priesthood. d. Fleet Street, July 1

Bl. Roger Dickenson (Dicconson), sem. priest; b.Lincoln; educ. Rheims; ord. 1583. Cond. for priesthood.d. Winchester, July 7

Bl. Ralph Milner, layman; b. Slackstead, Hants.; husbandman. Hanged for relieving Dickenson (above). d. Winchester, July 7

Bl. Laurence Humphrey, layman; b. Hampshire; convert (aged 20). d. Winchester, date unknown

St. Edmund Gennings (alias Ironmonger), sem. priest; b. Lichfield; convert; educ. Rheims; ord. 1590. Cond. for priesthood. d. Gray's Inn Fields, December 10

St. Swithun Wells, layman; of Brambridge, Hants. Hanged for harboring Gennings (above). d. Gray's Inn Fields, December 10

St. Eustace White, sem. priest; b. Louth, Lincs.; convert; educ. Rheims, Rome; ord. 1588. Cond. for priest-hood. d. Tyburn, December 10

St. Polydore Plasden, sem. priest; b. London; educ. Rheims, Rome; ord. 1588. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, December 10

Bl. Brian Lacey, layman; b. Brockdish, Norfolk. Hanged for relieving priests. d. Tyburn, December 10

Bl. John Mason, layman; b. Kendal, Westmorland. Hanged for relieving priests. d. Tyburn, December 10

Bl. Sidney Hodgson, layman; convert. Hanged for relieving priests. d. Tyburn, December 10

Bl. William Pike, layman; a joiner, of Moors, near Christchurch, Hants. Cond. for being reconciled. Hanged. d. Dorchester, December 22

1592

Bl. William Patenson, sem. priest; b. Durham; educ. Rheims; ord. 1587; Engl. miss., 1589, W. Counties. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, January 22

Bl. Thomas Pormort (alias Whitgift, White, Pryce, and Meres), sem. priest; b. Little Limber, Lincs.; educ. Cambridge; Rheims, Rome; ord. 1587. Cond. for priesthood. d. St. Paul's Churchyard, February 21

Ven. Richard Williams, sec. priest; a Marian priest who had conformed and been reconciled. d. Tyburn, February 21

Bl. James Bird (Byrd or Beard), layman; b. Winchester; convert; educ. Rheims. Cond. for being reconciled (aged 19). d. Winchester, March 25

Ven. Roger Ashton, layman; b. Croston, Lancs. d. Tyburn, June 23

Bl. Joseph Lambton, sem. priest; b. Malton-in-Rydale, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims, Rome; ord. 1592. Cond. for priesthood. d. Newcastle, July 31

1593

Bl. Edward Waterson, sem. priest; b. London; convert; educ. Rheims; ord. 1592. Cond. for priesthood. d. Newcastle, January 8

Bl. Antony Page, sem. priest; b. Harrow, Mddx; educ. Christ Church, Oxford; Rheims; ord. 1591. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, April 20

Bl. William Davies, sem. priest; b. Croes-yn-Eirias, Caernarvon; educ. St. Edmund Hall, Oxford; Rheims; ord. 1585; miss., N. Wales. Cond. for priesthood. d. Beaumaris, July 27

1594

Bl. John Speed (alias Spence), layman; b. Durham. Hanged for relieving priests. d. Durham, February 4

Bl. William Harrington, sem. priest; b. Mount St. John, Felixkirk, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1592; Engl. miss., London. Cond. for priesthood (aged 27). d. Tyburn, February 18

Bl. John Cornelius (alias O'Mahony and Mohun), sem. priest; b. Bodmin, of Irish parents; fellow of Exeter Coll., Oxford; Rheims, Rome; ord. 1583; Engl. miss., Lanherne, ten years; adm. SJ 1594. Cond. for priesthood. d. Dorchester, July 4

Bl. Thomas Bosgrave, layman, nephew of Sir J. Arundel; b. Cornwall. Hanged for aiding Cornelius (above). d. Dorchester, July 4

Bl. John Carey, layman, Irish serving-man. Hanged for aiding Cornelius (above). d. Dorchester, July 4

Bl. Patrick Salmon, layman, Irish serving-man. Hanged for aiding Cornelius (above). d. Dorchester, July 4

St. John Boste, sem. priest; b. Dufton, Westmorland; educ. Queen's Coll., Oxford; convert minister; Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., N. Counties, 12 years. Cond. for priesthood. d. Durham, July 24

Bl. John Ingram, sem. priest; b. Stoke Edith, Hereford; convert; educ. New Coll., Oxford; Rheims, Rome; ord. 1589; miss. in Scotland. Cond. for priesthood. d. Gateshead, July 26

Bl. George Swallowell, layman; b. Shadforth, near Durham; educ. Sherburn Hospital; schoolmaster; convert minister. Cond. for being reconciled. d. Darlington, July 26

Bl. Edward Osbaldeston, sem. priest; b. Osbaldeston, near Blackburn, Lancs.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1585; Engl. miss., Yorks. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, November 16

1595

St. Robert Southwell, priest; b. Horsham St. Faith, Norfolk; educ. Douai; Rome; adm. SJ 1578; Engl. miss., London, 1586–92. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, February 21

Bl. Alexander Rawlins (alias Francis Feriman); sem. priest; b. Oxfordshire; educ. Rheims; ord. 1590; Engl. miss., Yorks. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, April 7

St. Henry Walpole, priest; b. Docking, Norfolk; educ. Norwich G.S., and Peterhouse, Cambridge; Gray's Inn; convert; English Coll., Rome; adm. SJ 1584; ord. Paris, 1588. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, April 7

Bl. William Freeman (alias Mason), sem. priest; b. Menthorpe(?), E.R. Yorks.; educ. Magdalen Coll., Oxford; convert; Rheims; ord. 1587; Engl. miss., Worcester and Warwick. Cond. for priesthood. d. Warwick, August 13

St. Philip Howard, earl of Arundel and Surrey, layman; b. Arundel House, London; prisoner under sentence of death for being reconciled, 1585 till death. d. Tower of London, October 19

1596

Bl. George Errington, layman; b. Hurst, near Morpeth, Northumberland; educ. Oxford. Cond. for "persuading to popery." d. York, November 29

Bl. William Knight, layman; b. S. Duffield(?), E.R. Yorks. Cond. for "persuading to popery." d. York, November 29

Bl. William Gibson, layman; b. near Ripon, W.R. Yorks. Cond. for "persuading to popery." d. York, November 29

1597

Bl. Christopher Robinson, sem. priest; b. Woodside, near Carlisle; educ. Rheims; ord. 1592; Engl. miss., six years in the North. Cond. for priesthood. d. Carlisle, late March or Aug. 19, 1598

Bl. Henry Abbot, layman; of Howden, E.R. Yorks.; convert. Cond. for "persuading to popery." d. York, July 4

Bl. William Andleby (Anlaby), b. Etton, near Beverley, E.R. Yorks.; educ. St. John's Coll., Cambridge; convert; Douai; ord. 1577; Engl. miss., Yorks., 20 years. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, July 4

Bl. Thomas Warcop, layman; of Winston, County Durham. Hanged for harboring. d. York, July 4

Bl. Edward Fulthrop, layman; of Yorkshire. Hanged, drawn, and quartered for being reconciled. d. York, July 4

1598

Bl. John Bretton, layman; b. W. Bretton, near Wakefield, Yorks.; married. Cond. on charge of treasonable language. d. York, April 1

Bl. Peter Snow, sem. priest; b. Ripon, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1591; Engl. miss., Yorks. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, June 15

Bl. Ralph Grimston, yeoman, of Nidd, near Knaresborough, W.R. Yorks. Cond. for harboring. Hanged. d. York, June 15

St. John Jones (alias Buckley), priest, Franciscan; b. Clynog Fawr, Caernarvon; joined Observants at Rome as Father Godfrey Maurice; Engl. miss., London 1592–97. Cond. for priesthood. d. Southwark, July 12

Ven. Richard Horner, sem. priest; b. Bolton Bridge, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Douai; ord. 1595. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, September 4

Ven. John Lion, layman. Cond. for denying Supremacy. d. Oakham, July 16

Ven. James Dowdall, layman; a Waterford merchant; arrested in England. Cond. for denying Supremacy. d. Exeter, August 13

1600

Bl. Christopher Wharton, sem. priest; b. Middleton, near Ilkley, W.R. Yorks.; convert; educ. Trinity Coll., Oxford; Rheims; ord. 1584; Engl. miss., 14 years. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 28 St. John Rigby, layman; b. Harrock Hall, near Wigan, Lancs. Cond. for being reconciled. d. Southwark, June 21

Bl. Thomas Sprott (alias Parker), sem. priest; b. Skelsmergh, near Kendal, Westmorland; educ. Douai; ord. 1596. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lincoln, July 1

Bl. Thomas Hunt (alias or vere Benstead), sem. priest; b. Norfolk; educ. Valladolid and Seville. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lincoln, July 1

Bl. Robert Nutter (alias Askew and Rowley), sem. priest; b. Reedley Hallows, near Burnley, Lancs.; educ. Blackburn; Rheims; ord. 1581; Engl. miss., 18 years, mostly in prison; adm. OP in prison. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, July 26

Bl. Edward Thwing, sem. priest; b. Heworth, near York; educ. Rheims; Rome; ord. 1590. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, July 26

Bl. Thomas Palaser, sem. priest; b. Ellerton-upon-Swale, near Richmond, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; Valladolid; ord. 1596. Cond. for priesthood. d. Durham, August 9

Bl. John Norton, layman; of Ravensworth, Lamesley, Durham. Hanged for harboring. d. Durham, August 9

Bl. John Talbot, layman; of Thornton-le-Street, N.R. Yorks. Hanged for harboring. d. Durham, August 9

1601

Bl. John Pibush, sem. priest; b. Thirsk, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1587; Engl. miss., 12 years, mostly in prison. Cond. for priesthood. d. Southwark, February 18

Bl. Mark Barkworth (alias Lambert), priest, Benedictine; b. Searby, Lincolnshire; educ. Oxford; after conversion Rome, Valladolid. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, February 27

Bl. Roger Filcock (alias Arthur), priest; b. Sandwich, Kent; educ. Rheims, Valladolid; adm. SJ in England. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, February 27

St. Anne Line, laywoman, nee Higham; b. Dunmow, Essex; convert. Hanged for harboring. d. Tyburn, February 27

Bl. Thurstan Hunt (alias Greenlow); b. Carlton Hall, Leeds, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Rheims; ord. 1585. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, April 3

Bl. Robert Middleton, sem. priest; b. York; educ. Douai and Rome; adm. SJ in prison. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, April 3 Ven. Nicholas Tichborne, layman; b. Hartley Mauditt, Hants. Hanged for rescuing a priest. d. Tyburn, August 24

Ven. Thomas Hackshott (Hawkshaw), layman; a young man from Muresley, Bucks. Hanged for rescuing a priest. d. Tyburn, August 24

1602

Ven. James (or Matthew) Harrison, sem. priest; b. Diocese of Lichfield; educ. Rheims; ord. 1583. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 22

Ven. Antony Bates (Battie), layman, farmer, of Masham, E.R. Yorks. Hanged for harboring. d. York, March 22

Bl. James Duckett, layman; b. Gilfortrigs, Skelsmergh, Westmorland; convert, bookseller. Cond. for printing Catholic books. Hanged. d. Tyburn, April 19

Ven. Thomas Tichborne, sem. priest; b. Hartley Mauditt, Hants.; educ. Rheims and Rome; ord. 1592; Engl. miss., Hants. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, April 20

Bl. Robert Watkinson, sem. priest; b. Hemingborough, E.R. Yorks.; educ. Hemingborough and Castleford; Douai; Rome; ord. March 1602. Cond. for priesthood (aged 23). d. Tyburn, April 20

Bl. Francis Page, sem. priest; b. Antwerp; of a Harrow family; educ. Douai; ord. 1600; adm. SJ in prison. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, April 20

1603

Bl. William Richardson (alias Anderson), sem. priest; b. Wales, near Sheffield, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Valladolid; Seville; ord. 1594. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, February 17

Under James I

1604

Bl. John Sugar (alias Cox), sem. priest; b. Wombourn, Staffs.; educ. St. Mary Hall, Oxford; convert minister; Douai; ord. 1601; Engl. miss., Midlands. Cond. for priesthood. d. Warwick, July 16

Bl. Robert Grissold, layman; b. Rowington, Warwicks. Cond. for relieving priests. Hanged. d. Warwick, July 16

Ven. Laurence Bailey, layman, a Lancashire miller. Hanged for rescuing a priest. d. Lancaster, August, day unknown 1605

Bl. Thomas Welbourne, layman; b. Hutton Bushel, N.R. Yorks.; schoolmaster. Cond. for "persuading to popery." d. York, August 1

Bl. William Browne, layman; b. Northampton. Cond. for ''persuading to popery.'' d. Ripon, September 5

1606

St. Nicholas Owen, Jesuit brother; b. Oxford; companion to Father Henry Garnet, SJ. Died from torture. d. Tower of London, March 2

Bl. Edward Oldcorne (alias Hunter and Hall), priest;b. York; educ. Rheims; Rome; adm. SJ 1587; Engl. miss.,Midlands, 1588–1606. Cond. for alleged complicity in the Gunpowder Plot. d. Worcester, April 7

Bl. Ralph Ashley, Jesuit brother; companion to Oldcorne (above); had been a servant at Rheims and Valladolid. Cond. for alleged complicity in the Gunpowder Plot. d. Worcester, April 7

1607

Bl. Robert Drury, sem. priest; b. Bucks.; educ. Rheims; Valladolid; ord. 1593; Engl. miss., London district. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, February 26

1608

Bl. Matthew Flathers, sem. priest; b. Weston, near Otley, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Douai; ord. 1606. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 21

Bl. George Gervase, priest, Benedictine; b. Bosham, Sussex; educ. Douai; ord. 1603. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, April 11

St. Thomas Garnet priest; b. Southwark; educ. Horsham; St. Omer; Valladolid; adm. SJ 1604. Cond. for priesthood. (Protomartyr of St. Omer College.) d. Tyburn, June 23

1610

Bl. Roger Cadwallador, sem. priest; b. Stretton, Hereford; educ. Rheims; Valladolid; ord. 1593; Engl. miss., Hereford. Cond. for priesthood. d. Leominster, August 27

Bl. George Napper (Napier), sem. priest; b. Oxford; educ. Corpus Christi Coll., Oxford; Douai; ord. 1596; Engl. miss., Oxford. Cond. for priesthood. d. Oxford, November 9

Bl. Thomas Somers (alias Wilson), sem. priest; b. Skelsmergh, Westmorland; schoolmaster; educ. Douai; ord. 1606; Engl. miss., London district. Cond. for priest-hood. d. Tyburn, December 10

St. John Roberts, priest; b. Trawsfynydd, Merioneth; educ. St. John's Coll., Oxford; convert; Valladolid; adm.

OSB, 1599; Engl. miss., London district. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, December 10

1612

Bl. William Scott, priest; b. Chigwell, Essex; educ. Trinity Hall, Cambridge; convert; adm. OSB in Spain 1604 (Dom Maurus); Engl. miss., London district. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, May 30

Bl. Richard Newport (alias Smith), sem. priest; b. Ashby St. Legers, Northants.; educ. Rome; ord. 1599; Engl. miss., London district. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, May 30

St. John Almond, sem. priest; b. Allerton, near Liverpool; educ. Much Woolton; Rheims; Rome; ord. 1598; Engl. miss., 1602–12. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, December 5

1616

Bl. Thomas Atkinson, sem. priest; b. Leeds; educ. Rheims; ord. 1588; Engl. miss., 1588–1616. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, March 11

Bl. John Thules, sem. priest; b. Whalley, Lancs.; educ. Rheims; Rome; ord. 1592. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, March 18

Bl. Roger Wrenno, layman, a Chorley weaver. Hanged for relieving priests. d. Lancaster, March 18

Bl. Thomas Maxfield, sem. priest; b. The Mere, Enville, Staffs.; educ. Douai; ord. 1615. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, July 1

Bl. Thomas Tunstal (alias Helmes and Dyer), priest, Benedictine; b. Whinfell, near Kendal, Westmorland; educ. Douai; ord. 1609. Cond. for priesthood. d. Norwich, July 13

1618

Bl. William Southerne (Sotheran), sem. priest; b. Ketton, near Darlington; educ. Valladolid; Seville; Douai; ord. c. 1601; Engl. miss. Staffs. Cond. for priest-hood. d. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, April 30

Under Charles I

1628

St. Edmund Arrowsmith, priest; b. Haydock, near St. Helen's, Lanes; educ. Douai; ord. 1612; Engl. miss., Lancs., 1613–28; adm. SJ 1623. Cond. for priesthood and "persuading to popery." d. Lancaster, August 28

Bl. Richard Herst (also Hurst or Hayhurst), layman;b. Broughton(?), near Preston, Lancs. Hanged on charge of murder. d. Lancaster, August 29

1641

Bl. William Ward (vere Webster), sem. priest; b. Thornby (Thrimby), Westmorland; educ. Douai; ord. 1608; Engl. miss., 33 years (20 in prison). Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, July 26

St. Ambrose (Edward) Barlow, priest; b. Barlow Hall, near Manchester; educ. Douai; Valladolid; professed OSB 1615; Engl. miss., 24 years. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, September 10

1642

Bl. Richard (Thomas) Reynolds (vere Green), sem. priest; b. Warwicks.; educ. Douai; Seville; ord. 1602; Engl. miss., nearly 50 years. Cond. for priesthood (aged about 80). d. Tyburn, January 31

St. Alban (Bartholomew) Roe (Rowe), priest; b. St. Albans; educ. Cambridge(?); after conversion, Douai; professed OSB 1612; Engl. miss., 1615–42. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, January 31

Ven. John Goodman, sem. priest; b. Bangor; educ. Oxford; convert minister; Douai; ord. in France c. 1632. Cond. for priesthood. Died in prison. d. Newgate, April 8

Bl. John Lockwood (alias Lascelles), sem. priest; b. Sowerby, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Rome; ord. 1597; Engl. miss., 1598–1642. Cond. for priesthood (aged 81). d. York, April 13

Bl. Edmund Catherick, sem. priest; of Carlton, near Richmond, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Douai; Engl. miss., 1635–42. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, April 13

Ven. Edward Morgan (alias John Singleton), sem. priest; b. Bettisfield, Flints.; educ. Douai; Rome; Valladolid; ord. 1618; 14 years' prisoner. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, April 26

Bl. Hugh Green (alias Ferdinand Brooke), sem. priest; b. London; educ. Peterhouse, Cambridge; convert; Douai; ord. 1612; Engl. miss., Dorset. Cond. for priesthood. d. Dorchester, August 19

Bl. Thomas Bullaker, priest; b. Chichester, Sussex; educ. St. Omer; Valladolid; adm. OSF in Spain, 1624 (Father John Baptist). Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, October 12

Bl. Thomas Holland (alias Sanderson and Hammond), priest; b. Sutton, near Prescot, Lancs.; educ. St. Omer; Valladolid; adm. SJ 1624. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, December 12

1643

Bl. Henry Heath, priest; b. Peterborough; educ. St. Benets, Cambridge; convert minister; Douai; adm. OSF 1622 (Father Paul of St. M. Magdalen). Cond. for priest-hood. d. Tyburn, April 17

Bl. Arthur Bell, priest, Franciscan; b. Temple Broughton, Worcester; educ. St. Omer; Valladolid; adm. OSF 1617 (Father Francis); Engl. miss., 1634. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, December 11

1644

Ven. Robert Price (Apreece), layman; of Washingley, Huntingdon. Shot by Puritan soldiers. d. Lincoln, May 7

Bl. John Duckett, sem. priest; b. Underwinder, near Sedbergh, W.R. Yorks.; educ. Douai; ord. 1639; Engl. miss., Durham. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, September 7

Bl. Ralph Corbie (vere Corbington), priest; b. Dublin; educ. St. Omer; Seville; Valladolid; adm. SJ 1631; Engl. miss., Durham. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, September 7

1645

St. Henry Morse, priest; b. Broome, Suffolk; convert; educ. Inns of Court; Douai; Rome; adm. SJ 1625; Engl. miss., London, etc. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, February 1

Ven. Brian Cansfield, priest; b. Robert Hall, Tatham, Lancs.; educ. St. Omer; Rome; adm. SJ 1604; Engl. miss., Lincoln and Lancs. Died of ill treatment in prison. d. York, August 3

1646

Bl. Philip Powel (alias Morgan), priest; b. Trallong, Brecknocks; educ. Abergavenny G.S. and Temple; adm. OSB 1614; Engl. miss., 1622, in West. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, June 30

Bl. Edward Bamber (alias Helmes and Reding), sem. priest; b. Carleton, Blackpool, Lanes; educ. St. Omer; Seville; Engl. miss., Lancs. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, August 7

Bl. John Woodcock (alias Farington and Thompson), priest; b. Clayton-le-Woods, near Preston, Lancs.; educ. St. Omer; Rome; adm. OSF 1631 (Father Martin). Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, August 7

Bl. Thomas Whitaker (alias Starkie), sem. priest; b. Burnley, Lancs.; educ. St. Omer; Valladolid; ord. 1638; Engl. miss., Lancs. Cond. for priesthood. d. Lancaster, August 7

During The Commonwealth

1651

Bl. Peter Wright, priest; b. Slipton, Northants.; convert; educ. Ghent; Rome; adm. SJ 1629; military chaplain in Civil War. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, May 19

1654

St. John Southworth, sem. priest; b. Lancs.; connected with Southworths of Samlesbury; educ. Douai; ord. 1619; Engl. miss., Lancs. Cond. for priesthood. d. Tyburn, June 28

Under Charles II

1678

Ven. Edward Mico (alias Harvey), priest; b. Essex; educ. St. Omer; Rome; adm. SJ 1650. Arrested for "the plot." Too ill to be removed from sick-bed, where he died. d. Wild House, London, November 24

Bl. Edward Coleman, layman; b. Suffolk; educ. Peterhouse, Cambridge; convert; secretary to duchess of York. Arrested for "the plot." d. Tyburn, December 3

Ven. Thomas Bedingfeld (alias Mumford, vere Downes), priest; b. Norfolk; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ 1638. Arrested for "the plot." Died in prison. d. Gatehouse, December 21

1679

Bl. William Ireland (vere Iremonger), priest; b. Lincs.; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ, 1655. Arrested for "the plot." d. Tyburn, January 24

Bl. John Grove, layman, servant of Ireland (above). Arrested for "the plot." d. Tyburn, January 24

Ven. Francis Nevill (vere Cotton), priest; b. Hants.; adm. SJ 1616; Engl. miss., 1630–79, mostly Midlands. Died in prison for "the plot." d. Stafford, end of February

Bl. Thomas Pickering, Benedictine brother; b. Westmorland(?); professed OSB 1660. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, May 9

Bl. Thomas Whitbread (alias Harcourt and Harcott), priest; b. Essex; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ 1635; Engl. miss., 1647–78; Jesuit provincial. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, June 20

Bl. William Harcourt (alias Waring, vere Barrow), priest; b. Weeton-cum-Prees, Kirkham, Lancs.; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ 1632; Engl. miss., 1645–78, London. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, June 20

Bl. John Fenwick (vere Caldwell), priest; b. Durham; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ 1656. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, June 20

Bl. John Gavan, priest; b. London; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ 1660; Engl. miss., 1671, Staffs. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, June 20

Bl. Antony Turner, priest; b. Dalby Parva, near Melton Mowbray, Leicester; educ. Cambridge; after conversion, Rome; adm. SJ 1653; Engl. miss., 1661–78, Worcester. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, June 20

Bl. Richard Langhorne, layman; b. Bedford; educ. Inner Temple; barrister; called to Bar 1654. Cond. for "the plot." d. Tyburn, July 14

St. John (or William) Plessington (Pleasington; alias Scarisbrick), sem. priest; b. Dimples, near Garstang, Lancs.; educ. Scarisbrick School; Valladolid; Engl. miss., Cheshire. Cond. for priesthood. d. Chester, July 19

St. Philip Evans, priest; b. Monmouth; educ. St. Omer; adm. SJ 1665; Welsh miss. Cond. for priesthood. d. Cardiff, July 22

St. John Lloyd, sem. priest; b. Brecknocks; educ. Valladolid; Welsh miss. Cond. for priesthood. d. Cardiff, July 22

Bl. Nicholas Postgate (alias Watson and Whitemore), sem. priest; b. Egton, N.R. Yorks.; educ. Douai; ord. 1628; Engl. miss., Ugthorpe, etc., 50 years. Cond. for priesthood. d. York, August 7

Bl. Charles Meehan, priest; b. in Ireland; Irish Province, OFM; arrested in Wales on way to Ireland. Cond. for priesthood. d. Ruthin, August 12

St. John Wall (alias Francis Webb and Johnson), priest; b. Chingle Hall, Wittingham, Lancs.; educ. Douai; Rome; adm. OSF 1651 (Father Joachim of St. Ann); Engl. miss., Worcester 1656–79. Cond. for priesthood. d. Worcester, August 22

St. John Kemble (alias Holland), sem. priest; b. Pembridge(?), Hereford; educ. Douai; Engl. miss.,1625–79, Hereford. Cond. for priesthood. d. Hereford, August 22

St. David Lewis (alias Charles Baker), priest; b. Abergavenny, Monmouths; educ. Abergavenny G.S.; convert; Rome; adm. SJ 1645; miss., S. Wales, 31 years. Cond. for priesthood. d. Usk, August 27

1680

Ven. Francis Leveson, priest; b. Willenhall, Staffs.; adm. OSF 1664 (Father Ignatius of St. Clare). Arrested for "the plot." Died in prison, Worcester, February 11

Bl. Thomas Thwing (Thweng), sem. priest; b. Heworth, N.R. Yorks.; educ. St. Omer; Douai; ord. 1665; Engl. miss., Yorks., 15 years. Cond. for "the plot." d. York, October 23

Bl. William Howard, Viscount Stafford, layman; grandson of St. Philip HOWARD; b. Strand, London, 1611; married; convert. Cond. for "the plot." Beheaded. d. Tower Hill, December 29

The "Dilati"

Robert Dimock, layman, died in prison, Lincoln, 1580

John Cooper, layman, died in prison, London, 1580

William Tyrwhit, layman, died in prison, London, 1580

William Chaplain, sem. priest, died in prison, place unknown, 1583

Thomas Cotesmore, sem. priest, died in prison, place unknown, 1584

Robert Holmes, sem. priest, died in prison, place unknown, 1584

Roger Wakeman, sem. priest, died in prison, London, 1584

James Lomax, sem. priest, died in prison, place unknown, 1584

Mr. Ailworth, layman, died in prison, London, 1584

Thomas Crowther, sem. priest, died in prison, Southwark, 1585

Edward Pole, sem. priest, died in prison, London, 1585

Laurence Vaux, priest, Can. Reg., died in prison, London, 1585

John Jetter, sem. priest, died in prison, London, 1585

John Harrison, sem. priest, died in prison, place unknown, 1587

Martin Sherson, sem. priest, died in prison, place unknown, 1587

Gabriel Thimelby, layman, died in prison, place unknown, 1587

Thomas Metham, priest, SJ, died in prison, Wisbeach, 1592

James Atkinson, layman, died from torture, London, 1595

Matthew Harrison, sem. priest, executed, York, 1599

Eleanor Hunt, widow, died in prison, York, 1600

Mrs. Swithun Wells, widow, died in prison, London, 1602

Henry Garnet, priest, SJ, executed, London, 1606

John Mawson, layman, executed, Tyburn, 1614

Edward Wilkes, sem. priest, died in prison, York, 1642

Boniface Kemp, priest, OSB, died in prison, Yorkshire, 1642 Ildephonse Hesketh, priest, OSB, died in prison, Yorkshire, 1642

Thomas Vaughan, sem. priest, died in prison, Cardiff, probably 1644

Richard Bradley, priest, SJ, died in prison, Manchester, 1646

John Felton, priest, SJ, died in prison, Lincoln, 1646

Thomas Blount, sem. priest, died in prison, Shrewsbury, probably 1646

Robert Cox, priest, OSB, died in prison, Southwark, 1650

Laurence Hill, layman, executed, Tyburn, 1679

Robert Green, layman, executed, Tyburn, 1679

Thomas Jenison, priest, SJ, died in prison, London, 1679

William Lloyd, sem. priest, died in prison, Brecknock, 1679

Placid Adelham, priest, OSB, died in prison, London, 1680

Richard Birkett, sem., SJ, died in prison, Lancaster, 1680

Richard Lacy, priest, SJ, died in prison, London, 1680

William Atkins, priest, SJ, died in prison, Stafford, 1681

Edward Turner, priest, SJ, died in prison, London, 1681

William Allison, sem. priest, died in prison, York, 1681

Benedict Constable, priest, OSB, died in prison, Durham, 1683

William Bennet, priest, SJ, died in prison, Leicester, 1692

For additional information on martyrs see individual entries.

Bibliography: The Catholic Martyrs of England and Wales (London 1985). L'Osservatore Romano, English edition, no. 44, (1987): 6–7; no. 48, (1987): 6. R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924; repr. Farnborough 1969). B. CAMM, Nine Martyr Monks (London 1931); ed., Lives of the English Martyrs, 2 v. (New York 1904–05). P. CARA-MAN, Henry Garnet, 1555–1606, and the Gunpowder Plot (New York 1965). M. L. CARRAFIELLO, Robert Parsons and English Catholicism, 1580–1610 (London 1998); The Catholic Martyrs of England and Wales (London 1985). P. COLLINSON and J. CRAIG, eds., The Reformation in English Towns, 1500–1640 (New York 1998). Acts of the Privy Council (London 1890–1907). S. DORAN, Princes, Pastors, and People: The Church and Religion in England, 1529-1689 (London 1991). M. J. DORCY, "Ven. Robert Nutter," St. Dominic's Family (Dubuque, Ia. 1964), 341-342. T. P. ELLIS, The Catholic Martyrs of Wales (London 1933). Douai, English College, The First and Second Diaries of the English College Douai, ed. Fathers of the Congregation of the London Oratory (London 1878). The remaining College Diaries are published by the Catholic Record Society. G. R. ELTON, Policy and Police: The Enforcement of the Reformation in the Age of Thomas Cromwell (Cambridge 1972). D. FLYNN, John Donne and the Ancient Catholic Nobility (Bloomington, Ind. 1995). H. FOLEY, Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, 7 v. (London 1877-82). J. FOSTER, Alumni Oxonienses (Oxford 1892); Glover's Visitation of Yorkshire [London (privately printed), 1875]. J. GIBBONS, Concertatio Ecclesiae Catholicae in Anglia adversus Calvinpapistas et Puritanos, ed., M. ROGERS (1588, reprint, Farnborough 1970). GILLOW, Biblical Dictictionary of English Catholicism, 5 v. (London and New York 1885–1902). C. HAIGH, Reformation and Resistance in Tudor Lancashire (London 1975). F. HEAL & R. O'DAY, eds. Church and Society in England: Henry VIII to James I, (London 1977). L. HEN-DRIKS, London Charterhouse: Its Monks and Its Martyrs (London 1889). KNOX, First and Second Diaries of English College, Douai (London 1878). D. M. LOADES, The Oxford Martyrs, 2 ed. (Bangor, Gwynedd 1992). P. MARSHALL, The Catholic Priesthood and the English Reformation (Oxford 1994). T. M. MCCOOG, The Society of Jesus in Ireland, Scotland, and England: 1541-1588 (New York 1996). J. MORRIS, ed., The Troubles of Our Catholic Forefathers Related by Themselves, 3 v. (London 1872-77); The Catholics of York under Elizabeth (London 1891). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of the English Martyrs (London 1891); English Martyrs 1584-1683 in Catholic Record Society, 5 v. (London 1908); The English Catholics in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth . . . , 2nd ed. (New York 1971). M. STANTON, Menology of England and Wales (London 1887). J. THADDEUS, The Franciscans in England 1600-1859, 15 v. (London 1898). E. M. THOMPSON, The Carthusian Order in England (New York 1930). M. TODD, ed., Reformation to Revolution: Politics and Religion in Early Modern England (London 1995). J. N. TYLENDA, Jesuit Saints & Martyrs (Chicago 1998), 16-17; 27-32; 65-69; 87-95; 138-40; 155-56; 175-81; 189-92; 198-99; 216-17; 266-70; 288-89; 415-21; 440-42. S. UNDSET, Stages on the Road, tr. by A. WALSHAM, Church Papists: Catholicism, Conformity, and Confessional Polemic in Early Modern England (Rochester, N.Y. 1993). J. WALSH, Forty Martyrs of England and Wales (London 1972). E. I. WATKIN, Roman Catholicism in England (New York 1957). WATSON, Decacordon of Ten Ouodlibet Ouestions (1602). W. WESTON, An Autobiography from the Jesuit Underground, translated by L. E. WHATMORE, Blessed Carthusian Martyrs (London 1962). R. WHITING, Local Responses to the English Reformation (New York 1998). D. DE YEPES, Historia Particular de la persecución de Inglaterra (Madrid 1599).

[P. CARAMAN/EDS.]

ENGLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

One of several kingdoms comprising the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, England is situated on the largest island in Europe. Bordered on the north by Scotland, on the west by Wales, the Irish Sea, and the island of Ireland, and on the east by the North Sea, England is separated from France and the European mainland by the English Channel. One of the world' major industrial powers, and with a maritime fleet second to none during the 18th and 19th centuries, England divested itself of its colonial holdings during the early 20th century and has since become a modern nation and a member of the European Union. Although retaining political control of Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland, the British parliament granted each of these principalities increasing degrees of political self-determination by the end of the 20th century.

The essay that follows covers the history of Catholicism in England from A.D. 597 to the present. For information specific to Scotland, Wales, or Northern Ireland, please refer to those entries. For information on the Church in England prior to 597, see the entry, BRITAIN, THE EARLY CHURCH IN.

[EDS.]

English history before the Reformation can be divided into three epochs, the first of which is a period of conversion or plantation (7th-8th centuries). After almost a century of wars, shifting political boundaries, and Danish invasion, a second period began with Alfred the Great, in which civil and ecclesiastical organization interpenetrated and in which the fortunes of the Church depended greatly upon the king. Finally, during the period from the Conquest onward, the Church in England was drawn into the administrative network of the reformed papacy. From being an outlying part of Christendom in communion with the apostolic see, it became a regional Church (ecclesia Anglicana) like all the other churches of Europe, forming part of a unitary system that depended directly upon the papacy for its doctrine, legislation, and discipline.

597 to 880. When GREGORY I became pope all England, save the Cornish coast, was pagan. Christianity had been driven, with the British, into Wales. In Ireland, however, a flourishing Christian population was evangelizing the western isles of Scotland; Wales was also Christian, but the Celtic Church had made no attempt to convert the Anglo-Saxon invaders. Had Gregory not sent AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY, Christianity would probably have spread slowly from the north over England; as it was, there was an almost simultaneous entry from north and from south.

While successful at the court of King ETHELBERT OF KENT, the mission of Augustine failed to expand beyond London and south Essex, and a meeting with British ecclesiastics near the Severn failed to achieve a union. After Augustine's death, one of his companions, PAULINUS OF Capital: London.

Size: 50,333 sq. mi	les.
Population: 52,563	3,500 in 2000.
Language: English	1.
Religions: 4,730,7	15 Catholics (9%), 25,756,115 Anglicans
(49%), 2,102,540 N	Aethodist (4%), 262,000 Sikh (.5%),
270,800 Hindu (.59	%), 260,550 Jewish (.5%), 394,230 other
(7.5%), 18,786,550	without religious affiliation.

YORK, was sent as bishop to evangelize the north. Having converted the king of the Northumbrians, Paulinus preached and baptized in Lindsey, near York, and as far north as Yeavering in Northumberland. At retirement he left numerous converts, but not an organized church. In East Anglia, the Burgundian Felix of Dunwich and the Irishman FURSEY had more permanent success, and in Wessex BIRINUS founded a church in the upper Thames Valley. Where Paulinus had failed, AIDAN from Iona and his companions succeeded; within 20 years a flourishing Church with Celtic traditions and culture had extended its influence to Mercia in the north Midlands. A clash between the Roman and Celtic traditions was inevitable: while no doctrinal issue was at stake, points of ritual and discipline, including the date of Easter, as well as differences of sentiment, devotions, and ascetic ideals caused disagreement. Union was effected at a debate held at WHITBY in 663, and the victory on disputed points lay with the Roman party, ably represented by WILFRID; but Celtic sanctity, personified by CUTHBERT OF LINDIS-FARNE, permanently influenced Northumbrian religious sentiment.

Meanwhile England was becoming Christian. The faith was spread and maintained by groups of monks and clergy, living in "minsters" and preaching and ministering at crosses and other landmarks before founding churches, which in time became parishes. Monasteries of men and women of the Gallic pattern multiplied, with saintly abbesses such as HILDA OF WHITBY and ETHELRE-DA OF ELY and hermits such as GUTHLAC OF CROWLAND. A period of loose organization ended with the papal appointment to Canterbury of the elderly Greek monk THE-ODORE, who, assisted by the African monk HADRIAN, reformed the church, founding new sees and giving it new laws and discipline. Schools began to flourish, and ALDHELM OF MALMESBURY was the first writer. At the same time, the Northumbrian BENEDICT BISCOP took Roman ritual and chant and Benedictine monachism to Jarrow and Wearmouth, where a remarkable flowering of literary and artistic activity was crowned by the writings of BEDE and the calligraphy and illuminations of the LIN-DISFARNE GOSPELS. The generation following Bede saw a great exodus of missionaries, men and women, from

Metropolitan Sees	Suffragans
Westminster	Brentwood, Northampton, East Anglia, Nottingham
Birmingham	Clifton and Shrewsbury
Liverpool	Hexham and Newcastle, Lancaster, Hallam, Leeds, Middlesbrough, and Salford
Southwark	Plymouth, Portsmouth, Arundel and Brighton.

Northumbrian and Wessex monasteries to Frisia and Germany, with St. BONIFACE of Devon as their chief. The great age of the Anglo-Saxon Church continued in Mercia under Offa and flourished in the north and south till the end of the 8th century, and had its share, through AL-CUIN and others, in forming the spirit of the CAROLINGIAN RENAISSANCE.

880 to 1066. The continuity of development was broken from 780 onward by the Danish invasions, which increased in number and strength until the Danes ultimately controlled England north and east of Watling Street. Though Christianity was never exterminated, and the whole of the Danelaw soon became Christian, the country had been shaken and ravaged, and the culture of the past did not return. ALFRED THE GREAT (871-899) inherited a kingdom without schools or monasteries, making the period of recovery slow. A new era of prosperity dawned during the mid-10th century, when the ability and piety of King Athelstan, the patronage of King EDGAR, and the emergence of a trio of saintly and able monk-bishops, DUNSTAN, ETHELWOLD, and OSWALD OF YORK, led to a great rebirth of piety. It issued in and was assisted by a monastic revival on a large scale, leading to the foundation of some 40 houses of men and women, including three cathedrals staffed by monks. A revival of educational, literary, and artistic activity accompanied the monastic movement. This revival owed nothing to Roman or Continental initiative, and though England was traditionally devoted to Rome, the only direct links were the reception of the PALLIUM by each archbishop of Canterbury, the collection of PETER'S PENCE, and frequent pilgrimages to Rome.

In this period civil and ecclesiastical affairs were closely interwoven. Bishops and abbots were members of the royal council or witenagemot, which, presided over by the king, elected bishops, judged important cases, and framed laws on moral and ecclesiastical matters. Bishops would publish their decrees in the shire court, where ecclesiastical as well as civil justice was administered, and were appointed by the king on the advice of the witan.

England was now wholly Christianized, and every village had its church. Yet, as on the Continent, the PRO-PRIETARY CHURCH was ubiquitous. Parish and field churches as well as domestic chapels were almost all the property of an individual, lay or cleric, or of a monastery, and in the towns they were often owned by a group of burgesses. Everywhere the priest was appointed by the owner. The dioceses, uneven in size and ill-defined, were usually large, preventing bishops from regular contact with their clergy and faithful. While the decadence of the Church remains a debated question, England in the middle decades of the 11th century was certainly an educational and disciplinary (though not an artistic) backwater.

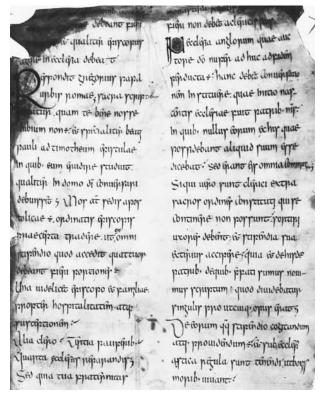

1066 to 1216. The Norman Conquest marked an epoch, not least because it coincided with a great crisis in the history of the Western Church. Its immediate result was to give England, in William the Conqueror and in his archbishop, LANFRANC, two able and energetic men of wide outlook, bent on order and reform. A long-term result was the integration of England into the cultural and religious community of Europe, sharing in and eventually adding to the spiritual and institutional developments of the age. Within 20 years of the Conquest almost all the bishops and abbots were Normans, as were many monks and leading clerks. A great wave of building activity began and cathedrals, abbeys, and parish churches were renewed on a grand scale. After a few decades the new or rejuvenated orders-Austin canons, CISTERCIANS, PREMONSTRATENSIANS, and the native GILBERTINESwere ubiquitous. The number of religious houses, 60 in 1066, had risen to some 600 by 1166. Councils and synods were held, cathedral schools came into existence, the study and observance of Canon Law became common, and canonical episcopal election was recognized as a norm. The Church in England was enriched by men from the Continent, such as the Italians Lanfranc, ANSELM, Faricius of Abingdon (d. 1117), and Vacarius, as well as the French THEOBALD OF CANTERBURY and William of Rievaulx. Those of Norman blood included Gilbert FOLI-OT and Thomas BECKET. England returned the obligation with Pope ADRIAN IV (Breakspear), STEPHEN HARDING, JOHN OF SALISBURY, and many others. Lanfranc, above all others, proved himself a great archbishop by establishing metropolitan rights over Wales and attaining similar, although temporary, successes in Ireland and Scotland. Ecclesiastical history, biography, and spiritual writing flourished with EADMER, ORDERICUS VITALIS, WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, and AELRED of Rievaulx; after an interval, sculpture and illumination flourished also.

The wise rule of WILLIAM I changed to a rough autocracy under WILLIAM II, and Anselm was twice constrained to become an exile before a compromise was arranged with Henry I as to the royal appointment of bishops. Tensions existed for the rest of the century between the king endeavoring to retain or reassert the rights exercised by his predecessors and the bishops insisting upon adherence to the new discipline and Canon Law of the GREGORIAN REFORM. Tension flared into conflict when HENRY II, after the eclipse of royal power under King Stephen, attempted to reassert royal control over the Church and over criminal justice in regard to clerks. Archbishop Thomas Becket, after repeated clashes and a long exile in France, was murdered in his cathedral on his return in 1170.

Among the most important social consequences of the Norman Conquest was the feudalization of the Church, which gave bishops and greater abbots liability for feudal dues and military service, while also making them members of the king's council, the body that developed into the Parliament that would become a national institution during the reign of Henry III. Feudalization and the great wealth accumulated by the Church tended to both secularize the prelates concerned and give bishops the double allegiance and the separation from pastoral care that would help cause the spiritual malaise of later centuries.

A page from a late 8th-century manuscript of Bede's "Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum." The text (from Bk. 2, ch. 1) deals with Augustine's request for a mission to Christianize England.

The reign of JOHN (1199–1216) was a time of tribulation for the Church. A disputed Canterbury election, in which a royal nominee figured, led to an appeal to Rome, the appointment of STEPHEN LANGTON by INNOCENT III, and a refusal by John to accept this outcome. There followed excommunication for the king and an interdict for the country. Even if the miseries of this episode have been exaggerated, it led to the dispersal of some monks, the exile of bishops, and the impoverishment of religious houses at the hands of the king. John's unexpected death brought relaxation, and Pandulf and other papal legates were a harmonizing and reforming influence during the decades that followed.

The Church's Golden Age: 1216–1350. The 13th century was indeed the golden age of the medieval Church in England. Its freedom was guaranteed by the MAGNA CARTA and respected by the pious Henry III, while its discipline was regulated by the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL. Free election gave it a hierarchy that for almost a century maintained a high level of enlightened administration. Three bishops—Richard of Chichester, EDMUND OF ABINGDON, and THOMAS OF CANTELUPE—attained canonization; ROBERT KILWARDBY, OP; JOHN PECKHAM, OFM; and ROBERT WINCHELSEA, all of Canterbury, were distinguished theologians; and the bench of bishops of which ROBERT GROSSETESTE of Lincoln was the acknowledged leader was perhaps the most illustrious of the English medieval Church.

England, with the rest of Europe, experienced the coming of the friars in the 3d decade of the century. Minors (FRANCISCANS) and Preachers (DOMINICANS) arrived almost simultaneously, settling in London, Oxford, and in all the major towns. Welcomed into their respective communities, they preached and heard confessions, bringing to the middle and lower orders an example of fervor and expert advice. The CARMELITES and Austin Friars (AUGUSTINIANS) followed soon after; by 1300 there were nearly 200 friaries with 5,000 inmates, and in a dozen towns all four orders had houses. At Oxford, as at Paris, the friars came to learn and to serve and remained to teach. As at Paris, leading masters such as ADAM MARSH and ROGER BACON joined their ranks; the fame of Oxford, which soon rivaled that of Paris, rested principally upon them, particularly upon the Minors. Britain gave its full share of masters to Europe: ALEXAN-DER OF HALES, Robert Grosseteste, Roger Bacon, Kilwardby, Peckham, DUNS SCOTUS, WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, and THOMAS BRADWARDINE make up a series unsurpassed by any other nation.

The age had its difficulties. Papal PROVISION to benefices, the appointment of absentee, foreign, or pluralist incumbents, and papal taxation were resented and opposed in England more strongly than elsewhere. The fervor of the monks and canons declined under the influence of wealth and the competition of the friars, but c. 1300 the number of religious of all kinds reached a peak (17,000) that was never again to be attained. Almost all the great abbeys and cathedrals were again reconstructed in part. SALISBURY, built on a virgin site in a single impulse, and WESTMINSTER ABBEY, rebuilt and decorated in the French style, are typical monuments of the purest Gothic.

The rhythm of prosperity slackened in the early 14th century under the influence of economic recession, war, and, in 1348, the Black Death, followed by further visits of pestilence. Clashes between Parliament and Church over papal taxation and provision were sparked by the statutes of PROVISORS (1351) and PRAEMUNIRE (1353), the latter in origin simply a deterrent to clerical appeals to Rome. Earlier still the Statute of MORTMAIN had controlled the engrossing of feudal land by monasteries. In the matter of elections, a compromise was reached by which the canonical body elected a royal nominee, who was then approved and provided by the pope.

1350 to 1485. The 14th century saw the rise of vernacular literature and lay piety. English mystical writers Richard ROLLE (d. 1349), the unknown author of The Cloud of Unknowing (c. 1375), Walter HILTON (d. 1396), JULIAN OF NORWICH (1342-1416?), and their contemporary, William Langland, to whom PIERS PLOWMAN is attributed, all stressed in their different but wholly orthodox ways an individual and uninstitutional spirituality. The same epoch saw a direct attack upon the organized Church, its riches and its claims to special powers and rights. The spokesman of this party was John WYCLIF, a master of Oxford, who, opening with an academic debate on the right of the Church to wealth, went on to attack sacramental and sacerdotal religion and to advocate vernacular preaching and Bible reading. His denial of TRAN-SUBSTANTIATION and his other heterodox opinions were condemned, though Wyclif himself died unmolested. Externally, the English Church, with its clergy reduced by pestilence, suffered with the rest of Europe the trials of the WESTERN SCHISM which accentuated the insularity already caused by the French war. Among the centralized religious orders the links with European administration were permanently weakened, while many of the "alien priories" became denizen, and others were permanently confiscated and their estates transferred to other orders or royal colleges. No new monasteries were founded save a small but fervent group of CARTHUSIAN priories, but colleges of priests and large chantries became popular forms of pious benefaction, as were educational colleges at Oxford and Cambridge. William of WYKEHAM's double foundation at Winchester and New College were notable examples of the trend. In the early 15th century English prelates played a considerable part at the Councils of CONSTANCE and BASEL, but the clergy emerged from the epoch of CONCILIARISM conservative in its attitude toward the papacy. Henry V was characteristic of his country in his severe and orthodox piety, of which SHEEN CHARTERHOUSE and the Bridgettine SYON gave evidence. The century that opened with his reign was perhaps the least distinguished in the history of the English Church. It was as unaffected by the brilliance and paganism of the Italian Renaissance as it was untroubled by the birth pangs of revolution. The DEVOTIO MODERNA of Flanders had no counterpart in England. The administration of the Church was conducted efficiently but mechanically by a group of functionaries in each diocese, who could, when needed, perform all duties for an absentee bishop. Formalism was more ubiquitous than moral laxity or official neglect. The brooding anticlericalism and religious indifference were due to resentment that the higher clergy existed only to judge, to amerce, and to tax. Royal munificence continued to fund great architecture as at Windsor and at King's College, Cambridge, while rich merchants showed their devotion in the churches of Somerset, Gloucestershire, and Suffolk.

Danes invading East Anglia in St. Edmund's reign, illumination in an 11th-century manuscript of 'Life of Saint Edmund,'' written and illuminated probably at the abbey of Bury-St.-Edmunds.

Bibliography: D. WILKINS, Concilia Magnae Britanniae et Hiberniae, 4 v. (London 1737, new ed.). A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78). F. M. POW-ICKE and E. B. FRYDE, eds., Handbook of British Chronology (2d ed. London 1961). M. DEANESLY, The Pre-Conquest Church in England (New York 1961—). Victoria History of the Counties of England (London 1900—). BEDE, Ecclesiastical History, ed. C. PLUMMER, 2 v. (Oxford 1896). A. H. THOMPSON, ed., Bede, His Life, Times, and Writings (Oxford 1935). S. J. CRAWFORD, Anglo-Saxon Influence on Western Christendom, 600–800 (London 1933). W. LEVISON, England and the Continent in the 8th Century (Oxford 1946). MOE, F. BARLOW, The English Church 1000–1066: A Constitutional History (Hamden, CT 1963). Z. N. BROOKE, The English Church and the Papacy from the Conquest to the Reign of John (Cambridge, Eng. 1931). J. R. H. MOORMAN, Church Life in England in the 13th Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1945). W. A. PANTIN, The English Church in the 14th Century (Cambridge, Eng. 1955). É. PER-ROY, L'Angleterre et le grand schisme d'Occident (Paris 1934). G. R. OWST, Preaching in Medieval England (Cambridge, Eng. 1926). A. H. THOMPSON, The English Clergy and Their Organization in the Later Middle Ages (Oxford 1947).

Edward I of England in council with his bishops, illuminated page from a 14th-century manuscript.

[M. D. KNOWLES]

The Early Tudors: 1485 to 1558. The establishment of the Tudor dynasty under its first ruler, Henry VII (1485–1509), introduced a period of strong government and increasing peace and prosperity. This situation was rudely disturbed by the revolt of the king's son, HENRY VIII (1509-47), against the authority of the Catholic Church. During his early years of rule, Henry entrusted the affairs of the Church in England to the hands of Thomas WOLSEY, Lord Chancellor, archbishop of York, and papal legate. The failure of CATHERINE OF ARAGON to present Henry with a male heir and his increasing infatuation with Anne Boleyn led Henry to seek an annulment of his marriage on the grounds that the dispensation that had permitted him to marry his brother's widow had been obtained on false pretenses. Henry's inability to prove his case before a legatine court at Blackfriars, London, presided over by Wolsey and the Roman cardinal, CAMPEG-GIO, in 1529, brought on the fall of Wolsey and a successful attempt to subject the Church in England to the king's will.

In 1531, under the threat of PRAEMUNIRE, the bishops recognized the king as "Supreme Head of the Church in England," with the qualifying clause—"insofar as the law of Christ allows"—soon disregarded. In 1532 the clergy virtually abdicated their authority by their submission to the king's demand for a radical revision of Canon Law. On the death of Abp. Warham of Canterbury in this same year, Henry secured the appointment of Thomas CRANMER, already a convinced Protestant, as his successor. Even before Cranmer, at the king's behest, declared the marriage to Catherine null and void, Henry married Anne Boleyn, who in September 1533 gave birth to a daughter, the future Queen ELIZABETH I.

The Statute in Restraint of Appeals of 1532 prevented any appeal to Rome against the judgment of the archbishop's court. Other statutes established the royal supremacy, secured the succession of Elizabeth, and made it treason to deprive the king of any of his titles or dignities. Between the years 1534-45 all who refused to take an oath to accept the supremacy were destroyed, among them Thomas MORE, who had succeeded Wolsey as chancellor; John FISHER, the saintly bishop of Rochester; and a group of Carthusians and Observant friars. In 1535 Henry began to exploit his ecclesiastical authority by a general visitation and valuation of the Church, which soon led to the suppression of the lesser monasteries. The king's agent and vicar-general in the business was Thomas CROMWELL, who had for some time been managing Parliament in Henry's interest.

Henry's treatment of the Church and the fear of worse to come sparked the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE (1536–37), a rising in the northern counties led by the lawyer, Robert ASKE. The Pilgrimage was at once a protest against the king's marriage, the heretic bishops, the threat to the monasteries, and the repudiation of papal authority. Deceived by royal promises, the rebels dispersed, and Henry took a terrible vengeance. By 1540 every religious house in the country had been suppressed and taken into the king's hands.

Up to this point, apart from rejecting papal authority, Henry had made few innovations in doctrine. Lutheran ideas entered the country with TYNDALE's translation of the New Testament (1526) and COVERDALE's English Bible (1535). The Ten Articles of Religion published in 1536 introduced the Protestant doctrine of justification by faith only, but an official statement of doctrine appearing in 1543, the "Necessary Erudition of a Christian Man," commonly known as the "King's Book," was generally orthodox in tone. Until his death in January 1547, Henry kept strict control over belief in England. The situation was to change dramatically under his son and successor.

The Protestant Edward VI (1547-53) was a child of nine at his succession. Archbishop Cranmer was for the first time free to introduce principles of reform that had long been maturing in his mind. A new ritual, the Order of Communion, appeared in 1548. In January 1549 the Act of Uniformity imposed on the country a new form of worship in the first BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, which preserved the form of the Mass in English, but from which all expressions had been removed that suggested the idea of sacrifice. The attempt to impose this prayer book led to a revolt in the western counties that was ruthlessly suppressed by the government. The first Book of Common Prayer was something of a compromise. In 1552 Cranmer produced a more radical edition in which all traces of belief in the sacrifice of the Mass and also of the Real Presence in the Eucharist were absent. An official statement of the new religion, the 42 Articles, appeared in 1553 and was approved by the young king shortly before his death.

The short reign of Edward's sister MARY TUDOR (1553-58) saw a temporary restoration of the Catholic faith and a sharp persecution of the Protestants. One of Mary's first acts was to repeal the religious legislation of the previous reign, but she alienated the sympathy of her people by her marriage to PHILIP II of Spain. Only when the marriage had taken place was Cardinal Reginald POLE, the papal legate, allowed to enter the country and, after receiving the solemn submission of Parliament, to reconcile the nation to the Catholic Church. Mary honorably, but unwisely, attempted to make some restoration to the Church and thereby further antagonized the holders of monastic lands. Finally, in January 1555, the heresy laws were revived, and in the course of the next three years nearly 300 persons, among them Archbishop Cranmer and four other bishops, were burned at the stake as heretics. Many of the leading Protestants had already fled the country and taken refuge in the Protestant cities of Geneva, Frankfurt, Zurich, and Strasbourg, to prepare for the inevitable reaction in England under Mary's successor.

The Reign of Elizabeth: 1558 to 1603. On Nov. 17, 1558, Mary Tudor was succeeded by her half sister, Elizabeth, daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. Elizabeth's true religious convictions are a mystery, but from the first she saw clearly that her advantage lay with the party of reform, now reinforced by the returning exiles. A new religious settlement was inevitable, and it was effected in the first Parliament of the reign, which met in January 1559. By the Act of UNIFORMITY, passed in spite of the protests of the bishops and of the CONVOCATION of the clergy, the second Prayer Book of Edward VI was restored with some slight modifications as the official form of public worship. By the Act of Supremacy, Elizabeth as "Supreme Governor" recovered control of the Church.

Obverse of the great seal of Edward III of England.

Bishops who refused to take the oath of supremacy were deprived of their sees and jailed. Those of the clergy who refused to accept the Prayer Book were punished by fines and imprisonment. The laity were commanded under penalty of a fine of 12 pence to attend the Protestant service in their parish churches each Sunday. In 1563 these penalties were increased; a second refusal of the oath was made treason, punishable by death. Royal commissioners toured the country to receive the submission of the clergy. Those who refused to submit were deprived; others went into hiding or exile; but the majority conformed, at least externally, and with this submission the government was for a time satisfied. The general religious situation in the country in the next few years is obscure; many Catholics, particularly in the north, continued to practice their faith in secret, and there was little overt persecution. After 1568 the situation changed rapidly due to two series of events.

The Ninth Booke containing the Actes and thinges done in the Reigne of King Edward the fixt.

Anti-Catholic activity during the reign of Edward VI, woodcut from the 1610 edition of Foxe's "Acts and Monuments of the Christian Martyrs."

The first was the Northern Rising, an attempt to secure the eventual succession to the English throne of the Catholic MARY STUART, queen of Scots. Led by the Catholic earls of Westmorland and Northumberland, the rising was a disastrous failure and provoked the first executions. In the following year PIUS V was persuaded to support the resistance by issuing the bull, Regnans in excelsis, in which he excommunicated Elizabeth as a heretic and supporter of heretics and released her subjects from their allegiance. The effect of the bull was to sharpen the penal laws.

The second event was the arrival in the country in 1574 of the first missionary priests from the English College founded in 1568 at DOUAI by William ALLEN, formerly principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, and a group of English Catholic exiles. The remarkable success of these missionary priests, who from 1580 were supported by a small group of Jesuits led by Edmund CAMPION, alarmed the government. An act of 1581 made it treason to reconcile any of the queen's subjects "from the religion now by Her Highness' authority established," and a further act of 1585 commanded all Jesuits and seminary priests to depart the realm within 40 days under penalty of death.

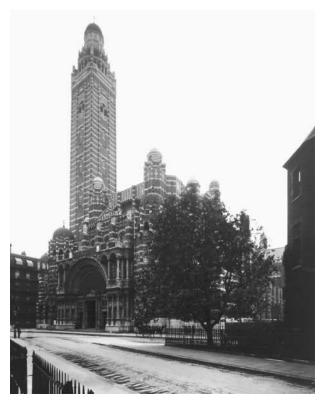

But nothing could arrest the movement of Catholic revival. Before the end of the reign new seminaries for English students were founded at Rome, Lisbon, Madrid, Seville, and Valladolid. In the course of these years, 189 persons were put to death for the faith in England, among them 111 secular priests and 62 lay men and women. The persecution was further sharpened by the threat of the Spanish Armada in 1588. The toll of the martyrs is the measure of the strength of Catholic resistance to the Protestant government at the end of the century (see ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF).

The position of English Catholics was weakened in the last years of Elizabeth's reign by serious divisions within the ranks of the clergy. After the death of Thomas Goldwell, the last of the deposed Catholic bishops, in 1585 and of Cardinal Allen in 1594, Catholics were left without a leader. In 1598 the cardinal protector, Tommaso Gaetani, appointed George Blackwell archpriest with full authority over all the clergy in England and with instructions to seek the advice and help of the Jesuit superior in England. A group of the clergy appealed this ruling, asking for the appointment of a bishop. A further appeal in 1601 by a group of 33 priests, later known as the Appellants, was followed by a third appeal, led by Thomas Bluet, this time with the approval of the government which sought to profit from the rift between the parties among the clergy. Bluet undertook to secure the recall of the Jesuits from the English mission. Pope Clement VIII, while condemning the association of Bluet and his supporters with the English crown, limited the authority of the archpriest and released him from the obligation of consulting the Jesuits (see ARCHPRIEST CONTROVERSY). But the damage was done. Elizabeth ordered all the Jesuits to leave the country and offered a veiled promise of toleration to those of the secular clergy who would, before the last day of January, acknowledge their allegiance to the queen. In spite of the papal prohibition of all dealings with the government, a group of 13 secular priests on the last appointed day made a formal declaration of their allegiance. While professing their undying loyalty to the pope as the successor of St. Peter, they declared their refusal to obey any papal command to take the part of the queen's enemies. With the death of Elizabeth in March 1603 the conflict was temporarily resolved, but the acute division between a party of secular clergy and religious, notably the Jesuits, was revived later in the century with disastrous consequences.

Henry Morse's appeal "To the Catholickes of England," Oct. 6, 1636.

Westminster Cathedral, c. 1895, London. (©Hulton/Archive Photos)

Under Stuart Kings: 1603 to 1688. Elizabeth was succeeded by JAMES I (1603–25), the son of Mary Queen of Scots. James, a Protestant, began his reign with a promise of toleration that was soon forgotten. As a result of the Gunpowder Plot (1605), the penal laws were revived, and an oath of allegiance that declared the pope's deposing power to be ''impious and heretical,'' was demanded of all Catholics. The question of the legality of the oath was to be a further cause of division in the Catholic body.

Later in James's reign negotiations for the marriage of the king's son, Charles, to a Catholic princess, first the Infanta Maria of Spain, and then Henrietta Maria of France, whom he married, led to a measure of toleration in practice and the hope of further relief. In these years, too, episcopal government was briefly restored to England. In 1623 William Bishop (1544–1624) was consecrated titular bishop of Chalcedon to serve the Catholics in England. He was succeeded by Richard Smith (1566–1655), who soon became involved in a controversy with the regular clergy and in 1631 retired to France and resigned his charge. For the next 50 years English Catholics were left without a bishop.

The early years of Charles I (1625–49) were a time of relative peace. He became deeply attached to his wife, Henrietta Maria, who, by the terms of the marriage treaty, was able to retain a large establishment of priests and chaplains. A movement of conversion developed in the court. Chapels of the Catholic ambassadors in London were well attended, schools and religious houses founded by exiles on the Continent flourished, and the penal laws, by the king's favor, were largely held in abeyance. From 1634 to 1641 a series of Roman agents, ostensibly accredited to the queen, resided in London, and Charles kept up an active correspondence with the court of Rome. There was even talk of reunion, but this possibility was shattered by the outbreak of civil war in 1642, in which the Catholic lords and gentry were royalist almost to a man. After the defeat of the king and his execution in January 1649, the monarchy was abolished and government was assumed first by a Council of State and then by Oliver CROMWELL as lord protector (1653-58). Catholics who had supported the king lost their property, but though the penal laws were revived, only two priests were put to death. Cromwell, in spite of his savage repressions in Ireland, extended a large measure of practical toleration to English Catholics.

The return of the monarchy with CHARLES II (1660-85) brought fresh hopes. Married to a Catholic wife and grateful to the Catholics who had saved his life and helped him to escape to France after the battle of Worcester during the civil war, Charles was prepared to give them support and comfort short of risking his throne. In 1670 he made the secret Treaty of Dover. By the terms of this agreement Charles promised, in return for financial help from Louis XIV of France, to declare himself a Catholic when a suitable opportunity offered. The conversion of his brother James, duke of York, under the influence of the example of his first wife, Anne Hyde (1637–71), herself a convert, alarmed the country, and in 1673 Parliament passed the Test Act, which excluded from office all who refused to take Communion in the Established Church and to deny the doctrine of transubstantiation. A later act of 1678 excluded Catholics from sitting in Parliament. But the great crisis of the reign was the Popish Plot (see OATES PLOT) of 1678. Titus Oates, an apostate convert of questionable reputation, revealed an alleged plot of the Jesuits to murder Charles and enthrone the Catholic James. The plot, as Charles well knew, was a fiction, but he made no attempt to protect the accused. Several laymen and priests, including Oliver PLUNKET, archbishop of Armagh, were executed.

On his deathbed, Charles, at the suggestion of his brother, sent for John Huddleston, a Benedictine who had helped save his life after Worcester. The priest heard the dying king's confession, reconciled him to the Church, and administered the last sacraments. With the accession of his brother JAMES II (1685–88), Protestant England had a Catholic king. It was to prove a disastrous experiment.

The metropolitan cathedral of Christ the King, Liverpool, England, Frederick Gibberd, architect.

James was determined from the outset to secure some measure of toleration, not only for persecuted Catholics, but also for Quakers and Protestant dissenters. Unfortunately, after the first months of his reign, he acted with the greatest imprudence. Catholics were appointed to the Privy Council and given commissions in the army and navy, the king using his dispensing power to protect them from the penalties of the law. At Oxford the master of University College was allowed to continue in office after becoming a Catholic, and at Magdalen College a Catholic president was forced on the unwilling fellows. Tensions flared in 1688 when the Anglican bishops refused to publish the king's "Declaration of Indulgence" granting full civic rights to dissenters. The archbishop of Canterbury and six other bishops were promptly imprisoned in the Tower of London. The birth of James's son at this time aroused fears of a Catholic succession, and the sequel was the REVOLUTION OF 1688 (known as the Glorious Revolution), the flight of the king, and the succession of the Protestant William of Orange (1688–1702), husband of James's daughter Mary.

Not everything gained during James's three-year rule was lost. In 1685 John Leyburn (1620–1702), a former president of Douai College, was made vicar apostolic for England and took up residence in London. Leyburn proved to be an active and able bishop. Three years later, three more vicars apostolic were appointed to the Midland, Western, and London districts. In spite of the vicissitudes of the years immediately following, this form of episcopal government was successfully maintained until the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850.

A Century of Decline: 1688 to 1781. The Protestant Revolution of 1688 was the prelude to the darkest chapter in the history of post-Reformation Catholicism in England. New penal laws prohibited Catholics from bearing arms or possessing a horse above the value of £5, from voting in Parliamentary elections, from practicing as solicitors or barristers, and from inheriting land. A reward of £100 was offered to any informer who secured the conviction of a priest, while an Act of Succession excluded from the throne the many Catholic descendants of Charles II and James II. The effect of this legislation was to exclude the Catholic gentry and middle classes from the professions and from public life. Many, perforce, devoted themselves to the care of their family estates, and with the good will of their Protestant neighbors profited accordingly. Catholics, as a whole, maintained their allegiance to the exiled James II and his sons and successors and played some part in the risings of 1715 and 1745 that attempted the restoration of the Stuart line.

ENGLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The 18th century saw a sharp decline in Catholic numbers. At the beginning of the period they probably numbered five percent of the population of 6 or 7 million. By 1780 their numbers had decreased to 69,316, served by some 300 priests. The largest concentration was in London, where, in 1742, CHALLONER estimated the Catholic population as 25,000. After London, the greatest numbers were in the north, especially Lancashire. This decline was in large measure due to the extinction or apostasy of many of the old Catholic families who, since the 16th century, had been the chief support of the clergy and who had made possible the continuance of Catholic worship.

The vicars apostolic were imprisoned in 1688 but were soon released. Bishop Philip ELLIS of the Western district then left the country and ended his days as bishop of Segni in Italy. Bishop Bonaventure GIFFORD of the London district was subsequently imprisoned on three separate occasions and lived in constant fear of arrest. Still, with difficulty, the succession was maintained. Although the vicars apostolic of the 18th century were notable for their longevity rather than their accomplishments, there were a few exceptions, among them Richard Challoner, who was in every way distinguished.

Challoner was ordained at Douai (1716) and, after spending some years teaching philosophy and theology, was sent to the London mission in 1730. Here he spent the next 50 years, first as a simple priest, later as coadjutor to Bp. Benjamin PETRE, and from 1758 as vicar apostolic of the London district. His long life was disturbed by two mild outbreaks of persecution: the first in 1745 when Prince Charles Edward, the Stuart Pretender, marched his forces from Scotland as far south as Derby, thus threatening a Catholic restoration; the second in 1767 when John Payne, a Protestant informer, denounced John Baptist Maloney, a priest, who was sentenced to life imprisonment. Challoner was also indicted but the charge failed; the mood of the day no longer favored persecution. Besides his extensive spiritual writings, which did much to mold the piety that would prevail in England for several centuries, Challoner founded two schools for boys, at Standon Lordship in Essex (1749) and at Sedgeley Park, near Wolverhampton (1762). A third school, for girls, was opened at Brook Green.

Relief for persecuted English Catholics came from an unexpected quarter. The revolt of the American colonies obliged the government to seek recruits for the army among Catholic clansmen of the Scottish Highlands and to offer in return a measure of toleration. The crown approached Bishop Challoner as representative of the English Catholics. When Challoner hesitated, the government turned to a committee of laymen, who took over negotiations. It was suggested that in return for the repeal of the penal laws enacted under William III, English Catholics should take an oath of allegiance to the sovereign. Upon Challoner's approval, a petition on these lines was drawn up by Edmund BURKE, and in 1778 a bill for a limited measure of toleration passed both houses of Parliament without difficulty. Passage of this first Relief Act showed the laity what they could do without the bishops, and the lesson was not lost. The act also led to a furious outburst of Protestant bigotry in London when wild rumors of plots against the liberties of Protestant Englishmen circulated in the capital. A Protestant alliance was formed to secure the repeal of the Act. In 1780, under the leadership of Lord George Gordon, an unbalanced nobleman who was also a religious fanatic, a large mob marched on Parliament to present a petition for repeal. A riot followed in which Catholic chapels in the city, including those of the Sardinian and Bavarian embassies, were looted and burned. The rioting spread beyond London. In Bath the house of the vicar apostolic of the Western district, Bishop Walmsley, was destroyed, together with all the archives of the district (see GORDON RIOTS). Challoner remained outside London until his death the following January at the age of 90.

Emancipation and Revival: 1781 to 1850. The closing years of the 18th century witnessed a remarkable transformation in the situation of Catholics. The lay committee, largely inspired by its able secretary, Charles BUTLER, and somewhat Gallican in its outlook, continued to seek relief from the penal laws. In 1789 a new bill incorporating an oath rejecting the papal deposing power was drafted. The terms of the oath led to some acute controversies with the vicars apostolic, but in 1791 a new Relief Act authorized the celebration of Mass in registered chapels by priests who had subscribed to the oath.

The outbreak of the French Revolution in 1789 led to the arrival in England of more than 5,500 French clergy; as further evidence of the a new attitude, the English government established a fund for their maintenance. The suppression by France's revolutionary government of English colleges and religious houses on the Continent led to the return of religious orders and seminaries. Students from Douai relocated to Old Hall, Ware, in Hertfordshire, and Ushaw College in County Durham. The Jesuits settled at Stonyhurst in Lancashire, and the Benedictines at Ampleforth and Downside.

An attempt by Prime Minister William Pitt to introduce a bill for Catholic emancipation in 1801 was frustrated by King George III's opposition, but from this year onward, projects for the complete abolition of the penal laws became an almost annual Parliamentary event. Meanwhile Catholics were growing in numbers and influence. By 1811 they numbered some 250,000, a remarkable increase due in part to steady Irish immigration. Between 1791 and 1816 more than 900 chapels were opened. A few Catholics began to attend the universities, and at Cambridge and elsewhere there were a few notable conversions. In 1817 commissions in the army and navy were opened to Catholics. In 1819 John LINGARD published the first three volumes of his History of England; this marked the turning of the tide. In 1829, in large measure because of the exertions of Irish Catholic leader Daniel O'CONNELL, an Act of Emancipation was passed restoring to Catholics full rights as citizens, including eligibility for government office and the right to sit in Parliament. Catholic worship and religious activities, however, were prohibited in public. Although religious orders were declared illegal, this clause was never enforced.

An increase in the Catholic population led to an increase in the number of bishops. In 1840 the number of vicariates was raised from four to eight. Even before this date, agitation had begun for the restoration of a diocesan hierarchy and a return to normal episcopal government. In 1835 Nicholas WISEMAN, a former pupil of the newly restored English College in Rome and a brilliant scholar, visited England and delivered a course of sermons for non-Catholics in the chapel of the Sardinian embassy in London. Wiseman soon became the acknowledged leader and spokesman of English Catholics. In 1836 he founded the Dublin Review as the organ of English Catholic opinion.

In the following years two devoted Italian missionary priests made a considerable impact on the people of England, Catholic and non-Catholic alike: Luigi Gentili (1801–48), of the Institute of Charity, who was established at Grace-Dieu, and Bl. Dominic BARBERI, a Passionist. Both preached with astonishing success and made many converts, although their introduction of a number of pious Italian practices was less favorably regarded by the older clergy and laity. Augustus Welby PUGIN, a convert, revived the Gothic style of architecture and designed the cathedral church of Southwark.

In 1845 Barberi received into the Church the leader of the OXFORD MOVEMENT, John Henry NEWMAN. Newman and his friends had for some years been engaged in an attempt to find a via media between Catholicism and ANGLICANISM. The condemnation of the famous Tract 90 foreshadowed Newman's conversion. He was preceded into the Church by William George WARD, author of The Ideal of a Christian Church (1844), a work that held up the Catholic Church as the model of what a church should be. For these opinions Ward was deprived of his degrees by Oxford University. Although a layman, he later taught theology at St. Edmund's, Ware. Newman and Ward were followed into the Church by a large group of Anglican clergy and laity.

In the late 1840s, there came from Ireland, as a result of the potato famine, a tremendous influx of destitute Irish. This immigration swelled enormously the numbers of Catholics in the country; according to the 1851 census England's Catholic population of 679,000 was served by less than 800 priests. The time was ripe for further ecclesiastical reorganization, and in 1850 a diocesan hierarchy was restored. The Holy See created 12 dioceses, with Westminster as the metropolitan see. Wiseman, vicar apostolic of the London district since 1849, became the first cardinal archbishop of Westminster.

Wiseman's pastoral letter from Rome announcing the restoration of the hierarchy was couched in somewhat imprudent terms and roused a flood of protest led by Prime Minister Lord John Russell. Throughout the country effigies of the pope and the cardinal were burned by mobs. In the midst of this no-popery agitation, Wiseman returned to London and issued an "Appeal to the British People," which was published in all the leading newspapers. In it he explained the nature of the new hierarchy's authority and the limitations of his own jurisdiction as archbishop of Westminster; he emphasized the poverty, indeed destitution, of a high percentage of the Catholics of his own diocese. The religious agitation soon subsided, and although Parliament passed an Ecclesiastical Titles Act that imposed a fine of £100 on any person assuming a title to a pretended see in the country, the law was never enforced.

The Modern Church. The new hierarchy met in a synod (1852) at Oscott, where Newman preached his famous sermon on the "Second Spring," but the sanguine hopes of the rapid conversion of England did not materialize. As a result of the Gorham judgment, Archdeacon Henry MANNING and other Anglicans entered the Church (1851), but the stream of conversions was declining. Wiseman, under an increasing strain because of ill health, fell under the influence of Manning, who was ordained a few weeks after reception into the Church and who became in 1865 the second archbishop of Westminster. As archbishop and, from 1875, as cardinal, Manning provided distinguished leadership in primary education and in social work, particularly on the occasion of the great London dock strike (1889). But the hierarchy showed little interest in higher education. Newman's plan to found a Catholic college at Oxford encountered bitter opposition, and Manning's experiment with a Catholic university in Kensington was a failure. Manning showed little understanding of Lord John ACTON or other liberal Catholics, or of Newman. After spending four years in Ireland in connection with the proposed University of Dublin, Newman retired to the Oratory he had established at Birmingham in 1848, and died in 1889.

At VATICAN COUNCIL I (1869–70) Manning was a spokesman for extreme ULTRAMONTANISM. This synod occasioned a mild outbreak of antipapal feeling in England. Bigotry, however, was slowly dying. While religious practice in the country began a long, steady decline, the Catholic body grew in numbers and prospered.

Herbert VAUGHAN, who would succeed Manning at Westminster (1893–1902), founded the first English foreign missionary society, the MILL HILL MISSIONARIES, whose members worked among the African-American population in the United States. Shortly after his appointment to Westminster, Vaughan obtained permission from Rome for Catholics to attend the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, which had abolished all religious tests many years earlier. Vaughan became a cardinal in 1893, and in 1895 he began the construction of Westminster Cathedral. The other outstanding events of his episcopate were the examination of Anglican orders, which were condemned by Leo XIII in APOSTOLICAE CURAE (1896), and the cardinal's vigorous defense of denominational schools, which Nonconformists in Parliament wanted to deprive of public financial support.

Vaughan's successor at Westminster was Francis BOURNE, bishop of Southwark from 1897, an excellent diocesan bishop and a builder of schools and churches. In alliance with the Anglicans he defeated an education bill hostile to Catholic schools, which were then increasing rapidly in number. Bourne's long episcopate (1903-35) was disturbed by MODERNISM, which in England was associated with the names of George TYRRELL and Baron Friedrich Von HÜGEL; and later by World War I. During these decades there was a notable increase in Catholics and a reorganization of dioceses. In 1878 the See of Beverley was divided to form the Dioceses of Leeds and Middlesbrough. Portsmouth became a diocese in 1892, and Menevia in 1898. Liverpool and Birmingham were raised to metropolitan status in 1911. In 1916 the Diocese of Newport became the Archdiocese of Cardiff with Menevia as its sole suffragan. Brentwood was created a diocese in 1917, and Lancaster in 1924. The one archdiocese and 12 suffragans of 1850 had thus grown to four metropolitan sees and 14 suffragans.

The number of converts to Catholicism increased steadily. Among the more distinguished during this period were Cyril MARTINDALE, SJ; Ronald KNOX, G. K. CHESTERTON, and Christopher Dawson, while the public champion of the Catholic cause was Hilaire BELLOC. On the initiative of Lord HALIFAX, a group of Anglicans explored the possibilities of reunion in a series of conversations with Catholic theologians at Malines, Belgium, under the presidency of Cardinal Mercier. English Catholics, in general, were not sympathetic, and no tangible results followed from these meetings (see MALINES CONVERSATIONS).

Arthur HINSLEY succeeded Bourne at Westminster (1935–43). English to the core and a warmhearted patriot, Hinsley (cardinal from 1937) made a profound impression on the English people, above all by his inspiring broadcast addresses in the early years of World War II. In 1940 he founded the SWORD OF THE SPIRIT, a movement to unite all English Christians in defense of Christian social principles. Early in his episcopate an apostolic delegation was established in London, whose first delegate was Abp. William GODFREY, later archbishop of Westminster (1956–63), succeeding Bernard GRIFFIN. The apostolic delegation performed valuable service in securing information about English prisoners of war. Hinsley's death in 1943 was widely mourned and almost the entire cabinet attended his funeral.

Following World War II there was a steady increase in Catholic ranks, due in part to a considerable influx of Polish and other refugees and to a very large immigration from Ireland. There was also a notable increase in churches and schools. Social legislation considerably improved the material lot of Catholics, most of whom belonged to the working class. Educational reforms and the expansion of the universities resulted in a remarkable increase in the number of Catholic university graduates. They became well represented in academic life and in all the professions.

The work of Vatican Council II aroused a keen awareness of the tragic divisions among Christians and a sincere desire for mutual understanding. Implementation of Vatican II reforms was, however, impeded in England by the resistance of the conservative Church hierarchy, led by Cardinal Godfrey. His successor, Carmel Heenan, was more amenable to the council's message of reconciliation, but, unable to embrace its deeper theological implications, he eventually became disillusioned. At the same time, greater freedom for Catholics in the educational and political realms was undermined by steadily increasing secularism in British society as well as a dramatic exodus of clerics and religious by the late 1980s. The total number of diocesan priests fell from 5,096 in 1966 to 4,457 in 1986 and continued to decline thereafter. Losses were greater in rural areas than in London, where the numbers changed very little. Shortages were felt most acutely in the field of education, as religious were replaced by lay teachers in Catholic schools throughout the country.

Into the Third Millennium. Interestingly, the 1990s sparked a flare-up of age-old questions among British Catholics. The question of whether a Catholic could remain a loyal subject to a divorced monarch-the question that had first surfaced as Henry VIII divorced Catherine of Aragon in the mid-16th century-was raised in 1996 upon the divorce of the heir to the throne, Prince Charles, and Princess Diana. In particular, the role of Queen Elizabeth, leader of the Anglican Church, in backing her son's divorce was called into question. Another issue rooted in Church history was the campaign to repeal the Settlement Act of 1701, which prevents Catholics from gaining the English throne or marrying a British monarch. Several supporters of the repeal within the Anglican Church noted that the role of monarch was political rather than theological, while those opposed noted that eliminating the monarch's position as leader of the Church of England would erode England's traditional claim of being a Christian nation.

Ecumenical efforts between the Anglican Church and the Catholic Church were highlighted in 2000 as leaders from both churches met in Toronto, Canada, in May to "review and evaluate the accomplishments of 30 years of ecumenical dialogue between the two traditions," in the words of Anglican archbishop of Canterbury, George Carey. The meeting occurred six months after Pope John Paul II opened the Holy Door of the Basilica of St. Paul in the presence of Anglican Archbishop Carey and a representative of the World Lutheran Federation. This gesture of peace among the world's Catholic and non-Catholic faiths was a historic moment, a millennial statement intended to bridge the theological gulf created in England five centuries before.

In 2000 England contained 2,495 parish churches, while an additional 1,000 private chapels held Mass at least once per week. There were 3,672 secular and 1,693 religious priests. Of England's approximately 1,950 Catholic schools, 75% educated primary-grade students; in addition, religion remained a required subject in all government-funded schools in both England and Wales. While in 1963 there had been 131,592 Church baptisms, that rate had dropped to 69,712 by 2000, reflecting a continued decline in affiliation with most faiths in England as a whole.

Bibliography: C. READ, ed., Bibliography of British History: Tudor Period, 1485–1603 (2d ed. New York 1959). G. DAVIS, ed., Bibliography of British History, Stuart Period, 1603–1714 (Oxford 1928). S. PARGELLIS and D. J. MEDLEY, eds., Bibliography of British History, 1714–89 (Oxford 1951). D. MATHEW, Catholicism in England (2d ed. New York 1950; 3d ed. London 1955). E. I. WATKIN, Roman Catholicism in England: From the Reformation to 1950 (New York 1957). M. D. R. LEYS, Catholics in England, 1559-1829: A Social History (London 1961). H. TOOTELL, Dodd's Church History of England, ed. M. A. TIERNEY, 5 v. (London 1839-43). Biographical Studies 1534-1829 (Bognor Regis, Eng. 1951-56), continued as Recusant History (1957-). G. R. ELTON, ed., The Tudor Constitution (Cambridge, Eng. 1960). P. HUGHES, Rome and the Counter-Reformation in England (London 1942). B. MAGEE, The English Recusants (London 1938). P. GUILDAY, The English Catholic Refugees on the Continent, 1558-1795 (New York 1914). M. J. HAVRAN, The Catholics in Caroline England (Stanford, CA 1962). G. ALBION, Charles I and the Court of Rome (London 1935). D. MATHEW, The Age of Charles I (London 1951). M. V. HAY, The Jesuits and the Popish Plot (London 1934). A. C. F. BEALES, Education under Penalty, 1547-1689 (London 1963). W. R. TRIMBLE, The Catholic Laity in Elizabethan England 1558-1603 (Cambridge, MA 1964). R. N. HADCOCK, Map of Monastic Britain (Chessington, Eng. 1950). B. HEMPHILL (pseud. for B. WHELAN), The Early Vicars Apostolic of England, 1685-1750 (London 1954). P. HUGHES, The Catholic Question, 1685-1829 (London 1929). B. N. WARD, Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England, 1781-1803, 2 v. (New York 1909); Eve of Catholic Emancipation, 3 v. (London 1911-12); The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation, 2 v. (New York 1915). G. MA-CHIN, The Catholic Question in English Politics, 1820-30 (New York 1964). D. GWYNN, Lord Shrewsbury, Pugin, and the Catholic Revival (London 1946). J. ALTHOLZ, The Liberal Catholic Movement in England: The Rambler and Its Contributors, 1848-1864 (London 1962). G. A. BECK, ed., The English Catholics 1850-1950 (London 1950). D. MCELRATH, The Syllabus of Pius IX: Some Reactions in England (Louvain 1964).

[G. CULKIN/EDS.]

ENGLISH LANGUAGE LITURGICAL CONSULTATION (ELLC)

Established in 1985, the English Language Liturgical Consultation (ELLC) is an international and ecumenical body concerned with English liturgical texts. It is successor to the INTERNATIONAL CONSULTATION ON EN-GLISH TEXTS (ICET) which had completed its work in 1975 with a revised edition of Prayers We Have in Common. ELLC has a charge going beyond common texts. The new committee was planned to represent, more formally than had ICET, the several existing bodies already established by joint action of the churches in various parts of the English–speaking world.

The first meeting of the ELLC was held in Boston in August 1985, in connection with the biennial congress of Societas Liturgica. The constitutive bodies which agreed to participate were: Australian Consultation on Liturgy (ACOL), CONSULTATION ON COMMON TEXTS (CCT) of North America, INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL), Joint Liturgical Commission on English in New Zealand, Joint Liturgical Group (JLG) of Great Britain.

The program of ELLC includes reviewing the ICET texts in the light of more than a decade's experience; producing one or more Eucharistic Prayers in common versions; evaluating ecumenical lectionaries, especially those based on the postconciliar Roman lectionary, including the Consultation on Common Texts' Revised Common Lectionary that use in North America, and the two-year lectionary of the Joint Liturgical Group; and the future possibility of producing biblical translations appropriate for liturgical proclamation.

In the case of common liturgical texts, extensive consultation with the parent churches was undertaken, with the possibility of adding to the limited corpus of ICET prayers. With regard to any revision of the latter, ELLC agreed that only changes that are certainly necessary should be recommended and that there should be sensitivity to inclusive language in relation to women; the proclamatory quality of texts to be said, heard, and sung; and the pastoral significance of the use of contemporary language. ELLC's revision of ICET's texts was published as Praying Together: English Language Liturgical Consultation in 1988.

Bibliography: Praying Together: English Language Liturgical Consultation (Nashville 1988). H. R. ALLEN, JR, "Common texts Revisited," Worship 60 (1986) 172–175. H. T. ALLEN, JR, "Common Lectionary : Origins, Assumptions, and Issues," Studia Liturgica 21 (1991) 14–30.

[F. R. MCMANUS/EDS.]

ENLIGHTENMENT

The Enlightenment was a movement arising from the philosophical systems of the 17th century. It appeared in England in theoretical writings on religion, ethics, and natural law; in France in the books of the Philosophes; and in the radical political changes of the American and French Revolutions a century later. Thus it was destined to reach the whole western world and pervade all modern thought, spreading from England and France to North America, and from Portugal and Spain to South America. Though Protestant countries were in general more receptive to the movement, still Catholic Portugal was the first to establish the power of the Enlightenment by means of public law. Her example was followed by the Bourbon states. In the countries of the Orthodox church the influence of the Enlightenment remained limited.

Nature and History. As an intellectual movement, it does not present a harmonious philosophical pattern. According to Kant ("Was ist Aufklärung?" Berlinische Monatsschrift, 1784), the Enlightenment is the emergence of a man from a state of dependence brought about through his own fault. This dependence is the inability to use one's intellect without guidance. The culpability does not lie in lack of intelligence, but in lack of decision and courage to use intelligence without reliance upon someone else. Sapere aude (take courage to use your brain) is, therefore, the motto of the Enlightenment.

This characteristic phrase throws light on the position that the Enlightenment assigns to man and to his most valued faculty, the intellect. The advice of the motto presupposes a strong trust in the power of intellect and an optimistic evolutionary faith, and calls for the liberation of man from controls interfering with his independence and his liberty. From these very general ideal premises follow deductions allowing for the most divergent systems and practices, so that a precise evaluation of the Enlightenment is impossible.

Philosophically speaking, the Enlightenment is a specific form of modern individualism and subjectivism. Its precursors are humanism, with its emphasis on what man can do with his own powers, its worship of the ancients, its secularism; and the enlarged view of the world resulting from the opening of new parts of the globe, the extension of commerce, world travel, knowledge of foreign cultures and religions; and the advance of the natural sciences.

The thought processes of the movement revolve around man (anthropocentrism). Observation of nature and man (psychology), analysis of natural law, mathematical thinking, experiment, and comparison: these are the means whereby it seeks to obtain knowledge. It is assumed that knowing must result in acting, since the Enlightenment holds that rational thought and moral act are closely connected. The bond with a positive or moral authority and respect for tradition are rejected. Hence, in spite of its insistence on historical research, the Enlightenment lacks a real instinct for history. The homage it pays to historical antecedents turns out to be mere historicism. The achievements of the past, notably of the Middle Ages, are met with skepticism and criticism.

The Enlightenment was ushered in by the Englishman Bacon of Verulam (see BACON, FRANCIS), and the Frenchman René DESCARTES. Bacon, founder of modern experimental philosophy, points the way to the new movement by his statement "knowledge is power" (tantum possumus quantum scimus), and by his new scientific ideal of an unprejudiced, methodical investigation of nature. Descartes starts his philosophy with methodical doubt, thereby laying the foundation of modern epistemology.

While the movement in England ran in the quiet channels of theoretical discussion, it became stormy in France as a result of political and social conditions. Materialistic and atheistic tendencies, skepticism, destructive criticism of political, social, and ecclesiastical institutions and conditions characterized the French phase of the Enlightenment, from which emerged men like BAYLE, MONTESQUIEU, Diderot, D'Alembert, VOLTAIRE, and ROUSSEAU. The movement finally precipitated the French revolution.

On the other hand, the Enlightenment ran a much quieter course in Germany, where its beginning and its end are marked by the two great thinkers LEIBNIZ and Kant. Leibniz, a man of universal vision, was convinced of the compatibility between the revealed Christian religion and the new insights of natural science. His doctrine of monads is essentially metaphysical, although he makes allowances for rationalism. Christian WOLFF, in trying to shape Leibniz' doctrine into a system, brought about Leibniz' connection with the Enlightenment. In so doing, he created an eclectic, if popular, philosophy, which came to have a wide influence. But the real pioneer of the Enlightenment in Germany was Christian Thomasius, who, following the French formula and especially Samuel von Pufendorf, advocated a doctrine of natural law and political thought independent of ethics and revelation and founded on plain reason. Kant led enlightened rationalism to its high point, but on the other hand pointed out the limits of the faculty of perception (Kritik der reinen Vernunft, 1781). He then tried to postulate the existence of God from the view of practical reason, taking as his starting point the fact of moral conscience (Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, 1788).

The strong missionary spirit of the Enlightenment spread its influence over a wide area. The secret societies of the Freemasons, the ROSICRUCIANS, and the Illuminati (see ILLUMINISM) encouraged a bond among freethinkers. Encyclopedias like Bayle's Dictionnaire historique et critique (1695–97) and Diderot and d'Alembert's Encyclopédie des sciences, des arts et des métiers (1751–80), periodicals like Christoph Nicolai's Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek (1765–1806) or the Berlinische Monatsschrift disseminated, along with aesthetic and popular scientific ideas, the new philosophy in a skillful but also destructive form. Classic German literature, which reached its high point with Lessing, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe, is best seen from this viewpoint.

Philosophy and Religion. The after effects of Ockhamistic thought, together with the impressive progress of natural science, which had made men aware of the regularity of the material course of the universe, urged philosophers to seek a new answer to the question of origin and methods of cognition. Descartes, with his methodical doubt, became not only the originator of philosophical criticism but also, by founding all thought on a consciousness sure of itself (cogito, ergo sum) and endowed with so-called innate ideas, made himself the forerunner of all later idealistic-rationalistic systems. Innate ideas are for him the infinite substance, God; and the twofold finite substance is that of thinking man and the extended thing that is thought of. SPINOZA, reuniting this dualism, arrived at pantheism. Thomas HOBBES's sensualistic philosophy is the empiric-naturalistic counterpart to the idealistic system of Descartes. John LOCKE and David HUME derive all cognition from sense experience. Metaphysics is impossible in such a system. The development of such thought ends in the materialism of Claude Helvétius, Paul HOLBACH (Système de la nature, 1770) and Julien de La Mettrie (L'Homme machine, 1748).

The attitude of these thinkers toward religion is determined partly by tradition and origin, partly by the idealistic or materialistic tendency of each system. When the higher life of man is considered as the effect of bodily organization, when thought and will are said to be sensations resulting from education, the aim of life will be placed in pleasure. Morality, whose source in this purely materialistic view is the physical urge of selfpreservation (Holbach, d'Alembert), can be founded only upon considerations of common good and private utility. Real religion has no place (De La Mettrie, Helvétius, Holbach). The idealistic structure of Descartes, on the other hand, appealed as a possible point of development to Jansenists, Oratorians like Malebranche, and some Jesuits. The empiric-inductive method, first demanded by Bacon, required a strict separation of reason and revelation, of knowledge and belief, and led to a natural religion (deism).

HERBERT OF CHERBURY (De veritate, 1624) traces all human knowledge to innate common ideas and principles whose criterion of truth is common acceptance. The most important religious-ethical content of innate basic truths is the existence of God, the necessity of divine worship through virtue and piety, expiation of wrongdoing through repentance, and belief in reward and punishment in this life and in the next. Anything that exceeds this is an addition made by positive religions. That is particularly true of dogmas. The more a religion is cleansed of such accretions or the more it approaches a religion whose nature is founded on rationalism, the greater is its value. In such a system religion is not conceived theocentrically as worship of God, but anthropocentrically as moral conduct of the individual, as realization of natural morality, as love of fellow man. Religion thus becomes a stimulus for virtue. But virtue is the happiness of man. All of this is a utilitarian-eudaimonistic way of thinking, leading to the equation: religion=morality.

The concept of a revealed religion and the acceptance of truth on the authority of someone else are repugnant to an Enlightenment based on reason and experience. This explains its attitude toward Christianity. Christ is to be considered as one among many founders of religions. His teaching must be judged by the norm of rational-natural religion and its ethical-humanitarian demands. Consequently, the Bible is a kind of code of ethics, to be studied independently of any alleged divine inspiration and pastoral interpretation. It must be cleansed of anything offensive, notably miracles. This last notion was advocated in particular by the German Protestant Samuel Reimarus in his pamphlet Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes (1744-), of which LESSING published seven sections entitled Wolfenbüttler Fragmente eines Ungenannten (1744-78). These stirred up great agitation as did the Wertheimer Bible translation of Lorenz Schmidt (1735). The Christian Church is to the adherents of the Enlightenment nothing but one religious association among many others (indifferentism), a society for fostering religion and morality on the basis of the dogma of Christ.

Culture and Education. Man is thus portrayed as a rational, moral being striving for happines and dominated by the urge for knowledge and learning. His knowledge results in actions harmonious with nature and reason; the philosophers call it virtue. And virtue makes for happiness.

This image determines social pedagogy also. Man is good by nature (Rousseau, Émile, 1762); nature has implanted in him the germs of a behavior based on social morality. Since he develops freely out of capacities and forces dormant within himself, according to the principle of spontaneity, stress is laid on the subordinate role of pedagogy. Its method has a strong psychological slant, in which the individuality of the pupil is encouraged, and punishment is considered a detriment to his development. Since knowledge and learning occupy a central position in the evolution of an enlightened, progressive man, school attendance is compulsory. The educational standards are further heightened by improving the methods and abilities of teachers. So-called normal schools or teachers' seminars are created after the pattern developed by the Swiss pedagogue, Johann PESTALOZZI.

Not only on the elementary and secondary school levels was the influence of the Enlightenment exerted, but also in universities, where new emphasis was placed upon research, especially in natural sciences. Prototypes in Germany are the Universities of Halle, founded in 1694, and Göttingen, founded in 1737. Parallel with such universities, there also arose special professional institutes, societies, and academies of science. The first university institute was the philological-pedagogical "seminar" founded in 1787 at the University of Halle. Scientific academies began with the Royal Society of London (1663), followed by the Prussian Academy of Sciences in Berlin (1700) and the Russian Academy of Sciences in St. Petersburg (1724). The last two had been organized by Leibniz.

The principle of equality among all men as understood by the enlightened philosophers expresses itself in rational morality, humanitarianism, tolerance, and cosmopolitanism. Such attitudes resulted in many praiseworthy developments, such as advances in medicine; the organized care of orphans, the underprivileged, and the handicapped, training for trades within individual capacities; and humanitarian reforms in criminal law and its procedures. The demand grew for abolition of slavery and for the application of ethical principles to colonial peoples. The disabilities that Jews were subjected to were likewise removed. In the U.S. the Jews obtained for the first time complete civil equality in 1776. Finally, cosmopolitanism furthered interest in physical and cultural anthropology, physical and social geography, languages, literature, art, and the civilization of peoples outside the Western cultural cycle.

State and Society. The state ranks highest among social institutions in enlightened thought. It is viewed as the sum of rational individual beings and their rights, and consequently as the totality and actuality of all reason and all law, as the highest and only positive authority. The origin of the state proceeds from the individual, having come about by means of social contract (Rousseau, Contrat Social, 1762). Private interest and the desire to keep personal liberty when living together with other men, but without being exposed to their tyranny and quarrelsomeness (loss of freedom, loss of property, war), cause men to band together and to surrender to the state a part of the rights due by nature so that these rights may be protected with better results in favor of the individual. The will of the state is, therefore, the united will of all individuals and is absolute (idea of sovereignty).

The protection of individual rights in the state is best served by the separation of powers into legislative, executive, and judicial. Locke and Rousseau consider popular sovereignty, in opposition to the divine right of kings of a former period, as the supreme norm. A communistic social organization, originating by transference of private property to the state, Rousseau declares indeed compatible with the idea of legality, but psychologically wrong. The possibility of withdrawing rights once transferred to the state is denied, e.g., by Pufendorf and Hobbes, who maintain that power transferred by popular will to the ruler is definite and absolute. From the foregoing it will be seen that the theory of the origin of the state, as proposed by the Enlightenment, admits a development into many different forms of the state: constitutional, absolute, totalitarian.

The purpose of the state is the protection of the individual, his liberty, and his property (administration of justice); the advancement of the individual by encouragement of education through universal compulsory schooling (basis of state monopoly of education); and the improvement of the general standard of living (social welfare). The specific content of individual freedom should consist of freedom of speech, of the press, and of association. These rights include freedom of conscience and freedom of religion, and consequently also the freedom to express collectively a religious belief through a religious community.

State and Church. The Enlightenment, however, has limited its recognition of the corporate liberty of the churches, since it saw therein, especially in the Catholic Church, a danger to the sovereignty of the state. But the various freedoms granted to the individual imply the duty of tolerance, which was now prescribed to the state in its relations with religious corporations. The first popular assembly proclaiming religious parity was that of Catholic Maryland in 1679. As part of a constitution we see parity first in Virginia in 1776; later, in negative wording, in the constitutions of the U.S. (1787-91) and of France (1793), in the Austrian Tolerance Edict (1781), and in the Prussian Common Law (1794). According to the Enlightenment, the state may tolerate only those religious associations that do not contravene the moral norms necessary for maintaining civil society (Locke; cf. wording of many modern constitutions). On this principle England justified its exclusion of atheists and Catholics from tolerance. Catholics were held to disregard the sovereignty of the state because they recognized the alien jurisdiction of the pope and denied the political authority of excommunicated rulers. The former could not bind themselves to an oath of allegiance by calling on God.

As to the actual relation between church and state, philosophers did not disturb the existing Established Church, but rather developed its theory and practice. On the one hand, they wanted to use the influence of religion and church on the moral conduct of men in favor of law and order in the state (Rousseau, Hobbes); on the other, they wanted to establish the sovereignty of the state (absolutism). To this end they developed out of the alleged general rights over the church (iura maiestatica circa sacra) a set of special rights, restricting the church. The right of supervision (ius inspiciendi) came to include the claim that ecclesiastical jurisdiction districts must not cross state boundaries. The state claimed a right of veto in the appointment of important church functionaries (ius exclusivae). Church announcements, in order to take effect, had to have the consent of civil authorities (placet; ius cavendi). The effect of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was made illusory by the possibility of appeal to a civil court (recursus tamquam ab abusu).

The theory of religion and church as held by the Enlightenment, including the doctrine of absolute state sovereignty, resulted in bitter conflict with the Catholic Church. Hence, it is toward her that the full weight of attack is directed. Obligatory dogmas, the teaching office of the church, supreme papal authority, the character of mystery of the Mass and the Sacraments, monasticism with its vows of obedience, and the contemplative life, were all rejected.

Papacy and Church Organization. Attacks on the papacy were revived by a new conciliar movement manifested in universal and national councils and convocations of clergy, by overemphasis on episcopal power that should stem directly from ordination (iurisdictio ordinaria episcopi; the episcopal system), and by the idea of a national church and a national primate. Systems like GALLICANISM, FEBRONIANISM, and JOSEPHINISM represent the relation between the enlightened state and the Church headed by the papacy. In France, during the socalled quarrel about the "regalia," the right of advowson and of disposal of church property, a right conceded to the king in an earlier period, came to be claimed an inherent and inalienable right of the crown. Papal protests were met with a convocation of the French clergy, who signed under duress a fundamental declaration of the Gallican clergy about ecclesiastical power (Declaratio cleri gallicani de potestate ecclesiastica, 1682). This declaration affirmed the superiority of general councils and denied the infallibility of the pope in matters of faith. The fact that jurisdictional acts of the pope were to take effect only after consent of the particular national church struck Catholic constitutional law in its vital point, and recognized in principle the notion of a state church.

A theological interpretation of Gallicanism and its application to the territories of the ecclesiastical princes of Germany is given by Febronianism. This system is developed in the book of Febronius, nom de plume of the suffragan Bishop of Trier, Nikolaus von Hontheim, De statu ecclesiae et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis (1763). Here the pope is thought of as first among equals, as representative of the universal Church or the universal episcopate. In the course of history, the episcopate, deceived by the so-called Pseudo-Isidorian forgery, is said to have transferred to the pope certain rights, express or implied. These rights the episcopate might take back at any time, except the main rights of primacy, which, however, possess no legislative character. On the contrary, in matters of canonical legislation the head of the Church should have the consent of the national churches.

On the basis of this Febronian canon law, the demands of the four German metropolitan bishops were formulated at the Congress of EMS (1786). Accordingly, the archbishops began to introduce arbitrarily the necessary reforms. Their measures reached a climax in the quarrel over the Cologne nunciature.

Similarly, the political church reforms of MARIA THERESA and JOSEPH II in the Hapsburg domains were partly necessary and justified, viz, the secularization of part of numerous monasteries in order to finance new dioceses and parishes and the reorganization of theological studies. But in theory and in practice they were the outcome of enlightened political thought.

Secular and Regular Clergy. The idea of the church as a religious community, part of and subordinate to the state, was bound to result in a lowering of respect for the status of priest and monk. The clergyman became a "servant of religion," whose main task was to be his moral-pedagogic influence on the people. The clergyman as an educator of the masses became an object of interest to the state. Hence, the state claimed the right to prescribe the scholarly training of the clergy and to regulate, to supervise, and even to conduct theological studies according to the needs of the time. In Germany there developed the tendency to require secular and regular clergy to study at the schools of divinity of the state universities. In Austria Joseph II founded general seminaries for this purpose. A study program, in its main outlines still in force today, was set up by Stephan RAUTENSTRAUCH in 1782, commissioned by the Austrian government. It is characterized by emphasis on Biblical and patristic sources and their study in the original languages, introduction of the historical method in the science of theology, and the introduction of history of dogma and of church history in theological instruction, while it minimizes speculative scholastic theology. The interest of the Enlightenment in the teaching and application of knowledge was met by the creation of a new practical subject, namely, pastoral theology.

Generally speaking, contemplation and asceticism were held to have no right to exist, since they did not serve any visible purpose. There was little tolerance for the breviary, for celibacy, or for the fostering of priestly vocations, which was especially harmful to the religious orders. The vow of obedience, by which the regular clergy was bound, was considered incompatible with the task of an educator of the people, and an inadmissible limitation of complete personal liberty. Activities of the regular clergy in pastoral work, education, teaching, and care of the sick were indeed viewed as useful. But the regular clergy who were to form the masses had henceforth to obtain their training at the state universities.

These measures, intensified by the animosity stirred up by literary attacks and the propaganda of the daily press, led many countries to a partial or total secularization of monasteries and orders. In some cases reduction of the number of members was ordered; in other cases the purely contemplative orders were abolished. In 1773 the Bourbon courts successfully forced the Pope, for political reasons, to decree the dissolution of the Jesuit Order. In 1782 Joseph II put through a partial secularization of the monasteries in Austria. A general dissolution of monasteries took place in France from 1789 through the great Revolution and in Germany as a result of a resolution of the Reichstag in 1803 (Reichsdeputationshauptschluss).

Divine Service and Pastoral Work. The insistence of the Enlightenment upon the increase of knowledge as the goal of human progress influenced religion in its practical expressions, to the degree that religious instruction became the central point of divine service. The sermon of the Enlightenment was preeminently an appeal to moral conduct. The functions of the priest as mediator to salvation, of the sacrifice of the Mass, and of the Sacraments were thereby often overlooked; everything must edify and stimulate and lead toward practical religiosity and morality. Hence the demand for the use of the vernacular in the liturgy, since people can receive instruction only in a language they all understand. Hence also the demand to rid divine service and the very church building of anything that is nonessential, overdone, strange, or no longer intelligible. That meant a repression of pious folk customs, reduction of the large number of Masses, abolition of Eucharistic exposition during the Mass, and restriction of processions and pilgrimages, of veneration of saints and relics, of indulgences and fraternities. The house of God was invaded by the sober art of classicism (cf. the pastoral letters of the Archbishops of Vienna in 1752, of Salzburg in 1782, and of Augsburg in 1783).

However, not withstanding much bias, the liturgical movement of the Enlightenment somewhat stimulated divine worship for the masses. There arose new rituals and new collections of songs. Furthermore pastoral conferences increased; pastoral periodicals were founded in order to arouse the clergy dedicated to the ministry of souls and to win them over to the new ideas. Thus, while the regular clergy was pushed into the background of Church life, the importance of the official parish ministry increased. Attempts of the episcopate to increase the care of souls and to decrease positions that were not so engaged supported this development. The interest in religious instruction especially benefited the compilation of new catechisms and of methodical catechesis, and its introduction as a required subject in the school curriculum.

Literature. The Enlightenment also affected literary and artistic forms. The literature of the 18th century, for example, was involved in the struggle for supremacy between reason and imagination. Out of this grew a classicism that demanded sobriety as the first canon of literary expression. The emphasis on rational literary style can be found in the effect of Johann Gottsched upon the Leipzig stage; the works of Gotthold Lessing; the Sturm und Drang of the middle Rhineland (1770–80), where efforts to restore fantasy never vanquished the strong rational element of the Enlightenment; Voltaire's search for an enlightened Utopia, which led him to teach the need of men's commitment to society, and to reexamine established institutions; and the observations of the master satirist Jonathan Swift on the manner of leading life by reason and without the impulses of emotion.

Evaluation. The positive effects of the Enlightenment lie in the cultivation of a humanitarian and tolerant spirit; an improved administration of law, including a humane criminal law; a pedagogy based on psychology; efforts toward social welfare; stimulation of research, scholarship, and education; and the struggle against ignorance and superstition. As bad effects the following may be counted; the overestimation of intellectual powers (thus Kant), the underestimation of nonintellectual powers (thus Rousseau and Herder), the absolute individualistic idea of liberty as well as statism, the negative attitude toward authority and tradition, religious relativism, and a worldly viewpoint with its ideas of pragmatism and utility. All of which have furthered the secularization of thought and action in all fields, including an exclusively material civilization.

With regard to the Enlightenment the Church has stood partly on the defensive, though partly willing to accept some of its programs. Dangerous consequences have resulted from unrestricted rationalism and liberalism, especially from the rejection of all metaphysics as well as from a conception of the Church based on natural law. On the other hand, it has had its good effects in the advancement of positive theology, especially of theological research; the renewal of the liturgy and of preaching the gospel; concentration on parish work; and the strengthened position of parish priest and bishop. Catholic efforts to fight against superstition and abuses of religious customs, Biblical textual criticism, etc., have often been suspected as unorthodox. To what extent one can speak of healthy progress, or to what extent of hindrance to the Church, must be judged from individual cases.

Bibliography: P. SMITH, A History of Modern Culture, 2 v. (New York 1930–34) v.2 The Enlightenment 1687–1776 (New York 1934). W. E. H. LECKY, History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe, 2 v. (rev. ed. New York 1925). F. VALJAVEC, Geschichte der abendländischen Aufklärung (Vienna 1961). F. UEBERWEG, Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, ed. K. PRAECHTER et al., 5 v. (11th, 12th ed. Berlin 1923–28) 3. G. SCHNÜRER, Katholische Kirche und Kultur im 18. Jahrhundert (Paderborn 1941). R. N. STROMBERG, Religious Liberalism in Eighteenth-Century England (London 1954). R. R. PALMER, Catholics and Unbelievers in Eighteenth Century France (Princeton, N.J. 1939). P. HAZARD, The European Mind: The Critical Years, 1680-1715, tr. J. L. MAY (New Haven, Conn. 1953); European Thought in the Eighteenth Century, from Montesquieu to Lessing, tr. J. L. MAY (New Haven, Conn. 1954). B. GROETHUYSEN, Die Entstehung der bürgerlichen Welt-und Lebensanschauung in Frankreich, 2 v. (Halle 1927–30). H. M. WOLFF, Die Weltanschauung der deutschen Aufklärung in geschichtlicher Entwicklung (Bern Munich 1949). E. WINTER, Der Josefinismus und seine Geschichte: Beiträge zur Geistesgeschichte Österreichs 1740-1848 (Brno 1943). F. MAASS, ed., Der Josephinismus: Quellen zu seiner Geschichte in Österreich 1760-1850, 5 v. (Fontes rerum Austriacarum II, 71-75; Vienna 1951-61). A. P. WHITAKER, Latin America and the Enlightenment (New York 1942). G. JEL-LINEK, Die Erklärung der Menschen-und Bürgerrechte: Ein Beitrag zur modernen Verfassungsgeschichte (4th ed. Munich 1927). D. KNOOP, and G. P. JONES, The Genesis of Freemasonry (Manchester, England 1947). A. ANWANDER, Die allgemeine Religionsgeschichte im katholischen Deutschland während der Aufklärung und Romantik (Salzburg 1932). W. PHILIPP, Das Werden der Aufklärung in theologiegeschichtlicher Sicht (Forschungen zur systematischen Theologie und Religionsphilosophie 3; Göttingen 1957). W. TRAPP, Vorgeschichte und Ursprung der liturgischen Bewegung (Regensburg 1940). A. L. MAYER, "Liturgie, Aufklärung und Klassizismus," Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft 9 (1929) 67-127. L. G. CROCKER, "Recent Interpretations of the French Enlightenment," Journal of World History 8 (1964) 426-56.

[E. HEGEL]

ENLIGHTENMENT, PHILOSOPHY OF

The ENLIGHTENMENT is a name popularly used to describe the extraordinary scientific, philosophical, religious, and political developments of 18th-century Europe. Like all historical periods, the Enlightenment had no abrupt beginning or end, and the determination of its temporal limits is considerably arbitrary. And like most popular historical nomenclature, the term used to describe this period, while setting in relief a very real aspect of the times, connotes an oversimple and somewhat uncritical view of what actually occurred. The purpose of this article is to outline the philosophical thought that characterized the period; this may be conveniently done in two parts, the first discussing the French and English Enlightenment and the second the German Enlightenment.

French and English Enlightenment

It is undeniable that the scientific developments of 18th-century Europe prompted the wide dissemination of a new spirit, one opposed to a priori solutions and very much given to experimentation. Although the 18th century did not produce any scientific discoveries equaling in importance those of Galileo and Newton, it was a century during which an unusually large number of people began to build on the scientific foundations already provided. The "scientific method" began to assume preeminence over all other approaches to important problems, even in moral and religious spheres; and scientific societies, journals, and encyclopedias multiplied their influence as means whereby scientists could exchange information and assist one another in their experimentation. The scientific laboratory became so popular, in fact, that it sometimes assumed the role of a status symbol among the socially elite, particularly in France, and accounts of laboratory experiments became more fashionable in some famous salons than court gossip. Moreover, at this time, in Europe's great universities chairs were founded in such sciences as anatomy, astronomy, botany, and chemistry.

Carl Linnaeus.

Scientific Progress. Such scientific ferment produced a remarkably large number of concrete results. C. Linnaeus in his Systema naturae (Leiden 1735) provided a firm foundation for the complex task of classifying the large number of minerals, plants, and animals that had been discovered and described by him or his assistants, who made voyages to the most distant parts of the earth for this purpose. Also in the field of biology, George Louis Leclerc de Buffon published his Histoire naturelle, générale et particulière (44 v. Paris 1749–1804), which argued from the stratification of rocks and the occurrence of fossils at various levels that the planet was of a much greater age than that commonly inferred from Biblical accounts. B. de Maillet (1656–1738) also wrote the very popular Telliamed (Amsterdam 1748), in which he proposed the theory that terrestrial forms of life had evolved over long periods of time from aquatic forms. J. B. Lamarck rounded out the century by publishing his Philosophie zoölogique (Paris 1809), in which he added to the developing evolutionary theory the notion that evolution was a consequence of adaptation to environment.

Physical Science. In the fields of chemistry and physics, Sir Henry Cavendish (1731-1810) pioneered in experiments with gases, electricity, and heat. He demonstrated the compound nature of water, invented the eudiometer tube, and introduced the use of drying agents in experimentation. Joseph Priestley published a History of Electricity (London 1767) and, in the following decade, Experiments and Observations on Different Kinds of Air (6 v. London 1774-86). He discovered oxygen, demonstrated the similarity of respiration and combustion, and invented the "pneumatic trough" for collecting gases. Priestley was something of a philosophe too, writing a History of the Corruptions of Christianity (Northumberland, Pa. 1796) and lending his support to the American and French revolutions. A. L. Lavoisier, author of a Traité élémentaire de chimie (Paris 1789) and famous for his phlogiston theory of combustion, was also a pioneer in laboratory work and invented, along with P.S. Laplace, a device for measuring linear and cubical expansion due to heat. Laplace is more noted for the "nebular hypothesis," which he proposed in his Exposition du système du monde (Paris 1796), and for his pioneering work in probability theory.

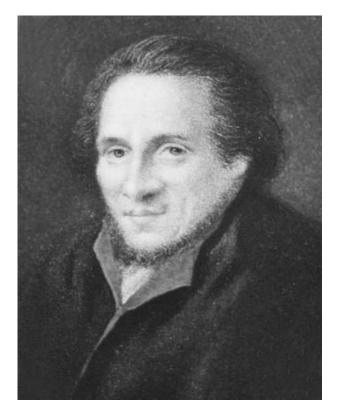

The 18th century saw also extraordinary developments in the study of electricity. Benjamin Franklin (1706–90) published his Experiments and Observations on Electricity (3 v., London 1754–62). L. Galvani discovered what is now known as the galvanic principle; A. Volta produced the first electrical battery; and at the close of the century A. M. Ampère explained the attraction and repulsion of electrical currents.

Technology. Concurrent with these contributions to physical science, the spirit of the Enlightenment was also producing practical results. Edward Jenner (1749–1823) introduced the practice of vaccination in England; James Watt (1736–1819) developed a steam engine that was such an improvement over the older piston engine of Thomas Newcomen that it could be used to drive all sorts of machinery. And the textile industry was not slow to provide the machines. John Kay had invented the flyshuttle in 1733; James Hargreaves produced the "spinning jenny" in 1764; and Edmund Cartwright developed the power loom in 1785. Finally, Eli Whitney devised his cotton gin in 1793.

Theories of Man. Such successes in science and its applications gave thinkers of the Enlightenment great confidence in human progress. All one needed to make real the Utopias of which others had dreamed was to apply, to the direction of human life, the scientific method that had so successfully dealt with the physical world. It became the fashion to regard man as a very complex machine whose workings, once understood, could be controlled to produce whatever results might be desired. Three of the ENCYCLOPEDISTS were particularly active in providing the new psychological theories: É. B. de CON-DILLAC, J. O. de La Mettrie, and P. H. D. HOLBACH. Abbé Condillac, in his Traité des sensations (Paris 1754), pushed John Locke's EMPIRICISM to the point of maintaining, against the Englishman's theory of "ideas of reflection," that all knowledge is ultimately sensation in one form or another. While Condillac himself was not a materialist in his conception of man, his work was a step in that direction. La Mettrie took the final step in his L'Homme machine (Leiden 1748), which was a completely mechanistic analysis of man's psychic activities; thinking, feeling, willing were all proclaimed to be physical functions of a highly complex, completely material mechanism whose motive power was self-love (see MATE-RIALISM).

Holbach, in his Système de la nature, ou des lois du monde physique et du monde moral (London 1770), helped popularize La Mettrie's view and emphasized the application of MECHANISM to the realm of morality. Man, Holbach said, is a purely physical being, and ethics is only a matter of considering this physical being from a certain point of view. "In all he does, a reasonable being ought always set before himself his own happiness and that of his fellows." And a consideration of l'homme machine from the ethical point of view revealed that "the source of man's unhappiness is his ignorance of nature." Such a conviction made possible a great optimism concerning man's perfectibility. M. J. A. C. CONDORCET gave expression to this optimism in his Esquisse d'un tableau historique des progrès de l'esprit humain (Paris 1794), a work that was written, ironically, while Condorcet was in hiding from the Jacobins.

Attitude Toward Religion. Another consequence of the 18th century's confidence in scientific method was an extremely critical attitude toward matters of faith matters that, by their very nature, could not be subjected to a "scientific" critique. Though I. Kant was busy in Germany attempting to provide some rational justification for faith, the general trend of the period was represented by the religious SKEPTICISM of the philosophes, particularly Voltaire, J. D'Alembert, and D. Diderot. While these men attacked religion with a vehemence and lack of restraint that induce doubts about their good faith, it must be noted to their credit that much of what they attacked in the religious practices of their day was deserving of criticism, e.g., an excessive love for the miraculous and the bizarre, the Jansenistic view of God as a harsh and exacting master, the bitter rivalries between religious groups, the sentimentalities of some society women who played at being "spiritual," and the failure of powerful and wealthy believers to care for the poor and oppressed. To this extent the philosophes can be said to have worked for an "enlightenment" in religion and an end to superstition. However, failing to distinguish between genuine religion and its aberrations, they let their enthusiasm for scientific method lead them to characterize all religion based on revelation as superstition. Indeed, when mention is made of the Enlightenment in the 21st century, the characteristic most remembered is the replacement of religious faith by reason-with reason being restricted, in theory if not always in practice, to what was empirically verifiable.

Moses Mendelssohn.

Political Notions. Parallel with the rejection of religious tradition there occurred a similar rejection of political traditions. The general acceptance of hereditary monarchical rule, a privileged class of nobles, and an alliance between the Church and the State gave way, by the end of the century, to the secularized liberty, equality, and fraternity of the French Revolution. The new spirit was epitomized in the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, which asserted that man had a natural right to liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression; that sovereignty resided in the nation as a whole rather than in one man; that law was the expression of the general will of the people; and that all citizens were equal before the law. These same principles had guided the American Founding Fathers in severing the ties with monarchical England and in setting up a representative government, principles that had been popularized by Enlightenment writers such as Baron de MONTESQUIEU and J. J. ROUSSEAU. Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin were deeply imbued with the spirit of the Enlightenment; and Thomas PAINE was active in promoting this spirit, first in America in his Common Sense (Philadelphia 1776), afterward in England in his Rights of Man (Philadelphia 1791-92), and then in France, where he was elected to the Convention by the Department of Calais. Paine's The Age of Reason (London 1794-96) was an expression of the DEISM that became the religion of the Enlightenment.

Bibliography: C. L. BECKER, The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers (New Haven 1932). R. ROCKWOOD, Carl Becker's Heavenly City Revisited (Ithaca, N.Y. 1958). L. I. BREDVOLD, The Brave New World of the Enlightenment (Ann Arbor 1961). E. CASSIRER, The Philosophy of the Enlightenment, tr. C. A. KOELLN and J. P. PETTEGROVE (Princeton 1951). H. G. NICOLSON, The Age of Reason (Garden City, N.Y. 1961). G. HAVENS, The Age of Ideas: From Reaction to Revolution in 18th-Century France (New York 1955). P. HAZARD, European Thought in the Eighteenth Century: From Montesquieu to Lessing, tr. J. L. MAY (New Haven 1954). C. FRANKEL, The Faith of Reason: The Idea of Progress in the French Enlightenment (New York 1948). A. VARTANIAN, Diderot and Descartes: A Study of Scientific Naturalism in the Enlightenment (Princeton 1953). R. R. PALMER, Catholics and Unbelievers in 18th-Century France (Princeton 1939).

[R. Z. LAUER]

German Enlightenment

The German Enlightenment presents a rather complex intellectual structure in which various currents of thought are discernible ranging all the way from RATIO-NALISM to PIETISM. This part of the article considers its historical development and concludes with a brief critique.

Historical Development. The history of the German Enlightenment may best be divided into three phases: the early period, that of Wolff and his school, and that of its full development.

Early Period (1690–1720). The central figure of this period is Christian Thomasius, with whom the first influence of English EMPIRICISM and PSYCHOLOGISM began to be discernible in German philosophy. In place of the concept of man proposed by traditional metaphysics and moral philosophy, he substituted the notion of man as he actually is, and this particularly in his philosophy of law. Although Thomasius's teacher, Samuel Pufendorff (1632–94) still conceived law as a metaphysical and moral order, for Thomasius law was only a clever balancing of the instinctual and emotional life of man for its purely utilitarian value. Thomasius introduced the separation between law and ethics that was later to prove disastrous.

Wolff and His School (1720-50). Christian WOLFF was a typical rationalist—a term used in a pejorative sense by his opponents, particularly the Pietists and orthodox Protestants. Since Martin Luther had placed faith over reason, Pietism treated any religion based on reason as an encroachment upon the freedom and omnipotence of God and of His grace. Understanding and reason thereupon came to be the passwords of Wolff and of his school: through enlightened reason man was to be led to virtue and to happiness. The titles of Wolff's works repeatedly read Vernünftige Gedanken über. . . . Actually, however, Wolff's emphasis on reason was not so much the usual rationalist emphasis as it was a return to the type of thought that characterized the school metaphysics of the 17th century and of G. W. LEIBNIZ in particular. Both Leibniz and Wolff were seeking a synthesis of reason and religion, of metaphysics and theology.

Nonetheless, Wolff's Pietistic opponents accused him of being atheistic. In 1723 he was relieved of his position in Halle, where he was professor of philosophy, and he was expelled from the region under threat of being hanged for his teaching. The Hessian University of Marburg received him, however, and there Wolff lived to see his renown reach its climax. In 1740 Frederick II of Prussia brought him back to Halle with full honors. The accusation of atheism was there seen to be completely unjust. Quite the opposite, Wolff had much occupied himself with proofs for the existence of God just as had the proponents of the older metaphysics. The treatment by Wolff, however, was not made in the spirit of the old metaphysics, but rather with a type of purely conceptual analysis that proved too little because it set out to prove too much. More particularly, Wolff understood PROOF (demonstratio) in a mathematical sense, overlooking both experience and the inner life of man in the process, and therefore supplying judgments that were analytical and not synthetic.

Wolff's efforts later provoked Kant's criticism of the proofs for the existence of God. When Kant spoke of metaphysics, he usually had in mind the metaphysics of the Leibniz-Wolffian school. For his lectures on metaphysics, in fact, Kant had used a textbook of a student of Wolff, A. G. Baumgarten (1714–62), who is noted also for his work on AESTHETICS. Other students of Wolff include J. C. Gottsched (1700–66), who was similarly occupied with aesthetics; M. Knutzen (1713–51), who taught the young Kant in Königsberg; and G. B. Bilfinger (1693–1750), whose Philosophische Erleuchtungen served for a long time as the best textbook of Wolffian metaphysics. In 1737 there were already no less than 107 authors who were writing in a way that identified them as belonging to the Wolffian school. Opponents of Wolff included J. Lange (1670–1744), who was later professor of theology in Halle, as well as A. Rüdiger (1673–1731) and C. A. Crusius (1715–75).

Full Development (c. 1750-80). In the last phase, the German Enlightenment again fell under the influence of the French and English Enlightenment. Frederick II of Prussia, himself a freethinking litterateur, sent for C. A. Helvetius (1715-71) at Potsdam, made friends with Voltaire, and took Rousseau into his service. Other influences, traceable to John Toland (1670-1722) and Matthew Tindal (1656–1733), encouraged the growth of DEISM. Toland had been in Hanover in 1701 and 1702, while Tindal's work Christianity as Old as Creation (London 1730) was translated into German in 1741. In rationalist and Deist circles, the Hamburg Orientalist H. S. Reimarus (1694-1768) criticized the Bible and revelation in his unpublished Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes. For him, miracles and revelation are unworthy of God. The thought of Moses Mendelssohn (1729-86) was also Deist.

The greatest figure in this last phase of the German Enlightenment, however, was Mendelssohn's friend G. E. LESSING, the son of a Lutheran pastor in Saxony, a free-lance writer, poet (Minna von Barnhelm, Emilia Galotti, and Nathan der Weise), secretary of famous personalities, dramatic producer of the Hamburg National Theater, and finally librarian at Wolfenbüttel. His poetry created a new literary taste, while his writings on aesthetics (Laokoon and Hamburger Dramaturgie) provide a theory of art, especially of drama, that to this day has not become dated. In his Wolfenbüttler Fragmenten Lessing published a part of Reimarus's Schutzschrift and thereupon provoked a passionate discussion over whether religion should be based on reason or on revelation. Lessing's philosophy saw the divine in the rational ordering of the universe, the moral in reason itself, and the education of the human race in religion and the great religious figures. For him, the religions are not something conclusive, but stages in the vital development of mankind. Everything is undergoing evolution, including religion itself. In particular, there is no final truth for man, but only the constant search for it; this alone gives meaning to the term truth. So as not to shorten this constant search, Lessing taught a repeated existence for man, a palingenesis similar to that of the transmigration of souls. His Erziehung des Menschengeschlechtes (Berlin 1780), moreover, contains a philosophy of history and of religion that exerted as much influence on German idealism as it did on liberal Protestant theology of the 19th century.

Alongside the unique and great figure of Lessing stand a long line of popular philosophers of this period, such as the psychologist J. N. Tetens (1736–1807), the moral philosopher J. G. Sulzer (1720–79), the spiritual aphorist G. C. Lichtenberg (1742–99), the Hamburg educator J. B. Basedow, and the still more important Swiss educator J. H. PESTALOZZI. The last-named, however, extends beyond the period of the Enlightenment, and the emotional element in his work takes on more significance than the rational. Those who eventually brought about the overthrow of the Enlightenment were J. G. HAMANN, F. H. JACOBI, and J. G. HERDER.

Critique. The Enlightenment in Germany did much good for education in general and for public instruction in particular. Even catechetical instruction benefited from its lively stimulation, insofar as it replaced rote memory with understanding and encouraged independent thought similar to that of the Socratic method. The cultivation of the humanities and of intellectual tolerance was here served, just as was the battle against biased judgments.

On the other hand, the Enlightenment itself gave rise to new and dangerous prejudices. In this connection one could mention its faith in the omnipotence of reason and of science, its uncritical progressive thinking, and the naïveté of its humanism, which treated man as though he had suffered no blemish from original sin and could work out his own destiny. A similar excess lay in the Enlightenment's Deist conviction that man is able to discern what is possible for God and what is not. Revelation cannot contradict reason, this is true, but man's reason is not the complete and exclusive measure of revelation. The Enlightenment was just as uncomprehending in the face of mystery as it was in the face of history. The enlightened man was faced with the temptation to make himself the measure of all things because he conceived himself as the ideal man. For that reason he regarded parochial education as a second-class effort and thought that a Catholic could not be a complete scholar. One consequence of this attitude is secular education, which is not aware of its peculiar presuppositions and prejudices and to this extent encroaches upon true freedom. "Enlightened" thinkers seem unaware that there is no such thing as the ideal man whom they take themselves to be.

See Also: FREETHINKERS; THEISM.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946–) v.6, Wolff to Kant. H. LEISEGANG, Lessings Weltanschauung (Leipzig 1931). H. THIELICKE, Offenbarung, Vernunft und Existenz: Studien zur Religionsphilosophie Lessings (Gütersloh 1936; 4th ed. 1959). M. CAMPO, Cristiano Wolff e il razionalismo precritico, 2 v. (Milan 1939). M. WUNDT, Chr. Wolff und die deutsche Aufklärung (Stuttgart 1941); Die deutsche Schulphilosophie im Zeitalter der Aufklärung (Tübingen 1945). H. M. WOLFF, Die Weltanschauung der deutschen Aufklärung in geschichtlicher Entwicklung (Bern 1949). R. HAASS, Die geistige Haltung der katholischen Universitäten Deutschlands im 18. Jahrhundert: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Aufklärung (Freiburg 1952). W. PHILIPP, Das Werden der Aufklärung in theologie-geschichtlicher Sicht (Göttingen 1957).

[J. HIRSCHBERGER]

ENMITY (IN THE BIBLE)

The mutual hostility between persecutor and persecuted, for which the Christian, following Christ's new morality, must substitute a new attitude by which he loves and prays for his enemy (Mt 5.43–48; Lk 6.27–36).

Enmity in the Old Testament. The doctrine of Leviticus demanded that an Israelite respect the rights of his NEIGHBOR and love his fellow Israelites (Leviticus 19.11–18) and even foreigners who lived among them (19.33-34). One was urged to come to the aid of one's enemy when he lost or suffered damage to his livestock (Ex 23.4-5). Besides encouraging a beneficent control over excessive revenge, which was the main purpose of the law of exact retaliation (Ex 21.24; confer, Gn 4.23-24), Hebrew wisdom went further and urged those who had suffered injustice to leave vengeance to God (Prv 20.22), and even to act kindly toward their enemies (Prv 25.21-22). Job, in his ideal innocence, never rejoiced at his enemy's misfortune or, by cursing, wished him dead (Jb 31.29-30). No such command as cited in Matthew 5.43b, ". . . and shall hate thy enemy," can be found in the Old Testament. It is probably a gloss inferred as the opposite of the command to love one's friend (Lv 19.18), and has the tolerative meaning of "and you need not love your enemy."

On the other hand, the disdain in which Israelites held non-Israelites and enemy nations was one of their well-known traits, recorded by Tacitus (Hist. 5.5) and exemplified by many Old Testament passages [Dt 7.2; 15.1–3; 23.4–7, 21; 25.17–19; Ps 136(137).7–9]. However, such international enmity is not in question here. Our Lord is contrasting the attitude between a person and his friends to the new attitude of God's sons toward their personal enemies, mainly those who persecute them for religious motives.

In this context of personal enmity Israelites exacted BLOOD VENGEANCE in accordance with their ethical background (Nm 35.19), not even allowing a ransom for the life of a murderer, although such a custom was prevalent in the ancient Near East (Nm 35.31–33). This legitimate vengeance led the Israelites to feel toward unjust aggressors what can be called a justifiable animosity, so vividly depicted in Psalm 108 (109). Since Hebrew law was not only religious but civil, it had to allow for such external manifestations of animus against evil men.

Enmity in the New Testament. In Our Lord's insistence, the new law forbade a Christian to nurture even the best motivated feelings of animosity and demanded instead a benevolence toward enemies, copied after the Father's concern for all men, even the most evil. The enmity to be borne by a member of God's kingdom was especially apt to take the form of religious persecution. The Christian should, indeed, desire that God's enemies desist from opposing God's work in His faithful, but he should desire this without personal hatred for the persecutors. Rather, one should pray for them, a command that should be taken literally and not as a Semitic exaggeration to emphasize a vague moral ideal. Jesus Himself gave His disciples the greatest example of compliance with this command (Lk 23.34), an example later imitated by St. Stephen (Acts 7.60). To love and do good to another who is unfriendly and in opposition to oneself, is, therefore, to imitate in the highest degree the beneficence of God toward His rebellious creatures; it is to reach up and practice God's way of loving, commended to mankind by Christ's destruction of the source of all enmity: ". . . because when as yet we were sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom 5.8–9).

Bibliography: J. A. SANDERS, The Interpreters' Dictionary of the Bible, ed. G. A. BUTTRICK, 4 v. (Nashville 1962) 2:101. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 1381.

[J. E. FALLON]

ENNODIUS, MAGNUS FELIX

Ecclesiastical writer and bishop; b. Arles, France, c. 473; d. Pavia, Italy, 521. Ennodius, orphaned at an early age, entered the clerical state in Pavia c. 494; he then served as secretary to his uncle Laurentius, Bishop of Milan. At a Roman synod in 502 he defended the right of SYMMACHUS to the papal throne; he became bishop of Pavia in 512 or 513. In 515 and again in 517 he headed embassies from Pope HORMISDAS to the Emperor AN-ASTASIUS I to heal the ACACIAN SCHISM (484), but both missions failed. Known as a zealous pastor he is honored in Pavia as a saint. Ennodius's literary works, written before he became bishop, are often a strange blend of Christian and pagan ideas, so heavily embellished as to be at times unintelligible. His 297 letters are important source material for the early 6th century. His 28 Dictiones are model speeches for students, or "occasional sermons" to be used by his fellow priests. Among his Opuscula are an outstanding life of St. EPIPHANIUS and a sermon in honor of THEODORIC THE GREAT. His 21 poems are grammatically correct but without verve or originality, while some of his 151 epigrams are in questionable taste. His Eucharisticon de vita sua is an imitation of the Confessions but lacks Augustine's introspection and sincerity. His defense of Symmachus contains the famous sentence: "God indeed ordained that men should settle the affairs of men; but to pass judgment on the bishop of this see [Rome] He unquestionably reserved to Himself." He also urged that the title "pope" be restricted to the bishop of Rome.

Feast: July 17.

Bibliography: Opera Omnia, ed. G. HARTEL (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 6; 1882); Opera, ed. F. VOGEL (Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Auctores antiquissimi 7; 1885); The Life of St. Epiphanius, tr. and ed. G. COOK (Washington 1942). P. C. DE LABRIOLLE, History and Literature of Christianity, tr. H. WILSON (New York 1924). M. HADAS, A History of Latin Literature (New York 1952). B. ALTANER, Patrology (New York 1960) 572–574.

[S. J. MCKENNA]

ENOCH

The son of Cain and the father of Irad, according to the YAHWIST genealogy in Gn 4.17-24. The purpose of this genealogy is to depict the increase of sin and violence in the world from Cain to Lamech (Gn 4.8, 23-24) that came as a result of the Fall (Gn ch. 3). By contrast, the Enoch of the Sethite genealogy of the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY WRITERS in Gn 5.1-32, according to which he is the son of Jared (a variant of Irad) and the father of Mathusale (5.18–24), seems to pertain to the paradisaic era of mankind. The priestly narrative makes no explicit mention of a fall in Adam, but indicates only that by the time of Noah the earth had become corrupt in God's sight and filled with violence (Gn 6.11). Enoch's lifetime belonged to the era when death had not yet touched mankind. ADAM, Seth, and the rest of his ancestors were still alive (5.5–20). During his life on earth, "Enoch walked with God" (5.24a). This recalls the Yahwist PARADISE tradition that speaks of Yahweh "walking in the garden" (3.8). Enoch, at the end of a perfect life cycle (365 years, by analogy with the solar cycle of 365 days), does not die. All that is said of Enoch is that "he was seen no more because God took him" (5.24b). Enoch, belonging to the seventh generation of mankind, seems to mark the apex of the paradisaic era. Thereafter, men will die; corruption will fill the earth.

The Book of Sirach is dependent on Gn 5.21-24 in its praise of Enoch as one who "walked with the Lord and was taken" (Sir 44.16; 49.14). Sirach, like Gn 5.21, is extremely reticent with reference to any so-called ascension of Enoch. Whereas Elijah "went up" (2 Kgs 2.11), or "was taken up" (Sir 48.9), of Enoch the Old Testament says only that God "took him" (Gn 5.21; Sir 44.16; 49.14). Sirach also praises Enoch as "a wonder to succeeding generations by reason of his knowledge," i.e., of divine mysteries (Sir 44.16). Here Sirach is perhaps dependent on the various noncanonical traditions that credit Enoch with the reception of special revelations, whether during his lifetime [Enoch (Ethiopic)] or at the time of his so-called ascension to heaven [Enoch (Slavic)]. Traditions concerning Enoch the visionary and revealer of mysteries are preserved in several apocryphal works including the Ethiopic Book of Enoch, written originally in Hebrew or Aramaic about the second century B.C. and preserved only fragmentarily in Greek and Ethiopic translations, and the Slavic Book of Enoch, originally written in Greek by a Jew in the first or second Christian century and probably later revised under Christian influence.

The Epistle of St. JUDE (v. 14) refers to Enoch as a revealer of mysteries and includes a direct citation from Ethiopic Enoch (60.8). The entire passage found in Jude v. 4–15 reveals a dependence on Ethiopic Enoch (Jude v. 4 on 48.10; Jude v. 6 on 12.4; 10.4–6, 11–12; Jude v. 14 on 60.8; Jude v. 14–15 on 1.9). The author of Hebrews praises Enoch's faith and speaks of his transfer or removal ($\mu \epsilon \tau \alpha \theta \epsilon \sigma \iota \zeta$, not ascension $\alpha \nu \alpha \lambda \eta \mu \psi \iota \zeta$), as a reward of his faith (Heb 11.5). This is a theme that appears frequently in Ethiopic Enoch and also in Jubilees 10.17. The dependence of Heb 11.5 on the apocryphal traditions, however, is not certain. Enoch is also mentioned in the genealogy of Lk 2.23–24 in dependence upon Gn 5.18–24.

Bibliography: H. ODEBERG, G. KITTEL, Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:553–557. C. BON-NER, The Last Chapters of Enoch in Greek (Haverford, Pa. 1937). J. T. MILIK, "The Dead Sea Scrolls Fragment of the Book of Enoch," Biblica 32 (1951) 393–400. N. AVIGAD and Y. YADIN, A Genesis Apocryphon (Jerusalem 1956). J. DANIÉLOU, Holy Pagans of the O. T., tr. F. FABER (Baltimore 1957) 42–56. D. S. RUSSELL, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia 1964) 107–118, 327–330. R. H. CHARLES et al., eds., The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O.T. in English, 2 v. (Oxford 1913) 2:163–164, 425–469. T. W. MANSON, "The Son of Man in Daniel, Enoch and the Gospels," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 32 (1949–50) 171–193.

[J. PLASTARAS]

ENOCH LITERATURE

The researches of J. T. Milik (see bibliography) on these complicated and fragmentary Aramaic materials have yet to be fully published; and their implications for the Jewish background of Christianity have still to be worked out in detail. One solid inference would seem to be that the absence from the Qumran texts of any trace of the Parables (or, Similitudes) of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71) is no mere accident. The highly developed portrayal of a messianic "son of man" in this part of the composite book needs therefore to be reevaluated as to its date and its relationship to the Gospels.

Insight into the cosmic speculations and apocalyptic hopes in Jewish Palestine before the latest books of the Old Testament were written can be gained from these fragments. In the order of their composition as seen by Milik (except for section 3 below), the several parts of the Enoch collection are as follows: 1. A "Book of the Heavenly Luminaries" corresponding to 1 Enoch ch. 72–82. Of four manuscripts (4QEn ast r^{a-d}), the oldest is from ± 200 B.C., the latest from around the birth of Christ. This material was presented independently in ancient times, and has been greatly reduced before being incorporated into the later book, which also lacks the opening and final portions. It began with a long calendrical treatise, reconciling the solar year with the liturgical year of 364 days adopted into the Book of Jubilees and into Essene worship. This and other lore are presented as taught to Enoch during his earthly life by the angel Uriel. Except for ch. 81 of the later work (still earlier than 100 B.C), this section was composed in the Persian period, fifth-fourth centuries B.C. Its mythical geography is cosmic in scope and shows Babylonian influence. 2. The opening part of 1 Enoch (ch. 1-36) is best described as the "Book of Watchers," i.e., of fallen angels to whom the origin of evil among men is attributed. It includes an older core (ch. 6-19) that contains "Visions of Enoch." Five Qumran manuscripts containing half the text of the 36 chapters prove that the section was already fixed in its content early in the second century B.C. Milik sees it as a thirdcentury B.C. composition, with the "Visions" older still. 3. Linked to the "Book of Watchers" before 100 B.C. was a "Book of Giants" dealing with the legendary antediluvians of Gn 6.1-4. Fragments of this and related texts exist in no less than 15 manuscripts from four different Qumran caves. Taken over by Mani in the third century A.D., it became an accepted part of Manichaean literature, in languages reaching from central Asia to Africa and western Europe. It was still known in the context of the Enoch compilation to Christian writers in Alexandria in the fifth century A.D. The inference lies ready to hand that it was this "Book of Giants" with its unsavory Manichaean associations for which the "Parables of Enoch" were substituted about the sixth century. Milik dates the "Parables" (he prefers "Discourses") about A.D. 270, and sees them as written originally in Greek in the style of the Sibylline oracles; they depend on the canonical Gospels. This evaluation will no doubt be controverted. 4. The "Book of Dreams" corresponding to 1 Enoch 83-90 comprises two dream visions narrated by Enoch, now thought of as living with his wife in a far-off paradise; he is brought back to earth by angelic guides to instruct his descendants. This section, known from four Qumran manuscripts, is patterned closely on the "Book of Watchers," to which it was composed as a pendant in 164 B.C. (according to Milik). The first dream has to do with the Flood; the second gives a conspectus of world history in highly allegorical terms. From the period of the Exile, 70 successive angelic guardians govern Israel until the end time. A similar scheme (70 generations from Enoch to Christ) underlies the genealogy in Lk 3.23–38. 5. The "Letter of Enoch" (1 Enoch 91-105), written in a Hellenistic milieu such as Gaza not later than 100 B.C., is known from two Qumran copies. It transforms the scheme of 70 periods into a cycle of 10 "weeks of years"; of these, the first seven, a jubilee cycle, comprise world history. The remaining three weeks of years are the eschatological end time. This arrangement combines 70 x 7 elements from a third-century B.C. "Book of Periods" with a 10 x 49 pattern from an apocalypse of jubilees transmitted under the name of Ezekiel. Both these sources are known from Qumran; only the former has been partially published. Chapters 106-107 of the Enoch compilation, borrowed from a separate work dealing with the birth of Noah, were already united with the "Letter" in a scroll copied late in the first century B.C.

The scroll just mentioned (4QEn^c) is that which yields (along with 4QEn Giants^a, written by the same scribe) the clearest evidence that the five sections listed above were treated as a two-volume composite work in pre-Christian times: section 1 apart because of its bulk, and sections 2 to 5 combined into a second scroll. Evidence drawn from George Syncellus establishes that this was still the arrangement known in Greek codices to the Christians of Egypt about A.D. 400. The regrouping of the parts into the order 2, "Parables" (instead of 3), 4, 1, 5, which produced the Ethiopic Enoch, is later, the origin of the last chapter (108) is unexplained.

See Also: QUMRAN COMMUNITY.

Bibliography: J. T. MILIK, "Problèmes de la Littérature hénochique à la lumière des fragments araméens de Qumrân," Harvard Theological Review 64 (1971) 333–378, with further references. J. T. MILIK and M. BLACK, The Books of Enoch, Aramaic Fragments of Qumrân Cave 4 (Oxford in press).

[P. W. SKEHAN]

ENTELECHY

In the usage of Aristotle, entelechy (Gr. 'εντελάεξεια, from 'εν τάελει 'εξειν, to have something in fulfillment; to be complete) is an analogical word. It has two most basic uses: (1) to designate the state of achievement or fulfillment that is like knowledge acquired and possessed (this is its first imposition); and (2) to designate the state of fulfillment, presupposing what is like knowledge possessed, that is like the actual entertaining or considering of knowledge possessed. For example, having acquired, and thus in possession of, knowledge of a geometric proof, one has fulfilled to some extent his natural capacity for learning. But he does not spend the rest of his life thinking through the steps of the proof. Actually thinking through the steps of the proof represents another and distinct sort of fulfillment. Before one has learned the proof, he is capable of learning it. Having learned the proof, he is capable of thinking through its steps. Corresponding to each of these two states of capability is a state of fulfillment, an entelechy. Knowledge possessed is simultaneously, but in different relations, both entelechy and capability. Actually thinking through the steps is impossible without knowledge possessed. This is why what is like knowledge possessed has been called first entelechy-first in an ontological sense, that without which something else cannot be or occur. This is also why what is like actually thinking through the steps has been called second entelechy. (See Aristotle, Anim. 412a 10-12; 417a 21-417b 2.)

Aristotle's purpose in distinguishing these two senses of entelechy was to make clear the sense of the first of his two common definitions of the SOUL: the first entelechy (actuality or ACT is a usual rendering) of a natural body having life potentially in it, i.e., of a natural organized body. The natural organized body of a living thing is related to its soul in the way in which man, taken as a knower, is related to knowledge possessed. The living thing, i.e., the compound of natural organized body and soul, is related to its vital operations (e.g., nourishing, sensing) in the way in which the knowing man, i.e., the compound of human knower and knowledge possessed, is related to actually thinking through the steps. Thus, the natural organized body of a living thing has a twofold entelechy: (1) soul, and (2) vital operations. Soul, being the ontologically prior, i.e., accounting for the ontological status of a living thing as living thing (this is why it is said to be a substantial form), and being that which vital operations presuppose and upon which they depend, is said to be the first entelechy of such a body; a vital operation, a second entelechy.

The suggestion of G. W. LEIBNIZ that his monads may be called entelechies, since they have in themselves a certain perfection consisting in their nonconscious perceptions, represents a usage differing from Aristotle's in that it designates something that is simple and also a substance. Aristotle's designates something simple, indeed; but something related to a substance, and not a substance itself.

Hans Driesch develops a notion of entelechy in the course of a lengthy argument against biological mechanism and for biological vitalism. Entelechy is an elemental agent in nature, over and above physical and chemical agents and configurations thereof, that in the realm of living things accounts for all the order in morphogenesis, and uses the genes as its means to account for inheritance. More generally, it directs life activities and everything material that is used in their performance. It is not a kind of energy, nor is it something quantitative, nor divisible, nor a force; it is not space, but has manifestations in space; it is substance, but only in the sense of what accounts for the ordered wholeness of a living thing; it is a cause, but only in an actual state, as actually accounting for wholeness (since it can also appear in a potential state). Driesch's concept of entelechy is clearly not incompatible with that of Aristotle; but whereas Aristotle's use of entelechy apropos of soul focuses on soul's function as the formal cause constituting a thing a living being, Driesch's can be said to focus on soul's function as efficient or agent cause in relation to the biological development and behavior of the living thing.

See Also: SOUL, HUMAN.

Bibliography: G. GIANNINI, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 1:1919–25. G. W. LEIBNIZ, The Monadology, in his Discourse on Metaphysics, Correspondence with Arnauld, and the Monadology, tr. G. R. MONTGOMERY (La Salle, Ill. 1962). H. DRIESCH, The Science and Philosophy of the Organism (2d ed. London 1929).

[J. BOBIK]

ENUMA ELISH

Babylonian epic of creation. It derives its name from the poem's opening words, enūma eliš (when on high). The poem, comprising seven tablets and slightly more than 1,000 lines, narrates the creation and battles of the gods, the creation of man, and the ordering of the cosmos. These themes, however, are subordinate to the poem's primary purpose: to explain how the god MARDUK, patron deity of BABYLON, attained his exalted position in the Babylonian pantheon. Because of its popularity and its annual solemn recital in the liturgy of the 4th day of the New Year's festival, the poem has survived in many copies and can be restored almost in its entirety.

Contents. Enuma Elish begins with a description of the cosmos as it was in the beginning: watery chaos, consisting of three elements—Apsu (the sweet waters), Tiamat (the salt water), and Mummu (probably the mist). From this chaos, with Apsu as father and Tiamat as mother, are born the gods Lahmu and Lahamu, who in turn beget gods as their children, have grandchildren, etc. The newly created gods enjoy lively and noisy gatherings, and their hilarity disturbs Apsu and Tiamat, who decide to destroy them. The wise young god Ea, however, learns of their scheme, weaves a spell over Apsu, and kills him, enslaving Mummu at the same time. Ea and his wife then establish their dwelling over the dead Apsu, and there their son Marduk, the hero of the epic, is born.

Meanwhile, some gods incite Tiamat to avenge the death of Apsu. She creates the tremendous army of monsters and places her second husband, Kingu, at its head. Ea, Anu, and Anshar, the three supreme gods, are powerless to overcome Tiamat and her host; and finally an assembly of the gods is called, in which young Marduk is proposed as their champion. Marduk accepts, on the condition that he, instead of the other gods, will henceforth decree all destinies and that his command will be supreme. The gods assent and invest him with the external insignia of kingship.

Marduk then ventures forth against Tiamat, with arrows of lightning, a net held by the four winds, and severe storms as his weapons. Kingu and his army withdraw, and Marduk and Tiamat are pitted in single combat. As she opens her jaws to devour him, he sends in winds to hold them open. Through her open mouth he then shoots an arrow that pierces her heart and kills her. From her dead body he makes the sky and then creates and sets in order the rest of the universe. Kingu is slain, and man is created from his blood by Ea (according to Marduk's plans). The gods are then assigned their various functions by Marduk; and they in return have Babylon and its temple, Esagila, built, where Marduk may reside in majesty. In conclusion, the great gods hold a banquet at which Marduk is seated on a throne, given the tablets of "destinies," and addressed by 50 titles expressing his supreme functions.

Origin. Unlike the GILGAMESH EPIC, Enuma Elish is apparently not derived from earlier Sumerian literary forerunners. It is a distinctly Babylonian creation and was composed in Akkadian sometime during the 2d millennium B.C. In most scholarly circles it is customary to assign the origin of Enuma Elish to approximately the reign of HAMMURABI (Hammurapi), i.e., the 18th century B.C., when the city of Babylon first rose to paramount political importance. The poem is usually viewed as theological underpinning for the rise of an upstart city to become the seat of a mighty empire and for the elevation of its hitherto obscure god to the head of the pantheon in place of the Sumerian god Enlil, who had ruled over the gods previously. Although fragments of the poem have been found in Kish, Uruk, NINEVEH, and Assur (where the Assyrian national god, Ashur, replaces Marduk as hero of the local version), none of these antedate the 1st millennium B.C.; but the faintly archaic language of the poem may be taken as indication of an earlier origin.

Several scholars, however, have presented plausible alternate approaches to the origin of Enuma Elish. W. G. Lambert, for instance, has shown evidence that Marduk was still a relatively minor god in the Babylonian pantheon until about the 13th century B.C. and that he rose to officially sanctioned preeminence only in the late 12th century under Nebuchadnezzar I, on the occasion of a great religious revival in Babylonia. T. Jacobsen, adducing parallels between the Ugaritic epics and Enuma Elish and noting that the sea-storm motif would be much more at home in Syria, has contended that the Babylonian epic—or at least prominent elements of its theomachy derived from the West Semitic world; he also views Enuma Elish as essentially a cosmogony (with Enlil originally as hero) and only secondarily (after the insertion of Marduk) revised into an apologia for Marduk.

The present state of the epic makes it difficult to adopt, unequivocally, any of these opinions. The original language of the poem is an artificial scribal tongue, thus hard to date precisely. Because of breaks in meter and rhythm at vital points in the verse, traces of extensive later revision may be detected—often to the detriment of the literary qualities of the epic; in this respect it is considerably inferior to the Gilgamesh saga. But it is difficult to date the alleged insertions, and definitive answers to the many problems of origin must await more explicit evidence.

Extra-Babylonian Parallels. Echoes of a primeval divine fight with monsters of the deep can also be found in the OT [e.g., Is 27.1; 51.9-10; Ps 88(89).10-12; Jb 26.12–13] and in Ugaritic literature. (See LEVIATHAN). Several other parallels between the Babylonian and OT cosmogony can also be found, e.g., the watery chaos (Akkadian Tiāmat, Heb. t^e hôm), the existence of light before luminaries, the formation of man as the culminating point of terrestrial creation. [See COSMOGONY (IN THE BIBLE)]. But, in general, the dissimilarities between the two accounts are more striking, especially the unequivocal monotheism and sublime grandeur of the Genesis tale as contrasted with the wrangling polytheism (or, at best, henotheism) of the Babylonian tale. The common motifs in creation stories might be explained on the basis of a background of common Semitic folklore or on the basis of known Babylonian literary influence on 2dmillennium Palestine-Syria (or, less plausibly, the reverse). Direct literary borrowing either way seems unlikely from the nature of the sources.

Bibliography: E. A. SPEISER, tr., "The Creation Epic," J. B. PRITCHARD, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (2d rev. ed. Princeton 1955) 60–72. A. HEIDEL, The Babylonian Genesis (2d ed. Chicago 1951). W. G. LAMBERT, "The Reign of Nebuchadnezzar I: A Turning Point in the History of Ancient Mesopotamian Religion," The Seed of Wisdom, ed. W. S. MCCUL-LOUGH (Toronto 1964) 3–13. H. FRANKFORT et al., Before Philosophy (pa. Baltimore 1959) 182–199.

[J. A. BRINKMAN]

ENVY

Envy is the culpable sadness or displeasure at the spiritual or temporal good of another. In popular usage envy is often not distinguished from jealousy, but jealousy implies a sense of right on the part of the jealous person to the exclusive possession of something. Jealousy, in spite of the pejorative connotation that is usually attached to the term, is not necessarily evil, so long as the right is well founded and the reaction to its violation is expressed in a reasonable manner. The desire of exclusive possession appears at first sight to enter into St. Thomas Aquinas's concept also of envy, for he says that envy makes the good of another an evil to oneself, inasmuch as it lessens one's own excellence (St. Thomas, Summa Theologiae, 2a2ae, 36.1). But the point is that the envious person is saddened not precisely because he feels his exclusive right is violated when another possesses the good he envies, but because he feels lessened and humiliated when another is more favored than himself.

Not all displeasure at another's good is sinful: the good may be undeserved, as when an unworthy person is advanced to a position of trust and responsibility; the good may create a nuisance to others, as when the boy next door acquires a bugle; the good may be harmful to the possessor himself, as when sudden affluence comes to a person lacking the virtue to make good use of it.

But if it is supposed that the good is a true good, to be pained or displeased at another's enjoyment of it is sinful. Envy springs from pride, vanity, and ill-regulated self-love. It is sinful because it is opposed to the benevolence essential to charity. Its gravity is dependent on the importance of the good that is envied. The worst envy is that which looks with displeasure upon the spiritual good of another, for such envy has an obviously diabolical character. Envy is a venial sin when it is concerned with trivial goods or when, as is often the case, it is indeliberate or imperfectly voluntary.

From the time of Origen, envy has regularly been numbered among the capital SINS; from it come hatred, calumny, detraction, and many types of malevolent behavior.

Some of the Fathers appear to have regarded envy as an incurable vice [e.g., St. Basil, Homilia de invidia, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 161 v. (Paris 1857–66) 31:373], or as one curable only by a miracle. However, this must be understood, not of the vice or sin, but of the propensity to envy that is inherent in concupiscence.

The vice of envy is best and most radically remedied by the curbing of the pride, vanity, and self-love from which it comes. Growth in fraternal charity will inevitably weaken the disposition to envy.

Bibliography: L. DESBRUS, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al., 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 5.1:131–134. É. RANWEZ, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.1:774–785.

[W. HERBST]

EOBAN, ST.

Anglo-Saxon missionary and bishop in the Netherlands; d. Dokkum, June 5, 754. Originally a messenger for St. BONIFACE, he later became his amanuensis. He was sent to England by Boniface, and later to Pope Zacharias by King Pepin III. Elevated to the rank of CHOR-BISHOP, he assisted Boniface in his responsibilities among the Frisians. He is sometimes alluded to as diocesan bishop of Utrecht or Maastricht in 753, although he is not listed in Gams Series episcoporum. He accompanied Boniface on the fateful last expedition among the Frisians, and was martyred with him at Dokkum. His relics, originally at Utrecht, were translated first to Fulda and then to Erfurt.

Feast: June 5.

Bibliography: A. M. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 2:283–284. W. LEVISON, England and the Continent in the Eighth Century (Oxford 1946), passim. T. SCHIEFFER, Winfrid-Bonifatius und die christliche Grundlegung Europas (Freiburg 1954) 167, 254, 272.

[J. L. DRUSE]

ÉON OF STELLA

Founder of the heretical Eonites (known also as Eons, Eudo, Euno, Evus); b. probably Loudéac, Brittany, 12th century; d. Reims, c. 1148. According to WILLIAM OF NEWBURGH, Éon was a simpleton who claimed that in the formula per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos, the word eum designated himself as sovereign judge and Son of God. After recruiting numerous followers, he was cited to appear before EUGENE III at the Synod of Reims (1148). He arrived armed with a forked staff. "When I raise this staff with its two prongs in the air," he explained, "God governs two-thirds of the world. When I turn it down, I command these two-thirds and God the remainder." Éon was condemned to prison and died soon after. He seems to have professed neither MAN-ICHAEISM nor the doctrines of the CATHARI. His opposition to the Church, especially to its wealth, his claim to divine filiation, and his advocacy of communism gained him a tremendous success among the destitute. The arrest and punishment of his followers-for their crimes rather than for their beliefs-in Brittany and Gascony marked the end of the "Eonite" heresy.

Bibliography: A. DE LA BORDERIE Histoire de Bretagne, 6 v. (Rennes 1905–14) v.3. T. DE CAUZONS, Histoire de l'Inquisition en France, 2 v. (Paris 1909–12) v.1. N. R. C. COHN, The Pursuit of the Millennium (London 1957). H. TÜCHLE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 3:1169–70. E. JARRY, Catholicisme 4:278–279.

[J. DAOUST]

EPARCHIUS, ST.

Monk and priest (called also Cybard); b. Périgord, France, c. 504; d. Angoulême, France, July 1, 581. In spite of parental opposition, he entered a monastery, perhaps Sessac in the Diocese of Saintes, while still young. He served there under Abbot Martin and gained a reputation for virtue and the gift of miracles. Out of humility he left the monastery and went to live in solitude near Angoulême, but his virtues were too well known, and the bishop obliged him to receive ordination to the priesthood. Although a recluse, he accepted disciples who were allowed to do no work or begging but, depending completely on providence, devoted themselves to prayer. GREGORY OF TOURS, the chief source of information, reported a considerable cult of Eparchius in the sixth century and noted that a church was built over his tomb.

Feast: July 1.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum July 1:97–104. GREGORY OF TOURS, Historia Francorum, bk. 6, ch. 8; De gloria confessorum ch. (101) 99. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 3: 4. R. AIGRAIN, Catholicisme 3:392–394. J. DE LA MARTINIEÈE, Saint Cybard, étude critique d'hagiographie (Paris 1908).

[B. CAVANAUGH]

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE

A New Testament letter traditionally regarded as sent by St. Paul to the Christian community in Ephesus. Two problems, especially perplexing, surround the study of the epistle, viz., its destination and its origin. Despite the title and the address in Eph 1.1, there are solid reasons for questioning its destination as the Ephesian community. The words "who are at Ephesus" are lacking in the two major codices, Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, in important papyri, and in some of the Fathers. Moreover, though purporting to come from Paul, who worked at Ephesus for a fairly long time (Acts 19), it contains no personal references to any of his friends there. Most scholars agree, therefore, that it was not originally written to the Ephesian church. But there is no agreement on the originally intended readers or on how the "Ephesian" tradition originated.

Contents and Doctrine. The introductory chapter contains a blessing (1.3-14) and a thanksgiving (1.15-23). In the body of the letter the christology of Colossians is further developed (2.1-3.21). The Church is viewed as a cosmic, universal entity; Christ as the head of the Church is the head of all creation. An important theme of the letter is the reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles (2.11-22), who form one humanity in the body of Christ. The emphasis is on sharing in the resurrection as a present reality rather than as a future hope. Following the exposition is a lengthy section of exhortation (4.1-6.20) that contains traditional materials—a list of vices (5.3-5) and a household code (5.21-6.9).

In content and vocabulary, Ephesians shows literary dependence on Colossians and on other epistles of the Pauline corpus. As in Colossians, the doctrine of Ephesians can be examined under the triple heading of Christ, the Church, and the Christian.

Christ. Colossians had already stated the cosmic dimensions of Christ's supremacy, both in the order of creation and in the order of redemption (Col 1.15-20). This is restated now, although more briefly: all things are to be "reestablished" in Christ (Eph 1.10). The term that is used (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι) means "to sum up" or "to bring together under one heading," indicating Christ as the source of unity through the one and same salvation. This bringing together in Christ necessarily involves the absolute supremacy of Christ, and the angelic orders are included (1.21). This had been a major point in Colossians, and despite the generally less polemical tone of Ephesians, one can note even here traces of a lack of sympathy with any who would question this doctrine. As in Colossians, $\pi\lambda\eta\omega\mu\alpha$ is applied also here to Christ (4.31), but not in the same way. It is always in relationship to the Church and is considered under that heading. Eph 4.10 states the reason for Christ's achieving the position of being the $\pi\lambda\eta\rho\omega\mu\alpha$: it consists in His descent into the lower regions and His consequent ascension into heaven. By this means He brought His redemptive presence into the whole of the universe.

The Church. The major emphasis of the epistle is on the understanding of the Church. As in Colossians, Christ is explicitly called the head of the Church (Col 1.18; Eph 1.22; 4.15; 5.23) and the Church referred to as the body of Christ (Col 1.18, 24; 3.15; Eph 1.22-23; 4.12, 16; 5.30), the reference in these cases being to the universal Church and not to the particular, local communities. Ephesians further develops the concept. Christ formed His "body" by making Jew and Gentile one through the cross (Eph 2.13-16), which destroyed the wall between them (a reference to the wall separating the court of the Gentiles from the court of the Israelites at the Temple of Jerusalem). It is Christ, too, who sees to the "building up" of his body, a process that is described in overflowing terms in 4.13-16. The image of head and body has evoked a wealth of other images that bring out the intimate union between Christ and the Church. It is because of this union that the word $\pi\lambda\eta\rho\omega\mu\alpha$ and its derivatives can be spoken of the Church, although it is difficult to know precisely what is meant in all of the cases. Christ fills the Church with all things so that she might attain "to the mature measure of the fullness of Christ" (4.13). In this way can the Church be called the "completion of him who fills all with all" (1.23), although the phrase can also be understood in the more restricted sense in which a "body" is the complement of the "head." Both the image and the insistence with which it is applied justify the conclusion that the writer was thinking of a real, organic, though spiritual, union between Christ and the Church and among the various members of the Church.

The intimacy of the union suggested by this image, in turn, evoked the image of a spouse and his bride to describe the relationship between Christ and the Church. The figure is a familiar one from the Old Testament (e.g., Hos 1-3; Ez 16) and is taken up in the New Testament by several writers (e.g., Mk 2.18-20 and parallels; Jn 3.29). Ephesians makes an explicit comparison between Christ's relationship to the Church and a husband's to his wife (5.21-33). Christ's love was such that He delivered Himself up for the Church "that he might sanctify her, cleansing her in the bath of water by means of the word . . .'' (5.25–26). Thus is the Church presented in ''all her glory, not having spot or wrinkle . . ." (Eph 5.27). While the writer was concerned in this section primarily with the ordinary husband-wife relationship, the introduction of the Christ-Church analogy has conditioned his whole presentation; the analogy is repeated several times (e.g., 5.24, 25, 29, 32). The climax of the passage, the quotation from Gen 2.24 about the man cleaving to his wife "and the two shall become one flesh," is used to describe the spiritual marriage of Christ and His Church (Eph 5.32). The epistle calls this teaching about the Church a "great mystery," i.e., a part of the whole design of God from the beginning, but hidden until now when it is revealed in Christ.

Ephesians uses still other figures to describe the Church. Eph 2.12-22 proposes a variety of images. In 2.12 the author says that his Gentile readers were at one time "excluded from the community $[\pi o \lambda i \tau \epsilon i \alpha]$ of Israel. . . .'' This is a reference to the theocratic state or commonwealth of the Old Testament that had God as its sovereign and that was to prepare for the coming kingdom of Christ and God (cf. Eph 5.5). Although the Church is not explicitly called a $\pi o \lambda \iota \tau \epsilon i \alpha$ in this passage, such an application can be inferred from the fact that the writer calls the Christians συμπολίται (fellow citizens) a little later (2.19); the term supposes that a new π oλιτεία, the Church with Christ at its head, has been constituted. In the same verse the Christians are said to be "members of God's household" (οἰκεῖοι τοῦ θεοῦ), a figure suggestive of a family and based on the adoptive sonship of Christians. The foundation of the household is the apostles and prophets; its chief cornerstone is Jesus Christ (Eph 2.20). The resulting structure is then identified as a "temple holy in the Lord" (2.21). This rich combination of images (see 1 Cor 3.10-17) is varied in Eph 4.12, 16, where the "building up" is applied to the "body of Christ." These passages take on greater significance in that the images are applied to the universal Church, not to the local church, as is generally the case in Paul's undisputed letters.

The universal character of the Church in Ephesians is most clear from 4.1-16, where the author pointed out three dangers that threaten the unity of the Church (Benoit). These are, first of all, the divisions that can rise up among Christians themselves (4.1-3). They must preserve unity because all Christians together make up "one body and one Spirit, even as you were called in one hope of your calling" (4.4). The unity in catholicity is most strikingly stated in the familiar words: "one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is above all, and throughout all, and in us all' (4.5-6). The second danger to unity is the variety of gifts within the Church (4.7–11). This variety must be seen as necessary to the perfect building up of Christ's body (4.12) and for the attainment of true unity (4.13). Here there is a strong argument for diversity in unity, even for the necessity of such diversity if true unity is to be attained. The final danger is heretical teaching (4.14) that could interfere seriously with "growing up in Christ" (Eph 4.15).

The Christian. The life of the Christian will be greatly influenced by this deeper understanding of the unity of the Church as expressed by the images of the body of Christ, the bride of Christ, the commonwealth and the household of God, the spiritual edifice, and the holy temple. A greater appreciation of the need for love should emerge (4.15-16; 6.23-24); and Christians have the perfect model and stimulus in the love that Christ has shown them (5.2, 25, 29), as well as in the love that the Father manifested in saving them through Christ (2.4-6). This love will be expressed in those virtues that regulate the conduct with one's neighbors (4.2); a further motive is presented in the Christian vocation itself, which is a great thing and calls for correspondingly great actions (4.1). In a fairly long ethical passage the author reminds Christians, first of all, that they are not to imitate the conduct of the Gentiles, since this is not in accord with Christian teaching (4.17-21). Rather, they are to put off the old person entirely, by which is meant anything that is reminiscent of the pagan past, and put on the new person, which means complete correspondence to the life of Christ (4.22–24). This will mean the avoiding of a large number of vices that the epistle lists (4.25-32). The ethical section is continued in chap. 5, which begins with the positive appeal to imitate God as His children and then goes on to show that immorality of any kind is incompatible with their status as "saints," "children of light," and "filled with the Spirit" (5.1–20). The writer is aware that it is no easy task to live such a life, but he urges his readers to make use of the extensive armor at their disposal. The passage illustrates the author's genius for making applications of ordinary material objects to the spiritual life (6.10-17).

In three passages in which the epistle deals with domestic morality, it urges the primacy of mutual subjection, something foreign to the pagan society of the time. Beyond the general attitude affecting the relationship of all Christians (5.21), there is a special one affecting that of husband and wife (5.22–33). On the part of the wife it is one of subjection to the husband (5.22). There is no doubt that this subjection would be understood differently in the social order of that day than in the present. That some aspect of this special relationship is essential to the married state seems demanded by the comparison with Christ's relationship to the Church (5.23–24). Once that comparison has been established, the writer uses it again to describe the mutual love between husband and wife as a basic element of the married life (5.25–33).

The second passage concerns children and parents, inculcating obedience on the part of the former and religious disciplining of the children on the part of the latter (6.1-4). The third passage outlines the mutual conduct of Christian masters and slaves. Although the epistle does not declare slavery to be intrinsically evil (such a judgment would have been almost impossible in the social order of that day), it does bring Christian principles into the picture reminding all parties of their responsibility to each other and that they are subject to a Higher Power (6.5–9). Again, these three passages have a parallel in Colossians (Col 3.18–4.1); but in Ephesians the treatment of husbands and wives has been greatly extended.

Time and Place of Writing. The author speaks of himself as a prisoner (3.1; 4.1). Scholars who suppose Pauline authorship, generally place provenance in Rome where Paul would have written it in the early 60s during his imprisonment. The Caesarean or an unrecorded Ephesian imprisonment have been suggested with less convincing arguments (for details, see CAPTIVITY EPISTLES). Those who deny Pauline authorship see the epistle as a much later document.

As to its destination, some suggest that it was intended as a circular letter for more than one Christian community (which would account for its strictly epistolary form and lack of personal greetings), or that it was addressed to a community that later became unworthy of it (suggested is Laodicea; cf. Rv 3.14–21; the address would then have been changed to a worthier candidate), or that an unknown author composed it. While none of these opinions can be absolutely excluded, neither can anyone of them be claimed as more probable at the present time.

Despite almost 18 centuries of unanimous, though uncritical acceptance of the Pauline authorship of Ephesians, modern scholars have proposed several serious arguments against it. (1) The vocabulary includes several words that are not used in the seven letters generally recognized as having been written by Paul, as well as an additional number of words that are rarely used by Paul or that are used by Paul with a different meaning. (2) The style is heavy and marked by redundance, unlike the vigorous, hurried style of Paul's letters. (3) The epistle shows a development of thought that is regarded as un-Pauline. (4) The striking surface similarity between Ephesians and Colossians is accompanied by unexplained differences in the meaning of common words and expressions. The last two points have led some scholars to suggest that an unknown author wrote the Epistle to the Ephesians as a summary of Paul's writings or as a conscious development of the doctrine in the Epistle to the Colossians.

Not all scholars find these arguments convincing, but acknowledge the influence of Pauline thought. Among the defenders of scholars who defend Pauline authorship are P. Benoit, L. Cerfaux, Markus Barth, F. F. Bruce, E. H. Maly, and P. T. O'Brien. Scholars who regard the letter as Deutero-Pauline include H. Conzelmann, M. Dibelius, J. Gnilka, E. J. Goodspeed, E. Käsemann, R. Schnackenburg, R. F. Collins, J. A. Fitzmyer, A. T. Lincoln, and M. Y. McDonald. The question of the origin of Ephesians, like that of its destination, remains without a certain solution.

Bibliography: P. J. KOBELSKI, The Letter to the Ephesians, in The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey 1990). E. J. GOODSPEED, The Meaning of Ephesians (New York 1933). K.-M. FISCHER, Tendenz und Absicht des Epheserbriefes (Göttingen 1973). A. VAN ROON, The Authenticity of Ephesians (Leiden 1974). R. SCHNACKENBURG, Der Brief an die Epheser (Neukirchen, 1982). P. BENOIT, "L'Horizon paulinien de l'épître aux Éphésiens," Revue biblique 46 (1937) 342–61, 506–25. H. SCH-LIER, Christus und die Kirche im Epheserbrief (Tübingen 1930). R. F. COLLINS, Letters That Paul Did Not Write: Letters to the Hebrews and the Pauline Pseudepigrapha (Wilmington 1988). A. T. LINCOLN, Ephesians (Dallas 1990). P. T. O'BRIEN, The Letter to the Ephesians (Grand Rapids 1999). M. Y. MACDONALD, Colossians. Ephesians (Collegeville 2000). For additional bibliography, see CAPTIVITY EPISTLES.

[E. H. MALY/M. P. HORGAN.]

EPHESUS, COUNCIL OF

The Third Ecumenical Council, held at Ephesus in Asia Minor in 431. This article deals with the council's history, its dogma, and its historical and doctrinal significance.

History. Following the difficulties provoked by the preaching of Nestorius against the title THEOTOKOS traditionally applied to the Virgin Mary (see NESTORIUS and NESTORIANISM), St. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, acting on a commission given him by Pope CELESTINE I and the Roman synod of Aug. 11, 430, journeyed to Ephesus to preside at the council convoked by the emperor THEODO-SIUS II (Nov. 11, 430) at the suggestion of Nestorius. St. Augustine, who had been personally invited, died on August 28 before the opening of the council. Celestine sent legates to preside over the council in his place (Epist. 16–19; April 7 and 15, 431), and they were to conduct themselves in accordance with Cyril's wishes.

By June 7, 431, the opening date of the council, many bishops, and particularly the Oriental partisans of Nestorius, had not arrived. Cyril, despite the protests of the bishops and the representative of the emperor, opened the council. The first session (June 22, 431), which was attended by about 150 bishops, approved the doctrine contained in Cyril's letter to Nestorius (Epist. 4) but not his 12 anathemas. It condemned the 'blasphemies'' of Nestorius; this action, in Cyril's report, was popularly cheered as a victory of the Lord over the enemies of the faith (Epist. 24). On June 26 JOHN OF ANTIOCH and the Oriental bishops arrived and, refusing to join Cyril's assembly, held a council of their own, which excommunicated and deposed Cyril and the bishop of Ephesus, Memnon. Informed of these happenings, Emperor Theodosius in a rescript of June 29 annulled the Cyrillan decisions of June 22.

Upon the arrival of the Roman representatives, the Cyrillan Council met again in their presence; and informed of what had transpired, they expressly approved and confirmed the condemnation of Nestorius, employing the authority of the Apostolic See (July 10–11). On the 16th they excommunicated John of Antioch and his adherents, including THEODORET OF CYR. On July 22 a final session forbade the composition of a formula of faith other than the Nicene Creed and renewed the condemnation of the errors of Nestorius.

In August an imperial rescript requested the bishops to return to their homes and declared that Nestorius, Cyril, and Memnon were deposed and were to be held in arrest. Both parties meanwhile sought the emperor's support. The Oriental bishops presented him with a formula of faith that acknowledged Mary as the Theotokos, but they sought in vain for the condemnation of the anathemas of Cyril. For his part Cyril approached powerful members of the court to whom he sent rich gifts. After a series of theological conferences at Chalcedon, Theodosius dissolved the council in September. Cyril escaped arrest and returned to Alexandria in triumph, while Nestorius was confined to a monastery near Antioch.

In April 433, after lengthy negotiations, Cyril and John of Antioch reached an agreement. John set forth the faith of the Oriental bishops, confessing that the Virgin Mary is the Theotokos, "because the Word of God has become flesh and is made man." In Christ the natures must be distinguished, but they must be united and assigned to one sole person (prosōpon). The Oriental bishops anathematized Nestorius and approved his deposition. Cyril joined in the profession of faith with enthusiasm, refrained thereafter from referring to the contested formula of the unique nature, and made no further mention of the anathemas (Epist. 38 and 39). Pope SIXTUS III, who had succeeded Celestine (July 31, 432), sent Cyril and John warm congratulations (Epist. 5 and 6; Sept. 17, 433).

To the question of which council was in truth the real council of Ephesus—that held by Cyril in such difficult circumstances or that of John and the Oriental bishops— Theodosius and some modern historians have attempted to give an answer by striking a balance between the two. Nevertheless, although Cyril did act in haste and with imprudence, he did not overstep the mandate entrusted to him by Celestine and Theodosius. The Roman emissaries joined him on their arrival; hence, it was Cyril's council and not John's that corresponded with the pope's intention, and that was approved by Sixtus III. Moreover the Church acknowledges the council of Cyril as the one that gave expression of its faith. Thus at the Council of Chalcedon (451) the fathers asserted adherence "to the ordinances and to all the doctrines of faith of the Holy Synod held long ago at Ephesus under the guidance of Celestine of Rome and Cyril of Alexandria" (Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum 2.1.2:127; and Leo, Epist. 93).

Dogma. The council had condemned Nestorius and his "impious preaching" in general terms; it did not desire to define or proclaim any other faith than that of Nicaea. But a positive expression of its belief was set forth in Cyril's letter, which was read and approved at the first session. Briefly stated, Cyril maintained that the Being (physis) of the Word has not undergone any change in becoming flesh. The Word is united according to the substance (hypostasis) to flesh animated by a rational soul. He is called the Son of Man, although He is so-called neither at one's mere will or one's good pleasure, nor by the assumption of a prosopon (person); the two natures are joined in a true union, and the two constitute one Christ and the one Son. The difference in natures is not suppressed by the union, but the indescribable meeting of divinity and humanity produces one sole Christ. The Word Himself was born of the Virgin and took to Himself the nature of His own proper flesh. It is not the nature of the Word that has suffered; but since His own body has suffered, it can be said that He has suffered and died for us.

There is one sole Christ and Lord, not that the Christian worships a man with the Word, but that he worships a one, only Christ. To reject the union according to the hypostasis is to speak of two sons. Scripture does not say that the Word is united to the prosopon of a man, but that the Word has become flesh. So the Fathers call Mary, the Mother of God, Theotokos. When these formulas are seen in the light of the Apollinarian debate and compared with the Christology of Antioch, they must be acknowledged as having a considerable bearing on what can legitimately pass for a definition by the Council of Ephesus.

Although this letter from Cyril to Nestorius (Epist. 17), with the anathemas, was read at the first session of Ephesus, it was not approved by the bishops. The anathemas cannot, then, be considered a solemn definition by the council. Nevertheless, in the entirety of the facts and context, and aside from certain formulas that were still in need of further precision, these anathemas represented the thought of the council. It was thus that the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE II (553) and the whole theological tradition thereafter understood them.

Regarding the maternity of Mary, the council did not give a dogmatic definition in a formal sense. Here again, however, account must be taken of the context and the atmosphere. "All this debate on the faith," says Cyril, "has only been engaged in because we were convinced that the Blessed Virgin is the Mother of God" (Epist. 39 to John of Antioch in 433). The letter of Cyril that the council adopted as the expression of its faith recalls the traditional use of the word Theotokos and explicitly teaches the divine maternity of Mary in intimate relationship with the mystery of the hypostatic union. Tradition is not wrong in seeing in the decisions of the council the equivalent of a definition.

Significance. Although it had been convoked by Theodosius at the request of Nestorius, the council that was supposed to condemn Cyril resulted in the defeat of Nestorius. To its convocation by the emperor, the pope gave his explicit consent and sent his legates to Ephesus. They were important. The council was in fact an almost exclusively Oriental assembly. Its ecumenical character was constituted by the presence of the Roman delegates, who represented both the Papal See and the Western episcopate whose judgment had been rendered in synod at Rome. Cyril acted more or less as the representative of Pope Celestine. When the delegates of the pope arrived, they intervened with full authority, and Philip the priest relates that all admitted that "the holy and blessed apostle Peter, prince and leader of apostles, column of the faith, foundation of the Catholic church, had received from Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Savior and Redeemer of mankind, the keys of the kingdom, and the power to bind or forgive sins. It is he who up to now and always lives and gives judgment through his successors." These expressions were repeated by Vatican Council I.

The council thus set forth a strong affirmation of the doctrinal authority of the bishop of Rome. It was he who confirmed the conciliar accomplishments. The letters of Sixtus III (Epist. 1, 2) to the Oriental bishops and to Cyril have almost the character of an official confirmation: "quaecumque sancta synodus, nobis confirmantibus, rejecit" (Whatever with our confirmation the holy synod rejected).

In the history of the dogma of the Incarnation, the Council of Ephesus marks a decisive milestone. It acknowledged and sanctified the theology of St. Cyril, the unity of the Incarnate Word, the union of two natures in the unique hypostasis whose difference is not suppressed by the union, the declaration that God the Word was born, suffered, and died in the flesh to which He was united. Certain of these formulas, which did not distinguish sufficiently between nature and hypostasis, were still in need of clarification, and the Orientals would always be tempted to look for APOLLINARIANISM in them, while Eutyches on his part would abuse them by seeing in Christ only one nature after the union. The Council of Chalcedon was to bring a useful counterbalance to the Cyrillan formulas without, however, putting an end to the argument. On the other hand, the divine maternity of Mary was agreed upon by all without discussion, and tradition has not been in error in seeing in the Council of Ephesus the triumph of the Theotokos.

In regard to the Conciliar Acts, Ephesus is the first council of which the original Acta are preserved. These are not the official Acta but individual collections, bringing together the verbal record of the meetings, documents of various kinds, letters, etc. The principal collection preserved was compiled under the direction of Cyril immediately after the council closed and has come down in three Greek collections, the Vaticana, the Segueriana, and the Atheniensis. They were translated into Latin as early as the beginning of the 6th century and were preserved in several collections, e.g., Turonensis, Palatina, Veronensis, Casinensis (Monte Cassino). A collection originating in Nestorian circles was translated into Latin by the deacon Rusticus (564-565) and has been preserved under the name Synodicum in the Casinensis. Other Latin collections also are known (Veronensis, Palatina). The Acts of Ephesus have been published in the older conciliar collections (such as Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 4–5); but they are now available in the edition of E. Schwartz, Acta Conciliorum Oecumenicorum, 5 v. (Berlin 1921-29), v. 1 Concilium Ephesinum.

Bibliography: SOCRATES, Historia ecclesiastica, 7.29–34; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857-66) 67:29-872. EVAGRIUS, Historia ecclesiastica, ch. 1.2-7, Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. MIGNE, 161 v. (Paris 1857-66) 86.2:2419-44. LIB-ERATUS OF CARTHAGE, Breviarium causae Nestorianorum et Eutychianorum (Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum 2.5; 1936) 98-141, c. 560, against the religious policy of Justinian. P. T. CAMELOT, Éphèse et Chalcédoine, v. 2 of Histoire des conciles oecuméniques (Paris 1962). Le Concile et les conciles (Chevetogne, Bel. 1960). R. DEVREESSE, "Les Actes du Concile d'Éphèse," Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques 18 (1929) 223-242, 408-431. P. GALTIER, Recherches de science religieuse 21 (1931) 169–199, 269-298. J. LEBON, "Autour de la Définition de la foi au Concile d'Éphèse," Ephemerides theologicae Lovanienses 8 (1931) 393-412. G. JOUASSARD, "Marie à travers la patristique," Maria: Études sur la Sainte Vierge, ed. H. DU MANIOR, 6 v. (Paris 1949–61) 1:71-216. É. AMANN, "L'Affaire Nestorius vue de Rome," Revue des sciences religieuses 23 (1949) 5-37, 207-244; 24 (1950) 28-52, 235-265, a Roman view of Nestorius. A. GRILLMEIER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 3:923-924. PIUS XI, "Lux veritatis" (Encyclical, Dec. 25, 1931) Acta Apostolicae Sedis 23 (1931) 493–517. P. L'HUILLIER, Church of the Ancient Councils: The Disciplinary Work of the First Four Councils (Crestwood, N.Y. 1995). V. LIMBERIS, "The Council of Ephesus: The Demise of the See of Ephesus and the Rise of the Cult of Theotokos," in Ephesos: Metropolis of Asia (Valley Forge, Pa. 1995) 321-340. G. GOULD, "Cyril of Alexandria and the Formula of Reunion," Downside Review 106 (1988) 235–252. W. H. C. FREND, The Rise of the Monophysite Movement (Cambridge, Eng. 1979), chs. 1 and 4.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

EPHESUS, ROBBER COUNCIL OF

After the condemnation of EUTYCHES by FLAVIAN at the Synod of Constantinople on Nov. 22, 448, THEODO-SIUS II, at the suggestion of the eunuch Chrysaphius, Eutyches himself, and DIOSCORUS of Alexandria, decided to call a council to rehabilitate Eutyches, depose Flavian, and "reaffirm the orthodox faith" against the Nestorians, that is, those who, like Theodoret, did not conform to the beliefs of Eutyches. Pope LEO I on invitation sent three legates to the council together with his Tome to Flavian (June 13, 449); in the tome he set forth in detail the Catholic doctrine on the mystery of the Incarnation.

The council opened at Ephesus on Aug. 8, 449. In his instructions to Dioscorus, to whom he entrusted the presidency of the council, Theodosius advised him that the assembly was not to add or take away anything from the faith as it had been set forth at the councils of NICAEA and EPHESUS. The bishops who had condemned Eutyches in 448 were present, but were prevented from taking part in the discussions.

Flavian was obviously in the role of the accused; and THEODORET OF CYR had been excluded from the council. In all about 130 bishops, carefully chosen from among the friends of Eutyches and the archimandrite Bar Sauma, an overzealous Cyrillian, accepted the leadership of Dioscorus while the adherents of Flavian were reduced to silence, and the three Roman legates, Julius, bishop of Pozzuoli, the deacon Hilary, and the notary Dulcitius, were handicapped by their lack of a knowledge of Greek.

Immediately at the opening of the council, Julius and Hilary, speaking through an interpreter, asked that the letter from the pope be read. Their request was evaded, and instead the Acts of the Synod of Constantinople at which Eutyches had been condemned were read, frequently interrupted by cries and protests of the bishops, who, at the suggestion of Dioscorus, threatened anathema to anyone who spoke of the two natures of Christ.

In the end, Eutyches was reinstated, and after the Roman representatives twice more in vain demanded that the Tome of Leo be read, Dioscorus proposed the deposition of Flavian and of Eusebius of Doryleum. Flavian protested as did the Roman deacon, Hilary, who shouted "contradicitur"; a great uproar broke out as the soldiers and the crowd invaded the basilica and disposed of the resistance of the minority by force. When order was restored, the bishops agreed to depose Flavian and Eusebius. Flavian was sent into exile and died en route. A second session on August 22 dismissed other bishops suspected of Nestorianism—viz, Theodoret of Cyr, Ibas of Edessa, and DOMNUS OF ANTIOCH. The Eutychian party triumphed and the doctrinal agreement between Cyril of Alexandria and John of Antioch reached in 433 was repudiated. On being informed of what had transpired at Ephesus by his deacon Hilary, who had escaped capture and brought an appeal from Flavian, Pope Leo in a local Roman Synod of Sept. 29, 449, denounced the decisions of what he later termed the latrocinium or Robber Synod of Ephesus (Epistles 95 of July 20, 451).

Bibliography: Acta conciliorum oecumenicorum (Berlin 1914–) 2.1.1:68–101; 2.3.1:42–91. P. T. CAMELOT, Das Konzil von Chalkedon: Geschichte und Gegenwart, eds. A. GRILLMEIER and H. BACHT, v. 3 (Würzburg 1951–54) 1:213–242. H. BACHT, ibid., 2:197–231.

[P. T. CAMELOT]

EPHPHETA

An Aramaic word spoken by Jesus in the cure of the deaf-mute of Decapolis (Mk 7.31-37). The Greek Gospel text gives ἐφφαθά (7.34), a transliteration of the Aramaic 'etpetah or 'etpattah or of the Hebrew hippātah (from the Semitic root pth, to open), which Mark translates as διανοίχθητι, "be thou opened." The word is accompanied by sacramental gestures: Jesus touches the man's tongue with spittle and puts His fingers into his ears. The actions of Jesus and His word of command are as a Sacrament, symbolizing the effects to be produced by the divine power using the sacred humanity as an instrument. Hence, it is not surprising to find the Ephpheta ceremony (as it was called from early times) among the rites prescribed by the church in the administration of baptism of infants: with some variations, the ministering priest repeats the actions of Christ and pronounces the solemn Ephpheta.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 674. I. RABINOWITZ, "'Be opened' = 'Εφφαθά (Mark 7.34): Did Jesus speak Hebrew?'' Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der äteren Kirche 53 (1962) 229–238. F. PRAT, Jesus Christ: His Life, His Teaching, and His Work, tr. J. J. HEENAN, 2 v. (Milwaukee 1950) 1:399–400. V. TAYLOR, ed., The Gospel according to St. Mark (London 1952) 355.

[A. LE HOULLIER]

EPHRAIM

The younger son and younger tribe of Joseph. Situated in the fertile hill-country between Benjamin and the other Joseph tribe, Manasseh, the tribe of Ephraim (Heb. 'epraim, from root meaning fruitful) was, in the early history of Israel, one of the most numerous and powerful tribes, important for its religious sanctuaries and prime mover in establishing the Northern Kingdom; yet, despite early superiority, Ephraim's leadership of the north was clearly supplanted by Manasseh as early as the 9th century. This article treats in order Ephraim's occupation of the land and its historical role.

Occupation of the land. The Elohist tradition, obviously interested in Ephraim, records how Jacob mistakenly blessed the younger brother in precedence over his older brother Manasseh (Gn 48:5-20). The brothers were the eponymous ancestors of the two Joseph tribes, their double character making up for the tribe of Levi, which received no territory, and thus preserving the classical number 12. The census numbers given for Ephraim and Manasseh in Nm 26:34, 37, as contrasted with those given in Nm 1:33, 35, and the account of Joshua's allotment of territory to Ephraim in a literary context that accords primacy to Manasseh (Jos 16:4; 17:1), reflect Ephraim's later, secondary status, hardly in agreement with its early hegemony (see Phythian-Adams, 231–232). At the Israelite conquest of Canaan, Ephraim gained possession of the strategically located section of northcentral hill country bounded by Manasseh on the north, Benjamin and Dan on the south, and extending from the Jordan to the sea (Jos 16:1-9). Strength of numbers led the powerful and warlike Ephraim (Jos 17:14-18) to encroach northward against Manasseh and southeastward to the Canaanite city of Gezer, whose inhabitants they subjected to forced labor and eventually absorbed into the tribe (Jos 16:10; Jgs 1:22–26, 29). The territory is one of the most fruitful in Palestine, as is reflected in its name and in the blessings of Jacob's Oracles (Gn 49:22-26) and Moses' Oracles (Dt 33:13-17).

Historical role. Its access to major zones of movement, superior position in the hill country, and military prowess cast Ephraim in the warrior's role in Israelite history. In the period of occupation Ephraimites fought under Aod against the Moabites (Jgs 3:27), under DEBO-RAH and Barak against the Canaanite coalition (Jgs 5:14), and under GIDEON against the Madianites (Jgs 7:24). This last episode nearly ended in internal strife because of the insult offered to the martial pride of some Ephraimites (Jgs 8:1-3). A similar incident involving the Judge Jephthah during the Ammonite war erupted into open conflict that resulted in severe Ephraimite losses (Jgs 12:1-6). Ephraim also contributed the Judge Abdon to Israelite history (Jgs 12:13). The presence of the ark at the central shrines of BETHEL and Shiloh further enhanced Ephraimite prestige during this period, as did the renown of Samuel, last of the Judges and reluctant inaugurator of the monarchy (Jos 18:1; Jgs 20:27; 1 Sm 1:1; 4:3). In the political friction after Saul's death (c. 1000 B.C.), the Ephraimites remained faithful to his son Is-Baal until his assassination, whereupon they offered their allegiance to David at Hebron (2 Sm 2:9; 5:1; 1 Chr12:30).

The secessionist movement of the northern tribes after Solomon's death (c. 922 B.C.) took root in Ephraim, the Prophet Ahijeh instigating Jeroboam I (both Ephraimites) to make the irrevocable break with Judah (1 Kgs 11:26–40). The sheer size and strategic location of Ephraim and Manasseh made them the nucleus of the Northern Kingdom, whose first capital was SHECHEM (1 Kgs 12:25). Despite their alliance, there seems to have been a bitter rivalry between the two (Is 9:20-21), which probably was rooted in the disputes that arose in occupying the land (Jos 17:14-18; see Phythian-Adams, 229-230), and was perhaps reflected in the swift succession of kings and internal instability of the Northern Kingdom. While the subsequent history of the divided monarchy depicts Manasse in the predominant role in the North until its downfall in 721 B.C., early Ephraimite influence was so profound as to make its name synonymous with the Northern Kingdom, Israel, a fact amply attested in prophetic literature (Is 7:2, 5, 8, 17; 9:8; Jer 31:9, 20; Ez 37:16, 19; Hos passim).

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 674–675. W. J. PHYTHIAN-ADAMS, "The Boundary of Ephraim and Manasseh," Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly (1929) 228–241. E. ROBERTSON, "The Period of the Judges: A Mystery Period in the History of Israel," The Bulletin of the John Rylands Library 30 (1946) 91–114. K. D. SCHUNCK, "Ophra, Ephron, and Ephraim," Vetus Testamentum 11 (1961) 188–200.

[R. BARRETT]

EPHREM THE SYRIAN, ST.

Theologian, exegete, and Doctor of the Church; b. NISIBIS, in Mesopotamia, c. 306; d. EDESSA, June 373.

Life. Born into a pagan family (though some sources call his parents Christian), Ephrem was baptized at the age of 18 or 28 by the ascetic Bp. (St.) James of Nisibis (303–338), whose influence on his early life was profound. Even more significant was the influence of James' second successor, Vologeses (346–361), with his blending of asceticism and culture; in this period Ephrem was already a famous teacher in the School of Nisibis.

When the Christian Emperor Jovianus was compelled to cede Nisibis to the Persians after the defeat of JULIAN THE APOSTATE (363), Ephrem emigrated with many other Christians to Edessa, where he continued to teach, and became a friend and counselor of Bishop Barses. The exceptical School of Edessa, intermediate in

		No. A State of the
1	A CARLON	poster and and
manala con en	and we have	and a share a share
mindues al mer	Low sound	Labor Levis . France
- He was the care	Leaver da Lever wer	- ALES - MALEYS FRI MA
the manual traders	נביר המלידה המנינההו איייי	upper and - and center to me the	rinke ann Art	Processing Prant len letter land.	ce for formy. In	D.o. House .o.
inni finiti	reducing estendos and	CRAV "CRICE >D
Plan isin isin	in more in along	יון איייאנצי הנבצה ון.
-line mo con -mil.	PLAN . Additionary	were his were miners and takes	and alling and	- Advision and a second
Cipenen mangas	clearthin in who	trapus Jalidider
mi novina ans	Les System celly	· caregos - was - for ane server and margi	CARLAGIANA . FRENDAN	the with the sender
contrain where	FRAN - AND FARMERS	Ronard
ast + manifes	· reason - and raters	הנפנטלי כאי אביי
Entrein when an	And they dear	הנינים כא שלי
Stanp - Proto	דבוורדי, פרי הבוואד	inclus . muses cause
male mun parmes	הנובסולבין מסירי	-ins mi sento
mp. rading in	Tres an Proficience	יישיישייי יאיי יביום
ni ninistion mis	PREAM PRODUCT LANGER	receiring-menury ribin rices are	FATANA LOL STORM	See a bring
- handler	encing we lun	. realins in reason
entiretaria dia	CELENCE - TTURE	in the call of setal for the	TYLD - BAR. BUK	reaction any means repairs los lourship	enploinen. un	action action winds cure proin sheer	HONE -LINES OF	2000 - 2000 - 200 - 2000 - 2000 - 20000 - 2000
can ad faces	F	. T
the state of the state	and a day would be	and the state for rives an mint		tan des ernes
and anis mandain	Projects and the posts	perseef. In energy
The second in the states	- an rat an realans	Lanices and rise
למבלא הנייניי גבייאיו למים - ממסלאי בי		reaucing acorden.
MANDS PALATA Part		Pagement lanicem
Less - cuceta ala	marball als aff.	Wir THAL FRAM
Elifen lann ann lains	The of the marking	THE TA. OTHERS
בכבלבה היושות מחרים	-101 LODI E:217	Lacino - cel Poicio .
FLAD CRIDD DURING ALLA	STUR. LETT CILLETS	Lie more currer
Leoper Planting	LOLON HAR MAD AL	ce las epays more
	ייה היה היאלה בשונהוהי	Are really in
ALLENS ALL PLATE THE	100 98713 79.000	the united a prime
	the anter and	A STATE OF THE OWNER
	Too anyon col	duriam celelamon
Prove and and a state of the st	and agent an and a secondary of
0		· · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·

Folio dated 522 of hymns and other writings of St. Ephrem the Syrian (Cod. Vat. Syr. 111, fol. 21v).

method between Antiochene literalism and Alexandrian typology, owes to him its glory and perhaps even its foundation. Ordained a deacon, possibly by James of Nisibis, he apparently never became a priest, and by feigning madness managed to escape episcopal consecration. The Church historian SOZOMEN emphasized Ephrem's reserve in dealing with women and a self-control that made it possible for him to dominate a natural irascibility.

Doctrine. Some historical significance is attached to Ephrem's works against heresies; e.g., the second volume of the Syriac works contains 56 hymns against Marcion, Bardesanes, and Manes, while the third volume has 87 hymns against the "investigators," i.e., skeptics, especially the Arians and Anomeans. More importantly, the hymns and discourses are of interest for the history of dogma. Ephrem's doctrine on man's last end is perfectly orthodox: a particular judgment that fixes the soul's destiny after death; purgatory; and the eternity of hell's punishments. But, like most of the Christian writers down to Pope BENEDICT XII, he saw the souls of the just awaiting the resurrection in a sort of sleep, not enjoying beatitude before the body's resurrection. His forceful, realistic description of the Last Judgment inspired DANTE.

Remarkable as a devotee of the Virgin Mary, Ephrem extoled her cult and believed in her Immaculate Conception. Other dogmas that find support in him are original sin, free will and its harmony with divine grace, the primacy of Peter, intercession of the saints, and the Real Presence. An antiphon (No. 48) recovered in Armenian reveals the Trinity, especially the Spirit, at work in bringing the glorified humanity of Christ under the Eucharistic species. Our Lord, through the Father's right hand, i.e., the Holy Spirit, is in the Eucharist, and through the Eucharist is in men's hearts, without diminution, in His entirety, adapting Himself to their littleness. For Ephrem, as for many of the Eastern Fathers, the Eucharistic consecration, as well as the Incarnation and Redemption, is the work of the whole Trinity.

Works. Ephrem's literary legacy is still in an early stage of scientific exploration. The edition of J. S. and S. E. Assemani (6 v.: three for the Greek works, three for the Syriac, with Latin translation; Rome 1732-46) is incomplete and inexact, while T. J. Lamy's edition (4 v., Syriac works; Mechlin 1882–1902) omits the works in Assemani. E. Beck undertook a critical edition, with German translation, of the Syriac works in the Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium series, which includes the hymns on faith (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium [Paris-Louvain 1903] 154/Syr. 73; 155/Syr. 74), against heresies (169/Syr. 76; 170/Syr. 77), on paradise or against Julian (174/Syr. 78; 175/Syr. 79), on the Nativity and Epiphany (186/Syr. 82; 187/Syr. 83), and on the Church (198/Syr. 84; 199/Syr. 85). C. Tonneau edited the commentaries on Genesis and Exodus (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium [Paris-Louvain 1903] 152-153). The edition of the Greek works by S. G. Mercati produced only one fascicle (Rome 1915). Of the Armenian Ephrem (see below), L. Leloir reedited the commentary on the Diatessaron with a Latin translation (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium [Paris-Louvain 1903] 137 and 145).

Syriac Ephrem. The authentic works in Syriac are the hymns (on faith, against heresies, on virginity, on the Church, on paradise, on the crucifixion), the Carmina Nisibena (ed. C. Bickell, Leipzig 1866), some sermons (on faith, on our Lord), and some commentaries (Genesis, Exodus, etc.). Theodoret testifies (Hist. eccl. 4.29.3) that Ephrem's hymns ''lent luster to the Christian assemblies,'' and Sozomen reports (Hist. eccl. 3.16.7) that the Christians sang them to the music of Harmonius, son of Bardesanes.

Greek Ephrem. Here much is spurious, but certain items are literal translations of Syriac originals that may well stem from Ephrem. Sozomen affirms (Hist. eccl. 3.16.2) that "the Greek translations, which began in his lifetime, lose little if any of their original force." The defects of the Greek text—doublets, long and short recensions, interpolations, and omissions—are common to the Syriac. The Greek is ancient, for citations of Greek Ephrem appear in the sixth century. Mme. D. Hemmerd-inger–Iliadou distinguishes carefully (1) texts with a Syriac original, (2) texts that offer readings from the Diatessaron, (3) texts that cite apocrypha and agrapha, and (4) items in meter.

Latin Ephrem. Very old, this represents a state of text less reworked than the Greek manuscript tradition.

Armenian Ephrem. To this we are indebted, above all, for the commentaries on the New Testament (the Diatessaron, Acts, Pauline Epistles), but also for poems that are often important for the history of dogma.

For the Georgian, Slavic, Coptic, Arabic, and Syro-Palestinian versions, see J. Kirchmeyer, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. Viller et al. (Paris 1932-) 4.820-822.

Feast: Jan. 28 (Eastern Church); June 18 (Western Church).

Bibliography: Textes arméniens relatifs à S. Ephrem, 2 v., ed. L. TER-PÉTROSSIAN (Louvain 1985). E. BECK et al., Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VIL-LER et al. (Paris 1932-) 4.788-822; Die Theologie des Hl. Ephrem in seinen Hymnen über den Glauben (Studia anselmiana 21; 1949); "Die Mariologie der echten Schriften Ephrems," Oriens Christianus 40 (1956) 22–39; Ephräms Polemik gegen Mani und die Manichäer im Rahmen der zeitgenössischen griechischen Polemik und der des Augustinus (Louvain 1978); Ephräms des Syrers Psychologie und Erkenntnislehre (Louvain 1980); Ephräms Trinitätslehre im Bild von Sonne/Feuer, Licht und Wärme (Louvain 1981); Dorea und Charis; Die Taufe: zwei Beiträge zur Theologie Ephräms des Syrers (Louvain 1984). S. P. BROCK, The Luminous Eye: The Spiritual World Vision of Saint Ephrem (Rome 1985, rev. ed. Kalamazoo, Mich. 1992). C. M. EDSMAN, Le Baptême de feu (Uppsala 1940). P. FÉGHALI, Les origines du monde et de l'homme dans l'oeuvre de saint Ephrem (Paris 1997). S. H. GRIFFITH, Faith Adoring the Mystery: Reading the Bible with St. Ephraem the Syrian (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1997). M. HOGAN, The Sermon on the Mount in St. Ephrem's Commentary on the Diatessaron (Bern 1999). JACOB OF SERUG, A Metrical Homily on Holy Mar Ephrem, critical ed. of Syriac text, tr. J. P. AMAR (Turnhout, Belgium 1995). U. POSSEKEL, Evidence of Greek Philosophical Concepts in the Writings of Ephrem the Syrian (Louvain 1999). S. SCHIWIETZ, Das morgenländlische Mönchtum, v.3 (Mödling bei Wien 1938) 93-179. A. VÖÖBUS, Literary, Critical, and Historical Studies in Ephrem the Syrian (Stockholm 1958); History of Asceticism in the Syrian Orient, 2 v. (Corpus scriptorum Christianorum orientalium 184, 197; 1958-60). P. YOUSIF, L'Eucharistie chez saint Ephrem de Nisibe (Rome 1984). A. PALMER, "The Merchant of Nisibis: Saint Ephrem and His Quest for Union in Numbers," Early Christian Poetry, J. DEN BOEFT and A. HILHORST eds. (Leiden 1993), 167-233. S. H. GRIFFITH, "Images of Ephraem: The Syrian Holy Man and His Church," Traditio 45 (1989-1990): 7-33.

[É. DES PLACES]

EPICLESIS

Liturgy has a dialogical structure, originating in the divine activity within the life of faith. This gift of faith is the source of the Church's expression of praising remembrance of God's deeds in Christ, that grounds the confident petition for God's continuing bestowal of His blessings. The epicletic, or intercessory, aspect reflects the goal of all forms of Christian liturgical activity and is beginning to receive the attention it deserves in the theology of worship.

In ancient pagan and Christian literature, epiclesis signifies the invoking of a name (in a liturgical context the name of God) upon a person or thing. The most ancient Christian liturgical epiclesis is that found in all baptismal formulas in which the names of the Three Persons of the Blessed Trinity are invoked over the catechumen. Other forms of epiclesis are found in the rites of Confirmation, Ordination, and the blessing of the baptismal font. This entry discusses the historical and theological dimensions of the epiclesis in the Eucharist.

Term. The principal elements found in the Eucharistic epiclesis as gathered from the various liturgical texts are (1) a simple invocation to God, (2) a petition that God the Father send down the Holy Spirit, (3) a petition that the Holy Spirit transform the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, (4) a similar petition that the Holy Spirit apply to the faithful the sanctifying fruits of the Eucharist. Often only one or another of these elements is present in the two predominant types of Eucharistic epiclesis: one, a consecratory formula; the other, an application of the sanctifying effects of the Eucharist to the faithful. While the consecratory epiclesis-an invocation to the Holy Spirit to change the elements into the Body of Christ-does not seem to exist in the classical Roman liturgy, it is found in other Latin liturgies, such as the Mozarabic and the Gallican. But in the Eastern liturgies, especially the predominant BYZANTINE rite as typified by the liturgies of St. Basil and St. John Chrysostom, it is fairly universal. The other type of epiclesis, in the sense of an application of the Eucharistic effects, seems to have been the earlier.

Place in the Eucharist. In the Eastern liturgies, the epiclesis follows the Lord's words of institution. In the most widespread Byzantine liturgy of St. John Chrysostom the epiclesis reads: "And we pray and beseech and entreat You, send down Your Holy Spirit upon us and upon these gifts lying before us. And make this bread the precious Body of Your Christ. Amen. And that which is in the chalice the precious Blood of Your Christ. Amen, Changing them by Your Holy Spirit. Amen, amen, amen." The place of the Eastern epiclesis is more logical because it follows the actual historical development of the mysteries as recounted in the same order of events in the Creed. But liturgical development has never been uniform nor always logical, as may be seen in the lack of such a consecratory epiclesis after the words of institution in the Roman rite. There are five highly disputed opinions about whether there is an epiclesis and where it is placed in the classical Roman canon: (1) there is no epiclesis in the Roman Mass, (2) the Quam oblationem is the epiclesis coming before the words of institution, (3) the Supplices te rogamus is the epiclesis coming after the Consecration through the words of institution, (4) both these are forms of epiclesis, (5) a silent epiclesis occurs in the mere gesture of imposition of hands at the Hanc igitur.

Controversy. The early Fathers of the East, in fighting SABELLIANISM and other heretical tendencies of subordinationism, including later attacks against the divinity of the Holy Spirit, stressed the distinction between the Three Persons in the Blessed Trinity. In the Eucharistic Anaphoras of the East, afflicted by heresies against the divinity of the Holy Spirit, there arose an emphasis on the attribution to the Third Person of the power to consecrate and sanctify. Both actions were viewed as fruits of the Eucharist, which had a reference equally well to the faithful as to the gifts offered on the altar. Both in the Eastern liturgies and in the writings of theologians, such as Cyril of Jerusalem (d. 386), Gregory of Nyssa (d. 394), Pseudo-Chrysostom, Theophilus of Alexandria (d. 412), and John Demascene (d. 749), proof can be found of this attribution of consecratory power to the Holy Spirit. But only under the influence of Nicolas Cabasilas (d. 1363) and of Simeon of Thessalonica (d. 1429) did a controversy arise when the Latins attacked the Greeks for holding that the prayer of epiclesis after the words of institution was necessary for consecration. The Latins maintained that the words of institution sufficed. In the reunion council at Florence (1438), John Torquemada (d. 1468), Bessarion (d. 1472), and Isidore (d. 1463), metropolitan of Kiev, tried to reconcile the two opinions. All but Marcus of Ephesus accepted the Latin position that the Sacrament was realized by the Lord's words alone. Marcus pushed Cabasilas's position to the extreme, holding that the words of institution were merely narrative, but the epiclesis was the sole formula of transubstantiation. In the following centuries this became one of the many polemics between the Christian East and West.

In the beginning, the Church was not concerned with the exact point at which transubstantiation took place. The Eucharistic Anaphora was considered as a unity. Later, with the suppression of any consecratory epiclesis in western liturgies and with greater speculation in the West, there was a tendency to define the importance of each prayer of the canon. In the decree of reunion with the Armenians and Jacobites at the Council of Florence (1439–45) there was no question of the epiclesis, but it was stated that the words of institution were the form effecting transubstantiation (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1320, 1352). A similar decree was issued by the Council of Trent (ibid. 1654). In 1729 Pope Benedict XIII wrote to the Melkites: "Not through the invocation of the Holy Spirit but by the words of consecration [i.e., words of institution] is transubstantiation effected." The thesis of Prince Maximillian of Saxony, which tried to reconcile the two theories—the words of institution would be the necessary form for the Latin Church; the epiclesis would suffice for the Eastern Church—was condemned by Pius X in 1910 (ibid. 3556).

Theological developments since Vatican II. Since the conclusion of the Second Vatican Council, Catholic theologians have attempted to work out the full implications of the dialogue structure, and essentially epicletic nature, of all forms of liturgy: a structure and content that mirror and actualize the covenant relationship between God and the Church, founded on Christ. This entails the rethinking of the christological dimension of worship that is essential for any systematic explanation of the full scope of the theology of Christian liturgical-sacramental activity. There is also the problem of the theological integration of the role of the Holy Spirit into the liturgy so that the complementarity of the activity of Christ and the Holy Spirit is made more understandable. Both the christological and pneumatological aspects are involved in the current discussion on the subject of the theology of liturgy in general, and the epicletic dimension of liturgicalsacramental celebrations in particular.

Traditional Eucharistic prayers. The traditional Eucharistic theologies of the East and West agree that the sanctifying action of the Holy Spirit changes the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, and that the properly disposed participants of Holy Communion are fully united to Christ through the sanctifying action of the Holy Spirit. All classical Eucharistic Prayers reflect this theology of sanctification by including a twofold invocation: for the sanctification of the bread and wine, and the communicants.

Traditional Eastern Eucharistic Prayers invoke the Father to send the Spirit to change the gifts and the community, while the old Roman Eucharistic Prayer appeals only to "God." This difference between the two traditions no longer remains since the introduction of the epiclesis of the Spirit in the new Eucharistic Prayers of the Roman Missal of Paul VI. However, divergent theological interpretations of the role of the special epiclesis of the Eucharistic Prayer, carried on within the Byzantine Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches since the Middle Ages, have not been fully resolved at the level of official teaching. Nevertheless, there are hopeful signs that theologians of the two traditions are working toward a consensus over important aspects of this matter. In this regard, developments on the subject of the agent of the divine activity, the role of the presiding minister of the liturgy, and the more recent investigations of the liturgical-theological structure of the Eucharistic Prayer may be singled out for special mention.

Divine Agent of Sanctification. Traditional Western scholastic theology attributes the work of sanctification to the Godhead as such, and "appropriates" it to the Holy Spirit, that is, insofar as the name "Spirit" evokes the concept of sanctification. In other words, the Holy Spirit is not considered to have a personal mission of sanctification in the Church. There is only the one personal mission of the Word, begun at the Incarnation, and continuing in the Church. From this point of view, the mystery of the transformation of the Eucharistic gifts is attributed to the action of Christ, consecrating the bread and wine, and to the action of the Holy Trinity as such, changing the elements into Christ's Body and Blood. This explanation is still favored in some influential Catholic theological circles.

Traditional Eastern theology, on the other hand, affirms that the Holy Spirit has a personal mission of sanctification in the Church. In virtue of this mission, the Spirit applies the words of Christ to each Eucharist by transforming the elements into Christ's Body and Blood.

The Liturgical Leader. Traditional Eastern and Western theologies agree that through ordination the priest obtains the authority from Christ to act as his representative in the special ministry. Both agree that the priest acts as representative of the Church in the exercise of his ministry. Therefore, both agree that what the priest does in the whole of the Eucharist is done as representative of Christ and the Church.

However, modern Orthodox theology explains that the priest, who presides at the liturgy, always acts directly as the Church's representative in all his official activity. In this way he indirectly represents Christ, the true High Priest of the liturgy of His Church. Consequently, the priest speaks the narrative of institution of the Eucharist as representative of the Church, and thereby as representative of Christ, who relates his words, spoken once for all at the Last Supper, to each Eucharist.

Western theology also holds that the priest always acts as representative of Christ and the Church in all liturgical activity. However, developments in theological reflection on the Eucharist since the 12th century resulted in a new view of how the priest represents the Church and Christ in this liturgy. According to traditional Western scholastic theology, in the rest of the Eucharistic celebration, before and after the recitation of the words of Christ, the priest directly represents the faith of the Church, and indirectly Christ, the Head. At the recitation of Christ's words, the priest directly represents Christ, and thereby indirectly the Church, insofar as Christ is the Head of the Church. This explanation was favored by Pius XII in his encyclical letter Mediator Dei (1947).

From this latter standpoint an epiclesis for the sanctification of the gifts is superfluous after the words of institution. Also the epiclesis before these words cannot be considered an integral sacramental moment of the sanctification of the bread and wine. It represents the desire of the Church, uttered in the name of Christ, for what takes place when the Christ speaks His own words of consecration. Orthodox theology, on the other hand, requires that the epiclesis be considered an integral sacramental moment of the sanctification of the gifts. Both the words of Christ and the epiclesis, taken together, are the sacramental representation of the mystery of the Eucharist. The one expresses the conviction of faith that Christ relates His words of institution to each Eucharist; the other that the Holy Spirit, working with divine and sovereign freedom, applies the words of Christ to the gifts of the Church.

Toward a consensus. There are indications that Orthodox and Roman Catholic theologians are beginning to transcend traditional differences in the theology of the Eucharistic epiclesis.

Orthodox Theology. Leading Orthodox theologians are drawing out more clearly the implications of the active presence of the Risen Lord in the Eucharist. They readily agree that Christ Himself includes the petition of the Church for the coming of the Holy Spirit in His "eternal intercession." Likewise, they make their own the opinion of John Chrysostom, mediated by Nicholas Cabasilas (14th century), that the words of Christ, recorded in the narrative of the Last Supper, are a formula of consecration that retains its power in the present.

Roman Catholic Theology. In modern times Catholic theology has displayed a singular interest in the theology of the Holy Spirit. One of the results has been a growing consensus concerning the personal mission of the Holy Spirit, and the application of this pneumatology to the Eucharist in a way that conforms to the Orthodox approach.

The theology of the role of the minister who presides at the Eucharist has also entered a new stage of development. The notion that the priest is only understandable as embedded in the relation Christ-Church has led many Catholic theologians to discard the sharp distinction between his two representative functions. This means that the priest is best described as the direct representative of the Church, and as indirectly the representative of Christ who is the Head, in all his activities, including that of the Eucharistic Prayer. When the priest recalls the account of institution and intercedes for the coming of the Spirit to apply the words of Christ to this celebration, Christ Himself is understood to relate His words to this liturgy and to include the petition of the Church in His "eternal intercession," since He is the true Host and High Priest of His Eucharist.

Witness of the Eucharistic Prayer. The modern analysis of the literary-theological structure of the classical Eucharistic Prayers has made a notable contribution toward its theology. The commonly accepted results of this investigation can be quickly summarized.

The typical forms of prayer, found in the narrative context in the OT, as well as in traditional Jewish private and public prayer, have anamnetic (praising remembrance) and epicletic (petitionary) sections. The anamnesis of God's mighty acts on behalf of the chosen people grounds their petition for God's continuing support that maintains the covenant relation. Jewish prayer, associated with feasts instituted by God, includes scriptural texts witnessing to the foundation of the feasts. These texts, introduced by way of direct address or allusion, furnish the theological basis of the prayer. The scriptural texts can be found in either the anamnetic or epicletic sections.

This structure of prayer, based on and mirroring the theology of covenant, enables those praying to experience the dynamics of the covenant relationship with God. It was taken over by the Christian Church as the normative structure of her liturgical prayer and, in particular, for the Eucharistic Prayer. Hence the anamnetic and epicletic sections of the Eucharistic Prayer must be considered as units of a single prayer, the confession of the mystery of salvation realized in Christ. Both parts, taken together, express the dynamics of the covenant relation initiated by God and continually actualized in the liturgy of the Church. Classical Eucharistic Prayers, following the pattern of Jewish liturgical prayer, insert the institution of the Eucharist into either the anamnetic or epicletic sections.

The former type, characteristic of the Antiochene tradition, concludes the anamnetic section with the Words of Institution, and an anamnetic-offering prayer that brings out the theological intention of the praising remembrance. This is followed by the epicletic section in which the explicit petition for the sanctification of the gifts can be located before or after the petition ordered to the sanctification of the communicants. The latter type admits of a greater variety. The special epiclesis of sanctification of the gifts can be placed before the Words of Institution and anamnesis-offering prayer, and the one ordered to the sanctification of the communicants afterward, as in the old Roman canon. Sometimes a twofold epiclesis is placed after the institution and anamnesis, as is the case with the Alexandrian anaphora of Mark.

In all Eucharistic Prayers the meaning of the praising remembrance of the saving acts of God in Christ lies primarily in the desire of the Church for fellowship with Christ, the sharing in His saving work, and His glory mediated through the "food of immortality." Hence the presiding minister appears as authorized spokesperson of the community, proclaiming God's deeds in Christ and petitioning that the saving work of Christ be applied in the present. In this activity, he is supported by the "Amen" of the liturgical assembly, identifying this prayer as its own.

Centrality of Institution. The institution is the central element in the dynamics of the Eucharistic Prayer. This narrative is the theological center from which the anamnesis-offering prayer draws its inspiration, and the theological center to which the epiclesis for the transformation of the elements is ordered. The epiclesis for the sanctification of the communicants is another center of the Eucharistic Prayer. It enables the community to express at the level of prayer the goal that is attained sacramentally through Holy Communion. The epiclesis for sanctification of the elements can come before or after the institution-anamnesis, but the communion epiclesis only afterward. This shows that the institution is the theological center of the prayer, from which the whole meaning is derived. At the same time, the communion epiclesis always makes clear the goal of the celebration. In Eucharistic Prayers in which the twofold epiclesis is brought together and placed after the institution, the order can be petition for the sanctification of the communicants, followed by petition for the change of the gifts [James (Gr.); Chrysostom (Byz.); Basil (Alex.)]. But even where the petition for the transformation of the gifts is given first consideration, it is always made evident that this is ordered to the benefit of the communicants, not primarily to the change of the gifts as such.

The Eucharistic Prayer expresses the intense desire of the Church to be continually reconciled with God. Following the pattern of the prayer of the OT and Judaism, the Church recalls the narrative of institution, situates it at the climactic summit to confer on her prayer the maximum force. Inspired by the promise that the words of Christ carry, the priest humbly petitions, in the name of the Church, for the transformation of the gifts together with the transformation of the communicants "for whom'' the change of the gifts is intended. As a person formally deputed for this task, the priest is aptly described as one who represents the Church in the whole of the Eucharistic Prayer. This formulation corresponds best to the liturgical-theological structure of the Eucharistic Prayer and does not deny that Christ Himself is the Host and High Priest of His Church and His Eucharist.

Bibliography: C. VAGAGGINI, The Canon of the Mass and Liturgical Reform, tr. ed. P. COUGHLAN (New York 1967). L. VIS-CHER, "The Epiclesis: Sign of Unity and Renewal," Studia Liturgica 6 (1969) 30–39. J. H. MCKENNA, "The Eucharistic Epiclesis in Twentieth Century Theology (1900–1966)," doc. diss. (Trier 1970). N. CABASILAS, A Commentary on the Divine Liturgy, trs. J. M. HUSSEY and P. A. MCNULTY (Crestwood, N.Y. 1977). Y. CONGAR, "On the Eucharistic Epiclesis," I Believe in the Holy Spirit, v. 3 (New York 1983). D. COFFEY, "A Proper Mission of the Holy Spirit," Theological Studies 47 (1986) 222–250. E. J. KILMARTIN, "The Active Role of Christ and the Spirit in the Divine Liturgy," Diakonia 17 (1982) 95–108; "The Active Role of the Holy Spirit in the Sanctification of the Eucharistic Elements," Theological Studies 45 (1984) 225–253. H. -J. SCHULTZ, The Byzantine Liturgy, tr. M. J. O'CONNELL (New York 1986).

[G. A. MALONEY/E. J. KILMARTIN/EDS.]

EPICTETUS

A younger contemporary of St. Paul, b. Hicropolis of Phyrigia, c. A.D. 55; d. c. 130. He was taken as a slave boy to Rome by Epaphroditus, a servant of the Emperor Nero, and sent to study under M. Rufus, the Stoic. As a freedman Epictetus opened his own school, but in A.D. 90 he was exiled with all the philosophers of Rome by DOMI-TIAN. He went to Nicopolis of Epirus near the Ionian Sea; and although Hadrian lifted the ban in 117, Epictetus remained in Asia till his death. Arrian, his devoted pupil, prepared and published his class notes as eight Discourses. Four are extant along with a summary, the Enchiridion, and some fragments. There is no trace of Christian influence in his thought although he certainly knew of the "Galileans" (Disc. 4.7). Among the ancients who admired him are M. Aurelius, ORIGEN, St. AUGUS-TINE, and St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS. His influence on Christian thought has been subtle and profound.

Philosophy begins, for Epictetus, when one realizes the enormous confusion among men about right and happy living. Trained men are unanimous in ideas such as right angles and halftones, to which the ignorant lay no claim. But since everyone is born with some notion of what is good or bad, fine or shameful, right or wrong, each one acts according to his own private impressions as if he knew all. So the philosopher must go in search of what is common to all, the universal basis of judgment, the universal good. He will find it in his own will ultimately, for good and evil are determined by what he can control. Everything else is neutral. The universal good is the truth about human freedom; the essence of good and evil lies in the attitude of the will (Disc. 2.92). Men are slaves while ignorant of the true nature of their psychic impressions and their sphere of power; when they choose according to what seems to be, nature resists them and they are frustrated. Men are free when they choose according to the true nature of things; e.g., they cannot resist death, but they can die in peace.

Epictetus's course was divided into three stages similar to the earlier Stoic division into ethics, physics, and logic. The first teaches how to have one's desires in accord with reason, i.e., the right attitude of mind toward external things and events. The second teaches how to conform one's actions to the order of divine providence manifest in creatures. The third stage, for proficients, is a rigorous training in logic to ensure unerring judgment against sophisms and fallacies.

Bibliography: Works. The Discourses with the Encheiridion and Fragments, tr. G. LONG (New York 1890); Complete Extant Writings in Stoic and Epicurean Philosophers, ed. W. J. OATES (New York 1940). Literature. A. JAGU et al., Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire (Paris 1932) 4.1:822–854. M. SPANNEUT, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum (Stuttgart 1950) 5:599–681, bibliog. 678–681. R. D. HICKS, Stoic and Epicurean (New York 1910). D. S. SHARP, Epictetus and the N.T. (London 1914). B. L. HIJMANS, Askesis: Notes on E.'s Educational System (Assen, Neth. 1959). W. A. OLDFATHER, Contributions toward a Bibliography of Epictetus (Urbana, III. 1952).

[M. J. GIACCHI]

EPICUREANISM

A philosophical school and doctrine founded by EPI-CURUS. The school resembled a religious community set up for the purpose of diffusing, applying, and perpetuating the writings and way of life of the master. Epicurus encouraged his followers to memorize his basic writings. They were not expected to improve upon or modify his theories deliberately. Hence this exposition of Epicureanism aims basically at reconstructing the philosophy set forth in the original works of Epicurus.

Division of Philosophy. Epicurus divided philosophy into logic, physics, and ethics. Logic, called canonic, is the science of the criterion and principle and is treated in a single book entitled The Canon. Physics, dealing with generation, corruption, and nature, is given a variety of presentations according to levels of difficulty; the letters present the subject in an elementary form, while the 37 books On Nature constitute a more elaborate treatment. Ethics determines how one should live, what one should do and avoid, and the goal of life (Diogenes 10.30). In his Letter to Herodotus on Physics Epicurus sets forth his basic physical doctrines (Diogenes 10.35–84). Another letter (to Menoeceus), also preserved by Diogenes Laertius (10.122–135), presents Epicurus's main teachings on moral matters. As for the canonic, many fragments collected by Usener and others allow one to reconstruct its fundamental principles.

Canonic. The criterion of truth is fourfold: sensations, anticipations, emotions, and images produced in reason. Sensation is the primitive contact of the knower with material reality. It does not involve the intervention of memory or of reason, and is irrefutable and irreducible. Man's thoughts derive from sensations (Diogenes 10:32) through contact, analogy, resemblance, or synthesis; mental discourse also contributes something to the process. In his poem De rerum natura, LUCRETIUS—one of the most influential Epicureans—stresses the importance of the senses as a criterion and starting point. In his view, the skeptics, by doubting the validity of sensation, have involved themselves in hopeless contradictions; sensation affords the ultimate means of rectifying errors and therefore merits absolute confidence.

Anticipation involves a number of previous sensations of identical or similar objects, an "experience" in terms of which a judgment can be formulated concerning something not as yet perceived or imperfectly perceived, such as the nature of an object, for example, an ox or a horse located at a distance. If such an anticipation is confirmed or at least not contradicted, one's judgment of the object is and was true.

The emotions serve as criteria in matters relating to objects of choice and aversion. Other judgments are verified in terms of images produced in the reason, possibly by the impinging of subtler aspects of objects on the finer rational component of the soul.

Epicurus and his disciples lay great stress on the distinction between judgments based on the criteria of evidence and judgments that do not conform to the criteria. Opinions are corroborated or verified if they state evident facts; they are not corroborated when they run counter to such evidence. However, an opinion may be verified indirectly (that is, not falsified) when it is shown to agree with an evident fact; an example would be the existence of the void, which is linked necessarily with the evident fact of MOTION. To deny the truth of an opinion positing the void, one would have to deny the fact of motion. In this manner Epicurus introduced the possibility of philosophical discourse, that is, the possibility of searching for aspects and structures that are not directly perceptible to the senses or to the mind.

Physics. Physics is studied to secure mental serenity. It is necessary at the outset to determine clearly the primary meanings of words and to refer to the impressions of the senses or to any other criterion (Diogenes 10.38).

The universe is infinite and eternal. It cannot have come from nothing, nor is there anything exterior to it that could change it. It is made up of bodies (revealed by sensation) and of place or void that allows for the possibility of motion. Nothing is conceivable aside from these two constituents. Atomic bodies are immutable substances, while conglomerates of atoms undergo change.

Atomism. Atoms exist in a great variety of shapes, and each shape is possessed by an infinite number of atoms. The atoms move constantly. Their hardness causes them to rebound when they collide because of slight deviations in the direction of their motions. Deviations of atoms were introduced by Epicurus to explain the formation of composite bodies out of atoms separated by the void and moving originally at a uniform speed in the same general downward direction; they explain not only the formation of the universe but also the presence of chance and freedom within it. This may be viewed as an example of a true judgment based on the Epicurean notion of nonfalsification.

Every composite body is a system of atoms moving at the speed of thought, but in constantly changing directions because of collisions with other atoms. Thus the speed of the conglomerate varies as revealed in common experience, without this in any way involving variations in the motions of atoms. The worlds, large and small, arise from concentrations of atoms and dissolve in the same way (Diogenes 10.73). See ATOMISM.

Soul. The soul is composed of subtle particles disseminated throughout the body; its existence depends on the body that it animates. The mobility of the living thing results from the smallness and smoothness of its soul atoms. Besides other cruder elements, the soul also comprises, according to Lucretius, a ruling and organizing principle that communicates life to its other parts and, through them, to the body. Any injury that affects this innermost part of the soul brings about the loss of life (De rerum natura 3). Once bereft of its protective covering, the soul disintegrates (Diogenes 10.63–64).

Sensitivity arises when the power of the soul becomes fully developed as a result of motion and is communicated to the body. Sensation involves finely textured images emanating from real objects and having the same form as their source. Such images may endure for some time in the atmosphere and traverse long distances at very high speeds (Diogenes 10.46). The fineness of their constituents allows them to pass through obstacles that would stop the cruder atoms. The surfaces of bodies are constantly emitting such images, which retain the order and positions of the atoms in the real object. This is the basic principle underlying the Epicurean theory of sight, hearing, and smell.

Gods. According to Epicurus, there is no need to attribute the regulation of celestial phenomena to divine beings. He firmly rejects the ancient view of the heavenly bodies as endowed with happiness, intelligence, and will. Serenity results not from ascribing the realities of the universe to the influence of divine forces, but from an understanding of its true principles and structure. Only by banishing mythical explanations and the fear of eternal torment or of death can one hope to achieve that imperturbability based on truth that is the goal of philosophy.

However, Epicurus conceives of the gods as awesome images having human forms that are originally perceived in dreams. The gods enjoy happiness and immortality but they are not concerned with the happenings of the physical world. There is no place in Epicureanism for providence or fate, nor is prayer valid save as a recognition of man's subordinate position in nature.

Ethics. Philosophy is the health of the soul (Diogenes 10.122); it opens up a way of life that excludes false opinions on the gods, destiny, and death. Death is nothing to man, and he should not let the fear of it deprive him even of the ephemeral joys of life. "As long as we exist, death is not, and when death is there, we are not" (Diogenes 10.125). The wise man does not fear death; he does not necessarily want the longest life, but he does want the most pleasant.

Epicurus divides desires into natural and empty. Natural desires comprise the necessary and the merely natural. Of necessary desires, some are necessary for happiness, others for bodily well-being, still others for life itself. Since human actions aim at avoiding suffering and fear, such a division of desires allows man to strive only for the things he needs to achieve a happy life.

Pleasure is the beginning and the end of the happy life (Diogenes 10.128-129). It is the principal good of man's nature and therefore determines his objects of choice or aversion. However, some pleasures are rejected (for example, excessive eating) because of the evils they entail; and many pains are judged preferable to certain pleasures because of the heightened pleasure experienced as a result or consequence of the pain. In any case, man must judge in terms of the advantages or disadvantages accompanying the pleasures and pains. Thus Epicurus's ethics may be called a utilitarian HEDONISM. Pleasures must be sought in moderation. Men should be content with little and should not fall into the habit of depending on goods they do not control or over which they may lose their control. Bread and water can be a source of great pleasure to the hungry man (Diogenes 10.131).

The Epicurean conception of pleasure involves moderation and tranquillity. The wise man avoids the orgies of food, drink, and sex. He subordinates his desires and aversions to the vigilance of reason (Diogenes 10.132). Wisdom, in which all other virtues are rooted, makes possible a life of happiness by regulating human actions according to the principles of utilitarian hedonism.

Critique. Epicureanism is remarkable for its firm rejection of superstitions, divination, fate, and some aspects of theological ANTHROPOMORPHISM in an age when most philosophers sought to allow for popular beliefs in their systems. In fact, the Epicureans' hostility to such important elements of folklore and religion may have been largely responsible for the distortions of their doctrines by their contemporaries and for the calumnies to which they were subjected. In this one can but agree with N. De Witt's defense of Epicurus. On the other hand, the quasireligious approach to Epicurus's teachings and the somewhat crude, dogmatic tone of his pronouncements must have seemed repugnant and even ridiculous to the ancient man of culture. Indeed the Epicurean spokesman in Cicero's philosophical treatises never appears to be taken too seriously. However, A. M. J. Festugière has shown the profoundly human appeal of Epicureanism and the lofty ideals to which Greek MATERIALISM could rise with Epicurus.

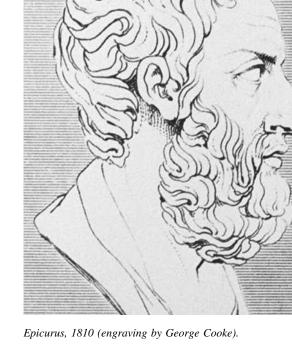

See Also: GREEK PHILOSOPHY; STOICISM; KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON, History of Philosophy (Westminster, Md. 1946) 1:401–412. W. SCHMID, Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum, 5:681–819, bibliog. 816–819. DIOGENES LAERTI-US, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, bk. 10 on Epicurus (Loeb Classical Library 1925) v. 2, Greek text with Eng. tr. R. D. HICKS. A. M. J. FESTUGIÈRE, Epicurus and His Gods, tr. C. W. CHILTON (Cambridge, Mass. 1956). N. W. DE WITT, Epicurus and His Philosophy (Minneapolis 1954).

[V. CAUCHY]

EPICURUS

Greek philosopher; b. Samos, 341 B.C.; d. Athens, 271 or 270 B.C. His father, Neocles, was an Athenian schoolmaster who had settled in the island of Samos. Epicurus studied there under the Platonist Pamphilus, but at 18 he left the island to go to Athens. Later, when the Athenian settlers were expelled from Samos, Epicurus joined his father in Colophon. His years between 20 and 30 appear to have been formative of his philosophy. He studied for some time under the Democritean Nausiphanes, from whom he is said to have derived his Canon. Toward the end of this period, Epicurus underwent an important moral and psychological change; this accounts for the widely divergent opinions of his moral character. His enemies and opponents stress the aggressive and ungrateful bent of his earlier years, while his disciples extol the gentle and considerate master who presided over his philosophical family (see De Witt, ch. 2). At the age of 32 he gathered disciples and founded schools in Mitylene and Lampsacus; five years later he established a school at Athens, where he lived until his death.

Epicurus wrote about 300 works in which he prides himself on never quoting another author. The list given by Diogenes Laertius enumerates many works on physics, including 37 on Nature, one on the Criterion or the Canon, many treatises on ethical matters, and books refuting or expounding other philosophies. The extant works and fragments of Epicurus have been collected and edited by Hermann Usener (Epicurea, Leipzig 1887). Diogenes Laertius in his life of Epicurus has preserved for posterity Epicurus's last will, three important letters on physical and ethical subjects, and the principal doctrines—a sort of Epicurean catechism made up of 40 propositions. For an analysis of his teachings and his influence, see EPICUREANISM.

Bibliography: F. C. COPLESTON History of Philosophy 1:401–412. G. M. POZZO, Enciclopedia Filosofica 1:1931–39. N. W. DE WITT, Epicurus and His Philosophy (Minneapolis 1954). A. M.

J. FESTUGIÈRE, Epicurus and His Gods, tr. C. W. CHILTON (Cambridge, Mass. 1956).

[V. CAUCHY]

EPIGRAPHY, CHRISTIAN

Epigraphy in general is concerned with ancient inscriptions, that is, writings on hard materials, such as stone, metal, clay, bone, and wood. By convention, legends on coins are not included, as they fall within the province of a sister discipline, NUMISMATICS.

Christian Epigraphy and Its Scope. Christian epigraphy, which is primarily concerned with inscriptions written in Greek or Latin, deals with writings on hard materials that can be recognized as being Christian in origin and that fall within the period from the 2d to the 7th century. It includes not only the extant Christian inscriptions themselves, but also copies of inscriptions, now lost, as found in the manuscript tradition, such as the Itinerarium Einsidlense and similar documents.

As compared with the some 300,000 profane Greek and Latin inscriptions extant, the Christian Greek and Latin inscriptions comprise a total of some 50,000, the Latin outnumbering the Greek by about five to one. It should be noted both in the case of pagan and Christian inscriptions that the number extant or known through copies represents only a fraction of the total that once existed. The largest number of Christian inscriptions found in any one area come from Rome and its vicinity and total some 20,000. In the 3d century the Greek inscriptions at Rome are as numerous as the Latin, but in the 4th century, the inscriptions are largely Latin, and in the 5th and 6th centuries, Greek disappears from the stones almost completely. The Latin inscriptions from Rome outnumber the Greek by about ten to one. Outside of Rome and Sicily, the number of Christian Greek inscriptions found in the West is very small, but includes the famous PEC-TORIUS epitaph at Autun. Surprisingly, archeology to date (1965) has brought to light only a relatively limited number of Christian Greek inscriptions on the mainland of Greece, Macedonia, and Thrace, including Constantinople before the 7th century. On the other hand, the finds in Asia Minor, Egypt, Syria, and Palestine have been much more numerous and valuable. The precious inscription of ABERCIUS, for example, comes from Phrygia. Outside of Rome the largest number of Christian Latin inscriptions have been found in Gaul, Africa, the rest of Italy, and Spain. Those from Africa and Gaul are especially important for their rich content. The Christian Latin inscriptions found in Germany are relatively few in number, and the same is generally true for Britain, Switzerland, Illyricum, and the East.

Pagan inscriptions embrace all aspects of public and private life and may be easily classified into a large number of special categories. In contrast, the range of Christian inscriptions is limited. They comprise chiefly funeral inscriptions, pious invocations and acclamations, brief professions of faith, scriptural quotations, and, after the Peace of the Church (313), dedications connected with churches and the cult of saints and martyrs and the graffiti of pious pilgrims. In the period before Constantine, and obviously in times of active persecution, many Christian inscriptions exhibit a guarded or symbolic reference to Christian belief, but by the application of all pertinent criteria these so-called crypto-Christian inscriptions may be identified as Christia without qualification.

On the dogmatic side, Christian inscriptions confirm doctrinal statements and liturgical practices recorded in the literary tradition, but they usually lack the fullness and precision of the patristic writings. On the other hand, they are an invaluable source for the organization of the early Church, for the cult of the martyrs, and, above all, for the daily life and occupations of the rank and file in the Christian communities. T. Mommsen's epigrammatic observation regarding pagan inscriptions applies equally well to the Christian: "Die Inschriften sind nicht Denkmäler der Literatur sondern des Lebens'' (The inscriptions are not monuments of literature, but of life).

Dating, Letter Forms, Abbreviations, and Linguistic Features. Christian and pagan inscriptions of their very nature have many elements in common that are characteristic of their genre and their age. Funeral inscriptions-and the great majority of Christian inscriptions are in this category-usually do not indicate any form of official date. At Rome, for example, the first dated Latin inscription comes from 217 (E. Diehl, Inscriptiones Christianae latinae veteres, 3631b), and the first dated Greek inscription from 235. The number of dated Christian inscriptions in both East and West is very small before 325. When dates are given, the West generally employs consular dating, although one finds also examples of dating according to the Mauretanian Era (A.D. 39) and according to the Era of Spain (38 B.C.) in Africa and Spain respectively. In the East dating by eras was much more frequent, the more common eras in use being: the Seleucid Era (312 B.C.), Era of Antioch (49 B.C.), Era of Bostra (A.D. 105), and Era of Tyre (126 B.C.). In Egypt, Christians introduced an Era of the Martyrs (A.D. 284). The employment of dating by indictions did not become common before the late 5th century A.D. It should be observed that the Christian Era itself was not used before the early Middle Ages. The assignment of dates to undated Christian inscriptions is difficult. However, the converging evidence of letter forms, formulas, and, above all, accompanying archeological evidence, especially Christian symbols, often make approximate dating reasonably certain. In the case of the catacombs, for example, it has been established that inscriptions found in the topmost galleries are earlier than those found in the lower galleries, which were only dug out later.

Letter Forms. Letter forms in both Christian Greek and Latin inscriptions correspond to the general evolving usage from the 2d to the 7th century. On the whole, the lettering of the earlier Christian inscriptions, especially on the Latin side, is inferior to that in the more or less official pagan inscriptions of the same period (see Grossi Gondi, 8-68, esp. 30-39). An exception must be made later for the elegant Latin capitals created by Furius Dionysius Filocalus for the inscriptions composed by Pope DAMASUS. Funeral inscriptions were normally incised on marble slabs or steles and were often obtained from professional pagan monument makers. This explains in part why a Christian inscription is occasionally found on a slab bearing the conventional pagan dedication DM (Dis manibus). The Christian graffiti of Rome especially are very important. They were made over a long period and furnish direct evidence for the writing habits, religious ideas, and culture of those who scratched them on walls and tombs.

A number of Christian Latin inscriptions found in Rome are written in Greek letters, and some Greek inscriptions were composed by Latin speakers or for Latin speakers. These phenomena are perhaps best explained by the special reverence and prestige attached to Greek as the liturgical language of Rome into the 4th century. It is significant that the extant papal inscriptions—with the exception of that of Cornelius—to the end of the 3d century were written in Greek, although certain other popes listed, as well as Cornelius were not Greek (see Hertling and Kirschbaum, 144).

Abbreviations. Christian inscriptions, especially the Latin, make frequent use-in common with pagan Latin inscriptions-of suspension. Both Greek and Latin Christian inscriptions likewise reveal a frequent employment of what may be called the characteristically Christian form of abbreviation, namely, contraction. Pagan and Christian ligatures occur side by side. Monograms are common also, the most important and the most famous being the Constantinian monogram for Christ (see CHI-RHO) which can be dated definitely from the year 323, and which assumes various forms (see Grossi Gondi, 53-68). Of the Christian cryptograms, IXOYC is the most widely used (see FISH, SYMBOLISM OF). The cryptogram, XMΓ, although not uncommon, has not yet received a generally accepted interpretation (see Testini, 359-60). Psephism occurs in Greek Christian inscriptions, but is rare.

flect the contemporary usages of the koine-especially the nonliterary koine-in phonology, morphology, and syntax. Iotacism-the monophthongization of diphthongs-becomes increasingly common from the 4th century, and local aberrations from the common standard occur in Greek inscriptions found in Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, and in the post-Constantinian period in Rome. In some instances, mistakes are clearly the result of an imperfect knowledge of Greek on the part of Orientals. The vast majority of Christian Latin inscriptions are written in Vulgar Latin and reflect to a marked degree the spoken Latin of the age in which they were composed. Along with a large number of pagan inscriptions of the same kind they furnish precious information on the evolution of the living Latin into primitive Romance. Sacred inscriptions of a liturgical character, or dedications of churches or other monuments, composed in the second half of the 4th century and in the early 5th, are usually written in the standard Latin prose style of the period. However, Latin funeral inscriptions, especially from the 4th century, and all Latin inscriptions from the second half of the 5th show a steady deterioration in phonology, morphology, and syntax, in some cases becoming almost unintelligible. (See Grossi Gondi, 417-22, but especially the indices in E. Diehl, Inscriptiones Christianae latinae veteres 3.) A number of Christian Greek and Latin verse inscriptions are extant, but as a whole-including the epigrams of Pope Damasus-they are more laudable for their pious sentiments than for their poetical quality and metrical accuracy. The most common meters employed are the hexameter, the elegiac couplet, and the iambic trimeter or senarius. Some examples are to be classified as accentual rather than metrical verse.

Linguistic Features. Christian Greek inscriptions re-

Christian Names, Places of Origin, and Indications of Age. Some definite tendencies or practices can be noted in the inscriptions, but it is impossible to reduce Christian epigraphical nomenclature to a system. In the beginning Christians apparently retained their pagan names. A baptismal name is attested first for Ignatius of Antioch and thereafter the baptismal name becomes common in place of, or often, beside the earlier name. There was a tendency among the Greeks to use a single name. At Rome, however, the traditional usage of three names gave way only gradually to the dominant employment of the single name in the 4th and 5th centuries. Yet it should be noted that converts from the Roman aristocracy, undoubtedly as a mark of humility, adopted a single name as early as the beginning of the 2d century. The types of names found in Christian inscriptions may be classified, in general, under the following heads: (1) profane or mythological, such as Diogenes, Aphrodisia, Asclepiodotus, Apollonius, Galatea, Phoebus, Hermes, such names being fairly common even after 250; (2) Biblical names, such as Susanna, Abel, Martha, Maria, Petrus, Paulus, and Ioannes; these names, however, being relatively rare, and, with few exceptions, late; (3) specifically Christian names, such as Theodorus, Adeodatus, Renatus, Redemptus, Anastasius, Dominica, Fides, Charitas, and, in particular, from Africa, Quodvultdeus, Spesindeo, Habetdeum; (4) names signifying humility or opprobrium, such as Stercorius, Proiectus, Sceleratus; such names commemorated pagan vilification in the age of persecution and were retained as titles of honor, but also of Christian humility; (5) Christian signa or nicknames introduced by qui et or δς καί, and similar formulas, as Marcellus qui et Exsuperius, Bassa qui et Felix, Anastasia qui et Verula, 'Aγαθη ή και Σείρικα, Muscula quae et Galatea.

Filiation is normally indicated in Christian Latin inscriptions by the use of filius as an appositive preceded or followed by the genitive of the parent's name, as Novellus Crescentis filius, Primigenia filia Primigenii. In Christian Greek inscriptions, filiation is indicated by the genitive alone, or by vióç or $\theta v \gamma \alpha \tau \eta p$ followed by the genitive. Greek and Latin inscriptions, as their pagan counterparts, often indicate the native region or place of origin of the defunct by a variety of phrases or proper adjectives.

The age lived is indicated commonly by the simple vixit or $\xi\zeta\eta\sigma\varepsilon$ accompanied by the number of years, but Latin inscriptions in particular often include months and days and exhibit specific Christian formulas, as vixit in saeculo, vixit in pace. In the fourth and fifth centuries the date of birth is often given according to the consular date. Latin inscriptions, especially, often indicate the age at which Baptism was received or the number of years between Baptism and death. The years lived in marriage are likewise often indicated, and already among the earliest Christian Latin inscriptions. Such information is rarely found in Christian Greek inscriptions.

Family, Civil Status, and Professions. The early Christian inscriptions tend, in general, to ignore distinctions of class and condition, but from the middle of the fourth century data of this kind rapidly became common. They reveal a closely knit Christian family life. Slavery is recognized as a traditional institution but the Christian slave, from the religious point of view, is a person possessing sacred personal rights. Christians are found engaged in a wide range of professions from grammarians and physicians to merchants, bakers, carpenters, dyers, and farmers. They are found also in the higher and lower nobility and as incumbents in all the offices of the imperial administration and in that of the municipalities. (See the lists furnished by Grossi Gondi, 100–19; Leclercq, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Cabrol, H. Leclerq, and H. I. Marrou, 7.1:750–59; and Inscriptiones Christianae latinae veteres 3, Res Romanae, 431–58.)

The Church and the Cult of Martyrs and Confessors. With some important exceptions, the pertinent inscriptions-at least the dated ones-belong to the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries. The Church, the Christian community as a whole, or the Christian communities at the regional or local level, are normally designated by the term ἐκκλησία, ecclesia, but often accompanied by a qualifying genitive or by a qualifying adjective. The combination Ecclesia Catholica appears first on the stones at Rome in an inscription of Pope Damasus composed in 362. Despite the frequent use of "Christian" in the literary tradition from New Testament times, this word occurs rarely in inscriptions outside Asia Minor. A newly baptized or full member of the Christian community is frequently called a veoquitotoc, $\pi i \sigma \tau \delta c$, neophytus, fidelis. Puer and puella are sometimes used in the same sense.

The Clergy. The inscriptions furnish evidence for an early distinction between clergy and laity and for clerical ranks. Of the minor orders, that of lector is mentioned with the greatest frequency. The major orders are much better represented, and from the pre-Constantinian period come diaconus (also called levita), presbyter, episcopus. The Roman inscriptions include references to the presbyteri of the titular churches. For ἐπίσκοπς, episcopus, special mention must be made of the early list of the bishops of Rome discovered in the Cemetery of Callistus beginning with ANTEP@C EIII (236) and including one name in Latin letters, CORNELIVS MARTYR EP. Other terms used with some frequency to designate a bishop are sacerdos, antistes, papa, praesul (poetic), and pontifex the last, because of its earlier pagan employment, only from the 5th century. Among other words designating ecclesiastical or quasi-ecclesiastical status it will suffice to note archidiaconus, diaconessa, vidua, fossor; from monastic life, monachus, virgo, virgo devota, virgo sacra or sacrata.

Numerous titles or expressions are found that connote devotion or humility: servus Dei (used by bishops, lower clergy, and laity), servus Christi, famulus Dei, ancilla Dei (often used to indicate a virgo sacra, but also applied to unmarried girls and married women), δοῦλος Θεοῦ, δοῦλος Χριστοῦ, δούλη Θεοῦ. Peccator is confined largely to ecclesiastical use and is found especially in the graffiti.

Cult of the Martyrs and Confessors. The inscriptions reveal an early cult of martyrs and confessors and its steady development. The term confessor is often employed, by Pope Damasus, for example, in the sense of martyr as well as in its stricter meaning. There are no dated examples before the 4th century, as the siglum MPT and the word martyr found in the epitaphs of the popes mentioned above were added later. Yet it seems very probable that a few undated inscriptions referring to martyrs are earlier than Constantine. In any event, from the early 4th century the number of inscriptions honoring martyrs increases rapidly, culminating in the poetic epitaphs of Pope Damasus incised in the beautiful Filocalian letters (see A. Ferrua, Epigrammata Damasiana). Martyrs are given the epithets sanctus, beatus, or, often in the superlative, sanctissimus, beatissimus. Such epithets are frequently given in abbreviated form. However, it should be noted that sanctus may be used also in a broader sense to indicate the faithful in general (sancti) or an individual pious Christian [see H. Delehaye, Sanctus (Brussels 1927)].

Funerary Formulas. The Christian inscriptions, the great majority of which, as already noted, are funerary, exhibit their specific Christian character by their constant expression of an unquestioned belief in a life after death and in the resurrection of the body. Earthly life is a journey, a peregrinatio, to the Christian's true homeland (patria), heaven. Death is not the end, but the beginning of the true and eternal life with God. Hence the Christian dies natalis is not the day of physical birth but the day of death. The passage of the soul or spirit to the other world, to life with God, is indicated by a variety of expressions, for example: abiit in pace, decessit (from 234 in Rome), discessit, evocatus a Domino, excessit, ingressus in pace, migravit de hac luce, recessit, recessit in pace; in Greek, ἀπεγένετο, ἀπεχώρει πρὸς (τὸν) Κύριον, έξ $\hat{\eta}\lambda\theta\epsilon$. It must be emphasized that these expressions are not euphemisms for death but reflect literally the Christian belief mentioned above. Burial is described as a "storing away" of the body, or as a rest or sleep, until the resurrection of the dead on the Last Day. This is the meaning conveyed by Latin depositus est, depositio, conditus in sarcophago, dormit, dormivit in pace, hic iacet, pausat, quiescit, requiescit (which becomes the basic liturgical word), and by Greek ανεπαύσατο, κοίμησις, ἐκοιμήθη, κεῖται.

The Christians, as noted earlier, followed generally the pagan system of dating for years, months, and days. However, there are sporadic and late examples of the use of dies dominica for dies Solis, of dies Sabbadi for dies Saturni, and of feria for one of the other days of the week.

Inscriptions often praise the virtues or piety of the dead. Expressions like the following are common: sanctissima femina, benemerenti (in pagan use also), devotus obsequiis martyrum, castissima et pudicissima, amator or amatrix pauperurm, μακάριος, θεοπιλέστατος, θεοσεβής.

Christian Dogma and Religious Practices. Because of their brevity, inscriptions do not furnish detailed information on Christian doctrine, yet they contain confirmatory evidence for the major Christian teachings. Thus, they reflect the universal belief in the Trinity, divinity of Christ, Redemption, remission of sins, communion of saints, resurrection of the dead, eternal life. They advocate and contain prayers for the living and the dead. They are particularly valuable for the evidence that they furnish on Baptism, the Eucharist, and Matrimony. They give precious information on the consecration and dedication of churches, on votive offerings, on the veneration of relics, and on the Christian calendar and feasts (especially Easter). Their acclamations, invocations, and prayers in general represent in many respects primitive liturgical formulas. Biblical quotations or adaptations of scriptural passages contribute to our knowledge not only of the early liturgy but also to the textual criticism of the Greek and Latin Bibles. It is hardly necessary to observe that the investigation of Christian inscription must be combined as closely as possible with the study of the accompanying early Christian symbolic art and with that of early Christian literature in all its phases. (For Jewish inscriptions in Greek and Latin, see the works by Frey and Leon cited in the bibliography.)

See Also: Art, Early Christian; Rossi, Giovanni Battista de.

Bibliography: Surveys, Manuals, History. W. LARFIELD, Griechische Epigraphik (3d ed. Munich 1914). R. BLOCH, L'Épigraphie latine ("Que sais-je?" rev. ed. Paris 1965). R. CAGNAT, Cours d'épigraphie latine (4th ed. Paris 1914). H. THY-LANDER, Études sur l'épigraphie latine: Date des inscriptions, noms et dénomination latine, noms et origine des personnes (Lund 1952). A. FERRUA, ed., Epigrammata Damasiana (Vatican City 1942). P. TESTINI, "Epigrafia," in his Archeologia cristiana (Rome 1959) 329-543, the most up-to-date comprehensive treatment. L. JALABERT, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, ed. A. D'ALES et al. (Paris 1912-) 1:1404-53, old but still valuable. L. JALABERT and R. MOUTERDE, "Inscriptions grecques chrétiennes," Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ, and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 7.1:623-94. H. LECLERCQ, "Inscriptions latines chrétiennes," ibid. 694-850; "Inscriptions (Histoire des recueils d')," ibid. 850-1089. These articles contain a large number of epigraphical texts and are furnished with copious bibliogs. O. MARUCCHI, Epigrafia cristiana (Milan 1910), Eng. tr. J. A. WILLIS (Cambridge, Eng. 1912), confined almost entirely to Rome. C. M. KAUFMANN, Handbuch der altchristlichen Epigraphik (Freiburg 1917). F. GROSSI GONDI, Trattato di epigrafia cristiana latina e greca del mondo romano occidentale (Rome 1920). L. HERTLING and E. KIRSCHBAUM, The Roman Catacombs and Their Martyrs, tr. M. J. COSTELLOE (2d ed. London 1960). I. KAJANTO, Onomastic Studies in the Early Christian Inscriptions of Rome and Carthage (in Acta Instituti Romani Finlandiae 2.1; Helsinki 1963). A. DEGRASSI, "Dati demografici in iscrizioni cristiane di Roma," Rendiconti della Classe di Scienze. . .dell' Accademia dei Lincei 18 (1963) 20-28. Collections, Greek. Corpus Inscriptionum Graecarum, ed. A. BOECKH et al., v.4 (Berlin 1959) nos. 8606-9026. In IG the Christian inscriptions are presented passim. See esp. v.14. J. S. CREAGHAN and A. E. RAUBITS-CHEK, "Early Christian Epitaphs from Athens," Hesperia 16 (1947) 1-54. F. HALKIN, "Inscriptions grecques relatives à l'hagiographie," Analecta Bollandiana 67 (1949) 87-108; 69 (1951) 67-76; 70 (1952) 116-37, 306-11; 71 (1953) 74-79, 326-58. L. A. JALABERT and R. MOUTERDE, eds., Inscriptions grecques et latines de la Syrie (Paris 1929-). No convenient collection of Christian Greek inscriptions corresponding to Diehl (see below) is available. Collections, Latin. E. DIEHL, Inscriptiones Christianae latinae veters, 3 v. (Berlin 1925-31), with invaluable index. In Corpus inscriptionum latinarum (Berlin 1863-), the Christian Latin inscriptions are omitted from v.6, as they are contained in De Rossi and Silvagni. In the other v. they are presented passim. J. B. DE ROSSI, ed., Inscriptiones christianae Urbis Romae septimo saeculo antiquiores, 2 v. (Rome 1857-87), new series ed. A. SILVAGNI and A. FERRUA, 3 v. (Rome 1922-57); Monumenta epigraphica Christiana saec. XII antiquiora quae in Italiae finibus adhuc extant (Rome 1944). J. VIVES, Inscripciones cristianas de la España romana y visigoda (Barcelona 1942). Sylloge inscriptionum christianorum veterum Musei Vaticani, ed. H. ZILLACUS et al. (Helsinki 1963). E. DIEHL, Inscriptiones latinae (Bonn 1912), plates 32-50. J. B. FREY, Corus inscriptionum Judaicarum, ed. J. B. FREY (Rome 1936-). H. J. LEON, The Jews of Ancient Rome (Philadelphia 1960). For photographs of Christian inscriptions in addition to those contained in the works listed above, see F. VAN DER MEER and C. MOHR-MANN, Atlas of the Early Christian World, ed. and tr. M. F. HEDLUND and H. H. ROWLEY (New York 1958), passim. For new discoveries and current bibliography, see Revista di archeologia cristiana (Rome 1924-) and L'Année philologique (Paris 1928-) s.v. "Épigraphie chrétienne."

[M. R. P. MCGUIRE]

EPIKEIA

A term derived from the Greek ἐπτείκεια, meaning reasonableness, has undergone a development in moral theology. According to most manuals of theology epikeia is a restrictive interpretation of positive law based on the benign will of the legislator who would not want to bind his subjects in certain circumstances. Recently, theologians have referred to the Thomistic notion of the virtue of epikeia. In a concrete situation the individual invoking a higher law acts against the letter of an imperfect positive law.

St. Thomas Aquinas, following Aristotle, speaks of epikeia as a virtue, which pertains to the virtue of legal justice (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 120.1 ad 2). Human law is imperfect and admits of exceptions because, by its very nature, human law is based on the ordinary course of changing circumstances (ut in pluribus). Epikeia safeguards the higher values of the natural law in the face of the imperfections of positive law.

Suárez follows St. Thomas, but under the influence of the medieval jurists, puts special emphasis on the mind of the legislator who would not want to bind his subject in certain circumstances. According to Suárez, epikeia may be used in three cases: (1) when the observance of the law would be sinful by reason of a higher law, epikeia is obligatory; (2) when compliance with the law demands heroism and effort out of proportion to the purpose of the law, epikeia may be used; (3) when particular circumstances unforeseen by the legislator would indicate that it was not his mind or intention to bind the subject, epikeia may be used.

Some modern theologians follow Suárez, but others restrict epikeia solely to the third instance wherein it is purely a question of the mind of the legislator (epikeia in the strict sense). In the first and second instances (epikeia in the wide sense) it is beyond the power of the legislator to bind his subjects. With regard to epikeia in the strict sense, the question of recourse to the legislator is discussed. The general tenor of the teaching is that in cases where there is probability, but no certainty, epikeia may not be used if recourse is possible.

Since 1940, there has been a tendency to revive the notion of epikeia as a virtue connected with legal or social justice. The need for the virtue of epikeia stems from the following conditions: (1) the imperfect nature of human law; (2) the possible tensions between the primary law for the Christian-the internal law of the Spirit-and that law's external expressions; (3) possible conflicts between society seeking the common good and the individual with his inalienable rights and individual good; (4) the imperfection of the human lawgiver. The rapidly changing circumstances of modern society only underscore the need for the virtue of epikeia. Epikeia is not just a way to escape from the obligations of law; it is the response to a higher law (the law of the Spirit or the natural law) against the letter of the positive law. At times, epikeia may demand more than the letter of the positive law.

Epikeia, per se, cannot be used with regard to the natural law, but only with regard to inadequate and imperfect expressions of the natural law. Epikeia can be used with regard to all positive laws, but less often with regard to irritating or invalidating laws. When epikeia is conceived as a virtue, there is no need for recourse to the superior.

See Also: LAWS, CONFLICT OF.

Bibliography: E. HAMEL, "La Vertu d'Épikie," Sciences ecclésiastiques 13 (1961) 35–56. L. J. RILEY, The History, Nature, and Use of Epikeia in Moral Theology (Washington 1948). R. EGENTER, "Über die Bedeutung der Epikie im sittlichen Leben," Philosophisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft 53 (1940) 115–127. J. FUCHS, Situation und Entscheidung (Frankfurt 1952) 47–68. A. DI MARINO, "L'Epikeia Christiana," Divus Thomas (Piacenza) 55 (1952) 396–424. P. HAYOIT, "L'Usage de l'epikie," Rev. Dioc. Tournai 10 (1955) 513–518. J. GIERS, "Epikie und Sittlichkeit: Gestalt und Gestaltwandel einer Tugend," Der Mensch unter Gottes Anruf und Ordnung: Festgabe für Theodor Muncker, ed. R. HAUSER and F. SCHOLTZ (Düsseldorf 1958) 51–67. W. SCHÖLLGEN, "Die Lehrpunkte von der Epikie und vom Kleineren Übel," Anima 15 (1960) 42–51. B. HÄRING, The Law of Christ: Moral Theology for Priests and Laity, tr. E. G. KAISER (Westminster, Md. 1961—) 1:1.74, 247, 269, 281 ff.

[C. E. CURRAN]

EPIKEIA (IN THE BIBLE)

English transliteration of the Greek ἐπιείκεια (that which is of just measure, reasonable, equitable). The Greek word is used in the Septuagint (LXX) only of persons, usually those in authority [Dn 4.24 (LXX: 4.27); Est 3.13; 2 Mc 9.27], and designates the virtue of moderation (prudence) in those who do not rigorously insist upon their rights. Unlike the despot who with want on violence (ΰβρις) presses for his due, the ἐπιεικής ruler manifests toward his subjects a fatherly indulgence and kindness, pardoning offenses and mitigating punishment. As an attribute of God, ἐπιείκεια denotes His mercy (Bar 2.27; Dn 3.42).

In the New Testament, similarly, ἐπιείκεια is attributed to Christ (2 Cor 10.1), to those in authority (Acts 24.4; 1 Pt 2.18; 1 Tm 3.3), and to Christians in general (Phil 4.5; Ti 3.2; Jas 3.17), but it takes on more clearly the nuance of gentleness, meekness, and humility, becoming synonymous with $\pi \rho \alpha \ddot{\upsilon} \tau \eta \zeta$ (2 Cor 10.1; Ti 3.2; cf. Wis 2.19). Although the term is not used in Mt 5.39-42 and 1 Cor 6.7, these passages give typical examples of the Christian virtue of "gladly ceding one's rights." Christians must abandon the lex talionis; in accordance with the directives of the SERMON on the Mount, they must instead cultivate the generous spirit that does not haggle about one's rights, but has its roots in complete selflessness. Similarly, St. Paul's real concern in writing 1 Cor 6.1-11 was not the administration of justice, but the inculcation of an attitude of living above the law. Christians should renounce their rights rather than give scandal or disturb charitable relations.

The highest example of $\epsilon \pi \iota \epsilon (\kappa \epsilon \iota \alpha \text{ was given by})$ Christ who, setting aside the glory due His dignity, embraced the condition of a slave and accepted the death of the cross (Phil 2.5–8). Christ, whose mildness ($\pi \rho \alpha \tilde{\upsilon} \tau \eta \varsigma$) and gentleness ($\epsilon \pi \iota \epsilon (\kappa \epsilon \iota \alpha)$) Christians must imitate (2 Cor 10.1), is not a weakling, however, but the glorified Lord (Phil 2.9–11) who, instead of jealously guarding His rights, exhibits the mildness that only an omnipotent King can show. His $\epsilon \pi \iota \epsilon (\kappa \epsilon \iota \alpha)$, then, is but the complement of His divine glory and is thoroughly majestic in nature.

Christians, through their heavenly vocation (Phil 3.20), participate in Christ's kingly power and must be guided by His gentleness in their relationship with others. Thus, when St. Paul was accused of being cowardly, he reminded the rebellious Corinthians that he was capable of being stern (2 Cor 10.2), but that he preferred to exercise his authority only in the spirit of the Lord (2 Cor 10.8), i.e., as ἐπιείκεια. The same virtue is required of every Church official (1 Tm 3.3) who, inspired by the gentle wisdom from above (Jas 3.17), must manifest Christ's heavenly glory in his rule. Even more clearly does the majestic aspect of enterixet appear in Phil 4.5, where Paul instructs the Philippians to make known their forebearance (tò $\epsilon\pi\iota\epsilon\iota\kappa\epsilon\varsigma$) to all since "the Lord is near." The thought of their future glorification must prompt them to maintain their lovable equanimity even in the face of persecution. The Lord will right all wrongs when He returns to establish His universal dominion. Therefore, έπιείκεια, which can be rendered as "kindness, graciousness, the willingness to cede one's rights," is an earthly reflection of the heavenly splendor that awaits all who follow Christ's royal example.

Bibliography: H. PREISKER, G. KITTEL Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (Stuttgart 1935–) 2:585–587. C. SPICQ, "Bénignité, mansuétude, douceur, clémence," Revue biblique 54 (1947) 321–339. W. BARCLAY, A N.T. Wordbook (London 1955) 38–39.

[S. MAKAREWICZ]

EPIPHANIUS, PATRIARCH OF CONSTANTINOPLE

Reigned Feb. 25, 520, to June 5, 535; d. 535. Epiphanius had previously been a syncellus in the patriarchal curia and was esteemed for his virtue and knowledge of Scripture, when he was chosen patriarch in 520 in the hope that he would collaborate with the Byzantine Emperors JUSTIN I and JUSTINIAN I to foster better relations with the papacy after the ACACIAN SCHISM (482-519). Soon after his election he sent a profession of faith to Pope HORMISDAS, showing clearly his adherence to the orthodox doctrine of Chalcedon. The next year he wrote to the Pope regarding the deposition of the Patriarch Paul of Antioch. On the occasion of the visit of Pope JOHN I to Constantinople, he had the Pope preside over the celebration of the Easter Liturgy there (April 19, 526). As a result of the colloquy of the orthodox bishops with the Severians held in Constantinople in 532, he requested Pope JOHN II to approve the formula unus ex trinitate crucifixus ("One of the Trinity was crucified") and to condemn those who denied that Mary was truly the Mother of God.

Bibliography: V. GRUMEL, Les Regestes des actes du patriarcat de Constantinople 1:217–226. L. BRÉHIER, Histoire de l'église depuis les origines jusqu'à nos jours 4:423–442. E. STEIN, Histoire du Bas-Empire, ed. J. R. PALANQUE 2:230–231, 378. L. DUCHESNE, L'Église au VI^e siècle (Paris 1925) 65–70.

[G. T. DENNIS]

EPIPHANIUS OF PAVIA, ST.

Fifth-century Italian bishop; b. c. 438–9; d. Pavia, c. 496–7. His 30-year episcopate described by his biographer, Bp. Ennodius of Pavia (c. 512–521), demonstrates the unlimited charity of the bishops and their influence on civil authority in the difficult years when Roman domination in the West was crumbling. According to the vita, Epiphanius undertook two diplomatic missions: one to reconcile the Roman General Ricimer with the Emperor Anthemius at Rome (467–472); the other for Emperor Nepos with the Visigothic King Euric at Toulouse (474–5).

Epiphanius helped rebuild Pavia after it had been pillaged (476) by the Ostrogothic king of Italy and by the Rugi, and mitigated the sufferings of his people burdened with vexatious laws and intolerable taxes by Odovacar, or led off into captivity. With Bp. Laurentius of Milan he visited the Ostrogothic King THEODORIC (THE GREAT) at Ravenna (493–4) and shortly after, with Bp. Victor of Turin, persuaded the Burgundian King Gundobad at Lyons to release 6,000 Italian captives. His last journey of mercy took him, in midwinter, to Theodoric at Ravenna for the people of the Province of Liguria. When returning to Pavia he fell ill, and he died shortly after he reentered the city. His remains were stolen from Pavia in 962 and placed in the cathedral at Hildesheim.

Feast: Jan. 21.

Bibliography: ENNODIUS OF PAVIA, Vita and Dictio, ed. F. VOGEL (Monumenta Germaniae Auctores antiquissimi 7; 1885) 84–109; ed. G. HARTEL (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 6; 1882) 331–383, 531–539; The Life of Saint Epiphanius, tr. G. M. COOK (Catholic University of America, Studies in Medievel and Renaissance Latin, Language and Literature 14; 1942); new tr. in The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation, ed. R.J. DEFAR-RARI 15 (1952) 301–351. Analecta Bollandiana 17 (1898) 123–127, the Anonymous of Hildesheim. G. H. PERTZ, ed., Translatio Sancti Epiphanii (Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825–) 4; 1841) 248–251. F. SAVIO, Gli antichi vescovi d'Italia dalle origini al 1300, 4 v. (1898–1932) 4:350–355. A. RIMOLDI, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–)15:615–617.

[G. M. COOK]

EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS, ST.

Church Father; b. near Eleutheropolis, Palestine, c. 315; d. at sea, May 402. Epiphanius studied classics in Egypt, and in addition to Syrian, his native language, acquired a knowledge of Coptic and Hebrew; he remained for some time among the monks. On his return to Palestine he founded a monastery near Eleutheropolis that he governed for 30 years and on this basis was ordained. The bishops of CYPRUS selected him for the See of Constantia (Salamis) in 367; he was strongly attached to the doctrine of St. ATHANASIUS (except for the date of Easter) and opposed both the Arians and Origenists with passion but uncritically.

He took part in the MELETIAN SCHISM of Antioch, and broke allegiance with Meletius, whom he accused of refusing to subscribe to the HOMOOUSIOS before 363, and of dealing with the Pneumatics. Having tried in vain to win St. BASIL to the cause of Paulinus, he antagonized Vitalis, head of a third Antiochene party. After the Council of CONSTANTINOPLEI (381), over whose beginning Meletius had presided, Epiphanius journeyed to Rome with (St.) JEROME and Paulinus to protest that Council's decisions. Between 387 and 393 he traveled through Palestine with JOHN OF JERUSALEM, and destroyed the painting of a holy image in a church in Jerusalem (See PNEUMATO-MACHIANS).

Origenism. Epiphanius was aware of Origenistic tendencies among the Palestinian monks (after 374), but in his Panarion (ch. 64) he describes ORIGENISM according to the treatise of METHODIUS OF OLYMPUS. He reproaches Origen for teaching SUBORDINATIONISM, the preexistence of souls, and the fall or original sin before the union of the soul with the body. In 393 he attacked Origen in the presence of Bp. JOHN OF JERUSALEM; in the following year, he failed to force John to condemn Origen (Jerome, Ep. 51), thus inaugurating a new phase of the Origenistic controversy, and added to his accusations that of the APOCATASTASIS of the devil. He attacked both RUFINUS OF AQUILEIA and Palladius, justly the latter, as he sought to describe contemporary Origenism as a pagan philosophy, or even outright GNOSTICISM.

After the condemnation of Origen in 400, Epiphanius went to Constantinople (402) to agitate against (St.) JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, who had succored the Tall Brothers, expelled from Nitria as Origenists; but when Epiphanius realized that THEOPHILUS OF ALEXANDRIA was involved in the matter, he did not await the Synod of the OAK that deposed Chrysostom, but departed; he died at sea.

Works. Epiphanius, of mediocre Greek culture, was opposed to speculation in theology, and considered philosophy a source of heresy; but his literary style furnishes an interesting example of the contemporary Greek Koine.

Ancoratus, 374, deals with the Trinity. It opposes Apollinarianism regarding the Incarnation, and Origenism in reference to the Resurrection and the interpretation of Genesis ch. 1. It closes with a text of the Creed of Nicaea-Constantinople (which a copyist substituted for the original of Nicaea) and a Creed of Epiphanius's own composition (See NICENE CREED).

Panarion, a tract against heretics written c. 374–76, draws heavily from the Adv. Haereses of HIPPOLYTUS and IRENAEUS, as well as original documents. It gives the titles of certain Gnostic works otherwise unknown, and extracts from the Apostolica of MARCION or the Montanist Oracles, and includes interesting judgments on his contemporaries.

His De mensuris et ponderibus (392) is a manual for the study of the Bible. De duodecim gemmis (c. 394) is an allegorical interpretation of the 12 jewels on the breastplate of the High Priest. It is preserved in a Georgian translation, and partly in Latin (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum (Vienna 1866) 35:743–773), with Greek, Coptic, and Ethiopic fragments.

Fragments of three works by Epiphanius against images utilized in the eighth-century controversies over ICONOCLASM have been identified as his: a Pamphlet against the Images; a Letter to Theodosius I; and the Testament. Other of his extant works are letters. One is a Letter to the Arabs (Panarion 78.2–25) on the perpetual virginity of Mary; another letter survives in Ancoratus (77) and in a Syriac version; and two letters were translated into Latin by Jerome (Epist. 51, 91).

In Greek catenae there are Epiphanian scholia on the Octateuch; and in Coptic catenae, on Mark and Luke. For Arab catenae, see G. Graf, Geschichte der christlichen arabischen Literatur (Vatican City 1944–1953) 1:356.

Among the works falsely attributed to him are an Anakephalaiosis, or summary of the Panarion; the Physiologus that had great influence on medieval iconography; commentaries on the Old Testament; homilies; and a Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Feast: May 12.

Bibliography: EPIPHANIUS OF SALAMIS, "Ancoratus" und "Panarion," ed. K. HOLL, 3 v. (Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der erstendrei Jahrhunderte 25, 31, 37; 1915, 1922, 1933); Texte und Untersuchungenzur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur 36.2 (1910). O. BARDENHEWER, Geschichte der altkirchlichen Literatur (Freiburg 1913–1932) 3:293–302. B. E. PERRY, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA 20.1 (1941) 1074–1129. A. PUECH, Histoire de la littérature grecque chrétienne, 3 v. (Paris 1928–30) 3:643–669. B. ALTANER, Patrology, tr. H. GRAEF (New York 1960) 365–368. J. QUASTEN, Patrology (Westminster, MD 1950) 3:384–396. J. N. D. KELLY, Early Christian Creeds (2d ed. London 1960). G. JOUAS-SARD, Gregorianum 42 (1961) 5–36. Der Physiologus, tr. and ed. O. SEEL (Zurich 1960). P. NAUTIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 15:617–631. D. FERNÁNDEZ, De mariologia sancti Epiphanii (Rome 1968). L. A. ELDRIDGE, The Gospel Text of Epiphanius of Salamis (Salt Lake City 1969). G. VALLÉE, A Study in Anti-Gnostic Polemics (Waterloo, Ont. 1981). J. F. DECHOW, Dogma and Mysticism in Early Christianity: Epiphanius of Cyprus and the Legacy of Origen (Macon, GA 1988). A. POURKIER, L'hérésiologie chez Epiphane de Salamine (Paris 1992). M. E. STONE and R. ERVINE, The Armenian Texts of Epiphanius of Salamis De mensuris et ponderibus (Sterling, Va. 2000).

[P. CANIVET]

EPIPHANY, THE SOLEMNITY OF

A feast celebrated for most of Christian history on January 6, though—since the reform of the liturgical calendar—marked by most Catholic churches on the Sunday between January 2 and 8, where January 6 is not a holy day of obligation.

Names for the Feast. One of the most ancient annual liturgical feasts, Epiphany has been variously called, in the East, epiphánia, epiphánios, theopháneia, all suggesting divine appearances or manifestations. Other names for the feast—such as heméra ton photon, or "day of lights"—have emphasized the images of sun, stars, and light, long associated with Epiphany and perhaps connected to the period of "illumination" in the process of initiation in the early Church. Parallel terms in the Latin West were dies epiphaniarum, the "day of revelations;" dies manifestationis, the "day of manifestions;" and simply apparitio, "appearance." Also connected to the light imagery was the Latin phrase dies luminum, the "day of lights."

Before their use in Christian liturgy, the Greek epiphany or theophany designated a manifestation of a divinity and, later, important events in the life of a ruler, such as a birth, ascension to the throne, or even a visit to a city. The word "epiphany" was first used in a Christian sense in the New Testament, referring to both the first and final comings of Christ (see, e.g., Ti 2:11,13). The word was soon after used of the miracles of Christ as manifestations of divine power.

Origins in the Calendar. A feast on January 6 is first mentioned by Clement of Alexandria (around A.D. 215), who said that the Basilidians, a gnostic group, commemorated the baptism of Christ on this day (Stromata 4.12; Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte [Leipzig 1897—] 2:284–287). The feast of the Epiphany certainly originated in the East, and it is found in the Breviarium Syriacum of 411 C.E. (ed. tr. Mariani [Rome 1956] 28). In the West the journals of Ammianus Marcellinus describe a visit in 363 of the Emperor Julian to Gaul "on the day of the festival in January which the Christians call 'epiphany'" (LCL 2:98–101).

The feast was listed in the Calendar of Carthage, in North Africa (Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne 8.2:2286), but not in the Roman Chronograph of 354, where one finds the earliest evidence for Christmas.

In the Egyptian calendar, the winter solstice and a feast of the sun-god were observed on January 6, so it is likely that the Christian date was originally related to draw people away from the pagan celebrations. On the previous night, pagans of Alexandria commemorated the birth of their god Aeon, born of a virgin. Some pagans also believed that the waters of rivers, especially the Nile, acquired miraculous powers and even turned into wine on this night.

Narratives in the East. It is difficult to ascertain if there was originally a single narrative or image for the feast, or if the feast celebrated a variety of epiphanies or manifestations from its origin. By the fourth century the feast embraced the narratives of the birth of Christ, his baptism, the adoration of the Magi, and the miracle at Cana (perhaps linked with the water turned wine in the Egyptian pagan celebration). Epiphanius, fourth-century bishop of Salamis, described the pagan feasts above and accepted January 6 as the date of the birth of Jesus, and he also speaks of the Magi and sign at the wedding in Cana (Panarion 51.16).

Two writers of Latin Christianity who traveled in the East give witness to early narratives for the feast. First, the fourth-century travel-diary of Egeria describes the Palestinian celebration of January 6 and its octave. Though a folio is missing, the narrative was likely that of the nativity of Jesus, for the people, monks, and the bishop had gone up from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. There is no mention in Egeria's journal of the baptism or of Cana for this feast (Journal, chapter 25). Second, according to John Cassian (Conferences 10.2), the Alexandrian "day of the epiphanies" commemorated the birth and baptism of Christ.

In ancient Christian Syria the narratives included the birth, the Magi, and the baptism, and the Apostolic Constitutions (8.33.7) command that slaves not work "on the festival of the Epiphany, because on it there came to pass the manifestation of the divinity of Christ . . . at the baptism" (tr. Grisbrooke, 51).

Narratives in the West. Though some scholars assume that there had been a single narrative at the start to which others were added, it seems more likely that a plurality of objects, all "manifestations" of God's presence in Christ, was there from the start. This is supported by the testimony of Bishop Filastrius of Brescia, whose Diversarum hereseon liber (c. 383) simultaneously declared that there is only one proper narrative for the feast (the visit of the Magi) and named the feast with the plural dies epifaniorum, "day of the manifestations," the plural likely capturing the earlier stratum of more than one narrative even though Filastrius was himself legislating only one for orthodox belief.

Sermons of Augustine indicate that the feast existed in North Africa in his time (Patrolgia Latina 38:1026–1039), and eight sermons of Leo the Great (bishop of Rome, 440–461) witness to the feast's observance in Rome in the middle of the fifth century (Sermons 31–38; Patrolgia Latina 54:234–263). By the time of Augustine and Leo, the date of December 25 for the birth of Christ had been received by most churches, and the narratives of Epiphany had been pared down to the single one of the visit of the Magi, as narrated only in the Gospel of Matthew (2:1–12).

Liturgy. The multiplicity of narratives earlier attached to Epiphany was not manifest in the liturgies of Epiphany in Rome. There the principal narrative was from the earliest sources and still is the visit of the Magi to adore the Christ-child. The narratives of Christ's baptism and of the sign in Cana turning water into wine are secondary.

Early Mass formularies are found in the Würzburg Lectionary (Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne 8.2:2286) and in the old Gelasian Sacramentary (ed. Mohlberg 61–68). Although the diary of Egeria testifies to an octave of Epiphany in Palestine, and the Würzburg Lectionary indicates a triduum following January 6, an octave did not enter the Roman liturgy until the eighth century (Gregorian Sacramentary). This octave, together with the vigil, was suppressed in 1956. In the present liturgical calendar of the Roman Catholic church, the Sunday after January 6 is the feast of the Baptism of the Lord, a narrative that had been proclaimed on Epiphany in Egypt in the early Church.

In the Liturgy of the Hours for the feast of Epiphany, the manifestation of Christ's power in the miracle of Cana is commemorated in the Magnificat antiphon on January 6 and in the Gospel of the second Sunday after Epiphany. The espousals of Christ and the Church are mentioned in the same antiphon. This theme enters the Epiphany liturgy because Christ is believed to have sanctified water at his baptism, and it is through the waters of baptism that the church exercises spiritual maternity.

Today the multiplicity is not evident in the texts for the eucharistic liturgy for the celebration of Epiphany. The prayer texts draw only from the Matthean narrative of the Magi. While the prayers maintain the imagery of light and stars, one step removed from the baptismal origins, these are dissociated from their original connection to baptism and the process of illumination. The multiplicity of the feast of manifestation is expressed well, however, in the antiphon for the canticle at morning prayer:

Today the Bridegroom claims his bride, the Church, since Christ has washed her sins away in Jordan's waters; the Magi hasten with their gifts to the royal wedding; and the wedding guests rejoice, for Christ has changed water into wine, alleluia. This is also so in the antiphon for the canticle at evening prayer:

Three mysteries mark this holy day: today the star leads the Magi to the infant Christ; today water is changed into wine for the wedding feast; today Christ wills to be baptized by John in the river Jordan to bring us salvation.

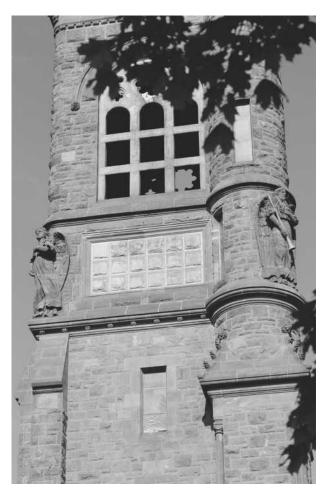

Customs. The fourth canon of the Council of Saragossa, Spain, in 380 legislated that "for 21 continuous days, from December 17 until the day of the feast of Epiphany, which is January 6, no one should be absent from church, or hide at home, withdraw to a dwelling in the country, move to the mountains, or go walking with bare feet. Rather, all should assemble in church." (tr. of Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio [Paris 1889–1927; repr. Graz 1960] 3:634). These prescriptions both indicate the gravity of the feast and suggest that Christmas itself was not yet observed in Spain in 380, for the three weeks of discipline, during which December 25 would have occurred, would not otherwise have been "continuous."

From ancient times the Eastern Church has blessed baptismal water on Epiphany. Antonius of Piacenza (c. 570) testifies that in Palestine the Jordan River itself was blessed (Itinerarium 11–12; Patrologia Latina 72:903–904), this in commemoration of the baptism of the Lord in the same stream. Antonius testifies that a baptism took place, ships were blessed with the holy water, and "all descended into the river for blessing, dressed in woven clothes as if for burial."

As attested by John Cassian, on Epiphany the church of Alexandria announced to other churches the date of the following Easter. Elsewhere the dates of Easter and other movable feasts were announced after the Gospel on the feast of Epiphany. Ambrose testified to a Milanese custom at Epiphany for the enrollment of catechumens. Today, this custom has been revised in some parishes.

Bibliography: A. CHUPUNGCO, ed., Liturgical Time and Space (Handbook for Liturgical Studies, v. 5; Collegeville, MN 2000) 135–330. A. ADAM, The Liturgical Year (New York 1981) 121–157. T. J. TALLEY, The Origins of the Liturgical Year (New York 1986) 79–162. B. BOTTE, Les origines de la Noël et de L'Épiphanie (Louvain 1932). M. MERAS, The Origins of the Celebration of the Christian Feast of Epiphany: An Ideological, Cultural and Historical Study (Joensuu, Finland 1995).

[M. F. CONNELL]

St. Paul's Episcopal Church. (©Lee Snider/CORBIS)

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, U.S.

The Anglican Church in the U.S. since 1789 has been autonomous and independent of the Church of England, but an integral part of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION of churches and joined in kinship of faith, government, and worship to the English mother church (see ANGLICAN-ISM).

History. Although the Church of England early made contacts with America through chaplains who accompanied explorers such as Sir Martin Frobisher (1578) and Sir Francis Drake (1579) or unsuccessful colonizers such as Sir Walter Raleigh (1585), the first permanent settlement of the church was begun in 1607 when Rev. Robert Hunt celebrated the Eucharist for the first time in Jamestown. Other foundations followed in Philadelphia (1695), New York City (1697), Boston (1689), Newport, Rhode Island (1702), and Burlington, New Jersey (1705). By the end of the colonial period, the Church of England was represented in all 13 colonies and was officially established in Virginia, Maryland, North and South Carolina, and Georgia, although only in the first two was it fully and effectively established. Elsewhere, in the midst of predominantly Nonconformist or non-Anglican communities, the church had to be assisted by the mother church and especially by the SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL (SPG). To this private organization, founded in 1701 through the efforts of a commissary sent to Maryland by the bishop of London, Thomas Bray, belongs much of the credit for the existence and development of the church during this period.

Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York. (©CORBIS)

Early Difficulties. The church in the colonies suffered under three major handicaps. The first was its connection with the state either in England or in America. Where it was established as a state institution in the colonies it suffered from interference by unsympathetic governors or by dominating lay employers, as well as from the inadequacy of funds provided by taxes levied on all members of the colony, whether Anglicans or not. Where it was not established, as in Massachusetts and in Connecticut, the church was a distinct minority suspected by many as the colonial representative of the state Church of England, whose authority and power they had migrated to America to escape.

In this situation the clergy were generally of poor quality. Some had left England to avoid difficulties at home; most lived in conditions of isolation, frontier hardships, and great poverty. A number worked valiantly in the face of grave obstacles, but by and large their standing was inferior and their morale low. To worsen matters, the Anglican mission in the United States was under the direct jurisdiction of the bishop of London throughout English colonial rule. Without a local bishop in the United States during the colonial period, prospective clergymen had to journey to London for their ordination, a prospect that discouraged many candidates.

The American Revolution added a severe crisis of loyalty to the existing troubles. Most of the 250 clergy, together with several thousand of the laity, persisted in their allegiance to the king; and accordingly some were put in prison, some were banished, and some voluntarily departed, going to Canada or back to England. A good percentage of the laity, however, supported the revolution, and two-thirds of those who signed the Declaration of Independence were members of the Episcopal Church. Leaders to the revolutionary cause who were Episcopalians include George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Patrick Henry, John Jay, Robert Morris, John Marshall, John Randolph, Charles Lee and Harry Lee.

Post-Revolutionary Developments. After the war the church, cut off from Great Britain, disestablished in America, and weakened by losses of clergy and laity, had to develop self-support, a national organization, and especially an American episcopate. The last came about first. Ten of the 14 clergymen in Connecticut voted for Dr. Samuel SEABURY, an American born in Groton, Conn., to go to England for consecration. Put off in England because he could not take an oath of allegiance to the king, Dr. Seabury was consecrated by NONJURING bishops in Aberdeen, Scotland, on Nov. 14, 1784.

Meanwhile, under the leadership of Rev. William White, rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia, a movement arose to constitute a Protestant Episcopal Church for the whole United States. On Sept. 27, 1785, the first general convention met in Philadelphia with delegates from only seven states, but the assembly took important preliminary steps toward the formation of a unifying constitution and the establishment of a hierarchy. Through its efforts Rev. Samuel Provoost and Rev. William White were consecrated in England on Feb. 4, 1787, as bishops for New York and Philadelphia, respectively. Finally, a general convention met in Philadelphia on July 28, 1789, to bring about a united church, but the first session from July 28 to August 8 convened without Bishop Seabury or representatives from New England. The convention then took a number of conciliatory steps, especially the recognition of the validity of Seabury's consecration, thereby succeeding in bringing the bishop and representatives from Massachusetts and New Hampshire to the second session. With united forces the general convention, meeting from September 30 to October 16, adopted a constitution, agreed on and ratified 17 canons, and authorized a BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. The Episcopal Church of the United States was a reality. To complete the foundation, another bishop, Dr. James Madison, was consecrated in England for Virginia in 1790; and in 1792 all four bishops inaugurated a distinctly American episcopate by uniting in the first consecration in the United States, that of Thomas John Claggett as bishop of Maryland.

For more than 20 years the new church endured many painful trials in its evolution into a sound organism. Many distrusted it as fundamentally an English institution. The loss of the METHODISTS, as well as the demoralizing effects of a long war, weakened its vitality. Formal worship repelled people in an age of emotionalism and freedom in religious expression. Growth was slow and leadership ineffective. However, beginning with the second decade of the 19th century, more effective leadership ushered in a new era of vigorous development. Foremost among the new leaders were the bishops Alexander V. Griswold of the eastern diocese, John H. Hobart of New York, Philander Chase of Ohio, and Richard C. Moore of Virginia. During Griswold's episcopate the parishes in his diocese increased fivefold, and at his death the eastern diocese became the Dioceses of Vermont, Massachusetts, Maine, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. The four or five active ministers laboring in Virginia when Bishop Moore arrived in Richmond in 1814 increased to nearly 100 during his 27 years of service.

Educational and missionary activities developed, and the early interest in education that had led to the formation (1693) of William and Mary College at Williamsburg, Virginia, blossomed. The General Theological Seminary of New York (1819) and the Theological Seminary of Virginia (1824) were founded. Bishop Chase began Kenyon College in Ohio, and Rev. James L. Breck founded Nashotah Hall, originally an associate mission, but later a theological seminary, in Wisconsin. The Domestic and Foreign Society, organized by the General Convention in 1820, stimulated the work of church extension. Bishop Jackson Kemper, the first officially designated missionary bishop, worked in Indiana, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. Bishop James H. Otey did missionary work in Tennessee and in the South and Southwest. James L. Breck pushed across the country, establishing foundations along the way, until he reached the Pacific Coast. New dioceses and missionary territories matched the growth of the United States as the church became coextensive with the country, and even went beyond. Missionary zeal led to foundations in Greece, Turkey, Liberia, China, and Japan.

The period of growth was abruptly halted by the Civil War. The Episcopal Church was the only major denomination that did not develop into full-blown schism during the Civil War. Church leaders maintained cordial relations throughout this period. When the split in the Union developed into war, the southern dioceses formed a temporary Protestant Episcopal Church in the Confederate States, holding their first general council in Augusta, Georgia. Nevertheless, both sides still considered themselves one church. Throughout the war both northern and southern sections of the church maintained friendly attitudes. At the 1892 general convention in New York City, the names of the southern bishops were called in, and the 1865 general convention in Philadelphia was attended by some southern delegations. Soon afterward, the unity of the church was quietly restored by the resumption of full relations.

After the Civil War the church continued its progress. In 1866 there were 160,000 Episcopal communicants; in 1900, 720,000. Organized diocesan and missionary work expanded to include the whole of the United States and its dependencies, as well as areas in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. From 1867 onward the American bishops participated regularly in the meetings of the Anglican Communion known as the LAMBETH CONFERENCES.

With other American churches, the Episcopal Church, particularly since 1900, has championed the cause of a Christian social order. In numerous pronouncements its general conventions have called for social justice, the elimination of poverty and prejudice, opportunity for self-development, and fair shares for all in the gains of progress.

Another and different kind of development came in 1913 when the general convention passed a canon for the recognition of religious communities, significant as the first legislation of its kind since the Reformation (see RELI-GIOUS ORDERS, ANGLICAN-EPISCOPALIAN).

Liturgical Reforms. In the 1970s, the Episcopalians engaged in the process of liturgical reform that involved the experimental use of proposed new liturgies, inspired by the liturgical reforms of VATICAN COUNCIL II. In 1976, the general convention approved a measure for the use of the proposed Book of Common Prayer, ad experimentum. The proposed prayer book received both accolades and criticisms. Many praised it for its use of contemporary language and its endeavors to incorporate the best of 20th-century historical liturgical scholarship. While a small minority thought that the latter resulted in a prayer book that was more "Catholic" than its predecessors, a great majority of its detractors were unhappy with the inclusion of contemporary language in the proposed prayer book, as contrasted with the classic dignity of the Elizabethan idiom. Nevertheless, at the 1979 general convention the new prayer book was passed by an overwhelming majority. This was the first revision of the American Book of Common Prayer which utilized contemporary language (in the Rite B texts), while at the same time retaining the traditional language in the Rite A texts. In conjunction with this revision, a new hymnal was issued in 1982.

Women's Ordination. The controversy over women's ordination became a great concern in the Episcopal Church in the 1970s. Opponents of women's ordination fell into two camps: those who believed that it was theologically impossible for women to be ordained because it ran counter to Scripture and tradition, and those who believed that this was an issue to be decided not by the Episcopal Church on its own, but by the Universal Church at some sort of ecumenical council. Nevertheless, the 1970 general convention authorized the ordination of women deacons. This lead to the ordination of the first woman priest in 1976. The year 1988 witnessed the election of the Rev. Barbara C. Harris as the suffragan bishop of Massachusetts, and she was ordained the first woman bishop in the historic succession in 1989.

Doctrine. The Episcopal Church holds to the Apostles' and Nicene creeds as doctrinal symbols. At its general convention of 1801 it accepted with some modifications the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES of the Church of England as a general statement of doctrine; but adherence to them as a creed was not demanded. Of the Thirty-Nine Articles, the 21st article is excluded, and the 8th, 35th and 36th articles are accepted in a modified form. The Church expects all of its members to be loyal to the doctrine, discipline, and worship as proposed by the "one, holy, Catholic, Apostolic Church" of all ages and as based on the Holy Scriptures. Clergymen must subscribe to the declaration "I do believe the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments to be the Word of God, and to contain all things necessary to salvation, and I do solemnly engage to conform to the doctrine, discipline, and worship of the Episcopal Church in the United States of America." A wide latitude of interpretation exists, however, in the positions known as HIGH CHURCH, LOW CHURCH, and BROAD CHURCH, differentiated by the relatively high importance or low importance or liberal interpretation given to the episcopate, priesthood, sacraments, and liturgical ceremonies. These positions reflect the "Catholic" and "Evangelical" elements in the Church: Catholic, as the Anglican Congress of 1954 put it, "in seeking to do justice to the wholeness of Christian truth, in emphasizing continuity through the Episcopate and in retaining the historic Creeds and Sacraments of undivided Christendom; and Evangelical in its commission to proclaim the Gospel and in its emphasis on personal faith in Jesus Christ as Savior."

Organization and Structure. The system of ecclesiastical government in the Episcopal Church includes parish or local congregations, dioceses, provinces, and the general convention. Officers of the parish are the rector, who must be a priest; wardens, representing the body of the parish; and members of the vestry, who are the trustees of the parish corporation. The direction of spiritual affairs is exclusively in the hands of the rector. The diocese, consisting of a number of parishes, is governed by a bishop; and the diocesan convention, which is held annually, is presided over by the bishop and is composed of both priests and laity. Each diocese adopts its own constitution for the regulation of its internal affairs, but no canon or regulation may be contrary to the constitution and canons of the general convention. A bishop is elected by the diocese, but the election must be approved by a majority of the standing committees of the dioceses in the United States and by a majority of the bishops having jurisdiction. The bishop may have a coadjutor bishop who has the right of succession as head of the diocese, and may also have suffragan bishops as assistants, but these bishops have limited authority and do not have the right of succession. Missionary bishops are elected by the House of Bishops, subject to confirmation by the House of Deputies if the general convention is in session; if it is not in session, then confirmation must be made by the standing committees of the dioceses.

The supreme governing body is the general convention; it meets every three years and consists of two houses, the House of Bishops and the House of Deputies, each of which sits and deliberates separately. The House of Bishops has as its members all bishops; the House of Deputies is composed of delegates, consisting of not more than four clergy and four laypersons elected from each diocese. In addition, each missionary district within the boundaries of the United States is entitled to one clerical and one lay deputy. Either house may propose new legislation, and all enactments of the convention must be passed by both houses. In this way the laity, ever since the general convention of 1789, has had a responsible share in the legislative action of the Church.

Ecumenical Relations Presenting the Episcopal Church as the best hope for promoting Christian unity in the United States, Rev. William R. Huntington, in The Church-Idea, An Essay Towards Unity (1870), offered as a basis for unity what he declared were the Anglican principles: the Scriptures as the word of God, the primitive creeds as the rule of faith, the two Sacraments ordained by Christ, and the episcopate as the keystone of unity. These four points were accepted by the general convention of 1886 meeting in Chicago and became known as the Chicago Quadrilateral. Two years later the third Lambeth Conference offered to the world an almost identical version, which has since been called the LAMBETH QUAD-RILATERAL.

These early attempts at Christian unity were partially responsible for further attempts in 1910. In that year Charles H. BRENT, then bishop of the Philippine Islands, imbued with a vision obtained at the missionary conference held in Edinburgh, Scotland, made a stirring speech at the U.S. general convention, urging a world meeting on faith and order. The convention appointed a joint commission to attempt such a conference. The first world meeting on faith and order met at Lausanne, Switzerland, in 1927. In 1948 the Faith and Order movement merged with the Life and Work movement to form the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, whose avowed purpose is worldwide Christian unity. The Episcopal Church is represented both in the World Council and in the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST in the United States.

In 1960 Rev. Eugene Carson Blake, stated clerk of the United Presbyterian Church, made a formal proposal that his church and the Episcopal Church form "a plan of church union both catholic and reformed." The Episcopal Church accepted the invitation and formed the CON-SULTATION ON CHURCH UNION together with the United Presbyterian Church, the United Church of Christ, the Christian Churches (Disciples of Christ), the Methodist Church, and the Evangelical United Brethren Church (which later merged with the Methodist Church to become the United Methodist Church).

Since the 1970s, the Episcopal Church has engaged in formal dialogues with the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Presbyterian and Lutheran communions. In 1999, the Episcopal Church and the EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN AMERICA concluded an agreement for full communion partnership.

Bibliography: R. W. ALBRIGHT, A History of the Protestant Episcopal Church (New York 1964). E. C. CHORLEY, Men and Movements in the American Episcopal Church (New York 1946). G. E. DEMILLE, The Episcopal Church Since 1900 (New York 1955). J. T. ADDISON, The Episcopal Church in the United States (New York 1951). F. V. MILLS, Bishops by Ballot: An Eighteenth-Century Ecclesiastical Revolution (New York 1978). R. B. MULLIN, Episcopal Vision/American Reality: High Church Theology and Social Thought in Evangelical America (New Haven 1986). D. L. HOLMES, A Brief History of the Episcopal Church (Valley Forge, Pa. 1993). C. M. PRELINGER, Episcopal Women: Gender, Spirituality, and Commitment in an American Mainline Denomination (New York 1992). P. W. DARLING, New Wine: The Story of Women Transforming Leadership and Power in the Episcopal Church (Cambridge, Mass. 1994). N. L. RHODEN, Revolutionary Anglicanism: The Colonial Church of England Clergy during the American Revolution (New York 1999). R. W. PRICHARD, A History of the Episcopal Church, (rev. ed. Harrisburg, PA 1999). G. S. CADY and C. WEBBER, Lutherans and Episcopalians Together: A Guide to Understanding (Cambridge, Mass. 2001).

[R. MATZERATH/C. E. SIMCOX/EDS.]

EPISCOPAL CONFERENCES

Episcopal conferences embody the collegial (conciliar or synodal) exercise of church authority by the bishops of a region or a nation, arising from the recognition in Lumen gentium, no. 23, of subsidiarity on one hand and the personal responsibility of archdioceses and dioceses to collaborate on the other. Contemporary determinations about episcopal conferences flow from three historical items: the revision of the Code of Canon Law in 1983; the 1985 Synod of Bishops, held to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the end of the Second Vatican Council; and Apostolos suos, the motu proprio of Pope John Paul II on May 21, 1998, that addresses the theological and juridical nature of episcopal conferences.

Conferences of bishops, or national episcopal conferences, originate during the nineteenth century in Europe—for example, Belgium (1830), Germany (1848), Austria (1849), and regional meetings in Italy—but they have deeper roots in the ancient practice of the Church to organize assemblies of bishops at the level of ecclesiastical provinces. In the Eastern Church, these provinces comprise metropolitan and suffragan dioceses; in the Latin Church, the archdioceses and dioceses of a particular geographic region form provinces. The latter have long standing ecclesiastical recognition according to canon 292 of the 1917 Code of Canon Law, while the former received definitive canonical status in 1965 at Vatican Council II with the decree Christus Dominus, nos. 37 to 38, and the specifications set forth by Pope Paul VI in his apostolic letter, Ecclesiae sanctae of Aug. 5, 1966 (section 1, no. 41).

European assemblies of bishops had their importance recognized as akin to ecclesiastical provinces, but these meetings took place in a historical context of rising European nationalism that often cast liberalism and democracy as oppressors to institutional Catholicism, specifically to the Holy See. In the United States of America, the first national conference of bishops took place in September 1919, although annual meetings of the metropolitan archbishops took place in the final decades of the previous century. In subsequent years, the American episcopate met in annual conference and transacted business first as the National Catholic Welfare Conference and then after Vatican II under two titles: the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the United States Catholic Conference. In 2000, the episcopate reorganized again as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops.

1983 Code of Canon Law. Chapter four of book two, "The People of God," of the 1983 Code includes 13 canons (447–59) dealing with the general nature and responsibility of episcopal conferences. The canons are largely derived from the conciliar decree Christus Dominus on the pastoral office of bishops in the Church. The canons on national conferences constitute a fourth illustration of the groupings of particular churches, or dioceses, in the organizational structure of the Catholic Church.

The canons embody two aspects of conferences in which they differ from the ancient tradition of particular councils: They are permanent bodies (c. 447), not occasional assemblies, and they have the canonical character of juridic persons in the Church (c. 449, §2). Canons 448 and 450 establish the membership of national conferences, respecting the competence of the Holy See sated in canon 449, §1. Canons 451 to 459 set the composition and operating procedures of the conference. Canon 455 merits particular notice. The canon deals with a great number of practical applications, but it also raises serious theological implications, precisely because it touches the autonomy of individual bishops and the relationship of diocesan bishops with each other and the Holy See. Early recognition of this difficulty appeared in a Nov. 8, 1983 letter of the Cardinal Secretary of State to each national episcopal conference indicating where the conference (a) may and (b) must issue local norms (see Communicationes 15 (1983):135–39.)

1985 Synod of Bishops. With respect to conferences of bishops, the synod members wrestled with two tendencies: one seeing episcopal conferences as a centralizing influence in a nation or region and the other seeing the responsibility and innate power of the bishop of the individual, particular church. A 1988 letter from the Congregation of bishops focused on the theological and the juridic status of national conferences.

On the theological status, the letter repeatedly draws a sharp line between episcopal collegiality (itself the expression of the communion of the local churches) in the full or strict sense and in the partial or limited sense. They are judged collegial only in an analogical and in exact sense. Admitting that the remote foundation of conferences is in the particular (provincial or regional) councils held since the end of the second century, the text sharply distinguishes councils and conferences and dwells upon the pastoral utility of the conferences. The latter are said to lack any proper magisterial office, although their teachings are to be received with a "religious submission of mind" in accord with canon 753.

On the juridic status, the Roman letter dealt with the conferences in three sections: (1) restraints on teaching, conceived merely as "applying pronouncements of the magisterium of the universal Church"; (2) the distinction between the authority of the individual diocesan bishop and the conferences, with the actions of the conferences limited to "moral authority" in most instances; and (3) proposals for consensus for nonbinding decisions, with special attention to the danger of a conference's subsidiary organs, commissions, or offices being confused with the conference itself.

Critique of the Roman letter saw many of the concerns as matters of ecclesiastical polity rather than theology and church law. Challenges were made for more precision in terminology and a thorough grounding of both the theological and juridical status of national conferences in conciliar, canonical, papal, historical, and liturgical references. The response of the bishops of the United States was that a new draft should be prepared with the collaboration of representative bishops, canonists, theologians, and historians.

Apostolos suos. The motu proprio of May 21, 1998, represents the response to request of the 1988 synod of bishops and subsequent consultations. The document contains four sections. Section one traces major theological-historical moments of the collegial structure or permanent assembly of the apostles as constituted by the Lord Jesus. Section two addresses collegial union among bishops as it touches on the themes of unity, collegiality, and joint pastoral action. Section three sets forth Pope John Paul II's understanding of the conference of bishops as a permanent institution, the issues that currently call for the joint action of the bishops, the manner in which episcopal conferences are to organize territorially, their composition, especially with respect to deliberative or consultative voting power, and finally the authority of the episcopal conference with respect to the authority of the diocesan bishop and the requirements of a recognitio of the Apostolic See. Section four sets down complementary norms regarding the conference of bishops.

[A. ESPELAGE]

EPISTEMOLOGY

A term that derives from the Greek $\dot{\epsilon}\pi\iota\sigma\tau\dot{\eta}\mu\eta$ and $\lambda\dot{\delta}\gamma\varsigma$ meaning the science of KNOWLEDGE; in its broadest signification it refers simply to an investigation of knowledge and its problems. A synonymous term is criteriology, from the Greek $\kappa\rho\ell\nu\omega$ meaning to distinguish or judge, which implies the testing of knowledge to distinguish the true from the false. See CRITERION (CRITERIOLOGY). Related to these are the expressions critique of knowledge and GNOSEOLOGY; the former is Kantian in origin and is much used in contemporary philosophy, whereas the latter predominates in European usage. Among scholastics all of these terms are taken to mean the science of true and certain knowledge.

It may be said that epistemology, in its present state of development, is the newest, the most unfinished, and the most unsatisfactory area of philosophical investigation. It is also the most controversial. There is no unanimity about its name, its subject matter, or even the precise problems it attempts to solve. Some important philosophers regard it as a wholly synthetic discipline that owes its existence neither to the demands of reality nor to the exigencies of the human mind, but only to the need for a reaction against false and misleading theories of knowledge. Their point seems to be that an integral REALISM need not be, and even cannot be, critical. Yet the fact remains that there is, and always has been, a critical problem; this is what assures epistemology of its proper place among the philosophical disciplines. The fact that it has become prominent only in modern times and that it was dealt with summarily by ancient and medieval thinkers does not lessen the need to solve the problems associated with its critique of knowledge.

Greek and Medieval Origins. Since men have always asked questions about knowledge and have always been concerned with distinguishing the true from the false, epistemology has a long history. Before the golden age of Greek philosophy, it was natural for men to be less interested in knowledge than in the world of nature. Yet the difficulty of penetrating into nature's secrets gave rise to many different interpretations and conclusions; the very multiplicity of cosmological systems, in fact, prompted the skepticism of the SOPHISTS. Because many mistakes were made, it was easy for the skeptic to find a willing ear for his claim that truth is unattainable. It took the profounder minds of SOCRATES, PLATO, and AR-ISTOTLE to produce a reaction against this early skepticism, and in their investigations and conclusions are to be found the origins of a genuine scientific epistemology. Particularly with Aristotle was begun the ordered statement of what can now be recognized as the main epistemological tradition, one in accord with the common sense of the ordinary man but going far beyond the latter's primitive indications. The main ideas of this tradition are the recognition of the difference between sensory and intellectual knowledge; a basing of the abstract knowledge of the INTELLECT in a sensory content that depends totally on EXPERIENCE; the denial of INNATISM; the outline of a theory of ABSTRACTION; and, in general, the complex of doctrines that has come to be known as moderate realism, wherein a balanced doctrine of UNIVERSALS makes both PHILOSOPHY and SCIENCE possible. The Aristotelian view allows for a theory of truth and a theory of error, and recognizes that the mind of man is capable of distinguishing between the one and the other.

After Aristotle came a rapid decline toward the MA-TERIALISM of the Epicureans and the Stoics, with its attendant SKEPTICISM. This attitude persisted roughly to the time of St. AUGUSTINE, with whom there was an accent on the theory of ILLUMINATION and a tendency toward the radical intellectualism of NEOPLATONISM. Augustinian views had a strong influence during the early medieval period. They were counteracted during the high scholastic period, however, as the works of Aristotle were recovered and much of their content incorporated into Western thought. The Aristotelian development reached its zenith in the synthesis of St. THOMAS AQUINAS and the allied realism of DUNS SCOTUS, although it also gave rise to epistemological difficulties associated with the Latin AVERROISM OF SIGER OF BRABANT (see DOUBLE TRUTH, THEORY OF).

After the golden age of SCHOLASTICISM, Aristotelian realism gave way to NOMINALISM, and this in turn prepared the way for EMPIRICISM and a return to materialism. Attempts were made to revive the older epistemological tradition in the writings of Cardinal Tommaso de Vio CA-JETAN, Silvestri FERRARIENSIS, Francisco SUÁREZ, and JOHN OF ST. THOMAS. The results, however, were sporadic and the influence of these men severely limited.

Modern Development. The reversal of the antiintellectualist trend really began only with René DES-CARTES, who initiated a movement to restore the rights of the intellect, and in so doing became the father of modern philosophy. Although a great mathematician, Descartes was a poor epistemologist, if only because he attempted to apply mathematical methodology to all areas of knowledge. His unsound psychology, moreover, left his epistemological doctrines vitiated by assumptions that have plagued the science of knowledge ever since. Descartes denied the true value of SENSATION; he reintroduced the innate ideas of Plato, and is responsible for the representationist conception of knowledge-a conception that has been consistently attributed to scholastics, though they never maintained it. Descartes's intentions were the best; he meant to be a realist and to defend the primacy of reason, but his presuppositions led inevitably to idealism and skepticism, and he succeeded only in fostering an absolute DUALISM of mind and matter that still confuses contemporary thought.

Epistemology degenerated after Descartes until, near the end of the 18th century, I. KANT began a philosophical revolution that proposed to eliminate all unwarranted assumptions and to make a genuine critique of knowledge. Here Kant did not succeed, even though he put at the service of philosophy a penetrating and methodical intelligence, persevering labor, and excellent intention; for he was both profoundly intelligent and ignorant of the long epistemological tradition that had preceded him. Ignoring the fact that man's intellectual knowledge is abstract-a fact that forced Aristotle and St. Thomas to admit an abstractive power in man's intellect-Kant saw no alternative between the innate ideas of Plato and Descartes, which he rejected, and his own theory, which would have intelligence informing the data of sensibility and imposing its own forms upon such data. For him, the mind makes things intelligible and imposes intelligibility upon them; the real in itself is unknowable. Metaphysics, in this view, becomes impossible and knowledge ends in subjectivism and AGNOSTICISM. Anticipating the impasse to which his speculative theory would lead, Kant thereupon developed his critique of practical reason and prepared the way for VOLUNTARISM and PRAGMATISM. Contemporary IDEALISM in epistemology also stems from Kant. At its opposite pole is the line of thought traceable to D. HUME that has accompanied the development of the natural sciences and has manifested itself in various forms such as empiricism, POSITIVISM, SCIENTISM, utilitarianism, and INSTRUMENTALISM.

Epistemological Problems. Textbooks and treatises on epistemology written over the past 50 years frequently contradict one another, offer totally different approaches, and fail to agree even on the basic problems. There are reasons that explain this situation; without doubt a preoccupation with combatting the subjectivism and skepticism that have been the legacy of Descartes, Kant, and Hume has played its part in promoting the general confusion. Defensiveness and negativism have marked most attempts to develop an epistemology within the scholastic tradition. Yet epistemology is not negative; it is a positive investigation of knowledge. Rather than being defensive it must assert the true claims to be made for knowledge in view of reason's nature and role in the life of man.

Although neither Aristotle nor St. Thomas Aquinas wrote treatises that were exclusively epistemological, both consistently made use of a positive and scientifically ordered critique of knowledge in their works. Since this is interwoven with different contents in their writings on many subjects, some effort is required to bring its precise epistemological bearing to light. In what follows an attempt is made to outline the basic epistemological problems implicit in the Aristotelian and Thomistic corpus, relying heavily on an analysis of such problems already provided by L. M. Régis (see bibliog.).

St. Thomas, using Aristotle's method, had pointed out that in a properly scientific investigation of anything only four types of question may be asked. These are: Does the thing exist? What is it? What are its properties? Why does it have these properties? (In 2 anal. post. 1.2). The first and second questions have to do with the composition of essence and existence, whereas the third and fourth have to do with the composition of substance and accident. Frequently, the first question does not arise because the existence of the thing may be evident to the senses or to the intelligence. In this case, the answers to the remaining three questions, formulated in series of demonstrations, constitute the science of that particular subject. It is obvious that in many cases the knowledge sought will be extensive and will give rise to a vast number of further questions; it is obvious also that either the imperfections of man's intelligence or the difficulties of the matter under investigation may make it difficult or impossible to proceed to any great length with the inquiry. But the fact remains that these four questions furnish the scientific framework in which any type of research can be pursued.

Applied to epistemology, this basic methodology suggests four questions about knowledge: Is there knowledge? What is knowledge? What are the properties of knowledge? Why does it have these properties? But knowledge is a fact of immediate experience, and thus the first question does not arise. The entire study of epistemology, therefore, may be subsumed under the remaining three questions.

Nature of Knowledge. As to the question, What is knowledge?, knowledge presents itself in man's experience as a complex of activities that occur interiorly and yet put him in contact with the exterior world in which he lives. The investigation of knowledge, as such, belongs properly to psychology, and it is from this science that epistemology accepts its basic principles. Fundamental to an understanding of knowledge is the fact that to know is not a physical, chemical, or mechanical activity, but a vital and immanent activity that is found only in living beings. Irreducibly different from transient activity, it is self-perfecting and terminates in the agent wherein it originates. This means that knowledge is a QUALITY within man, a self-modification whose formal type is specified by its relation to something other than the agent, i.e., the object or thing known.

The subject-object paradox accentuates a mysterious aspect of knowledge that complicates all epistemological problems. The total interiority of knowing stresses the subjective element, to which proper attention must be given—although too much attention here leads to subjectivism and idealism. Simultaneously, knowledge demands that one recognize its exteriority, for knowing makes things other than the knower present to him. The first area of epistemological research, therefore, is the explanation of this subject-object relationship. The elucidation of its interiority and its simultaneous exteriority must be effected and related to the IMMANENCE and selfperfectiveness of cognitive operations (see INTENTIONALI-TY; OBJECTIVITY; CONSCIOUSNESS).

Properties of Knowledge. The second general area of epistemological research is concerned with the answer to the question, What are the properties of knowledge? More precisely, it is concerned with the properties of TRUTH and FALSITY. A kind of truth is associated with apprehensive knowledge on both the sensory and intellectual levels (see APPREHENSION, SIMPLE). This truth follows from the necessary relationship between the knowing powers and their respective objects; it is necessary and unavoidable and, in a sense, is built into the cognitive operations, for these may not be false in apprehension. This kind of truth, though naturally guaranteed, is imperfect; indeed, it is as imperfect as the apprehensive knowledge of which it is a property. Apprehensive knowledge, the simple presentation of things, furnishes bits and snatches of reality on both the sensory and intellectual levels. It enables man to grasp isolated aspects of things without unifying these as they are actually found in reality.

The genuine problem of truth is the problem of the unification of this apprehensive knowledge on the intellectual level. The human intelligence has a passion for unity that leads it to integrate the fragmentary bits of knowledge gained through apprehension. This unification is brought about by a JUDGMENT or a series of judgments. When such unification is made in a way that adequates the actual unity found in reality, the mind judging produces a PROPOSITION or statement that is true. When, on the contrary, the proposition is at variance with the mode of being found in reality, the result is falsity. The very possibility of truth is therefore implicit in the difference between the two intellectual functions of apprehension and judgment. Whereas the former simply presents an object to the mind, the latter is a dynamic act wherein the mind not merely reports the things it sees but takes a stand and says something about them. It is in this enunciation that truth or falsity can properly be found. The problems surrounding truth, judgment, enunciation, and the assurance that at least some judgments may be adequated to reality form the second area of epistemological inquiry.

Explanation of Properties. The third general question that faces the epistemologist is: Why must knowledge have either truth or falsity? One may put the question in a different form, e.g., What is infallible knowledge? Seemingly simple, the latter question encompasses a vast series of problems that are extremely complex. The first problem necessarily concerns the very existence of truths that the human intellect must know infallibly, that it cannot miss, that are forced upon it by knowledge it must have and cannot avoid having. If there are such truths, it is important to discover what they are, and then, possessing them, to inquire how they may be used in the further investigation of reality.

St. Thomas was quite certain that FIRST PRINCIPLES exist and can be, in fact, must be known. "In its origin all knowledge consists in becoming aware of the first indemonstrable principles" (De ver. 10.6). "Among things apprehended there is to be found a certain order. The notion which we grasp before anything else and which is included in every apprehension is being. And on the notion of being and non-being is based the first indemonstrable principle, namely, that the same thing cannot be affirmed and denied at the same time. On this principle, in turn, are based all other principles'' (Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2). Here begins all CERTITUDE, a property of truth that arises in the first place from necessary judgments. But St. Thomas warns quite clearly that this is not the last word to be said about the subject. The knowledge of these principles is, properly understood, infallible, yet these are "the beginning and not the end of human enquiry, coming to us from nature and not because of our search for truth" (C. gent. 3.37).

The knowledge of first principles is vague and general; it gives absolutely certain knowledge about the most universal characteristics of all things, yet tells nothing about the more detailed and specific qualities. These must be sought out, and cannot be deduced from the general truths, though the latter always control the more particular truths. The knowledge of first principles does not offer the final answer, but only the starting point from which man's reason, with full knowledge of the controls it has in its possession and assurance of the absolute validity of these principles properly applied, can proceed to the long and often difficult task of searching out more detailed truths. But the first principles of thought are the foundation of all intellectual constructions. There is, moreover, no certitude in the last analysis unless all knowledge be resolved back to first principles whose own certitude is based on immediate evidence.

From further material, supplied by the senses, the intellect perceives other principles that are first within particular orders of knowledge. The precise form these judgments take is analyzed by St. Thomas at the beginning of the De veritate (1.1). Such judgments are simply the primary mental assents at which the human mind naturally arrives in its inspection of reality, both in terms of the general modes of being common to everything and the special modes of being proper to the different kinds of things in man's experience. The judgments relating to the general modes of being concern the TRANSCENDEN-TALS and are the source of all the principles and conclusions of METAPHYSICS. The judgments that relate to the special modes of being concern the categories or various types of reality and are the source of all the principles and conclusions of the special sciences (see SCIENCES, CLASSI-FICATION OF). The ultimate test of the truth of any judgment, then, is the analytic resolution of that judgment back to first principles, which is the reason that St. Thomas can say: "There is never falsity in the intellect if the resolution to first principles be rightly carried out" (De ver. 1.12). The human intellect does not learn these principles, nor does it assume them; it arrives at them naturally and necessarily and immediately once it attains a knowledge of the terms that make them up.

The human mind thus attains truth and certitude by grasping first principles and then proceeding from these to conclusions. This does not mean that all knowledge can be deduced from these principles, but only that before anything can be deduced they must be admitted and applied. As regards contingent things, for example, in research in the natural sciences, this means that material things are investigated, weighed, and measured in the light of primary principles—both the first principles of metaphysics and the first principles of the special science involved. The application of these principles to the data of experience produces the conclusions of the particular science.

There is thus a minimum of truth that each man must possess, and from which he can then proceed to knowledge of other truths. In other words, not only can man attain to truth, but to some extent he must attain it; there are certain truths he cannot miss. As St. Thomas says in this regard: "Although no man can attain to perfect apprehension of truth, yet no one is so completely deprived of it as not to know any at all. The knowledge of truth is easy in this sense, that immediately evident principles by means of which we come to truth are evident for all men" (In 2 meta. 1.275). The epistemological problems that arise in connection with the reasoning process include, e.g., an examination of the process of REASONING itself; an examination of the various types of reasoning, such as ANALYSIS AND SYNTHESIS, INDUCTION and DE-DUCTION, and finally the question of the validity of the evidence that conclusions borrow from principles. To many of these problems there are only partial or inadequate solutions, and to some of them there are no solutions at all. The work of the epistemologist is to provide answers to such questions on the basis of a sound logic, psychology, and metaphysics.

See Also: KNOWLEDGE, THEORIES OF; CRITICISM, PHILOSOPHICAL; DOUBT; WONDER; OPINION.

Bibliography: L. M. RÉGIS, Epistemology, tr. I. C. BYRNE (New York 1959). R. HOUDE and J. P. MULLALY, eds., Philosophy of Knowledge (Philadelphia 1960). J. MARITAIN, Distinguish to Unite, or The Degrees of Knowledge, tr. G. B. PHELAN (New York 1959). P. COFFEY, Epistemology, 2 v. (New York 1917; repr. Gloucester, MA 1958). G. VAN RIET, L'Épistémologie thomiste (Louvain 1946).

[G. C. REILLY]

EPISTLES, NEW TESTAMENT

Twenty-one of the New Testament's 27 books are known as ''epistles.'' The name derives from the Greek and Latin words, epistolē, epistola, meaning letter. Tradition ascribes 14 epistles to the Apostle Paul, seven to other authors. Late nineteenth– and early twentiethcentury discovery in ancient ruins, rubbish heaps, and tombs included many papyri containing Hellenistic letters. The discovery of these letters enabled biblical scholars to come to a better understanding of the art of letterwriting in the Hellenistic era than had previously been possible.

Pauline Epistles. The oldest of the New Testament epistles is Paul's first letter to the Thessalonians. The earliest Christian communities who expected an imminent Parousia and accepted the Hebrew scriptures as their own scripture experienced no need to produce any literary documentation for their own use. Paul, on the other hand, experienced the need to keep in touch with the communities that he recently evangelized. His letter tells the story of his attempt to stay in contact with the Thessalonians after he had left Macedonia. Unable to return personally to Thessalonica, Paul first sent Timothy as his personal envoy to strengthen and encourage the Thessalonians, then he sent a letter to respond to what was lacking in their faith.

Paul's letter was written in the style of a Hellenistic personal letter. It opens with the name of the sender, the name of the recipient, and a brief greeting-the first things that would be read when the scroll was unrolled and read aloud to the designated recipient(s). Paul omits the customary wish for good health. In its stead he mentions his prayer of thanksgiving for those to whom he was writing as did several other letter-writers of his time. After the body of the letter, containing the specifics of his communication, Paul offers a farewell greeting. Paul did not sign the earliest of his extant letters in his own hand as he would some of the later letters (1 Corinthians; Galatians). Paul's letters frequently address the community as his "brothers and sisters" and speak of his desire to be with them. These features of his epistolary style correspond to the norms of Hellenistic letter writing. His contemporaries considered that, in addition to whatever specific message it contained, the major purpose of a letter was to serve as a means being present when absent (parousia) and as an expression of the friendship between the letter writer and its recipient (philophronēsis). In the largely illiterate Hellenistic world it was customary for a letter-writer to dictate his letters and for a reader, often the one who delivered the letter, to read its contents to its intended audience. The letter was normally "written" and "read" as an oral composition. The message of a letter (homilia), both ancient and contemporary, is always situational. Scholars accordingly speak of the occasional nature of a letter. A letter is always written on a given occasion to a particular recipient and for a specific purpose. These elements of the literary form of a letter must be carefully weighed by those who wish to understand Paul's letters as he wrote them.

Before the first of the canonical gospels had been written, the memory of Paul's creative use of a letter to communicate some aspect of the gospel message had a major influence on the church and was an important piece of church history. The "apostolic letter" became a common way to proclaim the gospel. Thus, letters were written by Clement, Polycarp, and Ignatius respectively to the Corinthians, the Philippians, and various churches in Asia Minor.

By the end of the twentieth century biblical scholars generally held that only seven of the 14 New Testament epistles attributed to Paul were actually written by him (Romans, 1–2 Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, 1 Thessalonians, Philemon). Six of the other epistles attributed to Paul (Ephesians, Colossians, 2 Thessalonians, 1–2 Timothy, Titus), the so-called Pauline pseudepigrapha, have the form of a letter written by Paul but were not written by him. Rather, they were written by disciples of Paul who used Paul's authority to communicate an important message to one or another of his church communities.

The practice of writing in another's name was not altogether unusual in the Hellenistic world. The ancients readily considered as spurious works written in another's name for base motives, for example, for the sake of profit or to discredit an authority. They were not ready to condemn as false works written in another's name when such works were intended to honor the person whose name they bore or when they were intended to use his authority and some of his essential ideas in order to address a situation that he had not personally addressed.

With the acceptance of Ephesians, Colossians, 2 Thessalonians, 1-2 Timothy, and Titus in the Canon, the church expresses a conviction that Paul's authority lies behind these epistles and that they are a legitimate, Spiritinspired, expression of the Pauline tradition. The cultural and religious situation which allowed anonymous Christian writers to compose the Pauline pseudepigrapha allowed other anonymous authors to write James, 1-2 Peter, 1-2-3 John, Jude, the "catholic" or "general" epistles of the New Testament. The qualification derives from the fact that these texts were ostensibly intended for various people in the "dispersion" (James, 1 Peter), the faithful (2 Peter), or those who had been called (Jude) rather than for specific communities as were Paul's letters. James, 1-2 Peter and Jude have a typical epistolary opening, with mention of the sender, the recipient(s), and a greeting. Otherwise their style and content is quite unlike that of a typical Hellenistic letter. In the case of these letters the form of the apostolic letter was used by anonymous authors to convey authentic early Christian teaching on pertinent topics.

Catholic Epistles. Among the catholic epistles the three Johannine letters form a group apart. The second and third epistle of John are real letters. Their length and their style make them, along with Paul's letter to Philemon, most similar to the letters found among Hellenistic papyri. An anonymous elder wrote 2 John and 3 John, respectively to a church and to Gaius. The First Letter of John, on the other hand, is totally lacking in epistolary features. This short treatise is included among the Johannine letters because of its similarities with the Fourth Gospel. In this respect it is somewhat similar to the Epistle to the Hebrews which makes no claim to have been a letter nor to have been written by Paul. Only its last three verses bear any real similarity with a letter and these may have later been added to an otherwise self-contained "word of exhortation" (Heb. 13.22).

Other Letters. The New Testament contains eight other epistolary compositions in addition to the traditional 21 epistles. The Book of Revelation contains "letters" to the seven churches of Asia Minor, Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea (2.1–3.22; cf. Rv 1.11). These "letters" are clearly written in the style of the Book of Revelation itself. That they were ostensibly written to churches in the Roman province of Asia where Paul had evangelized and that they are presented as having been written as letters bears testimony to the importance of literary form of Paul's apostolic letter in the early church.

The 29th epistle in the New Testament (Acts 15.23–29) is a communication from an apostolic and presbyteral group in Jerusalem to Gentile Christians in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia. Luke borrowed the letter from the Antiochene source that he used in the composition of Acts of the Apostles. The letter stipulates the conditions that Gentile Christians must meet if they are to enjoy table fellowship with Jewish Christians. Along among the New Testament letters, this letter to Gentiles opens and closes with the simple "greetings" (chairein) and "farewell" (errōsthe) of a typical Hellenistic letter.

Bibliography: R. F. COLLINS, Letters That Paul Did Not Write: The Epistle to the Hebrews and the Pauline Pseudepigrapha (GNS 28; Wilmington 1988); The Birth of the New Testament: The Origin and Development of the First Christian Generation (New York 1993). H. KOSKENNIEMI, Studien zur idee und Phraseologie des griechischen Briefes bis 400 n. Chr (AASF B 102/2; Helsinki 1956); J. MURPHY-O'CONNOR, Paul the Letter-Writer: His World, His Options, His Skills (GNS 41; Collegeville 1995); J. L. WHITE, Light from Ancient Letters (Philadelphia 1986).

[R. F. COLLINS]

EPISTOLAE OBSCURORUM VIRORUM

Humanistic anticlerical satire, the principal literary product of the controversy between Johann REUCHLIN and Johannes PFEFFERKORN and the Cologne theologians, over Pfefferkorn's proposal to destroy all Hebrew books. A bitter pamphlet war followed Pfefferkorn's proposal, and Reuchlin's objections received the support of nearly all humanists (see HUMANISM). In 1514 Reuchlin published a collection of commendatory letters, the Clarorum virorum epistolae, or Letters of Famous Men. The next year there appeared what purported to be a contrary collection of 41 letters written supposedly by Reuchlin's antagonists and addressed to Ortwin GRATIUS, leader of the Cologne theologians. This work, the Epistolae obscurorum virorum, or Letters of Obscure Men, was really a witty but scurrilous satire, presenting Reuchlin's foes as a self-confessed pack of ignorant obscurantists and unchaste priests. Its deliberately barbarous Latin underlined the charges of ignorance, and the supposed correspondents alternated between complacent descriptions of their own immorality and fatuous discussions of ridiculous "theological" questions. Beyond their indirect pleading of Reuchlin's cause, the letters expressed a mood of dangerous anticlericalism and tended to bring the whole clergy into disrepute. Alongside Gratius and Pfefferkorn, those chiefly attacked were Jacob van Hoogstraten, OP, the inquisitor of Cologne, and Arnold von Tungern, dean of the theological faculty. The Epistolae were an immense success among the educated, who did worse than oppose Reuchlin's enemies: they laughed at them. A second edition (1516) had seven additional letters, and in 1517 another 62 were added, and later that year, eight more. The authors remained anonymous. Many suspected ERASMUS, but the Epistolae originated in talks between the humanists CROTUS RUBIANUS and Ulrich von HUTTEN, though a number of other persons, including Hermann von dem Bussche and Nikolaus Gerbel, contributed. Crotus wrote most of the first collection; Hutten, most of those added in 1517.

Bibliography: Epistolae obscurorum virorum, ed. and tr. F. G. STOKES (London 1909), repr. of English text (New York 1964). H. HOLBORN, Ulrich von Hutten and the German Reformation, tr. R. H. BAINTON (New Haven 1937). W. BRECHT, Die Verfasser der Epistolae obscurorum virorum (Strasbourg 1904).

[C. G. NAUERT, JR.]

EPITHETS, DIVINE

The names of divinities and the epithets employed to characterize their powers and functions play an essential role in the history of religions. This article is confined to the use of epithets in Greek and Roman religion. The employment of epithets in other religions is treated in the respective articles devoted to them.

Epithets in Greek Religion. They are found frequently in poetry, especially in hymns; however, their occurrence in religious formulas is even more important as these reflect formal and official use. In Greek religion it is necessary to distinguish between epithets that apply to all gods and those that are appropriate for individual divinities. For easier intelligibility, the typical epithets selected are given in transliteration.

General Epithets. As the principle or beginning of all things, god is called archē (beginning) archós, archēgós, archēgétēs-all with the basic meaning of founder or leader; protos (first), or pater (father)defined more precisely by the addition of the adjectives áphthitos (imperishable), pantelēs (perfect), or megalonumos (illustrious). Gaia and Demeter especially are called meter. The divinity's sanctity is reflected by the epithet hágios (holy, replaced later by hierós or hagnós); his longevity and his immortality, by présbus (venerable) and athánatos (immortal); his happiness, by makários (blessed) and ólbios (happy); his power, by téleios (allpowerful), and his kindness by eumenes, epios, híleos, and phílos. Power and sovereignty are expressed by formulas with aeí (always), mónos (alone), pâs (all), or their compounds. A term like polutímētos (very revered) is reserved for divinity.

Epithets Applied to Individual Gods. Some are applied to a group of gods, as sotēr (savior) to Zeus, Apollo, Asclepius, and the Dioscuri; others more particularly to a given god, according to his appearance (an inheritance from ANTHROPOMORPHISM), his attributes, his origin, or his favorite locales. Thus, Apollo is called akersekómēs or chrusokómas because of his long golden hair, argurótoxos because of his silver bow, Dēlios after his birthplace, or Púthios after his chief temple at Pytho (Delphi). His sister, Artemis, is called iochéaira (archer), agróteira (huntress), or chrusēlakatos (with golden distaff). Other epithets are rather secondary appellations that are employed alone, as Lóxias and Phoîbos for Apollo, Brómios and 'Iakchos for Dionysus. Many are unexplained, such as Diáktoros and Erioúnios for Hermes.

Epithets in Roman Religion. A full index of Latin epithets is given in Carter (see bibliography). Among the general epithets, sanctus, which is rare in the literary texts, is very frequent in inscriptions, particularly in votive inscriptions. As regards individual gods, Ceres and Cybele are called alma, Apollo, Jupiter, and Mercury, bonus; and Liber (Bacchus) is often given the title or epithet Pater.

Bibliography: H. J. ROSE, The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. M. CARY et al. (Oxford 1949) 333–334. C. F. H. BRUCHMANN, "Epitheta deorum quae apud poetas graecos leguntur," Ausführliches Lexikon der griechischen und römischen Mythologie, ed. W. H. ROSCHER, Suppl. 1, (Leipzig 1893). J. B. CARTER, "Epitheta deorum quae apud poetas Latinos leguntur," (1902; ibid. Suppl. 2), with an excellent index, 107–154. K. KEYSSNER, Gottesvorstellung im griechischen Hymnus (Stuttgart 1932). H. DELEHAYE, Sanctus (Brussels 1927; reprint 1954).

[É. DES PLACES]

Elisabeth Eppinger.

EPPINGER, ELISABETH

Foundress of the Daughters of the DIVINE REDEEM-ER; b. Niederbronn, France, Sept. 9, 1814; d. Niederbronn, July 31, 1867. She was the eldest of the 11 children of simple, pious, and poor parents, George and Barbara (Vogt) Eppinger. Her formal education was limited, and she suffered long periods of physical illness as well as severe spiritual trials. In 1846 began a period of visions, revelations, and ecstasies. As the fame of her prophecies and ecstasies spread, she became known as the "Ecstatic of Niederbronn," and her advice was frequently sought. Her energetic and enlightened pastor and confessor, Father Jean Reichard, became convinced that these graces were supernatural; so did Bishop Raess of Strasbourg and the professors at the seminary there. After a remarkable cure of her illness, she was accepted as a postulant in the Sisters of Divine Providence of Ribeauvillé (1846), but before entering the community, heeded her bishop's urging and continued counseling at home. With permission she took the three vows of religion privately (1848). Along with Father Reichard she founded her religious congregation (1849) devoted originally to caring for the sick poor in their homes and aiding other poor persons. As Mother Marie Alphonse, her name in religion, she acted with great competence as superior general until her death, when the congregation had 372 sisters in 74 houses. Her beatification process has been instituted.

Bibliography: L. CRISTIANI, L'Extatique de Niederbronn (Paris 1958). A. RICHOMME, Mère Alphonse-Marie (Paris 1963). J. LEFLON, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932) 4.1:909–911.

[M. A. VARGA]

EPTADIUS, ST.

B. near Autun, France, c. 490; d. Montelon, France, 550. He was a serious boy at 12, a local scholar at 15, and a handsome young bridegroom at 20. Shortly after his marriage, he was struck by a stubborn fever. After a visit by three holy women, his faith and religion revived; he recovered, and then led a life of austerity and penance. Impressed by his virtue, Bp. Flavian (d. 614) of Autun wished to ordain him, but Eptadius fled. King CLOVIS, after making peace with the Burgundian King Gondobad (d. 516), planned to appoint Eptadius bishop of Auxerre. Although elected, Eptadius refused the dignity, compromised enough to accept the priesthood, and withdrew into the monastic community of Cervon, which he had organized. He was noted for his charity and his efforts to ransom captives. It is conjectured that he died at Montelon. Later his relics were taken to the BENEDICTINE monastery at Cervon, which gave rise to the theory that he was a Benedictine himself.

Feast: Aug. 24.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum Aug. 4:775–781. V. B. HENRY, Vie de saint Eptade (Avallon 1863). G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:354–355.

[B. CAVANAUGH]

EQUATORIAL GUINEA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Formerly known as either Spanish Guinea or the Province of Fernando Póo, the Republic of Equatorial Guinea includes a portion of the African mainland and five islands located in the Bight of Biafra, in the Gulf of Guinea 20 miles off the coast of CAMEROON. Equatorial Guinea includes the mainland province of Río Muni, bordered on the north by Cameroon, on the east and south by Gabon, and on the west by the Bight of Biafra. Its island territories include Corisco, Great Elobey, Little Elobey, Bioko (formerly Fernando Póo) and Annobón.

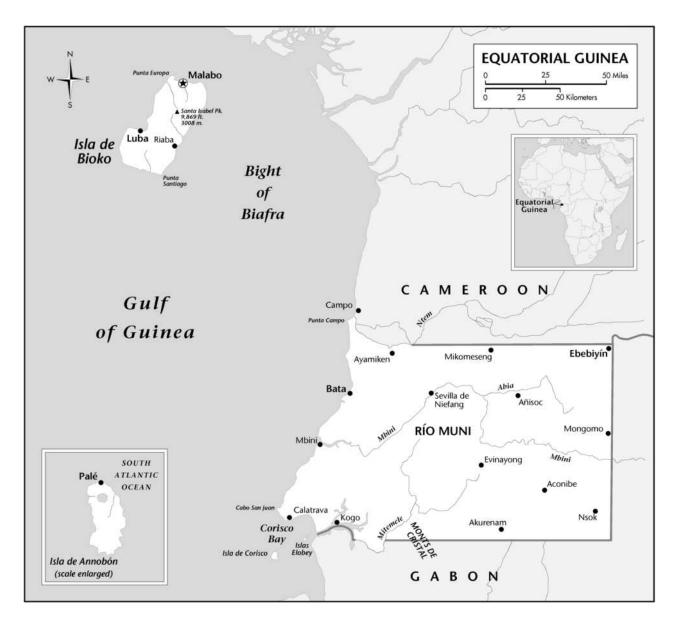

With a tropical climate, Equatorial Guinea is frequently visited by strong winds, and flash floods are common. Natural resources include recently discovered oil

Ca	pital: Malabo.
Siz	e: 10,831 sq. miles.
Po	pulation: 474,214 in 2000.
	nguages: Spanish and French; Fang, Bubi, Ibo, and other bal languages are spoken in various regions.
	ligions: 398,340 Roman Catholics (84%); 4,510 Muslims %); 21,340 Protestants (4.5%); 23,710 with traditional bel	iefs (5%); 26,314 without an organized faith.
Ar	chdiocese: Malabo, on the island of Bioko, with suffragans
Ba	ta and Ebebiyin, both on the African mainland.

reserves as well as small gold, manganese and uranium deposits. A volcanic island, Bioko, benefits from more fertile soil than does the Río Muni mainland, and for many years its cocoa, timber and coffee yields served as the region's main exports. In the forested mountainous interior of the island of Bioko live the aboriginal Bubi people. Other ethnic groups include Fang, Duala, Ibibion and Maka, who live on the mainland. Due to a succession of tyrannical and fiscally ineffective leaders, Equatorial Guinea remained one of Africa's poorest nations, its economy dependent on foreign aid from Spain. With the discovery of oil in the late 20th century its economy would stabilize.

The island of Bioko was discovered in 1471 and named after Fernando Póo, its Portuguese founder. Portuguese settlements were established in the region during the 16th century and slave trading became common. A Catholic mission established in 1740 failed, and the island was ceded to Spain in 1788. In 1829 Bioko began, with the consent of the Spanish crown, 15 years of British occupation that saw the arrival of English Baptist missionaries. British influences were eliminated in 1844 after control of the region reverted back to Spain. After 1841 the labors of Spanish chaplain Jeronimo de Usera were successful enough to bring other Catholic missionaries to the island. The apostolic prefecture of Annobón, Corisco and Fernando Póo was detached from the vicariate of the Two Guineas in 1855 and entrusted to the Jesuits between 1857 and 1872. Military chaplains were followed by a restored prefecture entrusted to the Claretians in 1882.

From 1857 to 1877 Spanish explorers mapped the nearby regions of the African mainland, and an agreement with the French government in 1900 determined the official boundaries of those regions to be under the control of Spain. With Río Muni now added to its jurisdiction, the region became a vicariate in 1904. The seat of the vicariate, Santa Isabel (now Malabo) on the north coast of Bioko, served as the capital of the region while it remained under Spanish control. Development of the island began in the 1920s, when the mainland became occupied.

In 1963 Equatorial Guinea was granted the right to limited self-rule, and full independence was granted five years later, on Oct. 12, 1968. Before Río Muni was detached as a separate vicariate in 1965, there were 180,000 Catholics in the vicariate, the highest percentage of Catholics in all of Africa. Unfortunately for those Catholics, as well as for the region's other inhabitants, the first ten years of independence brought death to many under the regime of President Macias Nguema, and the repression of the Catholic Church became one of his main efforts. His nephew, General Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, executed Nguema on Aug. 3, 1979 during a military coup that brought about a more peaceful era for the region. Lifting its repression against the Church and encouraged in its sporadic efforts toward democratization by Spain, Equatorial Guinea held its first "free" elections in 1993, where an overwhelming majority elected Teodoro Mbasogo president. Despite this move toward democratization, human rights violations, as well as a questionable election process, remained a concern of the United Nations throughout the 1990s, and the overwhelming election of ruling Democratic Party legislators in the March 1999 election did little to quell suspicions that the democratic process was compromised. In July 1999, 50 bishops from Central Africa met to discuss concerns over the fraud, tribalism and corruption that plagued not only Equatorial Guinea but also several of its African neighbors.

The country's 1995 constitution granted freedom of religion, and Catholicism remained the predominate faith due to its presence in the region over several centuries. Religious education remained mandatory in all state-run schools and a Catholic mass was incorporated into annual government celebrations of the nation's independence. However, in July of 1998 the government of Equatorial Guinea undertook several repressive measures. In addition to expelling three U.S.-sponsored foreign missionaries from the country, it began requiring priests to request permission before celebrating Mass or holding other assemblies. Church leaders saw this requirement as government retaliation against the open denouncement of government human rights abuses and other manifestations of corruption. It also closely followed the January of 1998 arrest of a Catholic priest in connection with a failed coup attempt the year before; the priest, Father Eduardo Losoha Belope, was still in prison in 2000.

By 2000 the region maintained 53 parishes, which were administered by 43 secular and 52 religious priests. In addition, 36 brothers and 222 sisters contributed to the social welfare of the region, their efforts focused through schools, hospitals and charitable organizations such as Caritas. Despite the escalation of government repression, Church leaders continued to speak out against human rights abuses and other corruption.

Bibliography: A. O. IBÁÑEZ, "Los misioneros Hijos del Inmaculado Corazón de María en Fernando Po," El Misionero, 25 (1948) 352–365. Oriente Cattolico (Vatican City 1962) 134–135. Annuario Pontificio (1964) 748.

[J. A. BELL/EDS.]

EQUIPROBABILISM

The moral system according to which in a doubt of conscience concerning the morality of a certain course of conduct, a middle way between law and liberty is to be taken. When the opinions on both sides are about equally probable, the opinion for liberty may be followed if the doubt concerns the existence of the law (whether there is a law, whether it extends to this case, etc.); but the law must be observed when the doubt concerns the cessation of the law (whether a law that certainly did exist has been fulfilled, whether it has been dispensed with, etc.). For in the former case liberty is in possession, in the latter case the law; and the fundamental principle of this system is "In a doubt the possessor is to be favored." Furthermore, if the opinion for liberty is notably more probable, whether the doubt concerns the existence or the cessation of the law, the opinion for liberty may be followed; if the opinion for law is notably more probable, the law must be observed. The chief defender of this opinion was St. Alphonsus Liguori, the patron of moralists and confessors.

See Also: CONSCIENCE; MORALITY, SYSTEMS OF; REFLEX PRINCIPLES; DOUBT, MORAL.

Bibliography: J. AERTNYS and C. A. DAMEN, Theologia moralis, 2 v. (16th ed. Turin 1950) 1:102–119. M. ZALBA, Theologiae moralis compendium, 2 v. (Madrid 1958) 1:676. D. M. PRÜMMER, Manuale theologiae moralis, ed. E. M. MÜNCH, 3 v. (10th ed. Barcelona 1945–46) 1:347–348. A. LIGUORI, Theologia moralis, ed. L. GAUDÉ, 4 v. (Rome 1905–12) 1:54–89.

[F. J. CONNELL]

EQUIVOCATION (LOGIC)

Equivocation, from the Latin aequa vox meaning similar sound, is one of the main sources of FALLACY, and may be defined as taking one meaning from a word, whereas another is intended or possible. Thus, it is the acceptance of one definite and particular signification of a term, with or without reflection, although the word in question permits a variety of interpretations. The result is usually a mistake in judgment. Equivocation itself is commonly the result of AMBIGUITY in speech or writing.

The fallacy can arise both from an exact similarity of the word and from a sameness of sound (homonyms). A great number of words in the English language, similar in spelling but different in meaning, lend themselves to this fallacy, such as fire (to burn or to discharge), saw (looked or carpenter's tool), bill (invoice or lip), and rank (station or foul). Even more words are homonyms, such as one and won, soul and sole, fair and fare, nose and knows, steak and stake, might and mite, and bruise and brews.

It should also be remembered that meanings of words change with time or are regarded differently by people in other climates of opinion. A man labeled a liberal in the Victorian era would not pass for one in the 1960s. Words such as democracy, idealism, progress, education, and dictator change in significance with social movements and attitudes. This is why good logic requires that one define terms at the beginning of a debate.

Amphibology is an extension of equivocation in which a whole sentence (instead of one word) takes on a double meaning, usually because of an ambiguity in grammatical construction.

Equivocation has a primary role to play in logic when investigating the possible modes of PREDICATION. There are three modes of predication: the univocal, the analogical, and the equivocal. In the univocal mode, a term is applied to two or more objects in unvarying exactitude of meaning, such as human to Peter and to Pauline, fish to flounder and fluke, or quantity to mountain and mole. In analogical predication, the term is applied to two or more objects not because of an identity of nature, but for some resemblance in characteristics (see ANALOGY). Thus, lamb is applied to Christ because of His resemblance in meekness, gentleness, and purity to a real lamb. In equivocal predication, however, there is neither identity nor resemblance, but only a similarity of word or sound. When the term match is attributed to a wedding and to a lighter, there is no common ground whatsoever in nature or resemblance.

See Also: TERM (LOGIC); PROPOSITION.

Bibliography: J. A. OESTERLE, Logic: The Art of Defining and Reasoning (2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1963). S. J. HARTMAN, Fundamentals of Logic (St. Louis 1949).

[P. C. PERROTTA]

ERAS, HISTORICAL

By the term era is meant a period dating from a fixed point of time, generally some historical event, and used in reckoning years for chronological purposes. Historical eras are those on which historical chronology is based. A distinction can be made between eras of political or civic origin and those of religious origin.

Eras of Political or Civic Origin. To this class belong eras of empires, eras of cities or provinces, and eras of particular countries or regions.

Eras of Empires. The principal imperial eras are six in number and usually named after rulers or dynasties. The era of Alexander the Great has been made known through inscribed bricks and coins and was distinct from the era of the Seleucids. It began the first of Nisan, 330 B.C., and was connected with Alexander's capture of Persepolis (January 330).

The era of the Seleucids among the Greco-Syrians got its name from Nicator Seleucus, founder of the Dynasty of the SELEUCIDS, who instituted it to commemorate the beginning of his empire (312 B.C.). It was known also by other names: the era of contracts among the Jews, because of its legal character; the era of the Greeks or of Alexander among the Syrian Christians and the Arabs; the era of "the man with two horns," Alexander's epithet among the Arabs; the era of the Chaldeans or the Assyrians; the years of the Syro-Macedonians. The era was first employed in the lunar-solar calendar in use among the Macedonians that began with the first lunar month (o $\Delta \hat{\iota} o \zeta$, Dios) following the autumnal equinox. The beginning of the era was placed on Dios 1, 312 B.C. When the Greco-Syrians received from Rome the solar calendar with its fixed years of 365 days plus one day every fourth year, they fixed the beginning of the year and consequently that of the era as October 1, and later, c. A.D. 460, as September 1, in order to align it with the Byzantine indiction; but this did not affect the Oriental Syrians not subject to Constantinople.

The era of the Seleucids among the Persians began when the Seleucids, having become masters of Persia, imposed their era on it also, yet without changing its calendar, a solar one of 365 days without leap years that continued to proceed as it had before. The beginning of the era was placed on the first of Ferverdin (the first month of the year), which corresponded to Feb. 7, 311 B.C., of the Julian calendar.

The era of the Arsacids, named after Arsacius, the first King of the Parthians, was superimposed on the preceding era of the Persians with the same beginning of the year, the first of Ferverdin. It began on Ferverdin 1, 248 B.C., which corresponded to January 22.

The era of Yezdegird was a continuance of the preceding era and of the same type, having as its point of departure Ferverdin 1 (June 26), A.D. 632. The Jalalaean era ended the era of Yezdegird and was the result of a reform that substituted a fixed solar calendar for the previous one that did not have leap years. The beginning of the year was placed at the vernal equinox, which, being then the 19th of Ferverdin (March 15, 1079, of the Julian calendar), was changed to the first of Ferverdin.

Eras of the Cities or Provinces. Some eras were connected with certain cities. The most important of these were the following.

The era of the Olympiads was named after the city of Olympia, where the Olympic games were held every four years. Each period of four years, at the end of which the games took place, was called an Olympiad. Chronographers, several centuries later (c. 300 B.C.), got the idea of using these four-year periods as a measure of chronology. The era of the Olympiads reckoned not directly with individual years, but with the series of four-year periods starting with the institution of the games. The point of departure was the beginning of July 776 B.C. In the concordance tables, the beginning of the year is placed at the beginning of the July that follows January 1 of the corresponding Dionysian year.

The era of the foundation of Rome (Urbis conditae, abbreviated U.C.), commonly employed, was determined by Varro (De gente populi romani, written c. 43 B.C.). It began in 753 B.C. and was reckoned as starting on January 1, even though April 21 was regarded as the actual date of the founding of the city. The Capitoline era was another era based on the traditional founding of Rome. It was established according to the tables of the consuls engraved at the Capitol c. 30 B.C. and is one year behind the years of Varro's era. It appears in certain inscriptions and in the works of a few authors.

The Actian era was common to several cities and provinces. It was connected with the victory of Actium, which took place on Sept. 2, 31 B.C.; but in it the beginning of the year varies according to the different calendar (see below).

Egyptian Eras. In Egypt three different eras were in use: the Diocletian, the Alexandrian, and the Oxyrhynchus era (the last variously dated).

The era of Diocletian (also called the era of the martyrs) was common to all of Egypt. Its point of departure was Thoth 1, A.D. 284. In three years out of four, Thoth 1 was August 29; but every fourth year, i.e., in the year after the leap year, it was August 30. (On its origin, see CHRONOLOGY, MEDIEVAL.)

The Alexandrian era was an Actian era of which the beginning was fixed on Thoth 1, 30 B.C. Thoth 1 was either August 29 or August 30, as above. The Thoth 1 with which this era began was Aug. 30, 30 B.C. This date also inaugurated the replacement of the Egyptian calendar having 365 days every year with one having 366 days every fourth year.

As for the eras of Oxyrhynchus, as many as eight of these have been noted, of which two are of more importance: A.D. 324, the year Constantius II became emperor, and 355, the year Julian became emperor.

Eras of Syria, Palestine, and Arabia. These include the era of the Seleucids, the Actian era, and the era of the province of Arabia.

The era of the Seleucids was the same as the imperial era mentioned above as common to Syria, Palestine, and Arabia.

The Actian era was common to several cities: Tripoli, Seleucia of Pieria, Laodicea, and Gerasa. Its year began October 1.

The era of the province of Arabia, or the era of Bostra (the capital), commemorated the Emperor Trajan's establishment of Arabia as a province. Its point of departure was March 22, A.D. 106, the vernal equinox falling on that day at that time and thus marking the beginning of the year.

Local Eras. A good number of the local eras commemorated the granting of autonomy to various cities, either by Pompey or Caesar, and for that reason are called Pompeian or Caesarean; their starting dates depend on when these cities received their independence.

Pompeian eras were used in various cities of Syria and Transjordan, especially in the cities of the DECAPO-LIS: Abila, Antiochia ad Hippum, Kanatha, Dium, Gerasa, Gadara, Philadelphia, and Pella. The starting date for Gadara was 64 B.C.; for Philadelphia (Ammān), 63 B.C. For the other cities the dates are uncertain, between 64 and 61. Cities outside the Decapolis began their eras about the same time: Antioch and Apamea in 66 B.C.; Demetrias of Phoenicia and Dora in 63; Arethusa in 64 or 63; Epiphania of Cilicia in a year that is uncertain; Gaza on Oct. 28, 61 B.C., following the introduction of a fixed year—an era in use until the 7th century; Tripolis in 64–63; and Scythopolis in 64–63 B.C.

Caesarean eras, with their starting dates, were used in the following cities: Laodicea, Dios (later Oct.) 1, 48 B.C.; Ptolemais, 47; Gabala, Oct. 1, 47 or 46; Antioch (the most important of all), Dios (later Oct.) 1, 49 (Sept. 1, following the adjustment to the Byzantine indiction, c. 460); several Syriac writers begin this era Oct. 1, 48 B.C.

Other local eras were used in other cities in Syria and Palestine that had eras of their own: Ascalon, two eras— 104 and 57 B.C.; Beirut, 81 B.C. (under Tigrane); Eleutheropolis, A.D. 200; Laodicea, besides the Actian and Caesarean eras already indicated, three other eras—era of freedom under Tigrane, 81–80 B.C.; era of its establishment as a metropolis, A.D. 194; era of the colony, A.D. 197–198 [the last was recently discovered by H. Seyrig, Syria 40 (1963) 30–32]; Ptolemais (Accho), besides the Caesarean era indicated, had another era, 174 B.C. (the year of the establishment of the Antiochian colony in the city); Seleucia of Pieria, 109 B.C.; Sidon, 110 or 109 B.C.; Tyre, two eras, 274 and 116 B.C. (independence of the city); the beginning of the year, following the adoption of a fixed year, was October 19.

Eras of Asia Minor. Provinces and cities in Asia Minor that had eras in common were the following.

For Bithynia and Pontus there were the era of the independence of Bithynia, beginning in 297 B.C., and for several cities—Apamea, Myrlea, Bithynium, Nicaea, Nicomedia, Prusa—an era that began in 283 B.C., and came to an end when Bithynia became a Roman province.

In the proconsular province of Asia the era of Sulla, conqueror of the province, began autumn 85 B.C. and was fixed at the equinox, September 24, following the adoption of the solar calendar, later at September 23, the dies natalis of Augustus. This era appears in inscriptions from Phrygia, Mysia, Lydia, Pisidia, and Lycia. It continued up to the 6th Christian century.

The era of Galatia, beginning in 25 B.C., was employed in Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium.

The era of Pontus Polemoniacus was employed in several cities including Trabezus, Cerasus, Neocaesarea, and Zela. It began October 64 B.C.

Local eras were in use in several of the principal cities: Adana (Antiochia ad Sarum), sometime shortly after 19 B.C.; Amasia, October 3 B.C., annexation to the Roman Empire; Amisus, October 32 B.C., liberation; Anazarbus, 19 B.C.; Gangra, 5 B.C.; Comana, A.D. 34 or 35; Mopsuestia, 68 B.C.; Pompeiopolis, 7 B.C.; and Sinope, which had two eras, 70 and 45 B.C.

Eras of the Balkan Peninsula and the West. Several regions in the Balkans and in western Europe had their own eras.

The era of Upper Moesia began Jan. 1, A.D. 239, when the region was made a Roman province.

The era of Dacia dates from A.D. 246, after the middle of the summer.

Macedonia had two eras—one starting at the time of the Roman conquest, autumn 146 B.C., following the adoption of the solar calendar, the beginning of the year being fixed at October 15; the other an Actian era, beginning Oct. 15, 32 B.C. These two eras are frequently joined in the inscriptions.

The Spanish era began on Jan. 1, 38 B.C. It is found in inscriptions and was current with the chroniclers on the peninsula. It was used in Spain as late as the 14th century and in Portugal until 1422, when it was officially abandoned. It was in use also in the Visigothic provinces of southern Gaul. Its origin has not yet been explained.

The era of Mauretania (Caesarean, Sitifian; for Tingitane Mauretania evidence is lacking) began Jan. 1, A.D. 40, and dates from the annexation of Mauretania by the Roman Empire.

The Carthaginian era is indicated in several inscriptions by the formula anno N. Kartaginis. It is now known that the era was connected with the capture of the city by the Vandals in A.D. 439, and not, as was once thought, with its reconquest by the Byzantines. There is no certain evidence for any era connected with this reconquest.

Eras of Religious Character. Certain eras were established with a starting point connected with important events in the histories of various religions. The most important of these are the following.

Era of Abraham. This is used in the Chronicle of Eusebius. It begins with the call of Abraham. The birth of Christ is placed by Eusebius in the year 2015 of this era, 2,014 years after the call of Abraham, two years earlier than in the modern common era, which places it in 2017 of this era; therefore, the era of Abraham begins in 2016 B.C. But this relationship is not constant; it can be shown by cross comparisons that there is a deviation of two years in the calculations of Eusebius from the year 2210 of this era (A.D. 192) to the end of 2343 (A.D. 326), which moves the beginning of his era back from 2016 to 2018

B.C. In St. Jerome's continuation of this era from 2343 to 2395, the deviation is only one year, which brings the beginnings of the era to 2017 B.C.

Christian Eras. Several eras have been established by Christians beginning either on a computed year as the time when the world was created or on a year in the life of Christ.

The Alexandrine, or mundane, era began in the year 5492 B.C., which is considered to have been the year in which the world was created. In this era the year 5501 marks the birth of Christ, which is a starting date also for a Christian era frequently used in conjunction with this world era. The last two digits of any date are the same and always constant in both cases; thus, in this era the year 5965 of creation is the year 465 after the birth of Christ. Since the Alexandrine world era is eight years behind the modern common era, the same is true of its accompanying Christian era. Consequently, the year one in the latter era is A.D. 9 in the Christian. The beginning of its year is the same as that of the world era, i.e., March 25, which marks both the creation of the world and the Incarnation of Christ.

In the Proto-Byzantine era the 1st year was 5509 B.C., and the birth of Christ was placed in the year 5507 (3 B.C.); but this date of the birth of Christ was not used for chronological purposes.

The Byzantine era begins with the creation of the world considered as having taken place in 5507 to 5508 B.C. But Byzantine authors were not uniform in regard to the year of the birth of Christ. At least five different dates can be noted. The principal chronicler (Skilitzes-) Cedrenus placed Christ's birth in 5506 of this era (3-2 B.C.) on December 25 (3 B.C.) and constructed an era of Christ in conjunction with his mundane era, computing it as beginning with the Incarnation on March 25, 5505, of the mundane era, so that the final figure differs by six between the two eras, e.g., the year 5950 of the mundane era is the year 456 of his Christian era.

The common Christian era is known also as the Dionysian era because it was first used by DIONYSIUS EXIGU-US in his paschal table as a substitute for the Diocletian era. The era begins on January 1 of the year of Christ's birth. This year is situated chronologically by its relationship to the Diocletian era in the paschal table mentioned above, in which the year 532 of the Christian era corresponds to the year 248 of the Diocletian era. The Dionysian era spread abroad little by little —first in England, where it was brought by St. Augustine of Canterbury, then in France, and finally in the rest of Europe. It was commonly used by chroniclers in the West from the time of Bede, except in the Iberian Peninsula, where the chroniclers retained the Spanish era for a long time. The beginning of the year differed from place to place: December 25, March 1, Easter, or January 1. By the end of the 16th century January1 was commonly accepted as New Year's Day in this era, following the example of France, where it was made official in 1563.

The era of the Ascension, found among the Greeks and the Syrians, began in A.D. 31.

Jewish World Era. This era began on the first of Tishri 3761 B.C. Its invention appears to go back, at the earliest, to the latter half of the 4th Christian century.

Islamic Era or Era of the Hijra. Year one of this era began on the 1st of Moharem (1st month of the Muslim year), July 16, 622, marking the day arbitrarily set for the commemoration of Muḥammad's HIJIRA, or flight from Mecca to Medina; the flight actually took place 68 days later. The era was instituted by Caliph Omar. It has been in continuous use by Christians living under Muslim rule (in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and Persia), as well as by the Muslims. Since the Muslim year consists of 12 lunar months totaling 354 or 355 days, special tables must be used for converting a date in the Islamic era into a date in the Christian era. (See CALENDARS OF THE ANCIENT NEAR EAST.)

For eras of cyclic origin that, though without historical basis, were nevertheless commonly used in daily life and by the chroniclers, see CHRONOLOGY, MEDIEVAL, 1.

Bibliography: F. K. GINZEL, Handbuch der mathematischen und technischen Chronologie, 3 v. (Leipzig 1906-14; repr. 1958). A. GIRY, Manuel de diplomatique (new ed. Paris 1925). W. KUBITS-CHEK, Paulys Realenzyklopädie der klassischen Altertumswissenschaft, ed. G. WISSOWA et al. 1.1 (1893) 606-52. H. LECLERCQ, Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. CABROL, H. LECLERCQ and H. I. MARROU, 15 v. (Paris 1907-53) 5.1:350-84. H. BRAUNERT, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957-65) 1:785-86. E. MAHLER, Chronologische Vergleichungs-Tabellen (Vienna 1888). L. DE MAS-LATRIE, Trésor de chronologie (Paris 1899). P. V. NEUGE-BAUER, Hilfstafeln zur technischen Chronologie (Kiel 1937). F. RÜHL, Chronologie des Mittelalters und der Neuzeit (Berlin 1897). H. SEYRIG, "Antiquités syriennes: Sur les ères de quelques villes de Syrie," Syria 27 (1950) 5-50; "Antiquités syriennes: Un Poids de Laodicée," ibid. 40 (1963) 31-32. N. DUVAL, "Recherches sur la datation des ères chrétiennes d'Afrique," Atti del terzo Congresso internazional e di epigrafia greca e latina (Rome 1959). V. GRU-MEL, La Chronologie (Paris 1958).

[V. GRUMEL]

ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS

Humanist, classical and patristic scholar, first editor of the Greek New Testament; b. Rotterdam, Holland, Oct. 27, 1466; d. Basel, Switzerland, July 12, 1536. He was an illegitimate child and his father eventually became a priest. Educated first at Gouda, and then from 1475 under the BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE, Erasmus remained at Deventer for eight years; there is no doubt that this tradition shaped his later educational ideals.

Career. In 1483 his parents died; his guardians sent him to a school at s' Hertogenbosch, also maintained by the Brethren. In 1487 he was persuaded, in part by a friend and in part by his guardian, to enter the Augustinian monastery of CANONS REGULAR at Steyn. Although lacking a genuine vocation, he was no doubt partly attracted by the ordered life of the monastery; he found some congenial companions, and he had opportunities for the study of Christian and classical literature. However, even before his ordination (April 25, 1492) he seems to have found the intellectual horizon too confined and was ready to seek a wider opportunity for the development of his intellectual interests. This came in 1494 with an invitation from the bishop of Cambrai to enter his service. Erasmus received a dispensation from residence in his monastery, which he never entered again. Within the year he had persuaded the bishop to allow him to go to Paris to study for a degree in theology.

When Erasmus arrived in Paris in 1495, he took up residence in Montaigu College, where he soon found little to his liking the discipline imposed by the director, Jean Standonck. Equally uncongenial were the lectures on scholastic philosophy and theology at the university. Erasmus tried to escape from this environment by cultivating prominent literary figures, among whom were Italian humanist exiles who were beginning to introduce new standards of taste. At the same time, in order to improve his economic circumstances, he began to take pupils for instruction in Latin. These included some wealthy and highly placed Englishmen, and through one of them he received an invitation to visit England in 1499.

This first visit to England marks a decisive stage in Erasmus's intellectual development. He had an opportunity to meet such men as John COLET, Thomas MORE, and Archbishop WARHAM. Through these friends he came into more direct contact with the heritage of the Italian RENAISSANCE and realized what might be achieved by applying to the great texts of the Christian tradition the same methods of exegesis that the Italian humanists had applied to the classics. To this task Erasmus determined to devote the rest of his life. From his English visit dates his serious application to the study of Greek. A few years later his ambition to provide a more accurate knowledge of the basic texts of the Christian tradition was further confirmed by his discovery in a monastery in the Low Countries of a MS of Lorenzo VALLA's Annotations on the New Testament. Erasmus had already been greatly influenced by Valla's ideas on the uses of philology, and he then published the Annotations in Paris in 1505 with an enthusiastic introduction.

The English visit was the first of Erasmus's many changes of residence. He returned to France in 1500 and spent some years there and in the Low Countries. A second visit to England in 1505-06 was followed by three years in Italy (1506-09), during which he was associated with the Aldine Academy in Venice and had an opportunity to visit the Rome of JULIUS II. From Rome Erasmus returned to England on the accession of HENRY VIII, in the hope of sharing in the royal patronage. In 1511 he settled in Queen's College, CAMBRIDGE, where he spent two and a half years. Leaving England again in 1514, he went first to Basel and then for brief periods to Louvain and to Holland. In 1521 he returned to Basel, where he remained for the next eight years, his longest residence in one place. The official acceptance of the REFORMATION in Basel in 1529 caused his retreat to Freiburg, where he spent the next six years.

The refusal to identify himself with any of the national cultures in Europe was characteristic of Erasmus. In spite of invitations from France, England, and the Empire he preferred to retain his independence. His increasing literary fame enabled him to lead the life of a man of letters unattached to any institution. The poor scholar who had had to take in pupils for a living became a comparatively wealthy man through the rewards bestowed on him by many patrons.

Works. At the height of his fame, Erasmus occupied a position in the history of European literature rivaled perhaps only by that of VOLTAIRE. In every country, admiring followers accepted his leadership. His letters provide the most comprehensive source for the intellectual history of his age. Of the many works that secured his reputation, the first to bring him public notice was the Adages. This collection of classical proverbs with an explanation of their meaning furnished students with a convenient handbook and digest of the subject matter of classical literature, arranged under such headings as misfortune, love, modesty, liberality, war. In 1508 Erasmus brought out at the Aldine Press (see MANUTIUS) in Venice a second edition containing three times as many adages as the first and reflecting what he had learned from the refugee Greek scholars at Venice. This remained one of the most popular of Erasmus's works; it went through many editions and its influence can be traced in the vernacular literature of every European country in the 16th century.

In the Enchiridion militis christiani, first published in Antwerp (1503), Erasmus expounded his conception of a Christianity infused with the spirit of the Gospels. This little treatise presented life as a struggle between virtue and vice. Here is found the combination of piety and learning, the docta pietas, which Erasmus emphasized in so many of his later works. In the analysis of the soul in the Enchiridion he follows, on the whole, ORIGEN and the Greek Fathers, who had a profound effect on his thinking. Erasmus later maintained that his chief purpose in writing the book had been to remedy the errors of those who confused ceremonial observances with true piety. The conclusion of the treatise is that there is a regular progression through nature to grace and that the philosophy of Christ depends on the inner action of the spirit rather than on conformity to external rites.

The message of the Enchiridion was reiterated in a very different form in the Praise of Folly, which has remained the work by which Erasmus is perhaps best known to the general public. It was composed in 1509 while Erasmus was traveling from Italy to England and was dedicated to Thomas More with the pun on his name contained in the title Encomium moriae. Erasmus imagined Folly personified delivering a classical oration in her defense. This device gave him an opportunity to satirize many aspects of contemporary society, both ecclesiastical and lay. In the end, however, Folly becomes serious and makes her hearers recognize that what is, in the eyes of the world, the greatest folly, namely Christianity, is in reality the highest wisdom.

The same themes were taken up in many of Erasmus's Colloquies of which the first authorized edition was published in 1519. Later the dramatic possibilities of these little dialogues appealed to Erasmus, and he created a whole gallery of characters, through the medium of whose conversation he managed to take up all the great issues of politics and religion of his generation. The style of these compositions was particularly consonant with Erasmus's character. The dialogue form emphasized the rhetorical arts of persuasion that had been so central to the educational curriculum of the Renaissance. Furthermore, this form had the advantage that the views of the author could be concealed beneath those attributed to one of the characters.

The homilies, satires, and colloquies that Erasmus wrote did not interrupt the course of his scholarly work. The number of his editions of classical and patristic works is formidable. Some of these represented no great labor on his part, such was the Basel Aristotle of 1531, to which Erasmus contributed only a preface. Others represented years of patient work. What the Aldine Press in Venice had accomplished at the turn of the century for classical literature, FROBEN in Basel aspired to do for patristic literature, and it was upon Erasmus that his estable lishment chiefly depended. Of the patristic works edited by Erasmus, the most important were the Jerome of 1516, the Augustine of 1529, the Chrysostom of 1530, and the Origen of 1536. To the edition of JEROME, with whom he felt a kind of affinity, Erasmus devoted a particular effort, not only emending the text and providing an extensive commentary, but also contributing a preface with an account of the life and works of the translator of the Vulgate.

Erasmus had decided, perhaps as early as his edition of Valla's Annotations, to occupy himself with the text of the New Testament. This project grew to be an edition of the Greek text with a new Latin translation and a commentary on which Erasmus was seriously at work from 1512. The Novum instrumentum, which appeared in 1516, was the first published version of the Greek text. Erasmus's work is far from the standards of modern scholarship in both method and content. He established his text on a limited number of MSS, rather haphazardly consulted; his knowledge of Greek was insufficient to deal with many philological problems; his footnotes contained frequent irrelevant digressions. The work, nevertheless, was of epoch-making importance. His Greek text was the basis of many of the vernacular versions produced during the sixteenth century.

Erasmus and the Reformation. The Novum instrumentum was dedicated to Leo X, whom Erasmus hailed as introducing a new age in which scholarship and the arts would flourish and peace would reign. These hopes, however, were disappointed by the religious revolution in the outbreak of which his own work had played a very large part. His widely read criticism of abuses in the Church, his revolt against formalism, and his appeal for a restoration of an earlier and purer piety awoke an enthusiastic response among his contemporaries and the younger generation. One of his readers was Martin LUTHER, who had sought Erasmus's approval as early as 1516 but felt that "with him, human things were of greater value than divine" ("humana praevalent in eo plus quam divina''). In 1519 he begged for Erasmus's support in his struggle with the Curia. Erasmus replied not very cordially, professing ignorance of Luther's writings, but declaring that he had urged moderation in influential quarters.

With the papal condemnation and Luther's treatises of 1520, Erasmus's attitude changed. He feared the consequences of what he now saw to be a revolution, and he deplored Luther's appeal to the general public. As the Lutheran movement took shape and the gap between Rome and Wittenberg widened, Erasmus's position became increasingly uncomfortable. Many of his former friends, such as Dürer and HUTTEN, condemned him for not supporting Luther. Others, such as Aleandro, once his roommate in Venice, accused him of having attacked the basic institutions of the Church and prepared the way for Luther. He was urged by friends on both sides to clarify his position and at first seems to have believed that it was still possible to deal with these great issues in the manner of the Colloquies. The Inquisitio de fide probably represents his attempt to explore in a dialogue the implications of the religious division. He soon saw, however, that this congenial approach was no longer possible, and he composed his treatise on the freedom of the will, published in 1524, to define his religious position against that of Luther. Luther replied with the De servo arbitrio, in which he disdainfully repudiated the theological arguments of Erasmus. This elicited from Erasmus the first and second Hyperaspistes, in which he elaborated his original argument. During the same period he had to defend himself from the attacks of his enemies on the other side, especially Alberto Pio, Prince of Carpi, and the Spanish monks.

In spite of these controversies and the bitterness that Erasmus had to face in the last years of his life, he continued his literary and scholarly publications, producing, among other works, in the years at Freiburg the treatise on preaching, Ecclesiastes, and the edition of Origen. It was to see these volumes through the press that he returned to Basel in 1535. There he died in the house of Froben, surrounded by his friends. In the absence of a priest, he did not receive the Last Sacraments. He was buried in the cathedral at Basel, which had been converted into a Protestant church.

Significance. Erasmus's significance has been as variously estimated as it was ambiguous in his own lifetime. Rightly regarded as one of those who had prepared the way for the religious revolution, he nevertheless repudiated decisively the work of Luther and ZWINGLI. Although he was offered a cardinal's hat by Paul III, his work was put on the Index by the Council of Trent. To the Enlightenment he appeared a figure in the history of European rationalism. He has often been accused of having been wavering and cowardly in the great crisis of his generation. In fact, however, he maintained with remarkable consistency throughout his life the position defined by his ideals as a Christian humanist. As a Christian, he declared again and again that his whole life had been devoted to the cause of the gospel. He professed always his willingness to submit to the authority of the Church, even though he never committed himself in detail on how that authority was to be defined. Many of the points on which his orthodoxy was questioned were clarified only after his death by the decisions of the Council of TRENT. As a humanist, he believed that even the deepest commitments should be defended, and the cause of truth advanced by persuasion rather than by force. It was the tragedy of his later life that he pleaded for peace and unity in a Christian world that had become so deeply divided that a continuing dialogue was no longer possible.

Bibliography: Works. Opera omnia, ed. J. LE CLERC, 10 v. in 11 (Leiden 1703-06); Opuscula, ed. W. K. FERGUSON (The Hague 1933); Ausgewählte Werke, ed. H. and A. HOLBORN (Munich 1933); Opus epistolarum, ed. P. S. ALLEN et al., 12 v. (Oxford 1906-58); Poems, ed. C. REEDIJK (Leiden 1956); Colloquies, tr. N. BAILEY, ed. E. JOHNSON, 3 v. (London 1900); Inquisitio de fide, ed. C. R. THOMP-SON (New Haven 1950); The Education of a Christian Prince, tr. and ed. L. K. BORN (New York 1936); Handbook of the Militant Christian, tr. and ed. J. P. DOLAN (Notre Dame, IN 1962); The Epistles of E., from his Earliest Letters to his Fifty-first Year, Arranged in Order of Time, tr. and ed. F. M. NICHOLS, 3 v. (New York 1901-18); The Free Will in Discourse on Free Will, tr. and ed. E. F. WINTER (New York 1961), treatises by Erasmus and Martin Luther; The Praise of Folly, tr. H. H. HUDSON (Princeton 1941); Colloquies, tr. C. R. THOMPSON (Chicago 1965). F. F. E. VANDER HAEGHEN et al., 7 v. (Ghent 1897-1908). Collected Works of Erasmus (Toronto 1974-). Studies. J. HUIZINGA, Erasmus of Rotterdam (New York 1952). P. SMITH, Erasmus: A Study of his Life, Ideals and Place in History (New York 1923). P. MESTWERDT, Die Anfänge des E.: Humanismus und "Devotio moderna," ed. H. VON SCHU-BERT (Leipzig 1917). A. HYMA, The Youth of Erasmus (Ann Arbor 1930). E. F. RICE, "Erasmus and the Religious Tradition, 1495-1499," Journal of the History of Ideas 11 (1950) 387-411. Erasmus and the National Traditions. M. BATAILLON, É. et l'Espagne (Paris 1937). M. MANN, É. et les débuts de la réforme française, 1517–1536 (Paris 1934). A. RENAUDET, É. Et l'Italie (Geneva 1954); Préréforme et humanisme à Paris pendant les premières guerres d'Italie, 1494-1517 (2d ed. Paris 1953). L. W. SPITZ, The Religious Renaissance of the German Humanists (Cambridge, Mass. 1963). Erasmus and Humanism. R. PFEIFFER, Humanitas Erasmiana (Berlin 1931). O. SCHOTTENLOHER, Erasmus im Ringen um die humanistische Bildungsform (Münster 1933). M. P. GIL-MORE, "Erasmus and the Cause of Christian Humanism: The Last Years, 1529-1536," Humanists and Jurists (Cambridge, MA 1963) 115-145. S. A. NULLI, Erasmus e il Rinascimento (Turin 1955). Religious Thought. L. BOUYER, Erasmus and his Times, tr. F. X. MURPHY (Westminster, MD 1959). K. H. OELRICH, Der späte Erasmus und die Reformation (Münster 1961), É. V. TELLE, É. De Rotterdam et le septième Sacrement (Geneva 1954). H. JEDIN, History of the Council of Trent, tr. E. GRAF (St. Louis 1957-60) v.1. D. KNOWLES, The Religious Orders in England, 3 v. (Cambridge, England 1948-60) 3:141-156. Special topics. J. HOYOUX, "Les Moyens d'existence d'É.," Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance NS 5 (1944) 7-59. P. SMITH, A Key to the Colloquies of Erasmus (Cambridge, MA 1927). Bibliotheca Erasmiana, comp. L. HALKIN, Erasmus: A Critical Biography, J. TONKIN, tr. (Oxford 1993). L. JARDINE, Erasmus, Man of Letters (Princeton 1993). M. SCREECH, Erasmus: Ecstacy and the Praise of Folly (London 1980). J. TRACY, Erasmus of the Low Countries (Berkeley 1996); Erasmus, the Growth of a Mind (Berkeley 1972).

[M. P. GILMORE]

ERASTIANISM

Erastianism is the doctrine of complete subjection of the Church to the power of the State. This thesis was not specifically held by Thomas Erastus although his name is attached to it. Career of Erastus. Erastus (Thomas Lüber, Lieber, or Liebler) was born in Baden, Switzerland, on Sept. 7, 1524. Most of his early education was received at Basel, where he was given a patron's aid for his university training. After his recovery from the plague, which had struck Basel, he went first to the University of Bologna and then to the University of Padua where he studied medicine and philosophy. In 1553 he became the court physician to the Prince of Hennenburg, and later to Otto Henry, the Elector of the Palatinate, while he taught medicine at the University of Heidelberg.

Although the subject of his work and teaching was medicine, his chief interest was theology. In the religious controversy that raged at Heidelberg, the Elector Frederick III (1559–76) fostered Calvinism in the Palatinate (see REFORMED CHURCHES). At first, Erastus was sympathetic but he opposed the Calvinist party which was led by Caspar Olevianus, when it tried to introduce the Geneva system of church discipline. As a Zwinglian, Erastus was opposed also to the Lutherans on the doctrine of the Eucharist.

Erastus's great work is the Seventy-Five Theses (1568) based originally on 100 theses. Seventy-two were against the ideas on excommunication set forth by the English Puritan, George Withers, who was supported by the Calvinists, especially Theodore BEZA. Because of his statements, his opposition to the Presbyterian views, and his alleged Unitarianism Erastus was excommunicated. After a long controversy, he proved the charges false and the excommunication was lifted in 1575. As Lutheranism was restored to the Palatinate by Louis VI in 1579, Erastus resigned from the University of Heidelberg in 1580. He returned to Basel where he taught ethics and medicine until his death, Dec. 31, 1583.

Theories and Doctrines. The central question in the Theses, which was written about 1568, was excommunication. The term was used by Erastus not in the Catholic sense of exclusion of a notorious sinner from membership in the Church or communion of the faithful. Erastus wrote against Withers's interpretation of excommunication, which excluded people of bad lives from participation in the Sacrament, on judgment by presbyters or laymen sitting in the name of the whole Church. Erastus insisted that excommunication could not be supported from the Scriptures and that the Sacrament should not be withheld from those who wish to receive it. Erastus argued from the Protestant viewpoint that the Bible is the sole source of faith. The chief argument of his whole system was based on an analogy between the Jewish and Christian dispensations. He noted that the Mosaic Law excluded no one from offering the paschal sacrifice, and that Christ had not excluded Judas from holy communion. Erastus admitted, however, that some exegetes thought that the betrayer left the cenacle before the Holy Eucharist was instituted.

The last three theses state the theory of Church-State relations to which his name is attached, even though the interpretation put upon them was not that of Erastus. He considered the ruler responsible for the external government of the Church, but he limited this responsibility to Christian rulers. Erastus judged that when a ruler is Christian, there is no need for corrective jurisdiction other than that of the State. He thus assigned the ruler the same power he had in the Jewish state. Therefore, according to Erastus, a Christian magistrate might pass judgment on men's conduct, settle disputes, and work with the ministers in admonishing and reproving those who "live unholy and impure lives," but he could not debar anyone who wished to receive the Sacrament. Nowhere did Erastus hold that the interests of religion are subordinate or subservient to those of the State. Nor on the other hand, did he accept the Church as a visible society with its own completely independent government.

Erastus's entire system was never accepted nor promoted by any sect, but his theories on Church-State relations had great influence in Germany and England in the 17th century. The Presbyterians rejected them, but England's Established Church had an Erastian group. The Presbyterians used the term "Erastian" as an unfavorable epithet for their opponents in the Westminster Assembly in 1643. The Anglican Richard HOOKER, in his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, borrowed the Erastian analogy between the Jewish and Christian states to defend the English sovereign's title as head of the Church as well as his appointment of bishops. Hooker required the laity's consent before an ecclesiastical law was binding and believed in a single society that assigned all coercive authority to the civil functionary.

Erastus's real purpose seems to have been to deny to the Church any right to coercive authority apart from the State. He was opposed to any political role for the Church whether that in a theocracy or that of the Church as an independent society within the State. Erastus was not a modern "Erastian." He considered only the case of a state in which a single religion is tolerated as the true one. Moreover, he labored to prevent the Evangelical Church from embracing the Genevan doctrine that the Church is a perfect society in and by itself.

Bibliography: L. C. MCDONALD, Western Political Theory (New York 1962). J. Y. EVANS, J. HASTINGS, ed., Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics 13 v. (Edinburgh 1908–27) 5:358–366. R. HOOKER, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, 2 v. (New York 1925). W. S. CROWLEY, "Erastianism in England to 1640," Journal of Church and State 32 (Sum 1990), 549–566. R. E. RODES, "Last Days of Erastianism: Forms in the American Church State Nexus," Harvard Theological Review 62 (July 1969), 301–348.

[M. L. FELL]

ERCHEMPERT

Historian, poet, monk of MONTE CASSINO; lived in the second half of the 9th century. The very few biographical details known about Erchempert (namely, those concerning his activities in the years c. 880 to 888) derive from his main work, the Historiola Langobardorum Beneventi degentium, which traces the history of the southern Italian Lombards, the author's own people, from 774 to 889. The Historiola is a primary source for the history of southern Italy in that period. Erchempert himself (Historiola c.31) alludes to his poetical work, of which little survives except the dedicatory poem of the Historiola [U. Westerbergh, Beneventan Ninth Century Poetry (Stockholm 1957) 8–29] and some verses he added to a metrical calendar of Anglo-Saxon origin (ibid. 74–90).

Bibliography: P. MEYVAERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 15:685–687.

[P. MEYVAERT]

ERCONWALD OF LONDON, ST.

Anglo-Saxon bishop of London, monastic founder; b. c. 630; d. Barking Abbey, April 30 c. 693. Erconwald (Earconwald or Erkenwald) was born in Lindsey of the royal blood of East Anglia. Attracted at an early age to the monastic life, he converted his patrimony into the foundation of two monastic establishments, the abbey at Chertsey under his direction and the abbey at BARKING under the direction of his sister ETHELBURGA. His reputation for sanctity led to his appointment in 675 as bishop of London, where he was consecrated by Abp. THEODORE OF CANTERBURY. As diocesan he enlarged his cathedral church, augmented the revenues of the see, and secured for it papal privileges. He labored to effect the reconciliation of WILFRID OF YORK and Theodore. After 11 years, he retired to Barking. He was buried at SAINT PAUL'S CA-THEDRAL, where his shrine was the object of popular pilgrimage during the Middle Ages. In art he is represented in bishop's robes, with no particular distinction.

Feast: May 13 (Dioceses of Westminster, Southwark, and Brentwood); Nov. 14 (translation of 1148); Feb. 1 (translation in 1326).

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History, 2 v., tr. J. E. KING based on the version of T. STAPLETON (Loeb Classical Library; New York 1930) bk. 4. Saint Erkenwald, ed. C. PETERSON (Philadelphia 1977). The Owl and the Nightingale, tr. B. STONE (2d ed. London 1988). The Saint of London: The Life and Miracles of St. Erkenwald, ed. and tr. E. G. WHATLEY (Binghamton, N.Y. 1989). W. STUBBS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–1887) 2:177–179.

[J. L. DRUSE]

ERDINGTON, ABBEY OF

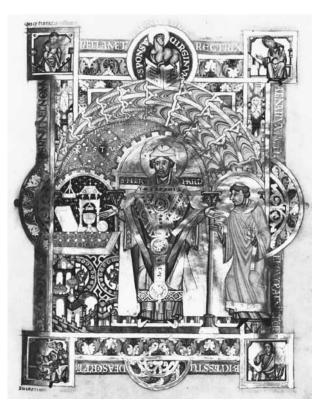

Former BENEDICTINE monastery, now a Redemptorist house, in Erdington, a suburb of Birmingham, England, Diocese of Birmingham. Founded in the parish of Father D. H. Haigh in 1876 as a priory of the German Abbey of BEURON, Erdington became an abbey dedicated to Thomas of Canterbury in 1896. In 1899 its first abbot, Dom Anskar Hockelmann (d. 1943), was appointed. There were few English vocations, and the policy of the English government toward citizens of enemy countries living in England resulted in the removal of Abbot Anskar and the appointment of an English abbot, Dom Francis Izard, from 1915 to 1919. Twenty-eight of the monks chose to retire to Germany in 1919, leaving only 11 monks at Erdington. Authorization was obtained from Rome for the sale of the abbey, which was bought by the Redemptorists in 1922; Dom Anskar transferred the Benedictine community to St. Martin of WEINGARTEN in Württemberg.

Bibliography: Annales O.S.B., 28–34 (1920–26) 42–44, 240–242. J. U. SAXTON, "Die Wiederbelebung der Benediktinerabtei Weingarten," Benediktinische Monatsschrift, 4 (1922) 316–320; Bygone Erdington (Birmingham 1928). H. DAUPHIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:688–689.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

ERHARD, ST.

Missionary bishop; b. perhaps Narbonne, France (or Ireland?); d. Regensburg (formerly Ratisbon), Germany, seventh century. The details of this saint's life are unclear, for his vita, which was written in the mid-11th century by a monk, Paul the Jew, perhaps of Fulda of Regensburg, is not completely reliable inasmuch as it borrows freely from the vitae of St. ODILIA and St. HIDULF OF MOYENMOUTIER. Erhard may well have been a monk following the rule of COLUMBAN, and it is known that he was certainly a zealous missionary and the founder of seven monasteries. It seems that he was also a regional missionary bishop who died at Regensburg with a great reputation for sanctity; he was buried in the Abbey of Niedermünster. On Oct. 8, 1052, Pope LEO IX, in the presence of Emperor HENRY III, solemnly exhumed the relics of WOLFGANG and Erhard (P. Jaffé, Regesta pontificum romanorum ab condita ecclesia ad annum post Christum natum 1198, ed. S. Löwenfeld 1:543), an action that at that time was equivalent to CANONIZATION. While Erhard's cult was overshadowed by that of St. Wolfgang and St. EMMERAM, two famous bishops of Regensburg, his purported crozier and part of his skull are still venerated in Regensburg.

St. Erhard celebrating Mass, miniature from Gospel Book of Abbess Uota, 11th century (Clm 13601, fol. 4r).

Feast: Jan. 8.

Bibliography: Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 6:1–21. Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863–) Jan. 1:533–46. A. SCHÜTTE, Handbuch der deutschen Heiligen (Cologne 1941) 113. R. BAUERREISS, Kirchengeschichte Bayerns, 5 v. (St. Ottilien 1949–55; 2d ed. Munich 1958–) 1:52–53, 173. KONRAD VON MEGENBERG, Historia Sancti Erhardi, ed. R. HANKELN (Ottawa 2000) office for feast. R. VAN DOREN, Bibliotheca sanctorum (Rome 1961–) 4:1285–87. A. RAGGI, ibid. 1287.

[H. DRESSLER]

ERIC IX JEDVARDSSON, KING OF SWEDEN, ST.

Patron of SWEDEN, reigned from 1150 to c. 1160. He was killed, according to legend, in the church of Old-

Reliquary of Saint Eric IX Jedvardsson, who died in 1160, in the Cathedral of Uppsala, Sweden. (©Archivo Iconografico, A.S./ CORBIS)

Uppsala when a Danish prince invaded the country and disputed his right to the throne. This same legend attributes to Eric all the qualities of a good Northern king, i.e., he instituted salutary laws, helped the poor, worked miraculous cures, etc. One of the most famous, although not undisputed, events in the legend, is Eric's "crusade" to Finland (see HENRY OF UPPSALA). He was honored as the ancestor of a line of Swedish kings. As early as the end of the 12th century, a calendar from the Diocese of Uppsala (Vallentuna) mentioned St. Eric. His elevatio took place probably before 1200; he was never formally canonized. Although the surviving legend is of later origin, it seems to be based on records contemporary with the official recognition of his cult. A rhythmical history entitled Assunt Erici regis sollemnia (Analecta Hymnica 25) and the sequence Gratulemur dulci prosa (Analecta Hymnica 42) are extant. Numerous paintings, sculptures, and hymns (Analecta Hymnica 43) commemorate Eric; his image appears on Swedish coins. His cult was observed not only in Sweden but in Finland, Denmark, Norway, and in the sphere of influence of the BRIGITTINE SISTERS. He is pictured with a sword, palm, and crown. The cathedral of Uppsala, which was once adorned with paintings depicting Eric's life, houses supposedly authentic relics of Eric in a 16th-century shrine.

Feast: May 18.

Bibliography: E. CARLSSON, "Translacio archiepiscoporum," Uppsala Universitets Årsskrift (Uppsala 1944) No. 2. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956–) 2:342–343. B. THORDEMAN, ed., Erik den Helige: Historia, kult, reliker (Stockholm 1954), articles by T. SCH-MID et al. O. HARTMAN, Korsfararen; mirakelspel i tre akter (Stockholm 1962).

[T. SCHMID]

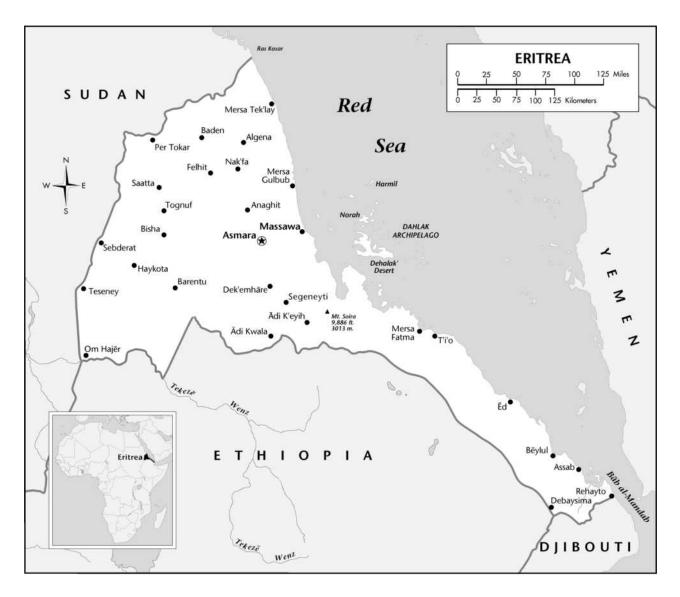

ERITREA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Located in northeast Africa, the State of Eritrea is bordered on the north and east by the RED SEA, on the south by ETHIOPIA and DJIBOUTI, and on the west by SUDAN. Including the islands of the Dahlak Archipelago and Zuqar Island, northern coastal plains rising to interior mountains and falling again to rolling plains in the southwest characterize the region. The arid climate of the northern coast cools into the mountains while becoming more arid in the western hills. Subjected to frequent periods of drought and infestations of locusts, agricultural production consists of sorghum, lentils, corn, cotton, tobacco and coffee. Eritrea exports much of it agricultural production, along with textiles, livestock and small manufactured goods, to other nations surrounding the Red Sea.

Annexed to Ethiopia in 1952 as part of a federation, and then made a province, Eritrea began a struggle for independence that lasted three decades. Independence, which was finally achieved on May 24, 1993, was followed by border skirmishes with Ethiopia that escalated into war by 1999. Thousands of refugees lived in camps around the country, prompting such organizations as Caritas to provide much-needed aid. By 2001 peace talks began, accompanied by troop withdrawals from Eritrea's southern border, and the prospect of a lasting peace was viewed as a possibility.

Ecclesiastically, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church has dioceses at Asmara, Barentu and Karen, all of which are suffragans of the Egyptian Archdiocese of Addis Ababa. An Oriental Orthodox Church, it falls under the patriarchy of Constantinople. An apostolic vicariate for the Latin rite is located in the capital city of Asmara.

Part of the ancient Ethopian empire, Eritrea saw the introduction of Christianity in the 4th century. Following a split within the Church at the fourth Ecumenical Council of Chalcedon in 451, Ethiopia joined with the eastern Oriental Orthodox churches. A Coptic rite, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church is monophysite, accepting the doctrine that Christ has, not two, but only a single nature: the divine (see MONOPHYTISM). Missionary activity by Ethiopian Orthodox increased in Eritrea during the 19th century; meanwhile Roman Catholicism also made inroads, brought by Italians who colonized the region in 1882. By the 20th century the Latin-rite Church remained a minority faith, numbering only three percent of the population, which otherwise remained divided between Orthodox and Muslim.

In 1935 the region was used as a base for the Italian invasion of Ethiopia, and was incorporated into Italian East Africa the following year. Conquered by the British in 1941, it was federated to Ethiopia in 1952 and was made a northern province of its African neighbor ten years later. Eritrea's incorporation into Ethiopia did much to strengthen the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, which remained the predominate Christian faith even after the nation declared its independence in 1993. In 1995 Orthodox dioceses were established at Barentu and Karen, although difficulties caused in an escalating border war between Eritrea and Ethiopia left them lacking both funding and staff. While the Eritrean government continued to allow the freedom to worship, it prevented religious groups from involvement in politics or other public administration activities. In April 1998, as fullscale war erupted, the troubled Eritrean government postponed announced plans to nationalize the country's private schools and hospitals, most of which were run by the Catholic Church. In April 1999 Pope John Paul II met with bishops of both Ethiopia and Eritrea, urging them to ''support every move toward peace and every effort to restore unity and brotherhood.''

By 2000 the Orthodox Church had 93 parishes under the care of 72 diocesan and 217 religious priests, while 80 brothers and 340 sisters administered to the humanitarian needs of the nation, including the thousands left homeless as the result of war. The country's two Catholic bishops joined with the bishops of Ethiopia to form an episcopal conference, and efforts to work with Muslim and other religious groups were seen as integral in the formation of a peace pact signed between the presidents of the warring nations on Dec. 15, 2000.

Bibliography: E. CERULLI, Scritti teologici etiopici dei secoli XVI e XVII, 2 v. (Studi e Testi 198, 204; Vatican City 1958–60). T. KILLION, Historical Dictionary of Eritrea (Methchen, NJ 1998). Annuario Pontificio (2000).

[P. SHELTON]

ERITREAN ORTHODOX CHURCH (ORIENTAL ORTHODOX)

When Eritrea gained independence from Ethiopia on May 24, 1993 after a long struggle, negotiations took place between the Eritrean bishops of the ETHIOPIAN OR-THODOX CHURCH (ORIENTAL ORTHODOX) and the COPTIC ORTHODOX CHURCH (ORIENTAL ORTHODOX) for the creation of an autocephalous church independent of the Ethiopian Church. This request was approved by the Holy Synod of the Coptic Church on Sept. 28, 1993. In the same month, the Ethiopian Church gave its blessings to the separation. A formal agreement was signed in February 1994 between the primates of the Ethiopian Church and the newly established Eritrean Orthodox Church, recognizing and affirming the AUTOCEPHALY of both churches. The primate of the Eritrean Orthodox Church is the patriarch of Eritrea, who resides in Asmara, Eritrea. This church is in communion with the Ethiopian and the Egyptian Coptic Churches, and accords a primacy of honor to the Coptic Church.

Bibliography: R. ROBERSON, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed. (Rome 1999).

[EDITORS]

ERKEMBODO, ST.

Benedictine abbot; d. Thérouanne, April 12, 734. He was received into the abbey of Saints. Peter and Paul (SAINT-BERTIN) before 709, and was elected fourth abbot of the monastery in 717. The BENEDICTINE RULE had already replaced the earlier usages of St. COLUMBAN. Erkembodo developed his abbey's liturgical practices and intensified its life of prayer. He increased the property of the monastery by buying neighboring lands, and from Chilperic II and Theodoric IV he obtained confirmation of the privilege of immunity granted by Clovis III. In 720, upon the death of Ravenger, he became fifth bishop of Thérouanne. He was buried in the church of Saint-Omer beside the first bishop of Thérouanne and became the object of a popular cult, which continues to this day. A Romanesque church was built there in the mid-11th century. His present tomb is a monolithic sandstone sarcophagus, with concentric carvings, after the manner of those in Ravenna.

Feast: April 12.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum April 2:93–95. M. COENS, ''L'Auteur de la Vita Erkembodonis,'' Analecta Bollandiana 42 (1924) 126–136. L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique . . . des saints mérovingiens de l'ancienne Belgique (Louvain 1907). G. COOLEN, ''La Mort de S. E.,'' Bulletin trimestriel de la société académique des antiquaires de la Morinie 18 (1957) 641–643.

[G. COOLEN]

ERLANGEN SCHOOL

An influential school of German Protestant theology that grew out of the corporate efforts of the Lutheran theological faculty at Erlangen University in the mid-19th century. This university, founded in 1743, and its theological faculty had experienced in their successive stages of intellectual development the influence of EN-LIGHTENMENT theology, philosophical RATIONALISM, philosophical IDEALISM (connected with ROMANTICISM and its understanding of history), and also the late romantic revival of theology, whose chief representatives were the Reformed theologian Christian Krafft (1784–1845) and the scientist Karl von Raumer (1783–1865).

The systematic, theological origin of the Erlangen school was the accomplishment of Gottlieb Adolph von Harless (1806-79), who had been influenced by SCHLEI-ERMACHER and "converted" by Friedrich Tholuck, and who stressed personal "regeneration." This emphasis, the first characteristic mark of the school, received added impetus from Johann Christian von Hofmann (1810-77), who combined the views of PIETISM with a confessional Lutheran outlook and elements of Schleiermacher's thought. Hofmann systematized the regeneration approach and held that all the main parts of classical Lutheran orthodoxy must be constructed in a regressive theological process from the experience of regeneration if the internal testimony of the Holy Spirit has any truth. Theology, he claimed, has met its task if the results of this reconstructive process coincide with the proof from Scripture.

A second characteristic of the school was its systematic interest in biblical interpretation and stress on the promise-fulfillment concept that is the basis of a theology of Heilsgeschichte (redemptive history). Hofmann's book, Weissagung und Erfüllung (2 v. 184–144), proposed that revelation is God's gradual unfolding of the plan of salvation whereby each step or "fulfillment" is again turned into a promise. Thus, Scripture is to be understood historically, but strictly as a redemptive history with Jesus Christ as its center.

These two characteristics, the emphasis on subjective regeneration and on redemptive history, became the pillars of the impressive system of Franz Hermann von Frank (1827-94), a pupil of Harless and Hofmann. His System der christlichen Gewissheit (1870-73) concentrated on the regenerate believer who uncovers the "immanent, transcendent, and transeunt" objects of faith, but his System der christlichen Wahrheit (1878-80) proceeded in the opposite direction by unfolding the divine truth (Wahrheit) that leads to the individual believer's certainty (Gewissheit). Immanent objects of faith, according to Frank, are those the regenerate man finds in himself, such as sin and righteousness; transcendent ones are those causing regeneration, namely the Trinity and the person and work of Christ; and transeunt ones are those that mediate between the immanent and transcendent, such as the Church, Sacraments, and inspiration. This theological system attempted to encompass both Schleiermacher and traditional orthodoxy; it represented the climax of the Erlangen school. Other scholars related to the school, especially Theodosius Harnack (1817-89), Gottfried Thomasius (1802-75), and Theodor von Zahn (1838–1933), did not subscribe fully to Frank's elaborate system.

The school's achievements were effectively attacked by Albrecht RITSCHL and his disciples, but some of its historical and exegetical fruits remained influential. The systematic concept of Heilsgeschichte gained new relevance in discussions of typology in Old Testament interpretation.

Bibliography: K. G. STECK, Evangelisches Kirchenlexicon: Kirchlich-theologisches Handwörterbuch, ed. H. BRUNOTTE and O. WEBER (Göttingen 1956–61) 1:1123–25. H. GRASS, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Tübingen 1957–65) 2:566–568. W. LOHFF, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:981–982.

[D. RITSCHL]

ERLEMBALD, ST.

Lay leader of the Patarines in 11th-century Milan; d. Milan, Italy, Holy Thursday, April 1075. On his return from a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, he decided to become a monk; but with the death of his brother, LANDULF of Cotta, Erlembald resumed his life as a knight, and led the Patarines against the forces of antireform headed by the Milanese Archbishop Guido of Velate.

After the brutal murder of St. ARIALDO, another Patarine leader, in 1066, the movement was to become more militant. Erlembald, now the sole head, sought to avenge his friend's death. Thus, from 1067 on, the word of Arialdo transcended to the sword of Erlembald. By the 1070s, this eagle-eyed, red-bearded soldier of God, who was "like a pope to judge the priests, a king to crumble the peoples," transformed Milan into a battleground.

By 1075 the conflict between Church and State, which had been developing for many decades, was brought into the open by the Milanese situation. Therefore, the Patarines, under Erlembald, served as a catalyst for the INVESTITURE STRUGGLE.

After Erlembald's death in one of the battles, the movement was largely dissipated. Some Patarines went to other cities in Italy, and the rest receded into the twilight for nearly 20 years. Erlembald was canonized by Pope URBAN II, who sought to make a gesture of peace with the remaining die-hards from the Patarine party. He shares the same feast day as his friend, Arialdo.

Feast: June 27.

Bibliography: ANDREW OF STRUMI, "Vita Sancti Arialdi," Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825-) 30.2. 1047-75. ARNULF, "Gesta archiepiscoporum Mediolanensium," Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825-) 8.1-31. LANDULF SENIOR, "Historia Mediolanensis," Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825-) 8.32-100. S. M. BROWN, "Movimenti politicoreligiosi a Milano ai tempi della Pataria," Archivio storico lombardo, ser. 58, 6 (1931) 227-278. C. CASTIGLIONI, I santi Arialdo ed Erlembaldo e la Pataria (Milan 1944). H. E. J. COWDREY, "The Papacy, the Patarenes and the Church of Milan," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, ser. 5, 18 (1968) 25-48. Y. RENOUARD, Les villes d'Italie de la fin du x^e siècle au début du xiv^e siècle, v. 2 (Paris 1969). E. WERNER, Pauperes Christi: Studien zu sozialreligiösen bewegungen im zeitalter des reformpapsttums (Leipzig 1956). J. P. WHITNEY, Hildebrandine Essays (Cambridge 1932) 143-157.

[P. M. LEVINE]

ERMELINDE, ST.

Belgian recluse; d. Oct. 29 c. 595. She belonged to a rich family in Brabant; her traditional connections with the Carolingian family of Pepin I derive from a unreliable 11th-century vita. According to this legend Ermelinde cut her hair and fled from home to avoid a marriage arranged by her parents. She took up a life of mortification and asceticism in a hermitage, first at Beauvechain and then at Meldaert, near Tirlemont, Belgium. It was later alleged that she founded a monastery at Chaumont near Meldaert. After her death at the age of 48, she was buried at Meldaert, where a chapel was later built in her honor.

Feast: Oct. 29.

Bibliography: Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae ct mediae aetatis (Brussels 1898–1901) 1:2605–07. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 12:843–872. S. BALAU, Les Sources de l'histoire de Liège au moyen âge: Étude critique (Brussels 1903). L. VAN DER ESSEN, Étude critique . . . des saints mérovingiens de l'ancienne Belgique (Louvain 1907) 307–309. É. DE MOREAU, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique (2d ed. Brussels 1945) 1:196; 2:253, 286; 3:569. J. L. BAU-DOT and L. CHAUSSIN, Vies des saints et des bienheueux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes (Paris 1935–56) 10:976–977.

[C. P. LOUGHRAN]

ERMENBURGA, ST.

Anglo-Saxon queen and abbess, known also as Domna Ebba or Domneva; d. Thanet, c. 695. She was the daughter of Ermenred of the royal line of Kent. In her youth, she was married to Merewald, son of Penda, king of Mercia; by Merewald she had three daughters and one son. Her brothers had been killed in a family struggle in Kent and in compensation, King Egbert of Kent gave her estates on the island of Thanet. After her husband's death she retired there and founded the Abbey of Thanet, being blessed as first abbess by Abp. THEODORE OF CANTER-BURY. After a rule of many years she died, and was succeeded as abbess by her daughter, St. MILDRED.

Feast: Nov. 19.

Bibliography: W. STUBBS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–1887) 2:133. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 3:329–332.

[J. L. DRUSE]

ERMENRICH OF PASSAU

Benedictine, bishop of Passau; b. c. 814; d. Dec. 26, 874. He is perhaps to be identified with the Benedictine monk Ermenrich of ELLWANGEN, who was educated at FULDA under RABANUS MAURUS and Rudolph, at REIC-HENAU under WALAFRID STRABO, and later at SANKT GALLEN. About 840 Ermenrich composed a life of the Anglo-Saxon monk Sualo (whom he calls Solus), based on oral tradition and historically unimportant. In a dialogue modeled on the Consolatio of BOETHIUS, he composed for Gozbald, Bishop of Würzburg (841–855), a legendary account of the founding of the monastery of organized and overornate in style, the letter shows the breadth of knowledge to be acquired in the monastic schools of the time, contains important historical data, and supplements the chronicles of Sankt Gallen. When sent by Louis the German on a missionary expedition to the court of BORIS I OF BULGARIA (866–867), he worked against the influence of SS. CYRIL and METHODIUS. Bibliography: E. DÜMMLER in Forschungen zur deutschen Geschichte, ed. G. WAITZ, v.13 (Göttingen 1873) 473–485. W. WAT-TENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im mittelalter bis zur Mitte des 13 Jh. (Berlin 1894) 1:282–284. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (Berlin Leipzig 1958) 2:680–681. v.

TENBACH, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im mittelatier bis zur Mitte des 13 Jh. (Berlin 1894) 1:282–284. A. HAUCK, Kirchengeschichte Deutschlands (Berlin-Leipzig 1958) 2:680–681. v.
BURR, "Ermenrich von Ellwangen," Ellwanger Jahrbuch 16 (1956) 19–31; Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1031–32. w. SCHWARZ, "Die Schriften Ermenrichs von Ellwangen," Zeitschrift für Württembergische Landesgeschichte 12 (1953) 181–189; 15 (1956) 279–281. W. FINK, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques 15:759–761.

Ellwangen by Hariolf. Between 850 and 855, he sent to Grimald, Abbot of Sankt Gallen, a letter in which he discussed a wide variety of subjects from grammar and philosophy to mythology and dogma. Though badly

[M. F. MCCARTHY]

ERMIN, ST.

Abbot; b. Herly, Laon, France, late seventh century; d. Lobbes, near Cambrai, Belgium, April 25, 737. He was born of a noble French family and became chaplain and confessor to Madelgar, Bishop of Laon. While in the bishop's service he became a friend of URSMAR, abbot of LOBBES, and entered the BENEDICTINE ORDER at his monastery. When Ursmar resigned in 711 or 712, Ermin succeeded him as abbot bishop of Lobbes. He was buried at Lobbes, and in 1409 his relics were reinterred next to those of St. Ursmar. Together they are the patrons of Lobbes.

Feast: April 18 and 25 (Dioceses of Soissons, Cambrai, Tournai, and Ghent).

Bibliography: Vita, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores rerum Merovingicarum (Berlin 1825–) 6:461–470. J. WARICHEZ, L'Abbaye de Lobbes (Tournai 1909). Analecta Bollandiana (Brussels 1882–) 50 (1932) 132. W. BÖHNE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–1965) 3:1032. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 2:68–72.

[P. BLECKER]

ERMINFRID, ST.

Frankish monastic founder; seventh century. Born of a noble Frankish family in Franche-Comté, he spent part of his youth at the court of Chlothair II, where his brother Waldalenus became chancellor. In 625 both retired from the court to the area of Cusance for a life of piety. About 627, Erminfrid entered the Celtic monastic life at LUX-EUIL. When he inherited the empty nunnery at Islia in Cusance, EUSTACE OF LUXEUIL had him restore the edifice and reestablish monastic life there for men, making it a priory attached to Luxeuil. Erminfrid lived at Cusance, in Franche-Comté (present-day Department of Doubs), to an advanced age and was buried there near his brother.

Feast: Sept. 25.

Bibliography: EGILBERT OF CUSANCE, Vita, Acta Sanctorum Sept. 7:106–113. T. W. DAVIDS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–1887) 2:181. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 3:101–103. G. BARDY, Catholicisme 4:389. J. MARI-LIER, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912) 15:751–752.

[J. L. DRUSE]

ERMINOLD OF PRÜFENING, BL.

Abbot; d. Prüfening, Bavaria, Jan. 6, 1121. Erminold came from the Swabian nobility and, as a youth, entered the BENEDICTINE monastery of HIRSAU under Abbot WIL-LIAM. He took part in the unsuccessful attempt to reform the Abbey of LORSCH (1106–07) and was appointed (1114) by Bishop OTTO OF BAMBERG to be abbot of the newly founded monastery of Prüfening, near Regensburg. There Erminold implemented a strict reform that led to rebellions by his monks, one of whom finally killed him. In 1283 his relics were disinterred and buried in a catafalque surmounted by a reclining effigy. The sculptor was the "Erminold Master," so called from his connection with this statue, an outstanding example of early German Gothic art.

Feast: Jan. 6.

Bibliography: Vita Erminoldi, Monumenta Germaniae Historica (Berlin 1826–) division: Scriptore, 12:480–500. J. SYDOW, Neue deutsche Biographie (Berlin 1953–) 4:602. A. M. ZIMMER-MANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–38) 1:49–51. L. HEIDENHAIN, "Quellen zum Stil des Ermenoldmeisters," Jahrbuch der Preussischen Kunstsammlungen 48 (1927) 183–208.

[L KURRAS]

ERNEST OF PARDUBICE (PARDUBITZ)

Archbishop of Prague; b. Hostinné Castle (Czech.), c. 1297; d. Roudnice, June 30, 1364. After his education at the Benedictine monastery in Broumov and the bishop's school in Prague, he studied Canon Law at the universities of Bologna and Padua. Following ordination he was named canon, then dean (1338) of the St. Vitus Cathedral Chapter in Prague. He was elected bishop of Prague in 1343, and its first archbishop in 1344. His program of reorganizing and reforming his lax clergy was accomplished through a diocesan synod (1343), enforcing regulations against heretics, and a provincial synod (1349), promulgating statutes concerning ecclesiastical life. He innovated acta consistorii to improve administrative procedure in the archdiocese, while at the same time, the DEVOTIO MODERNA was working toward an improvement of moral standards for the laity. He was a trusted friend of Emperor Charles IV, and his frequent emissary to the papal court. The foundation of the new St. Vitus Cathedral (1344) and monasteries at Emmaus (1347) and Kladsko, are credited to Ernest. He was responsible for the foundation of Charles University of Prague (1348), and as its chancellor he secured it privileges and financial support. His desire for retirement obviated the proposal that he be a serious candidate for the papacy in 1362.

Bibliography: E. WINTER, Tausend Jahre Geisteskampf im Sudetenraum (Salzburg 1938) 57–98. J. K. VYSKOČIL, Arnošt z Pardubic (Prague 1947). S. H. THOMSON, "Learning at the Court of Charles IV," Speculum 25 (1950) 1–20.

[L. NEMEC]

ERNEST OF ZWIEFALTEN, ST.

Abbot and martyr; d. Mecca, 1148. His origins are unknown, but for five years he was abbot of ZWIEFALTEN in Swabia. He abdicated in 1146 because of the troublesome factions that were disrupting the life of the monastery. He undertook a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in the retinue of Bishop OTTO OF FREISING, who accompanied the crusade of Conrad III. Legend has it that Ernest was cruelly tortured by the Saracens in MECCA. He is commemorated in Zwiefalten as a martyr, and his cult exists but has never been officially recognized. There are a vita and a passio dating from the end of the 12th century [Acta Sanctorum (Paris 1863) (1910) Nov. 3:605–617], and he is represented in a large statue and two wall paintings in the abbey church

Feast: Nov. 7.

Bibliography: Annales maiores Zwifaltenses, Monumenta Germaniae Scriptores (Berlin 1825) 10:55–56. Acta Sanctorum Nov. 3:608–617. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 3:272–275. H. TÜCHLE, Kirchengeschichte Schwabens, 2 v. (Stuttgart 1952–54) 1:245. J. N. HAUNTINGER, Reise durch Schwaben und Bayern im Jahre 1784, ed. G. SPAHR (Weissenhorn 1964). J. E. STADLER and F. J. HEIM, Vollständiges Heiligenlexikon, 5 v. (Augsburg 1858–82) 2:87.

[G. SPAHR]

EROTIC LITERATURE

In its widest sense, erotic literature includes all writing that deals to a conspicuous degree with sex and love. Under this norm, there is a vast body of literature that treats these themes from an integral human point of view; that is, sex and love are conceived not merely in terms of their physical aspects, but also as manifestations of the spirit. In this type of literature, the physical is generally quite subordinate to the spiritual aspect. Even when physical details are quite frankly portrayed, they are nevertheless caught up in a total atmosphere that provides aesthetic pleasure, and not sensual titillation. Emotionally immature readers may, of course, read merely to satisfy an unhealthy curiosity, but a sound judgment of the work itself, and of the author's intention as far as it is evident in the work, would conclude that the work is not of its nature seductive or sexually stimulating. Often, as a matter of fact, the very realism of the physical details is a necessary element in bringing alive to the reader the deeper spiritual aspects of the story. Romeo's raptures over Juliet's physical beauty are certainly sensuous, but it would be a most insensitive reader who would think that Romeo did not see much more in Juliet than merely her physical attractions.

Pornography. It can be said that almost all the great literature in the world, and certainly the vast bulk of literature that deals with human relations, is of this erotic type, for the simple reason that love and sex are among the greatest dynamic forces in human life. When these forces get out of hand in literary treatment, they tend to degenerate into writing that is pornographic or obscene. The common quality that runs through all pornographic and obscene writings is emphasis on the physical aspects of sex and love, or on what should be private physical functions, to an extent that makes them the dominant, if not the exclusive, impression on the normal reader. As a result, sex and love become dehumanized and not infrequently disgustingly animalistic. This quality of pornographic writing can often be discerned as the author's deliberate intention (in the so-called "hard-core" pornography); but even when the author's intention is not evident, the quality may be manifest by the very nature of the work itself. It is often argued that in works wherein the author's pornographic intent is not evident the literary quality is frequently of such excellence as to make them genuine art and therefore immune from any CENSORSHIP. A sounder view would be that works whose chief, if not exclusive, appeal is to sensuality cannot be works of literary merit.

> Sensual art can very well be great art. Every art is sensual to a certain degree, and it is easy to see that in many arts the sensual is strongly emphasized. But art whose intention is to arouse the senses cannot be great art. On the contrary, the more this is its purpose, the more decidedly it deserts service for the sake of servility or slavery, the further it is from being art at all. Rubens was an artist; the illustrations in an indecent humor magazine are not art, no matter how well they are drawn. Between Boccaccio and Aristophanes and the pornographic novel lies all the difference in the world. [Van der Leeuw, 279.]

PORNOGRAPHY certainly includes all those works that of their nature tend to arouse in the normal reader illicit physical reactions or sexual fancies that of their nature result in such physical reactions (see PLEASURE; THOUGHTS, MORALITY OF). Theoretically, and for the sake of precision in argument, it might be better to restrict the definition of pornography to that type of literature that tends to arouse such physical or psychological reactions (see H. C. Gardiner, Norms for the Novel [rev. ed. Garden City, N.Y. 1960], 62–67). Practically, however, this is not the common understanding of the meaning of the word, nor is it the scope of the meaning almost universally envisioned in law. All civilized countries have laws against obscenity. Some endeavor to draw a distinction between obscenity and pornography. In Germany, for example, the obscene is defined as that which "offends grossly against the concept of decency, even if it is not pornographic"; in France the obscene is simply that which is contraire aux bonnes moeurs; in Belgium, the obscene is variously described as that which is of a nature to éviller ouá surexciter des passions sensuelles or that which is of a nature à produire, à la simple vue, un sentiment de réprobation. In Japan, the obscene is that which "stirs up or excites sexual desire, spoils the normal sexual modesty of the ordinary human being, or is contrary to good sexual morals." In other countries the obscene is simply that which is "indecent," "disgusting," "places undue emphasis on sex or crime," "encourages depravity," "offends decency," and so on. One German opinion even includes under a definition of obscenity matter that "extolls wars or racial hatred" (see N. St. John-Stevas, Obscenity and the Law [London 1956] appendix 3, 217-359).

Some authors, and generally those whose own works have been accused of being pornographic, have attempted to distinguish between obscenity and pornography. D. H. Lawrence, for example, who claimed that he was a fierce foe of pornography, defended himself against the charge that some of his own works were obscene on the grounds that the use of obscenity is no moral or artistic wrong. It would seem that he and others like him confuse erotic literature, in the sense defined above, with writings that place undue and even revolting emphasis on sex.

Pornography and Censorship. Be that as it may, one fact seems clear: Pornographic-obscene literature, in common understanding, ranges from that which tends to excite to illicit sexual acts or fantasies, through that which tends to debase sex and marriage (this is generally done when woman is portrayed as merely an object of passion, walled off from any love, sympathy, consideration, or esteem), to writings that arouse a justifiable disgust, such as those that dwell on excremental functions. It is evident that a precise definition of pornography does not emerge from these various approaches to it, and this is exactly where, in so many modern societies, the enforcement of laws against obscenity or pornography runs into great difficulty. The search for exactness of legal definition is generally fruitless and frequently not demanded by the nature of the case. St. Thomas Aquinas, for example, has stated this fact succinctly: "We must not seek the same degree of certainty in all things. Consequently, in contingent matters, it is enough for a thing to be certain, as being true in the great number of instances, though at times and less frequently it may fail" (Ethics 5.2). And the Supreme Court of the U.S. has echoed this principle: "This Court has consistently held that lack of precision is not itself offensive to the requirements of due process. . . all that is needed is that the language of definitions conveys sufficiently definite warning as to the proscribed conduct when measured by common understanding and practices" (Norms for the Novel, 79). This statement was issued in connection with the 1956 Roth v. United States case, wherein this test to determine obscenity was laid down: "Whether to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interest." Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., who wrote the decision, continued:

> These words, applied according to the proper standard of judging obscenity . . . give adequate warning of the conduct proscribed and mark. . .boundaries sufficiently distinct for judges and juries fairly to administer the law. . . . That there may be marginal cases in which it is difficult to determine the side of the line on which a particular fact situation falls is no sufficient reason to hold the language too ambiguous to determine a criminal offense. [Norms for the Novel, 79.]

Note should be taken of the fact that the presence of the so-called four-letter words does not necessarily make a piece of writing pornographic or obscene. It is true that these words are frequently used in contexts that are obscene; their use betrays vulgarity and crudity, and circumstances under which they are used may make their use sinful (e.g., deliberate use of them to shock or disedify the young and impressionable), but considered merely in themselves, they would not fall under any definition of pornography. Their use is to be reprobated, without doubt, but for the reason that they are vulgar and crude, and even shocking, not because they are ispo facto obscene (see SPEECH, INDECENT AND VULGAR).

Despite difficulties of definition for purposes of legal control of obscenity, it is clear that the consensus of thought and the universal operation of law in society recognizes that there is such a thing as pornographic and obscene literature. When a work is recognized as definitely such, public authority has the right and the duty to exercise prudent censorship.

See Also: CENSORSHIP OF BOOKS (CANON LAW).

Bibliography: N. ST. JOHN-STEVAS, Obscenity and the Law (London 1956). T. J. MURPHY, Censorship: Government and Obscenity (Baltimore 1963). M. MEAD, "Sex and Censorship in Contemporary Society," in New World Writing (New York 1953). C. R. HEWITT, ed., Does Pornography Matter? (London 1961). G. VAN DER LEEUW, Sacred and Profane Beauty: The Holy in Art, tr. D. E. GREEN (New York 1963). D. H. LAWRENCE, Sex, Literature, and Censorship (New York 1953). H. C. GARDINER, Norms for the Novel (rev. ed. Garden City, N.Y. 1960). E. PARTRIDGE, Shakespeare's Bawdy (New York 1948).

[H. C. GARDINER]

ERRÁZURIZ Y VALDIVIESO, CRESCENTE

Chilean priest, archbishop, and historian; b. Santiago, CHILE, Nov. 28, 1839; d. there, June 5, 1931. Errázuriz was born into one of Chile's most aristocratic and prominent families of Basque origin, and as a youth was considered by many to lack the temperament to become a distinguished priest. Raised in the mid-19th century when the Church-State controversy was waxing bitter and when his uncle Rafael Valentín Valdivieso y Zañartu was the iron-willed archbishop of Santiago (1845–74), Errázuriz appeared to be too moderate and equable in character, too much the dispassionate scholar, to become the polemicist that clerical leaders at the time, according to the view of many, had to be.

Once ordained, Errázuriz, who suffered frequently from bad health, was content to be a rather inconspicuous and often ignored clergyman. Originally a Dominican, he soon left that order and took up his duties as a secular priest. With enthusiasm he began to study and to write on Chilean Church and colonial history. His historical studies, beginning to appear in the 1870s, refuted the charges of Spanish depravity during the colonial past that had been spread by such liberal, anticlerical Chilean writers as Diego Barros Arana, Miguel Luis Amunátegui, and José Victorino Lastarria. Diligent in his research and objective in his evaluations, Errázuriz found much that was worthy of admiration in Chile's past. Along with history, Errázuriz dedicated himself to journalism, founding in 1874, and becoming the first director of, the newspaper El Estandarte Católico. As a journalist charged with defending the Church position on all issues, he disliked having frequently to publish harsh criticisms of old friends.

Crescente Errázuriz Y Valdivieso.

Church-State Controversy. The relatively obscure clergyman was nominated in 1919 by Pres. Juan Luis Sanfuentes as archbishop of Santiago. The nomination, which was duly approved, had been suggested by the long-time leader of the moderate wing of the Liberal party, Eliodoro Yáñez. Rightly foreseeing that within the next few years the issue of separation of Church and State, which had been under debate for decades, would have to be resolved, Yáñez felt that the times demanded a primate of unusual tolerance, moderation, and wisdom. With the majority of the clergy issuing extreme statements and predicting the moral ruin of Chile if separation occurred, Archbishop Errázuriz himself was for a time swept along by the tide of rising passions. On April 24, 1923, he issued a pastoral admonishing all Catholics to reject in toto the attempt to separate Church and State. Such a move, the prelate insisted, would signify an affront to God, a public and solemn declaration on the part of Chileans that God did not exist. Despite this stand, a new constitution providing for Church-State separation was approved in 1925, even though a majority of the registered electorate, for a variety of reasons, boycotted the constitutional plebiscite. Once the new constitution was officially sanctioned, the Chilean hierarchy decided to accept defeat gracefully. The prelates issued a joint pastoral that, reflecting the wishes of the archbishop, expressed the hope for the future safety of the Church and concluded with the confident prediction that the Chilean state would refrain from such acts of persecution as had already been unleashed by separation in other countries.

Fascist Influences. In the late years of his life Errázuriz found grounds for cooperation with dictator Carlos Ibáñez del Campo (1927-31). Avoiding totalitarian expedients, Ibáñez decided against establishing state control over the entire educational structure. In a number of ways he encouraged the expansion of a Churchcontrolled, private educational system. Errázuriz was highly pleased by this and also came to admire the corporate state ideology that Ibáñez, under the influence of Primo de Rivera and Mussolini, began to advocate. The Errázuriz views on fascism were reflected in the Feb. 16, 1929, edition of the official organ of the Chilean hierarchy, La Revista Católica. Not only had Mussolini managed to route the defenders of pseudodemocracy, stated the Revista; he had also crushed the doctrines and the parties of international Masonry.

In their concern with the Communist menace, a large majority of the more influential churchmen in Chile had by this time come to accept fascism as a desirable social, political, and economic system, and it was not surprising that the archbishop, in his late 80s, went along with this development, which was by no means without its positive features. Errázuriz cooperated wholeheartedly with the paternalistically administered social reform programs that Catholic Action groups, most of them under the influence of fascist ideology, began to advance in the mid-1920s. Happily death spared Errázuriz the ordeal of witnessing the extremes of violence and racism into which an originally benign Chilean fascism evolved with the rise in that country of a National Socialist or Nazi movement.

However valuable his contributions in preserving calm in the troubled 1920s, Errázuriz's most important role in Chile may, in the final analysis, have been that of historian. By showing a new generation of intellectuals that they could properly feel pride in Chile's colonial past, he helped provide the basis for an integral nationalism and corrected many of the errors of excessively partisan historians. The best insight into the nature of Errázuriz is provided by his autobiographical memoirs, Algo de lo qué he visto (posthumous, Santiago de Chile 1934). Among his many historical works appear: Don García de Mendoza, 1557–61 (1916); Historia de Chile sin governador: 1554-57 (1912); Historia de Chile: Pedro de Valdivia (2 v. 1916); Orígines de la Iglesia chilena (1873); and Seis años de la historia de Chile, 1598-1605 (2 v. 1908).

[F. B. PIKE]

ERRINGTON, GEORGE, BL.

Martyr; b. c. 1554 at Hirst (or Herst), Northumberland, England; d. Nov. 29 1596, hanged, drawn, and quartered at York, England. He served as a courier and escort for Catholics traveling between the northeast of England and the Continent, which had to be accomplished furtively. He was imprisoned in the Tower of London from 1585–87 and at York Castle in 1591 and 1593–94, but released. When Errington was again arrested for recusancy and imprisoned at York, a Protestant minister came to him, feigning an interest in Catholicism. Errington was tricked into attempting to persuade the minister to convert. For this reason he was condemned with BB. William KNIGHT and William GIBSON for ''persuading to popery.'' Errington was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England).

See Also: ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.

Bibliography: R. CHALLONER, Memoirs of Missionary Priests, ed. J. H. POLLEN (rev. ed. London 1924). J. H. POLLEN, Acts of English Martyrs (London 1891).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ERROR

Truth is commonly defined as the conformity between intellect (knowledge) and reality. As the contrary of truth, error may be defined as a lack of conformity between knowledge and reality. Error is related to FALSITY as the specific to the generic: Falsity may be ontological (falsity in things—possible only in an improper sense); moral (falsity in speech—LYING); or logical (falsity in thought—error). Thus error is logical falsity. As lack of conformity, error is to be distinguished from IGNORANCE, which is defined as lack of knowledge.

Error is positive or negative. Positive error distorts reality. Negative error fails to detect some aspect of reality but does not distort it. If the undetected reality is not connaturally knowable, the error is merely negative. If it is, the error is privative. Thus to judge that white is black is positive error. Not to hear sound waves below a minimum frequency is merely negative error. Not to see a certain color in the spectrum under normal conditions is privative error.

Cognitive powers are naturally ordered to TRUTH. Yet error is possible because KNOWLEDGE is not mere passive reception but an active synthesizing and interpreting of innumerable, diverse data. Among the cognitive acts, JUDGMENT is subject to positive error; under the influence of faulty judgment, conceptualization also is subject to positive error; external sense perception is not subject to positive error. As inherently finite, all cognitive powers are subject to merely negative error; and if a given power is indisposed or poorly applied, to privative error. Error of judgment is error in the strictest sense of the term.

The cause of error is the knower's precipitancy in making unwarranted judgments under the influence of passion, prejudice, haste, inattention, and the like. Avoiding error therefore requires serious effort to attain genuine EVIDENCE and careful vigilance to avoid influences other than evidence when making judgments. As an influence on VOLUNTARITY, error is equivalent in effect to ignorance. Error also has moral relevance in that man's actual sins presuppose an error of judgment equating apparent good with true GOOD.

See Also: INTELLECT; SENSES; CONSCIENCE; ERROR, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography: R. P. PHILLIPS, Modern Thomistic Philosophy, 2 v. (Westminster, Md. 1948) 2:120–124. F. VAN STEENBERGHEN, Epistemology, tr. M. J. FLYNN (2d ed. rev. New York 1949) 172–176. P. COFFEY, Epistemology, 2 v. (New York 1917; reprint 1958) 2:366–371. J. GREDT, Elementa philosophiae Aristotelico-Thomisticae, ed. E. ZENZEN, 2 v. (13th ed. Freiburg im Br. 1961) 2:681–684. E. VALTON, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT, 15 v. (Paris 1903–50; Tables générales 1951–) 5.1:435–446. L. W. KEELER, "St. Thomas's Doctrine Regarding Error," The New Scholasticism 7 (1933) 26–57.

[J. B. NUGENT]

ERROR, THEOLOGICAL

One of the theological censures, i.e., one of the pejorative judgments that indicate a proposition is in some way opposed or harmful to faith or morals. In condemning many propositions of QUESNEL, a censure used by Clement XI was that of "error" (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2502). Theologians distinguish various erroneous propositions and speak of them as involving an error in divine faith, in ecclesiastical faith, in Catholic doctrine, or in theology. This last censure, theological error, is generally applied to a proposition that is directly opposed to a strict theological conclusion from a revealed premise. Thus, to maintain that Christ is not capable of laughter would be a theological error.

Rashness is a censure inferior to that of theological error. It is usually applied to a proposition that contravenes a thesis that is not a strict theological conclusion but is well grounded and commonly held by theologians.

See Also: NOTES, THEOLOGICAL.

Bibliography: Sacrae theologiae summa, ed. FATHERS OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS, PROFESSORS OF THE THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES IN SPAIN (Madrid 1962) 1.3:884–913.

[E. J. FORTMAN]

ERTHAL, FRIEDRICH KARL JOSEPH AND FRANZ LUDWIG VON

Friedrich Karl Joseph, prince elector and archbishop of Mainz, primate of Germany and chancellor of the Empire (1774–1802); b. Mainz, Jan. 3, 1719; d. Aschaffenburg, July 25, 1802. He studied at Mainz, Würzburg, and Reims, and became a canon of the cathedral of Mainz (1753) and rector of the university (1754). In 1774 he was elected archbishop of Mainz as well as prince archbishop of Würzburg, but he resigned the latter office in favor of his brother Franz. Karl was most gifted, but worldly, and favorable to the ENLIGHTENMENT. His episcopalist tendencies found expression in the Congress of EMS. As a result of the FRENCH REVOLUTION he lost his territories on the Rhine, and was expelled from Mainz.

Franz Ludwig, prince bishop of Würzburg and Bamberg (1779–95); b. Lohr am Main, Sept. 16, 1730; d. Würzburg, Feb. 14, 1795. After studying theology at Mainz, Würzburg, and Rome, and jurisprudence at Vienna, he was appointed president of the secular administration of the cathedral chapter of Würzburg (1763). In 1779 he was elected unanimously to the double episcopal see of Würzburg and Bamberg. He was loyal to Rome, held strict ecclesiastical views, was solicitous for good training for his clergy, promoted the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of St. IGNATIUS, and was a zealous preacher and a tireless visitator of both his dioceses. In secular matters he reformed the school system, penal law and administration, and took special care of the poor. To his worldly brother, the prince elector, he proposed the ideal of a ruler in his Principles of Government, an ideal that he himself strove to realize completely.

Bibliography: Friedrich Karl Joseph. L. VEZIN, Die Politik des Mainzer Kurfürsten F. K. von Erthal vom Beginn der Französischen Revolution bis zum Falle von Mainz (Bonn 1932). Franz Ludwig. F. LEITSCHUH, L. von Erthal: Fürstbischof von . . . Bamberg, Herzog von Franken (Bamberg 1894). H. RAAB, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 3:1055–56 bibliog.

[F. MAASS]

ESBJÖRN, LARS PAUL

Pioneer Swedish Lutheran in America; b. Hälsingland, Sweden, Oct. 16, 1808; d. Ostervala, Sweden, July 2, 1870. He was a graduate of Uppsala University and taught school and served as pastor in his homeland for 17 years, during which he was influenced by Pietistic revivalism. Impressed by reports of the spiritual destitution of the Swedes who were then beginning to migrate to America in large numbers, he crossed the Atlantic in 1849 and settled in Illinois. There and in adjacent states he gathered Swedish immigrants into congregations. With other clergymen from Sweden he united these congregations into the Augustana Synod (1860). In the same year, persuaded that the future of Swedish LUTHERANS in America required a native ministry, he helped found Augustana College and Seminary in Chicago (later in Rock Island, Ill.) and was made its president. In his early years in America Esbjörn had fellowship with Methodists because of his own background in Pietistic revivalism, but he resisted proselytizing among Swedish immigrants by Methodists, Baptists, and Episcopalians and in the process became more self-consciously Lutheran in doctrine and practice. Worn out by his labors he returned to Sweden in 1863, where he spent his last seven years as a parish minister.

Bibliography: S. RÖNNEGÄRD, Prairie Shepherd: Lars Paul Esbjörn, tr. G. E. ARDEN (Rock Island, Ill. 1952). O. N. OLSON, The Augustana Lutheran Church in America: Pioneer Period, 1846–1860 (Rock Island, Ill. 1950).

[T. G. TAPPERT]

ESCH, NICHOLAS VAN

Mystical theologian; b. Oosterwijk, Holland, 1507; d. Diest, July 19, 1578. He studied in the College of Pope Adrian VI in Louvain, was ordained priest in 1530, and settled in Cologne. There he tutored and taught philosophy. He had great influence intellectually and spiritually over a group of university students, among them Peter CANISIUS. He was devoted to the Carthusian Order and lived at several different times in the monastery, although his weak health prevented his becoming a member of the order. In 1538 he became pastor at Diest, where he was in charge of the Beguines of St. Catherine. He founded several diocesan seminaries according to the rules of the Council of Trent, and he contributed to the reform of many monasteries and convents by letters, counsel, and visits, on his own initiative or by order of the bishops. His spiritual doctrine, deeply rooted in his own period, was influenced by THOMAS À KEMPIS, Gerard GROOTE, Meister ECKHART, Johannes TAULER, HENRY SUSO, etc. Among his literary works are Introductio in vitam introversam, which is the introduction to Templum animae (Antwerp 1563) and Exercitia theologiae mysticae (Antwerp 1563).

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:133. HERMES in Wetzer und Welte's Kirchenlexikon, 12 v. (Freiburg 1882–1903) 4:888–889. D. A. STRACKE in Ons geestelijk erf 25 (1951) 59–90. P. GROOTENS, ibid. 31 (1957) 51–71. A. AMPE, ibid. 32 (1958) 303–330; Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique 4:1060–66. A. F. MANNING, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1109.

[M. M. BARRY]

ESCHATOLOGISM

The explanation of the life and mission of Jesus Christ in terms of His alleged expectation of the full realization of the visible reign of God on earth in the immediate future through His own messianic activity.

In 1892 the German scholar Johannes Weiss published his pioneer work, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes, which won for him the distinction of being one of the founders of the "eschatological school." According to J. Weiss, Jesus simply adopted the apocalyptic attitude of His contemporaries. Their eager anticipation of the DAY OF THE LORD was greatly intensified by the preaching of JOHN THE BAPTIST. Gradually Jesus' messianic self-consciousness convinced Him that it would be His own mission that would bring about the coming of the KINGDOM OF GOD in power; this was confirmed by Peter's confession (Mt 16.16). All of the events of Christ's life are viewed by J. Weiss from this perspective.

At the turn of the century another German theologian, Albert Schweitzer, carried this thesis to its logical though extreme conclusion. He maintained that Jesus firmly convinced that God's judgment on the world was imminent—had no intention of founding a church: such an institution presupposed an extended period of time. Indeed, Jesus did not even look upon Himself as a moral teacher or as the MESSIAH; He saw His earthly task as merely outlining the conditions for entry into the kingdom in the very near future when He would return as the heavenly SON OF MAN. Schweitzer considered the Sermon on the Mount and the other ethical statements of Jesus as provisional, much as a captain's orders to the crew of a sinking ship. The delay of the expected divine intervention forced Him to include His own martyrdom in His plan to precipitate the coming of the kingdom.

Schweitzer expressed these ideas in a book entitled Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1906). Though actually an attempt to save the "historical" Jesus from the morass of 19th-century rationalism, this work concluded skeptically that the real Jesus cannot be found in the Gospels, but only through personal encounter in the toils and conflicts of His service.

Other scholars, such as M. Werner and R. Otto, were to take up his thesis. Alfred LOISY [L'Évangile et l'église (1902), Autour d'un petit livre (1903)] used this approach in an attempt to prove a purely natural origin of the NT as a Christian apology for the failure of the expected reign of God to materialize. J. Munck, the Danish scholar, further tried to show that St. Paul shared Jesus' messianic expectation to the extent of concluding that it was his (Paul's) preaching to the Gentiles on which the final consummation of all things depended.

Besides ignoring the many statements of Christ that speak of the presence of the kingdom, this Schweitzerian "unrealized (or consequent) eschatology" nullifies such basic dogmas as the Incarnation, hypostatic union, Redemption, and grace; it denies as well the VISIBILITY OF THE CHURCH. W. D. Davies, a Congregational minister, showed that to connect Jesus with a sectarian apocalyptic movement is "to sever [Him] from the main stream of Judaism." He pointed out, moreover, that the Synoptic Gospels do not support this viewpoint because (1) Jesus' insistence on a strict moral code is too emphatic to pass for an interim ethic; (2) His apocalyptic imagery is borrowed from the OT, not from current apocalypses; and (3) to categorize Christ as a deluded visionary does violence to the Gospel portrayal of Him as "one having authority" (Mt 7.29; cf. 13.54).

Opposed to this futurist interpretation of the life of Jesus is the other extreme sometimes designated as the school of "realized eschatology." Its foremost spokesman in the English-speaking world was C. H. Dodd. Although he did not deny the existence of a future life with God, he saw a perfect fulfillment of the messianic hope in the earthly ministry of Christ. By imitating His obedience, His followers can make the kingdom "come" for themselves and attain its fruition. Dodd did not carry this position as far as did the disciples of A. RITSCHL, who equated the kingdom preached by Jesus with the development of man's religious sentiment.

Contrasting with both of these opposing viewpoints is that of the moderate eschatology held by the majority of Christian scholars. Blending realization with unrealization, this position sees Jesus as teaching that the kingdom of God would experience two levels of fulfillment: (1) a genuine but partial fulfillment through His Passion and Resurrection in the conquest of Satan, sin, and death shared sacramentally with His followers; and (2) a future level of perfect fulfillment at the PAROUSIA, when He will reappear in glory to judge mankind and to inaugurate the other-worldly, spiritual phase of the kingdom.

See Also: CHURCH, ARTICLES ON; HOPE OF SALVATION (IN THE BIBLE); MESSIANISM; PEOPLE OF GOD.

Bibliography: F. J. SCHIERSE, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. M. BUCHBERGER, 10 v. (Freiburg 1930–38) 3:1098–99. J. BONSIRVEN, The Theology of the New Testament, tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963) 140–152. W. D. DAVIES, Christian Origins and Judaism (Philadelphia 1962) ch. 2, 8. C. H. DODD, The Parables of the Kingdom (rev. ed. New York 1961). R. OTTO, The Kingdom of God and the Son of Man, tr. F. V. FILSON and B. LEE-WOOLF (rev. ed. London 1943). R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1963). A. SCHWEITZER, The Mystery of the Kingdom of God, tr. W. LOWRIE (New York 1950).

[M. K. HOPKINS]

ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON

The general articles in eschatology are: ESCHATOLO-GY (IN THE BIBLE); ESCHATOLOGY (IN THEOLOGY). Classically, eschatology was the science of the four last things: death, judgment, heaven, and hell. Individual articles on these topics include DEATH (IN THE BIBLE); DEATH (THEOL-OGY OF); DEATH, PREPARATION FOR; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); PURGA-TORY; DEAD, PRAYERS FOR THE; PAROUSIA; END OF THE WORLD; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; HEAVEN (IN THE BIBLE); HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); BEATIFIC VISION; HELL (IN THE BIBLE); HELL (THEOLOGY OF). Scripture scholarship of the late 19th and 20th centuries focused the question of eschatology on Jesus' preaching of the Kingdom; for the history of this line of thought and its conclusions, see ESCHATOLOGISM; KINGDOM OF GOD. More generally, the meaning of Christian eschatology has been broadened to include the fulfillment of human life and the world not only at death or at the end of history, but as it has been accomplished in Jesus Christ and as it affects the present. This perspective is reflected in such articles as HISTORY, THEOLOGY OF; CREATION; ECOLOGY; THEOLOGY OF HOPE.

[G. F. LANAVE]

ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE)

Etymologically, eschatology is the study of the "last things." The difficulty experienced in applying the term in biblical theology stems from the fact that the word "last" embodies a more precise concept in modern Western languages than in the categories and thought world of the Bible. "Last," according to Webster's Third New International Dictionary, "designates that which comes at the end of a series; it may imply that no more will follow." The variety of viewpoints within the Bible itself can be classified according to the manner in which this "last in the series" is envisaged.

General Considerations

Some of the ancient Biblical writers expected a decisive point in history that would end Israel's then-current inconclusive condition and give stable historical existence to the promises that it believed God had given it. Thus, "last" for these people meant the complex of events that would mark the end of one historical era and usher in a new one. Some modern scholars refuse to accord the name "eschatology" to this outlook. It is, however, the predominant view of the preexilic tradition and already contains within itself the fundamental principle that stands at the basis of all eschatology: that history is incomplete until the moment when God's plan exists fully in its human dimension.

Another Biblical viewpoint looks forward to a Day on which this whole present mode of historical existence will cease in favor of some other "age" in which God's rule will be uncontested and supreme. Such an event would necessarily have cosmic repercussions of a much greater extent than those envisaged in the historical eschatology of the first viewpoint, since an end of this age would involve an end of this world as it is now known. This second outlook is called "cosmic eschatology" and becomes more prominent in postexilic literature. When the cosmic element is strongly accentuated in a system that tends to stress the dualism between this age and the age to come and to calculate history in terms of periods with the conviction that the "end" is imminent, the result is what is known as "apocalyptic eschatology." This type of thinking about the last things characterized late prophetic writing and the intertestamental period. Since all three tendencies shared a common heritage, were composed of much the same elements, and were communicated to the same audience, it is misleading to categorize them too neatly, either chronologically or theologically, into separate compartments. They all witnessed to a unique factor in revealed religion: the conviction that this world of man's experience is destined in and through man for a goal that has been set for it by God and toward which God is directing it.

Biblical Thought Patterns. It has often been noted that modern Western thought categories, e.g., in regard to time and personality, do not coincide with those of the Biblical author [see TIME (IN THE BIBLE)]. Though these authors do not present a completely consistent outlook themselves, they do have in common certain characteristics that will be considered briefly before entering upon the main subject.

The most striking feature of this type of thought is the capacity to consider an individual person or thing as the embodiment of a more universal reality and vice versa. Thus, e.g., Israel is both a man and a people (see ISRAEL), and the servant of the Lord is both the people Israel and the personal distillation of Israel's vocation (see SUFFERING SERVANT, SONGS OF THE). Fundamentally, this "totality thinking" is based on an ontological insight into the nature of a concrete universal; and the predication of the total reality, wherever a partial realization of it is discovered, is a form of symbolic analogy. But this procedure is part of an undifferentiated thought process that cannot be expected to conform to the modern more reflective norms of accuracy. In the context of eschatology, there is the interesting example of the term DAY OF THE LORD. This was continually expected to be a definitive event; yet in spite of the fact that many of the aspects of the Day had not been realized, the term was used post eventum of the fall of Jerusalem (Lam 1.21; 2.21; Ez 34.12, etc.) while it continued to be predicated as future (Ezekiel ch. 38-39; Jl 2.28-32; etc.).

This same type of thinking can be said to characterize the Israelite views of time. Not only can such words as day, hour, etc., be used with a meaning that is not strictly chronological as is the case in any language, but the very terms in Hebrew for beginning, end, eternity, the end of days, etc., have a relative content that reflects a less objective reference to the world as a norm according to which they are to be judged [see WORLD (IN THE BIBLE)]. It might be observed in relation to this view of time that it is not completely foreign to modern philosophical reflections on time that speak of time as "psychic" or "cosmic" and classify the various depths of time.

Method of Treatment. Modern studies of eschatology usually divide their subject matter into universal or social eschatology and individual eschatology. In the former, they treat of ''the last things'' as they apply to man and his world in general; in the latter, they consider the end of each individual human life in this world. For a more complete treatment of individual eschatology, see DEATH (IN THE BIBLE); JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THE BIBLE); AFTERLIFE; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD.

This study traces the historical development of the Biblical concept of eschatology as it acquired greater precision and consistency until it was concentrated in the person and activity of Jesus Christ. For the OT period it follows the standard historical divisions of: preprophetic origins; prophetic teaching in the early, preexilic, and postexilic periods; and the later writings. For the intertestamental period note is made simply of the tendencies and vocabulary that are necessary to understand the NT. For the NT period consideration is given to: the teaching of Jesus; the various accents given to this teaching in the Gospel traditions; Pauline eschatology; and other NT teaching.

In the Old Testament

It seems as though Israel's irrepressible expectation of a future completely ruled by God flows from a consciousness of its own election. This is reflected in Israel's earliest literature.

Preprophetic Origins. The two groups of oracles that are recorded in Genesis ch. 49 (Jacob's Oracles) and Numbers ch. 23-24 (the Oracles of BALAAM) date, in their present form, from the period of the early monarchy and reflect the popular conviction that the promises made to the people by God were then being fulfilled in David and his descendants. The editors who included the poems in the Pentateuch prefaced them by the statement that what is contained therein is to take place "at the end of days." This expression, which is literally "at the rear of days," may reflect a later judgment, that the glories described have yet to be realized. The term is characteristic of later prophetic usage (cf. Is 2.2; Ez 38.16); yet most often it can mean hardly more than "in times to come" (cf. Dt 4.30; 31.39). An earlier poem (Judges ch. 5), from the 11th or 12th century B.C., is a victory song celebrating the might of Yahweh and making reference to "the just deeds of Yahweh'' (Jgs 5.11). Although the term implies some act of judgment on behalf of Israel, such an act could be described as "just" only in the context of a covenant relation: a saving act of God is in keeping with the promises made by Him to the people He had chosen (cf. 1 Sm 12.7; Mi 6.5).

The YAHWIST traced the source of this election to God's call of Abraham (Gn 12.1–3) and consistently linked the promise of the land to this mysterious destiny to be a "blessing" in his progeny for "all the tribes of the earth" (Gn 15.5, 18; 26.3; 28.13). These two factors of land and blessing formed the basis of the Israelites' consciousness of election and provided the foundation for their expectancy of some definitive act of God. In the words of J. Lindblom: "The historical eschatology originates in the belief in the election of Israel and is unique for the Israelite religion" [cited by T. Vriezen, Vetus Testamentum Supplement 1 (1953) 220, n.1].

Early Prophetic Teaching. Amos, the first prophet whose message has been preserved in writing (see AMOS, BOOK OF), built his indictment of the chosen people precisely on the fact of their election (cf. Am 3.2 with Gn 12.1–3). After Amos was convinced that there was no "turning back" the doom that threatened not only Israel's enemies but Israel itself (cf. ch. 7-8 with ch. 1-2), he took up the popular expectation of the Day of the Lord and used it to convince his people that they would find themselves among the objects of God's wrath on that Day of Judgment (Am 5.18-20). Perhaps the impact of his discovery led Amos to insist that the decisive event that was to bring about a new historical era would be primarily one of punishment and destruction. Yet even here, the awareness of God's fidelity to his promises forced Amos to hold out a hope that "it may be" that a remnant would be rescued (5.4-6, 14-15; and especially 9.11-15, if it is original).

Israel's ingratitude and dullness in the presence of God's loving choice formed the basis for Hosea's conviction of an imminent day of punishment and restoration (see HOSEA, BOOK OF). His message to the Northern Kingdom contains a series of threats of unmatched vehemence (Hos 5.14; 10.14–15; 13.7–8; etc.). Yet he sensed the ambiguity of the situation in which a just and angered God cannot act "reasonably" because of His love (11.8-9), and thus Hosea's eschatology, like that of Amos, has two aspects. Descriptions of the exact historical consequences of the coming destruction (3.4; 9.4) are found side by side with scathing denunciations of a more general sort (4.4-6; 13.12), and both are balanced against tender promises of restoration (14.2-9) and look to a renewal of the ideal age of the desert wandering and the COVENANT (2.16), as well as to a redundance of this peace into the realm of nature itself (2.23-25). An era is envisaged in which God's spontaneous choice of Israel will be ratified (14.5 - 9).

Preexilic Prophets. ISAIAH, who saw the fall of the Northern Kingdom, blended in his outlook a realistic, historical actuality with a transcendent sense of divine activity (see ISAIAH, BOOK OF). He saw this activity as part of a plan (see especially Is 5.19; 6.9–10; 14.24–27) that necessarily included other nations (since they had to act in regard to Israel), who also would be punished for the same crimes that were bringing about Israel's downfall (2.5-22). This universal outlook was adumbrated by Amos (ch. 2-3), but it became an explicit factor in Isaiah's conviction that, whereas God's judgment on Samaria would be repeated on Jerusalem (Is 28.1-29.6), the whole world stood condemned (14.26-27) and would be restored only through the reinstatement of Jerusalem itself (2.1-4). Isaiah's teaching regarding both aspects of the coming judgment is well typified in the large place he gave to the concept of the Remnant of Israel. This term contained both a threat that some catastrophe was imminent and the assurance that God would be faithful to His promises (1.9). Even granting the antiquity of Gn 49.1-12 and Am 9.11-15, one must still see in Isaiah's connection between the house of David and the light that would shine out of the coming darkness a new note in the prophetic description of God's definitive act in history (Isaiah ch. 7, 9, 11). This conviction was shared by Isaiah's contemporary Micah (Mi 5.1-3) and became part of the prophetic teaching in succeeding generations.

The work of Zephaniah is dependent on the writings of Isaiah and Amos (see ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF); and although there is no new theological contribution in his book, there is in ch. 1 a marked intensity both in the universalism regarding the impending judgment and in Israel's oldest eschatological expectations of a war in which Yahweh would destroy His enemies. In Zephaniah this became the disaster that was about to befall Jerusalem (Zep 1.2–18). Both this intensity and the imagery it evokes became part of later eschatological writing.

JEREMIAH could match the vivid imagery of Zephaniah (see JEREMIAH, BOOK OF), and he may indeed have drawn upon the same experience or prophetic tradition in his description of the foe from the north (Jer 4.5-31). He too looked to some definitive event that by then was assumed to include the chastisement of unfaithful Judah. The rise of Babylonian power gave to the generic threats of destruction with which the work abounds a sense of imminence and historical realism. One may, in fact, speak of a sort of "realized eschatology" in regard to Jeremiah, who applied all the previous prophetic teaching of a decisive event of divine judgment in history to the actual invasion by NEBUCHADNEZZAR (11.15-17; 15.1-4; 34.8–22; 37.3–10; etc.). It is difficult to establish exactly what Jeremiah thought would happen after the era of judgment, though there is no doubt that he expected that the reprieve promised to those already deported (3.12; 24.5-7) would be extended to the victims of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem (32.1-14). Like Isaiah, he built the continuity of the people on an ideal Davidic king (23.1–13, of which at least the core is original); but his own insight consisted in seeing that the reestablishment of Israel would mean the renewal of the covenant in a way that would truly change the hearts of men (31.31-34).

Exilic and Postexilic Prophets. Important developments in Israelite eschatology took place during the Babylonian Exile and in the early postexilic period, as can be seen in the writings of Ezekiel [see EZEKIEL, BOOK OF] and the anonymous author of Isaiah ch. 40–55, who is known as Deutero–Isaiah.

Ezekiel. Like Jeremiah, Ezekiel prophesied and witnessed the fall of Jerusalem and saw in it the decisive act of condemnation. Yet one can trace in those writings of Ezekiel that were composed in exile a greater sense of imminence, not only in regard to the traditionally expected judgment on other nations (ch. 25-32), but also in regard to the restoration of Israel that had formed part of the eschatological drama since the teaching of Amos. There is mention of a Davidic "shepherd" who would lead the restored people (Ez 34.17-24; 37.24-25) and the insistence that restoration would mean an interior conversion (36.26-27; see also 11.19-20). The accent, however, was placed more on the Temple as the center of the people's life (ch. 40-46), from which there would flow a lifegiving stream to all the world (47.1-12). Israel would thus become the ruler of a chastened world (36.1-8, 36-38), and the promise made to the fathers would at last become a reality (47.13-23).

Though the dramatic vision of the resurrection of the dry bones (ch. 37) ought not to be understood in an individual sense, still the problem of individual responsibility was posed by Ezekiel (18.1–32) at about the same time as by Jeremiah (Jer 31.29), and the problem was treated more completely by Ezekiel. There was not yet any direct eschatological application of this individualistic view, though the experience of some men of prayer in Israel had already prepared the way for a different notion of the state of God's friends in the afterlife [Ps 15(16).10; 72(73).25–26]; and the Book of JOB, written in the experience of the exile, challenged the accepted view of RET-RIBUTION.

Deutero-Isaiah. This inspired prophet, who wrote at the end of the Exile, seems to have been convinced that the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile constituted the decisive act of judgment foreseen by Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Just as Babylon's growing ascendancy had been the sign of God's impending wrath, so the rise to power of Cyrus and his Persian armies gave historical content to the predictions of a consolation soon to follow.

Deutero-Isaiah was the first to appeal, not only to a plan of God, but also to a notion of time that saw it as having a beginning and an end (Is 41.22–23, 26; 43.13;

46.9; etc.). This plan included the salvation of all the nations and would be brought about by the servant of the Lord, whose mission it was to be a light to the Gentiles and proclaim God's justice to the ends of the earth and whose mysterious suffering and exaltation would bring peace to the many. Jeremiah had seen the land reverting to a state of primeval chaos (Jer 4.23) and had considered that the covenant relation had been severed (31.31-32). Deutero-Isaiah saw the era of restoration as a new creation of both the world and the people (Is 41.17–20; 42.5; 43.1; 45.8; etc.). A restoration of the world was first adumbrated in Hos 2.23 and Is 11.6-9, while the concept of God creating His people by the covenant seems already implied in the use of qānâ in Ex 15.16; Dt 32.6. Yet in Deutero-Isaiah there seems to be a concretization of concepts that were previously left undetermined. What, then, is the meaning of this insistence on a cosmic participation in the restoration of the people? It seems that one must apply here the notion of totality thinking mentioned previously, as well as the fact of what can, perhaps, be best termed "a sliding time scale." The cosmic imagery, whether invoked in terms of destruction or renewal, contains within itself the notion that the definitive events in history are effected by a causality that transcends the world of man's control. Yet this thinking clings fast to the ancient conviction that man's inner life has, for good or ill, cosmic repercussions (cf. Gn 3.8-19). It may be granted that Deutero-Isaiah was here writing poetry and using a traditional imagery repeated for its power to evoke an atmosphere rather than propound a dogma; yet it would be false to empty the imagery of all content. Something transcendent is being mediated and certain historical events deserve to be called by its name. Only time can decide whether or not the event that is imminent or even present is in fact the definitive act of God. Not all of what Amos or Hosea or Zephaniah had foretold came to pass; and though the historical nucleus of what Isaiah and Jeremiah expected had in fact transpired, what was described by them as universal (Is 2.2-5) and indeed cosmic (Jer 4.23-26) had not been realized. As men became progressively convinced of the human unattainability of restoration, they looked forward to an event more transcendent than ever.

The sense of actuality that Deutero-Isaiah had initiated primarily in regard to the restoration of Israel was continued and applied more specifically to the expected punishment of the nations. Oracles against the nations had been part of prophetic eschatological preachings since Amos. Yet as the conviction grew that Israel had undergone its judgment and was about to be reinstated, the expectation of a more widespread catastrophe became vivid. Whereas in Isaiah ch. 13 (postexilic) the notion of the holy war and the Day of the Lord is applied to Babylon and in Abdia the same concept is applied to Edom (Abd 15), in both of these writings the aid of cosmic imagery is enlisted, most probably for the reasons mentioned above.

Postexilic Writings. After the Exile, prophecy continued, both in its own right and in the editing and glossing of the older prophetic writings. The disappointment that accompanied the return from Exile forced men to reconsider the full implication of what these older books had taught. Babylon had indeed fallen, and the people had indeed returned to Jerusalem. But there was no miraculous exodus, no universal destruction of the sinful nations who were Israel's enemies, and no worldwide recognition of the might of Yahweh with pilgrimages to a glorious Jerusalem.

Early Postexilic Writers. Haggai and Zechariah [see HAGGAI, BOOK OF; ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF] continued to expect the rebuilding of Jerusalem and to look for an anointed ruler (Hg 2.20–23; Zec 6.9–14). Besides, Zechariah introduced a type of symbolism in ch. 1–2 that was later taken up by Daniel and became standard in apocalyptic writing. Joel continued to apply the term "Day of the Lord" to judgments against the chosen people (ch. 1–2), while he expected the spiritual renewal spoken of by Jeremiah and Ezekiel and the great judgment of the nations (ch. 3–4). Both of these events were to reveal their transcendent nature by the effects they would have on the cosmos.

Later Postexilic Writers. Trito-Isaiah (the anonymous author of Isaiah ch. 56–66) took these concepts to their limit by "objectifying" their cosmic elements and describing a new heaven and a new earth (Isaiah ch.65–66). Deutero-Zechariah (the anonymous author of Zechariah ch. 9–14) developed the mythical elements in Ezekiel ch. 38–39 and applied them to his contemporaries' experience (Za 14.1–21). The collection of oracles known as Malachi [see MALACHI, BOOK OF] included more teaching regarding the judgment soon to overtake the nations surrounding Jerusalem, and it inaugurated the notion (Mal 3.23) that the great and terrible Day of the Lord would be preceded by the return of Elijah [see ELIJAH (SECOND COMING OF)].

The postexilic author of Isaiah ch. 24–27 (the socalled Apocalypse of Isaiah) elevated "Babylon" and "Moab" to the status of symbols, much as Ezekiel and Zechariah had done for Jeremiah's "foe from the north," and again the cosmic imagery is in evidence.

Within a long poetic piece that probably derives from the liturgy (Isaiah ch. 26), there occurs what is perhaps the first statement regarding the resurrection of the just in an eschatological context (Is 26.19). As the tension of waiting increased, the problem of the future of those who died without seeing the consolation of Israel finally forced its way into men's consciousness; and the solution, perhaps already stated by the author of Job (Jb 19.25) in the context of personal retribution, was adopted in this larger context.

Writers of the Late OT Period. This solution was repeated in the Book of DANIEL (Dn 12.1-3), with the addition that the incomplete retribution made to both just and unjust in this life, specifically in relation to the expectation of the "last things," would be made good by a resurrection of some of them from the dead. A different solution of this problem in an individual context, not immediately linked with the future of the nation, was adopted by some adherents of the Alexandrian Judaic tradition (such as the author of the Book of WISDOM) that made use of the Greek concept of an imperishable soul to extend the Hebrew notion of nepeš, so that the future of a man after death was differentiated according to the deeds he performed on the earth (Wis 3.1-9; 15.3; etc.). The individualizing tendency in the wisdom tradition seems to have applied terms previously restricted to the events of national history to the life of the individual as the Psalms had already done before them [note the "time of distress," the "day of wrath," etc., in Ps 19(20).2; 49(50).15; Jb 15.23; 21.30; Prv 11.4; Wis 3.18; Sir 11.26; etc.]. This outlook provided the basis for a more developed individual eschatology in the intertestamental period.

In the Book of Daniel there is also a certain stable pattern into which traditional elements of prophetic eschatology were fitted in such a way that a new literary genre was created, which developed and became standardized as the normative presentation of this teaching during the two centuries before Christ. Cosmic imagery and a concept of plan were now combined with a greater emphasis on the transcendent nature of the event that would be definitive for all history. Thus, even the vocation of Israel was now concentrated not in a king or a servant, but in a SON OF MAN whose exaltation would have consequences for "all peoples, nations, and tongues" (Dn 7.14). The result was an imaginative literature fraught with the conviction, based on careful calculation, that "the end is near." Daniel, one of the earliest APOCA-LYPTIC writings, already contained the complex imagery and periodic divisions of history. These were not so much the product of a mind taking refuge in fantasy as an effort of faith to adhere to the promises of God and to render them intelligible and actual to an Israel already painfully aware of its true historical dimensions but not less aware of its special vocation within the universalist demands of God's covenant and of the ultimate truth of its confidence in God's justice.

In the Intertestamental Period

Though prophecy had disappeared in the last centuries of pre-Christian Jewish history (1 Mc 4.46), people still awaited the fulfillment of what Deutero-Isaiah had promised. They looked forward to a glorious Jerusalem, the source of salvation for those nations that were left after God's terrible judgment had punished them for their wickedness, especially for their oppression of the Jews. It has been frequently remarked that what Pharisaic zeal effected in relation to the Law, codifying, standardizing, and materializing it, apocalypticism did for prophecy.

The influence of Persian thought has often been assumed for the purpose of explaining a certain dualism that now characterized eschatological thinking. No doubt there was a real and objective content to the distinction between "this age" and "the age to come" that capitalized on the "newness" of the era of restoration as described by the prophets, and this type of objective thinking was apparently injected into the Jewish view of the cosmos by some outside influence. Yet it should be observed that this factor and others that were manifestly dependent for their form on Persian theories (developed angelology, pronounced forensic elements in the judgment, etc.) were well integrated into the Jewish thought system.

Messianic Expectations. The decisive event was now most frequently called "the end," and it was thought of as preceded by a series of woes and calamities (Dn 12.1; Assumption of Moses 10.5; Enoch 80.4-5; Sibylline Oracles 3.806). According to some writings, the final judgment would be presided over by a MESSIAH, and the wars and cosmic convulsions in which he would assert the kingdom of God were called the "birthpangs" of the Messiah (cf. Hos 13.13; Is 26.16–19). Sometimes his efforts would be directed specifically against a figure whose traits were derived from the prophetic development of Gog in Ezekiel ch. 38-39 (see also Dn 7.8-14) and perhaps also from Ahriman (Angra Mainyu), the opponent of Ahura Mazda in the Zoroastrian system [see AHURA MAZDA (OHRMAZD) AND AHRIMAN], as in the Testament of Issachar 6.1; Enoch 13.1-58; Sibylline Oracles 3.63-65; IQM 1.1-17 (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). The time of this end was calculated on the basis of a reinterpretation of the prophetic writings (cf. Jer 25.11; 29.10 with Dn 9.2, 24-27), which in turn needed to be reinterpreted when the Day failed to appear (cf. Daniel ch. 7 with 4 Esdras 12.11–14; Dn 12.11–13). The restoration of Israel was most often described in terms of a kingdom, though notions about the nature and function of the king differed considerably. In some systems he was easily recognizable as the Davidic ruler described by the prophets, and he now bore the technical designation Messiah, while in still other systems, God Himself was the king without any intermediary. The writings that stressed the other-worldly aspect of the coming new age tended to clothe this figure with heavenly power and give to him a universal dominion. These two figures, the Messiah and the Son of Man, tended to blend into one; and according to some theories, the messianic kingdom on this earth would be succeeded by another that would mark the final entrance of "the end" and initiate the age in which God with or without the Messiah would rule forever. Along with this concept of a heavenly man, mention is made of a heavenly Jerusalem, heavenly Sion, etc., which apparently reflected the notion that present earthly realities were only images of their true types, which in the final age would themselves assume human dimensions (Enoch 10.16-19; Psalms of Solomon 17.25; 2 Baruch 4.2-6; 4 Esdras 10.26). This may be but one more aspect of the very realistic, even material expectation of a new heaven and a new earth (Is ch. 66) in which the reign of Satan over the cosmos would be broken and this world would be destroyed.

Retribution in the Hereafter. The awareness of individual eschatology that can already be found in some of the late prophetic and wisdom literatures now received a great deal more attention, though little systematization. The fundamental experiences that, as was shown, forced the problem of individual immortality to consciousness were: the experience of union with God expressed by the Psalmists [e.g., Ps 72(73).25], the experience of the inconclusive nature of retribution in this life (e.g., in Daniel and Job), and the desire that all should share in the realization of the promises (Is 26.19). These, combined with an extra-Biblical anthropology in the late wisdom literature, provided the basis for some integration of the speculations proposed during the period. Again, thinking centered on the concept of judgment, and thus it maintained an intimate link with the events connected with the coming of the kingdom. According to David S. Russell, (357-366), there were four characteristics that marked the change of climate effected during this period. First, the dead were conceived as having individual and conscious existence. Second, they were distinguished on the basis of moral criteria, and the state in which they found themselves as a result of their moral activity in this life was considered by most as irrevocable (Enoch 62.2; 2 Baruch 85.12; Pirke Avoth 4.16; Sifra Leviticus 85; Enoch 71.14–16). Third, in keeping with the changed views regarding the souls of the dead, SHEOL was now regarded as an intermediate state in which men waited for the final judgment. According to most of these writers, the final judgment could not take place until the resurrection, which was usually conceived of as being universal in its proportions but of differing results depending on a man's moral status. According to the systems that envisaged a messianic interregnum, there were sometimes two judgments and even two resurrections, first of some of the just and then of all the dead. Other works, notably the Book of Jubilees (23.31), seem to have dispensed with the notion of resurrection and consequently of a period of waiting. Sheol then became the place of torment for the wicked (Jubilees 7.29; 22.22). The fourth characteristic of these writings followed from the fact of a moral distinction in the hereafter: Sheol was now depicted as having compartments corresponding to the moral and spiritual condition of the souls that went there. The description of these different parts of Sheol drew upon and embellished prophetic imagery and became the source of Christian apocryphal writings and of centuries of subsequent Christian speculation.

In the New Testament

The eschatological concepts of the NT, whether traditional or newly forged, are all dominated by and center on the fact of Christ. The NT asserts unequivocally that the definitive act of judgment, both salvation and condemnation, has been realized in the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus, and yet it looks forward to a Day when this reality will be made fully manifest in each individual and in the whole cosmos. The synthesis of this twofold assertion into some coherent statement that respects the other aspects of revelation is one of the most difficult and, at the same time, most pressing problems of modern Biblical theology.

Confronted with passages that seem alternately to assert and deny the definitive nature of the Christ fact, its present all-sufficiency and its need for future fulfillment, some scholars have been tempted to achieve some sort of consistency by assigning chronological priority to one series and explaining the other series as later additions to the original teaching of Jesus. For the liberals of the 19th century, Jesus was an ethical teacher of unique stature whose subsequent death was given an eschatological interpretation by His disciples. According to Albert Schweitzer and others, Jesus was a "consistent eschatologist," a successor to the apocalyptic theorists, who believed Himself to be the Son of Man and the inaugurator of God's reign on earth. When even His death failed to bring this about, His disciples reinterpreted His message. Charles Dodd, on the other hand, considers that the eschatological imagery is Jesus' own, and He intended by it to assert that its real meaning was being fulfilled in Himself. His followers, who were expecting a more mundane and perhaps a more dramatic manifestation of the Day of the Lord, were led to the conclusion that it would take place in the immediate future; and then, as time wore on, they either continued in their expectations or finally grasped the original meaning of Jesus' message. Rudolf Bultmann, too, maintains that the eschatological imagery originated with Jesus and was continued by His disciples. But Bultmann is convinced that such imagery was the only conceptual equipment available to Jesus at that time through which God's transcendent message could be understood and mediated. Consequently, it is the role of the interpreter today to free this message of its ancient and mythical garb in order to allow it to confront man and elicit from him faith and submission (see DEMYTHOLOGIZ-ING). The analyses of Dodd and Bultmann have shed much light on the nature of many passages in the Gospels and have shown how necessary it is to account for the creative activity of the early community and of the Evangelists themselves in any understanding of the message they have passed on. But there is a danger that the desire to achieve a unified view of the Gospel revelation may result in an oversimplification. In order to respect the nature of the Gospel material, one must recognize that in the original teaching of Jesus there is both a realized and a futurist eschatology and that this tension is preserved by the NT authors who developed their own theologies with the aid of concepts traditional in their culture.

Teaching of Jesus. The general tenor of John the Baptist's preaching centered on the theme of restoration and consolation that Deutero-Isaiah had proclaimed on the eve of the return from Babylon and the notion of an impending messianic judgment spoken of in the Book of Malachi (Mk 1.1–8; Mt 3.1–12; Lk 3.1–8; Jn 1.19–34). St. Mark gives the gist of Jesus' early preaching as "The kingdom of God has come near" (Mk 1.15; see also Lk 4.18; 7.22; Mt 4.23). This theme was calculated to evoke in the minds of Jesus' hearers the notion of an imminent fulfillment of the prophetic expectations as they were preserved in the thought of His day.

Imminence of the Kingdom. Early in His public life Jesus pointed to His power over demons as proof of the presence of the kingdom (Lk 11.20; Mt 12.28; see also Mk 3.27). He declared those blessed who beheld Him (Mt 13.16; Lk 10.23); He applied the words of Deutero-Isaiah to Himself (Mt 11.2-6; Lk 7.18-23); and He claimed that one greater than Solomon stood before His audience (Mt 12.41-42; Lk 11.31-32). At His entry into Jerusalem, He consciously acted out the fulfillment of Zec 9.9, a passage that was considered messianic by the rabbis; and He appealed to the eschatological universalism of Is 56.7 as well as to Jer 7.11 to establish His right to cleanse the Temple (Mk 11.15 and parallels; see, however, Jn 2.13-17). When Jesus assumed for Himself the prerogative of reinterpreting the Law (e.g., Mt 5.22), He was aware that such a function was expected of the Messiah (Targum Jonathan on Is 12.3; 1QpHab 10.13; CD 1.11; etc.); and when He likened the kingdom of God to His own activity of sowing the word (Mk 4.1-9 and parallels), foreseeing a slow, mysterious growth of that kingdom (Mk 4.30–32), He was undoubtedly claiming to make it present here and now (see also Lk 17.21).

The most predominant feature of Our Lord's preaching, however, seems to have been His stress on the imminent coming of the kingdom of God. Besides being the theme of His early preaching, there are parables from different times of Jesus' life that echo this preoccupation. Among the more outstanding there are: the parable of the Two Men on the Way to Court (Mt 5.25-26; Lk 12.57-59), the Great Feast (Mt 22.1-13; Lk 14.16-24), the Ten Virgins (Mt 25.1-12), and the Vineyard (Mk 12.1-12 and parallels). The parable of the Vineyard was probably propounded during Jesus' last days in Jerusalem. He looked forward to a crucial day in the near future when the "Bridegroom" would be taken away from the Disciples (Mk 2.18-20 and parallels). In Mk 9.1 there is recorded a promise of Jesus to His hearers that some of them would see the kingdom of God come in power, and this is most probably an allusion to His forthcoming Passion and Resurrection. Such is undoubtedly the meaning of the symbolic parable that Jesus enacted at the supper the "night he was betrayed." The meal both initiated and foreshadowed the messianic banquet (Lk 22.16), while drawing its meaning from the Passion and Resurrection, which it symbolized. This theme had already sounded in Our Lord's instruction of His disciples. His predictions of imminent suffering for the Son of Man are described in terms of the vocation of the Servant whose sacrifice of Himself as a sin offering (Is 53.10) brings about His own exaltation and the fulfillment of Israel's mission to proclaim God's justice to the ends of the earth (Mk 10.45; see also the "Passion predictions" in Mk 8.31; 9.31; 10.32-34; and parallels). At His trial Jesus asserted that men would soon see this exaltation of the Son of Man as Daniel had described Him (Mk 14.62; see also the interpretations in Mt 26.64; Lk 22.69).

Intervening Period. In addition to some other more enigmatic passages that stress the imminence of the kingdom (e.g., Mt 10.23), there is a whole series of passages that reflect Jesus' awareness that there would be a period of time between His death and the final realization of some aspects of the traditional prophetic and apocalyptic teaching. He called about Him a group of disciples, gave them instructions, taught them to pray for the coming of the kingdom (Mt 6.1), and gave them a commission to proclaim His message and suffer for adherence to Him. Jesus endorsed the prevailing view of a general resurrection (Mt 12.41; see also Lk 14.14) and described some of its features (Mk 12.18-27 and parallels). He often spoke of a day of judgment (Mt 10.15; 11.22, 24; etc.) and described the punishments of the wicked in traditional terms (Mt 5.29; Mk 9.45-47; etc.), while also teaching a judgment that follows immediately after death (Lk 16.19–31; see also 12.20). In all of the statements there is a conformity to the common vocabulary of the time; yet there is also a difference. For not only does Jesus assign to Himself the messianic role of judge (Mt 7.22; Lk 6.26; Mt 25.31–46); but more important, as the passages cited imply, a man's future judgment will depend on his present attitude to Jesus. This is stated explicitly in Mk 8.38 (see also parallels and Lk 17.24–26), and it becomes a standard theme in John (Jn 12.48; 5.24; 3.18–21). Moral rectitude is, of course, necessary for entrance into the kingdom (Mt 5.20); yet the newness of Jesus' eschatological preaching lies precisely in His insistence that the future is determined already in the stand one takes now in regard to Him.

It is practically certain that Jesus predicted the fall of Jerusalem (Lk 19.42–44), and it is very probable that the same event forms the frame of reference for the famous "eschatological discourse" found in Mark ch. 13 and parallels. The interpretation of this passage is still debated, but it seems to be a good example of the totality thinking and "sliding time scale" mentioned previously. The judgment against Jerusalem is described in terms of the Day of the Lord as the Prophets had often done before, and in this same tradition all the imagery reserved for the definitive event of history is applied to this partial realization of it. Thus St. Matthew already transposes the discourse to the "PAROUSIA and the consummation of the age" (Mt 24.3).

Theology of the Early Church. In one of the speeches of Peter recorded in Acts, Joel's description of the Day of the Lord (Jl 2.28–32) is applied to the coming of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2.14–36). Peter stated also that Jesus is the source of this gift of the Spirit (Acts 2.33), that He is the future judge of the living and the dead (Acts 10.42; see also 17.31), and that He will be sent from heaven at the time of the restoration of the universe (Acts 3.19–21, a difficult passage).

The tradition first represented in St. Mark's Gospel combines the predictions of the Passion with a description of the vocation of the disciples (Mk 8.34–37; 9.35; 10.39) and continues this assimilation by describing the future suffering of the disciples (13.9–13) in terms reminiscent of the Passion narrative (14.53–65; 15.4–5, 15; etc.). This mystery of the eschatological sufferings of the Son of Man that are continued in the Church is touched on also by St. Paul (2 Cor 4.10; Col 1.24; see also Jn 15.20–21). St. Matthew has a tendency to transpose the sense of imminence in Our Lord's preaching to the expectation of the Parousia (only he among the Evangelists uses the term). Moreover, he employs many words common to the intertestamental apocalyptic tradition (''regeneration," Mt 19.28; "age to come," 12.32; see also 13.40, 49). St. Luke capitalizes on some features of Jesus' teaching to insist that the period between the Passion and the consummation of all things is part of God's eschatological plan: it is the era of the Spirit and the Church (cf. Mk 4.17 with Lk 8.13, and cf. Mk 9.1 with Lk 9.27). This same tendency can be seen in the characteristic way Luke records phrases that are in an eschatological context (cf., e.g., Lk 21.20 with Mk 13.14).

St. John actualizes the theme of judgment, as has been seen (see also Jn 16.8-11), and likewise makes the possession of eternal life a present reality (Jn 6.47, 51; 17.20-21; etc.). While he foresees a future "last day" of resurrection (6.39-40, 44; 11.24), he also records Jesus as describing Himself as the resurrection and the life (11.25). John alone alludes to the coming sufferings of the disciples as the "birth pangs" of the Messiah (16.21), and he applies the term, it seems, both to the definitive hour of the Passion (cf. 19.28-30) and to the future vocation of the disciples. Even the coming of Christ, which John no doubt expected on the last day, is portrayed as an actual reality for the Christian who lives by Christian love (14.3, 19, 21; 16.16-22). Thus, it seems certain that as the actual time of the Parousia was postponed, Christians began to reflect on the full import of Christ's declarations regarding the presence of the kingdom in His own person and activity and to see this reality continued in the Church by the action of the Spirit.

Pauline Eschatology. This same process of penetration can be seen in the writings of St. Paul, who, though he brought to the problem a mind already enriched by the speculations of the rabbis, still required many years to achieve a synthesis.

Individual Eschatology. Paul's strong accent on individual eschatology can be seen in his first answer to the problem of those Christians who die without witnessing the Parousia. Those who die "through Jesus" are not only partakers of the "age to come" as the rabbis taught; they are now "with Jesus" (1 Thes 4.14; see also Phil 1.23). The same preoccupation can be seen in the discussion of the resurrection body in 1 Corinthians ch. 15. The doctrine regarding some kind of identity between the body "sown" and that "reaped" can also be found in 2 Baruch 49.3; 50.3-4; Sibylline Oracles 4.181; etc.; but the insistence on the unique causality of the risen Lord is at the core of what is peculiar to Christian eschatology. Alongside these early assurances regarding the future of those who "are asleep," i.e., dead, there is a complete scenario of the Day of the Lord that depends on the same tradition as the eschatological discourse in the Synoptics (cf. 1 Thes 5.2 with Mt 24.43) and shares with it the same sense of imminence. In this early period Paul already laid the foundations of his view that the reality of Christ's Resurrection, as imparted now to the believer, conferred on the latter's life an eschatological dimension. It is because "Jesus died and rose" that Christians will be brought together with Him (1 Thes 4.14), a togetherness shared also by those who are still "awake" (1 Thes 5.9–10). Indeed the power of His Resurrection is at work in those who share the fellowship of His sufferings (Phil 3.10–11), and this power will eventually enable Christ to subject the universe to Himself (Phil 3.20–21).

Future Day of Christ. These three factors of individual union with Christ, cosmic redemption, and actualized eschatology are already being synthesized around the reality of the risen Christ in the letters of the central period of Paul's life. There is still a future day of Christ (1 Cor 1.8; 5.5; 2 Cor 1.14; etc.), which will be a day of judgment (Rom 2.5, 16), a day on which Christ will be revealed (1 Cor 1.7). The events of that day are sketched in 1 Corinthians ch. 15, and in the same letter Paul speaks of the vision that awaits him when the "now" of this life gives way to the "then" of full maturity (1 Cor 13.12; see also 1 Jn 3.2–3). The power of the risen Christ is stressed again in 2 Cor 3.18 (see also 4.17–18), and there for the first time occurs the apocalyptic hope of a new creation applied to the individual believer (2 Cor 5.17). In the Epistle to the Romans (1.4) the Resurrection, by which Christ was constituted SON OF GOD, is linked to the same Spirit that Christians now possess as a pledge and are thereby already made sons of God. Because Christians possess the Spirit, they are attuned to the groaning of the whole cosmos as it longs to be free of the corruption imposed on it by the folly of man (8.18–24). And it is the presence of the same Spirit deep within Christians that will one day bring their share in the risen life of Christ into a full and definitive human existence, thus transforming the cosmos by conforming them to the image of the Risen One and fulfilling the eternal plan of God.

The same notions are brought to their final synthesis in the Epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians. The Church is the "fullness of Christ" (Eph 1.23; 3.19; 4.13), within which He is now at work subjecting the cosmos and all its demonic forces to Himself (Eph 3.10; 6.12; Col 1.15; 2.8–15; etc.). The beginning and the end of the divine plan, already spoken of by Deutero-Isaiah and sketched in Rom 8.28–30, is now seen to have existed in Christ "before the creation of the world" (Eph 1.4; see also 3.9; Col 1.15). The consummation of this plan means the summing up of all things in Christ (Eph 1.10) and the power that achieves this consummation in His Resurrection (Col 1.18; 2.12–13), which is communicated to the believer (Eph 2.6). The PASTORAL EPISTLES, apart from an individualizing tendency in their use of the term Day of Christ (2 Tm 1.12, 18; etc.) and a polemic against some overenthusiastic proponents of "realized eschatology" (2 Tm 2.17–18), add nothing to Paul's eschatological teaching. In the Pauline tradition, the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of the revelation, in these last days, of God in His Son (Heb 1.1), whose death and Resurrection is the definitive act of God on man's behalf (10.12). Christ has not only entered the heavenly realities described by the apocalyptic writers (9.23–24); He has given man access to these same realities (10.19–25). And though this act was performed "once for all" (9.26), He is coming again (9.28) on a Day that is drawing near (10.25).

Other New Testament Teaching. In most of the other letters in the NT there seems to be a less dynamic synthesis of the elements that compose the teaching on eschatology. The prevailing terminology is employed, but its full consequences are not investigated. The thought of the glory to come (1 Pt 5.4) or of the punishment reserved for the wicked (2 Pt 2.9–10; Jude 15) is used in a context of moral exhortation. In Jas 5.4 the traditional threat of fire on the "last days" is used for the sake of persuading the rich to part with some of their wealth, and in 2 Pt 3.5–13 the same imagery is employed in the unique NT reference to a total destruction of the cosmos by fire.

The Revelation of St. John makes no claim to be counted among the intertestamental writings that are called apocalypses, though it does share much of their imagery in its presentation of the Christian message. The cosmic dimensions of the Christ fact are presented more dramatically in the Revelation than in Paul (Rv 6.12; 16.18-21; 20.11; 21.1), but there is a like insistence on the fact that in Christ God's plan has been definitively realized (Rv 5.9-14; 12.10-12; etc.). Yet Christ is still to come (Rv 1.7; 22.6), and Christians are taught to pray for His coming (Rv 22.17, 20; etc.), even though the LORD'S SUPPER is already a coming of Jesus (3.20). The heavenly Jerusalem, already mentioned by Paul (Gal 4.26), assumes a human dimension (Rv 21.2, 9-27); and enlightened by the Lamb (Rv 8.16), it will be forever the meeting place of God and man. Other images, such as the two stages of the messianic kingdom (e.g., 20.1-15), are not as easy to understand, but they seem to refer to the realized and yet to be realized aspects of Christ's work. (See MILLENARIANISM.)

Conclusion. The "last things" in Biblical theology are not so much last as ultimate, and their chronological sequence does not correspond to their degree of definitiveness. When the world will have been transformed, then time, as it is now experienced, will cease. There will be such a point in history or rather metahistory, though there are no words that can describe it, and the Scriptures

The consciousness of being chosen forced Israel to look forward to a Day when God would give them peace and somehow make of them a blessing for the nations. Man's opposition to God's plan was first experienced in the hostility with which the nations resisted Israel's effort at self-realization; they would certainly be punished. Time and failure revealed that the opposition to God was deep within Israel itself, and this brought with it a conviction that God's justice demanded a judgment that would both condemn and save. As one calamity after another befell the chosen people, they became aware of participating in a universal rebellion whose cosmic echoes forced themselves in on man's world; yet they still clung to their vocation and their faith in the promises of God. When even the restoration of Jerusalem failed to end their inconclusive state of existence, men began to look beyond history for a solution. In their overwhelming sense of sin and inadequacy, they mistook God's transcendence for His absence, though they never ceased hoping to see His salvation. Thus, what had begun as a time-bound nationalistic hope now inclined to despair altogether of ever experiencing God's activity within human confines.

The Resurrection of Jesus Christ revealed to man that the transcendence of God's power is at work deep within man's proper dimension. God's judgment has condemned sin in the flesh of His Son, and, in reconciling the world to Himself, He has made good His promise to Abraham. The cosmic dimension of this definitive act can be seen even now in the glory of God on the face of Christ Jesus and can be felt even now in the water and wine and bread that allow man to touch Him. And yet man is saved in hope. The Last Thing is present; yet it does not fully exist. How is it that, though man no longer looks forward to a more decisive divine act, man still groans within himself as he awaits his redemption? Perhaps the best explanation that can be given is that given by Jesus Himself in His description of the tiny mustard seed that must fall into the ground and reveal its promise by dying and transforming all things into itself in the power of its own inner dynamism. What man awaits is not the Christ Himself, but His full manifestation within each man, within the Church, and within the cosmos. "For you have died, and your life now lies hidden with Christ in God. But when Christ, our life, appears, then you shall appear with him in glory" (Col 3.3-4).

Bibliography: General. H. GROSS and R. SCHNACKENBURG, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg, 1957–66) 3:1084–93. A. JEPSEN et al., Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart. 6 v. (3rd ed. Tübingen 1957–63) 2:655–672. P. AUVRAY, Catholicisme 4:410–414. Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 677–686. R. PAUTREL and D. MOL- LAT, "Jugement," Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928) 4:1321-94, with extensive bibliog. up to 1946. Old Testament. W. EICHRODT, Theology of the O.T., tr. J. A. BAKER (Philadelphia 1961). G. VON RAD, O.T. Theology, tr. D. STALKER (New York 1962). P. HEINISCH, Theology of the O.T., tr. W. G. HEIDT (Collegeville, Minn. 1950). T. C. VRIEZEN, "Prophecy and Eschatology," Vetus Testamentum, Supplement 1 (1953) 199-229. G. A. F. KNIGHT, "Eschatology in the O.T.," Scottish Journal of Theology 4 (1951) 355-362. S. O. MOWINCKEL, He That Cometh, tr. G. W. AN-DERSON (Nashville 1956). L. CERNÝ, The Day of Yahweh and Some Relevant Problems (Prague 1948). G. W. BUCHANAN, "Eschatology and the End of Days," Journal of Near Eastern Studies 20 (1961) 188-193. R. H. CHARLES, Eschatology (New York 1963). J. MOUROUX, The Mystery of Time, tr. J. DRURY (New York 1964). J. BARR, Biblical Words for Time (Naperville, Ill. 1962). O. CULL-MANN, Christ and Time, tr. F. V. FILSON (rev. ed. Philadelphia 1964). H. GRESSMAN, Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie (Göttingen 1905); Der Messias (Göttingen 1929). G. HÖLSCHER, Die Ursprünge der jüdischen Eschatologie (Giessen 1925). L. DÜRR, Ursprung und Ausbau der israelitisch-jüdischen Heilandserwartung (Berlin 1925). Intertestamental period. D. S. RUSSELL, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia 1964), with excellent bibliog. H. H. ROWLEY, The Relevance of Apocalyptic (3rd ed. New York 1964). B. VAWTER, "Apocalyptic: Its Relation to Prophecy," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 22 (1960) 33-46. T. F. GLASSON, Greek Influence in Jewish Eschatology (London 1961). J. BONSIRVEN, Palestinian Judaism in the Time of Jesus Christ, tr. W. WOLF (New York 1964). New Testament. J. BONSIRVEN, The Theology of the N.T., tr. S. F. L. TYE (Westminster, Md. 1963). M. MEINERTZ, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Die Heilige Schrift des N.T. 1; Bonn 1950). E. STAUFFER, N. T. Theology, tr. J. MARSH (London 1955). R. K. BULTMANN, Theology of the N.T., tr. K. GROBEL, 2 v. (New York 1951-55). A. FEUILLET, Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928) 6:1331-1419, with extensive bibliog. up to 1959. W. G. KÜMMEL, Promise and Fulfillment, tr. D. M. BARTON (Naperville, Ill. 1957). C. H. DODD, The Parables of the Kingdom (rev. ed. New York 1961); The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge, Eng. 1953; repr. 1960). J. A. T. ROBINSON, Jesus and His Coming (Nashville 1958). J. JEREMIAS, The Parables of Jesus, tr. S. H. HOOKE (rev. ed. New York 1963). A. WILDER, Eschatology in the Ethics of Jesus (rev. ed. New York 1950). H. CONZELMANN, The Theology of St. Luke, tr. G. BUSWELL (New York 1960). F. PRAT, The Theology of St. Paul, tr. J. L. STODDARD, 2 v. (London 1926-27; repr. Westminster, Md. 1958). R. K. BULTMANN, Presence of Eternity: History and Eschatology (New York 1957). R. SCHNACKENBURG, God's Rule and Kingdom, tr. J. MURRAY (New York 1963). B. J. LE FROIS, "Eschatological Interpretation of the Apocalypse," Catholic Biblical Quarterly 13 (1951) 17-20. R. KOCH, "L'Aspect eschatologique de l'Esprit du Seigneur d'après S. Paul," Studia Paulina 1 (1963) 131-141. H. P. OWEN, "Eschatology and Ethics in the N.T.," Scottish Journal of Theology 15 (1962) 369-382. W. G. KÜMMEL, "Futuristic and Realized Eschatology in the Earliest Stages of Christianity," Journal of Religion 43 (1963) 303-314.

[F. MARTIN]

ESCHATOLOGY (IN THEOLOGY)

The word eschatology is derived from the Greek (ἕσχατος, last) and means the science of the last things. Individual eschatology treats of death, particular judgment, purgatory, heaven, and hell; collective eschatology, of the end of the world, the Second Coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the general judgment. In the twentieth century the term eschatological began to be used in a wider sense, designating all those aspects of the Christian revelation that transcend this world. In this sense it no longer looks solely to those subjects usually dealt with in the treatise De novissimis but includes the Christian's basic attitude to life and his striving to reach fulfillment in the following of the gospel. The first part of this article will survey the ways Christians have historically understood the ultimate realities discussed in eschatology. The second part will present the position of eschatology in recent Catholic theology.

HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVES

One can break down the structure of Christian belief as put forward in the creeds into a present conviction that involves a hope of certain events in the future, justified by reference to past events. The future events are expressed as "From thence He shall come to judge the living and the dead," implying that Christ will come again and man's present moral dispositions will have an important bearing on his ultimate fate, and "I believe in . . . the resurrection of the body and life everlasting," thereby stating that the redeemed will enjoy a never-ending existence in which the body will be present so that man's future condition is not that of a disembodied spirit. The past events that justify this expectation are connected with the life, death, and RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

Early Church. The close connection between the paschal events and man's final destiny was very much to the fore in early Christianity. There were many treatises on the resurrection. Like St. Paul, Justin, Origen, Hippolytus, Tertullian, and Methodius linked Christ's Resurrection with that of the Christian at the last day. There was special reverence toward the martyrs because they most clearly imitated Christ by laying down their lives, and in the acts of the early martyrs, for instance in the acts of Polycarp, one sees the strong affirmation that those bodies that had been consumed by the flames and dismembered would rise in glory at the last day. The legend of the phoenix arising from the ashes and the peacock as the symbol of immortality are both found among early Church inscriptions. Thus one sees that the Christian belief was something more than the philosophical belief in the immortality of the soul. It was something transcending merely human experience and reason. It was a belief centered on the risen Christ.

The desire and yearning for the accomplishment of God's plan for the world in the definitive victory of Christ meant a recognition of the transience and impermanence of man's present state. It would be an oversimplification to read into this a firm belief and conviction that the END OF THE WORLD was imminent. In the early Church, certainly, a problem was posed by the delay in the Second Coming, but it was soon recognized that the Church had to make use of the period of waiting to convert the world and that in a sense the Christian has already begun to enjoy the future goods in the Resurrection of Christ and his access to God through GRACE. Only the heterodox movements such as MONTANISM looked to a speedy Second Coming that would purge the Church of all its carnal elements.

In those days there was a keen awareness of the social aspect of the future state of mankind, and Origen perhaps more than anyone looked forward to an APOCATASTASIS, the restoration of all things in Christ. He did not fall into the error of CHILIASM as he interpreted Revelation allegorically, but his insistence on the idea of fulfillment led him into supposing that in the end all would find happiness in Christ. Even the devil would be pardoned and hell would be no more. This view was to reappear from time to time in the history of theology. It was taken up by the disciples of Origen, was condemned at the synod of Constantinople in 543 (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 411), and was combated by the Fathers. The error is really based on a failure to see that God's glory can be manifested in those who freely reject the divine advances and suffer the consequences. See GLORY OF GOD (END OF CREATION). In the West it was St. Augustine who was most conscious of God's action in history, and in books 20 to 22 of The City of God one sees this applied to the last things. In his writings against the Pelagians St. Augustine focused attention on the individual's attitude toward death and the last things by his insistence on the gift of final PERSEVERANCE. The importance of the moment of death for the Christian and the need for God's help if man is to enter into eternal life are well brought out in the De dono perseverantiae.

Since the time of Nicaea I (325) Christian thinkers had been making use of pagan philosophy to develop the doctrine of man's ultimate end. St. Basil and especially St. Gregory of Nyssa in his Life of Moses had helped Christians to recognize that the last things are the conclusion of a long process, not only the progress of mankind through history, but the progress of the individual toward his end, which is God. St. Augustine shows that man cannot but seek his own happiness, that his life is a search for this, and that he can find rest only in God. This individual and collective eschatology have an ultimate harmony.

Middle Ages. Throughout the Middle Ages there continued the same general pattern that was found in the patristic period. Augustine's sense of history is seen in tion between C

Isidore of Seville, and his influence continued into the 12th century, being particularly marked in Hugh of Saint-Victor. The Manichaean view of matter as evil and consequent denial of the Resurrection were repeated in the heresies of the Catharists and Albigenses.

Monasticism. There has always been a strong witness to the values of life beyond the grave in monasticism. In the 4th century the flight to the desert reminded Christianity that, although it was no longer persecuted, it still had to keep its sights on superterrestrial values. It was a useful corrective of those who like Eusebius of Caesarea tended to identify the Church with the new political order. The prophetic ministry of the Old Testament was continued by the fathers of the desert, who demonstrated that the KINGDOM OF GOD was not yet fully realized. These ideas continued both in the East and in the West. In the East the Hesychastic movement and Gregory Palamas drew men's attention to otherworldly values even to the extent of being thought antihumanist. Their spirituality is founded on two events in the history of man's salvation: one in the past, the INCARNATION; one to come, the resurrection of the last day. This eschatological perspective is essential to their teaching. In Western monastic literature certain eschatological themes are developed. If hell is only alluded to indirectly, it is because this is the place to avoid and is not a subject for contemplation as heaven is. The great wealth of Biblical imagery was used to describe the New Jerusalem. These descriptions of heaven do not convey the idea of a place of disembodied spirits, since the Dionysian tradition had far less influence inside the monasteries than outside them. The mystery of the Transfiguration that patristic tradition had regarded as an anticipation of the Second Coming was a popular subject of devotion, and the feast was introduced into the West by the monks. The Canticle of Canticles was one of the most popular books of the Bible, and the monastic commentators always saw in it the relation between Christ and the individual soul, a tradition that was to continue in the 16th-century mystics. For every Christian the life of grace can be said to be the beginning of union with God, but in a special way the otium of the monastic life, the leisure for the things of God, exemption from the cares of the world, was seen as a foretaste of heaven.

Joachim of Fiore. But there was the danger that the monk would idealize the monastic life and deny any value at all to life in the world, and this is what happened with the Abbot Joachim of Fiore. It was not his sense of history nor his harmony between the two Testaments nor his symbolism that were novel but his pessimism concerning any life other than that of the monastery. This led him to overspiritualize the Christian message and look for an immediate Second Coming. The taking of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1187 was a severe blow to Christendom, and, as with previous political happenings of this nature, men's minds were once more recalled to a contemplation of the transitoriness of life. Cyprian, Hilary, Jerome, and Ambrose had spoken of the world growing older, and at the time of Gregory the Great the position of Rome seemed to forebode the end of the world. But these reactions at times of crisis were simply those of the Christian conscience recognizing the precariousness of human existence rather than a definite expectation of the end. In the 12th century there were many allusions to the coming of ANTICHRIST, but often these were nothing more than a literary convention adopted by moralists, reformers, and polemicists dramatizing the situation. Every public misfortune announces the final catastrophe and is another act in the great drama. This is the way the Christian has interpreted St. John's "Antichrist is come already" (cf. 1 Jn 4.3), as an awareness of the power of evil in the world. Any attempt to calculate the date of the end was discouraged, and popular superstition and extreme literalism were always a danger to the true doctrine. Joachim fell into this error of exact calculation and overingenious explanation and so was condemned (see JOACHIM OF FIORE).

Biblical Commentaries. The traditionally accepted interpretation of the Scriptures included the anagogic sense, which drew the attention of the reader to the significance of the sacred text in reference to Christ's Second Coming. Thus, for the word Jerusalem there would be called to mind the past history of the people of Israel (historic or literal sense); it would recall that the Church is the New Jerusalem (allegoric sense) and that the true city of God is yet to be fully realized (anagogic sense). This anagogy took two forms. For some passages there was the objective doctrinal exposition of the end of the world and the end of the individual, the consideration that man is intended for heaven, that he has yet to enter into his inheritance. But in many cases the anagogic sense was more practical and meant a consideration of the life of prayer and contemplation as a preparation for man's final end.

Scholastics. In his Book of Sentences, Peter Lombard considered the main purpose and direction of man's life at the beginning, in the first distinction of the first book. At the end of the work, in book four, distinctions 43 to 50, there is a specific treatment of the themes of resurrection, judgment, heaven, and hell. In the Summa theologiae, 1a2ae, 1–5 St. Thomas Aquinas harmonizes the Aristotelian idea of HAPPINESS as the end of man with the Christian teaching that man is created for God. He had reserved a place in the third part for a special treatment of eternal life as the end that one attains through the risen Christ. (Since he never completed the Summa theologiae, one has to rely on his commentary on Peter Lombard and on the Summa contra gentiles 4.79–97 to ascertain his views on these matters.)

Aquinas's division has the methodological advantage of separating the finis intentionis from the finis executionis. It gives a unifying principle to the consideration of Christian morality. The danger is that the truths of De novissimis may not be sufficiently integrated into Christian life but be considered simply as an appendage. Certain elements of medieval mysticism exaggerated the connection between the two. Thus those movements associated with the names of Meister Eckhart, the Beghards, and the Alumbrados (Illuminati) maintained that in this life one could experience the vision of God. As a reaction against a false mysticism Catholic theology tended to relegate De novissimis to an abstract consideration of man's state as it would be in the future.

East and West. The theological disputes in the Middle Ages between East and West concerned the last things only on minor points. There was general agreement on the basic doctrines of man's destiny, but the Council of Florence revealed misunderstanding about the reward or punishment that was given immediately after death, and the nature of the pains of purgatory.

Reformation. It was the doctrine of purgatory that was called into question by the reformers. This was connected as much with the basic Protestant idea of the nature of JUSTIFICATION and an inability to understand temporal punishment as with certain abuses in the practice of Masses for the dead and the use of indulgences.

Since the Reformation. The dispute about the NATU-RAL ORDER and SUPERNATURAL ORDER has meant discussion as to how far the BEATIFIC VISION can be said to be man's natural end. Against M. Baius the Church has maintained that the destiny to which man has been called completely transcends any exigencies of his nature. In the 17th and 18th centuries the quietist movement neglected the importance of human activity and minimized the role of Christian morality. Counter Reformation theology was characterized by stress on the last things of the individual; there was little about the PAROUSIA. The age was one of individualism, and it is not surprising that personal values were more thought of by theologians. In the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola, in the writings of St. Grignion de Montfort, in retreats and sermons, the last things are continually referred to; but it is almost exclusively from the point of view of the individual soul. Since the Protestant error had made Catholics insist on the authoritarian and fixed aspect of the Church, it was not surprising that there was little about the Church as still imperfect and on pilgrimage to its final realization at the Parousia.

In the 19th century there came a change. At first it was not seen how there could be any reconciliation between the Church's teaching and contemporary ideas of the progress of mankind. But soon it was appreciated that there is such a thing as a God-directed progress of man. The social encyclicals of Leo XIII and Pius XI testify to the belief that man can attain his fulfillment only in a society that has been transformed and Christianized.

In the 20th century the questions of progress continued to inform reflection upon eschatology. Other trends furthered the integration of eschatology with the whole of theology. Biblical studies came to a better appreciation of the idea of SALVATION HISTORY. Man can reach his fulfillment as an individual only within the framework of society, and society is moving toward the final completion of God's saving plan. Scientific theories of evolution allowed theologians to see a continuity between this world and the next. The notion of a sudden end of the world has been reexamined. Certainly it will be sudden in the sense that it will be due to divine intervention, but it is not necessary to hold to annihilation of the old and creation of something entirely new. The debates about nature and grace produced a better appreciation of the Augustinian concept of the world as being created and destined for a supernatural end.

Biblical studies also uncovered the Semitic idea of man as a totality, which meant less attention was paid to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and more to the resurrection of the body. Christ came to save the whole man and not just man's soul. The soul is the more important part since it governs and gives form to the rest, but one must not neglect the working out of the Redemption in man's body. Christ's healing of the sick was part of His mission as redeemer. The fall of man meant the loss of the gift of bodily INTEGRITY and immortality of the body. This has been restored to man by Christ, although he does not yet possess it in its totality. As man is body as well as soul, the material creation has a part to play in the redemptive scheme, and one sees this especially in the sacramental system. Much thought has been given in recent years to the Sacraments of the Eucharist, Anointing of the Sick, and Matrimony, all of which have a special reference to the body.

In such a context death is not a liberation from the body so much as a transitus, a going over in totality to the new world to which the Christian already belongs in essence by his Baptism. The opposition is not between one place of existence and another so much as between the world as affected by sin and death and the redeemed world of the Spirit. The theology of death began to focus on the call of the Christian to a daily dying as witness to eschatological values. In this the Christian shares in the prophetic mission of Christ, announcing the future event, the Parousia, when Christ will come in glory and the kingdom will be finally and irrevocably established. It is in the religious life that this witness is most clearly seen. The vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience speak to man of another world. The liturgical revival drew attention to the paschal mysteries as the central point of Christianity, which fostered a Christological approach to the last things.

See Also: DEATH (THEOLOGY OF); DESIRE TO SEE GOD, NATURAL; ELEVATION OF MAN; ESCHATOLOGISM; ESCHATOLOGY, ARTICLES ON; HEAVEN (THEOLOGY OF); HELL (THEOLOGY OF); INCARNATIONAL THEOLOGY; INCARNATIONALISM; JUDGMENT, DIVINE (IN THEOLOGY); MAN; PURGATORY; RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; SANCTION, DIVINE; SUPERNATURAL EXISTENTIAL; TEMPORAL VALUES, THEOLOGY OF.

Bibliography: E. MANGENOT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903-50) 5.1:456-457. K. RAHNER, Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche, (Freiburg, 1957-66) 3:1094-98. J. A. MACCULLOCH, Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics, ed. J. HASTINGS and J. A. SELBIA (Edinburgh 1908-27) 5:373-391. E. E. KELLETT, ibid. 10:757-763. J. GALOT, Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932) 4:1020-59. A. WINKLHOFER, Handbuch theologischer Grundbegriffe, ed. H. FRIES (Munich 1962-63) 1:327-336. P. AUVRAY, Catholicisme 4:410-414. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 462. M. and L. BECQUÉ, Life after Death, tr. P. HEPBURNE-SCOTT (New York 1960). R. W. GLEASON, The World to Come (New York 1958). M. SCHMAUS, Katholische Dogmatik, v.4.2 (5th ed. Munich 1958). On the history of the question. V. DE BROGLIE, De fine ultimo humanae vitae (Paris 1948). R. A. KNOX, Enthusiasm (New York 1950; repr. 1961). J. LECLERCO, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God, tr. C. MISRAHI (New York 1961). H. DE LUBAC, Exégèse médiévale, 2 v. in 4 (Paris 1959-64) 1:621-681; 2:437-558. A. LUNEAU, L'Histoire du salut chez les pères de l'église (Paris 1964). On modern problems. B. BESRET, Incarnation ou eschatologie? (Paris 1964). L. BOUYER, "Christianisme et eschatologie," La Vie Intellectuelle 16 (1948) 6-38; The Meaning of the Monastic Life, tr. K. POND (New York 1955). O. CULLMANN, Immortality of the Soul or Resurrection of the Dead? (New York 1958). F. X. DURRWELL, The Resurrection: A Biblical Study, tr. R. SHEED (New York 1960).

[M. E. WILLIAMS/EDS.]

CONTEMPORARY CATHOLIC THEOLOGY

One of the most significant developments in eschatology in the twentieth century was the rediscovery of the primacy of the advent of the end (the eschaton) in Jesus the Christ crucified and risen. It is only in the light of the end of time revealed "in Christ" that a truly Christian theology of the last things can be worked out.

In the middle 1960s eschatology was given a new lease on life through the writings of Johann-Baptist Metz and Jürgen Moltmann, who drew attention to the neglect of hope within theology and the need to reintegrate eschatology into the mainstream of Christian theory and praxis. Others, like Karl RAHNER and Wolfhart Pannenberg, emphasized the importance of CHRISTOLOGY for a balanced understanding of eschatology. Since the 1960s there has been a steady stream of literature on eschatology which gathered momentum in the years leading into the celebration of the Jubilee Year 2000 A.D.

To review the contemporary state of eschatology we shall summarize first of all the teaching of the Catholic Church on eschatology from Vatican II onwards. This teaching of the Church will be easily misunderstood if it is not accompanied by some principles of interpretation, and so it will be necessary to outline some hermeneutical guidelines. Mention of interpretation demands that consideration be given to the modern and postmodern contexts in which eschatology exists at present. Since eschatology deals with the destiny of the individual, particular attention must be given to anthropology. The centerpiece of eschatology is Christology, which gives both shape and form to Christian hope. In addressing the relationship between eschatology and Christology some discussion must be given to the current debates about Resurrection. It is impossible to talk about eschatology today without some reference to the contemporary fascination with cosmology. And finally something must be said about the increasing impact of eschatology on the rest of Christian theology.

Church Teaching from Vatican II Onwards. The few eschatological statements that do exist in the Vatican II documents are quite significant and signal a subtle shift in emphasis. The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church contains a short chapter devoted to "The Eschatological Nature of the Pilgrim Church and Her Union with the Heavenly Church'' (Chap. VII). This chapter reminds us that we are living in the end times: "Already the final age of the world is with us (cf. 1 Cor.10/11) and the renewal of the world is irrevocably underway" (LG 48). In the Pastoral Constitution on the Church and the Modern World a number of important developments are discernible in articles 38 to 43. Article 38 talks about those who are called "to give clear witness to the desire for a heavenly home" whereas others are called "to dedicate themselves to the earthly service of humanity." Of the latter group, it points out they can "make ready the material of important links between historical existence and eternity. Those who are dedicated to the service of humanity in this life can "give some kind of foreshadowing of the new age to come'' (39). In the same vein this document points out that "the expectation of a new earth must not weaken but stimulate our concerns for cultivating this one" (39). Indeed, the Council describes those who "knowing that we have no abiding city but seek one which is to come" as "mistaken" (43). Equally significant in this document is the Latin title Gaudium et spes which signals the important link between hope and joy: the exercise of Christian hope carries with it an essential element of joy. These shifts opened the way for the development subsequently of political and liberation theologies which in their own different ways gave considerable emphasis to the praxis of social justice and its place within the coming Reign of God.

A further emphasis implicit in the eschatology of Vatican II is the way the Council puts Christ at the center, claiming that Christ "is the goal of human history, the focal point of the longing of history and of civilization, the center of the human race, the joy of every heart and the answer to all its longings" (a. 43; see also G.S. a.10 and 12; A.G. a. 8). These eschatological references are notable for the way they talk about the eschaton rather the eschata, for the value they place on the significance of earthly activities for the world to come, and for the focus they give to the possibility of a social eschatology.

In 1979 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued an Instruction "On Certain Questions concerning Eschatology." The context of this document was a view being put forward about "Resurrection in Death" by the German theologian Ghisbert Greshake initially in 1969 and more extensively in 1977. Greshake's theology of "Resurrection in Death" seemed to call into question the need for and the credibility of the classical notion of "an intermediate state." By emphasizing "Resurrection in Death'' Greshake also appears to eliminate the necessity for a general judgment and the resurrection of humanity at the end of time. In response the Congregation reaffirmed classical eschatology: the general resurrection of the dead at the end of time, the immortality of the soul after death, and the existence of heaven, hell, and purgatory. The immortality of the soul is described in terms of the "spiritual element (that) survives and subsists after death." The same congregation also warns against "arbitrary imaginative representations" of the hereafter which can be "a major cause of difficulties that Christian faith often encounters." Instead it must be recognized that "neither scripture or theology provide sufficient light for a proper picture of life after death." This Instruction concludes by emphasizing on the one hand "a fundamental continuity between our present life in Christ and the future life" and on the other hand "a radical difference between the present life and the future."

The Catechism of the Catholic Church set forth its teaching on eschatology by offering a commentary on the last two articles of the Apostles Creed: "I believe in the Resurrection of the Body and Life everlasting." The Catechism outlines what it means by "Christ's Resurrection and ours" (992–996). It notes that in death there is a "separation from the body," with the human body decaying and the soul going to meet God (997). The Catechism then goes on to say that God will reunite the body with the soul through the power of Jesus' Resurrection at the end. As to "how" the resurrection takes place the Catechism says that this "exceeds our imagination and understanding" and "is accessible only to faith" (1000). Next the Catechism deals with death, which it says is "the end of earthly life" and "a consequence of sin." Death "shrouded in doubt" has been transformed through the obedience of Christ unto death.

Under the final article of the Apostles' Creed (viz., life everlasting), the Catechism discusses six areas: particular judgment, heaven, purgatory, hell, last judgment and the hope of the New Heaven and the New Earth. Concerning the New Creation the Catechism "affirms the profound common destiny of the material world and man" (1046). The visible universe "is . . . destined to be transformed" (1047). The approach of the Catechism in its treatment of eschatology is Trinitarian, Christological, ecclesiological, relational, and communion based. In many respects it could be said that the Catechism expands and elaborates on the content contained in the 1979 CDF Instruction.

On a different doctrinal level the International Theological Commission (ITC) published a lengthy document in 1992 entitled "Some Current Questions in Eschatology." The document defends the immortality of the soul after death and the general resurrection of the dead at the end of time. The ITC talks about an "anthropology of duality" and an "eschatology of souls." It also refers to the existence of the separated soul as "half a person," as "not the I," and as "an ontologically incomplete reality" and uses these descriptions of the separated soul as ways of justifying the need for resurrection at the end of time.

Principles of Interpretation. This teaching of the Church on eschatology will be easily misunderstood unless it is accompanied by some principles of interpretation. The first principle is that eschatology is not some idle speculation about the future, nor is it some kind of report of what goes on in the next world, nor is it a prediction about the end of the world. Instead eschatology is about hope seeking understanding, more specifically about a particular hope-filled interpretation of human experience in the light of the Christ-event. Eschatology seeks to explore, analyze and interpret the potential within human experience insofar as that experience points us towards the future. Eschatology looks at present experience against the background of the salvation offered by Christ to see what it promises for the future.

The key to the interpretation of these experiences is the reality of the life, death and resurrection of Jesus as the Christ summed up in the New Testament and kept alive in the Christian tradition. One way of describing eschatology is to see it as the application of christology to the self, humanity, and creation in a mode of fulfillment. In particular it is the Paschal Christ, the Crucified and Risen One, that gives us an embryonic view of the future of humanity and the world.

A third principle guiding the interpretation of eschatology concerns the question of language. Eschatology statements are symbolic, dialectical and analogical. Symbols point beyond themselves to a dimension of life that is not readily available to human experience. The symbol is not the reality symbolized and yet that reality is only available through the mediating power of symbol. The perspective of dialectic, preferred more by Protestant theologians, highlights the need for negation and usually grounds itself in the cross of Christ. The doctrine of analogy, more favored among Catholic theologians, signals the limitations attaching to all eschatological statements while seeking to assert negatively the truth within its positive statements. Within analogy there is a dynamic movement from affirmation to negation and from negation to further refinement. Of critical importance to analogy is the awareness that we know more by way of negation than by way of affirmation.

A fourth and final principle guiding the understanding of eschatology is the importance of the practical and ethical import of its statements. An authentically Christian eschatology is one that generates a praxis of liberation in the present in the name of the coming Reign of God.

The Context of Contemporary Eschatology. One of the most significant contextual shifts within Catholic theology in the twentieth century has been the transition from a classical, fixed understanding of culture to the emergence of a historical consciousness. The culture of historical consciousness recognizes the contingent character of events within history and this clearly has implications for the way we construct a theology of history and providence as underlying suppositions of eschatology. The making of history, which is always self-involving, carries with it a burden of responsibility in the exercise of human agency. History, therefore, is not predetermined but open-ended and therefore subject to the influence of the praxis of individual and social liberation. Historical consciousness calls forth a new sense of shared responsibility for the shape of the world in the present and the future. This task for eschatology has been given particular expression in the requests for forgiveness articulated by John Paul II in the Jubilee Year 2000, especially in Jerusalem, and in Athens in 2001.

A second inescapable part of the contemporary context in which eschatology exists today is the new sense of globalization. From an eschatological point of view globalization reminds theology that the destiny of the individual is bound up with the destiny of the whole. Globalization also challenges eschatology to work out an ethic of human justice and ecological sustainability for the well being of the earth in the present.

A third element relating to context concerns the highly ambiguous legacy of the Enlightenment in modernity. The rise of individualism and the cultivation of the shining-self-sufficient-subject of modernity has no need of eschatology. Similarly, modernity's myth of progress, the promise of endless growth, and the politics of social evolution have taken over the role of eschatology in modern theology. Likewise the modern denial of death and the covering over of so much suffering in history has paved the way for the promotion of a purely secular utopia. Lastly, the promises of science in their pursuit of objectivity in the delivery of new freedoms, and the promotion of social reforms have had the effect of sidelining eschatology within contemporary thought.

In recent times these dreams of modernity have been found to be wanting in many respects and in some instances are perceived to be deceptive. This exposure of modernity has given birth to the vague, illusive, and deliberately ill-defined movement known as postmodernity. In contrast to modernity, post-modernity seeks to promote the cultivation of particularity, difference, and otherness. For many the logic of postmodernity seems to be one of radical deconstruction leading to fragmentation, relativism, and ultimately nihilism. One of the most immediate casualties of post-modernity is eschatology insofar as post-modernity dissolves the human subject into an empty site for linguistic exchanges and reduces history to a collection of disconnected fragments. However, it must be noted that there are some affinities between post-modernity and Christian eschatology.

The most obvious affinity is the adoption of the apophatic/negative tradition. Both post-modernity and eschatology emphasize what is unknowable, unrepresentable, and unsayable concerning the future. A second affinity between post-modernity and eschatology is the way in which post-modernity deconstructs all affirmations in the name of something other—even though it is impossible to name this other. The nearest post-modernity comes to naming this "something other" is to call it the "possibility of the impossible," "the thought that cannot be thought," the future that exists beyond the horizons of the foreseeable. In a somewhat similar fashion some postmodernists are prepared to talk about "religion without religion'' or ''God without being.'' These positive ''negations'' contain a faint echo with classical eschatology which openly acknowledges that it does not know the future and that it is impossible to express it adequately. There may be some connection between the radical deconstruction of post-modernity and the 'learned ignorance' (docta ignorantia) of theology put forward by Aquinas, though it must be pointed out that docta ignorantia is a point of arrival in theology and eschatology and not a point of departure.

A third affinity between post-modernity and eschatology is the deep suspicion post-modernity has towards all meta-narratives. Eschatology, of course, cannot succeed without some meta-narrative, especially the narrative of the creation, redemption, and the consummation of all things in Christ. Nonetheless, eschatology shares some suspicion with post-modernity about those narratives that claim to know too much about the end of the world, the nature of the Parousia, and the character of eternal life.

Some radical differences between post-modernity and eschatology are the following. Eschatology is constructed in and around the narrative of the unity between the creation, redemption, and the consummation of all things in Christ. Further, eschatology and post-modernity differ significantly on the issue of anthropology. Here eschatology affirms the enduring existence of the self as a conscious, free, and responsible agent both within history and beyond history into eternal life. Lastly, eschatology affirms a unity between the past, the present, and the future within its statements about the meaning of history.

Anthropology. It is most of all in the area of anthropology, namely the question about what it means to be human, that the modern and postmodern contexts of eschatology is most problematic. The exalted and exaggerated self of modernity (going back to Descartes) has given rise to a self-sufficient individualism. This strong individualism has little need of eschatology since as Gabriel MARCEL was fond of pointing out "hope does not exist at the level of the solitary ego." The human self knows that it cannot survive death on its own and that it is only because the self is known and loved by God that it has a future beyond death. It is the experience of loving and being loved that assures a future for the self. However, each of these moves is unavailable to and unnecessary for the shining-self-sufficient-subject of modernity.

At the other end of the spectrum there is the deconstructed self of post-modernity, which is even less available to eschatology. According to post-modernity the human self is something of an empty site around which a great variety of transactions take place, a little like a crossroads that facilitates the movement of traffic. On such a view there can be no coherent anthropology and therefore no viable eschatology. The dissolution of the self carries within itself the dissolution of hope and ultimately the dismantling of eschatology. The sharpness of this deconstruction of the human self highlights the necessity for some form of reconstruction of the human that is able to take account of the positives aspects contained within the modern and postmodern conceptions of the human self, namely the strong sense of human identity within modernity and the equally strong awareness within post-modernity of the presence of so much change in the life of the individual.

The reconstruction of the human required for a viable eschatology needs to take account of the variety of impulses coming from various sources. There is first of all the reaction against the individualism of modernity coming from feminism, ecology, and cosmology. Feminism in its great variety places a strong emphasis on the self as relational. Environmentalists emphasize the "connected self" as that which exists in dependence on the rest of nature and creation. Cosmologists talk about the individual as cosmic dust in a state of self-conscious freedom, which is always embodied. These different though complementary perspectives suggest that the whole of life, in particular human life, is organically interconnected, inter-related and inter-dependent. This perspective on human identity prompts the formulation of the following principles in the reconstruction of anthropology: to exist is always to co-exist, to be is always to be in relationship, self discovery comes into being through self surrender to the other.

A second impulse on the nature of the human self comes from the work of Paul RICOEUR as expressed in One's Self as Another (Chicago 1992). According to Ricoeur the human self is only available in narrative form and this narrative is more often than not a point of historical arrival rather than a point of departure. What is distinctive for Ricoeur about the human self is the pivotal role that action plays in the constitution of the human self. The self is not available through a process of introspection; rather, the self comes into view through a process of interpersonal action and reaction.

There are at least two different aspects to the self within Ricoeur's philosophy. The historical identity of the human self arises out of a dialectic between the underlying sameness of the self (idem) and the ongoing development of selfhood (ipse) through a process of mutuality and reciprocity with other selves. Selfhood is never quite as settled or fixed as modernity would suggest; instead, selfhood is far more flexible, as can be seen through the impact of actions associated with a career change, a new relationship, or the death of a spouse. Selfhood is always in process of becoming, open to change and development even though it is the same underlying self that is in motion.

What is significant about these relational and narrative anthropologies is the existence of an active self that is open and unfinished. Given these perspectives on human identity, eschatology emerges not as something additional or extrinsic to anthropology. Instead, eschatology is, as Rahner frequently pointed out, anthropology in a mode of fulfillment or anthropology conjugated in the future. Further, this kind of anthropology, namely a relational anthropology, sees the human subject as one who is in touch with God at the beginning of life and not simply at the end of historical existence. Thirdly, a relational anthropology opens up the way for the development of a social eschatology in both the present and the future.

Christology. The christological focus within eschatology has not always been to the fore in the history of Christian thought. The most obvious example of a break in the link between christology and eschatology is the emphasis often given to the eschata at the expense of the advent of the new eschaton in Christ. To say that Christ is the hermeneutical principle of eschatological statements (Rahner) means that we must be able to recognize the influence of the Christ-event within eschatological statements. The Christ-event is best summed up in terms of recognizing the theological significance that belongs to the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus as the Christ. This significance can be expressed in a variety of ways. At the Second Vatican Council emphasis was placed on the Paschal Mystery of Christ as the centerpiece of salvation history. Equally, as already noted, Vatican II also described Christ as the goal, ground, and center of human history.

The New Testament points out that God "has made known to us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure that he set forth in Christ, as a plan for the fullness of time, to gather up all things in Him, things in heaven and things on earth" (Ep. 1.9–10). The letter to the Colossians claims that Christ "is the image of the invisible God, the first born of all creation . . . in Him all things hold together; He is the beginning, the first born from the dead" (Col. 1.15). The future, therefore, is christomorphic.

In the early Church there was a sense that an eschatological breakthrough had occurred in the historical life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. The earliest interpretations of the historical life of Jesus are thoroughly eschatological. For example, Paul says that Christ has "abolished death, brought life and immortality to light" (2 Tm 1.10). In virtue of the Christ-event we are now living in "the end of ages" (1 Cor 10.11) and in the "latter times" (1 Tm 4.1) and therefore all are encouraged "to put away the old man and put on the new man" (Eph 4.22; Col 3.9). Because Christ is "the first born among many" (Rom 8.29; Col 1.18) and "the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep" (1 Cor 15.20) Paul can say that since "all die in Adam, so all will be made alive in Christ" (1 Cor 15.22).

Further, this experience and understanding of Jesus as the Christ is something that affects not only human existence but also the direction of history as well as material creation itself: ". . . for creation itself will be set free from its bondage and will obtain the freedom of the glory of the children of God" (Rom 8.21). The Christ-event, therefore, reconfigures our understanding of God in relation to the future of humanity, of history and of creation.

This sense of eschatological breakthrough is so strong in the early Church that initially Paul believes that the return of Christ (PAROUSIA) is imminent and so his early theology emphasizes resurrection and parousia. With the passage of time there is a shift from resurrection and parousia to death and resurrection, with resurrection taking place after death (2 Cor 5.1–10; Phil 1.21–23; Phil 3.21) to a later theology of being and becoming "in Christ" in the present.

Within this theology of Paul there are two key points to be noted. The early Church had a strong awareness and belief that the future has already dawned in Christ and has therefore taken a hold of the present. The future is not something that we are waiting for to take place; instead the future is here already in embryo in the Paschal Mystery of Jesus Christ. Also, in the theology of Paul there is a creative tension between what has "already" taken place "in Christ" and what is "not yet" achieved, between being "in Christ" and becoming "in Christ," between the indicative statements such as "you are in Christ" and the imperative statements that "you must put on Christ." In Paul there is a dialectic between the already and the not yet, a paradox of dying and rising, a mysticism of being and becoming in Christ. The crucified and risen Christ is one eschatological reality.

Debates about the Resurrection. The resurrection of Jesus from the dead, so central to eschatology in the early church and in particular in the theology of Paul, needs to be recovered in the twenty-first century. Part of the problem concerning the historicity of resurrection is that the symbol of resurrection has become isolated from other equally important eschatological symbols such as exaltation, glorification, ascension, and Pentecost. The eschatological breakthrough that occurred in the life and death of Jesus can only be grasped in the context of the variety of eschatological symbols employed to capture one and the same post-Calvary experience of Jesus as alive, personally present, gathering, empowering, and missioning the disciples. When resurrection is separated from these other eschatological expressions, then it becomes distorted and literalized.

While it is true to say that the immortality of the soul has captured in the past and continues to capture in the present a most important aspect of eschatology, it must also be recognized that this pre-Christian philosophy needs to be subordinated to the revelation of God's decisive, eschatological action in the life, death, and destiny of Jesus. The resurrection of Jesus is described in explicitly eschatological terms: "the first fruits of those who have fallen asleep" (1 Cor 15.20), the first born of all creation (Col 1.15), the New Man (Eph 4.22; Col 2.9), and the New Creation (2 Cor 5.17). These images highlight that the Resurrection of Jesus is the beginning of a new process in history, a re-ordering of existence, and the reshaping of creation. The resurrection of Jesus affects all who die, alters the course of history, and reconfigures the destiny of the cosmos. The theological content of these claims of the New Testament cannot be carried adequately by the Platonic doctrine of the immortality of the soul.

The third area of debate about the resurrection concerns the time of resurrection. Between the two positions of resurrection at the end of time (classical view) and resurrection in death (Greshake et al.) there can be found a third position. The perspective of Vatican II, following Paul on the Paschal Mystery and the centrality of communion in Christ, suggests that resurrection is initiated in this life through Baptism and lived out in varying degrees through the paschal process of dying and rising in Christ. This new life "in Christ" is deepened in the celebration of the Eucharist and reaches a point of finality in death. In death personal resurrection sets in and is completed, socially and cosmically, with the second coming of Christ, which will effect the final harvesting of humanity, history, and the cosmos into a New Heaven and the New Earth (Rv 21.1-6; Eph 1.9-10). Within this vision there is room for individual resurrection in this life, personal resurrection in death, and the social-cosmic resurrection at the end of time. This position is developed in more detail by Dermot A. Lane in Keeping Hope Alive: Stirrings in Christian Theology (New York 1996), 150-162.

Scientific Cosmologies and Christian Eschatologies. It is impossible to discuss Christian eschatology today without giving some consideration to the current fascination with scientific cosmologies. Throughout the twentieth century cosmologists have been attending not only to the beginning but also the ending of the universe. The resulting "scientific cosmologies" are increasingly popular and have been taking a hold of the secular imagination. Two very brief sketches will suffice to provide some broad points of comparison with Christian eschatologies.

Freeman Dyson, who works out of an open and expanding universe that will eventually collapse into a cosmic void, emphasizes the importance of adaptability for the future of human life in Infinite in All Directions (New York 1988). Dyson suggests that before the onset of cosmic collapse it will be necessary to export life to another planet or galaxy. The nature of life in question would be new forms of human consciousness that could become detached from flesh and blood. These forms of consciousness will be captured through vast systems of organizations and networks made available through computer circuits. For survival it will be necessary for this artificial intelligence to be able to adapt to zero levels of temperature, gravity, and pressure. A second "scientific eschatology" is put forward by Frank Tipler in The Physics of Immortality (London 1977). According to Tipler the human mind is a software program within a particular hardware system of the brain. Before the end of time this software program could be transferred to some other hardware system. Tipler claims this transfer of mental software is possible by using the vast quantities of matter and energy that would accumulate just before the collapse of the universe. This transfer would bring into being Omega Point, which would represent the soul as omnipotent, omniscient, and infinite. These summaries do not do justice to the detailed "scientific eschatologies" of these authors. At most they can give a flavor of what is envisaged in terms of creating artificial intelligence and replicating vast banks of information in computer systems about the constitution of human identity which are then presented as expressions of immortality.

A number of observations should be made by way of initial response to these "scientific eschatologies." From an anthropological point of view they seem to be operating out of an understanding of the human as that which is reducible to a gigantic mountain of informationsoftware processes. This perception of the human is explicitly dualistic, presupposing the possibility of disembodied existence in the future, which seems to lack any kind of human subjectivity. In brief the human person is replicated as a vast bank of information, with no sense of the need for healing or wholeness. From a theological perspective it must be noted that these "scientific eschatologies" are secular, making no reference to the creative, redemptive, and consummating God of the Bible; they are "scientific" in that they provide at best speculative information about the future. In contrast theology is not about information but the experience of being grasped and loved by that gracious mystery we call God which refuses to be reduced to propositional data. From an eschatological point of view these "scientific eschatologies" suffer from the absence of human memory as something quite distinct from mechanical memory. Within these predictions there is no memory of the pain, suffering and injustices of former generations that cry out for redemption. There is no memory of the historical Passover of the people of Israel or the Paschal Mystery of Jesus as the Christ, both of which provide sources of hope for the future. Thirdly, there is no memory that the future has already appeared in the death and resurrection of Jesus and that, therefore, the future is already shaping the present. Most of all these secular "scientific eschatologies" are flawed because of the way they disrupt the unity between human memory and imagination. Memory of the past and the future is essential to the credible operations of the imagination. Without memory the human imagination runs the risk of lapsing into fantasy. The capacity of the human imagination to articulate credible alternatives is impaired once it loses contact with tradition and ceases to adhere to the real.

In making this rather negative assessment, it must be acknowledged that these "scientific eschatologies" do provide an opening for an important dialogue between religion and science. The dialogue between Christian eschatology and "scientific eschatologies" has hardly begun, and the distance that exists between the two can be seen in the above points of comparison. It is essential for the credibility of Christian eschatology that this dialogue take place. In particular the dialogue is important to ensure that eschatological claims do not conflict with the established findings of cosmology.

The Growing Influence of Eschatology on the Rest of Theology. In many respects eschatology, understood as hope seeking understanding, is the missing link in a lot of contemporary theology. Metz and Moltmann, Rahner and Pannenberg have sought to bring eschatology to the center of the theological enterprise. This relocation of eschatology is having positive effects on rest of theology.

For instance, eschatology is a powerful reminder of the incompleteness of Christology and that what Christ has set in train continues to be subject to the second coming of Christ. In the area of ecclesiology, eschatology functions as a moderating influence on exaggerated ecclesiological claims, highlighting the fact that the church is always a pilgrim people continually in need of reform and renewal, never to be identified or confused with the coming Reign of God but always seeking to sight and celebrate elements of the Reign of God in the world. In sacramental theology, eschatology is coming more and more to the fore. For example, the eucharist is understood as the sacrament of the eschaton: celebrating the past and remembering the future, providing a foretaste of what is to come. In the area of moral theology eschatology provides a grounding for the work of justice, the praxis of liberation, and the care of the earth.

There is an important sense in which the end organizes and unifies the whole of life. Without an end in view, life lapses into empty time (chronos). But if there is an end in view, then chronos can be transformed into kairos, time filled with meaning, a purpose and promise. This, among others, is one of the primary tasks facing eschatology in the twenty-first century.

Bibliography: B. E. DALEY, The Hope of the Early Church: A Handbook of Patristic Eschatology (New York 1991). J. P. GALVIN, ed., Faith and Future: Studies in Eschatology (New York 1994). J. F. HAUGHT, The Promise of Nature: Ecology and Cosmic Purpose (New York 1993). Z. HAYES, Visions of a Future: A Study of Christian Eschatology (Wilmington, DE 1989). INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL COMMISSION, "Some Current Questions in Eschatology," Irish Theological Quarterly 58 (1992) 209-243. D. A. LANE, "Anthropology and Eschatology," Irish Theological Quarterly 61 (1995) 11-28. "Message of His Holiness John Paul II," Physics, Philosophy and Theology: A Common Quest for Understanding, eds. R. J. RUSSELL, W. R. STOEGER, and J. V. COYNE (Vatican City 1988). J. NEUNER and J. DUPUIS, eds., The Christian Faith in Doctrinal Documents of the Catholic Church, rev. ed. (London 1983). P. C. PHAN, "Contemporary Contexts and Issues on Eschatology," Theological Studies 55 (1994) 507-536. J. R. SACHS, "Current Eschatology: Universal Salvation and the Problem of Hell," Theological Studies 52 (1991) 227–254. J. RATZINGER, Eschatology: Death and Eternal Life, trans. M. WALDSTEIN (Washington, D.C. 1988).

[D. A. LANE]

ESCHMANN, IGNATIUS T.

Dominican philosopher, theologian, and critic; b. Dusseldorf, Nov. 13, 1898; d. Toronto, April 11, 1968. After completing his studies at the Hohenzollern Gymnasium in Dusseldorf in 1916 he was ordered to the trenches as a machine gunner until the end of the First World War, when he was honorably discharged. He joined the Dominican Order and made profession on May 19, 1920. He was sent to Rome to study philosophy and theology at the Angelicum, where he was ordained to the priesthood on July 12, 1925, and where he obtained his doctorate and taught moral philosophy until 1936, gaining the reputation of being a good teacher and a very persuasive preacher. When PIUS XI's encyclical Mit brennender Sorge appeared on March 4, 1937, he promulgated its contents as cathedral preacher in Cologne, and found himself at odds with both the police and the German hierarchy. He was ultimately arrested by the civil police and incarcerated in Cologne until the fall of 1938, when he was released and made his way to Canada.

In Ottawa he collaborated with the Canadian Dominicans in preparing the piana edition of the Summa theologiae of St. THOMAS AQUINAS, his particular contribution being the sources provided by that edition (1941). Until the end of the war he was under constant surveillance by the Canadian police and suspected by the French Canadian Dominicans as an enemy alien. Invited to join the staff of Laval University, Quebec, he taught for only one year (1939-40), becoming embroiled in a controversy with Cardinal Villeneuve and Charles De Koninck. In 1942 he joined the philosophy department of St. Michael's College and the faculty of the Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies in Toronto. He became a Canadian citizen in Dec. 1945 and devoted the rest of his life to teaching graduate students the riches of St. Thomas and a critical, historical approach to the study of moral philosophy. He pioneered many ideas which have since become part of Catholic scholarship.

Bibliography: L. K. SHOOK, "Ignatius Eschmann, O.P., 1898–1968," Mediaeval Studies 30 (1968) v–ix. I. T. ESCHMANN, The Ethics of Saint Thomas Aquinas: Two Courses, ed. E. A. SYNAN (Toronto 1997).

[J. A. WEISHEIPL]

ESCOBAR, ANDRÉS DE

Benedictine abbot, bishop, canonist, and theologian; b. Lisbon, 1366 or 1367; d. Florence(?) 1439 or 1440. His writings on the canonical-moral aspects of confessional practice in the Sacrament of PENANCE, on the underlying causes of the EASTERN SCHISM, and on his proposals for the reform of the clerical and lay states of life made him one of the most widely read of Renaissance Churchmen up to the 17th century. This Hispano-Portuguese monk (he was neither a Dominican nor a Franciscan, as some have asserted) earned his master's degree in theology at the University of Vienna. After becoming abbot of Randuf in the Diocese of BRAGA, he began his 40-year career in the papal Curia (c. 1397), acting as a papal penitentiary and adviser. He later took part in the councils of CONSTANCE, BASEL, and FLORENCE, and his signature appears on the Decree of Union with the Greeks. In 1408 Pope GREGORY XII made him bishop of Cività (Tempio-Terranova) in Sardinia; in 1422 MARTIN V transferred him to the See of Ajaccio in Corsica. He does not seem to have resided in either see. In May 1428 Martin V transferred him to the titular See of Megara. Besides Randuf, he held the abbeys of San Juan de Pendorada in Oporto and San Rosendo de Celanova in Galicia in commendam in order to supplement his meager income.

In his Gubernaculum conciliorum (1435) he manifested certain conciliarist views (see CONCILIARISM), but Candal asserts that these views must be understood in the light of Escobar's anxiety for the promotion and carrying out of reform in the Church. His authentic attitude appears more sharply defined in his abandonment of the Council of Basel in favor of Pope EUGENE IV and in his defense of papal PRIMACY and INFALLIBILITY in his last treatise, De Graecis errantibus (1437). This work, largely derived from St. Thomas Aquinas's Contra errores Graecorum, is distinguished for its balanced and sympathetic approach to an understanding of the ritual differences between the Greek and Latin Churches.

Bibliography: The best authority for the facts of Escobar's biography and for a summary view of his writings are his Tractatus polemico-theologicus de Graecis errantibus, ed. E. CANDAL (Concilium florentinum: Documenta et scriptores 4.1; Rome 1952), and E. CANDAL, ''Andrés de Escobar, Obispo de Megara,'' Orientalia Christiana periodica 14 (1948) 80–104.

[R. H. TRAME]

ESCOBAR, MARINA DE, VEN.

Mystic and foundress of the Brigittines in Spain; b. Valladolid, Feb. 8, 1554; d. Valladolid, June 9, 1633. Marina's father, Rodrigo, was a man of deep spirituality, a lawyer at the royal chancellery, and a professor at the university. Her mother, Marguerite, was the daughter of the physician attending Charles V. Marina's adolescence was disturbed somewhat by alterations of fervor, dryness, and scruples. She offered herself totally to God during the Lent of 1587. Three Jesuits were successively her directors: Pedro de Leon; Luis de LA PUENTE, after Pedro's death in 1603; and Miguel de Oreña, who succeeded La Puente. In 1615 Marina conceived the plan of establishing the Brigittines in Spain. With the help of La Puente she drew up an adaptation of the constitutions of St. Brigit, which was approved by Urban VIII, Nov. 28, 1628, and permission was granted for the foundation of the first monastery with Spanish religious from other orders. Although Marina did not live to see the opening of the house in Valladolid in 1637, the Spanish Brigittines nevertheless considered her their foundress.

The last 30 years of Marina's life were spent in small, dark, poorly ventilated quarters, where she was bedridden. She was able to assist at Mass, however, for it was celebrated for her daily in an adjacent room. A small circle of devout women attended to her needs and looked upon her as their spiritual mother. During these years her physical afflictions amounted to a kind of pro-tracted martyrdom, but spiritually she seemed to live two lives—one in which she conversed with those about her, and the other in which she conversed with God, the angels, and the saints. All this is described in what may be called her autobiography, Vida maravillosa de la Venerable Virgen Doña Marina de Escobar. This work was put together from notes written at the command of her spiritual directors. The first part, carrying up to the year 1624, was prepared and published by La Puente (Madrid 1655); the second part, by Pinto Ramirez, SJ (Madrid 1673). The two parts were published together in 1766. Besides providing an account of Marina's own extraordinary mystical experience-her participation in the mysteries of the humanity of Christ, including the stigmata, her experience of the divine attributes and of the wonderful ways in which God communicates Himself to the soul, her sufferings of purification-the Vida also throws light on many matters of importance in ascetical and mystical theology. The Vida was subjected to careful scrutiny by the Jesuits. The first part of it caused the halting of La Puente's process of beatification for 40 years, for the Roman censors thought there was illusion in it and a suggestion of QUIETISM. However, the intervention of the promotor fidei, Prospero Lambertini (later Benedict XIV), secured the acceptance of La Puente's text.

Bibliography: C. M. ABAD, El Venerable Padre Luis de La Puente: Sus libros y su doctrina espiritual (Comillas 1954) 455–531; Vida y escritos del V. P. Luis de La Puente (Comillas 1957) 425–451, 528–550; Dictionnaire de spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et histoire, ed. M. VILLER et al. (Paris 1932–) 4.1:1083–86.

[J. VERBILLION]

ESCORIAL

Monastery of San Lorenzo, palace, royal mausoleum, college, and monastery, situated 26 miles northwest of Madrid, Spain, on the southern slope of the Guadarrama Mountains near the old village of Escorial. It was founded by Philip II in thanksgiving for the victory of St. Quentin (St. Lawrence's day, Aug. 10, 1557). Begun April 23, 1563 by Juan Bautista de Toledo, a Spanishborn military engineer, it was completed Sept. 13, 1584. The Escorial fulfilled Philip II's promise to provide a mausoleum for the remains of his father Emperor Charles V and provided a residence for the king and a palace for the court; it accommodated community of 100 friars (originally Hieronymites), a seminary, a college, a hospital, a large research library, and a generous basilica.

Architecture of the Escorial. Dissatisfied with the first scheme for the church, Philip II requested plans from a great many architects. Their projects (now lost) were submitted to the Florentine Academy for criticism in 1567. Though parts of some of them may have been incorporated in the building as we see it, visiting Italian military architect Francesco Paciotto submitted the drawings (also lost) according to which the church was built, as we know from José de Sigüenza, official chronicler of the Escorial.

El Escorial Palace and Monastery, San Lorenzo de El Escorial, Spain. (© Nik Wheeler/CORBIS)

Upon the death of de Toledo (May 1567), his assistant Juan de Herrera took charge of the construction. In 1572 Herrera reorganized the entire workshop in order to speed the work, introducing competitive bidding for contracts and requiring stone to be cut to specified dimensions at the quarry rather than on site. Herrera claimed that his methods permitted doing in eight years (1572–84) what by previous methods would have taken 80.

The rectangular building measuring 207 meters by 161 meters consists of three parts: the south portion housed the royal palace and offices; on the north was the monastery with 300 cells and in the middle, the church with 43 altars. The Escorial has remarkable architectural coherence. Built in a coarse granite that permits no refinement of detail, it is contained within clean, simple planes of immense size. The taste and will of Philip II are present everywhere, and he, as much as his architects, is to be credited with the emergence of the severe mode in Spanish architecture (estilo desornamentado, or "bare style"). It contributed a clarity of structure, a love of rectilinear planes, and geometric consonance to subsequent Spanish architecture. History of the Escorial. The Hieronymites installed by Philip II remained there until their suppression (1854); the monastery was later granted by Isabella II to St. Antonio Maria Claret and a group of secular priests (1859), and by Alfonso XII to the Augustinians (1885), who still hold it. Philip II's ascetic study-bedroom, from which he governed the Spanish Empire and in which he died (1598), is interesting in its simplicity; but Charles III and Charles IV in the 18th century decorated the other rooms and used the building as a hunting lodge. Beneath the church is the pantheon, where most Spanish kings since Charles V are buried with their families in hierarchical order.

The Escorial as a Cultural Center. The Escorial houses some 16,000 oil paintings by Velázquez, Zurbarán, Ribera, Titian, and others; some 540 murals, including that of the battles of Higueruela and St. Quentin (185 feet long); and a world-famous library, which contains about 40,000 books, mostly rare, and 4,742 valuable manuscripts in Arabic, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Spanish.

Bibliography: El Escorial: Eighth Marvel of the World (Madrid 1967). G. KUBLER, Building the Escorial (Princeton 1982). R. MULCAHY, The Decoration of the Royal Basilica of El Escorial

(New York 1994). M. CABLE, El Escorial (New York 1971). M. LÓPEZ SERRANO, ed., Trazas de Juan de Herrera (Madrid 1944). A. PORTABALES-PICHEL, Maestros mayores, arquitectos y aparejadores de El Escorial (Madrid 1952). J. QUEVEDO, Historia del real monasterio de San Lorenzo, llamado comunmente del Escorial (Madrid 1849). JUAN DE SAN GERÓNIMO, Memorias sobre la fundación del Escorial y su fábrica (Colección de documentos inéditos para la historia de España, 112 v. (Madrid 1842–95) 7; 1845). JOSÉ DE SIGÜENZA, Fundación del monasterio de El Escorial (Madrid 1605; new ed. Madrid 1963). Historia primitiva y exacta del monasterio del Escorial (Madrid 1881). Los Agustinos y el real monasterio de San Lorenzo de El Escorial, 1885–1910 (Madrid 1910). J. ZARCO CUEVAS, Catálogo de los manuscritos castellanos de la real biblioteca de El Escorial, 3 v. (Madrid 1924–29).

[G. KUBLER; D. W. LOMAX]

ESCRIVÁ DE BALAGUER Y ALBÁS, JOSEMARÍA, BL.

Founder of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and OPUS DEI; b. Jan. 9, 1902, Barbastro, Spain; d. June 26, 1975, Villa Trevere, Rome, Italy.

One of six children of José Escrivá and Dolores Balaguer, Escrivá studied at the School of Law of the University of Saragossa after high school, subsequently receiving the doctorate in law from the University of Madrid (1939). Once his seminary studies were completed in Saragossa, he was ordained on March 28, 1925. Later he received a doctorate in theology from the Pontifical Lateran University, Rome. His priestly work began in rural parishes and was continued among university students and people from a wide variety of backgrounds in the slums of Saragossa and Madrid.

On Oct. 2, 1928 he founded OPUS DEI, an association whose object is to spread Christian doctrine and virtues in all environments of social and professional life. It provides a spiritual life style for those who want to follow Christ more closely, but who choose to remain in secular society. In 1946, Msgr. Escrivá de Balaguer moved his residence to Rome and traveled throughout Europe to prepare and consolidate the apostolic work of Opus Dei. Between 1970 and 1975, he carried out an extensive work of preaching and catechetical instruction in practically every country of Latin America and in various European nations. In addition to historical, juridical, and theological writings, he is the author of widely read spiritual books, most of which have been translated into several languages, including The Way (Chicago 1954), Holy Rosary (Chicago 1953), Conversations with Msgr. Escrivá de Balaguer (Shannon 1968), Christ Is Passing By (Chicago 1974), Friends of God (Madrid 1977), and La Abadesa de las Huelgas (Madrid 1944). The Way, first published in 1934 under the title Consideraciones espirituales, by 1999 had sold 4,721,000 copies in 42 languages.

Addressing a crowd of 300,000 faithful gathered on May 17, 1992 in St. Peter's Square for Escrivá's beatification, Pope John Paul II said, "With supernatural intuition, Bl. Josemaría untiringly preached the universal call to holiness and apostolate." Escrivá's body is entombed in the Prelatic Church of Our Lady of Peace at Viale Bruno Buozzi in Rome.

Feast: June 26.

Bibliography: Works by BLESSED JOSEMARÍA ESCRIVÁ: Children of God: The Life of Spiritual Childhood (Princeton, N.J. 1998). Friends of God, Eng. tr. (Princeton, N.J. 1977). Furrow (Princeton, N.J. 1986). The Forge (Princeton, N.J. 1987). The Way of the Cross (Princeton, N.J. 1981). The Way, reprint (Princeton, N.J. 1985). Works about Blessed Josemaría Escrivá: Así le vieron: testimonios sobre monseñor Escrivá de Balaguer, ed. R. SERRANO (Madrid 1992). J. H. BENET, Josemaria Escrivá de Balaguer: un hombre de Dios (Madrid 1992). P. BERGLAR, Opus Dei: Life and Work of its Founder (Princeton, N.J. 1995). S. BERNAL, Msgr. Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer (New York 1977). A. BYRNE, Sanctifying Ordinary Work (New York 1975). L. CARANDELL, Vida y milagros de monseñor Escrivá de Balaguer (Barcelona 1992). C. CAVALLERI, Immersed in God: Blessed Josemaria Escriva (Princeton, N.J. 1996). Estudios sobre Camino: colección de estudios, ed. J. MORALES (Madrid 1988). F. GONDRAND, At God's Pace (Princeton, N.J. 1982). Hombre de Dios: testimonios sobre el fundador del Opus Dei (Madrid 1994). F. OCARIZ BRAÑA, Canonical Path of Opus Dei (Princeton, N.J. 1994); Vivir como hijos de dios: estudios sobre el Beato Josemaría Escrivá 4th ed. (Pamplona 1999). R. G. PÉREZ, Trabajando junto al beato Josemaría (Madrid 1994). La personalidad del Beato Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer (Pamplona 1994). A. DEL PORTILLO, Immersed in God: Blessed Josemaría Escrivá (Princeton 1996). J. YNFANTE, Opus Dei: así en la tierra como en el cielo (Barcelona 1996).

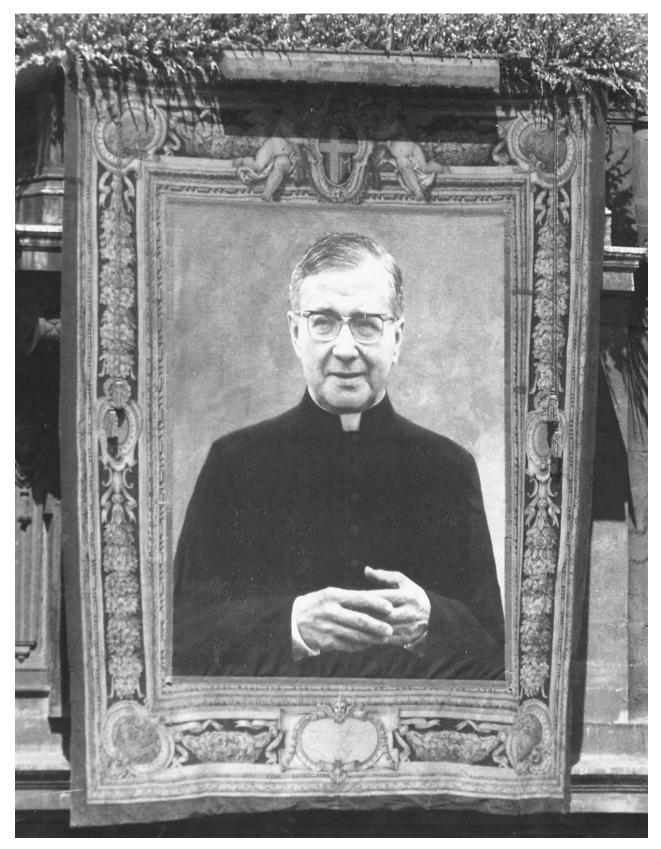

[M. M. KENNEDY]

ESGLIS, LOUIS PHILIPPE MARIAUCHAU D'

Eighth bishop of Quebec, Canada; b. Quebec, April 24, 1710; d. Saint Pierre, Île d'Orléans, Quebec, June 4, 1788. His father, François Mariauchau d'Esglis, was an army officer who arrived in Canada in 1689. Louis was ordained Sept. 18, 1734, and immediately became the parish priest of Saint Pierre, Île d'Orléans. In 1770 he was approved by the authorities at Rome and London as coadjutor of Quebec and was consecrated by Bp. J. O. Briand July 12, 1772, with the title Bishop of Dorylée. When Briand resigned (1784), d'Esglis, who was the first native-born Canadian bishop, assumed the authority of the see, but remained in his former residence until his death. Too old to administer to the diocese, he had a coadjutor, Jean-François Hubert, appointed as soon as possible.

Bibliography: H. TÊTU, Les Évêques de Québec (Quebec 1889). A. H. GOSSELIN, L'Église du Canada après la conquête, 2 v. (Quebec 1916–17) v.2.

[H. PROVOST]

Tapestry featuring Opus Dei founder Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer y Albás. (AP/Wide World Photos)

ESKIL, ST.

Martyr; fl. Sweden, 11th century. He was called Eskillinus by Ailnoth in his Gesta Suenomagni. According to a later legend, Eskil was born in England and was stoned to death in the pagan reaction under King Blotsven for having preached the Christian faith under Blotsven's predecessor. The patron of the Diocese of Strängnäs, Sweden, he had a local cultus, in addition to a cultus among the Bridgettines of other countries. The translation of his relics is observed on Oct. 12; a reliquary preserving an arm of the saint is in the State Historical Museum in Stockholm. Bishop Brynolf Algotsson of Skara (d. 1317, beatified 1492) composed a rhymed history and a sequence in Eskil's honor. The town of Eskilstuna (Tuna) bears his name, as does the church in which his remains are buried. Eskil is portrayed in art with the stones of his martyrdom.

Feast: June 12 (Northern Europe).

Bibliography: Scriptores rerum Suecicarum, v.2 (Uppsala 1828). Vitae sanctorum Danorum, ed. M. C. GERTZ (new ed. Copenhagen 1908–12). Analecta hymnica (Leipzig 1886–1922) 42:199–200; 43:130–131. S. LINDQVIST, Den helige Eskils biskopsdöme (Stockholm 1915). T. SCHMID, "E., Botvid och David," Scandia 4 (1931) 102–114; Sveriges kristnande (Stockholm 1934). C. A. MOBERG, Über die schwedischen Sequenzen, 2 v. (Uppsala 1927); Die liturgischen Hymnen in Schweden (Copenhagen 1947). L. MUSSET, Les Peuples scandinaves au moyen âge (Paris 1951).

[T. SCHMID]

ESKIL OF LUND

Archbishop; b. 1100; d. Clairvaux, Sept. 6, 1181. He was the son of high Jutish nobility, and was educated in the cathedral school of Hildesheim (Germany). In 1134, Eskil became bishop of Roskilde (Denmark); in 1138 he succeeded his uncle in the See of LUND; and in 1156 was created primate of Sweden and papal legate for all Scandinavia. He freed his archdiocese from German influence, promoted the GREGORIAN REFORM, converted the pagan Wends, supported ALEXANDER III against FREDER-ICK I BARBAROSSA, and promoted the settlement of monastic orders, particularly those of the CISTERCIANS and PREMONSTRATENSIANS. For his courageous stand on all these issues, Eskil suffered imprisonment, was forced into exile (1161-67), and, in 1177, retired for the last years of his life to Clairvaux, where he was venerated as a saint.

Bibliography: H. KOCH, Danmarks kirke i den begyndende Højmiddelalder, 2 v. (Copenhagen 1936) 1:81–121. W. W. WIL-LIAMS, Saint Bernard of Clairvaux (Westminster, Md. 1952) 88–89. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, The Letters of St. Bernard of Clairvaux, tr. B. S. JAMES (Chicago 1953) 493–494. A. OTTO, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche ² 3:1104.

[L. J. LEKAI]

ESPADA Y LANDA, JUAN JOSÉ DÍAZ DE

Reforming Spanish bishop of Havana; b. Arróyave, Alava, Spain, 1756; d. Havana, Aug. 13, 1832. He directed the Diocese of Havana for three decades (1802-32), and was able to ascertain the needs of his diocese with dispatch. To undertake his great work of reform, he requested and obtained the aid of the most outstanding men of merit in the Cuban capital. Because of his fervent apostolic zeal and his great social and intellectual accomplishments, his name was mentioned, primus inter pares, with the names of the great prelates of Cuba. Under his pastoral charge, and in large measure under his auspices, Cuban society was able to adapt to the culture and the progress of the period. In his diocese, Bishop Espada contributed a large sum of money and a large plot to establish the first cemetery of Havana. His first pastoral visit (1804-05) produced abundant spiritual fruit, and also permitted him to delineate more exactly the limits of the rural parishes; to allocate, with the greatest possible fairness, the distribution of Church revenue; and to assist impoverished and needy parishes. He was firm in correcting abuses and superstitions, and was a constant protector of charitable institutions and those that favored popular education. He founded schools, reorganized asylums, and directed the Economic Society of Friends of the country, giving it his own vigorous stamp and renewed impetus; he reorganized the seminary; and he encouraged and granted his protection to the famous Father Félix Varela, reformer of philosophical studies, and to Tomás Romay, who introduced and spread vaccination. Espada's outstanding work of reform during two constitutional periods caused him to make bitter and stubborn enemies, who denounced him and reviled him; but most of the people, even those who were in power, honored him. His death occasioned sincere, general manifestations of mourning among all the social classes of a people who loved and respected him.

Bibliography: C. GARCÍA PONS, El obispo Espada y su influencia en la cultura Cubana (Havana 1951).

[J. M. PÉREZ CABRERA]

ESPEN, ZEGER BERNHARD VAN

Canonist of wide influence in the Church–State theories of the 18th century; b. Louvain, July 8, 1646; d. Amersfoort, Oct. 2, 1728. After his ecclesiastical studies in Louvain, he was ordained a priest in 1673. In 1675, he received the doctorate in Canon Law and in 1677 he taught that discipline at the Collegium Hadriani VI, University of Louvain, where he was sought out for counsel by many jurists, bishops, and princes. After several influential books and pamphlets that indicated his inclination towards rigorism, he published in 1700 his Jus ecclesiasticum universum, an attempt to present in a coherent order all the elements of ecclesiastical discipline. The work strengthened his reputation but also provoked some qualms. In April 1704, it was placed on the list of the Roman Index. Nevertheless, Van Espen continued his work and published a supplement in 1729 (inserted in the 1753 edition). Meanwhile his leanings toward Jansenism and his contacts with prominent members of this movement became evident. Besides, his writings about dispensations, immunities, exemptions and the royal placet evinced opinions that provoked violent opposition in many quarters. Moreover, Van Espen had approved, perhaps even caused, the election of the Vicar-General of Utrecht, Cornelius Steenhoven, who had been promoted to archbishop without permission of the Holy See and furthermore by unauthorized electors. When afterward the bishop-elect had himself consecrated by a suspended bishop, assisted by two simple priests, Van Espen, in a letter printed in Holland (Responsio epistolaris, 1724), defended this procedure. Thereupon he was suspended and deprived of all claims to his professorship and academic honors.

About the same time, Abp. Thomas Philippe d'Alsace de Boussu submitted to him three questions: (1) whether he adhered sincerely to the confession of faith of Pius IV and was prepared to make it again; (2) whether he was prepared to swear upon the formulary of Alexander VII, in conformity with the Bull Vineam Domini (1705); (3) whether he accepted without reservation the constitution Unigenitus (1713) and rejected all theses condemned therein. Van Espen responded that he would agree to the first point, but could not to the other two, and appealed to the Governess of the then Austrian Netherlands. But he was sentenced and condemned, and rather than recant, he fled to the northern Netherlands, first to Maastricht, then to Amersfoort, where most Jansenist refugees from France and Belgium had settled. A few months afterward he died.

Bibliography: Scripta omnia, 5 v. (Louvain-Paris 1753–68). F. LAURENT, Van Espen (Brussels 1860). H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 4: 12181–84. K. WEINZIERL, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1107. J. LECLERC, Catholicisme 4:445. G. LECLERC, Z. B. Van Espen et l'autorité ecclésiastique (Zurich 1964). M. NUTTINCK, La vie et l'oeuvre de Zeger–Bernard Van Espen (Louvain 1969). G. COOMAN, R. G. W. HUYSMANS, B. WAUTERS, eds., Zeger-Bernard Van Espen (1646–1728) (Louvain 2001).

[F. MAASS]

ESPENCE, CLAUDE TOGNIEL DE

Theologian; b. Châlons-sur-Marne, 1511; d. Paris, Oct. 4, 1571. He was rector of the Sorbonne in 1540. Because of his rich qualities he was named in 1544 by Francis I to the theological commission established to prepare agenda for the Council of TRENT, to which he was sent in 1547 as the representative of Henry II. In 1561 he took part in the religious colloquium at Poissy, and because of his spirit of moderation and conciliation was attacked by Protestants and Catholics alike. His most important works were: De eucharistia eiusque adoratione (Paris 1573), Institution du prince chrétien (Paris 1548), Traicté contre l'erreur vieil et renouvelé des prédestinés (Paris 1548).

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae (3d ed. Innsbruck 1903–13) 3:17–19. A. HUMBERT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, A. VACANT et al. (Paris 1903–50) 5.1:603–605. H. M. FÉRET, Catholicisme. Hier, aujourd'hui et demain, ed. G. JACQUEMET (Paris 1947–) 4:445–446. A. BIGELMAIR, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAHNER (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1107.

[J. H. MILLER]

ESPINAR, ALONSO DE

Franciscan missionary in the Antilles; place and date of birth unknown; d. at sea, 1513. A friar by this name was vicar of the Franciscan friary of S. Antonio del Jobre in Galicia in 1499, and he may be the same friar who came in 1502 to Santo Domingo with Governor Ovando as the superior of 17 Franciscans. At any rate, Espinar and his friars began the work of evangelization of the New World. In Santo Domingo he began the famous friary of San Francisco, which became the headquarters of the province of the Holy Cross. This was the first province founded by any religious order in the New World, and Espinar seems to have been named the provincial. He helped found the first hospital, La Concepción, in November 1503. He guided the expansion of the friars to Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Jamaica and to the South American continent. He favored the elementary education of the sons of the caciques and other native leaders. By 1512 these students were so numerous that Espinar had shipped from Spain for their use 2,000 primers of reading and writing. In the commotion that resulted in 1511 from the sermon of the Dominican Antonio Montesino, who condemned to hell all Spaniards who held natives, Espinar took a more moderate view and helped to write the laws of Burgos (1512-13) that regulated the labor of the natives. For this he merited the vituperation of Las Casas, although even a prejudiced witness was forced to confess that Espinar was "a good religious and a venerable person" and "that the king had already formed a high opinion of him." On a trip to Spain, Espinar requested 40 friars from the king for the work in the New World. The request was readily granted, and the Crown agreed to defray all expenses of the outfitting and of the trip. Espinar was leading eight of these friars to Santo Domingo when he died, as the documents say "in the middle of the sea" and was buried there.

Bibliography: A. LÓPEZ, "Fray Alonso de Espinar, misionero en las Indias," Archivo ibero-americano 6 (1916) 160–167. A. S. TI-BESAR, "The Franciscan Province of the Holy Cross of Española, 1505–1559," The Americas 13 (1956–57) 377–397.

[L. G. CANEDO]

ESPINAREDA, PEDRO DE

Pioneer Franciscan missionary in the north of Mexico; b. place and date unknown; d. Zacatecas, Mexico, 1576. Espinareda first appeared in history in the late summer of 1553 traveling from Salamanca in Spain to embark as a Franciscan missionary to the New World. In 1562 he was superior of a small band of Franciscans engaged in settling the nomadic Tepehuan people in the lowlands of Durango and introducing them to the Egyptian plow, which they still use to this day. From his home base at Nombre de Dios he spearheaded the founding of new mission fields farther north. In 1566 he made his historic journey eastward along the northern rim of Spanish conquest to Panuco on the Gulf of Mexico, thereby occasioning further expeditions in that direction and arousing interest in a connecting route between the mines of northwest Mexico and the seaport of Panuco. He was appointed the first commissary of the Inquisition in the newly founded Kingdom of New Vizcaya in 1563, and lived to see his small band of friars grow to become the Custody of Zacatecas, the northern jurisdiction of the Franciscans in Mexico. Tradition tells us that he was the first superior of the custody.

Bibliography: J. L. MECHAM, Francisco de Ibarra and Nueva Vizcaya (Durham 1927). J. I. GALLEGOS, Durango colonial, 1563–1821 (Mexico City 1960).

[I. GALLEGOS]

ESPINOSA, ISIDRO FÉLIX DE

Franciscan missionary and historian; b. Querétaro, Mexico, November 1679; d. there, February 1755. Espinosa entered the Franciscan Order at Querétaro March 18, 1696, and was ordained in February 1703. When sent to the missions in northeast Mexico just below Texas, Espinosa soon became a promoter of reopening the old Franciscan missions. A preliminary exploratory trip (April 1709), of which he wrote his diario, helped win a favorable decision, although Espinosa himself was sent back to the college as master of novices. After 1714 Espinosa returned north and with Fray Antonio MARGIL helped to advance the mission frontier to the border of French Louisiana, founding six missions. A French advance in 1718 destroyed these promising centers. In 1721 Espinosa went back to Texas with the Marqués de Aguayo, but his election as guardian of the college forced him to leave and he never returned. He devoted the rest of his life to literary and administrative tasks. In 1726 he was appointed official chronicler of the college of Querétaro and later of all the mission colleges of Mexico. Espinosa's published works are numerous, but the more important are: El peregrino septentrional atlante: delineado en la exemplarissima vida del Venerable Padre Fray Antonio Margil de Jesús (Mexico 1737), the basic life of Margil; Chrónica de la Provincia de Michoacán, unfinished but printed in 1899; and Chrónica. . . de todos los colegios de Propaganda Fide de esta Nueva España de misioneros franciscanos (Mexico 1746). This is the most important work, written in a fluent style carefully documented. A posthumous biography of his brother, the Oratorian Juan Antonio Pérez de Espinosa, was printed in 1942.

Bibliography: I. F. DE ESPINOSA, Crónica de los Colegios de Propaganda Fide de la Nueva España, ed., L. GÓMEZ CANEDO (Franciscan Historical Classics 2; new ed. Washington 1964).

[L. G. CANEDO]

ESQUEDA RAMÍREZ, PEDRO, ST.

Martyr, priest; b. Apr. 29, 1887, San Juan de Los Lago, Jalisco, Mexico; d. Nov. 22, 1927, San Miguel el Alto, near Teocaltitlán. Pedro Esqueda, a precocious child, began his formal education at age four. He entered the seminary of Guadalajara (1902), which was seized and closed before he completed his studies. Returning to his home parish, he served as a deacon until his ordination was arranged in 1916 at which time he was named pastor. His passion for catechesis inspired Pedro to found several centers for training catechists. When the persecution of the Church worsened in 1926, Pedro went into hiding, moving from house to house until he was captured in hiding by federales on Nov. 18, 1927. They beat the priest, held him incommunicado in the abbey, tortured him for the next few days, and shot him in Teocaltitlán. He was both beatified (Nov. 22, 1992) and canonized (May 21, 2000) with Cristobal MAGALLANES [see GUADALAJARA (MEXICO), MARTYRS OF, SS.] by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: May 25 (Mexico).

Bibliography: J. CARDOSO, Los mártires mexicanos (Mexico City 1953). J. DÍAZ ESTRELLA, El movimiento cristero: sociedad y conflicto en los Altos de Jalisco (México, D.F. 1979).

[K. I. RABENSTEIN]

ESQUIÚ, MAMERTO

Franciscan bishop of Córdoba, patriot, theologian, and orator, whose reputation for sanctity has led to his being considered for beatification; b. San José, Catamarca, Argentina, 1826; d. Córdoba, 1883. He was perhaps the most important Catholic thinker of his country in the 19th century; and his thought, following the tradition of his order, was Neothomistic (see NEOSCHOLASTICISM AND NEOTHOMISM). Influenced by Bonaventure, Augustine, and Thomas Aquinas, he tried to stimulate the study of metaphysics. He held that the universe is the revelation of God, whose existence it demonstrates, showing the metaphysical supremacy of Thomas over Aristotle. Dedicating himself to the study of the Scriptures, he explained through them the mysteries of justification and of the laws and grace according to St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM and the commentaries of St. Thomas on St. Paul; by the Pauline method he resolved the theme of sin and freedom (libertas a peccato)—this permitted him to make a thorough criticism of the basis of the liberal thesis that freedom is always the "servant of love." In Christology he was influenced by the Fathers and also by Melchor Cano; in ethics, by St. Alphonsus Liguori. Among the moderns he was well acquainted with Balmes, Donoso Cortés, Bossuet, and the French apologists. On that foundation, he conceived the plan of a theology of history involving the moments of divine conservation and the reparation by the Word, which is historical time; that, in turn, includes the mission of the Apostles (Gospel), the doctrine (Epistles), and the institution of history in Christ. Thus, Christ is the center of society, and the people as such are historically responsible. The influence of De civitate dei and of Italian and even German neoscholasticism (Cornoldi) is evident. Man is social, and society is a moral being linked to the infinite; accordingly obedience is a duty, and civil authority is legitimate; but since at bottom the Word sustains everything, the Gospel must be the ultimate law of nations.

Esquiú acquired national fame for his "Sermon on the Constitution" (1853), in which he explained the difficulties of submission but also (after a half-century of wars and anarchy) exhorted it. Sovereignty, he said, resides in the people only instrumentally because their origin is from God. In a Catholic people the State must be united to the Church, and he concluded by stating the Marian vocation of America. Esquiú was a mystic whose unitive experiments can be observed in his Diario; however, it is not possible to learn whether he reached the transforming union. He was a model bishop and an apostle of confession, who exercised a decisive influence on the organization of Argentina. His unbounded charity and his humility have led the Argentines to consider him a saint. The cause for his beatification was begun Jan. 11, 1952.

Bibliography: M. ESQUIÚ, Sermones, discursos, cartas pastorales, oraciones fúnebres, etc., correspondencia . . ., ed. A. ORTIZ 2 v. (Córdoba, Argen. 1883). M. GÁLVEZ, Vida de fray Mamerto Esquiú (2d ed. Buenos Aires 1944). A. CATURELLI, El pensamiento de Mamerto Esquiú (Córdoba, Arg. 1954).

[A. CATURELLI]

ESSENCE

The word "essence" (Lat. essentia) is related to the Latin term ens (being), which itself implies a relationship to esse (to be). Essence is what is, what exists. In this sense, it designates a concrete, singular reality in the act of EXISTENCE. Essence is, moreover, a substantial reality (see SUBSTANCE). It is not, properly speaking, that which modifies an existing substance, such as weight, color, and operation, but that which exists in itself, that which sustains itself in existence without the aid of a substratum that receives and supports it. In fact, color, weight, and the like, do not exist: they are accidents; it is through them that substance, or essence, exists as colored, heavy, and so on. (see ACCIDENT).

In another sense, essence answers the questions: In what does a particular existing reality consist? What is its DEFINITION? Taken in this meaning, essence expresses the QUIDDITY of a thing, that by which it is immediately intelligible and on which the human mind can focus—because it presents an immobile aspect, the stable FORM of what it really and fully is, viz, a THING.

Since the notion of essence has undergone an evolution in the history of thought and is not uniformly regarded by all philosophers, this article first explains the historical development of the notion, and then treats a problem of interest to scholastic thinkers, viz, the multiplication and individuation of essences. The more difficult historical and doctrinal questions concerning the relationship between essence and existence are treated elsewhere (see ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE).

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

The history of the concept of essence may be conveniently divided into periods corresponding to Greek, medieval, modern, and contemporary thought.

Greek thought. For PLATO, essences are the proper object, the only authentic object, of human knowledge.

All else, that is, the world of sensible and moving appearances, is pure illusion: unintelligible in its constant mobility, it really is not; it does not exist. What exists is for Plato the essence of things divested of the various modes they manifest here below; this is realized in an intelligible world separated from the present one, where man may find it by reminiscence. The essence of horse—for example, what exists absolutely as horse, or horse in itself belongs to the world of archetypal Forms or Ideas, of which the horse sensed here below is only a deceptive partaker, an illusory reflection. Only essence is, with its characteristics of perfection and stability.

Such an idealistic theory found its refutation in the moderate realism of ARISTOTLE, one of Plato's disciples. Aristotle did not admit that what things are and what the mind perceives as unchanged in them exist apart in another world. Rather he extracted essences, definitions, and beings from this separated world and located them in the concrete realities of sensible experience. For Aristotle, essences say what things are; they are not what exists. What exists is concrete essence, that is, essence determined by adventitious secondary elements that make it individual and capable of existence. Horse in itself does not exist, but only particular horses with the essence of horse realized in them.

According to Aristotle, one may speak of essence also as common to all individuals of the same SPECIES. This essence, expressed by the definition, exists formally only in the mind, which abstracts from the individuating notes that clothe an essence in extramental reality (see AB-STRACTION). The universal character that essence receives from the mind is itself based on the real presence of the essence in things existing under an individualized mode.

Medieval thought. It is this latter theory that prevailed in Christian philosophy under the name of moderate REALISM, and to which St. THOMAS AQUINAS lent his support. The beings of the world, be they spiritual or material, are none other than realized ideas. Such realization, however, is no longer in the manner described by Plato, but according to a presence immanent within things and through PARTICIPATION in the divine essence, eminent model of all that exists. Essences come into being by way of creation or divine efficiency. The divine essence in its transcendent intelligibility is thus the remote foundation of every created essence.

St. AUGUSTINE was the first to develop the theory of divine ideas as principles and causes of the ideas or essences incarnate in things. The divine ideas are nothing other than the divine essence itself, inasmuch as this is remotely and variously imitable by the beings of nature. This Augustinian conception of ideas is obviously different from that of Plato. The Thomistic theory of moderate realism did not succeed in rallying all minds. Fourteenth-century philosophers such as WILLIAM OF OCKHAM and NICHOLAS OF AUTRECOURT asserted that the universal essences said to be abstracted from individuals are merely fictions. They refer simply to names, labels that are fixed to individuals of a certain, apparently homogeneous series, but to which no reality corresponds within things. These philosophers have been called nominalists.

Other thinkers, called conceptualists, did not go as far as the nominalists and regarded the common essence as a pure concept, a simple idea in men's minds without any foundation in nature. For them, the mind constructs this idea, starting from a certain sensible similarity, but without anything in existing beings that is really common to them. These two theories of NOMINALISM and CONCEP-TUALISM gave rise to the famous problem of UNIVER-SALS, which is concerned with the ontological status of the essences of things. The position of St. Thomas is realistic when compared to these theories, while avoiding Plato's exaggerated realism that attributes existence to the universal essence as such.

Modern thought. The fundamental positions adopted with regard to universals are found, with variations, in the philosophical systems of modern thought.

Nominalism underlies all the sensist and empirical systems. For J. S. MILL and D. HUME principally, the real is essentially diverse and is reduced to the purely sensible data of experience. The common essence, which is confused with nature, is no longer perceptible for them. They do not speak of species of things, but only of collections of individuals. Conceptualism takes its roots also and is found with various modalities in the different forms of IDEALISM, ranging from methodical to critical and absolute idealism.

Immanuel KANT was the first, after the success of EMPIRICISM, to admit to the exigencies of universality and determinism in the knowledge of the real. But for him universal essences are not in things, or, at least, man does not reach them in themselves. He grasps only the PHE-NOMENA; the NOUMENA, which are things in themselves, escape him. Thus the reality of nature comes to him necessarily by sensation, but is known by him only through the a priori forms of sensitivity and the categories of his mind. The essences of beings are reduced to purely subjective constructions that man imposes upon the formless matter of his knowledge. Extramental reality is itself no longer reached; all is contained formally within the knowing subject.

After Kant, the great German idealists, J. G. FICHTE, F. W. J. SCHELLING, and G. W. F. HEGEL, rejecting Kant's "thing-in-itself" as a caput mortuum, placed all the reality of the world in mind or spirit. For Hegel, especially, essences are completely within man and come from him alone. They express, in their dialectical oppositions and provisional resolutions, the development of the human logos realizing itself progressively to become the Absolute Spirit, God. The Hegelian "concept" is certainly not to be confused with an abstract essence; it is a concrete concept in permanent evolution, but it is completely interiorized according to the demands of a radical idealism.

A salutary return to things themselves occurred with E. HUSSERL. Idealism had been given the lie by the brutal realities of World War I. A reassertion of INTENTIONALI-TY, borrowed by F. BRENTANO from the scholastics, attempted to bring men back into contact with the real external world. The French thinkers Louis LAVELLE and René Le Senne, originators of the "philosophy of the spirit," also attempted to escape from the grip of idealism, and they made way for contemporary EXISTENTIAL-ISM.

Contemporary thought. Karl JASPERS and Martin HEIDEGGER, in Germany, and Jean Paul SARTRE, in France, continued the existentialist movement with its realistic tendency, as did M. MERLEAU-PONTY. These philosophers identified themselves as phenomenologists, and their preoccupation was to go to things themselves as these appear to the mind. They were at the same time fascinated by being, and they professed an ontology wherein being does not come from man; it is really opposed to the grasp of intelligence and is far from being confused with mind. Objective being is seen by them as a sort of milieu that is presented to the mind, but about which nothing can be said except that it is what it is. It excludes from its aggregate all types of distinction, of causality, and of relation: there is being, and that is all. What happens, then, to the essences that seem to divide being into determined portions, into limiting and circumscribing natures? Heidegger's answer is that being, the source of all, precisely as "historical" has its effect on the concrete beings of nature. Its effect is not in the manner of the Kantian categories, which are rejected, but no explanation is given as to how the ontological parceling demanded by experience is brought about. While being enjoys an extramental status, essences appear as associated only with the workings of the knowing mind.

The same difficulty of making philosophical contact with concrete reality exists in the ontological phenomenology of Sartre. The distinction of beings, and thus of essences, presents itself to the thinker as an effect of a sort of "decompression" of being that the mind carries out by its ability to negate. The mind, which is endowed with freedom, is in fact a being-for-itself that cannot be reduced to the massive being-in-itself of things; it has the power of denying itself, of annihilating, by a type of differentiation that results in the "ontic" multiplicity of the beings of nature. This solution does not completely escape from idealism—at least the type of idealism that makes essences a simple determination of man's free activity.

Karl MARX, in complete opposition to the idealist position of Hegel, placed dialectic in matter, which thenceforth became for him the only reality in the world. "Essences" evolve in matter according to the process analyzed by Hegel; the knowledge man has of essence is only a reflection, a superstructure. This explanation is incapable of transcending the limitations of dialectical and historical MATERIALISM, with its restrictive view of what is real.

MULTIPLICATION AND INDIVIDUATION

For scholastics, one of the key problems relating to the notion of essence is that of explaining how one essence is shared or multiplied by many individuals. Since essence itself can be applied variously to immaterial entities such as angels, to entities that are composites of matter and spirit such as men, and to purely material entities such as minerals, the different ways in which essence is individualized in each of these categories are here explained, beginning with a consideration of the last category.

Material beings. Such entities appear to man, on the one hand, as obviously individual. On the other hand, they manifest common characteristics in their properties and activities that permit one to classify them scientifically into species, and, in some instances, to formulate certain traits of their underlying nature in definitions. Since essence is both what exists individually and what is common to individuals of the same species, one may, by a kind of abstraction, have a concept of essence that says nothing of the singularity with which it is cloaked within individuals, nor of the universality the mind confers on essence when considering it as present in such individuals. In this manner, essence is neither universal nor singular but is itself an abstraction in which only its constitutive elements are retained.

If one envisages now the multiplicity of individuals having the same specific essence, since the species is given by the form—which is like a number and is not susceptible of more or less without ceasing to be itself individuality and multiplication can come only from the matter in which the form is received. The material form is not individuated by itself, since, in its contents, it presents only common principles; nor is it individuated by its accidents, either its own or those of the composite, for these are ontologically posterior to the individual essence. Only primary matter can furnish a principle of individuation for form (see MATTER AND FORM; INDIVIDUATION).

Matter alone lends itself to potential determinations relative to a QUANTITY about to be realized, which itself is the immediate principle of multiplication and number. Number is, in fact, founded on the numerical unity that accompanies actual and continuous quantity. This quantitative unity must be carefully distinguished from ontological UNITY, which is a transcendental aspect of being (see MULTITUDE). Discontinuous quantity receives its proper unity from an essence that is individualized by matter and is made one by its ontological unity. It is by this quantity, primordial accident of substance, that the individual, indivisible in itself, comes to be in the world of space and time.

Spiritual beings. Completely otherwise is the multiplication of created immaterial substances or angels; here quantity plays no role, and yet such substances are perfectly one with an ontological unity. This unity is relative to essence, which fully realizes a creative idea absolutely distinct from all others. It represents a degree of being that stands, in relation to existence, as a really distinct potency that receives and limits existence. Divine existence or esse divinum, which in God is supreme act, is thus participated according to the very measure that itself determines the essence. Act and potency are therefore components of all creatures, and at the level of substance itself. Here there is no longer informed matter; real essence plays the role of potency with respect to the act of being. God alone is simple. The immaterial creature is not only composed of an existing reality and its negative limitation; it is really composed of two distinct elements.

Individuation in the angels is thus not effected by a type of matter, as some have held. The ontological idea that such an essence represents, with its full richness, realizes itself in a single individual who is, henceforth, at the same time both species and individual when compared to what takes place in the material world. An angel, for example, Gabriel, is alone in his species, realizing this wholly at the level of singular being that is proper to his essence. Individuation thus proceeds, not from existence, but from essence; the latter adequately corresponds, in its unicity, to a creative idea of God that expresses, without real distinction in Him, the singular mode according to which the divine essence chooses to make itself participable.

The multiplication of spiritual substances has no other source, and their number—better indicated by the term "multitude"—transcends the entire order of quantity. Multitude is proper to individuated immaterial being: ontologically it expresses nothing more than a group of spiritual beings, which man conceives as analogous to groups of material and numerical entities.

Human beings. Moving finally to individuation within the human species, one finds on a vaster scale what has already been noted concerning purely material species. The human soul, taken essentially and according to its specific definition, is something like the separated substance of the angel; it represents an idea of God that is rich in virtualities. But, in contrast to what takes place in the realm of the immaterial, this idea, to be fully realized-because situated on an ontological level that implies a substantial relation to matter-requires a number of individuals of the same essence, each sharing in the richness of the essence only to the measure determined for it by the particular capacity of the matter it must animate. Thus all human souls are of the same species; their essence is the same specifically. They become incarnate, while retaining their essential spirituality, in the portions of matter that individualize them through their particular relation to quantity. Primary matter and a spiritual soul thus constitute a singular essence, a limiting capacity of esse that is one in the order of existence and is numerically one in the quantity of the actually existing composite. The number of men is a number in the proper sense, by reason of the human body that situates individuals in space and time.

What distinguishes spiritual souls such as that of man from infrahuman forms, both living and nonliving, is this: souls individualized by their relation to quantified matter retain their individual character, with their own SUBSISTENCE, at death. They do so because they are made in this way at the moment of their creation and infusion into matter; their number, in this state, more closely approaches the multitude of spiritual substances who have no matter in their constitution.

See Also: ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE; EXISTENCE; ACT; POTENCY; POTENCY AND ACT; IDEA; CONCEPT; NATURE.

Bibliography: A. GAZZANA, Enciclopedia filosofica, 4 v. (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:92–103. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe, 3 v. (4th ed. Berlin 1927–30) 3:538–543. É. H. GILSON, L'Être et l'essence (2d ed. Paris 1962). M. D. ROLAND-GOSSELIN, Le "De ente et essentia" de saint Thomas d'Aquin (Kain, Belg. 1926). R. JOLIVET, Les Sources de l'idéalisme (Paris 1936). M. J. ADLER, "The Hierarchy of Essence," Review of Metaphysics 6 (1952–53): 3–30.

[M. CORVEZ]

ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE

The relationship between ESSENCE and EXISTENCE poses a problem that was much discussed and controvert-

ed in the thirteenth century and continues to be important in the development of scholastic and Thomistic metaphysics. This article surveys the historical origins of the problem, examines in detail the solution proposed by St. Thomas Aquinas, sketches the use made of the doctrine in the Thomistic tradition, and concludes with a briefer account of other solutions.

Historical origins. The remote origins of the controversy over essence and existence are to be found in Greek philosophy, although the problem of the precise relationship between the two concepts was never stated there with the clarity to be found in its later formulations. For PLATO, the problem could not exist, for he conceived essence as the perfect and stable object of the intellect, devoid of the imperfections and changing character of the world of sense. For him, essence alone exists in the strict sense, and this in the world of Ideas; all else that is perceived by the senses is merely an illusion and the occasion for referring back to the world of separated substances or essences.

The rejection by ARISTOTLE of this teaching of his master led him to adumbrate the real distinction between essence and existence, if not to affirm it outright. In his view, essences do not exist in a separated universe but are to be found in the sensible beings of this world, where they have a concrete and singular mode of existence. The essence of horse exists in this individual horse, with the accretion of its particular qualities and of all other accidental determinations that make it to be this singular existent thing. There seems little doubt that, for Aristotle, essence and existence are distinct concepts, since he holds that "what human nature is and the fact that man exists are not the same thing" (Anal. post. 92b 10-11). Whether his distinction is real or merely rational, however, is disputed (see DISTINCTION, KINDS OF). It may be that he affirms only that the singular essence man experiences is in a state of actual existence, and that this serves to differentiate it from the purely possible essence that man's mind may happen to conceive. [For the realistic interpretation, see G. Manser, Das Wesen des Thomismus (3d ed. Fribourg 1949) 510.]

Real Distinction. Among the Arab commentators on Aristotle, AVICENNA first brought the problem into focus by teaching explicitly that existence is a kind of ACCIDENT OF ESSENCE, although not in the sense that existence comes to essence as a predicamental accident comes to substance. Rather, Avicenna holds that essence, as ideally conceived, involves an element of necessity, whereas it itself is merely possible when viewed in relation to extramental existence. Existence comes to an essence under the action of the efficient cause, such as is found in the order of nature in GENERATION-CORRUPTION or as is taught in the biblical account of CREATION. Thus, for Avicenna, essence and existence must be really distinct one from the other and not merely distinct in a rational or conceptual way. AVERROËS, it may be noted, disagreed with Avicenna's teaching on this point, reproaching Avicenna for proposing as philosophy what was essentially a theological doctrine of creation.

The first of the scholastics to adopt as his own the position of Avicenna was WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE. Although a severe critic of much of Avicenna's thought, William accepted his teaching on the real distinction and employed it in his De universo creaturarum as a proof of the finitude and dependence of creatures (1.3.26; 2.2.8). Gradually the list of adherents grew. To it were added the names of such luminaries of the thirteenth century as St. ALBERT THE GREAT and St. Thomas Aquinas. But the list never became all-inclusive; an appreciable number of thinkers of the thirteenth and subsequent centuries continued to reject this manner of distinguishing between essence and existence.

Opposition to Real Distinction. Foremost among those who opposed the teaching of Avicenna were the heterodox Aristotelians who developed the doctrines of Averroës into the movement that came to be known as Latin AVERROISM. But this was not an isolated group. Certain thirteenth-century theologians of the Augustinian school, among whom were the Dominicans ULRIC OF STRASSBURG, THEODORIC OF FREIBERG, and HARVEY NE-DELLEC and the Franciscans PETER JOHN OLIVI and RICH-ARD OF MIDDLETON, took a firm position against the Avicennian thesis. Like the Latin Averroists, these theologians were motivated by a loyalty to their traditions; they viewed with alarm the tendency to incorporate into the science of theology elements drawn from Islamic and Aristotelian sources. Their opposition, however, although indeed embracing the real distinction, touched it only as part of the larger problem. Not until the advent of Giles of Rome and his controversy with Henry of Ghent did the question of essence and existence become in itself a major issue.

Giles vs. Henry. To GILES OF ROME must go the credit for conferring on the problem a special prominence, for it was he who raised it from its previous ancillary role and treated it on its own merits. Giles saw essence and existence as farther apart than did St. Thomas. For St. Thomas, the two are really distinct; for Giles, they are also separable. Furthermore, Giles insisted, to the annoyance of all who disagreed, that the real distinction is fundamental to philosophy and theology. Without it—and on this point N. del Prado holds that Giles's position is identical to that of St. Thomas—the way was barred against proof of such basic doctrines as creation, the ANALOGY OF BEING, and the distinction of substance and accidents. Never had so clear and so deliberate a challenge on this issue been hurled, and it did not want for an adversary willing to accept.

In a series of quodlibets (1st, 10th, 11th) directly aimed at Giles's position, HENRY OF GHENT countered with his teaching of a rational distinction between essence and existence. And along with his rational distinction, he implicitly rejected, as did all who subscribed to the rational distinction between essence and existence, the major role attributed to the real distinction by Giles. In this teaching he was joined by GODFREY OF FON-TAINES, by PETER OF AUVERGNE, and later by John Duns Scotus.

Thomistic doctrine. Although Giles is undoubtedly responsible for bringing the issue to the fore, it is not he, but St. THOMAS AQUINAS, who is recognized as the most important protagonist of the real distinction. Nor is this situation surprising, given the preeminence in theology and philosophy that is rightly accorded Aquinas. In fact, this preeminence not only guaranteed Aquinas a primacy among the defenders of the real distinction, but it constituted a source of embarrassment for those who favored the opposite view. This has not, of course, done away with opposition; in fact it has been the occasion for peculiar maneuvers to which opponents have resorted in an effort to offset St. Thomas's influence.

M. Chossat, for example, sought to erase the problem itself by seriously challenging the traditional understanding of St. Thomas's position, maintaining that Aquinas himself did not teach the real distinction and that the so-called Thomistic position was in fact borrowed from Giles. But with the unearthing of evidence to the contrary through the historical studies of P. MANDONNET and M. GRABMANN this maneuver failed to convince.

Another position, traditionally Suarezian, consists in admitting that the rational distinction is in direct conflict with St. Thomas's teaching and then minimizing the force of the opposition by questioning St. Thomas's competence in dealing with the question. This is the approach of A. d'Ales, who, though accepting the Thomistic view as authentically St. Thomas's, states: "We believe that we must reject the real distinction of essence and existence as the foundation of all metaphysics, but we do not hesitate to affirm that it is the indispensable basis for a thoroughly Thomistic metaphysics." The challenge to Thomistic metaphysics embodied in this statement, namely, that it is a system whose fundamental position is vulnerable, does not find the Thomist submissive. Yet it does corroborate the traditional Thomistic stand by its admission that St. Thomas actually taught the real distinction.

Source of the Doctrine. One looks in vain through the writings of St. Thomas for a treatment of the relationship between essence and existence comparable to that given by Giles. Aquinas does discuss the relationship, but always in contexts that are devoted explicitly to the solutions of other problems. Yet there is abundant evidence of St. Thomas's teaching and his abiding consistency in proposing it. Maturity brought about a shift in St. Thomas's position on some matters, but in the matter of the real distinction the thought of St. Thomas remained unchanged throughout his scholarly career.

More interesting than the number of times that St. Thomas spoke of the real distinction is the question of the source whence he drew his conviction about the distinction. Here two possibilities suggest themselves, one clearly theological, the other philosophical. The first is the text from Exodus 3.14 ("God said to Moses: I am Who am"); the second, the doctrine on potency and act (see POTENCY AND ACT). The fact that the greater number of appeals to the real distinction occur in a purely theological context seems to make a good case for the first alternative. That God in a sense defined Himself in the terms "I am Who am" could very well be the source whence St. Thomas drew not only the inspiration to examine the creature in the light of essence and existence but also the assurance of the correctness of his position.

Yet the claim of potency and act is not without merit. Its strongest title to recognition is the constancy with which, and the contextual circumstances in which, St. Thomas the theologian associates potency and act with essence and existence. In the theological works in which he asserts the distinction of essence and existence, he makes frequent mention of the teaching on potency and act. This association of the two is not introduced as a proof of the real distinction. Rather, it is made to emphasize the fact that the essence-existence relation is an instance of the potency-act relation. This is significant, since it reveals that for St. Thomas the two dualities are to be compared with each other as the less known (essence-existence) and the more known (potency-act). Hence the latter could well be a source, if not the principal source, of the surety that distinguishes St. Thomas's commitment to the former.

Formulation of the Teaching. Whenever St. Thomas touches on the relationship between essence and existence—and the number of occasions is impressive—the object of his investigation remains unvaried, namely, the actual existent. His analysis of that object always reaches the same conclusion, although admittedly there are variations in his manner of expressing it. These variations range from (1) explicit identification of the distinction as real (In Boeth. de hebdom. 2.32; De ver. 27.1 ad 8), to

(2) implicit identification of the reality of the distinction (Quodl. 9.4.1.; In 2 sent. 16.1.2. ad 5), to (3) the simple statement of a distinction (In 1 sent. 8.4.1 sed contra 3; 8.4.2 ad 1; De ver. 10.8 ad 12). Such statements are troublesome only if wrenched out of context and understood in an absolute sense. As Aquinas employs them, they are but incidental to the development of some other point of doctrine; upon analysis, the content of each statement is seen to conform to the requirements of the principal question under examination.

St. Thomas's fuller teaching on the real distinction may be summarized as follows. Neither essence nor existence is a THING, nor is either to be identified with the actually existent thing, even though there could be no such thing without benefit of both. In themselves they are principles of being whence the actual existent thing is constituted (see PRINCIPLE). Each of these principles is incapable by itself of producing the total result, the actual existent. To effect the actual existent, each principle requires what the other contributes.

Viewed in isolation from existence, essence signifies a mode or manner according to which reality might be fashioned. Or better still—for the essence about which St. Thomas speaks is the essence of the actually existent thing—it stands for all the modes by which reality manifests itself. As a principle of the actual existing thing, it is the element that provides a full explanation of the whatness, or QUIDDITY, of the existent as being, that is, as susceptible of the formal act of being (esse). Existence, for its part, makes not the smallest addition to that whatness; moreover, there is no need that it should, since essence provides the complete explanation in its own order. The contribution of existence is in an order entirely different, but complementary, to that wherein essence exercises its influence.

Existence is not simply a factor; it is the primary component of actuality. It is not a FORM but an ACT. In fact, it is act par excellence, the act that perfectly fulfills the notion of act in its most formal sense. For whereas the form as act finalizes in a qualified sense, existence finalizes completely. It is the act that effects the release of essence from a most remote hold on actuality; prior to this release, essence's only claim to actuality is its susceptibility to receive it.

Do the notions of essence and existence represent for St. Thomas reflections of reality itself, or are they notions born solely of the mind's consideration? After the time of St. Thomas, as has been seen, two answers were given to this question. On the one hand, Henry of Ghent maintained that any plurality in this matter was a product of reason alone, that in point of fact there was only a real unity; on the other hand, Giles of Rome insisted not only on a real plurality but also on the separability of the two components. According to Giles, essence and existence are not only distinct independently of the mind's consideration but also capable of existential survival in the event of being severed one from the other. Neither represents St. Thomas's doctrine; Giles departs from it by excess, Henry by defect.

First, St. Thomas saw essence and existence as more than rationally distinct. Second, he never thought of conferring separability on them, either individually or conjunctively. For him, such an attribution would be a complete distortion of the character of essence and existence as principles. He taught merely that the two are really distinct and that their otherness is not the result of reason's consideration alone; reason does not make essence and existence to be two, but discovers that they are two. Despite this otherness, neither can survive the dissolution of their unification. Once their hold on each other is loosened, no trace of either remains in the order of the actual existent.

Supporting Arguments. St. Thomas has recourse to four separate arguments in the comparatively few instances in which he sought to substantiate his position on the real distinction: 1. The argument from the noninclusion of existence within the comprehensive content of essence (De ente 4; De ver. 10.12; In 2 sent., 1.1.1, 3.1.1). 2. The argument that existence, as the difference distinguishing things that communicate in a generic (or specific) unity, must be really distinct from essence, or quiddity (In 1 sent. 8.4.2; De ver. 27.1 ad 8). 3. The argument from the identity of essence and existence in God to the distinction of the two in creatures. The real distinction is here emphasized as signifying the basic and universal mode of composition that removes all creatures from the level of perfect simplicity that is proper solely to God (De ente 4; In 1 sent. 8.5.1-2; In 2 sent. 3.1.1; Quodl. 9.4.1). 4. The argument involving the notion of PARTICIPATION. Any perfection that is itself common and intrinsically unrestricted but is present in things in a limited fashion must be really distinct from the things in which it is found; this is the case of the perfection of existence (In 2 sent. 16.1.1 ad 3, 37.1.2; De ver. 21.5; In Boeth. de hebdom. 2.31-35).

Although the notions of potency and act are frequently interwoven into the fabric of these arguments, these notions are never of major significance. But wherever potency and act are associated with essence and existence, St. Thomas makes no effort to substantiate the reality of the former composition. This procedure is unintelligible save on the supposition that the reality of the mode of composition of potency and act is better known than that of essence and existence. Indeed, the quasi equation Aquinas makes in the same contexts between essence and existence and potency and act sheds more light on the former than on the latter. To see essence as an instance of potency and existence as a kind of act enables one to understand the unity of the composite of essence and existence and to penetrate to some degree into the notion of existence under the formality of act.

Thomistic tradition. Throughout St. Thomas's writings, the appearance of the doctrine on essence and existence seems always dictated by circumstances other than the doctrine itself. Yet the frequency with which Aquinas made use of this doctrine and the prominence of the contexts in which he employed it are clear expressions both of his conviction and of the high value he placed on it. Nor were these facts lost sight of in his school. Taking their cue from St. Thomas's evaluation of the doctrine, but resetting it in a philosophical context and making explicit what St. Thomas had been content to treat implicitly, Thomists present the doctrine on the real distinction as an indispensable key to a realistic philosophy of being. Within THOMISM, this doctrine is seen as (1) offering a true image of the metaphysical structure of the actual existent, (2) providing a rational basis for the mind's ascent to God, and (3) providing a proof of God's transcendence. [For specific details on the teachings of various individuals, see F. J. Roensch, Early Thomistic School (Dubuque, Iowa 1964); G. Manser, op. cit.]

Metaphysical Structure of the Actual Existent. The actual existent is a composite of essence and existence. Both are indispensable elements, each making valuable though distinct contributions to the actual existent. A primacy, however, must be granted existence. It is the sole source of the actuality that differentiates the actual existent from merely possible being. Though existence adds nothing to the formal content of essence, essence of itself is incapable of going beyond the range of possibility. Furthermore, it is only by its release from the order of possibility that essence is able to exercise the various functions that belong to it per se. Until actualized by existence, essence is only potentially the subject of the tremendous complex of accidental features that serve to perfect it entitatively and operationally. Existence affords essence the opportunity to function actually as the integrating principle for the sum total of realities that are its accidental modifications. (See SUBSISTENCE.)

Rational Basis for Mind's Ascent to God. Because its essence is pure potency with reference to the order of actuality, the actual existent is contingent; hence an efficient cause is needed to explain its presence in the realm of existing things. In the final analysis, this efficient cause must be a Being in whom essence and existence are one and the same (see GOD).

Transcendence of God. That the actual existent is composed of essence and existence, while its First Cause demands in itself an identification of these two, does much to demonstrate effectively God's TRANSCENDENCE. The exclusion of entitative composition in God, the cause of being, places Him far beyond the limits of created existent being. This latter participates in actuality, whereas God is essentially actuality. In the created existent, existence is multiplied, whereas the existence of the First Cause is absolutely one and unique. The actual created existent is finite and caused in its existential act, whereas the existence of the First Cause is itself infinite and uncaused. In a word, the difference between the created existent thing and its First Cause in terms of the actuality appropriate to each is the difference between the finite and infinite, the measurable and the immeasurable. Any community discoverable between the two can be only analogical.

Other solutions. The doctrine of St. Thomas on the real distinction found its principal adversary in John Duns Scotus. For Scotus, who thought in perspectives that were somewhat Platonic, essence is existence; thus concrete essence is its own existence. Divine Being is the infinite essence in which all created essences participate; and created essences are real and really existing when God, from the state of simple possibility, puts them into the state of existence. Thus there is no real distinction between existing essence and its act of being (esse); existence is only a mode of essence, a degree, an intensity, through which essence has become real. This mode is intrinsic to essence and puts it outside its causes. Existence is no longer the supreme value; it is a modality. Essence overtakes it and leads to a philosophy of essences in which existence plays only an accidental role. Scotus maintained, however, a modal distinction ex natura rei between essence and existence. (See SCOTISM.)

F. SUÁREZ suppressed even this distinction; for him, esse signifies only the placing of essence outside its causes. In Suárez's view, whatever is real is, as such, existent. Man conceives of a distinction between essence and existence because of his own contingency and limitation; in reality, however, the actual essence of a creature is not really distinct from its existence. (See SUÁREZIAN-ISM.) Thus, with these two thinkers, SCHOLASTICISM again turned to the direction given it by Henry of Ghent, holding merely for a rational distinction between essence and existence.

Modern Philosophy. As RATIONALISM began to prevail in the modern era, under the influence of R. DES-CARTES, substantial forms and essences were gradually rejected. Nothing was left in the visible world but extension and movement; these took the place of essences. Existence, similarly, was the existence of extension and movement—an existence recognized by the scholastics as accidental and thus not adequate to explain the ultimate constituency of being and substance.

For I. KANT and the idealists who followed him, the world of nature interiorized itself more and more. The problem thus became one of knowing how a cosmos created by mind could come to acquire a real or extramental existence. But the philosopher who most transformed the reality of the world and of history into a logos that continually develops itself was G. W. F. HEGEL. For him, an ideal dialectic describes the course of events and enables one to see their ultimate development. The criterion of reality, or of existence, consists in a type of accord with the totality of experience: the true and the existent find their place in the unraveling of facts as synthesized by the mind. The mind proceeds from synthesis to synthesis until it arrives at the ABSOLUTE, Itself the irrefragable guarantee of the real existence of all that is contained within It. Such a system leads to the ultimate form of IDE-ALISM. Existential reality is there but a backdrop or, even less, a kind of concept that combines with concepts of essence to weave the abstract texture of the real.

Existentialist Reaction. The fact that individual existence has no place in this dialectic prompted the strong reaction of S. A. KIERKEGAARD, who rose to the defense of particular existence—at least of his own existence as a man. The term "existence," for the Danish philosopher as for other existentialists, does not have the same meaning it had for the scholastics. In his view, existence reflects the manner of being proper to man. The prefix "ex" no longer signifies the emergence of beings from their causes and from nothingness, but the INTENTIONALI-TY of CONSCIOUSNESS going toward something different from itself. Still, beneath this "ex-sistence," with its psychological nuance, there is the implication of an ontological aspect that embraces what is or exists fully in extramental reality.

Martin Heidegger, in light of his attempt to situate Being with relation to the human Dasein, recognized that he still had not touched the problem of essence and existence as this was posed in the ontological tradition. In fact, Heidegger so separated Being from beings, he so dissociated the ontological from the ontic, that essences appeared to him not as real elements of nature but, after the manner of the idealists, as constructs of the mind. The question of the relation of these essences to real existence thus cannot even be raised in his philosophy. (See EXIS-TENTIALISM)

Nor does J. P. Sartre, scrutinizing the problem in the wake of Heidegger, provide a plausible solution. In his view, existence is pure actuality, the actuality of consciousness going out of itself and refusing to accept the other. By this action, the world exists, as do essences that make up the world, but whose existence is nothing more than the disinterestedness of consciousness. When this table exists, there is the being of table; but the table "exsists" only in the sense that it manifests itself to an annihilating consciousness. Things are not exclusively in the mind; they are back to back with being, without thereby having their own being as an ontological reality. It is ultimately consciousness that judges the reality of the type of existence one assigns to things; man has no criterion of truth apart from its ability to be known.

Such, briefly, are the solutions that have been proposed to the problem of the relation between essence and existence. The term "existence," like the term "essence," has been given very different meanings over the centuries. Admittedly, the problem of their relationship is one of the most difficult in philosophy. Yet, since so much depends on it, one might well wish that philosophers had not resigned themselves to so wide a divergence of views.

See Also: BEING; EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS; MATTER AND FORM.

Bibliography: N. DEL PRADO, De veritate fundamentali philosophiae christianae (Fribourg 1911). M. CHOSSAT, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 v. (Paris 1903-50) 4:1152-1243; "L'Averroisme de saint Thomas: Notes sur la distinction d'essence et d'existence à la fin du XIII^e siècle," Archives de philosophie 9.3 (1932) 129–177. A. D'ALES, Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi catholique, 4 v. (Paris 1911-22) 4:1667-1713. M. GRABMANN, "Doctrina S. Thomae de distinctione reali inter essentiam et esse ex documentis ineditis saeculi XIII illustrata," in Acta Hebdomadae Thomisticae Romae (Rome 1924) 131-190. P. MANDONNET, "Les Premières disputes sur la distinction réelle, 1276-1287," Revue thomiste 18 (1910) 741–765. M. D. ROLAND-GOSSELIN, Le De ente et essentia de saint Thomas d'Aquin (Kain, Belgium 1926). A. FOREST, La Structure metaphysique du concret selon S. Thomas d'Aquin (2d ed. Paris 1956). É. H. GILSON, Elements of Christian Philosophy (New York 1960; pa. 1963); L'Être et l'essence (2d ed. Paris 1962). É. H. GILSON, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (New York 1955) 4207-4427. L. SWEENEY, A Metaphysics of Authentic Existentialism (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1965); "Existence/Essence in St. Thomas Aquinas's Early Writings," American Catholic Philosophical Association. Proceedings of the Annual Meeting 37 (1963) 97-131. I. M. BOCHEŃSKI, Contemporary European Philosophy, tr. D. NICHOLL and K. ASCHENBRENNER (Berkeley 1956).

[J. C. TAYLOR]

ESSENES

The Essenes, along with the Pharisees and Sadducees, were one of the principal Jewish sects in Christ's time.

Sources. Knowledge of the Essenes is derived principally from the following works: PHILO JUDAEUS, Quod omnis probus liber sit [Philonis Opera, ed. Cohn-Wendland (Berlin 1896) v. 6], par. 75-91; Philo's lost Apology for the Jews as preserved in Eusebius, Praeparatio Evangelica 8.11.1-18 [K. Mras, Die greichischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte (Leipsig 1897-) 43.1:455-457 (1954)]; Flavius Josephus, Jewish War (hereafter B.J.) 2.8:2-13; Antiquities (Ant.) 18.1.5; Elder Pliny, Natural History, 5.15.73. All these authors seem dependent on earlier common sources, although Josephus (Life, 2) claims personal knowledge of the Essenes. The added details on the Essenes in the Slavonic Josephus are of questionable value. The statements that Philo and Josephus make about the Essenes are often inexact generalizations and need to be reexamined in the light of the Essene documents discovered among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (DSS) of Qumran.

Origins. The name "Essenes" comes from EGGηνοί, the Greek form that Josephus uses most frequently and that Pliny Latinizes as Esseni. Another form used by Philo and occasionally by Josephus is $EGG\alpha\hat{1}$ ot. The derivation of the name is probably from the Aramaic plural (hasên, hasayyâ) of hasyâ, "holy, pious," the equivalent of the Hebrew $h\bar{a}s\hat{i}d$.

Pliny located the main Essene settlement above En-Gedi on the west shore of the Dead Sea; this fits well with the ruins discovered at Qumran. Josephus and Philo report that Essenes were scattered about the cities and villages of Palestine. Some manuscripts of Philo mention Syria, separately from Palestine, in connection with Essene settlements, and this may harmonize with the journey to Damascus mentioned in a work connected with the DSS (CDC). Philo (De vita contemplativa) also describes the Egyptian THERAPEUTAE, a group like the Essenes.

The Essenes apparently arose as inaugurators of a separate movement in about 150 B.C. Among the supporters of the Machabean revolt of 167 B.C. were the hăsîdîm (1 Mc 2.42) or "pious ones." (See HASIDAEANS.) When the unalloyed motives that sparked the revolt were tarnished by the Machabean usurpation of the high priesthood by Jonathan (152 B.C.), there seems to have been a schism by the more conservative elements among the hăsîdîm. This schism produced the Essenes who preserved the original name of this group. Josephus's first mention of the Essenes is in relation to the reign of Jonathan (Ant. 18.5.9). Both Josephus and Philo estimate their numbers at about 4,000 in the first Christian century. (For subsequent history, see QUMRAN COMMUNITY.)

Life. The main group of Essenes lived in community. An ideal of celibacy marked their life, although Josephus (B.J. 2.8.13) mentions a group of Essenes who married. There were women at Qumran, but it is not clear whether the marrying Essenes were a separate group or the result of a relaxation of an ideal. Josephus (B.J. 2.8.2) says that they adopted children and brought them up as Essenes.

Caves of Essenes, Qumran, Israel. (©Richard T. Nowitz/ CORBIS)

Entrance into the community (B.J. 2.8.7) was severely controlled and required a type of novitiate. After a preliminary year of observation, the candidate was admitted to the common meals and to the purifications of the group. Then followed another period of trial (two years according to Josephus, but Qumran indications point to one year) before the candidates were fully accepted. Final entrance was marked by a series of vows covering their duties to God and to fellow Essenes, and their obligations to keep the secrets of the group. They surrendered (all?) their private property to a common treasury.

Prayer and various types of work were compulsory. The common meals were of a religious nature. Josephus (B.J. 2.8.5) tells us that the Essenes entered the dining room as if it were a temple, and all waited in silence for the priest to bless the food. Purificatory baths were required before virtually all functions.

Josephus (B.J. 2.8.10) mentions four classes of Essenes divided according to seniority. Presiding functionaries ($\dot{\epsilon}\pi\mu\mu\epsilon\lambda\eta\tau\alpha i$, $\dot{\epsilon}\pi i\tau\rho\sigma\pi\sigma i$, probably equivalent to the Qumran m^ebaqqēr) were elected by the community. The chief authority among them was the Legislator (B.J. 2.8.9); this might be Moses, or perhaps the Qumran Teacher.

Theology. Besides the peculiarities of their way of life, the Essenes had special doctrines that set them apart from other Jews. Here especially, however, we must allow for the inexactitude of our sources. Josephus (Ant. 13.5.9) stresses their belief in divine determinism; this may be an exaggeration of the dualistic doctrine found in the DSS. Their cult of the sun (B.J. 2.8.5) is still not clear to us, but we know the Qumranites followed a solar calendar and spoke of good and evil in terms of light and darkness.

The Essenes distrusted the regular sacrifices in the Jerusalem Temple (Ant. 18.1.5), a distrust flowing from their historic protest against its priesthood. Josephus says they made their own sacrifices, but Philo (Quod omnis 75) says that they did not sacrifice animals. Nevertheless, there was a strong priestly element among them. The Essenes maintained the immortality of the soul that had descended from the most pure ethereal substance to be imprisoned in the body (B.J. 2.8.11). No real evidence for such a doctrine of preexistence has yet been found in the DSS. Such a doctrine, if true, suggests the possibility of the indirect influence of Greek philosophy on the Essenes (see Ant. 15.10.4 for a comparison with the Pythagoreans). In their purifications and angelology, the Essenes present certain parallels with Persian thought, parallels more obvious in the dualism of the DSS. Other common elements were shared by the Essenes and SAMARITANS.

The Essenes had some influence on other branches of Judaism. They seem to have been the channel for preserving and propagating many of the ideas of such apocrypha as Enoch and Jubilees. Even after their disappearance as a separate group, the Essenes left their traces in Judaeo-Christian sects like the EBIONITES, perhaps in the Mandaeans (see MANDAEAN RELIGION), certainly in the Karaites. There have been many unsubstantiated hypotheses about their influence on Christianity. The DSS, however, show grounds for suspecting considerable indirect influence, which does nothing to destroy the originality of Christianity.

Bibliography: S. WAGNER, Die Essener in der wissenschaftlichen Diskussion (Berlin 1960), excellent bibliog. A. DUPONT-SOMMER, The Essene Writings from Qumran (New York 1962) ch. 1–2. M. BLACK, The Scrolls and Christian Origins: Studies in the Jewish Background of the New Testament (London 1961). B. RI- GAUX, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:1013–35.

[R. E. BROWN]

ESTE

The famous Italian Este family, of Lombard origin, descended from the Obertenghi. Albert Azzo II (d. 1097) is regarded as the head of the family because he first made Este his residence. His first-born son, made heir of Carinthia by his uncle Guelf III and Duke of Bavaria by Emperor Henry IV, as Guelf IV continued the Guelf family (see GUELFS AND GHIBELLINES). In time reduced to the Duchy of Brunswick, in 1714 it emerged as the House of Hanover with George I of England.

Medieval Origins. From Albert's second son, Folco (d. c. 1136), descends the Italian line. Folco's son, Obizzo I (d. 1193), inherited FERRARA in 1184 but had to dispute with the Ghibelline Torelli family for the city. Obizzo's nephew, Azzo IV (d. 1212), who sided with Otto IV and then with Innocent III, accompanied Frederick II to Germany in 1212. His first son, Aldobrandino (d. 1215), lost the castle of Este to Padua and was succeeded by the second son, Azzo VII (d. 1264). Their sister, Bl. Beatrice, was a nun. Azzo VII broke with Frederick II and became podesta of Ferrara, establishing the basis of the family's authority. His daughter Beatrice married Andrew II of Hungary. Azzo's son died in prison as a hostage of Frederick II. His grandson, Obizzo II (d. 1293), succeeded; as the ally of Charles of ANJOU, he acquired Modena in 1288 and Reggio in 1289; his daughter Beatrice married Galeazzo VISCONTI. His son, Azzo VIII (d. 1308), had ambitions for Parma and Bologna but lost Modena and Reggio in 1306; he left a disputed succession, and Ferrara came into Angevin hands. In 1317 Rinaldo (d. 1335) regained Ferrara as a fief of the pope. Obizzo III (d. 1352) in 1336 regained Modena, which was conferred on his son Aldobrandino (d. 1361) by Charles IV. Aldobrandino's brother and successor, Albert (d. 1393), founded the University of Ferrara in 1391. Under Albert's son Nicholas III (d. 1441), dissolute and cruel but shrewd, the family became powerful.

Renaissance Greatness. Leonello (d. 1450), Nicholas's son, made Ferrara a major center of culture in the Renaissance. His brother and successor, Borso (d. 1471), Duke of Modena (1452) and of Ferrara (1471), gave his name to one of the world's richest codices, the Bible of Borso in the Biblioteca Estense in Modena. Borso was succeeded by his brother Ercole I (d. 1505), whose children are noteworthy: Beatrice married Ludovico SFORZA; Isabella, known for her culture, married Francesco II GONZAGA, Duke of Mantua; Hippolyte I (d. 1520) was a cardinal; Alfonso I (d. 1534), his successor, Duke of Ferrara, married Lucretia BORGIA, and their son Hippolyte II (d. 1572) was a cardinal. Ercole II (d. 1559), Alfonso's son by his first wife, Anna Sforza, succeeded him. Ercole's son Louis was a cardinal (d. 1586); his daughters Lucretia and Eleanora were praised by Torquato Tasso. With his son Alfonso II (d. 1597), Duke of Ferrara, the legitimate line of Nicholas III became extinct.

The Cesare-Este Line. Clement VIII refused to recognize the illegitimate Cesare (d. 1628), who retained Modena but yielded Ferrara to the Church and French lands to Anne of GUISE. Cesare's son, Alfonso III (d. 1644), married Isabelle of Savoy; he was widowed in 1626, abdicated in 1629, became a Capuchin, and was ordained in 1630. He labored for the apostolate in the Tyrol and in Vienna; his son Louis was cardinal and bishop of Reggio. Another son, Francesco I (d. 1658), fought for both Spain and France in hope of regaining Ferrara. His son, Alfonso IV (d. 1662), a general of Louis XIV, married a niece of Cardinal Mazarin in 1655. Their daughter, Maria Beatrice, married the Duke of York, later JAMES II OF ENGLAND; their son, Francesco II (d. 1694), founded the University of Mantua and the Biblioteca Estense. Since Francesco was without sons, he was succeeded by his uncle Rinaldo (d. 1737), who renounced the cardinalate to marry Charlotte of Brunswick. Rinaldo's son Francesco III (d. 1780) fought for Spain against Austria, but by becoming Austrian administrator general of Lombardy and marrying Beatrice, his niece and heir, to the Archduke Ferdinand, gave up the independence of the duchy. His son Ercole III died in Turin in 1803, an exile from Modena. Ferdinand (d. 1806) and Beatrice (d.1829) inherited the duchy until the Treaty of Vienna gave it to her son Francesco IV (d. 1846). Another son, Ferdinand Charles Joseph (d. 1850), was a famous Austrian general in the Napoleonic wars and governed Galicia (1830-46). Francesco V was dispossessed in 1860 and died in Vienna, Nov. 20, 1875.

The Este Cardinals. The Este family was represented by many cardinals during the period of the high Renaissance. Hippolyte I, a cardinal (b. Ferrara, Nov. 20, 1479; d. Ferrara, Sept. 2, 1520) was, thanks to his aunt, the queen of Matyas Hunyadi of Hungary, archbishop of Esztergom at age seven, cardinal deacon at age 14, archbishop of Milan at age 17, and bishop of Ferrara, Narbonne, Modena, and Capua, as well as a holder of other benefices. He renounced Esztergom for Zagreb in 1497 and yielded Milan to his nephew Hippolyte II in 1520. He conducted successful military operations against Venice in the League of Cambrai (1509) and urged Este to resist Pope Julius II, who wanted it to join the Holy League. When he was summoned to Rome by Julius, he sent in his stead Ariosto, whose patron he was from 1503

Beatrice d'Este, 15th-century marble bust by an artist of the school of Milan, now in the Louvre, Paris, France. (Alinari-Art Reference/Art Resource, NY) to 1517 and who dedicated the Orlando furioso to him. Hippolyte was in Hungary from 1517 to 1520. He knew Leonardo da Vinci and was himself a man of great culture.

Hippolyte II, cardinal (b. Ferrara, Aug. 25, 1509; d. Tivoli, Dec. 2, 1572) was archbishop of Milan at age ten, later bishop of Lyons, Orléans, Autun, Auch, and Morienne, and was made cardinal in pectore (thanks to Francis I) in 1538 and publicly proclaimed in 1539. As cardinal protector of France, he represented the French party in Italy and in the sacred college. He was out of favor with Paul IV, but was legate a latere for Pius IV to Catherine de Médicis in France (1561–63). He was a great patron of the arts and began the construction of the Villa d'Este at Tivoli. His candidacy for the papacy was defeated in 1550, 1555, and 1561 because reformers who thought him too worldly joined the enemies of France.

Louis, cardinal, (b. Ferrara, Dec. 25, 1538; d. Rome, Dec. 30, 1586) disliked the clerical life, but his family persuaded him to become archbishop of Ferrara and, in 1561, cardinal. In 1558 and in 1581 he sought to leave his orders for marriage, but the pope refused permission. He was protected by the French. From 1565 to 1572 he was the patron of Tasso. Despite his enormous income he was always in debt. He completed the building of the Villa d'Este.

Alexander, cardinal (b. Modena, 1568; d. Rome, 1624) was bishop of Reggio (1621) and a good pastor; he was a learned man, as well as a patron of the arts.

Rinaldo, cardinal (b. Modena, 1618; d. Rome, 1672) left a distinguished military career to become bishop of Reggio and of Montpellier.

Rinaldo, cardinal (b. 1655; d. 1737) was the son of Francesco I. He became cardinal in 1681, but renounced the cardinalate to marry and assure the succession of his family.

The Last Dukes of Ferrara. The power and prestige of the Este family dwindled during the rule of the last Dukes of Ferrara. Alfonso I, Duke of Ferrara (b. Ferrara, July 21, 1476; d. Oct. 1534) was married to Anna Sforza and then Lucretia Borgia; he maintained the duchy by alliances with the pope, France, and the Empire. He traveled in England and Flanders and devoted himself to the arts, commerce, and military science.

Alfonso II, Duke of Ferrara (b. Ferrara, Nov. 22, 1533; d. Ferrara, Oct. 27, 1597) sought in vain to promote the fortunes of Este. From his marriages to the daughters of Cosimo I de Medici in 1560, Emperor Ferdinand I in 1565, and the Duke of Mantua in 1579 he had neither issue nor political advantage. He took part in the civil wars in France; and for his part in the war against the Turks in 1566, Tasso dedicated the Gerusalemme liberata to him. He lost supremacy over the small Italian city–states to the Medici. He was disliked despite an anti–Machiavellian program of loyalty and religion, expressed in a Principe written by his secretary of state. He died without heirs, and Este escheated to the pope.

Bibliography: L. SIMEONI, Enciclopedia Italiana di scienzi, littere ed arti, 36 v. (Rome 1928–39; suppl. 1938–) 14:395–398; 15:857–859. A. MERCATI and A. PELZER, Dizionario ecclesiastico, 3 v. (Turin 1954–58) 1:1014–15.

[E. P. COLBERT]

ESTHER, BOOK OF

One of the protocanonical books of the Old Testament, found among the Writings (the third section) in the Jewish Canon, after Lamentations and before Daniel [see CANON, BIBLICAL, 2]. It is the last of the five $m^e gill \partial t$, or festive SCROLLS. This article discusses the contents, the text, the origin, and the purpose of the book, and, finally, the canonicity of the Greek additions.

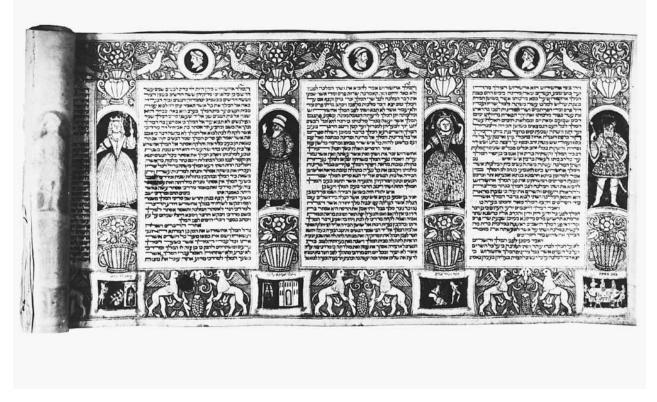

Contents. The dramatic story of Esther recounts the deliverance of the Jewish people from grave danger through the instrumentality of a woman; it is thus similar in theme to the Book of JUDITH. The setting is in Susa, at the palace of the Persian King Xerxes I (486-464 B.C.), given as "Assuerus" in the Hebrew text, "Artaxerxes" in the Greek. The king, after repudiating Queen Vashti, marries Esther, a young Jewess and the most beautiful girl in the kingdom. Haman, the king's vizier, determines by lot the 13th of Adar (Februrary-March) as the day for slaughtering all of the Jews in the empire. However, Esther and Mordechai, her uncle (or cousin) and foster father, are able to thwart Haman's plans. Haman is hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordechai, and Mordechai is promoted to vizier for having uncovered a plot against the king. On the day set for their extermination, the Jews are allowed to defend themselves by slaughtering their enemies. In the provinces the Jews celebrated the victory the following day. But in Susa, Esther requested the king's permission to continue the slaughter on the 14th of Adar and to celebrate on the 15th. Thus, Esther and Mordechai decreed that these events should be commemorated annually by the Feast of PURIM on the 14th and 15th of Adar, at which time the Book of Esther is read.

Text. The Greek Septuagint (LXX) text is much longer than the Hebrew text because of numerous additions. St. Jerome, in translating the Vulgate, followed the Hebrew version, then translated the Greek additions, which he added to the end of the book. According to the Vulgate numbering, which the Douay follows, these Greek additions extend from 10.4 through 16.24. The CCD version, however, gives these sections in the order in which they are found in the LXX but designates them with successive letters of the alphabet, with Arabic numerals for the verses, in order to avoid disturbing the regular chapter and verse enumeration. The major sections are as follows: Mordechai's dream and his discovery of a plot (A.1–17; placed before 1.1); the edict sent out by Haman (B.1-7; placed between 3.13 and 3.14); the prayers of Mordechai and Esther (C.1-30) and Esther's reception by the king (D.1–16; placed after 4.16); the king's edict protecting the Jews (E.1–24; placed between 8.12 and 8.13); and the epilogue (F.1-11; placed at the end of the book).

These different recensions seem to reflect successive stages in the development of the story arising from popular Jewish tradition. The Greek additions (midrashic amplifications; see MIDRASH) spiritualize the nonreligious tenor of the more primitive Hebrew text. Even with these additions the largely secular tone of the book and its almost savage nationalism contrasts unfavorably with the far more elevated and religious atmosphere of the Book of Judith.

Origin and Purpose. The story of Esther began to develop from an original nucleus between 300 and 150

Hebrew scroll of the "Book of Esther," showing King Xerxes, Queen Vasthi, Mardochai, Queen Ester, and seven princes of Persia, 17th century.

B.C. in the eastern Jewish DIASPORA and reached its present form c. 150-100 B.C. The Greek additions probably date from c. 100 B.C. In the past most scholars considered the story based on an event in Jewish history, a threatened pogrom in the Persian Empire from which the Jews escaped. This is the event celebrated annually at Purim. Modern scholars, however, are less willing to see even a minimal basis in history. Many elements of the narrative lack all semblance of verisimilitude, such as the complacence of King Xerxes at the slaughter of tens of thousands of his subjects (9.5–17), to give but one example. The story is possibly a fictional illustration of the firm Jewish belief that those who trust in God will be delivered in all their needs and a concrete illustration of the poetic justice so often prayed for in the Psalms, that the evil doers should perish in the very trap they had set for the innocent (see Est 9.1). Some, however, consider the story a Jewish adaptation of an already existing story of non-Jewish origin. Thus, it could be rooted in an ancient Babylonian myth and festival commemorating the victory of the gods of Babylon over the gods of Elam. Marduk and Ishtar, the chief Babylonian gods, become Mardochai and Esther. Aman and Vashti are derived from Humman and Mashti, the principals of the Elamite pantheon. Others see it stemming from a story in Book 3 of Herodotus. A certain magus (see MAGI), Gaumata, upon the death of King Cambyses (530–522 B.C.), usurped the Persian throne by posing as the secretly murdered son of CYRUS, king of Persia. The plot was uncovered by Phaidime, a concubine of the king, and Otanes, her father. Gaumata was executed, and there ensued a wholesale massacre of the Magi. The Persians celebrated this event with a festival, "The Massacre of the Magi." Scholars favoring a non-Jewish origin maintain that the Jews of the Diaspora became familiar with the pagan festival and adopted it. Later the Book of Esther was written to justify and regulate the feast, for which there was no basis in the Torah. At this time the festival became an occasion to fan the flames of Jewish nationalism.

Canonicity of the Greek Additions. Jerome and other Fathers questioned the authenticity of these passages. However, because of the influential position of the LXX, the Greek text with these deuterocanonical additions gradually won acceptance in the Christian Church. The Council of TRENT proclaimed the canonicity of the whole book as contained in the Vulgate.

Bibliography: Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible, tr. and adap. by L. HARTMAN (New York 1963) 690–693. J. SCHILDENBER-

GER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, ed. J. HOFER and K. RAH-NER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65); suppl., Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil: Dokumente und kommentare, ed. H. S. BRECHTER et al., pt. 1 (1966) 3:1115–16. H. BARDTKE and W. WER-BECK, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 7 v. (3d ed. Tübingen 1957–65) 2:703–708. A. ROBERT, "Historique (Genre)," Dictionnaire de la Bible, suppl. ed. L. PIROT, et al. (Paris 1928–) 4:20–23. A. BARUCQ, tr., Esther [Bible de Jérusalem, 14 (Paris 1952)]. L. SOUBIGOU, La Sainte Bible, ed. L. PIROT and A. CLAMER, v.4 (Paris 1952). B. W. ANDERSON, "The Place of the Book of Esther in the Christian Bible," Journal of Religion, 30 (Chicago 1950) 32–43. H. RINGGREN, "Esther and Purim," Svensk exegetisk årsbok 20 (1955) 5–24.

[E. A. BALLMANN]

ESTIENNE (ÉTIENNE)

A French family of the 16th century renowned as printers and humanists.

Henry Estienne, the founder of the family; b. c. 1460; d. Paris, 1520. The family printing press was set up near the Sorbonne University c. 1504–05. After Henry's death, since his three sons, Francis, Robert, and Charles, were still quite young, Simon de Colines, a foreman, provisionally took charge of the firm and married their widowed mother in 1521.

Robert, Henry's second son; b. Paris, 1503; d. Geneva, Sept. 7, 1559, collaborated (1522-23) in the printing of a Latin edition of the NT and the Psalms. By 1526 he became head of the family firm. In 1527-28 his first complete Bible in Latin was published, followed by his great Dictionarium seu linguae latinae thesaurus in 1531. Francis I appointed him the king's printer in 1539 for Hebrew and Latin works and in 1540 for Greek works. In this official capacity he published many texts of the Latin and Greek classics, as well as those of several early Church writers. Unfortunately, however, Robert became involved in the troubles of the Reformation; his critical and liberal views on religion and the Church ultimately prompted the privy council of Henry II, in 1547, to proscribe the series of Latin Bibles published by his firm. Robert, considering the censorship to be intolerable, became dissatisfied, and in 1548 he visited Geneva, where he conferred with John CALVIN. The following year he became a permanent resident of Geneva and also a member of the Reformed Church. Among his many works published at Geneva were a Greek-Latin NT (1551), in which he introduced the division of the text into verses that is still in use today. He published also a concordance of the whole Bible (1555). In his various editions of the Latin VULGATE (1528-57), Robert Estienne attempted to reestablish critically the authentic text of St. Jerome [see BIBLE (TEXTS)]. His contributions to the history of the Vulgate were recognized by H. Quentin in his Memoir sur l'établissement du texte de la Vulgate (Rome 1922). During this period Robert published a caustic reply, Ad censuras theologorum parisiensium responsio (1552), an answer to the Sorbonne's condemnation of him.

Henry (II) was the eldest son of Robert; b. 1531; d. Lyons, France, January 1598. From 1554 to the time of his death, Henry published a large number of the Greek classics. His greatest work was his Greek dictionary, Thesaurus graecae linquae, 5 v. (1572), a masterpiece of lexicography, which reappeared in several editions (Paris 1831–65).

Paul, son of Henry (II); b. 1566; d. 1627, he succeeded his father in charge of the press at Geneva in 1598. He also published a large number of Greek classics. He disappeared from history, however, after his sale of the press in 1627. The Estienne family's activities, both in Geneva and in Paris, ceased after the middle of the 17th century.

Bibliography: F. DRESSLER, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche² (Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1116–17. H. R. GUGGISBERG, Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart³ (Tübingen 1957–65) 6:360–361.

[C. H. PICKAR]

ESTIMATIVE POWER

The estimative power (also commonly, estimative sense) is a power of knowledge whose characteristic act is concrete evaluation or estimation. Spoken of as a distinct power of knowledge first by AVICENNA, it was accepted as such by the majority of medieval thinkers. Many later authors, however, have rejected it entirely, or have refused to consider it as distinct from the imagination, e.g., F. SUÁREZ, P. FONSECA, and J. FRÖBES; others consider it of very little importance, e.g., D. MERCIER. In Thomistic philosophy, the estimative power is conceived very much as it was by Avicenna (ST 1a, 78.4). It is the equivalent in animals of the COGITATIVE or DISCURSIVE POWER in man, though man also in some sense has an estimative power, as explained below.

Nature of the Estimative. A certain intelligence or purposiveness is observable in animal activity, and various explanations, such as INSTINCT, are offered for this. Many accept the explanation offered by Aristotle, i.e., that "animals know by nature" (Phys. 199a 20–30; Meta. 980a 28–981a). Avicenna went further. Having developed an analysis of knowledge in terms of formal objects, he applied this to animal knowledge and activity. He concluded that a distinct power was necessary (Liber Canonis 1.1.6.5; De anima 1.5, 2.1, 4.1, 4.3).

St. THOMAS AQUINAS followed this analysis closely, but more briefly. Animals, he asserted, have a knowledge of concrete suitability and harmfulness. Such knowledge is not reducible to the external SENSES, which know their objects in directly sensible modes. Consequently, this knowledge cannot be explained by the IMAGINATION either, whose function it is to retain and reproduce what was previously sensed. St. Thomas calls this knowledge "an unsensed intention" or "knowledge-object not able to be grasped by the [external] senses." Therefore, a distinct power is required. Nevertheless, an animal does not know the nature of good and evil, but only concrete goods and evils which are important to its life and the life of the species (ST 1a, 78.4; De ver. 15.1, 25.2; In 2 de anim. 13). Another aspect of this knowledge is its unlearned, or "natural," character. Hence, the estimative must be determined by nature to judge certain things as good and others as harmful. St. Thomas sees the evidence for this in the fact that animals of a particular species act in the same way (De ver. 24.1, 2; ST 1a2ae, 17.2 ad 3; 13.2 ad 2, 3).

Functions in Animal and Man. Because the kind of knowledge reached by the estimative is evaluative, it is immediately ordered to APPETITE and thus to action (In 3 sent. 27.1.2; De virt. in comm. 6; ST 1a, 83.1). The "good" as known by the animal is concrete and individualized. Consequently, good and evil as thus presented necessarily are followed by acts of appetite: desire, fear, rage, and so on. Hence, the estimative can well be considered to be the guiding, or supreme, power in an animal (In 3 sent. 35.1.2.2.1; ST 1a2ae, 31.6).

To a limited extent, we can speak of an estimative power in man (ST 1a, 78.4). For in the earliest years of human life, reason cannot yet guide actions, and sufficient learning has not yet taken place. If the baby responds to concrete good and evil beyond their immediately pleasurable or painful aspects he can do so only to the extent that he also has natural judgments about good and evil.

The area of animal (and human) behavior explained in THOMISM by the estimative power is evidently much the same as that explained by instinct. However, the term instinct for St. Thomas is not a technical term, but a general term for "innate" or "intrinsic" impulse. The modern doctrine of instinct is a different kind of explanation and has little in common with the estimative power.

See Also: FACULTIES OF THE SOUL; SENSES; COGITATIVE POWER.

Bibliography: G. P. KLUBERTANZ, The Discursive Power (St. Louis 1952). M. A. GAFFNEY, Psychology of the Interior Senses (St. Louis 1942). R. HAIN, "De vi aestimativa et de instinctu animalium," Revue de l'Université d'Ottawa 2.2 (1932) 98–114. D. DE VORGES, "L'Estimative," Revue néo-scolastique 11 (1904) 433–454. H. A. WOLFSON, "The Internal Senses in Latin, Arabic, and Hebrew Philosophic Texts," Harvard Theological Review 28 (1935) 69–133.

[G. P. KLUBERTANZ]

ESTIUS, GULIELMUS

Exegete, theologian, and hagiographer; b. Gorcum, Holland, 1542; d. Douai, Sept. 20, 1613. After his studies of the classics at Utrecht, he spent 20 years at Louvain, studying sacred sciences and teaching philosophy. He received the S.T.D. in 1580. After his appointment as Professor Primarius at the University of Douai in 1582, he taught Sacred Scripture and served two terms as rector of the seminary. He was chancellor of Douai from 1595 until his death. A profound student, highly esteemed for vast learning, solid judgment, and sincere piety, he was called Doctor fundatissimus by Pope Benedict XIV. Among his less famous works are a History of the Martyrs of Gorcum (Douai 1603) and an excellent commentary on Quattuor libri sententiarum Petri Lombardi (Douai 1615). His greatest work is exegetical, the wellknown In omnes beati Pauli et septem catholicas apostolorum epistolas commentarii (Douai 1614-16) in which he explained the literal meaning of the NT Epistles with precise judgment, acumen, and erudition. His calm, impartial answers to objections did much to expose the deficiencies of the Protestant Biblical exegesis. His prefaces to each Epistle were particularly valuable for their insight into the exact mind of the authors. Estius's reputation became so great among later scholars that the saying "Maldonatus on the Gospels, Estius on the Epistles" became proverbial.

Bibliography: H. HURTER, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae 3:484–489. T. LEURIDAN, Revue des sciences ecclésiastiques 2 (1895) 120–131, 326–340. L. SALEMBIER, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 5.1:871–878. A. FLEISCHMANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 3:1117.

[J. J. MAHONEY]

ESTONIA, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

A Baltic state, the Republic of Estonia is bound on the north by the Gulf of Finland, on the east by Russia, on the south by LATVIA and the Gulf of Riga, and on the west by the Baltic Sea. With an inland terrain characterized by marshy lowlands, Estonia also includes the two large islands of Hiiumaa (Dägo) and Saaremaa (Ösel) at the mouth of the Gulf of Riga, as well as numerous other Capital: Tallinn. Size: 17,410 sq. miles. Population: 1,431,470 in 2000. Languages: Estonian, Russian, Ukranian, English, Finnish. Religions: 4,240 Catholics (.28%), 16,400 Orthodox (1%), 200,900 Lutherans (14%), 3,100 Jews (.2%), 1,206,830 without religious affiliation. Estonia is ministered to by an apostolic administrator.

islands in the Baltic. Natural resources include shale oil, peat, amber and limestone, while agriculturally Estonia's main crops include potatoes, fruits and vegetables, and dairy products.

Estonia was settled by tribal Finno-Ugrian people who formed the bulk of the population by the 11th century. In the Middle Ages it comprised part of Livonia, an area long the center of a power struggle among its more aggressive neighbors. Independent from 1917 to 1941, Estonia was incorporated into the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) in 1944 and gained its independence in 1991. The region, which has gone on to develop economic and political ties with Western Europe, possesses a large Russian minority estimated at 30 percent of the population.

Establishment of Christianity. Russian missionaries and traders from Kiev were the first to penetrate Estonia, establishing a post at Tartu about 1030. Sporadic attempts at evangelization were also made by missionaries from Lund, Bremen-Hamburg, Novgorod and Plotsk in the 11th century, but they met with little success. Meinhard of Holstein (d. 1196) was consecrated the first bishop of Livonia in 1186, even before the Germans established a stable political organization in the region. His successor, Berthold of Hanover, died in battle in 1198. Bishop ALBERT I (d. 1229) arrived in 1199 at the head of a German crusade; he began the actual work of settlement and forced conversion of the native population of the area, which he renamed Marienland. The KNIGHTS OF THE SWORD were organized in 1199 at Albert's urging, and the city of Riga was founded as his see in 1201. Theoderich of Treyden, abbot of the Cistercian monastery of Dünamünde, was consecrated missionary bishop of Estonia in early 1211. The Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (November 1215) made the Livonian church directly subject to Rome, but the bishops, who were also imperial princes, and the Knights divided the newly converted areas between them, largely ignoring the claims of the Holy See. The Danes were also active in the northern part of Estonia and in the islands; in 1219 Waldamar II of Denmark founded the fortified city of Tallinn and, since Bishop Theoderich had been martyred, established his chaplain, Guicelinus, as bishop there. Meanwhile Albert had established his brother, Hermann, in the Estonian bishopric; this see, established at Leal, was moved to Dorpat in 1224. A reaction against the Church came in 1223, but the Knights of the Sword, by cooperating with the bishops, managed to regain their territories and occupy the island of Saarenaa in 1227. Saarenaa was entrusted to the ecclesiastical supervision of Gottfried, another of Albert's kinsmen, and, together with the mainland area of Lääne, became the Diocese of Ösel-Wiek (Latin, Osiliensis), the third Estonian diocese, with its seat at Haapsalu. Dorpat and Ösel-Wiek were suffragan to Riga after it became a metropolitan see in 1255, while Revel remained subject to the archbishops of Lund.

The Knights of the Sword, badly decimated by crusading warfare, merged in 1237 with the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, although the Livonian Knights remained a distinct branch of the order until 1513. Pushing eastward against Novgorod, the order suffered a defeat at the hands of ALEXANDER NEVSKI on the ice of Lake Peipus in 1242. The order remained the dominant political and cultural force in Estonia, although during the 13th century the towns, largely German in population, became increasingly important. Revel, Dorpat, Narva and Fellin (modern Vilyandi) were all members of the Hanseatic League. The vast majority of churchmen, both priests and hierarchy, were Germans, many of them Saxons. In the countryside population, which was becoming rapidly enserfed to the German nobility, indigenous superstitions mixed with Christianity, and the connection between religious faith and serfdom ultimately led a large portion of the population to shun religion altogether. In 1346 Denmark sold its lands in northern Estonia to the Teutonic Knights, prompting the Knights to attempt to annex Livonia to Prussia through the conquest of LITHUANIA. The Knights were defeated in 1410 at the Battle of Tannenberg.

In 1232 the Cistercians founded a monastery at Valkena (German Falkenau), near Dorpat. The Dominicans made foundations at Dorpat, Revel and Narva, while the Franciscans established themselves at Fellin, Dorpat and Wesenberg. By the end of the 16th century there were some 22 monasteries and convents in Estonia.

The Reformation. The bitter conflict between the Teutonic Knights and the Estonian bishops opened the way for the penetration of Lutheran ideas into the country. Lutheran communities were established at Revel, Dorpat and Pernau, where the heresy appealed to the German burgers. Not until the late 1530s did it begin to penetrate the countryside, and even then Protestantism meant little more than the cessation of Catholicism. Preachers and schools, especially for the native population, were lacking. The people followed the lead of their lords, and with the secularization of the order and the bishoprics, they were lost to the faith. The death of Johann von Blankenfield, archbishop of Riga and bishop of Revel and Dorpat, in 1529, marked the end of effective Catholic control in these dioceses.

Worried by the political instability of the area, Ivan (IV) the Terrible of Moscow invaded Estonia in 1558, capturing Narva and Dorpat and carrying the last Catholic bishop of Dorpat, Hermann II Wessal, into captivity. DENMARK and SWEDEN, now Protestant powers, also hoped to achieve territorial gains in Estonia. In 1559 Johann von Münchhausen, bishop of Ösel-Wiek, sold his see to Frederick II of Denmark, who installed his brother, Prince Magnus of Holstein (d. 1583), as the first Protestant prelate. In 1561 the city of Revel, doubting the ability of the order to protect it from Russian advances, submitted to King Eric XIV of Sweden. Their fears were well founded, for in this same year Livonian grand master Gotthard Kettler secularized the order and became duke of Courland, under the protection of King Sigismud Augustus of Poland. In areas under Polish administration, the Jesuit-led COUNTER REFORMATION made remarkable headway, appealing especially to the native population. All this came to an end when, in 1629, Sweden acquired all of mainland Estonia (the islands were added in 1645). Active in the development of the country and the welfare of the native population, Gustavus II of Sweden founded the University of Dorpat in 1634 with a Lutheran theological faculty. In 1721 the Treaty of Nystad confirmed PETER (I) the Great's conquest of the area, and during almost two centuries of Russian rule the Baltic barons, descendants of medieval German conquerors, were once again the dominant economic and political force in Estonia. In the MORAVIAN CHURCH the Estonians first found an opportunity to become pastors to their people. During the period of Russian rule large numbers also entered the Russian ORTHODOX CHURCH. In the last half of the 19th century, the attempts at Russification were met by a rising spirit of nationalism.

The Rise of Communism. The Russian Revolution of 1917 gave Estonia its independence, and in 1918 a truly representative government under Konstantine Päts (d. 1956) came to power. The republic recognized complete freedom of religion, and a Catholic apostolic administration for Estonia was dispatched to Tellinn in 1924. Up until that time there had only been a small number of Polish Catholics in the area, dependent on the Archdiocese of Mogilev. The second administrator, E. Profittlich, SJ, inaugurated a Catholic press with two publications. In 1934 the small Catholic population was organized into six parishes—Tellinn, Tartu, Narva, Valga, Pärnu and Kingisepp—with 12 priests, four of the BYZANTINE rite.

The Russo-German nonaggression pact of 1939 put Estonia, together with Lithuania and Latvia, into the Soviet sphere of influence. In 1940 a people's republic was established to force incorporation into the USSR, although most Western powers refused to recognize this seizure of territory by force.

The communist government closed schools and theological institutions throughout Estonia, while at Tartu University religious studies were abolished and thousands of volumes of theological writings were destroyed. The ongoing translation of the New Testament into Estonian was suspended after the appearance of the Gospel of St. Mark. Archbishop Profittich was deported in June 1941, part of Soviet efforts to root out allegedly "unreliable elements," including Catholic, Lutheran and Orthodox clergy. In the Estonian Orthodox Church ties were dissolved with the patriarch of Constantinople and established with the Russian Orthodox Church in Moscow. The Baltic republics, thus plunged into turmoil, welcomed the German invasion of the USSR on June 22, 1941. However, Nazi genocidal policy quickly raised a moral challenge to the Church; by the end of 1941 the Nazis and local collaborators had slaughtered most of Estonia's Jewish population. Throughout World War II, Estonia also suffered heavily in other ways.

Following the Soviet reconquest, the communist hold on the country intensified. The Church, viewed as a fascist agent of Western intelligence services, received much of Soviet dictator Josef Stalin's attention. Mass deportations between 1945 and 1953 sent thousands to Siberia and other remote regions of the USSR. Prohibitive taxes were levied against the Church, and in 1948 religious instruction in churches was banned. At the same time all Church properties were nationalized, and the buildings "leased" to the Church. A new system of supposedly self-governing religious communities responsible to the government was introduced in an attempt to subvert the traditional Catholic parish system and undermine the clergy's leadership of the faithful. The Lutheran, and to a lesser extent, Orthodox Churches also suffered from repression and flight to the West. By the end of World War II only one-third of Estonia's Lutheran pastors and two-thirds of its Orthodox clergy remained in the country.

Saint Nicholas Church, Tallinn, Estonia. (©Ludovic Maisant/CORBIS)

Coming to power in 1953, Nikita Khrushchev abandoned the terrorism of Stalin. Many deported clergy were allowed to return, and limited official contact with the Holy See was permitted. Unfortunately, this "thaw" was short lived, and repressive policies were again in place by the late 1950s, although without the mass terror of the Stalin years. Repression continued, even as the Soviet government sought to normalize relations with the Vatican, and the Holy See sought an "opening to the east." With antireligious propaganda intensifying, in 1957 only one-fourth of ethnic Estonians declared themselves church members; a decade later it was estimated that the country held about 2,500 Catholics in two parishes served by two priests.

Glastnost and the Fall of Communism. During the Gorbachev era (1985–91) the most egregious restrictions on religion were lifted and ultimately eliminated. In February 1990 uprisings against Soviet domination signaled the reinstatement of the 1920 constitution. In September 1991 the USSR recognized Estonia as an independent republic. The resultant fall-off of trade with Russia caused an economic collapse and required rationing. A new constitution was drafted in 1992 that granted religious freedom, although due to the proliferation of evangelical Protestant and fundamentalist groups in the country all churches were required to register with the government. Efforts were also undertaken by the government to return property confiscated under Soviet rule.

In the wake of communism, the Church in Estonia saw its membership drop, a reflection of the decrease in church attendance throughout the country in the late 1990s. Church leaders focused their efforts on reestablishing primary and secondary schools to supplement the government-provided ecumenical religious instruction available in Estonian public schools. In March 1999 an agreement between the Vatican and the Estonian government agreed to give the Church control over appointment of bishops, recognized the legal validity of Catholic marriages, established the right to teach the faith in public schools and allowed foreign priests to enter the country to tend Estonian parishes.

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 Estonia had eight parishes tended by eight secular and five religious priests. In addition, there were approximately 16 brothers and sisters at work in the country. The Estonian Apostolic Orthodox Church, with its patriarchate in Constantinople, and the Russian Orthodox Church, with its patriarchate in Moscow, both claimed followers in Estonia, although the Moscow patriarchate was unable to obtain government registration by 2000. In 1996 tensions between the two churches provoked the Russian Orthodox Church to break ties with Constantinople, and by 2000 the struggle showed signs of dividing along ethnic lines. Pope John Paul II visited Estonia in 1993, during a trip through the newly independent Baltic states.

Bibliography: L. ARBUSON, Grundriss der Geschichte Liv-Estund Kurlands (4th ed., Riga 1918); Die Einführung der Reformation in Livonia, Estonia und Kurland (Halle 1921). H. KRUUS, Eesti Kirikulugu, 3 v. (Tartu 1935–39). A. M. AMMAN, Kirchenpolitische Wandlungen in Ostbaltikum bis zum Tode Alexander Newskis (Rome 1936). H. SILD, Eesti Kirikulugu vanimast ajast olevikumi (Tartu 1938). E. UUSTALU, The History of the Estonian People (London 1952). R. WITTRAM, Baltische Geschichte; Die Ostseelande Livland, Estland, Kurland, 1180–1918 (Munich 1954). J. AUNVER, ''Religious Life and the Church,'' Aspects of Estonian Culture (London 1961). R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire tonian Culture (London 1961). R. AUBERT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912—) 15:1068–80. F. BENNINGHOVEN, Der Orden der Schwertbrüder (Cologne 1964). The Chronicle of Henry of Livonia, ed. and tr. J. A. BRUNDAGE (Madison, WI 1961). M. BOURDEAUX, Land of Crosses (Chulmleigh, UK 1980). A. LIEVEN, The Baltic Revolution: Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, and the Path to Independence (New Haven, CT 1993). R. J. MISIUNAS and R. TAAGEPERA, The Baltic States: Years of Dependence 1940–1990 (2d ed. Berkeley, CA 1993). T. RAUN, Estonia and Estonians (Stanford, CT 1987). V. S. VARDYS, "Human Rights Issues in Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania," Journal of Baltic Studies 12 (Fall 1981) 275-298. M. HELL-MANN, Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche², eds., J. HOFER and K. RAHNER, 10 v. (2d, new ed. Freiburg 1957–65) 3:1117–19.

[B. J. COMASKEY/EDS.]

ESTOUTEVILLE, GUILLAUME D'

Cardinal, diplomat; b. c. 1412; d. Rome, Jan. 22, 1483. He was canon of St.-Maurice of Angers and apostolic notary when EUGENE IV conferred the bishopric of Angers on him (Feb. 20, 1439). The king of France, Charles VII, would not allow such a derogation of the terms of the PRAGMATIC SANCTION of Bourges (1438) and canonically recognized the man elected by the chapter of the cathedral, Jean Michel. Angered by the king's action, Eugene IV made Guillaume a cardinal (1439). PIUS II translated him to the See of Porto (1459), then to Ostia (1461). The Holy See heaped benefices upon him and granted him in commendam several bishoprics, especially the Archbishopric of Rouen (1453). NICHOLAS V sent him into France in 1451 as legate a latere with the official mandate to work toward the signing of a peace between France and England, but actually he hoped that Guillaume could induce Charles VII to abrogate the Pragmatic Sanction. Charles, however, categorically refused. Guillaume persuaded Charles to open a trial for the reinstatement of JOAN OF ARC and presided personally over the preliminary investigation, May 2 to 3, 1452. He was also able to force the University of PARIS to alter its system of teaching and discipline (Chartularium universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. Denifle and E. Chatelain, 5:713). Thanks to Guillaume's mediation (October 1452), the negotiations between France and Savoy were successful. He managed to effect a detente in the persistently stormy relations between the Dauphin of Viennois and Venaissin County. After his return to Rome (January 1453) he went to Rouen (July 18, 1454). In 1455 he was back in Rome. Out of his wealth he gave liberal gifts to many churches.

Bibliography: G. DU F. BEAUCOURT, Histoire de Charles VII, v.5 (Paris 1896) 189–219, 353–389. G. BOURGIN, "Les Cardinaux français et le diaire Caméral de 1439–1486," Mélanges d'archeologie et d'histoire 24 (1904) 277–316. P. OURLIAC, "La Pragmatique Sanction et la légation en France du cardinal d'Estouteville (1451–1453)," ibid. 55 (1938) 402–432. N. VALOIS, Histoire de la Pragmatique Sanction de Bourges sous Charles VII (Paris 1906) 223–227. W. SCHÜRMEYER, Das Kardinalkollegium unter Pius II (Berlin 1914). P. DONCOEUR and Y. LANHERS, eds. and trs., La Réhabilitation de Jeanne la Pucelle, 2 v. (Paris 1956–58), v.1 L'Enquête ordonnée par Charles VII en 1450, v.2 L'Enquête du cardinal d'Estouteville en 1452. G. MOLLAT, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. A. BAUDRILLART et al. (Paris 1912–) 15:1080–82.

[G. MOLLAT]

ETERNAL WORD TELEVISION NETWORK (EWTN)

The Eternal Word Television Network (EWTN) transmits religious programming around the clock throughout the world. Its studios are located on the grounds of Our Lady of the Angels Monastery in Birmingham, Alabama. Under Catholic auspices, EWTN uses up-to-date technology to offer services that include television (wired and wireless cable, direct broadcast satellite), short-wave and AM/FM radio, news publishing, and online services (www.etwn.com).

The founder and supervisor of EWTN is Mother Angelica, a Franciscan nun. Born Rita Frances Rizzo on April 20, 1923 in Canton, Ohio, she joined the Poor Clares of Perpetual Adoration (PCPA) in Cleveland on August 15, 1944. From 1946 to 1961 she lived at the Santa Clara Monastery in Canton. With an intense desire to found a new convent, Mother Angelica began exploring possibilities. In 1961 an invitation came from Archbishop Thomas Toolan of the Mobile-Birmingham Diocese to establish a new convent in his diocese. In 1962, the monastery of Our Lady of the Angels was dedicated. During the early years of the Birmingham community, they found a number of ways to raise funds to keep the monastery going. They moved from making fishing lures to roasting peanuts and in 1973 decided to begin a book apostolate based on presentations given by Mother Angelica.

Mother Angelica's involvement in television ministry began in March 1978 when she was interviewed by a Chicago station. Following that interview she began videotaping programs for the Christian Broadcasting Network (CBN). By 1978, Mother Angelica had begun making plans for her own production studio to spread the Word and called it the Eternal Word Television Studio. Mother Angelica's dream was to reach common persons, teach them the various types of spirituality, provide family programming for children and adults, be a vehicle of expression for various Catholic organizations, and provide inexpensive but high quality programming for dioceses that could not afford to make their own programs. On September 18, 1980, she applied for a license from the Federal Communications Commission to activate the Eternal Word Television Network (EWTN).

When EWTN began transmission on August 15, 1981, the network reached sixty thousand homes; nineteen years later, the program could be seen in more than 59 million homes around the world. In 1983, EWTN launched its flagship series "Mother Angelica Live." Cablecast live three nights each week, this program combined a Bible lesson taught by Mother Angelica with a talk show featuring prominent Catholic theologians, clergy, and lay persons, as well as entertainers and sports figures. Topics discussed ranged from the traditions of the Catholic faith to current church issues.

What began as a beam of faith has evolved into an international network transmitting Christian programs with a Catholic point of view. EWTN, marketed as the global Catholic network, reaches Europe, Africa, and the Pacific Rim. In 1996 EWTN expanded with Spanish television and radio services in the USA market. In 1999 EWTN announced La Red Global Catolica, the twentyfour-hour Spanish cable network, and Radio Catolica Mundial, EWTN Spanish radio network, which are available not only within the United States but in Central and South America. Hispanic programming originates from over a dozen countries and reflects the diversity of the Hispanic community.

A state-of-the-art web site (www.ewtn.com) reflects a diversity of services and select information concerning the Catholic Church. It offers a library of select church documents, recent statements by the pope and church leaders, a gallery of religious art, catalogue for purchasing Catholic publications and religious art, Catholic Headlines News from Catholic World News, Vatican Information Services and Zenit, as well as "Life on the Rock," which is directed toward young people in their search for networking into Catholic youth groups, Catholic colleges, and religious communities. Visitors to the web site can download video and audio programs and clips to their computers.

In 1984, EWTN became the first religious network to receive one of the cable industries' ACE (Award for Cable Excellence) nominations for a series targeted to a specific audience (the family). In the same year, Mother Angelica received the Gabriel Award for Personal Achievement with EWTN from the National Catholic Association of Communicators (Unda-USA).

Bibliography: "The Electronic Church Spreads the Word," U.S. News & World Report (April 23, 1984). "Determination," Cablevision (Jan. 30,1984). "Satellites that Serve Us," National Geographic (Sept. 1983). "A New Cable-TV Network with a Difference," New York Times (Aug. 15, 1981). SISTER M. RAPHAEL, My Life with Mother Angelica (Our Lady of the Angels Monastery 1982). "The Broadcasting Nun," New Covenant (Nov. 1984). D. O'NEIL, Mother Angelica: Her Life Story (New York 1986).

[A. A. ZUKOWSKI]

ETERNITY

Although its Greek equivalent, $\alpha \dot{i} \omega \nu$, first meant fluid of life, then life, then the maximum span of individual life, the eternal usually signifies—from the ancients down to recent times—what endures without beginning or end, or what is inherently timeless, or what is utterly outside the created order of the universe and time.

History. The following survey points out some of the leading views of eternity in ancient, medieval, and modern thought.

Ancient. Major philosophers prior to, or indifferent to, the influence of Christianity ascribed eternity to divine entities that, while above nature, are part and parcel of the universe. For PLATO (Tim. 37C), the Forms resident in the domain of being abide unchangeably; they simply are, rather than were or will be. Eternity is the timeless being proper to the Forms. What goes on endlessly is not eternity, but time, a derivative everlasting image of eternity. In ARISTOTLE (Meta. 1072b 1–1075a 11), eternity is the perfect all-at-once existence of God, the self-thinking thought. PLOTINUS (Enn. 3.1–6) located the Platonic paradigms in the Intellect, the second of the hypostases. In his view, eternity is the unchanging life of Intellect possessing all things all at once in the present; it is the radiation of the manifold of intelligibles concentrated in the Mind.

Capitalizing on the metaphysics latent in Christian revelation, St. AUGUSTINE (Conf. 11.1–16) added the dimension of TRANSCENDENCE to eternity. Because God is His own existence, He is immutable and eternal. Hence, eternity is the total presentness of the one incommutable being; indeed, God is His eternity. For Augustine, the Forms of Plato, the Intellect of Plotinus, and the self-thinking thought of Aristotle are supertemporal, but none of them utterly transcends time because none is wholly outside of, and infinitely superior to, a universe produced out of nothing. BOETHIUS (De cons. phil. 5.6), also within a Christian framework, formulated a definition that was to become a classic object of medieval commentary: eternity is "the perfect possession of interminable life held wholly all at once." Along with Augustine, Boethius regarded total simultaneity as the proper note; eternity is a standing now, in contrast to the flowing now whose never-ceasing course resembles the plenitude of eternity.

Medieval. ALEXANDER OF HALES (Studia theologica 1.65) singled out interminability as the distinctive element of eternity. His Franciscan colleague, St. BONAVEN-TURE (In 2 sent. 2.1.1.3), differentiated eternity from time and the aevum. Time possesses a before and after with innovation and "veteration," and the aevum a before and after without innovation and "veteration"; but eternity simply lacks a before and after. St. ALBERT THE GREAT (In 4 phys. 4.1-4) sharply distinguished the total simultaneity of eternity from that of aeviternity; eternity measures what is utterly invariable. Eternity is the successionless extent-the nonquantitative continuumof what remains in one mode through all modes. But for St. THOMAS AQUINAS (Summa theologiae 1a, 10.1–6), the now rather than a stretch of time serves as the closest natural analogue of eternity: eternity is the uniformity or perfect possession of what is entirely immutable. The section on doctrine below analyzes this definition and its implications. However, according to DUNS SCOTUS (Quodl. 6.14 and Op. oxon. 1.8.4), life, or actual perfect existence intrinsic to the divine nature, constitutes the subject and foundation of eternity. The other three elements in Boethius's definition, i.e., the interminable, the wholly simultaneous, and perfect possession bespeak extrinsic relations of God. The approach of F. SUÁREZ (Disp. meta. 50.1-3) departed further from that of Aquinas. Interminable life, the exclusion of all mutability in existence, is a secondary factor. Eternity is uncreated duration; not the nature of God, but nonorigination from an outside active potency primarily differentiates eternity from created durations.

Modern. The abandonment of a creative God generally entails the loss of a transcendent eternity among certain moderns. Two philosophers committed to this transcendence base their views on moral or religious convictions that are virtually devoid of theoretical content.

B. SPINOZA reached a concept congruent with his quasi-mathematical monism. "By eternity I understand existence itself insofar as it is conceived to follow necessarily from the definition alone of the eternal thing." This formulation is plainly circular; eternal appears in the definition itself. In addition, an outlook relating God and the universe as ground and consequent blurs what is manifestly noneternal with the eternal.

J. LOCKE defined eternity as an infinity of duration, comparable to an infinity of number, achieved when one thinks of a duration "so much greater as cannot be comprehended." But if eternity is merely an unendingly extended time, its potential infinity is irreconcilable with the immaterial infinity of knowledge and power that Locke attributes to God.

I. KANT nullified his acceptance of a transcendent eternity by emptying the idea of God of theoretical import. Unable to know demonstratively that God is, the mind is persuaded by moral faith that God is eternal. In breaking the causal link between time and eternity, Kantian PHENOMENALISM destroyed for many moderns the possibility of regarding eternity as other than a metaphor or a religious symbol.

G. W. F. HEGEL overcame the Kantian divorce of time and eternity by making them diverse attributes of the one Absolute Idea. In itself eternal, the Spirit necessarily expresses itself in nature and history, so that eternity becomes immanent in time. Whereas Spinoza eternalized time, Hegel temporalized eternity. A One necessarily becoming many is really a dynamic manifold, and in a similar fashion an eternity revealing itself in time is really a finite distension.

Reacting against Hegel's absolutism, S. A. KIERKE-GAARD put time and eternity at opposite poles. Eternity, the forever present identical with pure being, excludes the becoming and "either-or" characteristic of time. Yet existence, one's subjective being, does somehow share in eternity, each moment of decision being filled with eternity. Kierkegaard, somewhat like Kant, posited a theoretically groundless eternity bequeathed by Christian culture to serve the subjective thinker striving for fulfillment. Furthermore, it seems absurd to make each moment big with the plenitude of the eternal.

A. N. WHITEHEAD blended the Platonic Forms with a quasi-Hegelian ingression of the changeless into concretes. Eternal objects, the abstract natures of things, reside in the nontemporal primordial nature of God. Yet in his consequent nature, God is enriched by the creative advance of the universe. Unfortunately, an unconditioned, eternal actuality always potential and subject to time is a self-defeating notion. Eternal objects enmeshed in time are simply constant features of nature abstracted from time.

Doctrine. Four aspects of the realistic account of eternity merit summary exposition: its precise notion, its comparison with noneternal measures, the eternal knowledge of contingents, and the possibility of an ab aeterno world.

Notion. As a being of nature, man has his thinking properly attuned to the quiddities of material things. To grasp beings outside nature, his mind must fall back on the negation of natural traits and the modes of causality and excess. In short, man knows not what God is, but what He is not. So with eternity; one knows it not in itself but in virtue of a transcendent negation of the potential in time and the now. TIME is the number of motion according to before and after. The negation of motion, the before and after, and number yields respectively immobility, sameness, and uniformity. Eternity is, then, the uniformity of the utterly immutable. The ascent to eternity can also start from the now, the number of mobile being. The negation of number issues in unity, the negation of mobile being in a being unaffected by mutability; the result is eternity conceived as the unity of an entirely immutable being. The terminus of an approach made from things measured by time coincides with Boethius's definition. Things in time, existing successively, begin and end; what is measured by eternity is successionless. Thus eternity as measure is interminable life existing wholly all at once.

God alone is truly and properly eternal, since He alone is utterly immutable. The word may be said analogously of other beings insofar as they are in some way immutable. However, Plato's Forms and Whitehead's eternal objects are only metaphorically eternal. UNIVER-SALS are always and everywhere only in a sheerly negative fashion; for, as known, they are objectified in the human intellect, whose discretely temporal operations exclude eternity. Universals and truths are eternal only as existing in an eternal intellect.

Comparison with Noneternal Measures. The aevum is closest to eternity, for it measures angels and human souls, exempt from transmutation. The aevum falls short of eternity because joined together with it are successive spiritual actions.

The now recedes even farther from eternity. While subjectively identical, the flowing now is formally other as other. Wedded to the mobile, the now is inexhaustibly potential to a diversity of positions. Eternity, by contrast, measures an immutable infinite act; humanly speaking, it is a nunc stans, stationary in that it is perfectly identical without differentiation of phases.

Nevertheless, the now is the moving image of eternity. As indivisible, and therefore most knowable in time, it reflects the perfectly indivisible measure. The now is the point of intersection of eternity and time; it is like the moving point on a circumference whose minimal indivisible act imitates in nature the maximal indivisible act of the transcendent center and measure of all being.

Thus, eternity and the now are analogically one; eternity is to God as the now is to the universal physical cause. The proportional resemblance is founded on the formal causality exercised by eternity with respect to inferior measures. God is so present in other things as the cause of their being that His principal causality does not liquidate, but uses created agents as secondary causes. Similarly, eternity is effective in the now as remote formal cause of its indivisibility, so that the now remains a secondary formal cause unifying cosmic time. Spinoza, Hegel, and Whitehead confuse this causal nexus with an essential unity; Spinoza makes eternity and time one in number, while Hegel and Whitehead make them one in genus or species.

Eternal Knowledge of Contingents. Like the center of a circle directly opposite every designated point on the circumference, eternity is simultaneously present to every instant of time. Each part of time coexists with the whole of eternity, although this part may be past or future in relation to other parts of time. Hence, every event in time is present to eternity; God sees each event actually occurring. Applied to the problem of divine knowledge of future contingents, this means that the copresence to eternity of events past, present, and future assures God an infallible and necessary knowledge of future contingents, including free acts. A contingent event is one actively or passively indeterminate in its causes; its indetermination lies in reference to the future, but once caused, it obviously occurs as this determinate event rather than some other. Socrates need not sit down while lecturing today, but if he is seen sitting down, he is necessarily sitting down. Just as it is evident to any observer that Socrates is now sitting down, so every event in the whole history of the universe is infallibly known by eternal vision, since the whole of time is copresent to the whole of eternity.

Possibility of an Eternal World. An allied problem concerns the eternity, here meaning perpetuity, of the universe. One view, implied by every absolutistic metaphysics, holds that the nature of divine action necessitates an eternal world. An effect must be proportional to its cause, but the conclusion that an eternal cause must produce ab aeterno beings is based on the faulty assumption that God generates the universe by natural necessity. God creates according to intellect and will; i.e., He freely determines that the universe will exist after not existing. According to a second opinion, popular with some scholastics, an eternal world is impossible, because to be beginningless is incompatible with being a creature and because an infinite time is untraversable. Indeed creature entails a principle of origin, but not a principle of a duration. Second, since each segment of an eternal time-line would cover a finite distance, it is no more difficult to conceive a time-line without an initial term than one without an end. Thus, an eternal world is neither necessary nor impossible. As God has revealed, the universe was in fact created in time. God so created without necessity and with reason, but the precise reason is hidden in the depths of divine wisdom. (See UNIVERSE, ORIGIN OF; CREATION.)

See Also: TIME; NOW.

Bibliography: M. J. ADLER, ed., The Great Ideas: A Syntopicon of Great Books of the Western World (Chicago 1952) 1:437–450. R. AMERIO, Enciclopedia filosofica (Venice-Rome 1957) 2:166–177. R. EISLER, Wörterbuch der philosophischen Begriffe (Berlin 1927–30) 1:420–424. J. GUITTON, Le Temps et l'éternité chez Plotin et saint Augustin (3d ed. Paris 1959). J. F. AN-DERSON, The Cause of Being: The Philosophy of Creation in St. Thomas (St. Louis 1952). B. GERRITY, Nature, Knowledge, and God (Milwaukee 1947). H. F. HALLETT, Aeternitas (Oxford 1930). R. ONIANS, The Origins of European Thought (2d ed. Cambridge, Eng. 1954). I. LECLERC, Whitehead's Metaphysics (New York 1958).

[J. M. QUINN]

ETERNITY OF GOD

The eternity of God contains two interrelated aspects. First, God has no beginning and no end. God always was, is, and will be. Second, God is timeless, that is, unlike creatures for whom time marks the changes they experience and undergo, God is immutably the same and so is not subject to the changes marked by time and thus does not experience time. As transcending the created order of change, he is timeless.

Biblical Basis. The Old Testament testifies to the fact that God always was. Abraham called on "the name of the Lord, the Everlasting God" (Gn 21:33). The Psalms speak of God being everlasting. Before creation "from everlasting to everlasting you are God" (Ps 89/ 90:2, see Hb 1:12; Is 40:28). God's throne is established from of old for "you are from everlasting" (Ps 92/93:2). Unlike creatures and humankind who come to be and perish, "you, O Lord, are enthroned forever; your name endures to all generations . . . you do endure . . . you are the same, and your years have no end" (Ps 101/102:12, 24, 26, 27; see Is 63:16). Daniel in his vision sees "the Ancient of Days'' (Dn 7:13). As creator, God existed prior to all else (see Gn 1, Jb 38, Prv 8). Because God is everlasting and so forever faithful to his promises, he is able to be present to and active within every generation of Israel (see Gn 26:24; 28:13–15; Ex 4:5; 6:3–8; Dt 34:4; Jos 1:3-7; 3:7; 24:2-13). God's mercy, kindness, name, love and salvation are everlasting (Ps 99/100:5, 102/ 103:17; Is 45:17, 54:8, 56:5; Jer 31:3). God "inhabits eternity" (Is 57:15). The New Testament not only testifies to the eternity of the Father but also to the eternity of the Son/Word. It is through the Word or Son that the Father created the universe and so he too is before all else and is thus everlasting (Jn 1:1-3; Heb 1:1-12). The Son possesses eternal life with the Father and it is through the Son that those who believe come to eternal redemption and so share in eternal life (2 Tim 2:10; Heb 5:9, 9:12, 9:15; Mt 25:46; Jn 3:15, 6:54; Rom 6:23, 1 Jn 1:2). This was all in accord with the Father's eternal plan (Eph 3:11). The Holy Spirit is the pledge that guarantees the eternal life of those who believe (Eph 1:13–14, 4:30). God's actions, as narrated within the Old Testament, reveal that he is the everlasting God. This revelation finds its culmination in the New Testament where God is revealed to be an eternal trinity of persons through whose actions humankind is enabled to share in their eternal life. Only if God possesses eternal life in himself is he able to share that life with humankind.

Christian Tradition. While the early Fathers of the Church upheld the eternity of God, it was Augustine who first examined it in any depth, and he did so within his analysis of time. Human beings find it difficult to conceive eternity for their minds are fixed on things that change "and have a past and future." However, "in the eternal, nothing is transient, but the whole is present. But no time is wholly present . . . Who will lay hold on the human heart to make it still, so that it can see how eternity, in which there is neither future nor past, stands still and dictates future and past times?" (Conf., XI, 13). For Anselm that which is not subject to space and time is greater than that which is, thus God alone is eternal for he does not come to be or cease to be (Proslog., 13). It is Boethius who provides the classic definition of eternity: "Eternity is the simultaneously whole and perfect possession of interminable life" (The Consolation of Philosophy, 5). Aquinas argues, following Aristotle's and Augustine's understanding of time, that time is the numbering of before and after within movement. Since God is not in movement in that he does not change from potency to act, he is outside of movement and thus outside of time, and in this "consists the idea of eternity" (Summa Theologiae, 1, 10, 1). "The idea of eternity follows immutability, as the idea of time follows movement

. . . . Hence, as God is supremely immutable, it supremely belongs to him to be eternal'' (Summa Theologiae, 1, 10, 2). For Aquinas, then, because God is being itself (ipsum esse) and thus pure act (actus purus), he must be eternal in the sense both of having no beginning and no end (interminable life), and of being timeless (no succession). As pure act, God possesses, in accordance with Boethius, the fullness and totality of interminable perfect life simultaneously. The Church attributes eternity to the Godhead as indistinct from the persons (Vatican I, H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer, 3001). Duration excluding a beginning is exclusively divine (Lateran IV, Enchiridion symbolorum 800).

Contemporary Thought. Many of those who deny God's immutability also deny that he is timeless. Some, such as process philosophers and theologians, and, others, like P. Fiddes, N. Pike, R. Swinburne, and K. Ward, argue that God changes through his interaction with the created order and thus there is successive change within him which demands that he experiences time. (See IMMU-TABILITY OF GOD.) B. Davies argues that while God does not change, there is duration within God. This he believes is more in accord with Aquinas's teaching that God is present to and embraces all time. This understanding would appear to alleviate the problem of how a timeless God can relate to temporal reality. However, in Aquinas's view the reason God is immutable is that he is pure act, and the very notion of pure act abolishes the notion not only of time but also of duration. As pure act everything that God experiences is contained within and experienced as the pure act that he is. While God as pure act endures, there is no duration within pure act for it is the one simultaneous timeless act that God perfectly and total is. One cannot predicate of God not only a past and a future, but also, strictly speaking, "a present", as if God existed in an "eternal now", for this too would imply an everlasting unchanging duration. For God to be eternal, in the sense of being timeless, negates even "the present" within God, for "the present" is a concept founded upon the human experience of time as that which is neither past nor future. For God to be eternal means that God is present to himself and is present to all else in being present to himself, but not in "a present."

While theologians, past and present, have focused their attention on the eternity of God in so far as God is one, yet it must be said that the persons of the Trinity are equally eternal both in that they have no beginning and no end and are timeless. The Father is eternally the Father for he eternally begets the Son and eternally loves the Son in the eternal spiration of the Holy Spirit. The Son is eternally the Son because he is both eternally begotten and in that he eternally loves the Father is the same eternal Spirit. The Holy Spirit is eternally the Holy Spirit because he eternally comes forth from the eternal Father and Son as their love for one another and in that he eternally conforms the Father to be the loving Father of the Son and the loving Son of the Father. The persons of the Trinity then eternally subsist as who they are within their eternal relationships with one another. These subsisting relations which define the persons of the trinity are eternally and fully in act and thus are timeless. The Athanasian Creed (Quicumque vult) professes: "The Father is eternal, the Son is eternal, and the Holy Spirit is eternal. Nevertheless, there are not three eternal beings, but one eternal being" (see also Nicaea, Enchiridion symbolorum 126; The Council of Rome, Enchiridion symbolorum 162; Lateran IV, Enchiridion symbolorum 800; Lyon II, Enchiridion symbolorum 851-53).

Bibliography: T. AQUINAS, Summa Theologiae, I.10.1–6. B. DAVIES, "A Timeless God", New Blackfriars 64 (1983) 215-24; The Thought of Thomas Aquinas (Oxford 1992). H. GORIS, Free Creatures of an Eternal God (Utrecht 1990). W. GUDERSDORF VON JESS, "Divine Eternity in the Doctrine of Augustine," Augustinian Studies 6 (1975) 75-96. P. HELM, Eternal God: A Study of God without Time (Oxford 1988). C. HUGHES, On a Complex Theory of a Simple God: An Investigation in Aquinas's Philosophical Theology (Ithaca, N.Y. 1989). C. PETER, Participated Eternity in the Vision of God (Rome 1964). N. PIKE, God and Timelessness (London 1970). G. L. PRESTIGE, God in Patristic Thought (London 1952). R. SORABJI, Time, Creation and the Continuum (Ithaca, N.Y. 1983). E. STUMP and N. KRETZMANN, "Eternity," in The Concept of God, ed. T. V. MORRIS (Oxford 1987), 219-52. T. G. WEINANDY, The Father's Spirit of Sonship: Reconceiving the Trinity (Edinburgh 1995).

[T. G. WEINANDY]

ETHELBERT, KING OF EAST ANGLIA, ST.

Martyr, d. 794. According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, he was killed at the order of Offa II of Mercia, perhaps because he stood for an independent East Anglia. Later hagiographers described him as a pious youth who wished to lead a celibate life, but was persuaded to propose marriage to Elfthryth, Offa's daughter. He was murdered at an interview with the king on the instigation of the queen. His body was later buried in the cathedral of HEREFORD. He became patron saint of Hereford and is honored by extensive services in the Hereford Breviary (Henry Bradshaw Society 40:167–182; 46:31–36). His feast is now observed in the Dioceses of Cardiff, Wales, and Northampton, England.

Feast: May 20.

Bibliography: T. D. HARDY, Descriptive Catalogue of Materials Relating to the History of Britain and Ireland, 3 v. (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores (London 1858–1896) 26; London 1862–71) 1.2:494–496. J. EARLE and C. PLUMMER, eds., Two of the Saxon Chronicles Parallel, 2 v. (Oxford 1892–99) 1:55, 2:61–62. M. R. JAMES, ed., "Two Lives of St. Ethelbert" English Historical Review 32 (1917) 214–244. Landesbibliothek Gotha MS I, No. 81, folios 30–39, see P. GROSJEAN, Analecta Bollandiana 58 (1940) 92–93. W. STUBBS, A Dictionary of Christian Biography, ed. W. SMITH and H. WACE, (London 1877–1887) 2:215–216. R. STANTON, A Menology of England and Wales (New York 1887) 220–221. A. T. BANNISTER, The Cathedral Church of Hereford (London 1924).

[B. W. SCHOLZ]

ETHELBERT, KING OF KENT, ST.

Reigned 560 to Feb. 24, 616; b. c. 550. The first Christian Anglo-Saxon king and lawgiver of Kent, he was the son of Eormenric, king of Kent, a descendant of Hengest. The early years of his reign were marked by a struggle with Ceawlin of Wessex for royal supremacy (Bretwaldaship). In pursuit of this objective Ethelbert sought the assistance and prestige of a marriage alliance with the MEROVINGIAN rulers of the Franks and obtained the hand of Bertha, daughter of Charibert, King of the Franks. Since Bertha was a Christian, the marriage arrangements provided for a Frankish bishop as her chaplain, and for the old Roman church of St. Martin in Canterbury as a place for her worship. This Continental connection brought in its wake the mission of AUGUSTINE OF CANTERBURY, sent out by Pope GREGORY I for the conversion of the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes in England. In 597, Augustine was welcomed courteously by Ethelbert, and quarters were assigned him. Later that same year the king accepted Baptism from the hands of the Roman missionary. Ethelbert seems to have been then at the height of his power, having become the acknowledged Bretwalda at the death of Ceawlin.

The king showed himself a paternal benefactor of the Church. He founded churches at Canterbury and Rochester. It was his influence that altered Gregory's plan to make London the primatial see, and the primacy remained at CANTERBURY. He arranged for a second bishopric at ROCHESTER, and endowed the first ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL at London. Through his influence the kings of Essex and East Anglia became Christians. In all of this he allowed no forced conversions, and it was probably this same sense of rectitude that lay behind his issuance in 604 of the Kentish laws that bear his name, and which were written in imitation of the old Roman codes. By Bertha he left at least three children, including his successor, the pagan King Eadbald. In religious art he is represented as holding a sword and a church.

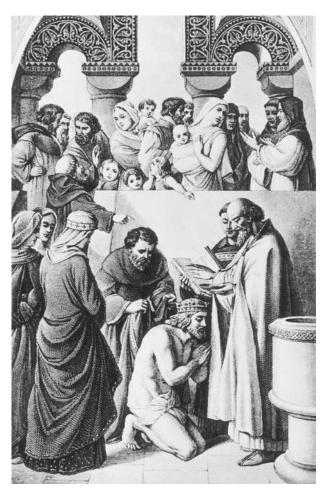

Feast: Feb. 25.

Bibliography: BEDE, Ecclesiastical History, 2 v., tr. J. E. KING based on the version of T. STAPLETON (Loeb Classical Library; New York 1930) bks. 1–2. His dooms are given in F. LIEBERMANN, ed., Die Gestze der Angelsachsen, 3 v. (Halle 1898–1916; repr. 1960) 1:3–8. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947) 33–112. S. BRECHTER, Die Quellen zur Angelsachsenmission Gregors des Grossen (Münster 1941).

[J. L. DRUSE]

ETHELBERT OF YORK

Archbishop of York; d. York, England, Nov. 8, c. 781. He was related to Archbishop EGBERT, under whom he directed the school of YORK and whom he succeeded in that see. Consecrated in 767, he received the PALLIUM from Pope ADRIAN I in 773. As a teacher of grammar and rhetoric he is referred to with affection by his pupil AL-

"The Baptism of Ethelbert of Kent by St. Augustine," after a fresco painting by William Dyce (1846) in the House of Lords, London, England. (©Baldwin H. Ward and Kathryn C. Ward/ CORBIS)

CUIN. Ethelbert traveled to Rome at least once and as archbishop undertook the restoration of the cathedral of York that Alcuin described, seemingly particularly impressed by the 30 altars, many encrusted with precious stones. In his later years Ethelbert consecrated his pupil Eanbald (d. 796) as his successor and retired from active life. He was buried in the cathedral at York, which he had helped to consecrate a short time before his death.

Bibliography: A. W. HADDEN and W. STUBBS, eds., Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78), 3:435–437, letter of Lull to Ethelbert and Ethelbert's reply. ALCUIN, De pontificibus et sanctis ecclesiae eboracensis carmen in The Historians of the Church of York and Its Archbishops, ed. J. RAINE, 3 v. (Rolls Series 71; 1879–94) 1:390–397. E. DÜMMLER, ed., Alcuini sive Albini epistulae, Monumenta Germaniae Historica: Epistolares 2:112, 114, 116, 121, 143, 148, 200, 232, 233, 271. Epistulae Bonifacii et Lulli, ibid. 3:124. H. DAUPHIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15:1158–59. G. HOCQUARD, Catholicisme 1:172.

[V. I. J. FLINT]

ETHELBURGA, SS.

There are three contemporary saints by this name. (1) Ethelburga of Barking; d. c. 676. A sister of Bishop ERCONWALD OF LONDON, she was the first abbess of the double monastery at BARKING.

Feast: Oct. 12 (Diocese of Brentwood).

(2) Ethelburga (or Aubierge, Edilburga); d. 695. A sister of St. ETHELREDA, she was abbess of FAREMOU-TIERS when she died.

Feast: July 7.

(3) Ethelburga (or Tata) of Lyminge; d. c. 644. The daughter of King ETHELBERT and Bertha. In the course of her father's diplomatic and apostolic maneuvers, she married the pagan King EDWIN OF NORTHUMBRIA. Bishop PAULINUS accompanied her to the north as her chaplain and became the first bishop of YORK. Together they labored to spread the knowledge of Christianity throughout Northumbria, their biggest obstacle being the firm paganism of Edwin. Pope BONIFACE V sent her a letter of encouragement. After the birth of a daughter, Edwin renounced his ancestral rites and became a Christian (627). an act that contributed to his death in the Battle of Heathfield in 633. After Ethelburga retired to Kent with her two children, her son was sent on to Gaul, where he died at the court of King Dagobert; her daughter ultimately married Oswy, king of Northumbria. Ethelburga herself founded the Abbey at Lymynge where she died as abbess.

Feast: April 5.

Bibliography: BEDE, Historia ecclesiastica, ed. C. PLUMMER (Oxford 1896, repr. 1956) bks. 2, 3, 4. Acta Sanctorum Oct. 5:649–652; July 2:481–482. A. BUTLER, The Lives of the Saints, ed. H. THURSTON and D. ATTWATER (New York 1956) 4:95–96; 3:34; 2:35. A. M.. ZIMMERMANN, Kalendarium Benedictinum: Die Heiligen und Seligen des Benediktinerorderns und seiner Zweige (Metten 1933–1938) 2:20–21. F. L. CROSS, The Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (London 1957) 465. J. DUBOIS, Catholicisme 3:1330.

[J. L. DRUSE]

ETHELHARD (AETHELHEARD) OF CANTERBURY

Archbishop; d. May 12, 805. The creation of the Mercian archbishopric of Lichfield in the 780s at the instigation of King Offa had ended the primacy of CANTER-BURY's jurisdiction in southern England. When Ethelhard, Abbot of "Hlud" (probably Louth in Lincolnshire), was elevated to Canterbury under Mercian influence following Archbishop Jaenbert's death (Aug. 12, 791), Kentish opposition caused his consecration by Archbishop Hygebert of Lichfield to be postponed until July 21, 793. In 796 a Kentish revolt under the apostate cleric Eadbert Praen forced Ethelhard into exile. Cenwulf, the new king of Mercia, and Ethelhard collaborated in breaking the revolt, and it was their correspondence with Pope LEO III that brought the reassertion of Canterbury's primacy. Journeying to Rome, Ethelhard received papal confirmation of the rights of his see (802), a judgment implemented by Cenwulf and Ethelhard at the Council of Clovesho (803), which abolished the archbishopric of Lichfield and maintained southern English ecclesiastical unity under Canterbury. Episcopal declarations of faith and obedience to the metropolitan apparently began in England during these troubles. Sources for Ethelhard include the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, FLORENCE OF WORCESTER, SIMEON OF DURHAM, and WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY.

Bibliography: A. W. HADDAN and W. STUBBS, Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents Relating to Great Britain and Ireland, 3 v. in 4 (Oxford 1869–78) v.3. W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:887–889. F. M. STENTON, Anglo-Saxon England (2d ed. Oxford 1947).

[W. A. CHANEY]

ETHELNOTH OF CANTERBURY, ST.

Archbishop, called "the Good"; d. Oct. 29, 1038. Son of ealdorman Aethelmaer, Ethelnoth (or Æthelnoth) was a monk of GLASTONBURY and dean of Christ Church, CANTERBURY, before his consecration to that see by WUL-FSTAN OF WORCESTER, archbishop of York, (Nov. 13, 1020). BENEDICT VIII received him in Rome "with much honor" and gave him the PALLIUM (1022). Archbishop Ethelnoth was chief advisor to King CANUTE OF EN-GLAND, who granted him the earliest known writ bestowing judicial and financial authority on an English prelate and presented his gold crown to Ethelnoth's cathedral. The archbishop translated the martyred ALPHEGE OF CAN-TERBURY's relics from London to Canterbury with great pomp (1023). Ethelnoth's death overwhelmed Bishop Aethelric of Sussex, who did not wish to survive the beloved archbishop and died within a week. Ethelnoth's life is recounted in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and in the writings of FLORENCE OF WORCESTER, SIMEON OF DUR-HAM, WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY and GERVASE OF CAN-TERBURY.

Feast: Oct. 30.

Bibliography: W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900) 6:889. C. COTTON, The Saxon Cathedral at Canterbury and the Saxon Saints Buried Therein (Manchester, Eng. 1929). H. DAUPHIN, Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques (Paris 1912–) 15: 1165–66.

[W. A. CHANEY]

ETHELREDA, QUEEN OF NORTHUMBRIA, ST.

Abbess, most popular of Anglo-Saxon women saints; b. Exning, Suffolk, England, c. 630; d. Ely, June 23, 679. Etheldreda (Ediltrudis or Ethelreda) was the daughter of Anna, King of East Anglia. While young she was married to Tonbert, a prince of the Gyrvii who endowed her with the land now called the Isle of Ely. She apparently lived in virginity with him, and after his early death she formally embraced the religious life for five years. Diplomatic considerations brought her out of the convent, and she was married to Egfrid, ultimately king of Northumbria. She seems never to have lived in wedlock with her husband, although there was a spirited argument about her marital duties in which St. WILFRID apparently supported her vocation to virginity. After 12 years Egfrid consented to her return to the convent, and she took the veil at Coldingham from Wilfrid. A year later she returned to ELY where she became abbess. After her death from the plague (which she foretold), her shrine became one of the principal sites of pilgrimage in England. The later form of her name "Audrey" gave rise to the word "tawdry" because of the cheap souvenirs hawked at her shrine. The church bearing her name in London's Ely Place is the only Catholic church in the metropolis whose structure dates to the Middle Ages. In art, St. Etheldreda is frequently represented as a crowned abbess.

Feast: June 23.

Bibliography: Acta Sanctorum June 5 (1863) 417–495. BEDE, Ecclesiastical History 4.3. Liber Eliensis, ed. E. O. BLAKE (Camden 3d ser., v.92; London 1962). Liber Eliensis, ed. E. O. BLAKE (London 1962), attributed variously to THOMAS OF ELY and RICHARD OF ELY. C. W. STUBBS, Historical Memorials of Ely Cathedral (New York 1897) 1–94.

[J. L. DRUSE]

ETHELWOLD OF WINCHESTER, ST.

Leader of English monastic revival; b. c. 908; d. Aug. 1, 984. He was tonsured and ordained by ALPHEGE "THE BALD" OF WINCHESTER, who prophesied Ethelwold's succession to Winchester. Having been a Bene-

St. Ethelreda, Queen of Northumbria, miniature from the "Benedictional of St. Ethelwold," written at Hyde Abbey, c. 965.

dictine of GLASTONBURY, Ethelwold (Æthelwold) was given ABINGDON ABBEY (c. 954), which he refounded, introducing Continental, especially Fleury practices (see SAINT-BENOÎT-SUR-LOIRE), and creating a model for the monastic revival (see DUNSTAN OF CANTERBURY, ST.; OSW-ALD OF YORK).

In 963 Ethelwold was consecrated bishop of WIN-CHESTER, where he expelled the worldly clerics and substituted monks at the Old and New Minsters. His harsh methods were perhaps justified by the decayed conditions they met and were supported by King EDGAR THE PEACE-FUL, for whom he was tutor and adviser. The "Father of the Monks," Ethelwold restored or founded monasteries at PETERBOROUGH (966), ELY (970), THORNEY (972), and perhaps Chertsey, Milton, CROWLAND, and St. Neot's. Austere but generous and of immense energy, he rebuilt his cathedral, restored ruined minsters, taught and translated, and reformed Church music. He prepared the Regularis Concordia (ed. and tr. T. Symons, London 1953) a customary for English religious. A skillful craftsman, he stimulated the Winchester School of manuscript production. The best sources for his life are the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and biographies by Wulfstan of Winchester (Patrologia Latina 137:79) and AELFRIC GRAMMATICUS, in the Chronicon Monasterii de Abingdon (Rerum Brittanicarum medii aevi scriptores), translated by S. H. Gem (1912).

Feast: Aug. 1.

Bibliography: WULFSTAN OF WINCHESTER, The Life of St. Aethelwold, ed. M. LAPIDGE and M. WINTERBOTTOM (Oxford 1991). W. HUNT, The Dictionary of National Biography from the Earliest Times to 1900 (London 1885–1900), 6:901–904. J. A. ROBINSON, The Times of Saint Dunstan (Oxford 1923). D. J. V. FISHER, "The Early Biographers of St. E.," English Historical Review 67 (1952) 381–391. D. KNOWLES, The Monastic Order in England 943–1216 (Cambridge, Eng. 1962). M. WINTERBOTTOM, Three Lives of English Saints (Toronto 1972). G. B. BRYAN, Ethelwold and Medieval Music-Drama at Winchester: The Easter Play, its Author, and its Milieu (Berne 1981). R. DESHMAN, The Benedictional of Æthelwold (Princeton, N.J. 1995). M. GRETSCH, The Intellectual Foundations of the English Benedictine Reform (Cambridge, U.K. 1999).

[W. A. CHANEY]

ETHICAL FORMALISM

A theory of ETHICS holding that moral value is determined by formal, and not material, considerations. Material and formal are here related by analogy to their physical meanings (see MATTER AND FORM). The material aspects of a moral act include what is done and its consequences, while the formal aspects are the law and the attitude and intention of the agent. Usually ethical formalism refers to views of the Kantian type, although intuitionism too is formalistic in a wide sense. A formalistic ethics is called such because it holds that an agent's disposition, taken without reference to any material aspect, determines the morality of his actions, just as form determines the nature of a material subject.

Immanuel KANT is the classic example of a formalist. For him nothing can possibly be conceived as an absolute GOOD, except a good WILL. A will, however, is good only insofar as it does its duty out of sheer dutifulness, and not because of what it achieves or is capable of achieving. Moral goodness is submissiveness to the law that imposes duties. This law is unique, necessary, universal, and inherent in reason itself. It is the CATEGORICAL IM-PERATIVE: "Act only on that maxim whereby you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law." It is also purely formal; it does not specify any concrete duties, but merely provides a criterion whereby one can determine what his duties are. And since it does not allow any exceptions, it entails RIGORISM.

By emphasizing the rationality of the moral law, Kant did much to curb the excessive EMPIRICISM and sentimentalism that was current in ethics in his day. He was right also in insisting that morally good acts can proceed only from a free will with a right intention. Again, his categorical imperative expresses a valid insight, that the moral law must be consistent and universal. However, as a norm of morality it is negative and inadequate. With it, Kant may show what cannot be a duty, but when discussing man's obligations in the concrete, he has surreptitiously to introduce considerations of consequences and ends. For it is impossible to divorce, as he tries, the notions of goodness and TELEOLOGY. It is also a serious defect in a moral theory to ignore the nature and circumstances of an act whose morality is to be determined. Again, it is incorrect to identify the good with acting out of mere dutifulness. In a sound ethics the central notions are those of nature, end, and good; duty is a subordinate concept. Many good acts are not duties. The spontaneous, exhilarating love of the good attained in an act may in itself be a better reason for doing it than any duty. Finally, one should point out that only God, by His essence and not merely by His will, is absolutely good and, in addition, also the source of all goodness.

Formalistic views of one type or another have been held also by Jean Jacques ROUSSEAU, Hermann Cohen (1842–1918), Paul Natorp (1854–1924), J. F. HERBART, Josiah ROYCE, and Simone de Beauvoir (b. 1908).

See Also: ETHICS, HISTORY OF; KANTIANISM; NEOKANTIANISM.

Bibliography: J. D. COLLINS, A History of Modern European Philosophy (Milwaukee 1954). J. LECLERCQ, Les Grandes lignes de la philosophie morale (rev. ed. Paris 1954).

[G. J. DALCOURT]

ETHICS

The philosophical study of voluntary human action, with the purpose of determining what types of activity are good, right, and to be done (or bad, wrong, and not to be done) that man may live well. This article deals with the general features of ethics that are common to most types of classical ethical theory; of the ethics of St. Thomas Aquinas, with variant modern interpretations; and of the main schools of ethics in the Catholic tradition.

General Characteristics. As a philosophical study, ethics is a science, or intellectual habit, that treats information derived from man's natural experience of the problems of human life, from the point of view of natural reasoning. Thus, ethics (etymologically connected with Gr. $\check{e}\Theta\varsigma$, meaning custom or conduct) is equivalent in meaning to moral philosophy (from Lat. mos, meaning custom or behavior). It is also generally regarded as a practical science, in the sense that the objective of the study is not simply to know, but to know which actions should be done and which should be avoided.

The subject matter of ethics is voluntary human conduct: this includes all actions, and also omissions, over which man exercises personal control because he understands and wills these actions (and omissions) in relation to some end he has in view. Such conduct is voluntary, in contrast to not-voluntary activities (digestion of food, accidental falling), which are not under the direction of intellect and will. Included within the scope of ethics, however, are somewhat involuntary activities (e.g., visiting a dentist, doing disagreeable work) that are performed with repugnance, yet involve some degree of personal approval. Perhaps most moral actions are less than perfectly voluntary (see VOLUNTARITY). What the ethicist aims at, then, is a reflective, well-considered, and reasonable set of conclusions concerning the kinds of voluntary activities that may be judged GOOD or suitable (or EVIL and unsuitable) for a human agent in the context of man's life as a whole, including his relations to other beings whom his actions influence in some significant way. Most systems of ethics also relate human actions to some overall goal of living: the knowing or loving of the perfect good, the higher welfare of the person or of his society, happiness or pleasure, or some such ideal or real end (see GOOD, THE SUPREME).

What distinguishes ethics from other studies of human conduct is the ethicist's interest in what constitutes a good human life, rather than in what makes a person, for example, a successful plumber or painter. The formal objective of ethics implies a distinctive meaning of right and wrong as generally applied to human conduct. Man's actions are studied in other disciplines also, in PSYCHOLOGY, in sociology, even in history, but the primary interest in these areas is not concerned with what man "ought" to do but with "how" he operates, personally, socially, or in the context of mankind's past. Such studies are non-normative; they do not deal primarily with "ought" judgments. Politics treats human action in relation to state welfare; economics relates it to the production and distribution of wealth. In ancient and medieval thought, these two studies were parts of ethics; today, they have become non-normative, and are regarded as outside the scope of ethics. Law and theory of law are closer to ethics; they are normative. However, modern civil and criminal law deal only with activities that have some bearing on public welfare and are capable of regulation by human legislatures and courts.

Thomistic Ethics. By St. THOMAS AQUINAS, ethics is treated in the Exposition of Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics. Some scholars regard this work as an impersonal explanation of Aristotle and not as a personal statement of Aquinas's own views. Others take it as what St. Thomas thought, in philosophy, concerning moral conduct. Aquinas described four kinds of rational order, each requiring a special intellectual habit (In 1 eth. 1.2). The habit of the philosophy of nature enables one to think of the order found to exist among all real beings, apart from any effect of man's activity (this habit includes even metaphysics). Next are the habits that enable one to order his own thinking (logic) and the production of useful or beautiful artifacts (art). Finally, there is the habit of ethics: "The order in voluntary actions belongs to the consideration of moral philosophy." Thomas, here, appears to speak personally about ethics, saying something that is not in Aristotle's text. "And so, to moral philosophy (which we are now treating) it is proper to think about human actions, as they are ordered among themselves and in relation to their ends. Now, I say human operations, those which issue from man's will according to the ordering of reason. . . . Just as the subject matter of natural philosophy is motion, or mobile reality, so the subject matter of moral philosophy is human action as ordered to an end, or even man as he is acting voluntarily for the sake of an end" (ibid. 1.3).

From this, it is clear that St. Thomas regards ethics as a practical, even a productive, science: for it brings rational order into the domain of man's own voluntary acts. Yet, there is also a speculative character to Thomistic ethics, particularly in its consideration of the general theory of what constitutes good action. In a famous text (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 94.2) where Thomas explains how we know the most basic judgments of natural moral law, he parallels the work of ethics with that of metaphysics. As the metaphysician starts with the understanding of BEING and bases all his consequent judgments on it, so does the moral scientist start with the meaning of good and move to the initial judgment: "Good is to be done and sought after; evil [not-good] is to be avoided" (ibid.). This is the starting point of all practical reasoning. Although this statement occurs in a theological work, it explains how a man comes to know what is morally good or evil in a natural way. "Since the good has the rational character of an end, and evil has the contrary meaning, as a consequence, reason naturally apprehends all things to which man has a natural inclination as goods and, therefore, as things to be sought after in working, and their contraries are apprehended as evils and as things to be avoided" (ibid.). There follows, in the same text, a description of natural inclinations on the level of physical substance, of animal life, and of rational life. This third level is distinctive of man: the good in accord with reason is truly ethical.

More than this start, however, is needed to work out the rules of a good life: they cannot be deduced merely from the notion of good. Experience of the facts of human action, with adequate knowledge of the circumstances in which men operate, form the empirical base from which the ethicist must make practical judgments on the suitability of various kinds of human action. Thomistic ethics is not a deductive rationalism (see Klubertanz, "The Empiricism . . .").

Ethics and Moral Theology. Some difference of opinion is found among Thomists on the relation of ethics to MORAL THEOLOGY. Much of the finest moral thought of Aquinas is expressed in his theological writings: the third books of both his Commentary on the Sentences and his Summa contra Gentiles, the disputed questions On Evil and On the Virtues, and the Summa theologiae, 1a2ae and 2a2ae. All are agreed that moral theology uses data and standards of judgment stemming from supernatural revelation. In the Bible, in the Fathers of the Church, in decisions of popes and councils, in the living tradition of Christianity, are many items of moral wisdom that are accepted on faith by Christians. These have been formed into a rich heritage of moral doctrine by theologians. A purely philosophical ethics cannot use such revealed knowledge. So, the start and the way of thinking of the moral theologian are different from those of the natural ethicist. St. Thomas puts it neatly: "As sacred doctrine is based on the light of faith, so is philosophy founded on the natural light of reason" (In Boeth. de Trin. 2.3).

Opposing Theories. Yet some Thomists indicate that a purely philosophical ethics would be an inadequate guide for the actual decisions of moral life [Jacques Maritain, Science and Wisdom (New York 1940) 174–209]. They suggest that the fall of man and original sin, together with the whole life of grace, are facts of faith that escape the natural ethicist. Consequently, Maritain and others insist that the Christian ethicist should "philosophize within the faith," utilizing certain principles that are known from revelation or from moral theology. A Christian ethics will thus be a more adequate and practical discipline, because it is subalternated to theology.

Other Thomists have criticized Maritain's proposal as destructive of the distinctive character of ethics, or as a fusion of ethics with moral theology [J. M. Ramirez, OP, "De philosophic morali Christiana," Divus Thomas 14 (Fribourg 1936) 87–122, 181–204; M. J. Le Guillon, OP, in Bulletin Thomiste, 8.1 (1952) 626–629; Klubertanz, "Ethics and Theology"]. No one denies that it is possible to develop a mixed moral science that would be useful to Christian believers unprepared to study all the details of moral theology. This would be a Christian ethics and not a purely philosophical ethics. It would not be convincing to people without the Catholic faith, and it would not serve as a bridge for ethical discussion with supporters of various types of natural ethics.

Ethical Presuppositions. The ethicist brings to his study certain convictions about the nature of the moral agent (man) and his relations to the rest of reality. Immanuel KANT, in his Critique of Practical Reason, claimed that ethics is impossible unless one postulates (or takes for granted) three things: the immortality and freedom of man, and the existence of God [Kant Selections, ed. T. M. Greene (New York 1929) 368]. For Kant, the moral agent must be immortal, in order that there be a duration adequate to the fulfilment of moral law; and man must be free, to be able to determine his will according to some law of understanding; finally, ethics must admit a highest good, which implies the existence of God. Kant supposed these three postulates to be so, even though his theoretical philosophy was unable to establish them, for he felt that ethical reasoning needs them. Some modern Catholic writers have adopted this terminology ["The Postulates" in J. F. Leibell, Readings in Ethics (Chicago 1926) 35–152]. There can be no objection to the contention that a valid ethics requires such convictions; however, in Thomism, these truths are not postulated, they are demonstrated in speculative philosophy. Some prior study of the philosophy of man, and possibly of metaphysics, is prerequisite to an understanding of ethics. The foundations of Thomistic ethics rest on the conclusions of the speculative philosophy of Thomas Aquinas.

Morality of Human Action. Thomistic ethics is divided into the consideration of voluntary actions as they are related to the private good of the person (individual ethics) and as they are related to the common good (social ethics). In both divisions, the approach is teleological; that is, ethics treats the HUMAN ACT in terms of the purpose or END (telos) to which it is ordered. This is not to say that "the end justifies the means"; whatever actions, or omissions, may be used to the attainment of an end that is good in itself, these means must also be good (or at least, in the abstract, morally neutral) in themselves, and the real circumstances that surround the action must be morally appropriate. There are, then, three determinants of the moral quality (goodness or evil) of a human action: (1) the end that is intended by the agent must be morally fitting; (2) the kind of action that is performed must be good, in the sense that it is not imprudent, unjust to others, intemperate, cowardly, or uncharitable (this determinant is the formal OBJECT); and (3) all the pertinent circumstances, required for the real context of the activity, must be present and reasonably suited to the nature of a human agent. (See MORALITY.)

Human Nature. Each individual moral agent belongs to the human species and has a specific nature in common with his fellow men. One cannot be a human agent unless endowed with certain living capacities to apprehend and desire various aspects of bodily things (SENSE KNOWL-EDGE and APPETITE). Every human agent requires an animated body capable of exercising at least some of its animal functions. Thus, men after death are no longer moral agents. Moreover, each moral person must have some use of INTELLECT and WILL, otherwise he is unable to bring about the rational ordering of his activities that entitles him to moral credit for good actions and punishment for evil ones.

While individual differences of mind and body distinguish one human being from another, it is not because of such differences that men are moral beings. Man's specific nature is so designed that certain actions are appropriate, and even peculiar, to his type of being. Briefly, what man does, which no other species does in the same way, is to reason about his experiences so that he may make free decisions to control his mental and bodily actions. His intellection and volition are performed in a distinctively human manner; neither brutes nor angels (man's closest neighbors in the hierarchy of being) understand or will, as man does.

Because of this community of human nature, all humans are subject to one and the same attraction of FINAL CAUSALITY. Irrespective of diversities of individual interest, all have the same specific purpose, or end, determined by their nature. This goal may be described from the viewpoint of man as the fullest possible use of all his capacities, under the direction of reason and will. This is what a Thomist means by HAPPINESS. From the side of that toward which human life is naturally directed, this ultimate goal is some being, great enough to be an inexhaustible object of human knowing and loving. This can only be a perfect being, God. All human actions that bring man nearer to the understanding and love of God are good; actions that remove man from this fulfilment are evil. (See MAN, NATURAL END OF.)

Elicited and Imperated Acts. In themselves, human acts are of two general types: elicited and imperated. Elicited actions are voluntary uses of understanding and will: they are begun and completed within the intellect and will of the agent. These are the actions that are most clearly moral. But man is not simply an immaterial being; he is capable of a variety of controlled functions of sensory cognition and appetition, and of many rationally controllable bodily activities. All of these sensory and bodily activities are assumed into moral life when open to rational direction. As such, lower activities are voluntary and are called imperated, or commanded, moral actions.

